Global Investigations Review

The Practitioner's Guide to Global Investigations

Volume I: Global Investigations in the United Kingdom and the United States

Fourth Edition

Editors
Judith Seddon, Eleanor Davison, Christopher J Morvillo, Michael Bowes QC, Luke Tolaini, Ama A Adams, Tara McGrath

2020

The Practitioner's Guide to Global Investigations

Fourth Edition

Editors

Judith Seddon

Eleanor Davison

Christopher J Morvillo

Michael Bowes QC

Luke Tolaini

Ama A Adams

Tara McGrath

GIR

Global Investigations Review

Published in the United Kingdom
by Law Business Research Ltd, London
Meridian House, 34-35 Farringdon Street, London, EC4A 4HL, UK

www.globalinvestigationsreview.com

The information provided in this publication is general and may not apply in a specific situation, nor does it necessarily represent the views of authors' firms or their clients. Legal advice should always be sought before taking any legal action based on the information provided. The publishers accept no responsibility for any acts or omissions contained herein. Although the information provided is accurate as of November 2019, be advised that this is a developing area.

Enquiries concerning reproduction should be sent to: natalie.hacker@lbresearch.com
Enquiries concerning editorial content should be directed to the Publisher:
david.samuels@lbresearch.com

ISBN 978-1-83862-228-2

Printed in Great Britain by Encompass Print Solutions, Derbyshire
Tel: 0844 2480 112

Dedicated to the memory of Rod Fletcher, one of the United Kingdom's most highly respected white-collar crime lawyers and a cherished friend.

Acknowledgements

ADDLESHAW GODDARD LLP
ALLEN & OVERY LLP
ANAGNOSTOPOULOS
ASSOCIATION OF CORPORATE INVESTIGATORS BAKER MCKENZIE LLP
BCL SOLICITORS LLP
BDO USA, LLP
BOFILL MIR & ALVAREZ JANA
BORDEN LADNER GERVAIS LLP
BROWN RUDNICK LLP
BRUNSWICK GROUP LLP
CADWALADER, WICKERSHAM & TAFT LLP
CLIFFORD CHANCE
CLOTH FAIR CHAMBERS
CMS CAMERON MCKENNA NABARRO OLSWANG LLP SCP
CONOR REARDON ESQ
CORKER BINNING
CRAVATH, SWAINE & MOORE LLP
DEBEVOISE & PLIMPTON LLP
DECHERT LLP
DLA PIPER LLP
FORNARI E ASSOCIATI
FOUNTAIN COURT CHAMBERS
FOX WILLIAMS LLP
FRESHFIELDS BRUCKHAUS DERINGER

GLEISS LUTZ

GOODWIN

GÜN + PARTNERS

HERBERT SMITH FREEHILLS LLP

HOMBURGER

JAMES P LOONAM ESQ

JENNER & BLOCK LLP

KINGSLEY NAPLEY LLP

KNOETZL

LATHAM & WATKINS

LAW OFFICES OF PANAG AND BABU

LINKLATERS LLP

MARVAL O'FARRELL & MAIRAL

MATHESON

MATRIX CHAMBERS

MILLER & CHEVALIER CHARTERED

NAVACELLE

OUTER TEMPLE CHAMBERS

PHILIPPI PRIETOCARRIZOSA FERRERO DU & URÍA – PPU

PINSENT MASONS LLP

RAJAH & TANN SINGAPORE LLP

REBAZA, ALCÁZAR & DE LAS CASAS

REED SMITH LLP

ROPES & GRAY LLP

RUSSELL MCVEAGH

SKADDEN, ARPS, SLATE, MEAGHER & FLOM (UK) LLP

SLAUGHTER AND MAY

SOFUNDE OSAKWE OGUNDIPE & BELGORE

SULLIVAN & CROMWELL LLP

TRENCH ROSSI WATANABE

VON WOBESER Y SIERRA, SC

WALDEN MACHT & HARAN LLP

Publisher's Note

The Practitioner's Guide to Global Investigations is published by Global Investigations Review (www.globalinvestigationsreview.com) – a news and analysis service for lawyers and related professionals who specialise in cross-border white-collar crime.

The Guide was suggested by the editors to fill a gap in the literature – namely, how does one conduct such an investigation, and what should one have in mind at various times?

It is published annually as a two-volume work and is also available online, as an e-book and in PDF format.

The volumes

This Guide is in two volumes.

Volume I takes the reader through the issues and risks faced at every stage in the life cycle of a serious corporate investigation, from the discovery of a potential problem through its exploration (either by the company itself, a law firm or government officials) all the way to final resolution – be that in a regulatory proceeding, a criminal hearing, civil litigation, an employment tribunal, a trial in the court of public opinion, or, just occasionally, inside the company's own four walls. As such it uses the position in the two most active jurisdictions for investigations of corporate misfeasance – the United States and the United Kingdom – to illustrate the approach and thought processes of those who are at the cutting edge of this work, on the basis that others can learn much from their approach, and there is a read-across to the position elsewhere.

Volume I is then complemented by Volume II's granular look at the detail of various jurisdictions, highlighting, among other things, where they vary from the norm.

Online

The Guide is available at www.globalinvestigationsreview.com. Containing the most up-to-date versions of the chapters in Volume I of the Guide, the website also allows visitors to quickly compare answers to questions in Volume II across all the jurisdictions covered.

The publisher would like to thank the editors for their exceptional energy, vision and intellectual rigour in devising and maintaining this work. Together we welcome any comments or suggestions from readers on how to improve it. Please write to us at:
insight@globalinvestigationsreview.com.

Preface

The history of the global investigation

Over the past decade, the number and profile of multi-agency, multi-jurisdictional regulatory and criminal investigations have risen exponentially. Naturally, this global phenomenon exposes companies and their employees to greater risk of potentially hostile encounters with foreign law enforcement authorities and regulators than ever before. This is partly owing to the continued globalisation of commerce, the increasing enthusiasm of some prosecutors to use expansive theories of corporate criminal liability to exact exorbitant penalties against corporations as a deterrent and public pressure to hold individuals accountable for the misconduct. The globalisation of corporate law enforcement, of course, has also spawned greater coordination between law enforcement agencies domestically and across borders. As a result, the pace and complexity of cross-border corporate investigations has markedly increased and created an environment in which the potential consequences, both direct and collateral, for individuals and businesses are of unprecedented magnitude.

The Guide

To aid practitioners faced with the myriad and often unexpected challenges of navigating a cross-border investigation, this book brings together for the first time the perspectives of leading experts from across the globe.

The chapters that follow in Volume I of the Guide cover in depth the broad spectrum of the law, practice and procedure applicable to cross-border investigations in both the United Kingdom and United States. Volume I tracks the development of a serious allegation (whether originating from an internal or external source) through its stages of development, considering the key risks and challenges as matters progress; it provides expert insight into the fact-gathering stage, document preservation and collection, witness interviews, and the complexities of cross-border privilege issues; and it discusses strategies to successfully resolve cross-border probes and manage corporate reputation throughout an investigation.

In Volume II, local experts from national jurisdictions respond to a common set of questions designed to identify the local nuances of law and practice that practitioners may encounter in responding to a cross-border investigation.

In the first edition, we signalled our intention to update and expand both parts of the book as the rules evolve and prosecutors' appetites change. The Guide continues to grow and extend its reach, in both substance and geographical scope. By its third edition, it had outgrown its original single-book format; the two parts of the Guide now have separate covers, although the hard copy of the Guide should still be viewed – and used – as a single reference work. All chapters are, of course, made available online and in other digital formats. Volume I also features tables of cases and legislation along with an index.

In this fourth edition, we have revised extant chapters to keep up with recent developments. To reflect an increased prosecutorial focus on individual accountability and on tone at the top, we have added US and UK chapters on the duties of directors to Volume I, outlining quite divergent corporate governance models. The questionnaire for Volume II authors has been extensively revised and reviewed by the editors and GIR staff. New questions zero in on the growing importance of technology in carrying out and investigating misconduct. There are also questions on economic sanctions, an area of heightened enforcement activity, which GIR has responded to this year with the launch of Just Sanctions (https://globalinvestigationsreview.com/just-sanctions). Volume II also carries regional overviews giving insight into cultural issues and regional coordination by authorities.

Volume II covers 25 jurisdictions, increasing the global coverage, particularly in South America, which continues to rake over recent corruption scandals. As corporate investigations and enforcer co-operation crosses more borders, we anticipate Volume II will become increasingly valuable to our readers: external and in-house counsel; compliance and accounting professionals; and prosecutors and regulators operating in this complex environment.

Acknowledgements

The Editors gratefully acknowledge the insightful contributions of the following lawyers from Clifford Chance: Oliver Pegden in London, Amy Montour and Mary Jane Yoon in New York, and Hena Schommer and Michelle Williams in Washington, DC. The Editors would also especially like to thank Clifford Chance associate Kaitlyn Ferguson in Washington, DC, Chris Stott, senior attorney at Ropes & Gray LLP in London, and Zoe Osborne, partner at Steptoe & Johnson in London.

Judith Seddon, Eleanor Davison, Christopher J Morvillo, Michael Bowes QC, Luke Tolaini, Ama A Adams, Tara McGrath
December 2019
London, New York and Washington, DC

Contents

Table of Cases

United Kingdom

United States of America

Australia

European Court of Human Rights

European Court of Justice

France

Hong Kong

New Zealand

Singapore

Table of Legislation

TABLE OF UK LEGISLATION

Statutes

Statutory Instruments

TABLE OF US LEGISLATION

CONSTITUTION

FEDERAL LEGISLATION

Federal Acts

US Code

Code of Federal Regulations (CFR)

Federal Rules

STATE LEGISLATION

Arizona:

California:

Connecticut:

Delaware:

District of Columbia:

Florida:

Illinois:

New York:

Ohio:

Oregon:

Pennsylvania:

Texas:

Washington:

TABLE OF OTHER NATIONAL LEGISLATION

Austria:

France:

Hong Kong:

Japan:

People's Republic of China:

Russia:

Switzerland:

TABLE OF INTERNATIONAL TREATIES, CONVENTIONS AND AGREEMENTS

TABLE OF EUROPEAN LEGISLATION

Treaties and Conventions

Regulations

Directives

Decisions

1

Introduction

Judith Seddon, Eleanor Davison, Christopher J Morvillo, Michael Bowes QC, Luke Tolaini, Ama A Adams and Tara McGrath[1]

As an introduction to Volume I of the Guide, this chapter addresses UK and US law regarding two critical concepts that a company facing an investigation in either or both jurisdictions will often need to consider at the outset: corporate criminal liability and double jeopardy. This chapter also sets out in summary the priorities and challenges companies face at each stage of an investigation – topics that are explored in more detail in the chapters that follow. One topic not explored, but likely to affect chapters in this guide with a European dimension, is the United Kingdom's decision to leave the European Union. (At the time of writing, neither the date of any departure nor the precise basis on which any departure will occur is clear.) Considerable uncertainty still remains surrounding the consequences, legal and otherwise, of exit arrangements, which we hope will have become clearer by the next edition. Whatever the United Kingdom's relationship with the European Union, co-operation between UK and US law enforcement is likely only to increase.

Bases of corporate criminal liability 1.1

When corporate misconduct that potentially implicates multiple jurisdictions is uncovered, a critical preliminary question is: what is the test, in each jurisdiction, for corporate criminal liability? Not all countries have regimes for the criminal liability of companies, but for those jurisdictions that do, it typically rests on the premise that the acts of certain employees can be attributed to the corporation.

1 Judith Seddon and Ama A Adams are partners at Ropes & Gray LLP; Christopher J Morvillo and Luke Tolaini are partners, and Tara McGrath is a senior associate, at Clifford Chance; Eleanor Davison is a barrister at Fountain Court Chambers; and Michael Bowes QC is a barrister at Outer Temple Chambers.

However, the category of employees that can trigger corporate liability differs between jurisdictions – in some, it is limited to those with management responsibilities, whereas in others the category of employees who can trigger corporate liability is much broader. Generally speaking, the act triggering corporate liability must occur within the scope of the person's activities as an employee. The act must also generally be done in the interest of, or for the benefit of, the corporation. The difference between theories of liability across jurisdictions inevitably poses challenges and complicates a company's strategy for dealing with a global investigation, and in some instances can determine the outcome.

1.1.1 Corporate criminal liability in the United Kingdom

In the United Kingdom, there are two main techniques to attribute to a corporate the acts and states of mind of the individuals it employs.

The first is by use of the 'identification principle' – or identification doctrine – whereby, subject to some limited exceptions, a company may be held liable for the criminal acts of those who represent its directing mind and will, and who control what it does. The relevant test is set out in the leading case of Tesco Ltd v. Nattrass:

> Where a limited company is the employer difficult questions do arise in a wide variety of circumstances in deciding which of its officers or servants is to be identified with the company so that his guilt is the guilt of the company.
>
> I must start by considering the nature of the personality which by a fiction the law attributes to a corporation. A living person has a mind which can have knowledge or intention or be negligent and he has hands to carry out his intentions. A corporation has none of these: it must act through living persons, though not always one or the same person. Then the person who acts is not speaking or acting for the company. He is acting as the company and his mind which directs his acts is the mind of the company. There is no question of the company being vicariously liable. He is not acting as a servant, representative, agent or delegate. He is an embodiment of the company or, one could say, he hears and speaks through the persona of the company, within his appropriate sphere, and his mind is the mind of the company. If it is a guilty mind then that guilt is the guilt of the company. It must be a question of law whether, once the facts have been ascertained, a person in doing particular things is to be regarded as the company or merely as the company's servant or agent.[2]

2 Tesco Supermarkets Ltd v. Nattrass [1972] AC 153; reaffirmed in Attorney General's Reference (No. 2 of 1999) [2000] 2 Cr App R 207 at 217-218 in which Rose LJ stated: 'Tesco v. Nattrass is still authoritative . . . and it is impossible to find a company guilty unless its alter ego is identified. None of the authorities since Tesco v. Nattrass . . . supports the demise of the doctrine of identification: all are concerned with statutory construction of different substantive offences and the appropriate rule of attribution was decided having regard to the legislative intent, namely whether Parliament intended companies to be liable. There is a sound reason for a special rule of attribution in relation to statutory offences rather than common law offences, namely there is, subject to a defence of reasonable practicability, an absolute duty imposed by the statutes. The authorities on statutory offences do not bear on the common law principle in relation to manslaughter. Lord Hoffmann's

It is for the judge to decide, as a matter of law, whether there is evidence on which a jury could be sure that a particular individual was a 'directing mind' within the Tesco principles; and, if there is such evidence, the jury must then be sure that the particular individual was in fact a directing mind for the purposes of his or her particular actions. A directing mind is not necessarily limited to board directors; it may also be found in a delegate who has full discretion to act independently of instructions from the directors. In short, under the identification principle, before a corporate can be found guilty of a criminal offence, someone who represents its directing mind and will must also be found guilty. There cannot be an aggregation of acts or omissions to attribute criminal conduct to the company; rather, the criminal act or omission must be performed by a single person who can be identified with the corporate for it to be liable.

The second technique of attributing liability to a company under English law is through vicarious liability. Although, in general, in the United Kingdom a corporate entity may not be convicted for the criminal acts of its inferior employees or agents, there are some exceptions, the most important of which concerns statutory offences that impose an absolute duty on the employer, even where the employer has not authorised or consented to the criminal act.[3]

Most significantly, statutory developments in the United Kingdom, starting with the offence of corporate manslaughter under the Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007, but more significantly the introduction of the Bribery Act 2010 and more recently Part 3 of the Criminal Finances Act 2017, represent a policy shift by introducing the offences of failure to prevent by an 'associated person' committed on behalf of the company, unless the company can demonstrate that it had adequate (or reasonable) procedures in place to prevent such offences occurring. These statutes have broad jurisdictional reach. Under the Bribery Act, for example, a corporate falling within the definition of a commercial organisation could be guilty even where no conduct occurred in, and where the associated person has no connection with, the United Kingdom.

The policy of the legislation to improve corporate governance is clear: Ministry of Justice guidance for the Bribery Act refers to the need for a corporate to create speech in Meridian is a re-statement not an abandonment of existing principles . . . .'; and Environment Agency v. St Regis Paper Co. Ltd [2012] 1 Cr App R 177 at paras. 10-12 in which, at para. 12, Moses LJ said: 'It seems to us that as a matter of statutory construction it is impossible to impose criminal liability for a breach . . . to the company in circumstances other than those where an intention to make a false entry can be attributed by operation of the rule in Tesco Supermarkets. There is, in our view, no warrant for imposing liability by virtue of the intentions of one who cannot be said to be the directing mind and will of [the defendant].' The identification principle was reaffirmed by the Court of Appeal in R v. A Ltd, X, Y [2016] EWCA Crim 1469. Most recently the Serious Fraud Office (SFO) was unsuccessful in having charges against Barclays Bank PLC reinstated through a voluntary bill of indictment, after all charges against the bank were dismissed in the Crown Court. The reasoning behind Davis LJ's decision cannot be reported until the conclusion of the trial of the individuals, including Barclays' former chief executive officer, https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2018/10/26/barclays-plc-and-barclays-bank-plc/.

---

3 These statutory offences are referred to by Rose LJ in Attorney General's Reference (No. 2 of 1999) [2000] 2 Cr App R 207 at 217-218, at footnote 2.

an 'anti-bribery culture'.[4] Similarly, a corporate is guilty of the offence of corporate manslaughter under the Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007 if the way in which its activities are managed or organised causes a person's death where a duty of care was owed. Guidance issued for the corporate offences of failure to prevent the criminal facilitation of tax evasion, which closely mirrors the Bribery Act guidance, also refers to the culture of the organisation. For example, commitment from top-level management should foster 'a culture within the relevant body in which activity intended to facilitate tax evasion is never acceptable'.[5] Each piece of legislation and accompanying guidance invites consideration of the company's culture – its attitudes, policies, systems and practices. The test for liability is closer to the test in the regulatory context where liability is based on broad principles and considers governance, and systems and controls.

It may be that this model of corporate criminal liability expands, in due course, to all economic crimes; on 13 January 2017 the government issued a Call for Evidence (which concluded in March 2017) to examine whether the law on corporate criminal liability in the United Kingdom needs reform. The government said that it was seeking to establish whether there is evidence of corporate crime going unpunished because of the current impediments presented by the identification doctrine, as well as evidence on the costs and benefits of further reform, bearing in mind the significant changes made in certain sectors to tackle misconduct. This, it indicated, would inform government decisions over whether to make further reforms.[6] It set out five options for reform: amendment of the identification doctrine; a strict (vicarious) liability doctrine; a strict (direct) liability offence – effectively a widening of the current offence under section 7 of the UK Bribery Act (section 7 offence); incorporation of the failure-to-prevent wording into substantive offences, but with the burden on the prosecution to establish that the company had not taken adequate steps to prevent the unlawful conduct; and possible sector-by-sector regulatory reform (implementation in other sectors of arrangements similar to the new individual accountability regimes introduced for financial services). It is yet to be seen what impact political uncertainty in the United Kingdom will have on this thinking and whether the government decides to make fundamental changes once the more immediate challenges arising from the departure from the European Union have been addressed.

There are signs that there may be broad support for applying the approach taken with the section 7 offence to other economic offences. The clearest indication of this to date has been in the report published in March 2019 by a committee of the House of Lords examining the effectiveness of the UK Bribery Act. Reflecting evidence received from lawyers, NGOs and enforcement authorities

4 Ministry of Justice Guidance on the Bribery Act 2010, issued pursuant to section 9 of the Bribery Act 2010.

5 Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs, Tackling tax evasion: Government guidance for the corporate offence of failure to prevent the criminal facilitation of tax evasion, 1 September 2017, at p. 25.

6 Ministry of Justice, Corporate Liability for Economic Crime: Call for Evidence, Consultation Document, at p. 4.

(including on the practical challenges presented by the identification principle), it concluded that the section 7 offence is an effective tool and called on the UK government to expedite the decision on whether to apply the approach to other offences.[7]

In the deferred prosecution agreement (DPA) context, the current high threshold for establishing corporate criminal liability in the United Kingdom is a problem inherent in the DPA regime: to enter into a DPA, a prosecutor must satisfy the evidential test, which requires either that the evidential stage of the Full Code Test in the Code for Crown Prosecutors is satisfied,[8] or that:

> there is at least a reasonable suspicion based upon some admissible evidence that [the company] has committed the offence, and there are reasonable grounds for believing that a continued investigation would provide further admissible evidence within a reasonable period of time, so that all the evidence together would be capable of establishing a realistic prospect of conviction in accordance with the Full Code Test.[9]

For that reason many expected DPAs to be used principally for section 7 offences, where the identification principle does not present an obstacle to satisfying the evidential test. So too is the prospect of DPAs being used for the failure to prevent the facilitation of tax evasion offence specifically laid out in the government's guidance.[10] With all that said, two of the five DPAs concluded to date relate to fraud offences (Tesco Stores Ltd[11] and Serco Geografix Ltd[12]) where both sides of the negotiation have had to grapple with the identification principle and the need for agreement on the existence of a 'directing mind and will'. To some extent this has also been the case in two of the three DPAs concerned with bribery. Sarclad Limited,[13] in addition to section 7 culpability, also accepted primary liability in relation to conspiracies to corrupt and to bribe. Sarclad was, however, a small company and, as Sir Brian Leveson, then President of the Queen's Bench Division, found, 'there is no question but that [Sarclad] spiralled into criminality

7 House of Lords Bribery Act 2010 Committee, Bribery Act 2010 Post-legislative Scrutiny, report published 14 March 2019 (https://publications.parliament.uk/pa/ld201719/ldselect/ldbribact/303/30302.htm).

8 Namely that prosecutors must be satisfied that there is sufficient evidence to provide a realistic prospect of conviction against each suspect on each charge. They must consider what the defence case may be, and how it is likely to affect the prospects of conviction. A case that does not pass the evidential stage must not proceed, no matter how serious or sensitive it may be.

9 DPA Code of Practice at para. 1.2(i)(b) (https://www.sfo.gov.uk/publications/guidance-policy-and-protocols/deferred-prosecution-agreements/).

10 Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs, Tackling tax evasion: Government guidance for the corporate offence of failure to prevent the criminal facilitation of tax evasion, 1 September 2017, at p. 13.

11 SFO v. Tesco Stores Ltd [2019] Lloyd's Rep FC 283.

12 SFO v. Serco Geografix Ltd [2019] 7 WLUK 45.

13 Sarclad Limited was previously referred to as XYZ Limited pending the conclusion of associated proceedings against individuals. Those proceedings concluded with the acquittal of individuals in July 2019.

as a result of the conduct of a small number of senior executives bending to the will of agents.'[14] In other words, the identification principle did not, in that case, present a problem. However, in Rolls-Royce, the DPA spanned three decades, and dealt with conduct much of which pre-dated the introduction of the Bribery Act 2010 and which formed the basis of seven counts of conspiracy to corrupt and false accounting. The remaining five counts related to section 7 offences. We can conclude that in that case, despite being considerably larger than Sarclad, the identification principle did not present evidential hurdles in reaching a settlement although the Serious Fraud Office (SFO) closed its related investigation of individuals.

The Call for Evidence recognised that 'the effectiveness of the DPA as an alternative disposal depends on there being a realistic threat of prosecution', which, they conclude, 'lends weight to the suggestion that the "failure to prevent" model would offer a more realistic threat of successful prosecution than a case built on the application of the identification doctrine'.[15] The failure-to-prevent model as enacted in the Bribery Act and now the Criminal Finances Act is described in the Call for Evidence as having 'some clear advantages'. Apart from being readily applicable to offending by organisations of any size, the government is explicit in the power of the model to effect corporate cultural change by acting as 'an incentive to companies to include the prevention of economic crime as an integral part of corporate governance and, should it afford a more realistic threat of prosecution, it might enhance the effectiveness of DPAs as an alternative to criminal prosecution'.[16]

1.1.2 Corporate criminal liability in the United States

The United States has long recognised principles of corporate liability based on common law and statutory bases.[17] The application of these concepts, however, has evolved over time and was most recently shaped by the global financial crisis of 2007–2008, where the spectre of industry and market collapse loomed large. Today, increasing emphasis on individual liability and corporate culture continues to shape and refine this area of law.

In the United States, the common law of agency plays an important role. Specifically, under principles of respondeat superior, a company may be held vicariously liable for the illegal acts of any of its agents (including employees and contract personnel) so long as those actions were within the scope of the agents' duties and were intended, even if only in part, to benefit the corporation.[18] An act is considered 'within the scope of an agent's employment' if the individual commits 14 SFO v. XYZ Ltd (Case No. U20150856) (Preliminary Redacted) Approved Judgment, dated 8 July 2016 at para. 34.

15 Ministry of Justice, Corporate Liability for Economic Crime: Call for Evidence, Consultation Document, at p. 23.

16 Ibid. at p. 21.

17 Charles Doyle, Congressional Research Service, Corporate Criminal Liability: An Overview of Federal Law 1 (2013).

18 Jones v. Federated Fin. Reserve Corp., 144 F.3d 961, 965 (6th Cir. 1998). See also Hamilton v. Carell, 243 F.3d 992, 1001 (6th Cir. 2001).

the act as part of his or her general line of work and with at least the partial intent to benefit the corporation.[19] The corporation need not receive an actual benefit and may be liable for these offences even if it directs its agent not to commit the offence.[20]

Moreover, even where no single employee has the requisite intent or knowledge to satisfy the scienter element of a crime, courts have recognised a 'collective knowledge doctrine' – where several employees collectively know enough to satisfy the intent or knowledge requirement, courts can impute this collective intent and knowledge to the corporation.[21] While historically courts have used the doctrine to establish knowledge on the part of a corporation, in recent years the doctrine has also been used to establish a corporation's intent (i.e., to establish whether the corporation acted wilfully).[22] This doctrine is not universally accepted and some courts have limited it to circumstances where the company was flagrantly indifferent to the offences being committed.[23]

Additionally, beyond the common law principle of respondeat superior, some legislation imposes criminal liability for companies, including in the fields of environmental and antitrust law.[24] Such statutes have the dual effects of forcing companies to internalise the costs of their wrongdoing and of increasing the deterrent effect of the law or regulation. For example, in a field such as environmental law, where misconduct can have tremendous collateral and long-term consequences, 19 United States v. Singh, 518 F.3d 236, 249 (4th Cir. 2008) (citing United States v. Automated Med. Labs., 770 F. 2d 399, 406–47 (4th Cir. 1985)).

20 Automated Med. Labs., 770 F.2d at 407.

21 United States v. Sci. Applications Int'l Corp., 555 F. Supp. 2d 40, 55–56 (D.C. Cir. 2008). See also United States v. Bank of New England, N.A., 821 F.2d 844, 856 (1st Cir. 1987); United States v. T.I.M.E.-D.C., Inc., 381 F. Supp. 730, 738–39 (W.D. Va. 1974).

22 See United States v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., No. 14-CR-00175-TEH, 2015 WL 9460313 (N.D. Cal. 23 December 2015). There, a grand jury charged the Pacific Gas & Electric Company with violating the Pipeline Safety Act after a gas line erupted causing several deaths and injuries. The company moved to dismiss on the basis that the grand jury received incorrect instructions on, inter alia, collective intent. In denying the motion to dismiss, the court held that the collective knowledge of the corporation's employees demonstrated that they wilfully disregarded their legal duty to abide by the safety standards outlined in the Act. Id. at *3. Following a jury conviction on five counts, the company sought to have the case set aside; however, the court held that a reasonable juror could have found wilfulness beyond a reasonable doubt based on the evidence presented. United States v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., No. 14-CR-00175-TEH, 2016 WL 6804575, at *3 (N.D. Cal. 17 November 2016). See also United States v. FedEx Corp., 2016 U.S. Dist LEXIS 52438 (N.D. Cal. 18 April 2016) (denying FedEx's motion to dismiss, which was premised on the ground that the jury received incorrect instructions on collective intent and collective knowledge).

23 T.I.M.E.-D.C., Inc., 381 F. Supp. at 740.

24 See, e.g., United States v. Hopkins, 53 F.3d 533 (2d Cir. 1995) (imposing a strict liability standard for a violation of the Clean Water Act); United States v. Weitzenhoff, 35 F.3d 1275 (9th Cir. 1993). Contra United States v. Ahmad, 101 F.3d 386 (5th Cir. 1996) (suggesting that there is a mens rea requirement for violations of the Clean Water Act). See also James Swann and Alex Ruoff, Self-Referral Law Seen as Barrier to New Provider Agreements, Bloomberg BNA (5 May 2016), http://www.bna.com/selfreferral-law-seen-n57982070764/ (discussing the physician self-referral law's imposition of strict liability).

the imposition of liability on the company acts as a strong incentive for corporate monitoring of employees and thorough due diligence and risk assessment.

Although corporate criminal liability has been a feature of US law since the nineteenth century,[25] the criminal prosecution of corporations slowed abruptly and significantly – although temporarily – following the ill-fated prosecution of Arthur Andersen in 2002; the conviction (subsequently overturned by the US Supreme Court) resulted in the firm's collapse and job losses for many thousands of innocent employees.[26] In the aftermath of the Arthur Andersen case, prosecutors became far more hesitant to unleash the brute force of criminal charges against companies.[27] Although limited prosecutions continued following Arthur Andersen, they were further reduced in number when, in the wake of the financial meltdown of 2007–2008, many feared that prosecuting big banks and large employers might lead to further economic turmoil.[28] This idea, that an entity might be 'too big to fail', is now widely rejected by both prosecutors and the public, and there has since been a marked uptick in prosecutions. Today, prosecutors are generally less willing to accept the prospect of dire collateral consequences as justification for not pursuing criminal charges against corporations and have required guilty pleas from large corporations, previously considered 'too big to jail'. As corporations survive – and even thrive – in the wake of guilty pleas, the spectre of the Arthur Andersen case recedes and the rigour with which prosecutors pursue companies continues to increase.[29]

In recent years, the United States has increasingly placed emphasis on an organisation's compliance culture and internal controls. The result is that self-reporting, full acceptance of responsibility and the disclosure of all relevant facts concerning culpable individuals (regardless of seniority) now form the basis on which the government awards co-operation credit. The Department of Justice's (DOJ) Justice Manual, the Security and Exchange Commission's (SEC) Seaboard factors, US Sentencing Guidelines and the 'Yates Memorandum', each of which is discussed in detail in later chapters, all reflect this pronounced shift in enforcement priorities. As a recent example, in late 2017 the DOJ introduced the Corporate 25 For a discussion of the history and development of corporate criminal liability in the United States, see Kathleen F Brickey, Corporate Criminal Accountability: A Brief History and an Observation, 60 Wash. U. L.Q. 393, 404–15 (1982).

26 Arthur Andersen LLP v. United States, 544 U.S. 696 (2005). For a complete history of Arthur Andersen LLP, see Susan E Squires et al., Inside Arthur Andersen: Shifting Values, Unexpected Consequences (2003).

27 See Gabriel Markoff, 'Arthur Andersen and the Myth of the Corporate Death Penalty: Corporate Criminal Convictions in the Twenty-First Century', 15 U. Pa. J. Bus. L. 797, 805–07 (2013).

28 See Gretchen Morgenson and Louise Story, 'Behind the Gentler Approach to Banks by US', N.Y. Times, 7 July 2011, at A1.

29 See, e.g., Peter J Henning, 'Seeking Guilty Pleas From Corporations While Limiting the Fallout', N.Y. Times Dealbook (5 May 2014), https://dealbook.nytimes.com/2014/05/05/seeking-guilty-pleas-from-corporations-while-limiting-the-fallout/; Francine McKenna, 'Why the Ghost of Arthur Andersen No Longer Haunts Corporate Criminals', MarketWatch (21 May 2015), https://www.marketwatch.com/story/why-the-ghost-of-arthur-andersen-no-longer-haunts-corporate-criminals-2015-05-21.

Enforcement Policy, which creates a rebuttable presumption that the DOJ will grant a declination to a company in regard to Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA) violations where the company satisfies the requirements for voluntary self-disclosure, co-operation and remediation. The DOJ has also announced that it will use the Corporate Enforcement Policy as non-binding guidance in criminal cases outside the FCPA context.

Although the price of attaining corporate co-operation credit is often painfully high, most companies have no choice but to tolerate it; co-operation typically provides the best prospect for a company to prevent a criminal charge, minimise financial penalties and avoid other harsh collateral consequences, such as the imposition of a monitor. Still, co-operation is not for the faint of heart, and any company operating in the United States or subject to US jurisdiction should carefully consider the far-reaching consequences – both good and bad – of setting off down the often treacherous path of co-operation. Once a company voluntarily discloses misconduct to the government, the ability to defend the case and control the process is effectively relinquished, and a company will find it very difficult to withhold sensitive, embarrassing or even harmful information. Given the highly uncertain alternative to co-operation, however, most companies accept and embrace this new reality from the start of an internal investigation and understand that factual findings far more often than not – if they involve potential criminal misconduct – will be presented to law enforcement.[30]

Double jeopardy 1.2

Another key question in any global investigation – where misconduct crosses borders and where more than one enforcement authority may seek to assert jurisdiction – is the extent to which different authorities can sanction the same or similar conduct. While domestic constitutional provisions on double jeopardy are similar between nation states, no universally accepted international norm exists, and the protection afforded by the laws in one country may offer no protection in another. This can present a major difficulty to achieving a satisfactory global settlement for a client.

The doctrine of double jeopardy is that a person should not be tried twice for the same offence.[31] Its underlying objective is to bring finality to criminal proceedings against individuals and companies in specific circumstances. Double jeopardy applies to criminal proceedings, but has been held by the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) to encompass an administrative penalty, in circumstances where that penalty was classified as a criminal penalty because of the nature of the charges and the severity of the punishment.[32]

30 U.S. Dep't of Justice, Justice Manual §9-28.700 (2015).

31 The ne bis in idem or double jeopardy principle is well established both in EU law and under the European Convention on Human Rights. The phrase is derived from the Roman law maxim nemo debet bis vexari pro una et eadem causa (a man shall not be twice vexed [or tried] for the same cause).

32 Grande Stevens and Others v. Italy (4 March 2014) Application Nos. 18640/10, 18647/10, 18668/10 and 18698/10.

In the United Kingdom, there are two essential conditions for the doctrine to apply. First, the case must be 'finally disposed of' and second, any penalty imposed must actually have been enforced or be in the process of being enforced. The rationale for the doctrine is that it confers protection on the person (individual or corporate) from the risk of repeated prosecution by the State with its greater resources.[33] Reflecting similar concerns, the concept of double jeopardy in the United States is rooted in the Fifth Amendment to the US Constitution, which reads in relevant part: 'nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb'.[34] These twenty words have generated tens – if not hundreds – of thousands of pages of case law and are worthy of a treatise in themselves. Distilled to its essence, however, double jeopardy in the United States applies to prohibit subsequent prosecution or multiple punishments of an individual or corporation for the same conduct.[35] Nevertheless, the doctrine of double jeopardy is complicated by the question of dual sovereignty, which holds that double jeopardy's bar against successive prosecution for the same conduct does not apply when the prior prosecution was brought by a separate sovereign, for example, the US government is not barred from bringing a case where a state or another country has already prosecuted the defendant for the same conduct and vice versa.

1.2.1 Double jeopardy in the United Kingdom

In England, the principle of double jeopardy is well established and has its origins in 12th-century common and ecclesiastical law. The modern principle of double jeopardy in English law was set out by the Divisional Court in Fofana v. Deputy Prosecutor Thubin, Tribunal de Grande Instance de Meaux, France:

> The authorities establish two circumstances in English law that offend the principle of double jeopardy:
> (1) Following an acquittal or conviction for an offence, which is the same in fact and law – autrefois acquit or convict*; and*
> (2) following a trial for any offence which was founded on 'the same or substantially the same facts', where the court would normally consider it right to stay the prosecution as an abuse of process and/or unless the prosecution can show 'special circumstances' why another trial should take place.[36]

33 The protection is not absolute. A second trial is permitted in defined circumstances. In the United Kingdom, a prosecutor will seek a retrial if a jury has been unable to reach a verdict in the initial trial. A further trial in murder cases may also be permitted in circumstances where compelling new evidence comes to light.

34 U.S. Const. amend. V.

35 See generally Ernest H Schopler, Annotation, Supreme Court's Views of Fifth Amendment's Double Jeopardy Clause Pertinent to or Applied in Federal Criminal Cases, 50 L. Ed. 2d 830 (2012).

36 [2006] EWHC 744 (Admin), Judgment at para. 18.

The Divisional Court referred expressly to the United Kingdom's adoption of Article 54 of the Schengen Convention and its underlying rationale.[37] This is particularly important, as Article 54 states that a person (or company) whose case has been 'finally disposed of' by one Contracting Party may not be prosecuted by another for the 'same acts', provided that any penalty imposed has been enforced or is being enforced.[38]

Throughout the judgment, the Court stressed the need to look at the underlying acts behind each charge, rather than the label of the charge itself. In the event, the Court stayed the extradition proceedings on the basis that, although the extradition offence specified in the warrant was not based exactly, or solely, on the same facts as those charged in the UK indictment, there was such significant overlap between them as to require the proceedings to be stayed.[39]

In the case of DePuy International Limited, the SFO applied the double jeopardy principle and confirmed that it will likely arise where there is or has been an investigation into the defendant's conduct by another authority overseas and the essence of a criminal offence in England and Wales is the same offence for which the defendant already faces trial, or has been acquitted or convicted. DePuy was a UK subsidiary of Johnson & Johnson, a US company that self-reported to the DOJ and the SEC bribery of foreign officials by DePuy, as well as other offences that did not involve the company, under the FCPA. Johnson & Johnson agreed to a DPA with the DOJ covering the FCPA violations and a civil sanction with the SEC that encompassed criminal and civil fines amounting to US$70 million.

The DOJ informed the SFO of the criminal conduct and the SFO commenced an investigation into DePuy and Mr Dougall, the company's marketing manager. The SFO took the view that the DPA agreed by the parent company with the DOJ had the legal character of a formally concluded prosecution that punished the same conduct that had formed the basis of the SFO investigation. It determined that the rule against double jeopardy prevented any further criminal sanction being applied in the United Kingdom and instead pursued the company using a civil route to obtain the proceeds of crime. The civil sum obtained by the SFO took into account the global settlement in the United States, including the civil fines paid and recovered of £4.8 million.

Whether a DPA under the United Kingdom's regime would qualify for double jeopardy protection remains an open question. Although entry into a DPA does not constitute a criminal conviction, it does become the final disposal of specific intended criminal proceedings on its expiry and is almost certain to include the enforcement of a fine against the corporate subject. Furthermore, prosecution may follow in the event of a breach of the DPA.

The DePuy case developed further in July 2019 with proceedings being brought in Greece against three UK nationals, Michael Dormer, Johnson &

37 Id. at para. 14.

38 In the United Kingdom, the decision to leave the EU adds further uncertainty to the recognition of double jeopardy principle in its application to convictions in other Member States.

39 [2006] EWHC 744 (Admin) Judgment at para. 29.

Johnson's former company group chairman, Gary Fitzpatrick, former vice president for finance at DePuy, and John Coppack, DePuy's former company secretary, as well as a number of Greek nationals. The three UK nationals were convicted of fraud and money laundering offences and sentenced to seven years in prison. As at the date of publication, these sentences are under appeal.

In addition to the convictions, the court acquitted six defendants of the charges, including DePuy's former legal director, Irene Kyriakides, and its former vice president, Robert John Dougall. Dougall was acquitted of the charges on double jeopardy grounds having already been convicted of taking part in the same bribery scheme in the United Kingdom in 2010. Some of the evidence Greek prosecutors sought to rely on to build a case against Dougall had come from the SFO following Dougall's co-operation under a section 73 Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 agreement. At the Greek trial, the SFO's associate general counsel, Raymond Emson, testified to say that the agency had not consented to the use of its evidence to prosecute Dougall in Greece and that its continued use could harm UK public interest.[40]

1.2.2 Double jeopardy in the United States

As noted above, the Fifth Amendment to the US Constitution contains a double jeopardy clause. Generally speaking, the double jeopardy clause prohibits the US federal government, or any individual state, from twice prosecuting someone for the same conduct if that person has already been acquitted or convicted (or after certain mistrials once a jury has been empanelled and 'jeopardy has attached').[41] It also prohibits courts from imposing multiple punishments for the same conduct, which may be covered in multiple charges in an indictment.[42] The double jeopardy clause of the Fifth Amendment – unlike its privilege against self-incrimination – applies to both individuals and corporations.[43]

The US Supreme Court, however, has long recognised a significant exception to the double jeopardy clause, known as the 'dual sovereignty' doctrine. Pursuant to this, double jeopardy does not prohibit the federal government from prosecuting a person previously convicted or acquitted by a state, or vice versa, or one state from prosecuting a person convicted or acquitted by another.[44] In other words, under this doctrine the US federal government can prosecute individuals and entities for the exact same conduct that they have previously been tried for in 40 https://globalinvestigationsreview.com/article/1195671/greece-convicts-three-uk-nationals-in-johnson-johnson-bribery-case#.Xa3IneLu1GM.mailto and https://globalinvestigationsreview.com/article/1195718/former-johnson-johnson-execs-to-appeal-against-greek-bribery-convictions#.Xa3JQi_97kI.mailto.

41 See U.S. Const. amend. V; Martinez v. Illinois, 134 S. Ct. 2070, 2074.

42 See Breed v. Jones, 421 U.S. 519, 528 (1975).

43 See United States v. Martin Linen Supply Co., 430 U.S. 564 (1977) (applying double jeopardy to corporate defendants without discussing their status as corporations); United States v. Sec. Nat'l Bank, 546 F.2d 492, 494 (2d Cir. 1976).

44 Gamble v. United States, 139 S. Ct. 1960 (2019). See also, United States v. Lanza, 260 U.S. 377, 385 (1922).

one of the states, regardless of whether they were convicted or acquitted in that prior case.[45]

In 2019, the Supreme Court, in Gamble v. United States, once again reaffirmed the dual sovereignty doctrine in upholding successive prosecutions of an individual by the state of Alabama and then by the United States for the same essential conduct.[46] Although Gamble involved purely US domestic conduct, the Court highlighted that the dual sovereignty doctrine helped ensure the United States retained authority to prosecute extraterritorial conduct – regardless of a foreign prosecution – to vindicate US interests. In arriving at this conclusion, the Court observed:

> There are other reasons not to offload all prosecutions for crimes involving Americans abroad. We may lack confidence in the competence or honesty of the other country's legal system. Less cynically, we may think that special protection for US nationals serves key national interests related to security, trade, commerce, or scholarship. Such interests might also give us a stake in punishing crimes committed by US nationals abroad – especially crimes that might do harm to our national security or foreign relations.[47]

The Court's cynicism aside, this decision clearly underscores the prudence of pre-resolution engagement with US authorities for companies and individuals facing investigations in a foreign jurisdiction where US interests might be implicated.

Nevertheless, while the law clearly allows successive prosecutions in such instances, to blunt the potentially harsh impact of the dual sovereignty exception, the DOJ has adopted a policy that precludes the initiation of federal prosecution following a prior state (or federal) prosecution based on substantially the same facts. The Dual and Successive Prosecution Policy (the Petite Policy) seeks:

> to vindicate substantial federal interests through appropriate federal prosecutions, to protect persons charged with criminal conduct from the burdens associated with multiple prosecutions and punishments for substantially the same act(s) or transaction(s), to promote efficient utilization of Department resources, and to promote coordination and cooperation between federal and state prosecutors.[48]

---

45 Notably, the Supreme Court very recently declined to extend the dual sovereignty doctrine to successive prosecutions by Puerto Rico and the United States, concluding that the question of separate sovereignty requires an assessment of the source of the power to punish. Puerto Rico v. Sanchez Valle, 136 S. Ct. 1863 (2016). There, the Court held that successive prosecutions may be brought only where two prosecuting authorities derive their power to punish from independent sources; if those authorities draw their power from the same ultimate source, successive prosecutions are prohibited.

46 Gamble, 139 S. Ct. at 1964.

47 Id. at 1967 (emphasis in original).

48 U.S. Dep't of Justice, Justice Manual §9-2.031 (1999).

To overcome this policy, federal prosecutors must not only comply with the standards applicable for commencing any federal prosecution (i.e., that the defendant's conduct constitutes a federal offence and that the admissible evidence probably will be sufficient to obtain and sustain a conviction by an unbiased trier of fact), but they must also obtain the approval of the appropriate Assistant Attorney General and establish that (1) the matter involves a substantial federal interest; and (2) the prior prosecution left that federal interest 'demonstrably unvindicated'. It is the second of these two factors that provides the greatest protection against successive prosecutions, as, under this policy, the DOJ 'will presume that a prior prosecution, regardless of result, has vindicated the relevant federal interest'.[49] While this presumption can, of course, be overcome (and the policy lists the factors relevant to make such an assessment),[50] federal prosecutors traditionally reserve such challenges for those cases where it perceives the preceding result to have been manifestly unjust.

Notably, the Petite Policy does not expressly preclude the DOJ from bringing criminal charges based on the same conduct previously prosecuted by a foreign sovereign. Nevertheless, similar, if not identical, principles are at play whether the prior prosecution was brought by a state or federal government, or a foreign sovereign. Counsel endeavouring to persuade the DOJ to defer to the foreign result certainly should be prepared to demonstrate why a successive prosecution would contravene that policy. The DOJ will, of course, consider if US interests have been sufficiently redressed by the foreign prosecution.[51] And, in the cases of corporate criminal activity, it is likely that the DOJ will seek to exact a penalty based on the harm to its interests.

Still, if a prior prosecution by a foreign sovereign has resulted in adequate penalties proportionate to the conduct, the DOJ may well decline or defer the prosecution or, perhaps, offset any US fines or penalties by the amounts paid abroad, particularly in the corporate context. This is particularly likely in the wake of the DOJ's new policy, announced in May 2018 and since incorporated into the DOJ's Justice Manual, to discourage the 'piling on' of multiple penalties by the DOJ and foreign and domestic agencies when they are investigating the same corporate misconduct.[52] The policy articulates certain factors to be used when determining whether the imposition of multiple penalties would nevertheless serve the interest of justice, and therefore there is no certainty that prior prosecution by a foreign sovereign will result in no or lenient punishment by the United States.

The double jeopardy clause generally does not restrict the ability of the US government to pursue successive criminal and administrative remedies for the

49 Id.

50 Id.

51 See Thompson v. United States, 444 U.S. 248, 248 (1980) (noting that there is an exception to the Petite Policy where US prosecution would serve 'compelling interests of federal law enforcement').

52 US Dep't of Justice, Justice Manual §1-12.100; Deputy Att'y Gen. Rod Rosenstein, Remarks to the New York City Bar White Collar Crime Institute (9 May 2018), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/deputy-attorney-general-rod-rosenstein-delivers-remarks-new-york-city-bar-white-collar.

same conduct.[53] Indeed, while it is more common for administrative investigations to run in parallel with DOJ investigations, double jeopardy is not offended when a criminal prosecution follows the imposition of an administrative sanction (or vice versa). As the Supreme Court held in Hudson v. United States, the double jeopardy clause does not apply to non-criminal penalties.[54] Though the Court in Hudson recognised that criminal charges following in the wake of stinging administrative penalties could potentially implicate double jeopardy concerns, a defendant mounting such a challenge must establish by the 'clearest proof' that the administrative penalty was so punitive as to render it criminal for double jeopardy purposes – a very high hurdle indeed.[55]

The application of double jeopardy in the EU and under the ECHR 1.2.3

Increased focus on combating overseas corruption following the signing of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development's Convention on Combating Bribery of Foreign Public Officials in International Business Transactions has resulted in a rise in multiple prosecutions. A person or company engaging in overseas corruption faces the prospect of prosecution in any signatory country where he, she or the company may have sufficient involvement, either by citizenship or place of incorporation, or as a place where relevant acts took place.

The picture is evolving on both the supranational and national levels, and this is discussed below. The double jeopardy principle is set out in Article 54 of the 1985 Schengen Agreement.[56] On 29 May 2000, the United Kingdom adopted Article 54 of the Schengen Convention and so it presently forms part of the domestic law.[57] The rationale for the application of the principle across the European Union was made clear in R v. Gozutok and Brugge,[58] as permitting finality in criminal proceedings and also engendering mutual trust in national criminal justice systems by requiring that each Member State recognise the criminal laws in force in the others even when the outcome would be different if its own national law had been applied.

The Council Framework Decision 2009 on the prevention and settlement of conflicts of exercise of jurisdiction in criminal proceedings (the EU Framework Decision)[59] sets out measures to prevent situations where the same person is subject to parallel criminal proceedings in different Member States in respect of the 53 See Hudson v. United States, 522 U.S. 93, 96 (1997).

54 Id. at 99.

55 See id.

56 Article 54: 'A person whose trial has been finally disposed of in one contracting party may not be prosecuted in another contracting party for the same acts provided that, if a penalty has been imposed, it has been enforced, is actually in the process of being enforced or can no longer be enforced under the laws of the sentencing contracting party.'

57 2000/365/EC: Council Decision of 29 May 2000 concerning the request of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to take part in some of the provisions of the Schengen acquis.

58 [2003] 2 CMLR 2.

59 2009/948/JHA.

same facts that might lead to the final disposal of those proceedings in two or more Member States.

The EU Framework Decision is constitutionally binding on the United Kingdom as a Member State and as such must be taken into account by the SFO in its decision whether to open a criminal investigation. The double jeopardy principle is not a bar to a criminal investigation, however, and the SFO has very wide discretion in deciding whether to carry out an investigation.[60]

1.2.4 European human rights jurisprudence

1.2.4.1 European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR)

Article 4 of Protocol 7 to the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) specifically recognises the double jeopardy principle.[61]

The importance of the principle was emphasised in the ECtHR's Chamber judgment in the case of Grande Stevens and Others v. Italy.[62] Here, the applicants received an administrative penalty from Consob, the Italian Companies and Stock Exchange Commission, in respect of providing false or misleading information concerning financial instruments. The penalty took the form of substantial fines and various banning orders. Subsequently, the applicants were committed for trial before the Turin District Court in respect of criminal allegations of market abuse arising out of the same facts.

The applicants argued before the ECtHR that the subsequent criminal proceedings were in breach of Article 4 as the applicants had already been subject to a penalty that was akin to a criminal penalty, even though it was imposed in an administrative context. The court accepted their argument and ruled that the administrative penalty should be considered a criminal penalty for the purposes of the ECHR and that Article 4 prevented the criminal proceedings from taking place on the grounds of double jeopardy.[63]

---

60 Section 1(3) of the Criminal Justice Act 1987: 'The Director may investigate any suspected offence which appears to him on reasonable grounds to involve serious or complex fraud.' See also R (Corner House) v. Director of the SFO [2008] EWHC 714 (Admin) at para. 51.

61 Article 4 – Right not to be tried or punished twice

1 No one shall be liable to be tried or punished again in criminal proceedings under the jurisdiction of the same State for an offence for which he has already been finally acquitted or convicted in accordance with the law and penal procedure of that State.

2 The provisions of the preceding paragraph shall not prevent the reopening of the case in accordance with the law and penal procedure of the State concerned, if there is evidence of new or newly discovered facts, or if there has been a fundamental defect in the previous proceedings, which could affect the outcome of the case.

3 No derogation from this Article shall be made under Article 15 of the Convention.

62 Grande Stevens and Others v. Italy (4 March 2014) Application Nos. 18640/10, 18647/10, 18668/10 and 18698/10.

63 In March 2015, France's Constitutional Court ruled that Airbus executives could not be prosecuted for insider trading because they had been cleared over similar administrative charges by France's Financial Markets Authority, the AMF. In reaching its decision, the Court gave considerable weight to the decision of the ECtHR in the Grande Stevens case.

The Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) 1.2.4.2

2018 saw three further cases arising in Italy where the principle of double jeopardy was considered, again in relation to administrative penalties imposed by Consob which were severe enough to be considered criminal in nature. All these cases were referred to the CJEU by Italy's Supreme Court of Cassation for a preliminary ruling considering Article 50 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union and Article 4, Protocol 7 ECHR.

In the Ricucci matter,[64] the defendant had been fined €10.2 million by Consob, as well as being convicted in criminal proceedings resulting in a sentence of four years' imprisonment for alleged market manipulation. The Rome District Court subsequently pardoned Ricucci in a final judgment.

Ricucci challenged Consob's fine in Rome's Court of Appeal, which reduced it to €5 million in 2009. He then took his appeal to Italy's Supreme Court of Cassation, where he argued that his 2008 criminal conviction and subsequent pardon should negate any Consob proceedings. The Court of Appeal asked the CJEU whether the ne bis in idem principle in Article 50 gives individuals a direct right that can be applied to negate dual proceedings. The Court also asked the CJEU whether the ne bis in idem principle precludes Italy's law allowing administrative proceedings to be brought for market manipulation after a defendant has been finally convicted.

The CJEU held that dual proceedings can be pursued if they meet 'an objective of general interest' – in this case, to protect the European Union's financial interests. However, the national legislation must also ensure that proceedings and the severity of penalties are limited to 'what is strictly necessary' where dual proceedings are to be pursued. Italy's market manipulation law did not respect the principle of proportionality, and the CJEU ruled that, if a criminal penalty already punishes misconduct in an 'effective, proportionate and dissuasive manner', administrative proceedings of a criminal nature are gratuitous and so go beyond 'what is strictly necessary'.

In two other cases, Di Puma and Zecca,[65] appeals were made against Consob fines, with the defendants arguing that they should not face administrative charges for insider trading when a criminal court had found no misconduct. The appeals court asked the CJEU whether, in light of ne bis in idem, a court would violate an EU directive that requires Member States to provide 'effective, proportionate and dissuasive penalties' for insider trading if it did not bring administrative sanctions after a criminal court found no wrongdoing.

The CJEU determined in its preliminary ruling that not bringing administrative sanctions after a criminal court has found no misconduct is in accordance with EU law because of the principle of res judicata. It ruled that a defendant who is cleared of a criminal charge should not be the subject of administrative proceedings for the same matter.

64 Case C-537/16: Judgment of the Court (Grand Chamber) of 20 March 2018 (request for a preliminary ruling from the Supreme Court of Cassation – Italy). See also https://globalinvestigationsreview.com/article/1168169/cjeu-italian-defendants-should-not-face-double-jeopardy.

65 Joined Cases C-596/16 and C-597/16, Di Puma and Zecca.

The CJEU has considered the application of the double jeopardy principle to the Schengen Agreement in the context of an individual under investigation in Poland and Germany for allegations of extortion.[66] In this case it upheld the German prosecutor's decision that the double jeopardy principle did not apply. The matter had not been finally disposed of as no detailed investigation had taken place.

On 15 November 2016, the CJEU rejected an appeal brought by two applicants who were penalised by the Norwegian Tax Authority for failing to pay tax in 2008 and then convicted of aggravated tax fraud in 2009 by the National Authority for Investigation and Prosecution of Economic Crime. The applicants claimed they were being prosecuted twice for the same misconduct in violation of double jeopardy rules. Rejecting the application, the court held that ECHR double jeopardy rules are not violated where the contracting party could satisfy the court that dual proceedings are sufficiently connected in time and space so as to represent a coherent whole, rather than two sets of proceedings.[67]

1.2.5 Double jeopardy in France

Recent developments in France continue to warrant a special mention as the issue of double jeopardy and its application has come before the courts on a number of occasions in recent years. The appellate courts have considered the extent to which domestic law will recognise convictions in the United States as a bar to prosecution, as well as the status of US DPAs in domestic proceedings. On 18 June 2015, a criminal court in Paris acquitted four French companies that were accused of paying bribes in connection with the United Nations' Oil-For-Food Programme on the grounds that they (or their corporate parents) had already signed DPAs with the DOJ. The rationale given was that it was inconsistent with French international obligations to prosecute the companies for a second time on what the Court found to be the same facts. The prosecutor's appeal against the acquittal was successful and in February 2016 a Paris court fined Total SA €750,000 for corrupting foreign officials.

Separate criminal proceedings were successfully pursued in France against Total for corruption of a foreign public agent (a senior energy official in Iran) resulting in a €500,000 fine being imposed in December 2018. The prosecution unsuccessfully sought confiscation €250,000 it had argued were the proceeds of the corruption. In relation to the same matters, Total entered into a US$245.2 million, three-year DPA with the DOJ and disgorged US$153 million in an SEC cease-and-desist order. The DPA expired in November 2016.

On 26 February 2018, the Court of Cassation in Paris upheld a decision to fine Swiss energy company Vitol €300,000 for making corrupt payments to the 67 Case of A and B v. Norway (Applications nos. 24130/11 and 29758/11), 15 November 2016, lovdata.no/static/EMDN/emd-2011-024130.pdf.

66 Case C-486/14, Kossowski, 29 June 2016.

Iraq government as part of the United Nations Oil-For-Food programme.[68] The Court rejected Vitol's argument that it was protected from criminal proceedings in France because it had already been punished in the United States. The Court found that double jeopardy did not apply because the company had pleaded guilty to a different charge in US proceedings[69] and stated that France must maintain its right to punish companies that break French law. In its ruling, the Court of Cassation considered double jeopardy protections enshrined in both France's Penal Code and the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union. It concluded that both those protections fail to immunise a company from being prosecuted twice if part of the offence occurred within France and if the misconduct is prosecuted by a country that is not bound by French or EU law, such as the United States.[70] This significantly weakens the double jeopardy defence, in circumstances where some of the misconduct occurred in France.

These cases demonstrate the potential unfairness to a corporate that has effectively admitted the offence in another jurisdiction to obtain a DPA and then finds those admissions being used against it in a jurisdiction that does not recognise the DPA under the double jeopardy doctrine.

Conclusion 1.2.6

At first sight, the doctrine of double jeopardy appears to be a substantial protection against repeated prosecution in respect of the same conduct. However, although the doctrine may in some circumstances protect against a similar prosecution within the state, or member group such as the European Union, it may well fail to protect against a prosecution brought by a separate state. France's decision not to apply the principle in circumstances where part of the offence occurred within its sovereign territory is a significant restriction on its scope.

As many countries do not recognise a foreign conviction for the purposes of double jeopardy, it is not possible to reassure a corporate client that a criminal settlement in one jurisdiction will qualify as a settlement in others as well. Further, entering into a DPA in one jurisdiction may risk damaging the client's interests in another if the DPA is not recognised as a bar to prosecution, but the admissions it made to secure the DPA are admissible against it in other jurisdictions.

The picture is uncertain and many questions remain unanswered. These include:

- Should there be international recognition of criminal convictions for the purposes of double jeopardy, to encourage global settlements?

68 The fine was in addition to a US$17.5 million sanction Vitol received in the United States in 2007 as part of a plea agreement entered to resolve identical allegations.

69 The company pleaded guilty to a single count of grand larceny in the New York State Supreme Court and paid a US$17.5 million fine, US$4.5 million of which was donated to the state of New York. Vitol admitted in the US plea deal that corrupt payments were made through its employees in France. In total, the company said it paid US$13 million to Iraqi officials between 2001 and 2002 hidden in oil contracts awarded to the company as part of the Oil-For-Food programme.

70 Note that as France is a civil law jurisdiction, lower courts are not strictly bound to follow the Court of Cassation's decision.

- Should DPAs be given the status of a criminal conviction for the purposes of double jeopardy?
- Should regulatory sanctions qualify for the purposes of double jeopardy?

Until these issues are resolved, a corporate client will only be able to place very limited reliance on the double jeopardy principle as a bar to further prosecution in respect of the same conduct. At present, the only safe course will be to seek to negotiate a global settlement with all the states most likely to take an interest in the conduct, before admitting guilt in any state. Whether this is practicable will vary from case to case.

In relation to individuals, an issue of note was recently referred to the CJEU stemming from a dispute between Hungary and Croatia in the case of AY.[71] The Croatian court had sought a preliminary ruling on whether the double jeopardy principle under EU law means Member States may refuse to enforce European arrest warrant (EAW) requests in cases where its investigations treated individuals as witnesses and not suspects. Specifically, Croatia asked whether Hungary could refuse to enforce two EAW requests it issued for an individual, named only as AY, to prevent damage to reputation, after AY was treated as a witness rather than a suspect in an investigation conducted by the Hungarian prosecutor's office. In its judgment of July 2018, the CJEU stated that execution of an EAW cannot be refused on the ground that a prosecutor had closed a criminal investigation where, during that investigation, the requested person was interviewed as a witness only. The Court stated that the judicial authorities of the Member States must adopt a decision on any EAW communicated to them.

71 Judgment in Case C-268/17 AY (Arrest warrant – witness). The Court analysed whether any of the grounds for optional non-execution provided for in Article 4(3) of the framework decision applied in the AY case and concluded they did not. Those grounds relate to (1) the decision of the executing judicial authority not to prosecute for the offence on which the European arrest warrant is based, (2) the fact that, in the executing Member State, the judicial authorities have decided to halt proceedings in respect of the offence on which the warrant is based, and (3) the fact that a final judgment has been passed on the requested person in a Member State, in respect of the same acts, which prevents further proceedings. The Court determined the first and third grounds were irrelevant in the case. The Court concluded that an interpretation according to which the execution of a European arrest warrant could be refused where that warrant concerns the same acts as those that have already been the subject of a previous decision, without the identity of the person against whom criminal proceedings are brought being considered relevant, would be manifestly too broad and would entail a risk that the obligation to execute the warrant could be circumvented. As that ground for non-execution constitutes an exception, it must be interpreted strictly and in the light of the need to promote the prevention of crime. The investigation by the Hungarian authorities was conducted, not against AY, but against an unknown person, and the decision that closed that investigation was not taken in respect of AY. The Court concludes from this that the second ground for non-execution does not apply either. See also https://globalinvestigationsreview.com/article/1166589/croatian-case-to-clarify-eaw-double-jeopardy-rules.

The stages of an investigation 1.3

Issues that at first glance may appear to be isolated or technical can quickly spread across borders and escalate into multifaceted threats to businesses, reputations and careers. Even within jurisdictions, different enforcement authorities operate within their own, often complex, legal and technical frameworks. Any investigation, whether an internal fact-finding inquiry aimed at establishing the size and nature of a problem or one commenced by an enforcement authority, is inevitably a dynamic process. There can be no 'one-size-fits-all' approach and the scope of an investigation can change significantly as it progresses.

Nonetheless, it is possible to identify three broad, and often overlapping, phases to an investigation, namely the commencement, information-gathering and disposal phases. Particular challenges arise, and sometimes recur, at each of these.

Conducting and handling investigations, limiting the damage they cause and bringing them to as swift and efficient a conclusion as possible is an art rather than a science. It requires advisers to anticipate, balance and respond to a wide variety of challenges, and to appreciate the potential ramifications of every interaction with a diverse cast of characters.

Commencement 1.3.1

When deciding whether or how to commence an investigation, or how best to respond to one already commenced by an enforcement authority, it is axiomatic that the very first task to be carried out must be to establish as precisely as possible the size and shape of the problem. Which corporate entities and individuals are regarded as subjects of the investigation? Which offences are they thought to have committed, and which regulatory provisions might they have infringed? Are any other local or foreign agencies investigating (or likely to investigate) this misconduct?

In some cases (typically those involving alleged breaches of regulatory requirements), the answers will be self-evident from notices from authorities confirming the commencement of an investigation or the appointment of investigators, and there may be opportunities to seek to establish more detail through scoping discussions. However, in other cases (typically those involving alleged criminal misconduct), the investigators will not necessarily provide details or opportunities for discussion. In some cases, the first indication an individual or entity receives of an investigation by an enforcement authority will be a requirement to attend an interview or provide documents, or, worse still, a knock at the door from investigating officers. In all cases – whether or not enforcement authorities are already aware of alleged misconduct – steps must be taken immediately upon discovery of the alleged misconduct to preserve and to avoid the destruction or deletion (inadvertent or otherwise) of documents that are, or could become, relevant. In large multinational organisations, identifying the custodians of these documents, drafting and disseminating appropriately inclusive document-retention notices, gathering the material and suspending automatic deletion policies is a substantial undertaking in itself.

Where authorities are not already aware of apparent misconduct, considering whether, when and how to disclose matters to them will be an immediate priority. In some cases, specific regulatory obligations will require disclosures. In others, it may be appropriate to voluntarily report matters to maximise the prospects of a consensual resolution on favourable terms. Both types of disclosures require careful handling. Consideration must be given to potential consequences, both for those individuals or corporates already implicated in alleged misconduct, and for those that may become so. Where information is disclosed voluntarily, wider considerations about whether co-operation will be appropriate and would be likely to encourage the relevant enforcement authority to curtail its investigation (and on which terms) should be borne in mind. Identifying the potential risks and benefits will typically involve assessing the enforcement policy and posture of each agency involved (and often of individual investigators) and its ability and propensity to pass information to other investigating or prosecuting authorities (both within and between jurisdictions).

These assessments will inform the answers to a number of practical questions:

- Should an initial notification be made before a full internal investigation has been undertaken?
- What should be disclosed at the end of the internal investigation and to whom?
- Should information be disclosed to the authorities orally rather than in writing?
- Will investigators regard anything less than unfettered access to witnesses' first accounts and other underlying documents as true co-operation enabling them to contemplate a negotiated outcome?
- Is it feasible to maintain claims to legal professional privilege or challenge investigators' actions or demands while still seeking to claim that the subjects of the investigation are co-operating?

Some of these questions have been addressed in the SFO's Corporate Co-operation Guidance, published in August 2019.[72] This provides greater clarity on the circumstances in which the SFO will be prepared to commence discussions with a view to potentially concluding investigations by way of DPAs.

Choices made at this stage about how much information and control to relinquish over the investigative process and the robustness of the line to be taken with investigators in relation to issues such as privilege can be crucial in setting the tone for the rest of the investigation, and any proceedings that flow from it. It is critical for companies, when deciding which stance to take at the commencement stage, to anticipate what enforcement authorities and courts may require at later stages and what the collateral effect of decisions about how much information to provide and how proactively to assist those authorities may be. The DPA agreed between the SFO and Sarclad illustrates this point. Following the conclusion of the DPA, former senior executives being prosecuted by the SFO sought to compel the SFO to obtain and disclose to them copies of notes of interviews relevant to the SFO's decision to enter into a DPA with the company.[73] The notes had not been previously provided to the SFO during DPA negotiations as Sarclad declined to waive privilege and the SFO agreed to proceed on the basis of summaries of the interviews prepared on the basis of 'oral proffers' delivered by Sarclad's lawyers. Although the High Court, hearing the challenge brought by the former senior executives being prosecuted (and who were subsequently acquitted in July 2019) declined to order the SFO to obtain and disclose the additional documents, it deprecated the approach taken by the SFO. As a consequence, as is confirmed in its Corporate Co-operation Guidance, the SFO is likely to take a more stringent approach when deciding which documents it requires during DPA negotiations.

72 https://www.sfo.gov.uk/download/corporate-co-operation-guidance/.

Before the publication of the third edition of this text, the Court of Appeal allowed ENRC's appeal against the first-instance decision, upholding its claim to litigation privilege over the disputed documents, including notes of witness interviews.[74] Under the leadership of the Director of the SFO, Lisa Osofsky, the SFO decided not to appeal that decision. Given the importance of privilege in the context of global investigations, the decision was welcomed by lawyers across the globe – the Court of Appeal's judgment aligned the law more closely with the law of privilege in the United States and its clear articulation of the applicability of litigation privilege in the context of a criminal investigation is likely to mean that the SFO will be less aggressive in making assertions that privilege claims by companies over documents created during the course of internal investigations are ill-founded than it was before the ruling. However, it is unlikely that the SFO will be any less willing to request waivers of privilege, particularly since the Court of Appeal judgment was clear that its decision should not 'impact adversely' on the deferred prosecution regime in the United Kingdom, and emphasising the relevance of waiver to an assessment of a company's co-operation in reaching resolutions.[75] The SFO's Corporate Co-operation Guidance addresses this point but does not provide a definitive answer. It acknowledges (as is evident from the DPAs concluded to date) that declining to waive privilege is not necessarily fatal to a settlement subsequently being agreed and simply states that a company declining to waive privilege does not attain the corresponding benefit set out in the DPA Code of Practice, but will not be penalised by the SFO. In practice, this superficially neutral stance is likely to translate into significantly more difficult discussions, both with the SFO about whether it is appropriate to commence DPA negotiations, and in due course with the SFO and the court about whether any proposed DPA should be concluded and approved. Decisions as to the approach taken by a company to privilege, regardless of whether privilege can properly be asserted or not, will continue to be crucial decisions that set the tone and, possibly, direction of an investigation and any proceedings flowing from it.

73 R (on the application of AL) v Serious Fraud Office [2018] EWHC 856.

74 SFO v. ENRC [2018] EWCA Civ 2006.

75 See SFO v. ENRC [2018] EWCA Civ 2006 at paras. 115–117, in particular: 'In any event, to determine whether a DPA is in the interests of justice, and whether the terms of the particular DPA are fair, reasonable and proportionate, the court must examine the company's conduct and the extent to which it cooperated with the SFO. Such an examination will consider whether the company was willing to waive any privilege attaching to documents produced during internal investigations, so that it could share those documents with the SFO . . .'

In cases involving allegations made by or against directors or employees, early determinations need to be made as to whether any specific whistleblower protection legislation or rules have been engaged and whether action should be taken to suspend or dismiss those individuals, or at least limit their involvement in decision-making in relation to investigations.

1.3.2 Information gathering

Once the scope of an investigation has been determined, the process of gathering and analysing relevant information, whether in documentary or electronic form or in the form of witnesses' accounts, commences. Since the advent of the European investigation order (introduced in England and Wales in 2017), the process of gathering information across borders has been a much simpler and quicker process for enforcement authorities in Europe.[76] In October 2019, the SFO's (and other agencies') powers were further extended as new legislation came into force enabling them to apply to the court to secure access to electronic data held by communications services providers overseas (provided certain international co-operation agreements are in place in the jurisdiction concerned).[77]

In substantial cross-border investigations, the task of collating relevant material, ascertaining whether it is responsive to requirements to produce documents or provide information (or whether it should otherwise be produced to demonstrate a co-operative stance), and filtering it to remove material exempt from disclosure is time- and resource-intensive. It often requires specialist technical input and expertise. Information should not be treated as a readily portable commodity, and careful consideration should be given to applicable data protection and other confidentiality constraints before information is transferred between jurisdictions during internal investigations or produced to investigating authorities.[78]

Witness interviews during internal investigations raise no fewer questions. When should interviews take place? Who should be present? What material and questions is it appropriate to put to them during such interviews? Should they be represented (and, if so, at whose expense)? Taking a wider view across all jurisdictions in which action could be taken, and from the individual's perspective, is it in the interests of subjects of the investigation to provide information voluntarily, or should they insist on being compelled to do so?

76 See Criminal Justice (European Investigation Order) Regulations 2017.

77 See Crime (Overseas Production Orders) Act 2019.

78 Recent developments in the United Kingdom and United States are relevant. In the United Kingdom, a decision by the Administrative Court in September 2018, R (on the Application of KBR Inc) v. The Director of the Serious Fraud Office [2018] EWHC 2368 (Admin), extended section 2 notices, served in the United Kingdom, extraterritorially to foreign companies in respect of documents held outside the jurisdiction when there is a sufficient connection between the company and the jurisdiction. KBR received permission to appeal in April 2019 (https://www.supremecourt.uk/docs/permission-to-appeal-2019-04.pdf). In the United States, following the successful appeal by Microsoft of orders holding it in contempt for failure to comply with a warrant requiring it to produce the contents of a customer's email account stored on a server outside the United States, Congress enacted on 23 March 2018 the Clarifying Lawful Overseas Use of Data Act (CLOUD Act), providing expressly for extraterritorial application and thereafter the United States obtained a fresh warrant against Microsoft.

Of course, where investigations by the authorities have already begun, investigating authorities will be keen to interview individuals who are suspects. Depending on the nature of the investigation and the allegations against them, it may be open to individuals to remain silent in response to questions (although this course of action may limit their options in any proceedings flowing from the investigation). Conversely, it may serve such individuals' interests to proactively volunteer information to secure more lenient treatment by authorities, or ultimately the courts.

Disposal 1.3.3

As the information gathering progresses, and evidence is assimilated and understood, a decision will need to be reached as to whether this may be resolved through negotiation, or whether the individual or company disputes the allegations entirely or is unprepared to reach any resolution or enter into any settlement that requires admissions of misconduct.

Where settlement is an option, from economic, commercial and reputational standpoints, settling with as many investigating authorities as quickly and on the most favourable terms possible is likely to be preferable. Particularly in regulatory enforcement investigations involving companies, it is often clear from the commencement phase that this will be the most likely outcome, and dialogue throughout the investigation will have to be directed towards this outcome.

It should not be assumed that the process leading to a negotiated disposal is a smooth or simple one. Even in cases involving only one enforcement authority, the legislation and rules governing settlement and the calculation of penalties are complex. Although the discounts available for early settlement are potentially significant, the processes leading to them can involve successive rounds of proposals, counterproposals, representations and negotiations. In criminal investigations, in jurisdictions where it is possible to achieve negotiated outcomes as an alternative to prosecution, although the degree of scrutiny varies depending on which jurisdiction is concerned, such settlements will also be examined by a judge.

Complexity is multiplied where multiple authorities or jurisdictions are involved, or where it is possible that a finding, even if it does not involve any admission of liability, may fuel subsequent litigation from third parties such as erstwhile customers, employees or shareholders.

Although major investigations are unlikely to have progressed to the disposal stage without attracting at least some publicity, it is at this stage that press and political interest will peak. Enforcement authorities usually must make the outcomes of investigations public (and indeed corporate entities themselves may be obliged to do so if their securities are listed).

Other difficult questions arise with negotiated disposals. What will be the size of the fines, if any? For individuals, is there the prospect of imprisonment or other career-threatening penalties? Will it be possible to settle with all interested investigating authorities? For the corporate to bring matters to a close, will it be necessary to assist authorities in their pursuit of individuals? Will the disposal of the investigations mark the end of the matter, or simply the start of a new phase of litigation or the commencement of a long process of reporting to a monitor and heightened levels of regulatory scrutiny or supervision? What can be said publicly by the subjects of the investigations?

With these themes in mind, we turn now to a detailed consideration of each stage in the chapters that follow.

2

The Evolution of Risk Management in Global Investigations

William H Devaney and Joanna Ludlam[1]

Sources and triggers for investigations 2.1

Corporates have traditionally approached investigations reactively, after the event, as an issue for legal functions and law firms that is largely concerned with suspicions of criminal activity or other misconduct. Such investigations were predominantly an exercise in detection, appropriate reporting and remediation. With the evolution of compliance departments and advances in forensic fact-gathering and analysis, investigations are increasingly regarded as key elements of a sound control environment and generally considered to support a company's commercial agenda.[2]

Now, problems can be discovered through a variety of novel and increasingly proactive ways, and can arise from both internal and external sources.

From an internal perspective, problems can come to the fore during transactional due diligence, or in the course of routine compliance activity, such as conformance reviews, financial and other audits, or corporate surveillance activity. Problems may also be signalled by industry-wide regulatory enforcement, or in a discrete area concerning allegations against an employee that indicates broader risk. Corporate awareness of risk may also be triggered through traditional or social media, political pressure, customer complaints, allegations arising in civil litigation, statements made in evidence in regulatory or criminal proceedings, and disclosures by competitors and whistleblowers. Corporations are now also

1 William H Devaney and Joanna Ludlam are partners at Baker McKenzie LLP.

2 US Department of Justice (DOJ), Evaluation of Corporate Compliance Programs, April 2019, Sections I.A – D, II.B and III.A (noting the importance of risk assessments, training, communications, confidential reporting structures and investigative processes to inform an effective corporate compliance programme and identifying, inter alia, root causes and systems vulnerabilities). See https://www.justice.gov/criminal-fraud/page/file/937501/download.

encouraged to use artificial intelligence to sift through their own data to uncover indicia of potential wrongdoing.

Problems may also be first identified through the direct intervention of a government agency, which may have learned of the issue on its own, through a third party or another agency. The provision of information between law enforcement and regulatory authorities (whether through informal communication protocols, established statutory gateways or recognition of competing jurisdictions) is a rapidly growing area, domestically and internationally.

Given the myriad of potential avenues for a crisis to develop, corporate counsel must always be on the lookout for the seeds of problems and be prepared to take appropriate steps to prevent the matter from taking root and distracting the company from its core business. Moreover, if a serious problem is identified and cannot be easily contained, an effective response may require a significant level of communication with, and ongoing reporting obligations to, multiple entities, including the company's board and senior management; its legal, compliance, risk and audit functions; external auditors; prosecutors, regulators or other government agencies; litigation counterparties; investors; customers; commercial partners; competitors; trade bodies; and other interest groups. In many cases, the simple gathering of facts and their analysis can be one of the least complex elements of the undertaking. Far more complex is the juggling of competing, often cross-border, legal principles, interests and priorities that these ongoing communication and reporting processes require. These are considered further below, together with some of the complicated legal issues they present.

2.2 Responding to internal events

Not all internal issues raised will require investigation. Take, for example, the self-described whistleblower who writes to senior management to raise points already conclusively determined in a disciplinary hearing, in relation to which there are no wider considerations or further rights to appeal. Where facts are not in issue, the person has exhausted his or her legal remedies and does not bring forward new bona fides issues, a corporation should not be deterred from operating efficiently and need not reinvestigate the underlying facts. Those concerns that do merit fresh investigation will not necessarily arise only in the context of criminal allegations or regulatory misconduct; some will emerge during transactional due diligence or in the control environment. There may also be instances where even if the allegation is true, it does not amount to a violation of law or company policy.

2.2.1 Compliance operations and transactional due diligence

A critical aspect of any effective transactional due diligence – whether an acquisition, a joint venture or simply a one-off transaction – must necessarily be to identify risks lurking beneath the surface of a target business or transaction counterparty. In particular, attention to areas that can give rise to successor liability should be of paramount concern to the risk-assessment team on any due diligence. In the anti-money laundering arena, in relation to the United Kingdom, compliance with the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002[3] is only as effective as the quality of the due diligence, ongoing monitoring and surveillance techniques employed by the company. Similar considerations apply to compliance with international sanctions, where certainty as to the true source of remitted funds, the purpose of the payment and the identities of the payor and payee are central. 'Adequate procedures' required under the UK Bribery Act 2010 will include the ability to assess counterparty risk to avoid participation in a corrupt transaction. In the United Kingdom, there has been a concerted move to replicate the corporate 'failure to prevent' offence in section 7 of the Bribery Act 2010 in other arenas, increasing the focus on the adequacy of prevention measures within corporations. Part 3 (sections 44 to 52) of the Criminal Finances Act 2017 created the offence of failing to prevent the facilitation of tax evasion, with the corresponding defence of 'reasonable prevention procedures'. In January 2017, the UK government consulted on the introduction of a general corporate offence of failing to prevent economic crime going beyond bribery and tax evasion, whereby companies would be liable for fraud by their employees or contractors in the absence of proof of adequate procedures to prevent the conduct.

The concerns in the United States are similar. The Department of Justice (DOJ) and the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) have stated in their Resource Guide to the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA) that they will be less likely to prosecute an acquirer that conducts effective pre-transactional due diligence, remediates, folds the acquired entity into its compliance programme and voluntarily discloses the conduct.[4] In 2018, US Deputy Assistant Attorney General Matthew Miner stated that the DOJ's revised FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy (providing for a presumption of a declination of prosecution with disgorgement of ill-gotten gains, assuming no aggravating circumstances, for companies that voluntarily disclose, fully co-operate and fully remediate) would apply to acquirers in a merger or acquisition.[5] In March 2019, the DOJ formally codified this policy.[6] Further, while declinations under the FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy are usually public and come with a statement of facts, Mr Miner recently said, in remarks he delivered at the American Bar Association's Third Global White Collar Crime Institute Conference, that 'there may be instances where a company self-discloses and [the DOJ] decide[s] a public declination is neither 3 Those necessary to enable a person or organisation to comply with reporting duties under §§ 330 to 332 and to avoid commission of separate money laundering offences under §§ 327 to 329 of the Proceeds of Crime Act.

4 A Resource Guide to the US Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (2012), 28 (discussing pre-transactional due diligence). See also US Department of Justice, Opinion Release 14-02 and Opinion Release 08-02.

5 See Matthew Miner, US Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Keynote Address at the American Conference Institute, 9th Global Forum on Anti-Corruption Compliance in High Risk Markets (25 July 2018).

6 See US Department of Justice, Justice Manual (JM) § 9-47.120 – FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy, at 4 (M&A Due Diligence and Remediation).

necessary nor warranted'.[7] He noted that 'if a company self-discloses misconduct that was discovered in the context of a merger or acquisition, and [prosecutors] determine that the conduct and financial impact was de minimis, [the DOJ] may be open to a company's request that [the DOJ not] disclose the declination'.[8] Without delving into the pros and cons of voluntary disclosure, US law enforcement and regulatory agencies generally treat acquirers similarly even when the disclosure does not relate to potential FCPA violations, but to other issues such as money laundering and trade sanctions.[9]

See Chapters 3 and 4 on self-reporting to authorities

Given these expectations in the United Kingdom, United States and elsewhere, a party offering to warrant that it has not engaged in corrupt practices or other criminal activity will not provide adequate comfort without objective assessment of the risk profile, which is, itself, an exercise in investigation and analysis. For example, in the case of the three primary areas of financial crime risk (money laundering, sanctions, bribery and corruption), further enquiry may be required to investigate and assess the risk presented by politically exposed persons (PEPs), transactions involving higher-risk jurisdictions or business practices, complex transactional structures characterised by opacity as to source of funds and ultimate beneficiaries.

In each case it is not only the primary due diligence activities that require investigative skills, but also the response to the information delivered by standard or enhanced due diligence that may itself stimulate wider investigation. Concerns in open-source materials (such as reports from internet research and reports by Amnesty International and Transparency International's Corruption Perception Index), and information already held on file, in bespoke due diligence reports by third-party vendors and in responses from counterparties to questionnaires and pre-contractual enquiries (which are particularly prevalent in public sector contract due diligence) may all trigger separate lines of enquiry. Red flags such as opaque ownership structures, prior enforcement actions against the counterparty, engagement in high-risk geographies or the presence of PEPs in the ownership or control structure can all raise the risk profile of a person, entity or proposed transaction, putting the company on notice that further investigation is required.

Ironically, for companies straining to deliver strong due diligence, flagging issues of concern in clear, contemporaneous records at the primary due diligence stage may pose a significant danger. That record may create disclosable evidence of a company's state of knowledge and awareness, or the fact it was on notice, at a material time, and in the absence of an adequate investigative response, this record

7 Matthew Miner, US Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Remarks at The American Bar Association's Criminal Justice Section 3rd Global White Collar Crime Institute Conference held in Prague, Czech Republic (27 June 2019).

8 Id.

9 See John Cronan, Acting Assistant Attorney General, US Department of Justice Criminal Division, Presentation at the American Bar Association, White Collar Conference (1 March 2018) (conveying DOJ's intention to 'reward self-disclosure, full cooperation, [and] timely and appropriate remediation' by declining to bring cases against companies investigated for criminal violations other than under the FCPA).

itself may assist in incriminating the company[10] despite the positive steps taken to identify the issue in the first instance.

As such, it is the initial response that separates the strong organisation from the weak and moves compliance culture from a tick-box habit to best-in-class governance and control. The tools available to the acquiring company to assess possible exposure beyond the initial indicative information are a blend of the traditional and the innovative. The review of source documents and interviewing of witnesses are standard investigative steps that will remain highly relevant in these circumstances. So too will access to open-source information including historical media content analysis, materials held by ratings agencies and analyses based on public records, a company's data, disclosures and third-party commentary, social media, a company's public statements and reports, and bespoke assessments. Reports from third-party investigators (which can range from analysis of public records and open-source material to more detailed data searches, including 'dark web' internet content review) may also be available.

Additionally, internal and external audit reports may flag control weaknesses and identify intended remediation plans. These will not constitute privileged documents, although they may be subject to significant confidentiality controls. Action logs should be traced to ensure that audit recommendations were implemented and can be used as evidence of such. Similarly, analysis of compliance remediation and restructuring plans, conformance reviews of compliance systems and controls, published results of thematic reviews by regulators and other third parties, evaluation of whistleblower logs or statements made by company executives in the public domain (e.g., records of evidence adduced at UK parliamentary select committee or US congressional committee hearings) may also corroborate or appease initial concerns, or may serve to trigger further investigation into wider issues.

Some financial institutions go beyond this level of investigative activity and maintain an intelligence-based client evaluation process, aimed at building customer profiles in anticipation of commercial decisions and regulatory obligations. This is not for the use of investigators in the detection of misconduct but is research and analysis to provide the bank with the broadest range of commercial information about a client, customer or counterparty, from identification and verification through to commercial development strategy and market profile, to enhance the bank's strategic decision-making in a highly regulated environment. While these processes are driven by commercial objectives, the underlying activity necessary to inform the bank as to the risk profile is no different to the skills applied during a regulatory enforcement investigation or in anticipation of criminal prosecution, and this is why, within banks, there is a gradual migration of employees from 'investigations and enforcement' functions within legal and compliance to 'financial intelligence' units within business teams or as separate risk or compliance teams. These units do not, however, operate as legal advisers and therefore do not benefit from the same protections afforded to legal advisory staff, such as the attorney–client privilege and work-product protections (considered further below).

10 For example, as evidence relevant to the offence in the United Kingdom of failing to prevent bribery under section 7 of the Bribery Act 2010 or in support of a regulatory enforcement for a suspected systems and controls breach under Principle 3 of the Financial Conduct Authority's (FCA) Principles for Businesses.

2.2.2 Policy guidance, opinion procedures and dialogue with public authorities

More formal, alternative third-party sources can provide a higher degree of comfort, subject to the availability of information and the legal and practical constraints as to its use. Use of these sources may be more appropriate where a company has identified a problem while undergoing due diligence. Nevertheless, practitioners should approach these resources with caution.

In the United States, for example, the DOJ may, on submission in writing by a relevant party, provide valuable guidance through the FCPA opinion procedure.[11] Similar to SEC no-action letters,[12] opinion procedures enable a corporation to obtain an opinion from the DOJ as to whether certain specified, prospective – not hypothetical – conduct does not violate the FCPA. The principles require disclosure of the entire intended transaction. An executed contract is not a prerequisite and in most cases the opinion would be sought prior to a requesting party's entering a contract. The DOJ's opinion will typically set forth a number of remedial or proactive steps, or both, that the company must take to receive protection from enforcement.[13] For example, in Opinion Release 08-02, a US company sought comfort from prosecution surrounding its proposed purchase of a UK company in the oil and gas sector. The UK company had a large number of government customers. The acquirer informed the DOJ that it had inadequate time and access to information to perform sufficient anti-corruption due diligence on the target. It further informed the DOJ that it could not disclose whether it had identified any possibly illicit payments owing to the confidentiality agreement it signed to receive access to information from the target. In its opinion, the DOJ said it would not initiate an enforcement action, so long as the acquirer disclosed any corruption concerns upon acquisition, conducted rapid and deep diligence (outlined in the opinion) once it owned the target, disclosed any potential violations it uncovered, and quickly folded the target into its compliance programme. In a 2018 keynote address at the Ninth Global Forum on Anti-Corruption Compliance in High Risk Markets, US Deputy Assistant Attorney General Miner

11 These can provide a high degree of comfort to corporations. See, for example, US Department of Justice Foreign Corrupt Practices Act Opinion Procedure Release 14-02 on successor liability principles, which assesses how the DOJ would approach the question of whether it would pursue wrongful pre-acquisition conduct by the target company where the target was not within the reach of the FCPA at the time of the alleged misconduct.

12 Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) no-action letters allow individuals or entities unsure of the legality of a product, service or action to request a letter from the SEC discussing the facts, applicable laws and rules, and providing a conclusion about whether SEC staff would recommend an enforcement action. See https://www.sec.gov/.

13 For Opinion Procedure Releases, see https://www.justice.gov/criminal-fraud/opinion-procedure-releases.

encouraged the use of the opinion procedure process, noting that it is under-utilised, and stating that in terms of response times, the DOJ 'can, to a degree, expedite [its] analysis based on timing needs'. As Mr Miner outlined, the DOJ will respond within 30 to 45 days of receiving all necessary information.[14]

As demonstrated by the few opinions issued each year, practitioners are often wary of this process, and will likely remain so, despite Mr Miner's encouragement. First, if the DOJ says no, the company is left without any flexibility to make its own risk-based decision. It must comply. Additionally, as Opinion Release 08-02 demonstrates, the DOJ will often impose conditions and requirements in its opinion that must be adhered to meticulously. Further, seeking an opinion may risk tipping off the government about a larger problem. Opinion procedures are also a limited tool, as they apply only to anti-corruption concerns.

The United Kingdom does not have a process similar to the DOJ opinion procedure. There remains no formal basis on which to approach the Serious Fraud Office (SFO) for guidance as to whether a party's conduct infringes the Bribery Act 2010, for example. This evaluation is left to the reporting party, with the more binary decision as to whether or not to make an early self-report to the SFO in relation to which co-operation credit is sought. The SFO will publish operational guidance and Codes of Practice from time to time (e.g., on issues of treatment of evidence, witnesses and legal representation at interviews, deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs), corporate self-reporting and, most recently, corporate co-operation)[15] and, like the DOJ and SEC's Resource Guide to the FCPA, also publishes its related prosecution policies and protocols (such as the Bribery Act Joint Prosecution Guidance of The Director of the Serious Fraud Office and The Director of Public Prosecutions, Guidance on Corporate Prosecutions, etc.).[16] These are not, however, consultative processes aimed at clarifying the SFO's approach to legal interpretation or jurisdictional issues (as in the case of the DOJ opinion procedure or SEC no-action letters). The SFO has made clear on a number of occasions that its role is not that of 'regulator, an educator, an advisor, a confessor, or an apologist'[17] but of investigator and specialist prosecutor. It remains to be seen whether, under SFO Director Lisa Osofsky's leadership, which commenced in August 2018, the SFO's policy will continue as before or develop a more US-style approach in this and other regards.[18]

14 For US Deputy Assistant Attorney General Matthew Miner's Keynote Address at the 9th Global Forum on Anti-Corruption Compliance in High Risk Markets on 25 July 2018, see https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/deputy-assistant-attorney-general-matthew-s-miner-remarks-american-conference-institute-9th.

15 https://www.sfo.gov.uk/download/corporate-co-operation-guidance/.

16 https://www.sfo.gov.uk/publications/guidance-policy-and-protocols/. These are objective statements of position, not subjective opportunities for evaluation of specific conduct.

17 'Ethical business conduct: an enforcement perspective' – speech by David Green QC, former Director of the Serious Fraud Office (SFO), to PricewaterhouseCoopers on 6 March 2014.

18 https://globalinvestigationsreview.com/article/1173689/osofsky-%E2%80%9Ci%E2%80%99ll-be-a-different-kind-of-director%E2%80%9D.

In terms of formal statements, a party dealing with the SFO is limited to the guidance contained in judgments and agreed terms of settlement under DPAs, of which there have only been five to date, four concerning the section 7 offence under the Bribery Act 2010 of failing to prevent bribery (three of which also involved substantive bribery offences).[19] More informal statements of policy and approach have been made in speeches by SFO staff to professional audiences,[20] but these remain indicative statements of policy intent and are not analogous to the DOJ opinion procedure.

In the United Kingdom, although the Financial Conduct Authority (FCA) issues policy statements from time to time, it will not give its blessing to a product, service, contractual undertaking or other course of conduct, nor will it make available records it holds in its supervisory or enforcement capacity that companies may rely on when evaluating an intended counterparty. This reluctance is a combination of statutory obligation in relation to the management of confidential information (enshrined in the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 (FSMA))[21] and because as a regulatory body it is subject to judicial review should it exceed its jurisdiction. Records of authorisations, published enforcement notices and decisions of the disciplinary tribunal are in the public domain, but there is no 'surgery service' to help companies determine the correct approach to the interpretation of their regulatory responsibilities relating to specific counterparty risks. Informal discussion, in the course of 'close and continuous' supervisory dialogue pursuant to a firm's Principle 11 obligations,[22] may shed light on the approach that the FCA may take, but these will not constitute formal policy guidance or policy statements to rely on for the purposes of transactional due 19 (1) Serious Fraud Office v. Standard Bank PLC (now known as ICBC Standard Bank PLC), 30 November 2015, Case No. U20150854. The SFO's press release with the deferred prosection agreement (DPA) and statement of facts can be found at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2015/11/30/sfo-agrees-first-uk-dpa-with-standard-bank/; (2) Serious Fraud Office v. XYZ Limited, 11 July 2016, Case No. U20150856. The identity of the defendant has been redacted from the press release dated 8 July 2016 and final redacted judgment dated 11 July 2016 pending ongoing proceedings, with the full DPA, statement of facts and full judgment due to be published when those proceedings are concluded; (3) Serious Fraud Office v. Rolls-Royce plc and Rolls-Royce Energy Systems Inc, 17 January 2017, Case No. U20170036. The SFO's press release with the DPA and statement of facts can be found at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/cases/rolls-royce-plc/; (4) Serious Fraud Office v. Tesco Stores Limited, 10 April 2017. The judgment, DPA and statement of facts can be found at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/cases/tesco-plc/; and (5) Serious Fraud Office v. Serco Geografix Ltd, 4 July 2019. The SFO's press release with the DPA and statement of facts can be found at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2019/07/04/sfo-completes-dpa-with-serco-geografix-ltd/.

20 e.g., speech to the Annual Bribery and Corruption Forum by Ben Morgan, Joint Head of Bribery and Corruption, SFO, 29 October 2015, in which the principles of co-operation credit and the application of the DPA jurisdiction were further explored.

21 Sections 348 to 353 of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 (FSMA) govern the FCA's treatment of information provided subject to duties of confidence and include certain exceptions to restrictions on disclosure of confidential information.

22 Under Principle 11 of the FCA's Principles for Businesses, a firm must deal with its regulators in an open and co-operative way and must disclose to the appropriate regulator anything relating to the firm of which that regulator would reasonably expect notice.

diligence or otherwise. A regulated entity is left with the unenviable task of accumulating a body of know-how as to the likely FCA reaction and expectation based on its continued engagement, which is made harder by a considerable degree of personnel turnover at the regulated entity and the regulator itself.

Tensions inherent in the management of privilege and confidentiality 2.2.3

In the United Kingdom and the United States, where similar (but not identical) doctrines of legal professional privilege exist, and in civil law jurisdictions that do not recognise the concept of privilege but rely heavily on the doctrine of professional secrecy, significant pressure points arise as a company seeks to keep material privileged and confidential while also satisfying the appetite of public bodies (regulators, prosecutors and legislators) and customer or investor groups for unguarded candour. There may even be a significant strategic divergence within a company's own board and management on the balance to be struck between transparency and established legal controls. These tensions emerge in investigations and, as a consequence, in the course of corporate activity.

For the company, tension immediately arises between the various duties owed to customers, shareholders and employees, on the one hand, and the protection of the right of confidentiality as between lawyer and client on the other. Many would focus on the expectations of regulators and prosecutors in respect of valid claims to privilege, and the difference of opinion between those parties and the company as to the status of information (whether disclosable or not). Yet, it is often tension, error, omission or indecision in the company that creates the greatest scope for complexity, long before any debate with authorities or before the courts has begun.

In a transactional context, for example, a target may want to share information so that an acquiring company can assess its exposure to certain risks. The target may hold a volume of documents and information ranging from initial fact-finding witness-interview material to the conclusive investigation report into the precise issues of concern. Yet the target will fear that waiver of privilege over that material may open it up to collateral waiver risk and an inability to defend speculative discovery requests in civil claims at a later date. As such, while non-disclosure may damage the prospects of the transaction or create future litigation risk, unbridled waiver may facilitate third-party litigation down the road.

One possible solution, as an alternative to relying on the concept of a 'limited waiver', has been the application of the common interest doctrine to the disclosure to the acquirer for a specific and limited purpose.[23] An example of effective use of a common interest privilege agreement is a joint venture business (A), the main investor in which is corporation (B), which invites investment by a venture capitalist (C). A faces substantial patent litigation in relation to the underlying product, constituting a substantial risk to the viability of the business. There exists a legal opinion as to the merits, sought by A in the ordinary course of the litigation. It is privileged and confidential as against B and C, who are not parties to the action but have a common interest in its outcome as they are aligned in wanting it to fail. Their investment may even support that. This is the typical circumstance in which a common interest privilege disclosure will be made to two parties, to inform their investment decisions, who are then subject to contractual duties of confidentiality to guard against arguments in litigation over waiver of privilege.

23 In the United States, the common interest doctrine varies from state to state. Under New York law, its application is limited to communications related to pending or anticipated litigation, rather than an anticipated merger or other commercial activity. Ambac Assurance Corp., et al. v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc., et al., 27 N.Y.3d 616, 627 to 629 (2016). In Delaware, which is generally considered the leading jurisdiction for corporate law, however, the privilege is much broader. 'A client has a privilege to refuse to disclose and to prevent any other person from disclosing confidential communications made for the purpose of facilitating the rendition of professional legal services to the client . . . (3) by the client or the client's lawyer or a representative of the lawyer representing another in a matter of common interest.' Del. R. Evid. 502(b)(3).

See Chapters 35 and 36 on privilege

On these grounds the acquirer can satisfy itself that it has made a true and fair evaluation of the risk, but this still leaves open questions as to how this risk assessment can subsequently be articulated in public statements if privilege is to be maintained and how the decision to advance can be justified to investors in the absence of a subsequent waiver of privilege. There is, however, conjecture in the United Kingdom as to the balance between risk and value in the application of the common interest doctrine in circumstances where authorities suggest a limited waiver may be sufficient.[24] In the United States, the concept of limited waiver, generally, does not exist.[25]

Similarly, a regulated entity will be concerned as to how it can defend a commercial decision to a regulator without sharing the contents of a privileged document. If it does share privileged material, what is the status of that disclosure? Will the restrictions over a regulator's dealings in confidential information,[26] or a specifically worded, limited waiver be sufficient to ensure there will be no onward disclosure or gradual widening of the waiver, weakening subsequent defences to disclosure in civil or criminal proceedings? Under English law, disclosure to a regulator on specific terms as to confidentiality, privilege and entitlement on the part of the regulator to make limited onward disclosure for a specific statutory or other legal purpose would not necessarily result in a wholesale waiver.[27]

See Chapters 35 and 36 on privilege

The law applies 'especially within the context of a pending transaction' when discussion 'involved legal issues regarding the transaction'. 3Com Corp. v. Diamond II Holdings, Inc., No. 3933-VCN, 2010 Del. Ch. LEXIS 126, at *13, *24 & n. 18 (Ch. 31 May 2010).

24 Gotha City v. Sotheby's (No.1) [1998] 1 WLR. 114 confirmed that where advice is shared with another party on a confidential basis, the waiver of privilege as between them did not constitute a waiver of privilege as against the wider world. In Property Alliance Group v. Royal Bank of Scotland [2015] EWHC 1557 (Ch), Mr Justice Birss applied Gotha and confirmed that waivers of privilege can be made for a limited purpose and that this would prevent the person to whom the document was disclosed from using it in circumstances outside the limited purpose.

25 See, e.g., Pac. Pictures Corp. v. United States Dist. Court, No. 11-71844, 2012 U.S. App. LEXIS 7643 (9th Cir. 17 April 2012) (rejecting the theory of 'selective waiver' and holding that a party who provides attorney–client privileged materials to the government may not thereafter claim the privilege in civil litigation).

26 e.g., FSMA, section 348.

27 In Property Alliance Group v. Royal Bank of Scotland [2015] EWHC 1557 (Ch), the documents in question had been provided to various regulators on the basis that confidentiality and privilege

At the heart of a claim to the protection of privilege is a duty to maintain confidentiality; yet in commercial circumstances the goals of candour and transparency, the disclosure duties set out in financial reporting standards and the reasonable investor test are at odds with the goal of maintaining enforceable claims to privilege in all instances. Counsel therefore often faces the unenviable task of electing which legal risk to prioritise.

In many boardrooms, in common with the views of many regulatory enforcement teams and prosecutors, there is a growing distaste for opportune (though arguably valid) claims to privilege that may obscure a complete understanding of the facts, and increasingly a premium is placed on holding nothing back. This may see the pendulum swinging towards greater disclosure and less concern about privilege, until a company cannot protect against litigation risk that would have been defensible had privilege not been waived. In the United Kingdom this moment has not fully arrived. While debates within the boardroom may rage in relation to the value of greater transparency and the reputational dangers of over-reliance on privilege and confidentiality, there is still a legitimate reliance on the protections afforded by legal professional privilege. In turn, this is being met with a greater level of scrutiny and challenge by public authorities, and episodes of intense litigation on issues of privilege appear to be increasing. Prosecutors and regulators press for greater levels of disclosure but cannot legitimately demand waiver of privilege as a key ingredient of a co-operative dialogue. Instead, they challenge perceived invalid claims or, in the United Kingdom, encourage it as part of the 'co-operation credit' debate to which many companies contemplating a DPA are sensitive. At the same time, the decisions in The RBS Rights Issue Litigation and ENRC[28] provided further guidance on the limited extent to which materials created during an investigation may be withheld on the grounds of legal advice privilege and litigation privilege. The RBS Rights Issue Litigation and ENRC highlight, among other things, the difference between the United States' and the United Kingdom's approaches to privilege and interview notes: whereas the interview notes in question would likely have been protected under the attorney–client privilege and work-product doctrine had US law applied, they were not covered by legal advice privilege in the United Kingdom. The first decision in ENRC was highly controversial, in large part owing to the findings, fatal to ENRC's claim for litigation privilege, that a criminal investigation was not 'adversarial' litigation and that reasonable anticipation of a criminal investigation did not necessarily equate would be preserved as against third parties. The agreements with the regulators contained 'carve-outs', which permitted the regulators to share the documents with other third parties (such as other government or regulatory agencies) and to make the material public or to disclose it further. Birss J found that those carve-outs did not amount to a general waiver of privilege and stated: 'The fact that the carve-outs recognise the regulator's rights and obligations to take a step, which might go as far as even publishing the information in the document, makes no difference if that has not happened. Until they do, I fail to see why the confidentiality and privilege would not be preserved.'

See Chapter 35 on privilege

28 Re The RBS Rights Issue Litigation [2016] EWHC 3161 (Ch); Serious Fraud Office (SFO) v. Eurasian Natural Resources Corporation Ltd [2017] EWHC 1017 (QB) 8 May 2017; Serious Fraud Office (SFO) v. Eurasian Natural Resources Corporation [2018] EWCA Civ 2006.

to the reasonable contemplation of a criminal prosecution. The ENRC decision was, however, challenged before the Court of Appeal, which concluded that litigation (in the form of criminal proceedings) was reasonably in contemplation at the time when ENRC had instigated its own internal investigation and that the other ingredients for litigation privilege were present. As such, litigation privilege applied to the notes of interviews with employees, former employees, company and subsidiary officers and other third parties. While the appeal decision in ENRC provides welcome relief in respect of the potential availability of litigation privilege in investigations, the United Kingdom remains significantly at odds with the United States on the applicability of legal professional privilege generally, which is an obvious cause for concern in cross-border investigations. Furthermore, as observed in the ENRC appeal judgment, the United Kingdom is also at odds with international common law in terms of the scope of legal advice privilege. Although discussion of the scope of legal advice privilege featured in the ENRC judgment, the Court of Appeal was clear that any re-examination of the ambit of legal advice privilege must be left for the Supreme Court.

In the United States, where prosecutorial demand for privilege waiver for a corporation to receive full co-operation credit was once common, federal prosecutors may no longer ask for a waiver of the privilege, although corporations must disclose all relevant facts, including against its employees, to receive co-operation credit.[29] Further, the fact that a corporation does not waive the attorney–client privilege during a government investigation cannot be used against a corporation when determining whether it 'co-operated'.[30]

In practical terms there is some hope for reconciliation of these conflicts by creating separate documents during the investigation: reports to management containing legal advice on investigative outcomes (privileged) having a separate purpose to reports of findings to regulators (not a privileged purpose). Additionally, facts themselves are not privileged[31] and may be presented to law enforcement and regulators, with careful handling to present them as only facts and not the product of specific counsel interviews, without waiving the privilege.[32] In the United Kingdom, fact-finding interviews can be conducted on the basis that the interviewee is not the client and the purpose of the interview is not the giving or receiving of legal advice (consistent with the decisions in The RBS Rights Issue Litigation and ENRC), working on the assumption that notes of the interview will not be privileged communications and should be drafted with that

See Chapter 35 on privilege

29 JM § 9-28.710–9-28.720.

30 Id.

31 See Upjohn Co. v. United States, 449 U.S. 383, 395-96 (1981).

32 See United States v. Stewart, No. 15CR287, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 103516, at *5 (S.D.N.Y. 22 July 2016) (in-house counsel waived privilege over defendant's communications by disclosing them to the Financial Industry Regulatory Authority, because counsel's disclosure contained not only unprivileged facts, but also the contents of privileged communications, i.e., counsel's questions to the employee).

in mind.[33] In the United States, however, the same material may be covered by the attorney–client privilege and work-product doctrine.[34] This presents a significant legal and practical concern in the management of transatlantic investigations, as it raises the threat of subject-matter waiver in the United States.[35] Ex post facto advice to management on the content or outcome of interviews, however, is likely to attract privilege. Yet, ultimately, there may be a point of strategic principle for a board and its advisers to determine: to waive or not to waive.

Whistleblowers, complaints and concerns 2.2.4

While certain investigations will be triggered by established controls or 'accidental' awareness of conduct risk, a very substantial proportion of matters under investigation will be instigated by virtue of a company's policy and practice on raising concerns, namely staff exit interviews, employee helplines and voluntary communications by staff, customers, former employees and members of the public. Together these forms of communication fall into a single, growing class of investigation trigger: whistleblowing.

Whistleblower complaints present a significant overhead for a company, in both financial and reputational terms. The number of complaints received does not necessarily determine how 'healthy' an organisation is as regards conduct risk; a significant flow of concerns may indicate a more risk-aware body of employees who feel free to challenge or raise issues without fear for their future employment. The key data is in the nature of allegations and the extent to which points raised are substantiated.

There are a series of primary investigative goals, before the underlying facts are conclusively determined. These are (1) the assessment of the credibility of the complaint and complainant (establishing whether it is a bona fide concern, and whether the matter has been previously raised and determined), (2) the duty owed to the complainant and any other parties in the circumstances (confidentiality and other safeguards of persons and evidence), and (3) whether a full investigation is necessary and, if so, the precise extent of allegations under investigation. Many 33 Note, however, that if the test for litigation privilege is met, interview notes may be covered by litigation privilege.

34 See, e.g., SEC v. Roberts, 254 F.R.D. 371, 375 (N.D. Cal. 2008); SEC v. Schroeder, No. C07-03798 JW, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 39378, at *20 (N.D. Cal. 27 April 2009); Nat'l Union Fire Ins. Co. of Pittsburgh, PA v. AARPO, Inc., No. 97-CV-1438, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21342, at *4 (S.D.N.Y. 24 November 1998); see also City of Pontiac General Employees' Retirement System v. Wal-Mart Stores Inc, et al., Case No. 5:12-cv-5162 (W.D. Ark 2012), Order 5 May 2017. An internal investigation conducted by non-lawyer investigators, not under the direction of counsel, nor in contemplation of litigation, is protected by neither the attorney–client privilege nor the work-product doctrine.

35 The Federal Rules of Evidence state: 'When the disclosure is made in a federal proceeding or to a federal office or agency and waives the attorney–client privilege or work-product protection, the waiver extends to an undisclosed communication or information in a federal or state proceeding only if: (1) the waiver is intentional; (2) the disclosed and undisclosed communications or information concern the same subject matter; and (3) they ought in fairness to be considered together.' Fed. R. Evid. 502(a). As interpreted, Rule 502(a) generally tends to narrow the scope of waiver.

companies will have clear policies on handling whistleblower complaints, but different companies and jurisdictions will apply varying standards and expectations as to the treatment of complainants. Some principles of general application are nonetheless emerging, namely:

- Whether complainants are actually whistleblowers if they do not class themselves as such is a matter that can be objectively assessed; it is the nature and context of the concern raised, and the policies and procedures triggered by those concerns, that determine the duty owed to them (such as a right to anonymity, the duty to report to authorities, employment protection and so on).
- How the concern is raised does not determine it as whistleblowing. The issues do not have to be raised in correspondence, through a helpline or formal complaints log: concerns can be raised orally in exit interviews, in informal email correspondence, during tribunal proceedings, by voicemail or in passing in social conversation in the office.
- A sensible rule of thumb is to ask whether the substance falls into the categories either defined in the policy on raising concerns or, in the unlikely event of there not being one, whether it constitutes the form of concern or complaint that a regulator would expect (or best practice would require)[36] to be treated with the controls and protections afforded to a whistleblower.
- In cases of doubt, the rights of the individual to protection should override the interests of the company such that complainants should be treated as whistleblowers and afforded necessary protection until the issue is clarified.
- There has been increased focus on the importance of protection of those raising concerns, including ensuring no steps are taken to identify those complainants seeking or entitled to anonymity. The FCA and the Prudential Regulatory Authority have reiterated their expectations as to the appropriate management of complainant confidentiality and the duties owed by regulated sector companies and individuals.[37]
- Care should nonetheless be taken to distinguish between genuine whistleblower cases and the raising of grievances contrary to process, although some allegations may be so significant or toxic to the company's reputation and financial interests that even an issue arising in an employment context but raised inappropriately or otherwise resolved may need to be investigated (e.g., an allegation of bribery made notwithstanding the existence of a compromised exit).
- A whistleblower may be the source of an allegation but need not (and probably should not) be involved in steering process or in determining or influencing the strategy or outcome. There is no obligation to provide a whistleblower with information in relation to findings, and there may be a significant downside in doing so in terms of loss of privilege and confidentiality. However, a 36 e.g., in guidance by unions, professional bodies or other interest groups or charities such as, in the United Kingdom, Public Concern at Work (www.pcaw.org.uk/).

37 See https://www.fca.org.uk/news/press-releases/fca-and-pra-jointly-fine-mr-james-staley-announce-special-requirements.

whistleblower should be made aware that the allegations have been taken seriously and are being addressed.

- Loss of bona fide status (e.g., in circumstances where spurious allegations are made for financial gain, employment protection or to blackmail) may result in the individual losing enhanced 'whistleblower' protection,[38, 39] but this must be contrasted with jurisdictions encouraging whistleblowing through 'bounty' schemes such as that offered by the US SEC's Office of the Whistleblower that do not impose any good faith requirement on the bounty recipient.[40]
- Bounty schemes and similar arrangements may influence the jurisdiction in which matters are first raised, but a company cannot rely on regulatory issues staying within that jurisdiction. As noted above, regulatory information gateways provide for the sharing of information between regulators and prosecutorial authorities in different jurisdictions (e.g., between the FCA and SEC, and between the DOJ and the SFO). As such, there should be an assumption of wide knowledge.
- Whistleblower initiatives are slowly gaining traction across the globe. A number of regulators (such as the IRS and SEC) in the United States in particular have established practices. However, there are significant cultural differences and enhanced data protection laws in certain European jurisdictions (particularly those whose current laws reflect the reaction to the intrusions of secret intelligence services in the 20th century, and where it is necessary to respect the legitimate reasons why these countries may continue to wrestle with the idea that staff should be encouraged to report colleagues' misconduct). There are some active reward programmes in Europe, such as the UK Competition and Markets Authority offering rewards of up to £100,000 for information on cartel activity, although these are much more limited than the incentives available in the United States. In October 2019, however, the European Union adopted a Directive on the protection of persons who report breaches of Union law,[41] which may encourage more whistleblowers to come forward. The new rules

See Chapters 19 and 20 on whistleblowers; see also Vol. II chapters at question 28

38 In the United Kingdom, the Public Interest Disclosure Act 1998 sets out protections for whistleblowers who are dismissed or affected as a consequence of making a disclosure as a whistleblower. Section 17 narrows the definition of protected disclosures to those made 'in the public interest'. Section 18 provides that tribunals may reduce compensatory payments in circumstances where the disclosure was not made in good faith.

39 In the United States, one eligibility requirement for whistleblower retaliation protection under the Dodd-Frank Act is that the whistleblower report conduct he or she 'reasonably believes' constitutes a violation. 18 U.S.C. § 1514A(a)(1). The employee's 'reasonable belief' must be both subjectively and objectively reasonable, and a good faith requirement has been interpreted as part of subjective reasonableness. Day v. Staples, Inc., 555 F,3d 42, 54 (1st Cir. 2009); Ashmore v. CGI Group Inc., 138 F. Supp. 3d 329, 344 (S.D.N.Y. 2015).

40 Pursuant to the Dodd-Frank Act, the SEC provides monetary awards to individuals, providing they meet certain criteria, who provide information leading to an enforcement action in which over US$1 million in sanctions is ordered. Awards range from 10 to 30 per cent of the amount collected. See https://www.sec.gov/whistleblower/.

41 See https://www.consilium.europa.eu/en/press/press-releases/2019/10/07/better-protection-of-whistle-blowers-new-eu-wide-rules-to-kick-in-in-2021/.

require (1) companies to create reporting channels and (2) a response within a fixed timescale. EU Member States will have two years from publication in the European Union's Official Journal (expected in late 2019) to comply. Outside the European Union, Australia's new whistleblower protection laws became effective in July 2019, requiring companies to have a whistleblower policy from January 2020.[42] However, the importance given to information from whistleblowers, the protection they are afforded and, accordingly, their willingness to come forward, vary widely across the world.

2.2.5 The role of the internal audit function

Many companies do not have (whether as a consequence of funding limitations, strategy or structural considerations) free-standing internal investigations capability. Some will have delegated that responsibility to the internal audit function. Even within that sector, which does have specific investigative capability, there may be examples of investigations having been undertaken by the internal audit functions as part of their ordinary control function activity. As internal investigation capability and practice have grown as a priority for business, so has the recognition that this is not the role of an internal audit function.

In a well-governed business, the purpose of internal audit is to provide the board with independent objective assurance as to the effectiveness of the enterprise-wide control framework. In summary, this means the identification of the appropriate controls in respect of specific (financial and other) risks and the assessment of their efficacy: identifying the risk to which the control relates; identifying the risk 'owner'; measuring the effectiveness of the control; mandating improvements where breaches or weaknesses are observed and escalating material control weaknesses to senior management or the board as necessary; tracking remedial action; and assessing the improved control environment. The DOJ's guidance on the evaluation of corporate compliance programmes asks companies to query how often internal audits are conducted in high-risk areas, whether the company audited its compliance programme and what control tests the company has generally undertaken.[43]

These activities are closely connected to, but not synonymous with, investigations. Internal audits are systematic reviews of the group-wide risk control framework and are not event-driven. They do not concern themselves with the investigation of complaints or claims with free-ranging subject matter or context, but are limited to the structure of the control framework devised by senior management.

Internal audit is not part of a legal function providing advisory services, so the output is not subject to legal privilege as a matter of English law (even where audit staff may be legally qualified, they are not tasked with providing legal advice to a client). In the United States, there is a practical refinement: where for a particular exercise members of the internal audit team are designated as working under the direction and control of the legal department, as its agent, for the purpose of providing expert assistance to the legal department in rendering legal advice to management then privilege will attach to their communication.[44] In the United Kingdom, this may be theoretically possible in circumstances where the audit team forms part of a working group under the control of a legal counsel or team, yet the very distinct role differentiation between audit and legal functions in UK corporate governance makes this a hard argument to sustain. Usually, an audit report that addresses legal issues, setting them out with clarity, identifying the controls, possible breaches and remediation recommended, and then identifying a lack of action in response to the recommendation can present dangers for an organisation. The report will be an unprotected disclosable document that presents a regulator, prosecutor or civil litigation claimant with a perfect platform – a charter for enforcement or a document undermining the credibility of a defence in a civil action. But this is not to suggest that internal audit has no role in internal investigations. On the contrary, it is one of the most important company functions, yet the timing and structure of its involvement in investigations is critical.

42 See https://asic.gov.au/about-asic/asic-investigations-and-enforcement/whistleblowing/.

43 US Department of Justice, Evaluation of Corporate Compliance Programs, § 9. See https://www.justice.gov/criminal-fraud/page/file/937501/download.

Internal audit output permits a pre-emptive, focused approach to investigation that is not simply limited to the complaints and concerns raised but operates within a risk-based evaluation culture. Internal audit reports allow a group-wide perspective on control weaknesses that enables investigators to concentrate resources in the most pressing areas of concern (whether in terms of reputational or financial risk) to the board, as opposed to responding piecemeal to each issue as it presents itself. This is important for an effective investigation function, as successful performance generates greater reliance and workloads can escalate aggressively once business leaders identify the value it can deliver. An internal audit function can therefore help to align an investigative function's input and output with the business's strategic risk management agenda.

Internal audit activity can also coincide with investigations, with the two functions reviewing similar subject matter, each with distinct purposes, strategies and methodologies, creating the obvious danger of conflicting or partly inconsistent outcomes (at least one of which will not be a privileged document and may contain stark conclusions in relation to the cause of a control breach). An internal audit, ideally, should occur subsequent to an investigation and may even rely on the contents of an investigators' report to focus the audit process. However, audit programmes tend to be cyclical, thematic or random, and internal auditors are understandably resistant to pressure from any part of the company to suspend or reschedule a standard audit (as this itself could constitute a breach of policy or control deficiency). Enhanced levels of communication between functions may assist in avoiding this risk, but a clash may be inevitable.

What steps can be taken to mitigate this risk? It may be possible to argue that audit is a limited process for a specific purpose, and not a comprehensive factual review. Investigation reports do have to distance their findings from time to time from historical and problematic, strident or oversimplified audit reports, and this can cause an issue where there are different findings on the same or similar facts in close proximity to each other. A forensic investigation is likely to be more comprehensive as it is likely to have included a wider range of evidence, including document reviews, e-discovery and, crucially, witness interviews. Furthermore, lawyers may be able to obtain more detail in the course of a formal interview dialogue where witnesses consider the implications of their responses more than in a control assurance review. It is essential, therefore, that the scope and purpose of an investigation be distinguished at the outset from a narrower control review or audit.

44 See United States v. Kovel, 296 F.2d 918 (2d Cir. 1961).

2.2.6 The role of the compliance function

A number of the observations above in respect of internal audit apply equally to the compliance function and are not repeated here. The standard control environment model is a three-legged stool: legal, compliance and risk, each with distinct but collaborative functions, with internal audit acting as a monitor separate from those operational controls. While positioning investigative capability within the legal function maximises claims to privilege and creates the opportunity for deploying the forensic expertise of litigation lawyers in investigative roles, it is by no means standard in the market, and many companies still engage compliance teams in investigative activity. The advantage is the natural connection between investigation, control assurance, control remediation and regulatory liaison, but the separation of roles avoids the risk of conflicts of interest (where, for example, a compliance function has been responsible for implementation of controls and measurement of their effectiveness, but is then charged with investigating breaches and establishing personal accountabilities).

As compliance functions are developing, particularly in the regulated financial services sector after the global financial crisis, a consensus is developing within companies and regulators that the proper home for conduct risk, whistleblowing and certain categories of investigation is the compliance function. There is an increasing pattern of financial crime risk management (policy ownership for bribery and corruption, money laundering, sanctions) being owned by the compliance function, and this has led a significant proportion of companies to extend the responsibility for investigation of these areas to compliance teams as well.

There is, however, a significant difference between ownership of policy and risk, on the one hand, and investigation of a suspected breach on the other, and significant governance concerns arise where the owners of a risk investigate the adequacy of their own conduct. For example, initial public criticism of banks' handling of issues over the London Inter-Bank Offered Rate (LIBOR) focused on the decision within some firms not to escalate concerns beyond the compliance function or the conduct of inadequate, early investigation by compliance teams within the affected businesses lines. Independent legal teams then proceeded with more thorough investigation of the issues, benefiting from the application of privilege where applicable (noting the points above and in Chapter 35 in relation to The RBS Rights Issue Litigation and ENRC decisions) as well as acting independently of the business. Learning from this episode, a number of banks restructured their compliance functions, separating the three legs of the stool more emphatically. They created greater levels of governance and control as between the respective functions, with operational framework agreements in place to ensure formal triggers for referral from compliance to legal in certain circumstances where the value or subject matter identifies a level of enhanced legal risk (e.g., bribery and corruption, financial sanctions, high-value fraud, or other systemic control breaches that could have material financial or reputational implications).

Considerations for investigations triggered by external events 2.3

Contact by authorities 2.3.1

In the UK regulated sector, where open and transparent supervisory dialogue is expected, it is comparatively rare for a business to find out about issues for the first time as a result of unilateral contact from a regulator. Ordinarily the regulated entity's report to the regulator leads to further investigation. By contrast, however, contact from prosecutors, competition authorities and, in certain circumstances, civil litigants may occur without prior warning. In the United States, corporates frequently learn of an investigation for the first time from prosecutors, and criminal referrals from regulatory agencies to the DOJ are common. The following does not seek to list all circumstances in which contact from authorities may trigger investigation, but it highlights certain aspects of unsolicited contact that may raise legal concerns.

The first challenge for a company is to discern the nature and purpose of the authority's enquiries, and in particular to distinguish between an investigation by a regulator and one by a prosecutor. While a company may be inclined to treat the two forms of organisation as synonymous, they are not. They discharge different duties, carry different powers (although they sometimes overlap) and have different expectations regarding co-operation. Accordingly, a company's approach to dealing with a regulator may differ from its response to a prosecutor.

A prosecutor investigating a matter is normally seeking evidence to decide whether a crime has occurred and whether individuals or the company should be criminally charged. If it proceeds with a prosecution, it carries the burden of proof (with certain limited jurisdictional and subject-matter exceptions). Apart from specific mandatory reporting regimes,[45] there is no obligation to volunteer information about misconduct to a prosecutor in the absence of a subpoena, warrant or other court order. It is an offence to obstruct an investigation, but obstruction does not extend to failure to volunteer evidence in the absence of compulsion; however, the provision of false, misleading or incomplete information to a prosecutor could amount to an offence of obstruction of justice in the United States or perverting the course of public justice in the United Kingdom. In the

See Chapters 5 and 6 on beginning an internal investigation

45 e.g., the obligation in the United Kingdom to submit suspicious activity reports under section 330 of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002.

United States, it is a crime to destroy evidence, even in the absence of compulsion or the initiation of a proceeding, when the purpose is to avoid its disclosure in an anticipated criminal or regulatory investigation or proceeding.[46] Further, the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination extends only to individuals, not corporations. Therefore, ancillary Fifth Amendment protections, such as the act of production doctrine, which permits an individual to hold back documents if the mere act of producing them, as opposed to their content, will be incriminating, does not apply to corporates.[47, 48]

In dealings with UK prosecutors, while opportunities for mitigation and leniency exist through demonstrable co-operation[49] (and a company may regret not being able to obtain co-operation credit later on), co-operation is a matter of pragmatic choice rather than legal obligation. The starting point remains unchanged: under what valid power does the prosecutor seek the evidence, what are the company's reasonable defences and how tactically does the company respond? While principles of co-operation with government agencies in the hope of gaining leniency or mitigation are more clearly defined and have a longer tradition in the United States, the general rule of law remains intact and questions of powers, defences and tactics are no less germane.[50]

Where a prosecutor, police or investigative agency, competition authority or other public body serves a subpoena, order or warrant entitling it to documents and electronic information, or to enter, search and seize, monitor or restrain, the challenge for the affected organisation is twofold: (1) to provide information or permit access and activity within the confines of the power granted; and (2) to ensure the company is not left behind (and preferably remains in front) in its own understanding of the relevant facts.

See Chapter 11 on production of information to authorities

In the United States, grand jury subpoenas are the most common tool prosecutors use to gather information against a corporation in a criminal investigation. Various civil and regulatory enforcement agencies, such as the SEC and Commodity Futures Trading Commission, may also issue subpoenas. General principles to follow when responding to a subpoena include issuing hold notices to the relevant employees and, if appropriate, third parties, to ensure that all

46 See 18 U.S.C. § 1519.

47 See United States v. Hubbell, 530 U.S. 27 (2000).

48 For the UK financial services industry, this is to be contrasted with the duty of open and co-operative dealings with the FCA, whereby evidence of a control breach would be reported without delay and significant regulatory implications could arise from a failure to do so. A US corporate's duty to disclose is limited. See Chapters 9 and 10 on co-operating with authorities.

49 In the United Kingdom, with the introduction of the Serious Fraud Office's DPA power in 2015.

50 There is no legal obligation to co-operate in an investigation in the United States. Under the Principles of Federal Prosecution of Business Organizations, however, a corporation's willingness to co-operate is a factor in determining whether to charge the corporation. But, a corporation's refusal to co-operate alone is not justification for prosecution. See JM § 9-28.700. Formal obligation aside, from a more pragmatic perspective, US and UK entities under a DPA or NPA, or parties subject to monitorships, may find they have little choice but to disclose, as might a member of the heavily regulated financial services sector, which could face adverse findings in relation to the duty to deal openly and transparently with its regulator.

information requested or potentially relevant to the enquiry (emails, other electronically stored information, hard-copy documents, etc.) is retained; controlling insider lists to identify those now aware of facts that may constitute inside information; preparing witness lists (to ensure they do not receive updates or advice on the matter, which may contaminate their evidence); and giving consideration to the treatment of witnesses (whether they require independent legal advice, or should be removed from the office environment through suspension or relocation so as not to risk evidence tampering, collusion or undue influence over other witnesses). In a criminal matter, defence counsel will almost always engage with the prosecutor to determine the company's status as a witness (potentially having relevant information, but no criminal liability), subject (the largest category, in which the government does not yet have sufficient information to determine criminal liability) or target (the government is gathering evidence to bring criminal charges against the company).[51] Counsel will also almost certainly work to narrow the scope of the information requested.

A number of important general principles apply also to the execution of search warrants and the conduct of dawn raids:

- The order or warrant must be reviewed to ensure that the party serving or executing it has the requisite power. (Does it catch the correct entity? Is it the correct site or office? Are the search area and the items the authorities are searching for described with the requisite particularity? Are there date or time discrepancies? Is it signed or executed? In the United Kingdom, does it bear the correct court seal? Does the person conducting the inspection have the requisite authority in that jurisdiction?)
- All relevant parties need to ensure the full scope and context of the search is understood (and where electronic searches are undertaken, endeavour to agree on relevant keyword searches and the exclusion of out-of-scope material, such as privileged documents or personal data).
- As with a subpoena, it will generally be necessary to issue hold notices immediately after receipt of the order or warrant with instructions not to destroy or spoil evidence or to give false or misleading information. As well as the obvious practical importance of preserving relevant evidence, there is also significant value in being seen to co-operate as an initial response.
- Individuals executing the order should be subject to identity verification to ensure that execution is in accordance with the terms of the order and that their identification is recorded (in the event that the order is breached and an individual's identity becomes relevant to any proceedings arising as a consequence).
- Staff, including reception and a designated dawn raid team, should be trained in advance as to how to conduct any interaction with investigators from the moment of first access to the premises. This includes training and instruction on not answering apparently casual questions on the subject of the search. The informal question to the unready on the walk along the corridor is a well-established source of information for experienced investigators. Any questions asked of staff should be noted. Employees may be informed of their legal rights not to speak to investigators and their right to counsel. Additionally, if the company is willing, the employees may be told that the company will provide legal counsel to them at no cost if investigators wish to speak to them or if they are later contacted. The company may not, however, instruct employees not to speak to investigators. That is the employee's choice.

51 See also, JM § 9-11.151, defining 'target' and 'subject'.

- A separate room should be set aside as a base for investigators and discussions between legal function representatives and the visitors so that debate and investigative activity does not take place within earshot of those under investigation.
- Local IT support (technology, plus a nominated IT representative) should be made available in the same room to ensure the IT environment can be explained to investigators and accessed. A log of access and copies of materials reviewed or seized should be made as the matter progresses so that a company's own investigators and lawyers can subsequently review the same material and evaluate compliance with the order or warrant.
- A written log should be kept of all places searched and items seized. Legal counsel should be present, if possible, to assert objections based on the attorney–client privilege, to identify commercially sensitive information or the sensitive personal information of customers or employees and to object if the search exceeds its authorisation. None of this, however, can be obstructive. The remedy for an improper search or seizure is to be had in court, not while the search is being conducted.
- Seek to agree with the investigators in advance on the definition and scope of principles such as legal privilege, commercial confidentiality, relevance, personal data and other material the company would contend falls outside the terms of the order, and to a protocol for handling these materials during and after the search.
- Consider whether it is necessary and appropriate to prepare a press release or public disclosure (e.g., stock exchange announcement) confirming the on-site inspection and its scope or purpose. In the United States, it may be advisable to convene a 'town hall' meeting with employees to discuss the search and the looming investigation, but in the United Kingdom, this practice is not favoured as it could tip off individuals who do not intend to comply, triggering evidence tampering or impacting the integrity of witness testimony.

See Chapters 37 and 38 on publicity

2.3.2 External whistleblowers

Many of the points in Section 2.2.4 on internal whistleblowers apply equally to whistleblowers from outside the organisation. There are, however, further legal sensitivities in dealing with external sources of concern that merit consideration.

While an employee cannot be prohibited or discouraged, contractually or otherwise, from reporting concerns to regulators or law enforcement, an employee will probably otherwise be subject to a contractual duty of confidentiality in respect to matters arising within the company and may often have a sense of loyalty to the company. Hence an internal whistleblower presents a more limited threat of public or further disclosure than an external whistleblower. Where an employee does not respect his or her obligations, care should be taken on the issue of enforcement of contractual and other duties of confidentiality, as a first response that apparently seeks to silence someone speaking up can appear extremely unattractive to the media, regulators and other authorities.[52] This has, more recently, become very sensitive in the context of sexual assault and discrimination claims and campaigns initiated by whistleblower complaints – including the #MeToo movement – with an increasing number of organisations publicly stating that they will not enforce confidentiality undertakings against complainants who are victims of such conduct in the workplace, notwithstanding their presence in employment contracts and compromise agreements, or choosing not to include them in newly executed agreements.

External whistleblowers frequently adopt a multi-level strategy for ensuring their concerns receive attention. First, they communicate through the formal whistleblower route, challenging the company to demonstrate the efficacy of its response. At the same time, or shortly after, they write directly to the board, senior management and shareholders, frequently copying in other third parties. Frustrated by inaction, they may turn to media interviews to increase pressure. Communication with regulatory authorities and other public bodies may follow.

It may be tempting to regard these scattergun approaches as self-evidently undermining the credibility of the issues raised and the complainant, but they are in fact remarkably effective strategies for ensuring the matter receives urgent attention, and the tools at hand for stopping wider publication are limited. Injunctive relief rarely succeeds in the face of a public interest justification.

Dialogue with the whistleblower, giving the clear impression that the company is grateful to the person for having spoken up and that an investigation is now under way, helps to reduce wider dissemination risk or slows the timetable. However, this must be balanced with the need to avoid encouraging the whistleblower to believe he or she is in charge, will be informed of the outcome of the investigation or in some way will influence the company's strategy in dealing with the issues.

A helpful counter to the lack of control a company has over the conduct of external whistleblowers is the lack of access they have to company confidential material and staff. By the same token, however, the company has limited line of sight into external whistleblowers' dealings with third parties, including public authorities. It is, therefore, advisable to invite the whistleblower to meet or speak with a member of the legal function to establish what he or she knows, has done so far and is intending to do next.

52 See e.g. SEC v. KBR, Release No. 34-74619 (1 April 2015) – fining and imposing remedial relief against KBR for violating Rule 21F-17, which prohibits impeding an individual from communicating directly with the SEC staff about a possible violation of the securities laws. KBR's violation stemmed from it requiring employees to sign confidentiality agreements as part of internal investigations, stating that they would not disclose interviews or the subject matter of interviews or investigations to anyone without the KBR legal department's prior approval, threatening disciplinary action up to termination for breaching the confidentiality agreement.

Finally, internal and external whistleblowers may have protected status, whether as employees or former employees under various EU, UK and US laws, or as a consequence of a company's policy and practice. Whether or not they are protected as a matter of law, it is essential that all whistleblowers are, and are seen to be, immune from retribution. This requires the application of significant care in the treatment of their complaints, evidence, the handling of witnesses, their anonymity (whether or not requested) and the reporting of facts within the organisation, recognising that ordinary line-reporting duties may be suspended to protect the identity of the whistleblower and avoid reprisal.

2.3.3 Media coverage

Unexpected media reports or more aggressive or intrusive media behaviour (such as undercover investigative journalism) can trigger an investigation in extremely pressurised circumstances. The media body running the story will often have completed its investigation before the company is aware of the matter. In the worst cases, the first a company learns of the facts is in the publication or broadcast, although various broadcasting codes and voluntary editorial principles encourage the opportunity for a right of reply, so most coverage will follow a short period of discussion of content between the media and the subject of the story, yet not enough to accommodate an investigation and fully informed response. The company's investigation is therefore under time pressure from its first step, with media, customers, shareholders, regulators and government agencies pressing for answers or redress before the company's senior management has been able to evaluate the facts or take advice on the risk they present.

Even if it has been aware of the broader issue, and is undertaking some form of investigation, sudden and intense media scrutiny can require a company to adjust the level of response to be seen to understand public demand for resolution. Companies that were otherwise intending to adopt a more passive approach, or undertake low-key investigations and adopt a reactive media and customer stance can appear to be on the back foot as they scramble to intensify investigative efforts.

All of this can, of course, play out as complaints and concerns become part of a viral episode through social media, reducing timelines to hours and days, not weeks and months. From a practical point of view, there is an immediate balance to be struck between thorough investigation and a sufficient grasp of the facts to allow the company to demonstrate a clear strategy that can be articulated publicly (consider, for example, the initial days of the Deepwater Horizon accident in the Gulf of Mexico in 2010).

Above all, these pressures require strong triage skills and pre-existing crisis management and investigations governance, which allows incident response, investigation, legal risk management, media, shareholder and customer relations strategies to follow well-practised routines so that precious time is not taken up debating who is leading and what the right first step may be. Setting up an investigations steering group and having effective policies and processes in place that are respected by senior management will ensure that emergency investigations are not obstructed by administrative chaos.

Customer and competitor complaints and regulatory response 2.3.4

As well as direct complaints to the company and civil litigation (which trigger the fact-gathering process), customers and competitors may refer complaints to regulators, consumer bodies and ombudsmen. Individual incidents may be sufficiently problematic to merit investigation in their own right. However, even with low-value customer complaints there comes a point where a volume of similar-fact criticisms raise concerns as to the fairness of underlying sales processes and adequacy of complaints handling systems, or perhaps even broader questions of breaches of systems or controls, that may combine to catch a regulator's attention.

While it might be hoped that a company's own monitoring of complaints levels and sources should trigger deeper investigation into the underlying issues, it will sometimes take unilateral regulatory enquiry and enforcement processes to bring about a non-voluntary, full evaluation, including thematic reviews, 'skilled persons appointments',[53] market studies and industry sweeps. Such investigations will have a significant distinguishing feature: the company's in-house investigators will not set the parameters of the investigation (though they can add significant value in debates with regulators over scope and process and may be heavily involved in the activities that follow, by partnering the external firm in a skilled person's review, for example). The in-house function will remain critical in the parallel process of evaluation of evidence as it comes to light so that advice may be taken to develop a response to regulatory or legal liability.

The influence of political agendas 2.3.5

The regulatory agenda is often set, adjusted or inflamed by the political climate, such that external regulatory or criminal investigations would not commence but for political pressure or the sudden availability of funding. The political agenda itself may change overnight in the face of public or media pressure.

Take, for example, UK parliamentary politics in the wake of the LIBOR regulatory settlements in the summer of 2012. Prior to the announcements that summer, the former Director of the SFO, Richard Alderman, had declined to commence an investigation into LIBOR manipulation citing insufficient resources to pursue the matter following budget cuts and a concern that the SFO might duplicate efforts by the Financial Services Authority and the Office of Fair Trading, which he considered better placed to determine the issues. He stepped down in April 2012 and the issue came to the public's attention in June 2012 when the first regulatory settlements were announced.

There followed a period of intense criticism in the media, growing public outcry and then questions in the House of Commons in late June 2012 as to why the SFO was not investigating the issues. Shortly after the Prime Minister's appearance in the House of Commons to answer questions on the issue, the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced that emergency funding was being made available, and on 6 July 2012 the SFO announced it was commencing an investigation. While the banks in question had either resolved matters with their regulatory bodies or were in the process of doing so, they then faced parallel investigations into the same matters (but on a different, criminal footing concerning the conduct of individuals as opposed to the regulatory breaches by the corporations). Formal requests for witness evidence were served in the weeks and months following. Prosecutions of individuals followed in 2015 and 2016 and continue in the United Kingdom and United States.

53 FSMA, section 166.

Although banks had already conducted their own investigative activity – in certain cases some years prior to the individual prosecutions – the purpose and nature, timescale and outcomes of the SFO's enquiries were different from the regulatory investigations by UK, US and other prosecutorial authorities, and different again to the multiple competition authority enquiries on the same issues that had already occurred, requiring a flexibility in approach by banks' investigations teams, not to mention significant capacity to handle such large-scale and long-running matters.

2.3.6 Investor complaints and shareholder derivative lawsuits

While this section considers the external causes of investigations, and complaints and claims by investors may appear to fall more obviously into the 'litigation' than 'investigations' workload for a company, claims and complaints are rarely so neatly delineated. The reality for many companies is that allegations raised by shareholders can trigger twin legal activities: a defence strategy in cases where issues of liability are plainly articulated and facts are either already established or may be simply assessed; and separate investigations into wider concerns raised by the complaint, or where the facts are far from clear and the allegation cannot be adequately responded to without an investigation.

A major sensitivity in matters of this nature, which can be overlooked in pursuit of the defence of the civil action, pursuit of the HR agenda and rebuttal of individual shareholder complaints, relates to the ongoing disclosure and transparency obligations arising from stock exchange listing rules. It is one thing to investigate sufficiently to position a company to defend litigation on the balance of probabilities, or to be able to respond to a letter of concern or questions from the floor in an annual general meeting, but another to investigate to a point where a public statement can be made with sufficient accuracy to satisfy the reasonable investor test.[54]

While a company may wish to respond speedily to concerns raised by an investor, and in other circumstances considered above a 'triage' approach enables early management of matters under investigation, dealing with investor complaints carries a further layer of complexity and a balance needs to be struck, in risk-management terms, between the urgency to make a statement to the market and the time it may take to investigate facts sufficiently to permit that statement to be adequately precise and informative. The publication of false or misleading statements through inadequate or incomplete investigation simply increases the range of potential legal liabilities and further delays resolution.

54 In the United Kingdom, information a reasonable investor would be likely to use as a basis for his or her investment decisions. See the FSMA and Article 7 of the Market Abuse Regulation relating to inside information. These provisions require a high degree of precision in the accuracy of factual statements.

Competitor complaints 2.3.7

A final category of external trigger is the complaint by a competitor (whether directly to the company or to a regulatory or criminal authority that then notifies the company).

On first analysis this seems to be little different from any other external trigger, but a complaint or concern raised by a participant in the same market raises a number of wider risks that impact the complexion of the subsequent investigation. In certain ways a competitor complaint has more in common with whistleblowing (and may even be regarded as such by authorities) in that it may create forms of protected disclosure, confidentiality obligations and behavioural expectations from particular authorities. This is certainly the case in competition matters where leniency or immunity is sought following a self-report to a competition authority following a tip-off or complaint by a competitor. This immediately limits the scope for communication of issues (including even the existence and subject matter of the investigation) among staff and will have a particular bearing on the management of evidence, including witness handling and interview processes. It will also affect the extent to which there may be ongoing communication outside the organisation where, for example, witnesses may exist within the competitor organisation but further dialogue is not possible without the consent of, and careful choreography by, the relevant authority.

3

Self-Reporting to the Authorities and Other Disclosure Obligations: The UK Perspective

Judith Seddon, Amanda Raad, Sarah Lambert-Porter, Chris Stott and Matthew Burn[1]

3.1 Introduction

Whether, when and how a company should report potential misconduct requires an increasingly 'global' (in all senses of that word) view of the risks and benefits involved. Around the world, enforcement actions in relation to bribery and money laundering are on the rise, international co-operation between authorities is being expanded and enhanced, and a growing number of jurisdictions are moving towards deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs) and formalised or protected whistleblowing regimes, as part of a general and growing trend towards incentivising corporate self-reporting.[2]

A corporate's voluntary decision to self-report requires directors to evaluate the potential benefits and risks involved in doing so, while complying with their duties under the Companies Act 2006 to consider and act in the best interests of the company as a whole.[3] Key benefits of self-reporting include the ability to manage the timing and content of the information being provided to the authorities, the potential for securing a DPA (or other negotiated settlement), reducing any financial penalties, minimising or managing reputational fallout, and achieving an earlier and more predictable resolution than may otherwise be possible. Particular risks include potential disruptive and damaging action by investigating authorities, damage to share prices, the removal or suspension of senior management,[4] costly internal investigations (including potential regulator involvement and the potential loss or waiver of privilege over key material) and potential civil litigation. The still relatively small body of decided cases in relation to DPAs, together with guidance setting out the circumstances in which they will be contemplated and entered into, provide some direction as to whether self-reporting may produce a negotiated outcome.

1 Judith Seddon and Amanda Raad are partners, and Sarah Lambert-Porter, Chris Stott and Matthew Burn are associates, at Ropes & Gray LLP in London.

2 In Lisa Osofsky's first speech as Director of the Serious Fraud Office (SFO), she referred to how the 'increasingly multijurisdictional and complex' nature of SFO cases makes co-operation to achieve global settlements all the more important. She said that '[s]trengthening and deepening the relationships that make this happen is going to be a major focus for me' and listed the newcomer countries to DPAs as part of that focus. Lisa Osofsky, SFO Director, speech at the Cambridge International Symposium on Economic Crime 2018, Jesus College, Cambridge, 3 September 2018, available at www.sfo.gov.uk/2018/09/03/lisa-osofsky-making-the-uk-a-high-risk-country-for-fraud-bribery-and-corruption/. A year on, co-operation continues to be central to the SFO's strategy: 'The work we at the SFO have been able to do in the last year with our international law enforcement partners has been energising – at times even inspiring. Prosecutors all around the world are realising how much we need each other if we are truly to do justice. So we are increasingly linking arms in the march against transnational fraud and corruption.' Lisa Osofsky, 2 September 2019, available at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2019/09/02/cambridge-symposium-2019/.

The stakes for individuals (usually directors) are also higher than ever in the United Kingdom – those working in firms regulated by the Financial Conduct Authority (FCA) or the Prudential Regulation Authority (PRA) will need to consider how the (relatively) new individual accountability regimes may provide those regulators with an easier route to regulatory enforcement action against them, in addition to any criminal and civil liability.

Frequently, questions as to how to deal with internal disclosures made by whistleblowers and, in those circumstances, whether, when and how to self-report matters to authorities, go hand in hand. Similarly, where a corporate operates in multiple jurisdictions, any trigger of mandatory reporting obligations in one jurisdiction warrants careful consideration regarding corresponding mandatory or voluntary reporting in others – particularly in light of authorities' increasingly collaborative approach to (formal and informal) sharing of information.[5]

The decisive and effective management of the risks and benefits of self-reporting, which typically involves balancing complex questions of fact and (criminal, regulatory and employment) law is critical and can help to conclude swiftly or pre-empt regulatory intervention. All these considerations play out against the backdrop of an obvious tension between self-reporting with sufficient speed to obtain or maximise co-operation credit and the chance of a DPA on the one hand, and taking

3 Companies Act 2006, s.172.

4 Alun Milford, then General Counsel at the SFO, said in a speech in September 2017 that in all DPA judgments to date, a key element has been the extent of reform in the corporate, including the removal of senior managers who were either implicated in, or should have been aware of, the criminality concerned, available at www.sfo.gov.uk/2017/09/05/alun-milford-on-deferred-prosecution-agreements/.

5 For example, in its recently published Corporate Co-operation Guidance, the SFO has set out certain indicators of good practice that they would expect to see in a co-operating corporate, including that an organisation should '[n]otify the SFO of any other government agencies, domestic or foreign, law enforcement or regulatory) by whom the organisation has been contacted or to whom it has reported', SFO Operational Handbook, Corporate Co-operation Guidance, p. 4, available at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/publications/guidance-policy-and-protocols/sfo-operational-handbook/.

the time to investigate an allegation sufficiently to understand whether, when and what to report on the other. The Court of Appeal's 2018 decision in the ENRC case[6] emphasises the importance (for the purposes of asserting legal privilege) of recording clearly and in good time the points at which a firm considers that it is involved in the self-reporting process and that litigation or criminal prosecution is reasonably in contemplation.

This chapter examines how authorities are using and interpreting self-reporting and whistleblowing frameworks in the United Kingdom, and identifies key considerations for corporates and their advisers. The extraterritorial reach of several pieces of key legislation (most notably the Bribery Act 2010 (UKBA)) and the comparatively aggressive stance of UK investigating and prosecuting authorities (principally the Serious Fraud Office (SFO)) mean that developments in the country are of interest to corporates operating around Europe and the Middle East, even if they are based, or undertake most of their activities, outside the United Kingdom.

3.2 Culture and whistleblowing

3.2.1 The importance of culture

Self-reporting and whistleblowing are increasingly considered to be fundamental to the 'culture' of an organisation. In the wake of the financial crisis and well-publicised corporate scandals, UK regulators and enforcement authorities remain concerned with promoting cultural change across financial institutions and corporates. Particular emphasis is placed on the need for meaningful challenge by (and of) senior management in addition to appropriately robust whistleblowing procedures, which employees are expected to use without fear of reprisal.

The FCA Handbook and PRA Rulebook set out the authorities' expectations that regulated firms will consider adopting internal procedures encouraging workers to blow the whistle internally about matters relevant to the functions of the FCA or PRA.[7] What is more, in response to recommendations by the Parliamentary Commission on Banking Standards in 2013, the FCA and the PRA published new rules, which have made it a requirement (since 7 March 2017) for in-scope banks and insurance firms to allocate responsibility for whistleblowing under the individual accountability regimes (i.e., the Senior Managers Regime, and the Senior Insurance Managers Regime) to a 'whistleblowers' champion', who must be a non-executive director.[8]

6 The Director of the Serious Fraud Office v. Eurasian Natural Resources Corp. Ltd (ENRC) [2018] EWCA Civ 2006.

7 FCA Handbook, SYSC 18.2.2 G.

8 FCA Policy Statement PS15/24 containing the FCA rules applicable to deposit takers with assets over £250 million. The rules are set out in the FCA Handbook at SYSC 18.1, SYSC 18.31, and SYSC 18.4 and 18.5. The PRA rules are set out in its Policy Statement PS24/15, the PRA General Organisational Requirements Rulebook (applicable to CRR firms, i.e, UK banks, building societies or investment firms subject to the EU Capital Requirements Regulation No. 575/2013) and its Whistleblowing Rulebook (applicable to solvency II firms) and PRA Supervisory Statement

Versions of these individual accountability rules are being introduced for all UK-regulated financial services firms. At the time of writing, the rules giving effect to this extension were due to enter into force in December 2019. There are variations as to how, and the extent to which, some aspects of the regulators' rules and guidance on whistleblowing apply to different types of financial services firms. However, regulatory guidance makes clear that other types of firms should regard the stringent rules currently in place for banks and insurers as best practice and that failures to implement appropriate arrangements may have adverse consequences on the assessment of firms' and individuals' ability to meet the required threshold conditions and fitness and propriety standards.[9]

In firms where one is required, the whistleblowers' champion is responsible for overseeing the effectiveness of internal whistleblowing procedures, including arrangements for protecting whistleblowers against detrimental treatment, preparing an annual report to the board, and reporting to the FCA where, in a case contested by the firm, an employment tribunal finds in favour of a whistleblower. Selection of the whistleblowers' champion should involve careful consideration of the proposed individual's standing and role within the firm, as well as the capacity, resources and access (e.g., to people and information) necessary to effectively discharge the responsibility for 'ensuring and overseeing the integrity, independence and effectiveness of the firm's policies and procedures on whistleblowing and for ensuring staff who raise concerns are protected from detrimental treatment'.[10] As a result of this new whistleblowing regime, the significance of whistleblowers will likely only increase.

Whistleblowing also features in the UKBA framework – under section 7 of the UKBA, a relevant corporate organisation commits an offence where a person associated with it bribes another person, intending to obtain or retain business or a business advantage for the firm. The firm has a defence if it can show that it had in place 'adequate procedures' to prevent such bribery. The Ministry of Justice published statutory guidance on 'adequate procedures' in March 2011, pursuant to section 9 of the UKBA.[11] That guidance recommends that adequate procedures should include procedures for reporting bribery 'including "speak up" or "whistleblowing" procedures'.[12]

SS 39/15 (applicable to deposit takers with assets greater than US$250 million, PRA designated investment firms and insurers).

9 FCA Handbook, SYSC 18.1.1AA G, 18.1.1C G and 18.3.9 G.

10 FCA Handbook, SYSC 18.4.4.R.

11 Ministry of Justice 'Guidance about procedures which relevant commercial organisations can put into place to prevent persons associated with them from bribing', available at www.justice.gov.uk/downloads/legislation/bribery-act-2010-guidance.pdf, March 2011.

12 Ibid. at para. 1.7. See also SFO v Tesco Stores Limited (2017) (Case No. U20170287) [2019] Lloyd's Rep FC 283, Approved Judgment, para. 60(ii), in which Leveson P set out the 'tangible remedial measures, that can properly be described as wide-ranging and comprehensive' and that included the relaunch of Tesco's 'externally-run whistle-blowing service, which is promoted to colleagues and suppliers, so as to raise awareness'.

Similarly, whistleblowing is featured in guidance published by the UK tax authority, HM Revenue and Customs (HMRC), in February 2019 in relation to the corporate offences of failing to prevent the facilitation of tax evasion under sections 45 and 46 of the Criminal Finances Act 2017 (CFA). It is a defence to those offences to show that 'reasonable prevention procedures' were in place (or that it was reasonable not to have any in place). Although, like its equivalent issued in respect of the UKBA, it is careful to avoid prescribing which particular measures specific corporate entities should have in place, the guidance issued by HMRC indicates that a demonstrable commitment to whistleblowing may assist corporate entities with establishing that arrangements maintained by them amounted to 'reasonable prevention procedures'.

Codes that govern prosecutors' decisions to bring charges against corporates,[13] and the DPA Code of Practice (the DPA Code)[14] itself, set out public interest factors for and against prosecution,[15] which, as Lisa Osofsky put it recently, 'instruct us to take into account the existence of effective compliance programmes and speedy self-reporting. It is about incentivising the private sector to cooperate in preventing crime, to be willing to report it if it occurs nonetheless, and to cooperate when we investigate and prosecute those who have transgressed.'[16] A self-report is also relevant at later stages in the UK criminal justice process. The Sentencing Council's Definitive Guideline,[17] which was effective from 1 October 2014 in relation to the sentencing of corporates for fraud, bribery and money laundering offences, and which is considered in setting financial penalties under a DPA, takes into account a corporate's culture in the event of a conviction.[18] Further, the amended Public Contracts Regulations 2015, introduced in February 2015, allow blacklisted companies to bid for public contracts if they can prove (among other things) that they have 'clarified the facts and circumstances in a comprehensive manner by actively collaborating with the investigating authorities' and 'taken concrete technical, organisational and personnel measures that are appropriate to prevent further criminal offences or misconduct'.[19]

13 https://www.sfo.gov.uk/publications/guidance-policy-and-protocols/corporate-self-reporting/.

14 Deferred Prosecution Agreement Code of Practice issued by the Director of Public Prosecutions and Director of the SFO pursuant to the Crime and Courts Act 2013, available at www.cps.gov.uk/sites/default/files/documents/publications/dpa_cop.pdf.

15 DPA Code, s.2.

16 Lisa Osofsky, SFO Director, speech at the Cambridge International Symposium on Economic Crime 2019, Jesus College, Cambridge, 2 September 2019, available at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2019/09/02/cambridge-symposium-2019/.

17 Sentencing Council's Definitive Guideline 'Corporate Offenders: Fraud, Bribery and Money Laundering', available at www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/Fraud-bribery-and-money-laundering-offences-Definitive-guideline2.pdf.

18 A culture of wilful disregard for the commission of offences will lead to a corporate being placed at the most culpable end of the spectrum and facing the heaviest fines available.

19 The Public Contracts Regulations 2015, Regulation 57(15).

Whistleblowing 3.2.2

The SFO launched its whistleblowing hotline (SFO Confidential) in 2011, although reports are now made electronically to the SFO's Intelligence Unit through the 'secure reporting form'.[20] The SFO's take-up of cases for investigation, based on such reports, remains low.[21]

The FCA managed 1,119 cases from whistleblowers in 2018, taking further action in 95 of these. The FCA has previously indicated that it expects to see an increase in the proportion of reports that lead directly to enforcement action or other intervention, or that provide intelligence of significant value, although these predictions are yet to come to fruition as the proportion of cases in which it has taken action has in fact declined slightly in recent years (10 per cent in 2017 and 8.5 per cent in 2018).[22]

The SFO has been keen to emphasise that whistleblowing is one avenue by which it may come to hear of alleged criminal conduct: 'Any such source can give us, or more particularly the Director, reasonable grounds to suspect the commission of an offence involving serious fraud, bribery or corruption and, with it, the power to open a criminal investigation.'[23] However, while whistleblower reports in the United Kingdom account for a proportion of the investigations commenced by the SFO, they are by no means the majority. They have led to some relatively high-profile successful prosecutions, although to date these have largely concerned individuals rather than corporate organisations.[24] More are expected to follow, including some of the SFO's current flagship investigations and prosecutions into large corporates. In September 2013, the SFO commenced criminal proceedings against Gyrus Group Limited, the UK subsidiary of Olympus Corporation, in connection with a worldwide fraud valued at approximately US$1.7 billion. That investigation flowed from the widely publicised whistleblowing disclosure made by Michael Woodford, the former CEO of Olympus, although the investigation has since been discontinued following a Court of Appeal judgment in February 2015, which ruled that English law does not criminalise the misleading of auditors by the company under audit. Separately, in December 2012, the SFO started an investigation into Rolls-Royce plc following a whistleblower report, although, despite the company having concluded a DPA with the SFO in 20 The secure reporting form is available at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/contact-us/reporting-serious-fraud-bribery-corruption/.

21 Number of SFO Investigations, July 2019, available at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/publications/corporate-information/freedom-of-information/.

22 See www.fca.org.uk/static/documents/how-we-handle-disclosures-from-whistleblowers.pdf.

23 Alun Milford, then General Counsel at the SFO, speech at the Cambridge Symposium on Economic Crime 2014, Jesus College, Cambridge ('The Use of Information to Discern and Control Risk'), 2 September 2014, available at www.sfo.gov.uk/2014/09/02/alun-milford-use-information-discern-control-risk/.

24 See, for example, prosecutions of individuals associated with Torex Retail PLC: https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2013/06/21/final-conviction-torex-retail-false-accounting-case/.

January 2017,[25] the SFO confirmed in February 2019 that no charges would be brought against individuals. The investigation into ENRC by the SFO was also influenced by whistleblower allegations first made to the company by email and then published in the media a few months later.[26]

See Chapter 19 on whistleblowers

3.3 The evolution of the link between self-reporting and a DPA

DPAs are now an established feature of the UK investigations landscape. The Director of the SFO, Lisa Osofsky, has spoken of her commitment to bringing the most complex and difficult cases of crimes to trial or, if in the public interest, to resolution through DPAs.[27] At the time of writing, five years and five DPAs after the introduction of the regime, there are some useful indications as to the SFO's stance – and equally importantly the courts' – in the cases decided (including those where DPAs have not been concluded), and in the operation of prosecution guidance in ongoing investigations and negotiations that may lead to further DPAs. The SFO's Corporate Co-operation Guidance,[28] issued in August 2019, gives greater clarity about when the SFO will consider a corporate organisation to be behaving sufficiently co-operatively to justify the commencement of discussions about possible negotiated outcomes. The Corporate Co-operation Guidance forms part of the SFO's internal Operational Handbook. It is published on the SFO's website in the interests of transparency, and the Guidance clearly states that it does not create legally enforceable rights, expectations or liabilities. The Guidance sets out what in practice constitutes co-operation. It focuses on the steps companies need to take to assist the SFO with its investigation, including by setting out the SFO's expectations with regard to the timeliness and extent of self-reporting by co-operating corporate organisations; in its introduction, it states:

See Chapter 23 on negotiating global settlements

> Co-operation means providing assistance to the SFO that goes above and beyond what the law requires. It includes: identifying suspected wrong-doing and criminal conduct together with the people responsible, regardless of their seniority or position in the organisation; reporting this to the SFO within a reasonable time of the suspicions coming to light; and preserving available evidence and providing it promptly in an evidentially sound format.

However, to understand the effect of any such co-operation, companies and practitioners still have to look to the DPA Code.

---

25 Serious Fraud Office v. Rolls-Royce plc and Rolls-Royce Energy Systems Inc. (Case No. U20170036) [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249, paras. 21 and 22.

26 Serious Fraud Office (SFO) v. Eurasian Natural Resources Corp. Ltd [2018] EWCA Civ 2006, at paras. 16-17.

27 Lisa Osofsky, speech at the Cambridge International Symposium on Economic Crime 2018, Jesus College, Cambridge, 3 September 2018, available at www.sfo.gov.uk/2018/09/03/lisa-osofsky-making-the-uk-a-high-risk-country-for-fraud-bribery-and-corruption/.

28 SFO Operational Handbook, Corporate Co-operation Guidance, p. 1, available at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/publications/guidance-policy-and-protocols/sfo-operational-handbook/.

The DPA Code sets out prosecutors' expectations in relation to self-reporting. A key factor when deciding whether a DPA is appropriate, to be weighed with other factors relating to the nature and seriousness of the offending, is whether the corporate has been 'genuinely proactive' in its approach.[29] This is measured by reference to the factors including the timing of a corporate's self-report, and how comprehensive, relevant and useful the material is (particularly in the context of any potential action to be taken against individuals).

The DPA Code makes clear that the SFO (or Crown Prosecution Service (CPS)) expects to be 'notified' of wrongdoing 'within a reasonable time of the offending conduct coming to light' for a DPA to be a realistic option.[30] The word 'notified' in this context replaced the word 'reported' originally included in the draft of the DPA Code. Although (perhaps given that it was not the subject of a consultation exercise prior to its publication in August 2019) the same distinction between 'reporting' and 'notifying' is not drawn in the Corporate Co-operation Guidance,[31] the message prosecutors are seeking to convey in both the DPA Code and the Corporate Co-operation Guidance is that corporate organisations wishing to obtain as much co-operation credit as possible should not wait until they have carried out their own detailed internal investigation before self-reporting concerns about possible wrongdoing. The Corporate Co-operation Guidance does not provide any further detail about when the SFO expects matters to be brought to its attention. Instead it reiterates previous general indications that this should occur 'within a reasonable time' of the corporate organisation becoming aware of the relevant matters. What is clear is that prosecutors expect to receive an initial notification of circumstances giving rise to concerns that criminal wrongdoing may have occurred. They do not expect or wish to receive a completed investigation report. As is set out in both the Corporate Co-operation Guidance and the DPA Code, they expect to be involved in the investigation at the planning stage and certainly before any witness interviews are conducted.[32] In cases where significant historic wrongdoing that is not already known to prosecutors and may suitably be resolved through a DPA comes to light, firms should consider making an initial notification to the SFO (or CPS, if appropriate) when they file suspicious activity reports (SARs) or other statutory reports (whether in the United Kingdom or abroad).

The timing of notification relative to details entering the public domain is of particular importance. At the time of writing, Rolls-Royce remains the highest-value

29 DPA Code, para. 2.8.2.

30 DPA Code, para. 2.8.1(v): 'Failure to notify the wrongdoing within a reasonable time of the offending conduct coming to light.'

31 SFO Operational Handbook, Corporate Co-operation Guidance, at p. 1: 'Co-operation means . . . reporting [suspected wrongdoing] to the SFO within a reasonable time of the suspicions coming to light.', available at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/publications/guidance-policy-and-protocols/sfo-operational-handbook/.

32 DPA Code, para. 2.9.2; SFO Operational Handbook, Corporate Co-operation Guidance, at p. 4: 'To avoid prejudice to the investigation, consult in a timely way with the SFO before interviewing potential witnesses or suspects, taking personnel/HR actions or taking other overt steps.', available at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/publications/guidance-policy-and-protocols/sfo-operational-handbook/.

DPA concluded in the United Kingdom. That it was still possible for the SFO to conclude a DPA with Rolls-Royce in 2017 despite some details of wrongdoing being already known to the SFO illustrates that this is just one factor informing a prosecutor's approach and does not by itself determine whether a DPA will follow.[33] However, as Sir Brian Leveson, then President of the Queen's Bench Division, noted in respect of Rolls-Royce, the case was anomalous in this regard, and it was necessary for the company to provide 'extraordinary' co-operation and to notify the SFO of matters 'of a different order' to those it would otherwise have known to obtain credit for self-reporting in the context of DPA negotiations.[34] Absent such extraordinary co-operation and disclosure, it is clear that a failure to notify the SFO of matters before they become public (or before negative headlines are threatened or imminent) will jeopardise the prospects of successfully negotiating a DPA.

The decision of the SFO in December 2015 to prosecute Sweett Group plc for the corporate offence of failure to prevent bribery under section 7 of the Bribery Act 2010 also illustrates this. Sweett self-reported to the SFO upon learning that a newspaper intended to publish allegations of involvement in bribery in connection with Middle Eastern construction consultancy agreements. Although informal discussions about DPAs did commence at one stage of the SFO's investigation, they were unsuccessful; and Sweett was deemed to have been un-cooperative for much of the investigation, leading ultimately to conviction and the imposition of a fine of £2.25 million in February 2016. Sweett's experience contrasts starkly with that of Standard Bank plc, with which the SFO agreed the first DPA in the United Kingdom in November 2015.[35] The SFO, and subsequently the court, highlighted and commended Standard Bank for reporting concerns to the SFO within weeks of the suspicious payment, and within days of filing a SAR.

The court's judgments in respect of Standard Bank and the other corporates with which DPAs have been concluded have added some colour to the indications in the DPA Code as to what the courts consider a corporate must do in practice when self-reporting to demonstrate 'genuine and proactive' co-operation. As already noted, these indications have been supplemented most recently by the Corporate Co-operation Guidance. Although it reflects what has occurred in previous cases where DPAs have been negotiated and approved (and other decided cases concerning issues arising during SFO investigations) and what continues to happen during discussions between co-operating corporate organisations and the SFO in cases where a DPA may be an option, at the time of writing, it has not been applied or referenced in any reported cases. For now, it has to be read 33 As noted in the Corporate Co-operation Guidance: 'Each case will turn on its own facts. In discussing co-operation with an organisation, the SFO will make clear that the nature and extent of the organisation's co-operation is one of many factors that the SFO will take into consideration when determining an appropriate resolution to its investigation.' Ibid., p. 1.

34 Serious Fraud Office v. Rolls-Royce plc and Rolls-Royce Energy Systems Inc. (Case No. U20170036) [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249, paras. 21 and 22.

35 Serious Fraud Office v. Standard Bank plc (Case No. U20150854) [2016] Lloyd's Rep FC 102.

together with the body of case law relating to DPAs in the United Kingdom. In these cases, 'genuine and proactive' co-operation has manifested itself largely through pragmatic decisions by firms to waive privilege on a limited basis and to make material available voluntarily (i.e., without requiring the SFO to use powers of compulsion, although the Corporate Co-operation Guidance confirms that the fact that the SFO may perceive a need to use its powers of compulsion will not necessarily mean that the corporate organisation concerned is not behaving suitably co-operatively). In all cases it has been crucial to show clear separation from the individuals alleged to have been involved in wrongdoing and commitment to providing material to be used in prosecutions against them, although in no case yet concluded has such material contributed to the conviction of any individual for the conduct in respect of which the corporate entity entered into a DPA.[36]

In early 2018, the CPS sent a useful reminder that self-reporting, however promptly, is only one factor influencing whether a DPA may be available. In R v. Skansen Interiors Ltd[37] – the first contested case in relation to the corporate 'failure to prevent' offence under section 7 of the UKBA – Skansen was prosecuted despite self-reporting to the National Crime Agency (NCA) and provided extensive co-operation to the CPS in the ensuing criminal investigation, including by disclosing privileged material. Skansen argued in court that its policies and procedures were adequate for a small company with operations only in the United Kingdom and a staff of 30, but the jury returned a guilty verdict, finding that the policies and procedures in place were insufficient for the purposes of the 'adequate procedures' defence. The CPS justified its decision to prosecute rather than pursue a DPA on grounds that Skansen was a dormant company and could neither pay a fine nor comply with the terms of any DPA, and that it wanted to send a message more generally to smaller companies as regards the importance of having effective anti-bribery and corruption procedures in place, rather than relying on 'company values' to establish proper compliance and conduct.

Key self-reporting requirements in the United Kingdom 3.4

Considerations for reporting may broadly be broken down into two categories – matters firms must report under legislation or regulation, and matters they may choose to report in the hope of bringing about an earlier or more favourable resolution to an investigation. These are examined separately below.

36 The most recent examples are the discontinuation of proceedings against former senior executives of Tesco Stores Limited in late 2018 (https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2018/12/06/no-case-to-answer-ruling-in-case-against-former-tesco-executives/) and the acquittal in July 2019 of employees of Sarclad Limited (which was anonymised as 'XYZ' when the DPA was entered into with the company, at which point reporting restrictions were in place due to the continuing proceedings against three employees (https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2019/07/16/three-individuals-acquitted-as-sfo-confirms-dpa-with-sarclad/)).

37 R v. Skansen Interiors Limited, unreported.

3.4.1 Anti-money laundering and terrorist financing reporting obligations

The sections of the United Kingdom's anti-money laundering and counter-terrorist financing legislation dealing with reporting are among the most stringent of their type in the world.

In outline, the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 imposes specific obligations on businesses operating in the 'regulated sector' to make SARs to the NCA where they know or suspect, or have reasonable grounds for knowing or suspecting, that another person is engaged in money laundering.[38]

The Money Laundering, Terrorist Financing and Transfer of Funds (Information on the Payer) Regulations 2017 (MLTF Regulations) require firms that are 'relevant persons'[39] to appoint a nominated officer and to ensure that anyone who is working in the firm, handling relevant business and has the requisite suspicion in relation to money laundering will make an internal report to the nominated officer, who is then obliged to consider whether to file a SAR.[40] This means that there are (internal) reporting obligations on the individuals working in those firms. For businesses operating in the regulated sector, information triggering reporting obligations is likely to have come to them as a consequence of customer due diligence and monitoring obligations imposed by the Money Laundering Regulations 2007 and the MLTF Regulations.

SARs may include a request to the NCA for 'appropriate consent' to enable the reporter to do a particular act in relation to the property concerned, which might otherwise amount to the commission of a money laundering offence.[41] Such SARs have historically been referred to as 'consent SARs', although they are now referred to by the NCA as 'requests for a defence against money laundering' or 'DAML SARs'.

There is a corresponding reporting and consent regime in relation to terrorist financing under the Terrorism Act 2000.[42] In addition, authorities may impose specific obligations on financial institutions, in particular, to report dealings with certain 'designated persons'.[43]

The relatively low threshold for making a SAR and the natural desire of businesses and the individuals within them to avoid liability (which can include potentially lengthy periods of imprisonment for individuals) means the NCA receives very substantial volumes of DAML SARs, placing a significant strain on its resources. In a review of the SAR framework completed in July 2018, the Law Commission acknowledged this, identifying that, on average, the relevant section

38 The Proceeds of Crime Act (POCA), ss.330 and 331.

39 A firm will be a 'relevant person' if it falls within the MLTF Regulations' definitions of: (1) credit institutions; (2) financial institutions; (3) auditors, insolvency practitioners, external accountants and tax advisers; (4) independent legal professionals; (5) trust or company service providers; (6) estate agents; (7) high value dealers; (8) casinos. (MLTF Regulations, regulation 8).

40 MLTF Regulations, regulations 19 and 20.

41 POCA, ss.335 and 336.

42 The Terrorism Act 2000 (TACT), s.21A (duty for the regulated sector), s.19 (duty outside the regulated sector) and s.21ZA (consent).

43 Counter-Terrorism Act 2008, Schedule 7, para. 12, and Terrorist Asset Freezing Act 2010, s.19.

of the NCA receives 2,000 SARs per working day, with some 100 reports seeking consent to proceed with a financial transaction.[44]

The number of SARs submitted remains high: the most recent statistics released by the NCA indicate that 478,437 SARs were filed between April 2018 and March 2019 (of which 34,151 were DAML SARs).[45] The statistics also show that the number of staff within the relevant section of the NCA is increasing (to 115 at the time of writing).

However, for the time being at least, the volume of SARs, together with the need for the NCA to consult with other enforcement authorities potentially interested in the information (of which there will be many), typically means that the NCA is not in a position to provide consent, or to confirm whether the reporter has 'appropriate consent' to proceed (in NCA parlance, whether the reporter has a 'defence against money laundering') much before the end of the seven-working-day notice period following the filing of a SAR.[46] This can lead to practical problems during the notice period itself and, if applicable, during the following moratorium period (which may now be extended to up to six months on the application of investigating authorities). Transactions will not be able to proceed. The risk of tipping off or committing other offences also leads to difficulties when communicating with customers, counterparties and others. The courts have been reluctant to interfere to accelerate this process.[47]

The Law Commission's review of the effectiveness of the United Kingdom's suspicious activity reporting regime for money laundering has acknowledged that more changes to existing frameworks are required. It has proposed changes including further practical guidance on key tenets of the reporting regime, such as the meaning of 'suspicion', but has stopped short of recommending other more radical changes originally mooted, such as amending the threshold for reporting matters to the NCA.[48]

In practice, a firm's decision whether and when to file SARs to comply with reporting obligations or to secure defences to substantive offences must form one part of wider strategic calculations about self-reporting. In many cases, it will be clear which enforcement authorities will be interested in investigating the circumstances that have given rise to knowledge or suspicion of (or reasonable grounds to suspect) money laundering. In such cases, it can make sense to consider providing 44 Law Commission's Consultation Paper, July 2018.

45 POCA, ss.335 (appropriate consent) and 336 (nominated officer consent). The NCA's most recent statistics indicate that the average turnaround time for a DAML SAR is five to 12 days. See the NCA's annual SAR report, November 2019, available at https://nationalcrimeagency.gov.uk/who-we-are/publications/390-sars-annual-report-2019/file.

46 The NCA's most recent statistics indicate that the power to extend the moratorium period was used 70 times in 2018–2019. See the NCA's annual SAR report, November 2019, available at https://nationalcrimeagency.gov.uk/who-we-are/publications/390-sars-annual-report-2019/file.

47 See National Crime Agency v. N [2017] EWCA Civ 253; and Lonsdale v. Natwest [2018] EWHC 1843 (QB), for example.

48 Law Commission, 'Anti-Money Laundering: The SARs Regime Report', Law Com No. 384 (June 2019), available at https://www.lawcom.gov.uk/project/anti-money-laundering/.

the information set out in the SAR to the relevant enforcement authorities. Doing so when filing a SAR with the NCA (or soon after) can help to secure maximum credit for proactively bringing matters to the attention of the authorities and to expedite obtaining consent to proceed with a transaction.

3.4.2 Other mandatory reporting obligations prescribed by legislation

A company will be subject to a variety of reporting obligations, depending on the nature of its operations, the sector in which it is involved, and the extent (and by which authorities) it is regulated. Each authority will have its own requirements as to the timing, format, content and process for mandatory reports. The key sectoral requirements include reporting:

- financial sanctions breaches, to the Office for Financial Sanctions Implementation (OFSI) (on behalf of Her Majesty's Treasury);
- (for financial institutions) the corporate offences of failure to prevent the facilitation of UK or foreign tax evasion under the CFA to HMRC;[49] and
- data security breaches under the General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR), within 72 hours of becoming aware of the breach, to the Information Commissioner's Office (ICO) and, in some cases, to the data subjects concerned.

3.4.3 Self-reporting obligations in DPAs and regulatory and private agreements

Separately, corporates may have self-imposed reporting obligations. It is common for certain reporting obligations to be built into DPAs, ongoing monitorship agreements or other agreements with regulators in relation to historic criminal or regulatory failings, for example. Where a firm has a history of such failings, it is also not uncommon for parties to key transactional and financial agreements to insist on similar reporting obligations, often tied to the corporate's mandatory reporting requirements to particular authorities. In all cases, these obligations may have short reporting windows, which should be familiar to the corporate and acted on without undue delay.

Separately, corporates may be obliged to bring the fact of an investigation, or the circumstances giving rise to it, to the attention of a host of potentially interested parties. These may include regulators, contractual counterparties, markets on which they are listed, affected customers and insurers. There is a relatively high likelihood of variations in contractual arrangements and legal and regulatory frameworks (for example, in relation to conditions for contracting with government entities under applicable public procurement legislation) across the jurisdictions in which corporates operate. Conducting an early analysis of the potential 49 The term 'corporate offences' refers to the 'failure to prevent the facilitation of tax evasion' offences created by s.45 (in relation to UK tax) and s.46 (in relation to foreign tax) of the Criminal Finances Act 2017, pursuant to which a financial institution must report on any failure to prevent the criminal acts of its employees and other associated persons who have intentionally facilitated tax evasion while providing a service for it or on its behalf.

collateral impact of historic wrongdoing and any investigation, prosecution or negotiated outcome, will therefore often be prudent.

Self-reporting to the FCA and PRA 3.4.4

The FCA and, in the case of dual-regulated firms, the PRA are responsible for the conduct of firms authorised under the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000. Of particular relevance is the responsibility for ensuring that the firms and individuals regulated by it establish and maintain effective, proportionate and risk-based systems and controls to ensure that they cannot be used for the purposes of financial crime.[50]

The FCA Handbook and the PRA Rulebook contain detailed rules and guidance on its requirements in this area. These provisions supplement the overarching obligations on regulated firms and individuals to maintain an 'open and co-operative' relationship with the FCA and PRA and to 'disclose . . . appropriately anything relating to the firm of which [the relevant regulator] would reasonably expect notice'.[51] In practice, these broad principles-based requirements oblige regulated firms and individuals to notify the FCA or the PRA, or both, not only of circumstances that may amount to breaches of rules set out in the FCA Handbook or the PRA Rulebook, but also of investigations and other matters that may affect the fitness and propriety of individuals, or the ability of firms to satisfy the threshold conditions required to be authorised to carry on particular regulated activities.

In recent years, the FCA has increasingly used its enforcement powers against firms and individuals for deficiencies in financial crime systems and controls. It continues to do so enthusiastically, with the most recent statistics published by the FCA indicating that it has approximately 88 such investigations open at the time of writing. It looks set to continue in this vein, having identified the area as one of its 'cross-sector priorities' in its most recent annual report.[52] A number of enforcement cases pursued by the FCA in relation to financial crime systems and controls have been based to a significant degree on failures proactively to bring matters to the FCA's attention.[53] Looking more widely across the FCA's regulatory purview, in a number of other cases substantial penalties have been imposed on firms and individuals simply for failing to comply with obligations to notify the regulator.[54]

50 See the FCA's Annual Report for 2018/19, available at https://www.fca.org.uk/annual-report-and-accounts-2018-19.

51 PRIN 2.1.1 R, Principle 11 of the Principles for Businesses (Relations with Regulators).

52 FCA Enforcement annual performance report 2018/19, available at https://www.fca.org.uk/publication/corporate/annual-report-2018-19-enforcement-performance.pdf.

53 For example, in 2015 the FCA fined The Bank of Beirut (UK) Ltd (Bank of Beirut) £2.1 million, prevented it from acquiring new customers from high-risk jurisdictions for 126 days, and fined two approved persons at the bank. The FCA noted that Bank of Beirut had also repeatedly provided the FCA with misleading information after it was required to address concerns regarding its financial crime systems and controls, including by indicating that it had completed remedial actions when it had not.

54 For example, in 2018, Santander was fined for, among other things, failing to disclose information relating to certain issues with the probate and bereavement process to the FCA. The final notice

In a number of other areas, firms and individuals must proactively bring particular matters to the attention of the FCA, which may in due course give rise to intensified supervision, or enforcement investigations, or both. Key examples include obligations to file suspicious transaction and order reports under the Market Abuse Regulation and requirements for firms to notify the FCA (or PRA, as appropriate) of breaches of the Conduct Rules by senior managers, certified persons or other employees. The timescales for such notifications and the level of detail required also vary significantly depending on the circumstances.

The FCA also acts as the UK Listing Authority, meaning that companies listed in the United Kingdom (and their directors) must behave in an open and co-operative manner.[55] Although the wording of the requirement imposed on listed companies differs from that imposed on regulated firms and individuals (it does not include an express requirement to notify the FCA of matters of which it would reasonably expect notice), listed companies and their directors should expect to have to notify the FCA of potentially significant investigations under these obligations.

None of the mandatory reporting obligations described above exists in a vacuum. The FCA in particular collaborates closely with other enforcement authorities within the United Kingdom and internationally.

Indeed, notwithstanding its ability to prosecute criminal offences, there have been several examples in recent years of cases in which it has supplied information to and otherwise coordinated its action with other authorities, including, notably, the SFO.[56]

The remainder of this chapter considers self-reporting in relation to the SFO and, to the extent relevant, the FCA, in relation to financial crime issues.

3.5 Voluntary self-reporting to the SFO

The SFO's decision as to whether to prosecute a corporate organisation will be governed by a combination of the 'Full Code Test' in the Code for Crown Prosecutors,[57] the Guidance on Corporate Prosecutions,[58] (in relevant cases) the is available at https://www.fca.org.uk/publication/final-notices/santander-uk-plc-2018.pdf. In June 2019, the FCA fined Bank of Scotland £45.5 million for failing to disclose suspicions that fraud may have taken place within part of its corporate lending operations. The final notice is available at https://www.fca.org.uk/publication/final-notices/bank-of-scotland-2019.pdf.

55 FCA Handbook, LR 7.2.1 R, Listing Principle 2.

56 By way of recent example, the FCA did not impose a financial penalty on Tesco plc or Tesco Stores in early 2017 for engaging in market abuse, partly because Tesco Stores had entered into a DPA with the SFO, pursuant to which it would pay £128.9925 million. The FCA explained that it had also taken into account 'the exemplary co-operative approach' taken by Tesco plc and Tesco Stores with both the FCA and the SFO. See the FCA final notice, available at www.fca.org.uk/publication/final-notices/tesco-2017.pdf.

57 The Code for Crown Prosecutors, available at www.cps.gov.uk/publication/code-crown-prosecutors.

58 The joint guidance issued by the Director of Public Prosecutions, the Director of the Serious Fraud Office and the Director of the Revenue and Customs Prosecutions Office Guidance on Corporate Prosecutions, available at www.sfo.gov.uk/?wpdmdl=1457.

Joint Prosecution Guidance of the Director of the SFO and the Director of Public Prosecutions on the Bribery Act 2010 (the Joint UKBA Guidance), the DPA Code of Practice and the Corporate Co-operation Guidance.[59]

The SFO will prosecute if there is a realistic prospect of conviction on the evidence, and it is in the public interest to do so. The fact that a corporate has reported itself will be a relevant consideration to the extent set out in the Guidance on Corporate Prosecutions. That guidance explains that, for a self-report to be a public interest factor tending against prosecution, it must form part of a 'genuinely proactive approach adopted by the corporate management team when the offending is brought to their notice'.[60] The SFO has long stated expressly, and has reiterated most recently in the Corporate Co-operation Guidance, that self-reporting is no guarantee that a prosecution will not follow, and that each case will turn on its own facts.[61]

The Corporate Co-operation Guidance 'does not seek to set out exhaustively what will be required in order for a corporate organisation to be considered as genuinely co-operative and indeed is clear that there will be dialogue in every case about what will be expected of the corporate organisation concerned'. It does add detail and confirm previous public statements in relation to some practical steps corporate organisations should take, including good general practices surrounding the preservation and production of relevant digital and hard copy information; good practice concerning evidence of financial records and analysis (to 'show relevant money flows'); the provision of industry and background information (including about other actors in the market and whether any other government agencies are aware); and good practice concerning taking witness evidence (including an expectation that co-operating corporates will waive privilege over witness accounts).

In appropriate cases the SFO may use its powers under proceeds of crime legislation as an alternative (or in addition) to prosecution.[62] If the SFO uses those powers, it will publish its reasons, the details of the illegal conduct and the details of the disposal.

Advantages of self-reporting 3.5.1

Co-operation credit 3.5.1.1

Most corporates will consider that the primary advantage of making a voluntary self-report is co-operation credit, particularly if the corporate is seeking a DPA. Speaking in June 2018, Camilla de Silva, the SFO's Joint Head of Bribery and 59 Bribery Act 2010: Joint Prosecution Guidance of The Director of the Serious Fraud Office and The Director of Public Prosecutions, 30 March 2011, available at www.sfo.gov.uk/?wpdmdl=1456.

60 Guidance on Corporate Prosecutions, para. 32 ('Additional public interest factors against prosecution').

61 SFO's statement of policy and revised guidance on corporate self-reporting, October 2012.

62 See the Attorney General's Guidance for prosecutors and investigators on their asset recovery powers under s.2A POCA, available at www.gov.uk/guidance/asset-recovery-powers-for-prosecutors-guidance-and-background-note-2009.

Corruption, said: 'The SFO will only invite a company to enter into an agreement to defer prosecution where the company has genuinely co-operated with the SFO.'[63] This statement reflects the DPA Code, which lists co-operation as an additional public interest factor tending against prosecution.[64] As noted earlier, the DPA Code is clear that the co-operation has to be 'genuinely proactive' and lists as examples of co-operative behaviour 'identifying relevant witnesses, disclosing their accounts and the documents shown to them . . . [and] where practicable it will involve making the witnesses available for interview when requested'.[65]

The Guidance on Corporate Prosecutions also lists co-operation as a factor tending against prosecution, but instructs prosecutors to 'establish whether sufficient information about the operation of the company in its entirety has been supplied in order to assess whether the company has been proactively compliant' before taking co-operation into account as a factor, and stresses that '[t]his will include making witnesses available and disclosure of the details of any internal investigation'.[66]

In approving DPAs between the SFO and each of Standard Bank, Sarclad Ltd,[67] (which in the initial preliminary and approved judgments had been identified as XYZ Ltd) and Rolls-Royce, Sir Brian Leveson, then President of the Queen's Bench Division, spoke approvingly of the co-operative stance adopted by each of those firms, as did Mr Justice William Davis, approving the DPA between the SFO and Serco Geografix Limited in July 2019.[68]

Even if a corporate reports at an early stage and takes every step to co-operate with the SFO, it may still not be considered eligible for a DPA because other factors ward against it, for example where the behaviour in question has caused a significant level of harm to victims, or a substantial adverse impact to the integrity or confidence of markets.[69]

Following conviction or a guilty plea, a corporate is still likely to receive some benefit from its co-operation when it comes to sentencing. The Sentencing Council's Definitive Guideline sets out a multi-step process to assist courts in determining the appropriate fine. The first step is to establish the harm caused by the offending. For example, for a bribery offence, the starting point for the calculation is the 'harm figure' – the gross profit from the contract obtained. Once a harm figure has been determined, the court has to establish the 'culpability' factor by reference to a scale in the Definitive Guideline (from 'A' for high culpability down to 'C' for lesser culpability). Each level of culpability has attached to it a

63 Camilla de Silva, SFO Joint Head of Bribery and Corruption, speech at the Herbert Smith Freehills Corporate Crime Conference 2018, available at www.sfo.gov.uk/2018/06/21/corporate-criminal-liability-ai-and-dpas/.

64 Para. 2.8.2(i).

65 Ibid.

66 Guidance on Corporate Prosecutions, p. 8.

67 Serious Fraud Office v. XYZ Limited (Case No. U20150856) [2016] 7 WLUK 220; [2016] Lloyd's Rep FC 509.

68 Serious Fraud Office v. Serco Geografix Ltd [2019] (Case No. U20190413) 7 WLUK 45.

69 DPA Code, para 2.8.1(vii).

range of multipliers to apply to the harm figure. In determining exactly which multiplier to apply, the court must take into account many factors. Notably, co-operation with the investigation is listed in the Definitive Guideline as a factor that will tend to reduce the culpability multiplier.

Arguably, corporates in the regulated sector have less scope for truly voluntary self-reporting because the requirement in Principle 11 of the FCA's Principles for Businesses require a regulated firm to 'disclose to the FCA appropriately anything relating to the firm of which that regulator would reasonably expect notice'.[70] The FCA sets out in its Decision Procedure and Penalties Manual (DEPP) a non-exhaustive list of factors it will consider when deciding to issue a financial penalty or public censure. Included on the list of factors is 'how quickly, effectively and completely the person brought the breach to the attention of the FCA or another relevant regulatory authority'.[71] If the FCA does choose to take action against a firm, DEPP includes provisions for determining the appropriate level of financial penalty, which operate similarly to the Sentencing Council's Definitive Guideline. DEPP states that a factor to consider when deciding whether to increase or decrease any fine is 'the conduct of the firm in bringing (or failing to bring) quickly, effectively and completely the breach to the FCA's attention'.[72]

Demonstrating culture and the strength of systems and controls 3.5.1.2

Effective self-reporting will clearly indicate a good corporate culture. Firms that have taken the necessary steps to institute a good culture supported by robust systems and controls will expect that any matters involving wrongdoing are quickly reported internally via its whistleblowing procedures and escalated and reported to the relevant authorities, as appropriate.

Conversely, for firms in the regulated sector, the failure to identify and self-report wrongdoing could indicate that its systems and controls are inadequate. The FCA Handbook states that a regulated firm:

> must establish, implement and maintain adequate policies and procedures sufficient to ensure compliance of the firm including its managers, employees and appointed representatives (or where applicable, tied agents) with its obligations under the regulatory system and for countering the risk that the firm might be used to further financial crime.[73]

There are a number of examples of the FCA taking enforcement action in recent years against regulated firms for having inadequate systems and controls.[74]

70 FCA Handbook, PRIN 2.1.1 R. An equivalent obligation to notify the PRA is set out in Fundamental Rule 7.

71 FCA Handbook, DEPP 6.2.1 (2)(a).

72 FCA Handbook, DEPP 6.5A.3 (2)(a).

73 FCA Handbook, SYSC 6.1.1R.

74 For example, the FCA's fine of Bank of Beirut, discussed above.

In a slightly different context, a recently concluded case concerning whether the actions of an investment bank in paying away monies held in the account of a company to its director amounted to negligence highlights the potentially substantial losses that may result from inadequacies in systems and controls, even if no regulatory or criminal enforcement action is taken against the institution concerned.[75]

3.5.1.3 Information control

Firms often think that choosing to self-report will enable them to retain control over the information that they disclose. In practice, however, the SFO and FCA's insistence on effective and complete self-reporting means that firms will have to provide as complete an account as possible of the wrongdoing concerned, and hand over any investigative work-product already created. Public companies will also have to give careful consideration to their obligations to make market announcements.

See Chapter 37 on publicity and Chapter 39 on protecting corporate reputation

Given the stance adopted by the FCA and SFO, perhaps the only true benefit to self-reporting is that the corporate has some control over the timetable (as compared, for instance, with a dawn raid) and is therefore able (having taken advice on any market abuse risks) to notify key stakeholders of the self-report and to prepare an appropriate media strategy.

3.5.2 Risks of self-reporting

For many companies, the primary driver behind self-reporting is the opportunity to secure a DPA. It should be clear from the analysis above, however, that self-reporting in the United Kingdom does not guarantee a DPA or even necessarily leniency in sentencing (depending on whether other public interest factors are at play). It is also clear that a firm may only be able to gauge its prospects of success relatively late in a process during which the firm will usually have provided a significant amount of information, documents, investigation reports and even witnesses for interview.[76]

Perversely, therefore, a firm's efforts to secure maximum co-operation credit may actually put it in a worse position than it began in, especially if it has provided information or evidence about an issue or facts that may not otherwise have come to light or been obtainable by the authority. There is an ever-present risk that by the time the corporate has visibility as to the direction in which the SFO or the court is leaning, it may have assisted prosecutors in building a strong case against itself, often at significant financial and other cost, for little or no benefit. The Corporate Co-operation Guidance provides the most recent reminder of this, with clear express warnings to corporate organisations that none of its provisions creates any rights or expectations. In a slightly different context, Soma Oil

75 Singularis Holdings Ltd (In Official Liquidation) (A Company Incorporated in the Cayman Islands) v. Daiwa Capital Markets Europe Limited [2019] UKSC 50.

76 In the United Kingdom, court approval is required for a DPA, which means that even if the SFO recommends a DPA after extensive co-operation, the court may reject it.

& Gas Limited v. Director of the Serious Fraud Office[77] provides an illustration of the expense, difficulty and disruption associated with seeking to force the SFO to bring about a conclusion to an investigation. Corporates therefore need to evaluate the risks and costs inherent in making self-reports very carefully. Some key risks and practical considerations are set out below.

Interest and potential investigation in other jurisdictions 3.5.2.1

There is always a risk of contagion: it is the nature of complex bribery, fraud and corruption that it crosses borders and can implicate authorities in multiple jurisdictions. Self-reporting to a regulator in one jurisdiction may draw the attention of other regulators, domestically or abroad. Matters are frequently complicated because the benefits and risks of reporting are seldom consistent or certain across jurisdictions, and authorities in different countries seldom have the same procedures, techniques or demands in conducting their investigations and taking enforcement action.

Increasingly, regulators are sharing information and seeking to collaborate in enforcement actions. As long ago as 2010, the US Department of Justice (DOJ) and the SFO worked together in investigating BAE Systems plc,[78] and such co-operation has since become routine. International co-operation often goes beyond formal mutual legal assistance requests, to encompass informal intelligence sharing (sometimes in advance of formal investigation in any jurisdiction), coordination or division of responsibility or issues for enforcement, and even formal programmes by which to enhance understanding and assist with capacity or resourcing. At a symposium in September 2016, Sir David Green QC, then Director of the SFO, explained: 'All [SFO] cases have a significant international dimension. We have invested real effort in building strong co-operative relations with foreign agencies in key financial centres across the globe. This involves secondments, rolling discussions, exchange of information and coordinated activity.'[79]

While there are legal limits to the extent of information sharing and collaboration between authorities, firms need to be strategic in their conduct across all countries. It is important to take heed of cases such as United States v. Allen,[80] in which the US Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit held that the prohibition against the use (and derivative use) of a defendant's compelled testimony will apply even where the testimony had been compelled by a foreign authority, such as the FCA. The DOJ therefore needs to ensure that it avoids its own investigation becoming 'tainted' by compelled testimony when it is collaborating or exchanging 77 Soma Oil & Gas Limited v. Director of the Serious Fraud Office [2016] EWHC 2471 (Admin).

78 See the DOJ's expression of gratitude to the SFO for its assistance in its press release, March 2010, available at www.justice.gov/opa/pr/bae-systems-plc-pleads-guilty-and-ordered-pay-400-million-criminal-fine.

79 Sir David Green QC, former Director of the SFO, speech at the Cambridge Symposium on Economic Crime 2016 at Jesus College, Cambridge, 5 September 2016, available at www.sfo.gov.uk/2016/09/05/cambridge-symposium-2016/.

80 United States v. Allen, No. 16-898 (2d Cir. 2017).

information with other countries' authorities – a particular concern as regards the United Kingdom, where the provision of evidence or interviews is commonly compelled. This also means that there is a risk that, by providing to the DOJ reports or information derived from compelled testimony (even by inadvertence, as part of routine updates or reports on progress or developments in parallel investigations), a firm may risk negating any co-operation credit that they might have established in other ways.

3.5.2.2 Privilege issues and authorities' involvement in the internal investigation

Legal advice in relation to internal investigations

A key concern for all firms considering and investigating suspicions or allegations of wrongdoing is to establish clearly at the outset that its board, or any committee with oversight of internal investigations, is authorised to seek and receive legal advice in relation to the investigation to ensure that updates to these bodies and related documents will be protected by legal professional privilege. This authorisation is important because English law on the question of who is the 'client' for the purposes of legal professional privilege remains rooted in the House of Lords decision in Three Rivers No. 5, such that the 'client' was not the corporation itself but only those officers and employees of the corporation who were 'authorised' to communicate with the corporation's lawyers.[81] In its September 2018 judgment in the ENRC case, the Court of Appeal made a number of interesting comments on the latter rule. The court noted in particular that this rule was more appropriate for the 19th century than the 21st century, that its application may result in a disadvantage to modern multinational corporations (where the information required to obtain legal advice would often be in the hands of people not charged with obtaining it),[82] and that it would have been in favour of departing from Three Rivers No. 5 if it had been open to it to do so. Significantly, however, those comments were obiter on the basis that only the Supreme Court can reverse or depart from the decision in Three Rivers No. 5.

Material generated during internal investigations

A significant concern in the context of internal investigations centres on the material generated during an internal investigation, including any investigation work and work-product that may have preceded the self-report. This material typically includes interview notes and summaries of key documents and issues.

The UK authorities are adamant that to self-report in any meaningful sense, firms must provide them with sufficiently detailed information about the wrongdoing. The SFO states: 'All supporting evidence including, but not limited to emails, banking evidence and witness accounts, must be provided to the SFO's

81 Three Rivers District Council and Others v. The Governor and Company of the Bank of England [2003] EWCA Civ 474 (Three Rivers No. 5).

82 Especially as compared with smaller corporations, which the Court noted was the typical size and structure of the corporations involved in the 19th century cases considered in Three Rivers No. 5.

Intelligence Unit as part of the self-reporting process.'[83] In practice, the SFO's Intelligence Unit will not always want every email that has been identified during an internal investigation. A key question for a company considering a self-report is thus whether or not it is prepared to disclose its full interview notes; the privileged status of which has been subject to heated debate in the United Kingdom in recent years.

By way of context, a good starting point is the April 2018 decision of the High Court in R (AL) v. Serious Fraud Office.[84] The case arose out of the SFO's investigation of Sarclad, during which the SFO had accepted 'oral proffers' of the first account interviews that had been conducted by an external law firm engaged by the company to conduct an internal investigation.[85] Having entered into a DPA with the corporate entity in 2016, the SFO turned its attention to a number of individuals, including the anonymised AL,[86] whose defence team repeatedly asked the SFO to obtain the complete notes of his first account interview with the law firm. The SFO asked Sarclad to disclose the interview notes but ultimately accepted the firm's refusal to do so on the grounds of privilege. Despite declining to exercise its judicial review jurisdiction (as it felt that disclosure disputes were best dealt with in the Crown Court), the High Court took the unusual step of stating that if it had chosen to exercise its judicial review jurisdiction, it would have found for AL. In obiter comments, Mr Justice Green, giving the judgment of the court, was critical of the SFO's acceptance of the law firm's claims that the current law of privilege was unclear pending the (then undecided) ENRC appeal. In Green J's view, the 'law as it stands today is settled. Privilege does not apply to interview notes.' In support of that statement, Green J cited the decision in Three Rivers No. 6 and concluded that the SFO had 'erred' as it had 'simply accepted the assertion of privilege made by [the law firm] even though it is the SFO's own case that privilege does not apply and the SFO's position is supported by current case law', and that the SFO had therefore not fulfilled its duty to 'assess claims of privilege properly and not cursorily and superficially.'

The thrust of the Sarclad decision appeared to be in line with Mrs Justice Andrews' first instance decision in ENRC. However, as noted already, a few months later, in September 2018, the Court of Appeal overturned her decision and handed down a judgment that does not sit comfortably with Sarclad.[87] The Court of Appeal rejected Andrews J's decision that litigation privilege will only apply in criminal or regulatory proceedings at the point where a company had uncovered evidence of wrongdoing that meant that a criminal prosecution or enforcement again was likely to follow. The Court of Appeal reiterated the established principle that litigation privilege may be claimed over documents that had 83 www.sfo.gov.uk/publications/guidance-policy-and-protocols/corporate-self-reporting/.

84 R (AL) v. Serious Fraud Office [2018] EWHC 856 (Admin).

85 This was confirmed to be McGuireWoods.

86 Subsequently identified as Adrian Leek.

87 Director of the Serious Fraud Office v. Eurasian Natural Resources Limited (Law Society intervening) [2018] EWCA Civ 2006.

been created at a time when litigation was in 'reasonable contemplation' and for the purposes of that litigation. Such determinations are necessarily fact-specific. Notably, the Court of Appeal held that, on the ENRC facts, the interview notes generated during the course of its internal investigation were subject to litigation privilege on the basis that (1) they had been brought into existence after ENRC's external counsel (who were conducting an investigation) had advised that there was a real and serious risk of law enforcement and regulatory intervention, including criminal prosecution, and (2) the notes were, in the Court of Appeal's estimation, drafted to assist any future defence of such proceedings.

If a further illustration of the potential complexities and follow-on implications of DPAs were needed, it is provided by Omers Administration Corporation and others v. Tesco PLC.[88] In a judgment handed down in January 2019 in civil proceedings pursued by investors in respect of losses they claim resulted from the conduct forming the basis of the DPA agreed between the SFO and Tesco Stores Limited, Mr Justice Hildyard ordered disclosure of documents in the possession or control of Tesco PLC. These included some documents provided to it by the SFO that had been obtained from third parties through the use of the SFO's compulsory powers under section 2 of the Criminal Justice Act 1987 and transcripts of interviews with and witness statements of third parties. The conflict between Tesco PLC's obligations to keep these documents confidential pursuant to an undertaking provided to the SFO as part of the DPA negotiation process, and its disclosure obligations in the follow-on litigation pursued by investors under the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, generated substantial ancillary litigation and a costly and involved process of seeking representations from third parties. The proceedings serve as a reminder that although a DPA may avoid the need for protracted criminal proceedings, it provides no guarantee of finality in respect of (and indeed may provide oxygen for) associated civil (or regulatory) proceedings.

The SFO has maintained for some time that firms wishing to co-operate with the SFO need to give serious consideration to waiving privilege, and that it is ready to challenge any overly broad claims to privilege. The Corporate Co-operation Guidance reinforces that approach. It notes that a claim to privilege must be properly established, that any claim should be supported by independent counsel and that the Court of Appeal in ENRC 'has not ruled out a court's consideration of the effect of an organisation's non-waiver over witness accounts as it determines whether a proposed DPA is in the interests of justice'.[89]

Following the Court of Appeal judgment in ENRC, it is open to any company that has conducted an initial investigation and received clear legal advice that the information unearthed may amount to a criminal offence or a regulatory failing[90]

88 Omers Administration Corporation and others v. Tesco PLC [2019] EWHC 109 (Ch).

89 SFO Operational Handbook, Corporate Co-operation Guidance, p. 1 at note 5, citing The Director of the Serious Fraud Office v. ENRC [2018] EWCA Civ 2006 at para. 117, available at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/publications/guidance-policy-and-protocols/sfo-operational-handbook/.

90 Indeed it is not clear on what other basis such a company would self-report.

to claim that any material generated in the course of that initial internal investigation will be subject to litigation privilege.

In practice, however, and especially following the publication of the Corporate Co-operation Guidance, companies are likely to come under pressure from the SFO to disclose interview transcripts as part of the self-reporting process. The Court of Appeal's judgment in ENRC made it clear that nothing it said about privilege should adversely impact the DPA regime and, furthermore, that maintaining claims to privilege may adversely affect prospects of obtaining a DPA.[91] The Court also noted: 'Had the court been asked to approve a DPA between ENRC and the SFO, the company's failure to make good on its promises to be full and frank would undoubtedly have counted against it.'[92]

In deciding whether to acquiesce in providing witness accounts, a company will need clear advice as to the risks involved in waiving litigation privilege, even on a limited basis, at such an early stage, particularly before it is clear whether a settled resolution is likely and especially where multiple authorities may be involved. The shield of litigation privilege is clearly of paramount importance to any company defending criminal or regulatory enforcement proceedings where, very commonly, civil litigants will be waiting in the wings and in jurisdictions where the concept of limited waiver may not exist.

See Chapter 35 on privilege

Involvement of authorities in internal investigation

Having ensured that the internal investigation is suitably established for the purposes of privilege, another critical concern for any corporate will be the likelihood of potential involvement in, or loss of control of the scope, timing and conduct of, its own investigation into the matters concerned. The former Director of the SFO, Sir David Green QC, made it clear that the SFO might specify particular areas or issues to be included in the firm's investigation, how the investigation ought to be conducted in relation to particular issues or persons, and to provide updates to the SFO, usually within agreed time frames.[93] Sir David Green QC explained the SFO's influence or imposition into internal investigations as being necessary to avoid 'churning up the crime scene' and compromising the SFO's own investigation. This, again, is reinforced in the Corporate Co-operation Guidance.

Similar sentiment (if not criticism) was expressed by Mark Steward, the FCA's Head of Enforcement, who referred to 'the crime scene being trampled over'. While he was Director of the SFO, in June 2016, Sir David Green QC also suggested that the SFO's influence or control over internal investigations might usefully be formalised so that it would be akin to the FCA's use of 'skilled persons investigations' (also known as section 166 investigations) of regulated firms.[94] The latter involves the FCA requiring the firm to engage (and pay for) an independent 'skilled person' (typically a law firm or forensic accountants, depending on the subject matter), approved by the FCA, to investigate and report to the FCA on areas or issues of concern specified by the FCA.[95]

91 Director of the Serious Fraud Office v. Eurasian Natural Resources Limited (Law Society intervening) [2018] EWCA Civ 2006, at paras. 115 to 117.

92 Ibid.

93 Sir David Green QC, former SFO Director, speech at GIR Roundtable Discussion on Corporate Internal Investigations, 27 July 2015.

This approach and degree of involvement in internal investigations by UK authorities is far greater than is the case in the United States, where authorities allow (if not encourage) firms to conduct internal investigations without much intrusion, on the basis that they can provide direction where necessary and that the firms will share the output and provide updates at agreed points.

3.5.2.3 Impact on witness interviews

In addition to influencing the scope of an internal investigation, UK authorities may also influence a firm's ability to conduct witness interviews after self-reporting, whether by prohibiting the firm from conducting interviews with certain individuals, or by requiring the firm to delay such interviews until after the authority has interviewed the individuals concerned. In approving the various DPAs to date, Sir Brian Leveson highlighted the assistance provided by firms to the SFO in relation to witness interviews. In relation to the Rolls-Royce DPA, for example, Leveson P noted the high levels of co-operation from Rolls-Royce as regards its witnesses, pointing out that when the SFO commenced its own investigation, not only did it have access to Rolls-Royce's internal investigations and interview notes (Rolls-Royce having made a limited waiver of its claims for legal professional privilege over them), but Rolls-Royce also deferred certain interviews until after the SFO had completed interviews of them.

3.5.2.4 Scrutiny, including potential monitoring obligations

A DPA or settled resolution will always include a number of non-financial terms and conditions. While these will often be fact-dependent and tailored to the wrongdoing involved and the state of the firm's remediation at the point of agreement, the DPA Code includes a list of terms that may be agreed as part of a DPA, including requirements for putting in place a robust compliance or monitoring programme, or both, which may include the appointment of an independent monitor.[96]

While the imposition of a corporate monitor is not compulsory, the DPA Code provides lengthy guidance as to monitors' roles and appointment, and notes that the imposition of a monitor 'must always be fair, reasonable and proportionate'.[97]

---

94 Sir David Green QC, former SFO Director, speech at a Q&A session organised by The Fraud Lawyers Association and the European Fraud and Compliance Lawyers Association in London, 17 June 2016 (see http://globalinvestigationsreview.com/article/1036163/david-green-sfo-can-learn-from-fca-approach-to-internal-investigations).

95 Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, s.166.

96 DPA Code, para. 7.10(iii).

97 DPA Code, paras. 7.11 to 7.22.

Where a monitor is required, the costs to the firm can be significant. Not only will the firm have to pay the monitor's fees, but it will also have to pay the costs associated with the selection, appointment and reasonable 'monitoring' costs of the prosecutor during the monitoring period. There are indirect or non-financial costs, too. The monitor must be given complete access to all relevant aspects of the firm's business and the firm will need to allocate resources to ensure that the monitor is provided with the information and co-operation required and to establish the systems and controls necessary to effect the remediation agreed with the regulator.

These costs have attracted a degree of judicial and corporate scepticism and criticism in the United Kingdom and the United States. In the Innospec case,[98] for example – where a UK subsidiary agreed with the SFO to plead guilty to corruption charges as part of the first 'global settlement' relating to similar conduct prosecuted by US authorities against its parent entity, and the first joint US–UK monitor was appointed – District Judge Huvelle gave a colourful criticism of the role of monitors, saying: 'It's an outrage that people get US$50m to be a monitor . . . . It's a boondoggle for some of these people.'[99] Lord Justice Thomas (the judge in the English case) chose instead to characterise the imposition of a monitor as 'an expensive form of "probation order"', which he considered 'unnecessary for a company which will also be audited by auditors well aware of the past conduct and whose directors will be well aware of the penal consequences of any similar criminal conduct'.[100]

See Chapter 32 on monitorships

Such criticism notwithstanding, the appointment of a monitor (in one form or another) is likely to feature regularly in DPAs in the future, as had previously been the case in civil recovery orders[101] or criminal court orders,[102] which were the SFO's preferred means of imposing monitorships before the introduction of the DPA regime provided it with a statutory basis for doing so. Indeed, in early 2017, the then SFO General Counsel, Alun Milford, explained that 'an integral part of any DPA discussion is the question of corporate reform. As such, monitors aren't something the SFO has set its face against, but as we've seen from the judgments, there are different ways of achieving that sort of process'.[103]

98 See https://www.sfo.gov.uk/cases/innospec-ltd/.

99 Christopher M Matthews, 'Judge Blasts Compliance Monitors at Innospec Plea Hearing,' (18 March 2010), https://globalinvestigationsreview.com/article/jac/1019218/judge-blasts-compliance-monitors-at-innospec-plea-hearing.

100 R v. Innospec Ltd [2010] Lloyd's Rep FC 462, at para. 49.

101 For example, the civil recovery orders between the SFO and Balfour Beatty plc in October 2008; Macmillan Publishers Ltd in July 2011; and Oxford Publishing Ltd in July 2012.

102 For example, in relation to Mabey & Johnson in September 2009, as well as Innospec Ltd in March 2010. See https://star.worldbank.org/corruption-cases/sites/corruption-cases/files/documents/arw/Mabey_Johnson_UK_SFO_Press_Release_Sentencing_Sep_25_2009.pdf and https://www.sfo.gov.uk/cases/innospec-ltd/, respectively.

103 Alun Milford, then SFO General Counsel, speech at GIR Live London in April 2017, www.globalinvestigationsreview.com/article/1144199/gir-live-london-dpas-the-new-normal.

The five DPAs reached to date clearly demonstrate this flexibility in the SFO's approach to monitorships. While the SFO required Standard Bank to commission and submit to an independent review of its existing compliance programme by PwC, and to implement PwC's recommendations (less onerous than a monitorship),[104] it did not require an independent monitor in its DPA with Sarclad, opting instead for a form of 'self-monitoring' for the first time, with the company's Chief Compliance Officer being required to report to the SFO on its anti-bribery and corruption policies and their implementation within one year, and annually for the duration of the DPA.[105] The approach in the Rolls-Royce DPA was different again – some four years before the DPA was agreed, Rolls-Royce had appointed Lord Gold to conduct an independent review of (and report on and make and oversee the implementation of recommendations regarding) the company's anti-bribery and corruption compliance infrastructure. In approving the DPA, which required the continuation of Lord Gold's work and the production by him of a final report to the SFO after implementation, Leveson P described Lord Gold as a 'quasi monitor'.[106] The Tesco Stores DPA required the appointment of Deloitte as an independent monitor to conduct a review, provide a report and implement recommendations in relation to a number of specific areas of concern.[107] In the DPA agreed in July 2019 between the SFO and Serco Geografix Limited, the company is required to report 'evidence of fraud by itself or related companies or individuals' and to take steps to enhance and report annually on the effectiveness of its ethics and compliance programme. Some corresponding reporting and enhancement requirements were also imposed on its parent company.

The current Director of the SFO, Lisa Osofsky, is very familiar with monitorships, and it is likely that she will be in favour of increasing their use, even if implemented in the United Kingdom as quasi-monitorships.

3.6 Practical considerations, step by step

3.6.1 Reaching the decision

Sometimes the decision to self-report may be clear-cut or the only sensible option (particularly where a whistleblower has made serious allegations). More often, however, it will be necessary to conduct an internal investigation to test the information underlying the concerns and to ensure that any report made to authorities

104 PwC was given the role of producing a report on Standard Bank's anti-bribery and corruption systems, controls, policies and procedures, the recommendations in respect of which the bank was then obliged to implement (to PwC's satisfaction) and within a year of that report. Serious Fraud Office v. Standard Bank plc, available at www.judiciary.uk/wp-content/uploads/2015/11/sfo-v-standard-bank_Final_1.pdf.

105 Serious Fraud Office v. XYZ Limited (Case No. U20150856) [2016] 7 WLUK 220; [2016] Lloyd's Rep FC 509.

106 Serious Fraud Office v. Rolls-Royce plc and Rolls-Royce Energy Systems Inc. (Case No. U20170036) [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249, at para. 43.

107 FCA Final Notice, Tesco plc and Tesco Stores Ltd (28 March 2017), at para. 4.10, available at www.fca.org.uk/publication/final-notices/tesco-2017.pdf.

is as complete and accurate as possible. How long this takes will depend on a range of factors, including where and when the alleged conduct took place, how many individuals are alleged to have been involved, and the availability of relevant documents and individuals for interview. It is critical to ensure that the decision to self-report is taken by directors who are independent of the underlying events or issues, and that the decision is taken in conjunction with appropriate legal advisers and is suitably documented. One of the first steps in this process must be to immediately preserve all relevant documents, and to ensure that the investigation is carefully scoped and proceeds expeditiously.

There is no one 'correct' approach to investigating disclosures, allegations or whistleblowers' reports. What is necessary and appropriate when following up on a disclosure will vary significantly depending on factors including the jurisdictions, personnel and business areas implicated. Several key principles may, however, help corporates to respond decisively and consistently, and to protect their interests when they receive disclosures of alleged misconduct.

Clear communication 3.6.1.1

Clear communication underpins a successful response to a disclosure, particularly where a whistleblower is involved. Carefully delineated channels must be in place to enable staff receiving disclosures (whether through a dedicated hotline or other less formal channels) to escalate them quickly and to the right people. In particular, policies and procedures should name a designated member of the senior management of the corporate (probably in its legal or compliance function) who should have a direct reporting line to the board or audit committee. Provision should also be made for how to deal with disclosures naming members of the board or the designated senior manager responsible for handling whistleblowing reports.

Even, dispassionate investigation 3.6.1.2

Not every disclosure or whistleblowing report will justify the expenditure of time and resources on comprehensive internal investigations or involve reports to authorities. It is clearly important to guard against complacency or undue cynicism when evaluating issues, or reports by whistleblowers. Level-headedness and even-handedness pay dividends. Allegations should be viewed dispassionately and, where possible, empirically tested by reference to readily available documents, or by means of interviews with relevant individuals (who should be apprised of the importance of confidentiality).

Clear protocol and structure 3.6.1.3

Where initial enquiries show disclosures or allegations to be well founded, firms' responses should be guided by clear protocols. These should set out the circumstances in which external legal counsel should be instructed (which may well be advisable at an early stage to ensure the preservation of any applicable privilege, as discussed above). They may also deal with how and when other external specialist resources (such as forensic IT consultants or accountants) may be required and instructed, and how such selection and instruction should occur (which should involve instruction by legal counsel, again to maintain privilege as far as possible).

Appropriate senior individuals within the organisation's human resources function should also be identified to coordinate its approach towards the whistleblower (if there is one) and to deal with any disciplinary action in relation to other employees that may be necessary. The FCA and PRA's whistleblowing rules require some regulated firms to have enhanced their existing whistleblowing procedures, including the appointment of a whistleblowers' champion since 7 March 2016.

3.6.1.4 Senior management involvement

Once notified of the fact of serious issues or allegations made in a whistleblowing report, it is paramount that the firm's senior management is kept apprised of the progress of enquiries. Once evidence emerges that establishes that complaints appear to be well founded, the window within which firms may receive maximum credit for self-reporting actual or suspected misconduct to the appropriate authorities is relatively short.

3.6.2 Once the decision has been made

Where corporates determine that it is necessary to make a report to authorities, the main challenges facing them are to demonstrate that any self-report (1) has been made in a timely fashion, (2) has been made genuinely voluntarily (i.e., not simply because public disclosure or a regulatory or criminal investigation is imminent), and (3) contains enough information to enable the authority to make a meaningful and informed assessment as to how to proceed.

A firm should aim to be the first to self-report to maximise credit. Generally, authorities will acknowledge that internal investigations into complex matters that may have occurred many years ago take time and give credit for initial notifications based on certain key facts having been established, with an indication that a fuller report will follow the completion of a more thorough investigation.

3.6.3 Documenting the decision

Regardless of whether the decision is to report or not, it is important for the firm's board to ensure that the issue or allegation is investigated, properly considered with appropriate advice and properly documented. The board must also ensure that appropriate remediation steps are taken, not only to mitigate the risks of criminal, regulatory and civil action, but also to demonstrate the firm's cultural responsiveness and change.

Firms must be careful in documenting the steps taken in reaching their decisions, so as to preserve privilege as far as possible and with regard to the likelihood of such documentation subsequently becoming subjected to external scrutiny or publicity, the latter being particularly likely where the firm is a public company.

Nature of approach to the authorities 3.6.4

Self-reports to authorities are not generally made in a set format, but instead usually take the form of a preliminary notification (typically verbal) soon after receiving notice of potential wrongdoing followed by a more detailed written or oral report after further investigation. The nature and scope of disclosures to authorities vary significantly between, and often within, jurisdictions and may depend on whether the issues cross borders. Specifically, whether it is possible to preserve any applicable privileges by providing reports orally rather than in writing will depend on the circumstances.

Timing of approach (DPAs) – what is a reasonable time? 3.6.5

The SFO requires self-reporting to be made within a reasonable time of an organisation becoming aware of the issue, and certainly before the SFO becomes aware of it by some other means, and before the firm is threatened with investigation or action by other bodies or authorities, including threatened leaks to the press.

Beyond the impact it may have on securing a DPA, the timing of a self-report will also have a bearing on the decision to prosecute and the level of any potential penalties. The Sentencing Council Definitive Guideline states that concealing an offence may result in the imposition of heavier penalties. The Guidance on Corporate Prosecutions expressly states that failing to report within a reasonable time will be a 'public interest' factor weighing in favour of prosecution, whereas a 'genuinely proactive approach involving self-reporting and remedial action' will be a factor tending against prosecution.[108]

The SFO's expectations as regards timing has become somewhat more realistic over time. The former SFO Director, Sir David Green QC, had stated in 2013 that '[c]ommon sense suggests that an initial report of suspected criminality should be made to the SFO as soon as it is discovered'.[109] Some three years later (in March 2016), the then SFO General Counsel, Alun Milford, said that it is reasonable for a firm to undertake an initial assessment before doing so,[110] a view that was echoed three months later by Matthew Wagstaff, SFO Joint Head of Bribery and Corruption, when he said that it is unrealistic to expect a firm to pick up the telephone to the SFO at the very moment it first becomes aware of potential wrongdoing.[111] In March 2018, Camilla de Silva, the SFO Joint Head of Bribery and Corruption, commented that the SFO 'will not be offering DPAs

108 Bribery Act 2010: Joint Prosecution Guidance of The Director of the Serious Fraud Office and The Director of Public Prosecutions (30 March 2011).

109 Sir David Green QC, former SFO Director, speech at the Pinsent Masons and Legal Week Regulatory Reform and Enforcement Conference, 24 October 2013, available at www.sfo.gov.uk/2013/10/24/pinsent-masons-legal-week-regulatory-reform-enforcement-conference-2/.

110 Alun Milford, then SFO General Counsel, speech at the European Compliance and Ethics Institute, Prague, on 29 March 2016, available at www.sfo.gov.uk/2016/03/29/speech-compliance-professionals/.

111 Matthew Wagstaff, SFO Joint Head of Bribery and Corruption, speech at the 11th Annual Information Management, Investigations Compliance eDiscovery Conference, London, on 18 May 2016, available at www.sfo.gov.uk/2016/05/18/role-remit-sfo/.

in cases of a late conversion to the joys of co-operating; DPAs are a reward for openness – the sooner you come in, self-report and the more you are open with us, the more you have to be rewarded for'.[112] In speeches to date, Lisa Osofsky has indicated that the SFO will be open to firms investigating allegations of misconduct before reporting.[113]

3.6.6 Managing other regulators

Whatever format is used to report matters to authorities, corporates and their advisers should assume that information provided to one enforcement authority will be passed to others, and that referrals may be made where authorities have parallel jurisdiction over some or all aspects of the corporate's activities. In cases where the SFO does not prosecute a self-reporting corporate, the SFO reserves the right to prosecute the firm for any unreported violations of the law, and may provide information on the reported violation to other bodies (such as foreign police forces or authorities) through the relevant gateway.

The above notwithstanding, corporates should not assume that disclosure to one authority necessarily means that other relevant authorities are aware of the matter – full assessments must be made as to whether it is necessary or appropriate to make separate notifications to other specific authorities (whether in the same jurisdiction or elsewhere) who might expect to be told of the alleged misconduct or of the fact of other investigations by or at the behest of enforcement authorities.

112 Camilla de Silva, SFO Joint Head of Bribery and Corruption, speech at ABC Minds Financial Services conference, 15 March 2018, available at www.sfo.gov.uk/2018/03/16/camilla-de-silva-at-abc-minds-financial-services/.

113 Lisa Osofsky, SFO Director, speech at the American Bar Association's London White Collar Crime conference alongside Sandra Moser (acting chief of the DOJ's Fraud Section), 8 October 2018.

4

Self-Reporting to the Authorities and Other Disclosure Obligations: The US Perspective

Amanda Raad, Sean Seelinger, Jaime Orloff Feeney and Zaneta Wykowska[1]

Introduction 4.1

There is typically no formal obligation in the United States to disclose potential wrongdoing to enforcement authorities; however, there can often be strategic advantages to doing so. Subjects of investigations may, in certain cases, avoid some of the most adverse consequences by self-reporting, including reduced penalties and more favourable settlement terms. Additionally, companies in certain regulated sectors may avoid debarment even where clear violations occurred. US regulators are incentivising companies to self-report by offering potential and meaningful co-operation credit for doing so. The Corporate Enforcement Policy of the US Department of Justice (DOJ), first announced in November 2017, updated and formalised the DOJ's criteria for evaluating and rewarding self-disclosure and co-operation in cases relating to the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA). Revisions in March and November 2019 broadened its application beyond the FCPA and clarified the DOJ's expectations for securing credit.

Despite public perception to the contrary, the Trump administration appears committed to enforcing the FCPA, including a continued focus on self-reporting and multi-jurisdictional co-operation. In 2017, the DOJ brought 29 FCPA actions and the SEC brought 10, with a total of US$958 million in monetary sanctions. In 2018, the DOJ brought 20 enforcement actions and the SEC brought 17, netting a combined US$2.2 billion in fines. The DOJ is on track to match or surpass that total this year, with US$1.56 billion in monetary fines up to October 2019. The DOJ's March 2019 settlement with Mobile Telesystems and its Uzbek subsidiary[2] was one of the largest in an FCPA case – US$850 million to resolve charges arising out of a scheme to pay bribes in Uzbekistan.

1 Amanda Raad is a partner, Sean Seelinger is counsel, and Jaime Orloff Feeney and Zaneta Wykowska are associates, at Ropes & Gray LLP.

Moreover, US regulators have historically been receptive to parties reporting facts while preserving privilege during the co-operation and reporting process, and are specifically prohibited from making co-operation credit conditional on privilege waiver.

4.2 Mandatory self-reporting to authorities

Before considering a voluntary disclosure, it is important for at least two reasons to determine whether the company has any potential mandatory reporting obligation. First, mandatory reporting obligations often prescribe the recipient, form, timing and content of the disclosure. Second, the evaluation will be materially different if a mandatory report is required, even if that report is in another jurisdiction, given the clear commitment to sharing information between international regulators. In other words, if a company is required to self-report in at least one jurisdiction, it should consider voluntarily disclosing in others given the likelihood that the government agencies will share information.

See Chapter 24 on negotiating global settlements

In May 2018, the DOJ announced a new formal policy to avoid 'piling on' penalties that are duplicative for the same misconduct. Under the policy, various US enforcement agencies must coordinate with each other and with foreign government agencies when reaching settlements with corporations. However, the DOJ has warned that companies looking to benefit from the new policy should self-disclose wrongdoing to the DOJ. When announcing the policy, former Deputy Attorney General Rod Rosenstein specifically remarked that the DOJ 'will not look kindly on companies that come to [the DOJ] after making inadequate disclosures to secure lenient penalties with other agencies or foreign governments. In those instances, the Department will act without hesitation to fully vindicate the interests of the United States'.[3]

4.2.1 Statutory and regulatory mandatory disclosure obligations

In the United States, most disclosure obligations originate in statute or regulations. Key examples include:

- the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, which requires the disclosure of all information that has a material financial effect on a public company in periodic financial reports;

2 See 'Mobile Telesystems Pjsc and Its Uzbek Subsidiary Enter into Resolutions of $850 Million with the Department of Justice for Paying Bribes in Uzbekistan', available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/mobile-telesystems-pjsc-and-its-uzbek-subsidiary-enter-resolutions-850-million-department.

3 Rod J Rosenstein, Deputy Att'y Gen., Dep't of Justice, Remarks to the New York City Bar White Collar Crime Institute (9 May 2018), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/deputy-attorney-general-rod-rosenstein-delivers-remarks-new-york-city-bar-white-collar.

- the US Bank Secrecy Act of 1970, which requires financial institutions to disclose certain suspicious transactions or currency transactions in excess of US$10,000;
- the US Anti-Money Laundering Regulations, which require financial institutions to report actual or suspected money laundering under certain circumstances;[4]
- state data breach regulations – 47 of 50 US states have laws requiring companies conducting business in the state to disclose data breaches involving personal information; and
- the Anti-Kickback Enforcement Act of 1986, which requires government contractors to make a 'timely notification' of violations of federal criminal law or overpayments in connection with the award or performance of most federal government contracts or subcontracts, including those performed outside the United States.

Disclosure obligations under existing agreements with the government 4.2.2

In addition to statutory or regulatory-based mandatory disclosure requirements, companies must also evaluate whether they have any mandatory disclosure obligations under pre-existing agreements with the government. For example, if a company is subject to a deferred prosecution agreement (DPA) (or a corporate integrity agreement (CIA) in the healthcare sector), the agreement often contains self-reporting mandates for any subsequent violations. In many cases, these agreements may require the appointment of independent monitors. While DPAs, CIAs and similar agreements have been used frequently in the United States, other countries, including the United Kingdom, are also now increasingly using similar agreements to drive self-reporting and co-operation.

See Chapter 32 on monitorships

Other sources of mandatory disclosure obligations 4.2.3

Individuals and companies may also have mandatory disclosure obligations as a result of private contractual agreements as well as membership in professional bodies. Such disclosures between private parties may lead to a disclosure to a regulator by the receiving entity. For example, a subcontractor may be obliged by contract to report issues to the contracting party. That contracting party may subsequently determine that it is subject to its own reporting obligation or may choose to self-report to reduce any potential liability.

Voluntary self-reporting to authorities 4.3

Self-reporting and co-operation are important factors for both the DOJ and the US Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) in deciding how to proceed with and resolve investigations and enforcement actions in cases involving corporations. Companies must carry out a fact-intensive and holistic inquiry in deciding whether to voluntarily self-report to US authorities. There is no one-size-fits-all approach to this analysis, but those contemplating voluntarily disclosing misconduct to US authorities should keep certain considerations in mind.

4 See, e.g., 31 U.S.C. 5318(g).

Key Considerations in Resolving Enforcement Actions
US Department of Justice	US Securities and Exchange Commission
• Self-disclosure and willingness to co-operate in the investigation • Disclosure of individuals substantially involved in or responsible for misconduct • Pervasiveness of wrongdoing within the corporation • Existence and effectiveness of a compliance programme • Meaningful remedial actions	• Self-reporting and investigation of misconduct • Effective compliance procedures and appropriate tone at the top • Whether the case involves a potentially widespread industry practice • Whether the conduct is ongoing

4.3.1 Advantages of voluntarily self-reporting

The primary benefit to self-reporting is to secure potentially reduced penalties through co-operation credit and, moreover, to maintain control over the flow of information to regulators. In recent years, US regulators have become increasingly vocal about the benefits of self-disclosure and co-operation, with the DOJ even formalising those benefits, first, in its FCPA Pilot Program (Pilot Program),[5] and subsequently the Corporate Enforcement Policy. Yet, co-operation, which inevitably goes hand in hand with a voluntary disclosure, imposes significant demands on corporations and is not without meaningful risk.

4.3.1.1 DOJ co-operation credit

To encourage self-reporting and co-operation, the DOJ has issued and subsequently revised guidance on the subject for many years. In June 1999, the DOJ issued the Principles of Federal Prosecution of Business Organizations, now known as the 'Holder Memorandum', to articulate and standardise the factors to be considered by federal prosecutors in making charging decisions against corporations.[6] The Holder Memorandum instructed DOJ prosecutors to consider as a factor in bringing charges whether a corporation has timely and voluntarily disclosed wrongdoing and whether it has been willing 'to cooperate in the investigation of its agents'.[7] In 2008, the then-Deputy Attorney General, Mark R Filip, added

5 For more details, see 'The Fraud Section's Foreign Corrupt Practices Act Enforcement Plan and Guidance', available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/file/838386/download (FCPA Enforcement Plan and Guidance).

6 Memorandum from Eric Holder, Deputy Att'y Gen., Dep't of Justice, on Bringing Criminal Charges Against Corps. to Dep't Component Heads and U.S. Attorneys (16 June 1999), available at https://www.justice.gov/sites/default/files/criminal-fraud/legacy/2010/04/11/charging-corps.PDF.

7 Id. at 3 (listing eight factors prosecutors should consider in deciding whether to bring charges against corporations that include '[t]he corporation's timely and voluntary disclosure of wrongdoing and its willingness to cooperate in the investigation of its agents . . . .').

language to the US Attorneys' Manual, now titled the Justice Manual,[8] instructing prosecutors to consider 'the corporation's willingness to provide relevant information and evidence and identify relevant actors within and outside the corporation, including senior executives' when assessing a corporation's co-operation.[9] Mr Filip also outlined in his memorandum nine factors on which prosecutors base their corporate charging and resolution decisions, the so-called 'Filip Factors', incorporating some language from the Holder Memorandum (Filip Factor Four, a corporation's 'willingness to cooperate in the investigation of [its] agents'), and adding of Filip Factor Eight: 'the adequacy of prosecution of individuals responsible for the corporation's malfeasance'.[10]

The Yates Memorandum

Building on the Holder Memorandum, former Deputy Attorney General Sally Quillian Yates issued the Memorandum of Individual Accountability for Corporate Wrongdoing, now known as the 'Yates Memorandum', in September 2015.[11] The Yates Memorandum is still operative and outlines the 'six key steps' prosecutors should take in all investigations of corporate wrongdoing.[12] The most significant policy shift in the Yates Memorandum concerned the relationship between a company's co-operation with respect to individual wrongdoers and the company's eligibility for co-operation credit. Under the Yates Memorandum, the identification of responsible individuals became a 'threshold requirement' for receiving any co-operation credit consideration.[13] Ms Yates also emphasised that a failure to conduct a robust internal investigation is not an excuse, stating that '[c]ompanies may not pick and choose what facts to disclose'.[14] However, the revised Justice Manual clarifies that '[t]here may be circumstances where, despite its best efforts to conduct a thorough investigation, a company genuinely cannot get access to certain evidence or is actually prohibited from disclosing it to the government'.[15] Nevertheless, the Justice Manual is clear that in such cases 'the company seeking cooperation will bear the burden of explaining the restrictions it is facing to the prosecutor'.[16] Consequently, thorough and properly scoped internal investigations are of critical importance.

See Chapter 10 on co-operating with authorities

8 US Dep't of Justice, Justice Manual §§ 9-28.000.

9 Id. §§ 9-28.700 – Value of Cooperation.

10 Memorandum from Mark Filip, Deputy Att'y Gen. Dept' of Justice, Principles of Federal Prosecution of Business Organizations (28 August 2008), available at https://www.justice.gov/sites/default/files/dag/legacy/2008/11/03/dag-memo-08282008.pdf, at 4.

11 Memorandum from Sally Quillian Yates, Deputy Att'y Gen., Dep't of Justice, Individual Accountability for Corporate Wrongdoing (9 September 2015), available at http://www.justice.gov/dag/file/769036/download, at 3. (Yates Memorandum).

12 The DOJ revised the section of the Justice Manual titled 'Principles of Federal Prosecution of Business Organizations' in November 2015 to reflect these steps.

13 Justice Manual § 9-28.700 (2015).

14 Yates Memorandum at 3.

15 Justice Manual § 9-28.700.

16 Id.

On 29 November 2018, former Deputy Attorney General Rod Rosenstein delivered a speech to FCPA practitioners announcing a shift in the DOJ's policy on co-operation credit and the scope of disclosure with respect to culpable individuals.[17] According to Rosenstein, the Yates Memorandum's policy directing prosecutors to make co-operation credit dependent on the corporation's disclosure of 'every person involved in [the] alleged misconduct in any way, regardless of their role' 'impeded resolutions and wasted resources'. Investigations were delayed solely to collect information on low-level employees unlikely to be prosecuted. By contrast, under the new policy, a corporation is entitled to co-operation credit in criminal proceedings as long as it discloses 'all relevant facts known to it at the time of the disclosure, including as to any individuals substantially involved in or responsible for the misconduct at issue'.[18] The DOJ will also use this standard to determine which corporations are entitled to full co-operation credit in the context of civil enforcement. In addition, corporations facing civil enforcement are now eligible for partial co-operation credit if, at the very least, they 'identify all wrongdoing by senior officials' and 'meaningfully assist the government's investigation'.[19] Finally, recognising that monetary recovery is the main objective of civil enforcement, the DOJ will once again let prosecutors 'consider an individual's ability to pay in deciding whether to pursue a civil judgment' – with the hope that prosecutors will avoid targets 'unlikely to yield any benefit'. Altogether, the new policy seeks to conserve 'limited investigative resources' while advancing traditional agency goals like deterrence and recovery and continuing to prioritise individual prosecution.

The Pilot Program and Corporate Enforcement Policy

In April 2016, the DOJ announced that it was launching a one-year Pilot Program to enhance its efforts to detect and prosecute individuals and companies for violations of the FCPA.[20] The Pilot Program, which incentivised voluntary self-disclosure of misconduct, was extended for an additional year on 10 March 2017. On 29 November 2017, former Deputy Attorney General Rod Rosenstein publicly applauded the Pilot Program as a 'step forward in fighting corporate crime' and announced that the DOJ would be incorporating a revised Corporate Enforcement Policy into the Justice Manual.[21] On 1 March 2018, the DOJ announced that it would apply the Corporate Enforcement Policy as non-binding

17 Rod J Rosenstein, Deputy Att'y Gen., Dep't of Justice, Remarks at the American Conference Institute's 35th International Conference on the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (29 November 2018), https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/deputy-attorney-general-rod-j-rosenstein-delivers-remarks-american-conference-institute-0.

18 See FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy, Dep't of Justice, Justice Manual, §9-47.120, available at https://www.justice.gov/jm/jm-9-47000-foreign-corrupt-practices-act-1977#9-47.120 (Corporate Enforcement Policy) (emphasis added).

19 Supra note 17.

20 See FCPA Enforcement Plan and Guidance.

21 See Corporate Enforcement Policy.

guidance in criminal cases outside the FCPA context.[22] In light of this recent development, the Corporate Enforcement Policy provides valuable guidance to corporations as they investigate misconduct and contemplate voluntary disclosure.

The Corporate Enforcement Policy outlines factors that a company must meet to earn credit for voluntary self-disclosure. The disclosure (1) must occur prior to an imminent threat of disclosure or government investigation, (2) must be disclosed within a reasonably prompt time after the company becomes aware of the offence, and (3) must include all relevant facts known to the company at the time of disclosure, including all relevant facts about the individuals substantially involved in or responsible for the misconduct.[23] The November 2019 changes to the Corporate Enforcement Policy acknowledge the DOJ's recognition, in a footnote, that 'a company may not be in a position to know all relevant facts at the time of a voluntary self-disclosure.' The Corporate Enforcement Policy also now requires the company to alert the DOJ of evidence of the misconduct when it becomes aware of it, whereas, previously, where the company was or should have been aware of opportunities for the DOJ to obtain evidence not in the company's possession, it had to identify those opportunities to the DOJ in order to receive full co-operation credit.

The Corporate Enforcement Policy also contains specific guidance on the steps a company must take to earn full co-operation credit and to provide timely and appropriate remediation, consistent with the Yates Memorandum and the Justice Manual's Sentencing Guidelines. The exact level of co-operation credit available to a corporation will vary based on the investigation. It is possible for a corporation to earn full credit under the US Sentencing Guidelines but not earn additional credit under the Corporate Enforcement Policy.[24] Moreover, the DOJ has shown itself willing to assign different levels of co-operation credit for different investigations into the same company. For example, in June 2019, the DOJ entered an NPA with Walmart, resolving investigations into Walmart's alleged corrupt activity in four countries: Brazil, China, India and Mexico. Although the NPA covered conduct in all four countries, and the company received full credit for its co-operation with the DOJ in the first three investigations, with respect to the Mexico investigation, Walmart received only partial credit due to its failure to timely provide certain documents and 'deconflict' in response to a witness interview request.

See Chapter 10 on co-operating with authorities

Compared with the Pilot Program, the Corporate Enforcement Policy enhances the benefits available to a company that satisfies all the requirements for voluntary self-disclosure, co-operation and remediation. Under both programmes, companies that fully co-operate with DOJ investigations and implement appropriate remediation in FCPA matters, but that do not voluntarily self-disclose, will be eligible for limited credit, at most a 25 per cent reduction off the bottom of the Sentencing Guidelines fine range. However, when a company has voluntarily self-disclosed, fully co-operated with the DOJ, and has timely and appropriately remediated, the Corporate Enforcement Policy creates a rebuttable presumption, which may be overcome by 'aggravated circumstances' related to the nature and seriousness of the offence, that the DOJ will grant a declination.[25] In contrast, the Pilot Program provided that the DOJ would 'consider' a declination for companies that met these requirements.[26] Under the Corporate Enforcement Policy, if the presumption is overcome and a criminal resolution is warranted, the DOJ will recommend a 50 per cent reduction off the low end of the Sentencing Guidelines fine range and generally will not require the appointment of a monitor if the company has, at the time of resolution, implemented an effective compliance programme.[27]

22 See Jody Godoy, 'DOJ Expands Leniency Beyond FCPA, Lets Barclays Off', Law360, 1 March 2018, https://www.law360.com/articles/1017798/doj-expands-leniency-beyond-fcpa-lets-barclays-off.

23 Corporate Enforcement Policy.

24 The DOJ evaluated corporate co-operation in this manner when reaching its DPA with Mobile TeleSystems in February 2019. See https://www.justice.gov/opa/press-release/file/1141631/download.

The DOJ issued seven public declinations under the Pilot Program and continues to decline prosecution under the Corporate Enforcement Policy.[28] Six declinations have been issued under the Corporate Enforcement Policy at the time of writing, with the most recent coming in February 2019, when the DOJ declined to prosecute Cognizant Technologies due to its voluntary self-disclosure, extensive co-operation and remediation, and disgorgement of US$19.37 million;[29] and in September 2019 when it issued a declination – in part for its prompt, voluntary disclosure of the misconduct – to Quad/Graphics,[30] which a week later agreed to disgorge approximately US$6.9 million of its ill-gotten gains to the SEC.[31]

All declination letters so far issued under the Corporate Enforcement Policy and Pilot Program have been publicly released by the DOJ. By publishing its rationale for issuing declinations, the DOJ has sought to provide 'increased transparency as to [the] evaluation process'.[32] However, in a June 2019 speech to 25 Corporate Enforcement Policy at § 1. 'Aggravating circumstances that may warrant a criminal resolution include, but are not limited to, involvement by executive management of the company in the misconduct; a significant profit to the company from the misconduct; pervasiveness of the misconduct within the company; and criminal recidivism.'

26 FCPA Enforcement Plan and Guidance, at 8-9.

27 Corporate Enforcement Policy at § 1. The Enforcement Policy provides specific guidance on the criteria for evaluating a corporate compliance programme, while also noting that the criteria may vary based on the size and resources of an organisation. Factors listed in the policy include culture of compliance, compliance resources, the quality and experience of compliance resources, independence and authority of the compliance function, effective risk assessments and risk-based approach, compensation and promotion of compliance employees, compliance-related auditing, and compliance reporting structure.

28 See https://www.justice.gov/criminal-fraud/pilot-program/declinations.

29 See https://www.justice.gov/criminal-fraud/file/1132666/download.

30 See https://www.justice.gov/criminal-fraud/file/1205341/download.

31 See https://www.sec.gov/news/press-release/2019-193.

32 Matt Miner, Deputy Assistant Att'y Gen., Dep't of Justice, Remarks at The American Bar Association, Criminal Justice Section Third Global White Collar Crime Institute Conference (27 June 2019), https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/deputy-assistant-attorney-general-matt-miner-delivers-remarks-american-bar-association.

the American Bar Association, Deputy Assistant Attorney General Matt Miner announced that the DOJ would be open to keeping declinations private where public release is 'neither necessary nor warranted'. Miner gave the example of a corporation that discovers inconsequential bribes in the context of an M&A transaction and self-discloses immediately – in such a case, the agency would be 'open to discussion' regarding public release. Nonetheless, Miner maintained that this decision will always remain in the agency's discretion.

The following table compares several recent FCPA corporate resolutions under the Corporate Enforcement Policy, and the comparative credit for self-disclosure, co-operation and remediation.

Recent Resolutions under DOJ's Corporate Enforcement Policy
Quad/Graphics Inc (Quad/Graphics)
Background	Quad/Graphics is a US-based digital and print marketing provider. Between 2011 and 2016, employees of Quad/Graphics' Peruvian subsidiary paid or promised to pay over US$1 million to third-party intermediaries, in part, to pay bribes to Peruvian officials to secure printing contracts and minimise penalty and tax payments. Additionally, between 2010 and 2015, employees of Quad/Graphics' Chinese subsidiary paid bribes to employees of state-owned companies to secure printing business in China.
Self-Report	Quad/Graphics voluntarily and promptly self-disclosed to the DOJ.
Co-operation and Remediation	Quad/Graphics conducted an internal investigation, proactively co-operated with the DOJ, took steps to enhance its compliance programme and terminated relationships with employees and third parties involved in the misconduct.
Result	In September 2019, the DOJ issued a declination letter and the SEC issued a cease and desist order requiring Quad/Graphics to disgorge US$6.9 million in profits, plus interest and a US$2 million civil penalty.
TechnipFMC plc (TFMC)
Background	TFMC, a global oil and gas technology and services company, was formed through a merger between Technip SA (Technip) and FMC Technologies, Inc (FMC Technologies). TFMC admitted that its predecessor companies engaged in two separate bribery schemes. Between 2003 and 2014, executives of Technip paid bribes to Brazilian officials through an intermediary, under the guise of legitimate consulting payments. Between 2008 and 2013, FMC Technologies paid bribes to government officials in Iraq to obtain contracts to provide metering technologies for oil and gas production.
Self-Report	TFMC did not self-report.
Co-operation and Remediation	TFMC received credit for substantial co-operation with the DOJ's investigation and for taking extensive remedial measures.
Result	In June 2019, TFMC entered into a DPA with the DOJ and agreed to pay a total criminal penalty of US$296 million to US and Brazilian authorities. The criminal fine included a 25 per cent reduction off the applicable US Sentencing Guidelines fine for co-operation and remediation.

(continues overleaf)

Recent Resolutions under DOJ's Corporate Enforcement Policy (cont.)
Walmart Inc (Walmart)
Background	Between 2000 and 2011, Walmart failed to implement sufficient anti-corruption related internal accounting controls. The failure to implement sufficient controls allowed Walmart subsidiaries in Mexico, Brazil, China and India to hire third-party intermediaries who made improper payments to government officials to obtain store permits and licences.
Self-Report	Walmart did not self-disclose the misconduct in Mexico and self-reported misconduct in India, Brazil and China only after the DOJ had already begun investigating the Mexico conduct.
Co-operation and Remediation	Walmart fully co-operated with the investigations in Brazil, China and India. Walmart co-operated with the investigation in Mexico, but did not timely provide documents and information to the DOJ and did not deconflict with the government's request to interview one witness before Walmart interviewed that witness.
Result	In June 2019, Walmart entered into a DPA with the DOJ in connection with a criminal information charging it with violations of the books and records provisions of the FCPA. Walmart entered into a related resolution with the SEC. Walmart agreed to pay US$137 million to resolve the DOJ's investigation, and to disgorge US$144 million in profits to the SEC. Walmart also agreed to retain an independent corporate compliance monitor for two years. Walmart received a 20 per cent reduction off the applicable US Sentencing Guidelines fine for conduct in Mexico, and a 25 per cent reduction for conduct in Brazil, China and India.
Cognizant Technology Solutions Corp (Cognizant)
Background	Cognizant authorised its agents to pay an approximately US$2 million bribe to one or more government officials in India in exchange for securing and obtaining a statutorily required planning permit.
Self-Report	Cognizant voluntarily self-disclosed to the DOJ within two weeks of the board learning of the misconduct.
Co-operation and Remediation	Cognizant conducted a thorough investigation, fully and proactively co-operated with the DOJ, and took steps to remediate, including termination of employees and contractors involved in the misconduct. The DOJ also noted that the company had an effective pre-existing compliance programme and had taken additional steps to enhance its compliance programme and internal accounting controls.
Result	In February 2019, the DOJ issued a declination letter, while the SEC issued a cease and desist order requiring Cognizant to pay disgorgement of US$16.4 million, prejudgment interest of US$2.8 million and a US$6 million civil fine.

The Pilot Program and its codification as the Corporate Enforcement Policy has demonstrated the DOJ's commitment rewarding voluntary self-disclosure in FCPA enforcement, and by many accounts has been viewed as very successful.

Benczkowski Memorandum

As part of its ongoing effort to update and clarify its corporate enforcement policies, in October 2018, the DOJ issued new guidance on imposing corporate compliance monitors now known as the 'Benczkowski Memorandum'.[33] The new policy supplements the 2008 'Morford Memorandum', which outlined the principles on selection, scope and duration of monitorships, and supersedes the guidance contained in the 2009 'Breuer Memorandum' on imposing corporate monitors. Assistant Attorney General Brian Benczkowski explained that the goal of the new guidance was to 'further refine the factors that go into the determination of whether a monitor is needed, as well as clarify and refine the monitor selection process'.

Under the Benczkowski Memorandum, the potential benefits of employing a corporate monitor should be weighed against the cost of a monitor and its impact on the operations of the corporation. In making a determination to impose a corporate monitor, the DOJ will consider a number of factors, including the type of misconduct, the pervasiveness of the conduct and whether it involved senior management, the investments and improvements a company has made to its corporate compliance programme and internal controls, and whether those improvements have been tested to demonstrate that they would prevent or detect similar misconduct in the future. Other factors include whether remedial actions were taken against individuals involved, and the industry and geography in which the company operates and the nature of the company's clientele. The Benczkowski Memorandum provides: 'Where a corporation's compliance program and controls are demonstrated to be effective and appropriately resourced at the time of resolution, a monitor will not be necessary.'[34]

The guidelines are clearly intended to complement the goals articulated in the Corporate Enforcement Policy, giving companies greater incentives to self-disclose and co-operate with DOJ investigations of corporate wrongdoing. A key feature of the Benczkowski Memorandum is that companies can receive meaningful credit, namely avoiding a compliance monitor, by engaging in extensive remediation of their compliance programmes.

See Chapter 32 on monitorships

33 Memorandum from Brian A Benczkowski, Assistant Att'y Gen., Dep't of Justice, (11 October 2018), Selection of Monitors in Criminal Division Matters, available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/file/1100531/download (Benczkowski Memorandum); 'Assistant Attorney General Brian A. Benczkowski Delivers Remarks at NYU School of Law Program on Corporate Compliance and Enforcement Conference on Achieving Effective Compliance', available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/assistant-attorney-general-brian-benczkowski-delivers-remarks-nyu-school-law-program.

34 Benczkowski Memorandum at 2.

4.3.1.2 SEC co-operation credit

Although it can be difficult to precisely quantify the benefit of co-operation with the SEC, the Commission will consider general principles of sentencing, especially general deterrence. In both public statements and in practice, the Commission has made clear that companies can receive significant leniency for full co-operation. During a speech on 9 May 2018, SEC Enforcement Division Co-Director Steven Peikin emphasised the importance of co-operation, noting that the SEC would continue to provide 'incentives to those who come forward and provide valuable information' to the SEC.[35] Co-operation may influence the Commission's decision whether to impose a civil monetary penalty.[36]

While the SEC has not entered into any non-prosecution agreements (NPAs) since 2016 and has only entered into three NPAs since their inception in 2010,[37] the SEC nevertheless signalled its continued commitment to using NPAs to reward co-operation through its proposed whistleblower rule amendments in 2018. Specifically, the proposed rule amendments would allow the SEC to make award payments to whistleblowers based on money collected as a result of DPAs and NPAs, to 'ensure that whistleblowers are not disadvantaged because of the particular form of an action' that the SEC or another regulator takes.[38] The SEC will, however, set a high bar before entering into an NPA in an FCPA enforcement action. With respect to NPAs entered into with Akamai Technologies, Inc and Nortek, Inc in 2016, Kara Brockmeyer, former Chief of the SEC Enforcement Division's FCPA Unit, stated: 'Akamai and Nortek each promptly tightened their internal controls after discovering the bribes and took swift remedial measures to eliminate the problems. They handled it the right way and got expeditious resolutions as a result.'[39]

4.4 Risks in voluntarily self-reporting

While self-disclosure can reap significant monetary benefits, a company must balance the potential risks against any potential benefit. Self-reporting can give rise to lengthy co-operation obligations and increased government scrutiny. As discussed

35 See 'Keynote Address at the New York City Bar Association's 7th Annual White Collar Crime Institute', available at https://www.sec.gov/news/speech/speech-peikin-050918.

36 In its November 2018 resolution with Vantage Drilling International, the SEC cited co-operation and financial condition as its basis for not imposing a fine. See https://www.sec.gov/litigation/admin/2018/34-84617.pdf.

37 The SEC announced its first NPA in an FCPA case in 2013, when it entered into an NPA with Ralph Lauren Corporation relating to bribes paid to government officials in Argentina. See 'SEC Announces Non-Prosecution Agreement With Ralph Lauren Corporation Involving FCPA Misconduct', available at https://www.sec.gov/news/press-release/2013-2013-65htm. The SEC announced its second and third NPAs on 7 June 2016. See 'SEC Announces Two Non-Prosecution Agreements in FCPA Cases', available at https://www.sec.gov/news/pressrelease/2016-109.html.

38 See 'SEC Proposes Whistleblower Rule Amendments', available at https://www.sec.gov/news/press-release/2018-120.

39 See 'SEC Announces Two Non-Prosecution Agreements in FCPA Cases', available at https://www.sec.gov/news/pressrelease/2016-109.html.

above, the multi-jurisdictional nature of many 'white-collar' matters means that self-reporting may lead to enquiries from global regulators, differing resolutions and ongoing obligations.

Furthermore, the DOJ is likely to impose a stringent bar when evaluating the sufficiency of compliance programmes to determine whether the requirements of the Corporate Enforcement Policy are met or to otherwise reduce liability. On 30 April 2019, the DOJ published revised guidance on Evaluation of Corporate Compliance Programs[40] (the Guidance). The Guidance is framed around three fundamental questions: (1) whether the corporation's compliance programme is well designed, (2) whether it is being implemented effectively and (3) whether it works in practice.

Although the content of the Guidance is largely familiar to practitioners, it does give a clearer picture of the DOJ's current approach to corporate compliance. The Guidance underscores the DOJ's focus on the operation, rather than the appearance, of corporate compliance programmes. The Guidance suggests that companies should expect to be asked detailed and challenging questions regarding the scope and effectiveness of their compliance programmes. If a company's compliance programme fails to withstand such scrutiny, it risks losing credit for the programme, paying higher penalties or even facing separate violations for inadequate internal controls. Taking these existing increasingly stringent co-operation standards into consideration, companies considering self-disclosure should carefully assess whether they can meet regulator expectations. If companies fall short, regulators may refuse co-operation credit and use the information obtained through the self-disclosure against the company.

Risks in choosing not to self-report 4.5

US regulators have warned that the potential downside of not self-reporting any violation could be significant where the matter is otherwise brought to their attention. In a 5 July 2018 press release announcing an NPA with a Hong Kong-based subsidiary of Credit Suisse Group to resolve an investigation into 'princeling' hiring by the bank, the DOJ noted certain steps the firm did not take that limited the amount of co-operation credit it received. Specifically, the bank did not receive voluntary disclosure credit and did not receive full co-operation credit because its 'cooperation was reactive and not proactive'.[41]

Consequently, companies should carefully consider the likelihood that the conduct will be discovered by other means. It is important to consider whether other industry players could affect the company's position. Industry-wide trends may expose a company's misconduct. If regulators undertake an industry-wide investigation into particular practices, which we have observed in recent years with pharmaceutical companies, medical device manufacturers and automobile companies, a company might be exposed by a competitor's self-report or more passively through a third-party subpoena or any investigative demand.

40 https://www.justice.gov/criminal-fraud/page/file/937501/download.

41 See 'Credit Suisse's Investment Bank in Hong Kong Agrees to Pay $47 Million Criminal Penalty for Corrupt Hiring Scheme that Violated the FCPA', available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/credit-suisse-s-investment-bank-hong-kong-agrees-pay-47-million-criminal-penalty-corrupt.

Companies should also be sensitive to increasing whistleblower activity. Current or former employees are incentivised to report potential misconduct to US regulators, which has led to substantial recoveries for the government. The SEC's whistleblower programme has been steadily active, with 67 individuals receiving approximately US$387 million between 2012 and November 2019. Whistleblowers are eligible to receive awards between 10 per cent and 30 per cent of the money recovered if their 'high-quality original information' leads to enforcement actions in which the SEC orders at least US$1 million.[42] The programme continues to be a priority for the Commission. In March 2018, the SEC announced its largest-ever whistleblower award, with two whistleblowers sharing nearly US$50 million and a third receiving more than US$33 million. In September 2018, the SEC awarded its second-highest whistleblower award of US$39 million to one whistleblower, with a second receiving US$15 million.[43] It is therefore important that a company consider the real possibility that its conduct could be exposed by means other than voluntary self-disclosure, and the associated, often expensive, risks associated with not being the first to come forward.

When deciding not to self-report, a company must ensure that the decision is appropriately considered and documented. If a company decides not to self-report and the government later enquires about the issue, the best defence is that the company conducted a thorough investigation, remediated the issue and had a reasonable basis for not self-reporting to the government. US regulators will look to a company's board of directors to ensure the appropriate steps were taken.[44] The SEC has expressed that the board of directors must exercise oversight and set a strong 'tone at the top' emphasising the importance of compliance.

42 More information is available at the SEC's 'Office of the Whistleblower' site at https://www.sec.gov/whistleblower.

43 See 'SEC Awards More Than $54 Million to Two Whistleblowers', available at https://www.sec.gov/news/press-release/2018-179.

44 Notification of the board of directors is often required under federal securities law. Section 307 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 requires that an attorney report evidence of a material violation of securities laws or breach of fiduciary duty by the company or any agent 'up-the-ladder' (i.e., first to the chief legal officer or CEO and, thereafter, if appropriate remedial measures are not taken, to the audit committee of the board or other board committee comprised solely of non-employee directors). Wherever possible, it is best to engage the board's disclosure counsel to assist in making this determination.

5

Beginning an Internal Investigation: The UK Perspective

Jonathan Cotton and Holly Ware[1]

Introduction 5.1

The trigger points for a potential internal investigation are increasingly diverse. Sources include employee allegations, whistleblowing, supplier or customer complaints, findings from internal or external audits, press reports, social media, blogs, third-party litigation and contact from government or regulatory authorities who may independently have uncovered an issue. In addition, potential issues may be uncovered during other internal investigations.

The focus of this chapter is on the key factors relevant to a company's decision whether, when and how to launch an internal investigation and to highlight key considerations when undertaking document preservation, collection and review. These decisions are often made under significant time pressure and with only limited information. They can, however, have serious repercussions.

Decision whether to notify any relevant authorities 5.2

A key initial question upon a potential issue coming to light is whether there is an obligation to notify any relevant authorities – which is likely, in turn, to impact the form of the internal investigation. Whether there is such an obligation will turn on the regulatory status of the company uncovering the issue, the expectations of the relevant authorities and the issue itself.

Firms regulated by the Financial Conduct Authority (FCA) are under a duty to deal with their regulators openly and co-operatively and to disclose appropriately anything relating to them of which the FCA would reasonably expect notice.[2] The FCA Handbook sets out a non-exhaustive list of situations where a company is under an explicit notification duty, including where there has been a significant failure in the company's systems or controls, there has been a significant breach of a rule imposed by the FCA, employees may have committed significant fraud against customers, or a significant infringement of any applicable competition law has, or may have, occurred.[3] Although the timing of the notification will depend on the circumstances, the FCA expects a firm to discuss relevant matters with it 'at an early stage, before making any internal or external commitments' and in certain cases the notification obligation can be immediate.[4] Dual-regulated firms owe similar obligations to the Prudential Regulation Authority (PRA).[5]

1 Jonathan Cotton and Holly Ware are partners at Slaughter and May. The authors would like to thank James Dobias for his assistance in preparing this chapter.

Persons working in the 'regulated sector' (a wider concept than just firms regulated by the FCA) must submit (either directly or through their firm's nominated officer) a suspicious activity report (SAR) to the National Crime Agency (NCA) in respect of information that comes to them in the course of their business if they know or suspect, or have reasonable grounds for knowing or suspecting, that a person is engaged in money laundering or terrorist financing, or even just attempting the latter.[6] Even if a person does not work in the 'regulated sector', they may still wish to make a voluntary SAR and an accompanying application for a 'defence against money laundering' if they suspect that property they are dealing with is in some way criminal, and that by dealing with it they risk committing a relevant money laundering offence.[7]

It may also be necessary to consider whether there are any notification requirements to professional bodies (e.g., the Solicitors Regulation Authority[8] or, for accountants, their applicable supervisory body[9]) or to the Information Commissioner's Office (for example if a personal data breach may have occurred).[10]

While there is no legal duty on a company to self-report to the Serious Fraud Office (SFO), the Deferred Prosecution Agreements Code of Practice (the DPA Code) states that it will be a public interest factor against prosecution if a company self-reports 'within a reasonable time of the offending coming to light';[11]

2 FCA Handbook, PRIN 2.1.1R, Principle 11. Relevant individuals are also subject to equivalent obligations under FCA Handbook, COCON 2.1.3 and COCON 2.2.4.

3 FCA Handbook, SUP 15.3.

4 Ibid.

5 PRA Rulebook, Notifications, Rule 2. (A dual-regulated firm is a firm that is a 'bank, a building society or a UK designated investment firm', FCA Handbook, SYSC 19 D.)

6 Sections 330 and 331 Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 and section 21A Terrorism Act 2000. 'Regulated sector' is defined in Schedule 9 of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002.

7 Sections 335 and 338 Proceeds of Crime Act 2002.

8 See, for example, Rule 3 (Cooperation and Accountability), Code of Conduct for Firms, SRA Standards and Regulations.

9 For example, accountants regulated by the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales are subject to a reporting obligation under Disciplinary Bye-laws 9.1 and 9.2.

10 Article 33, General Data Protection Regulation 2016/679 (GDPR); section 67 Data Protection Act 2018.

11 Deferred Prosecution Agreements Code of Practice, paragraph 2.8.2(i).

a point that has been strongly endorsed by the courts in the DPA judgments handed down to date.[12] Likewise, in August 2019, the SFO published guidance on actions that companies being investigated by the SFO can take to increase their chances of earning 'co-operation credit' (Corporate Co-operation Guidance), which refers to reporting to the SFO 'within a reasonable time of the suspicions coming to light'.[13] This reference to 'reasonable time' allows some scope for a company to conduct at least a preliminary investigation into a potential issue prior to self-reporting, as reflected in a speech given by the current Director of the SFO, who acknowledged that companies 'have a duty to their shareholders to ensure allegations or suspicions are investigated, assessed and verified, so they understand what they may be reporting before they report it'.[14]

Decision whether and when to launch an internal investigation 5.3

In addition to considering whether and when to notify any relevant authorities, the company will also have to assess whether it would be in its interests to conduct an internal investigation. This is an important decision as, once begun, an internal investigation can be difficult to stop or limit without damaging the company's credibility.

There are, in general, a significant number of advantages to undertaking an internal investigation, including, principally, the ability to gain a better understanding of the facts to allow for more informed decision-making and the exploration of possible defences. There can also be significant financial benefits if the results of the investigation allow the company to apply for leniency or immunity (principally available in the competition sphere) or to self-report and co-operate with an external investigation to gain a discount on a potential future financial penalty (or avoid prosecution altogether). Undertaking an internal investigation can also help to show adequate procedures and a corporate culture where compliance is taken seriously, with wider benefits should the company's compliance framework later be assessed (whether in the context of this or another investigation). Linked to this, an internal investigation can also allow for proper remediation and the implementation of corporate changes that might help to avoid the issue arising in future. Electing not to investigate can mean a company is in a purely reactive position with regard to any parallel external investigation or news story.

In certain circumstances, the factors in favour of conducting an internal investigation can be particularly acute. This can include where a company is effectively required to investigate to comply with its regulatory obligations (for instance to ensure compliance with the FCA Principles for Businesses)[15] or for directors to comply with their fiduciary and other statutory or common law duties.[16] A company may also have existing internal corporate governance codes or compliance policies that require an investigation to take place in the circumstances. On the other hand, in certain cases, authorities have been known to instruct companies not to conduct an internal investigation at all (for instance if it risks employees being 'tipped off' that they are under investigation, denying the authority the chance to monitor the relevant individuals covertly). Indeed, the FCA has stated that: 'Whether and how a firm investigates internally must now be looked at from the point of view of whether doing so will assist or inhibit the FCA's investigation.'[17]

12 See, e.g., Serious Fraud Office v. Standard Bank Plc (now known as ICBC Standard Bank Plc) [2016] Lloyd's Rep FC 102, at paragraph 14, Serious Fraud Office v. Tesco Stores Ltd [2019] Lloyd's Rep FC 283, at paragraphs 66 and 117, and Serious Fraud Office v. Serco Geografix Ltd [2019] Lloyd's Rep FC 518, at paragraph 47.

13 SFO Operational Handbook, Corporate Co-operation Guidance, August 2019.

14 Speech by Lisa Osofsky, Director, SFO, 3 April 2019, available at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2019/04/03/fighting-fraud-and-corruption-in-a-shrinking-world/.

There are, however, a number of potential downsides to conducting an internal investigation that in certain circumstances can allow a company to conclude not to investigate or to do so only in response to external requirements. These downsides include the potentially high costs and resource requirements of the investigation, the distraction from the day-to-day job, and the publicity and reputational risk that the investigation (should it be made public) might incur. Depending on the outcome of any investigation, companies may need to notify stakeholders (such as insurers, auditors, lenders – particularly where the facts may constitute an event of default – and affected third-party clients, customers and counterparties), and listed companies may be required to make a disclosure to the market. There is also the risk that the internal investigation might result in the creation of non-privileged documents that could assist regulators and prosecutors, as well as potential civil claimants (such as customers or shareholders), to the detriment of the company, or that the investigation might uncover misconduct beyond the scope of the initial allegation.

Alongside the decision whether and when to conduct an internal investigation is the decision whether to instruct external legal counsel to advise on or even conduct the internal investigation. In addition to providing investigations expertise and increased resources, the engagement of external counsel can also bolster the independence of the investigation, which is important in a criminal or regulatory context, and provide an external viewpoint to balance the views of internal stakeholders. External counsel also help to increase the likelihood that privilege may apply to certain investigation documents, especially where the in-house legal team that might otherwise be running the investigation hold dual business and legal functions.

15 FCA Handbook, PRIN 2.1.1R.

16 See, in particular, sections 171 to 177, Companies Act 2006.

17 Speech by Jamie Symington, then Director in Enforcement – Wholesale, Unauthorised Business and Intelligence, FCA, 5 November 2015, available at https://www.fca.org.uk/news/speeches/internal-investigations-firms. See also FCA Handbook, EG 3.11.7.

Oversight and management of the investigation 5.4

On taking the decision to undertake an internal investigation, a threshold issue to determine will be the governance structure for the investigation, including who will have day-to-day management of the investigation and whom they will report to. The structure chosen will vary depending on the company and the issue.

It is common for responsibility for day-to-day management of the investigation to be given to the internal legal or compliance team, although alternatives include oversight by the board as a whole, the audit committee or a specially constituted board subcommittee. The chosen entity would likely also be the 'client' for the purposes of instructing external legal counsel, with a consequent effect on the analysis of when legal advice and litigation privilege may arise. In any case, it will be important for potentially implicated individuals to be excluded from the investigation team, which should be kept under review in case additional individuals are implicated during the investigation. Further, where external advisers have been brought in to conduct an independent review, to preserve this independence, it may be necessary to limit the ability of the client to instruct or influence the review beyond clearly defined parameters.

See Chapter 35 on privilege

The question of whom the investigation team will report to will often be determined by a company's existing corporate governance structure and framework of delegated authorities. However, in certain cases the company may choose to constitute a specific review body, such as a special subcommittee of the board or a panel of senior employees and external advisers. In such cases, the terms of reference of this body will need to be clearly defined, including what matters are to be referred to it, what powers it holds and how it is to interact with existing governance bodies in the company.

Where, as is common, the issue involves subsidiaries (some of which may not be wholly owned), it may be necessary to include considerations as to corporate separateness in the governance structure, including the possible need to report to the boards of these subsidiaries.

Whatever governance structures are selected, it will be important to keep these under review and be flexible as to potential amendments to reflect the changing scope of the investigation as new issues arise.

Determining the internal investigation's scope 5.5

Having a clearly defined scope, as reflected in written terms of reference and an investigation plan, is important to set clear objectives and the steps to help avoid a wide-ranging, unfocused investigation, with consequent wastage of time, resources and cost. Clearly setting and justifying the scope will also better allow the investigation to be auditable if queries arise in the future.

See Section 5.6.5

A number of variables will feed into the decision on scope, and there is no one-size-fits-all solution. A narrow scope can help to focus resources and reach a quicker conclusion, but it may risk missing potential conduct or valuable context. A wider scope can help to demonstrate that the investigation has been comprehensive, but it can be expensive and slow. In any case, the scope will be affected by the issues (including whether the company is facing criminal, regulatory or civil claims risk), the time pressures (especially if the company is in a race against co-infringers to apply for leniency) and whether there are concurrent investigations by authorities or internal investigations in other jurisdictions.

Part of defining the scope will also include a decision as to the final deliverables. While the default may be the production of a factual summary report alongside legal advice as to the company's exposure, there is a risk the former may not be privileged. An alternative is for the investigation team to provide only oral updates on the factual findings. Other deliverables can include advice on potential self-reporting, employment law advice on disciplinary action against implicated employees, and proposals as to mitigation and remediation activities to help ensure the conduct is not repeated. The FCA Handbook states that a firm's willingness to volunteer the results of its own investigation, whether protected by legal privilege or otherwise, is welcomed by the FCA and is something the FCA may take into account when deciding what action to take.[18] Likewise, the DPA Code notes that co-operation (which is a public interest factor against prosecution) will include a company sharing its internal investigation report (including source documents) with the SFO; a point which has been highlighted by the courts in the DPA judgments handed down to date.[19]

Companies must also assess whether the scope and terms of reference need to be agreed in advance with any authorities that are aware of the issue to be investigated. The benefits of doing so include potentially building co-operation credit with the authorities, reducing the risk of the authorities later criticising the scope of the investigation and allowing the authorities an opportunity to express their preferences as to the final deliverables and the practical conduct of the investigation. The SFO has been particularly concerned about the potential for internal investigations to 'trample over the crime scene', and early engagement can help to avoid later criticism of the investigation team's actions.[20] Further, the FCA Handbook states that if a firm anticipates that it will disclose a report of its internal investigation to the FCA, the potential use and benefit to be derived from the report will be greater if the FCA has had the chance to comment on its proposed scope and purpose.[21]

Finally, at the scoping stage it can be helpful to assess what external resources may be required during the investigation, including the potential use of forensic accountants, asset tracers, private investigators, third-party experts, public relations firms, and local and foreign counsel.

18 FCA Handbook, EG 3.11.2.

19 Deferred Prosecution Agreements Code of Practice, paragraph 2.8.2(i). Also see Serious Fraud Office v. Rolls-Royce Plc and Another [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249, at paragraph 17, and Serious Fraud Office v. Serco Geografix Ltd [2019] Lloyd's Rep FC 518, at paragraph 24.

20 Speech by Ben Morgan, then Joint Head of Bribery and Corruption, SFO, 20 May 2015, available at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2015/05/20/compliance-and-cooperation/.

21 FCA Handbook, EG 3.11.5.

Document preservation, collection and review 5.6

In any internal investigation, it is critical to consider at the earliest possible opportunity the practicalities for the preservation, collection, review and analysis of relevant material. In its Corporate Co-operation Guidance, the SFO states that co-operation includes preserving available evidence and producing it to the SFO in an 'evidentially sound' format.[22] Any decisions should then be recorded in a written investigation plan to preserve a clear audit or 'chain of custody' trail. See Section 5.6.5

Although in the early stages of an investigation it may not be appropriate to conduct formal interviews, the investigation team may wish to consider conducting informal 'scoping interviews' to assist with scoping out the issues and identifying where relevant material might be stored. Care will need to be taken, given the preference of a number of authorities that they be consulted prior to interviews (even those relating to the location of evidence) to avoid the possibility of the internal investigation tainting the recollection of witnesses.

Preservation 5.6.1

An important first step in document preservation is to identify who might hold information relevant to the investigation. The pool of people is likely to be broader than just those implicated in the conduct and may also include individuals reporting to them, individuals to whom they reported, secretaries and assistants, individuals in other departments they interacted with, and third parties outside the organisation. In some investigations, wider business units or offices might also be relevant.

In general, a company would then issue a hold notice (also known as a document retention or document preservation notice) to such individuals asking them to preserve (and not alter, discard, delete or destroy) all materials (including hard-copy materials) they may hold relevant to the investigation. Beforehand, however, the company should consider whether circulation of the hold notice may risk tipping off individuals relevant to the investigation if there is a risk they may destroy documentation or otherwise frustrate the investigation. In its Corporate Co-operation Guidance, the SFO states that genuine co-operation is inconsistent with 'putting subjects on notice and creating a danger of tampering with evidence or testimony'.[23] Potential solutions to address this risk include delaying the circulation of the hold notice until relevant materials have already been secured or carefully drafting the content of the hold notice so that it does not necessarily reveal the specific circumstances or content of the internal investigation (subject, however, to the data privacy considerations discussed below). The company should also consider the risk of a possible leak and whether the description in the hold notice may go beyond relevant market disclosures.

Companies should take care to keep a clear record of the recipients of these hold notices, especially where they are not circulated centrally, but instead are cascaded via the reporting structures of the organisation. As part of this, companies may wish to ask employees to acknowledge their receipt and understanding of the hold notice, though this can create an administrative burden and raises the possibility that an employee may refuse to acknowledge receipt. A middle ground may involve requesting an email read-receipt instead.

22 SFO Operational Handbook, Corporate Co-operation Guidance, August 2019.

23 Ibid.

In support of the hold notices (which are issued to, and place the burden of preservation on, the relevant individuals), companies should also consider implementing background procedural steps to help ensure the preservation of relevant data. This can include the suspension of regular document destruction processes, activating permanent email holds (so that individuals cannot permanently delete data from their inbox), retaining computer drive backups (so that if individuals delete data from a shared drive, it can be recovered), retaining employee devices and preventing the recall of documents from archives without appropriate authorisation. It is good practice to implement these before the circulation of the hold notice to reduce the risk of individuals deleting data.

Preservation also requires companies to be alert to the risk of ageing technology or bespoke systems and to take steps to ensure that the data stored within them remains accessible during the investigation.

When issuing hold notices or implementing procedural steps to help ensure the preservation of relevant data, companies should carefully consider the potential application of data privacy rules and appropriately document their consideration of the data subjects' interests. In particular, key considerations under the General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) would include ensuring appropriate transparency (so that the data subjects are aware of the scope and purposes of the preservation), data minimisation (so that no more data is preserved than is necessary) and storage limitation (so that the data is not stored for longer than is necessary).

See Chapter 40 on data protection

5.6.2 Collection

Having preserved all relevant data, the next step is to identify what should be extracted and made available for potential review. A key part of this involves identifying which individuals are most likely to hold data relevant to the investigation (referred to as 'custodians') and which other sources might yield relevant documents (including any third-party sources). Companies will also need to identify what categories of material to collect, with a non-exhaustive list of options including emails, electronic documents, external storage devices, mobile phones, tablets, internet messaging and chatroom data, telephone recordings[24] and hard-copy materials.

Companies should also identify any material they are unable to access (such as private email accounts, messaging applications or social media) as the relevant authorities may have statutory powers that allow them to access these sources.

24 The FCA Handbook (SYSC 10A.1) places obligations on regulated firms to record telephone conversations that relate to regulated activities in certain financial instruments.

In its Corporate Co-operation Guidance, the SFO has stated it will consider it a mark of co-operation for companies to alert the SFO if there are any such inaccessible sources.[25]

Depending on the circumstances of the investigation, it may be desirable to instruct an external forensic provider to undertake the data collection. This will be especially important in the criminal context where issues relating to the forensic integrity of the underlying data and chain of custody are key.

When undertaking the collection, the decision will need to be taken whether the affected individuals should be notified. Relevant factors include the terms of any applicable data privacy policies at the company (including the existing description of the purposes for which the company might process the individuals' data) and the likelihood that giving notice may result in individuals destroying documents or otherwise frustrating the investigation. In certain circumstances, express consent may be required from employees, especially if required by local data privacy laws or if the employees use their own devices.

When undertaking the collection, it will also be necessary to consider the requirements of applicable data privacy rules more generally. Considerations as to data minimisation can require the collection to be limited by date range and search terms (even before the data is ingested into a review platform) and the principles of integrity and confidentiality require the data to be stored securely and only accessible with appropriate authorisation.

See Chapter 40 on data protection

For both preservation and collection, it will be necessary to record all steps taken and keep any decisions under review as the investigation identifies new custodians, sources and date ranges.

Review 5.6.3

Having collected the data, in all but the smallest reviews, it is advisable to upload it to a document review platform. This allows for easier searching, tagging and management of the data and will create an audit trail if questions arise in relation to specific documents.

The next stage will be to assess the appropriate searching criteria to help narrow the scope of the review and identify the most relevant documents. Tools here include applying date range, custodian and data source filters and identifying relevant search terms. If the timing allows, there are significant benefits to testing the potential searching criteria and refining them before starting the full review. A clear record should be kept of all decisions taken, including the reasons for refining or abandoning any provisional search criteria. There are also significant benefits to considering the appropriate type of data de-duplication to conduct.

Increasingly, many vendors are offering technology-assisted analytics and technology-assisted review (TAR), which allow for the review platform to learn from initial reviewer coding decisions and identify similarly relevant documents from the remaining data set. This can allow the technology to prioritise these documents, ensuring they are brought to the attention of the review team sooner, or even automatically code the documents. The success of this technology will, however, depend significantly on the quality of the initial 'seed set' of coding decisions and the complexity of the issues it is being asked to assess.

25 SFO Operational Handbook, Corporate Co-operation Guidance, August 2019.

In any case, it is common to structure the review around a series of 'tiers', with an initial triage stage for relevancy, followed by second and potentially third-tier reviews by more senior individuals to focus the set and apply more complex coding. In a number of cases, first-tier and even second-tier reviews are outsourced to specialist external document review teams, which can free resource within the investigation team to concentrate on management of the review and the other elements of the investigation.

To ensure accuracy and consistency of coding, it will be necessary to draft document review protocols and accompanying coding forms for each tier of the review, together with organising training for the reviewers. It is also common to organise regular quality control or calibration sessions with the reviewers, where they can ask questions of the senior team, and to set up a process for the rapid escalation to the senior team of key documents identified during the review.

In drafting the document review protocol and coding forms, it will be important to consider how the internal review may interact with any existing or potential parallel external investigation. In particular, if there is the possibility that relevant documents may be produced to an authority, there may be benefits at this stage to asking reviewers to code for privilege, data privacy, bank confidentiality and other jurisdiction-specific issues.

5.6.4 Data located in multiple jurisdictions

Particular complexities can arise where data relevant to the internal investigation is located in other jurisdictions (including where it is hosted on cloud-based or group-wide servers that might be physically located overseas).

It will often be necessary to get local data privacy advice before preserving and collecting data for review, including on whether and how the data may be transferred to the jurisdiction where the review is taking place. If transfer of the data is not permissible, it may be necessary to conduct a local review within the foreign jurisdiction.

There are also wider strategic considerations to bear in mind before deciding to collect and transfer data from other jurisdictions. In particular, consideration should be given to the risk of transferring documents into a jurisdiction where they might not otherwise have been available to authorities or to claimants during disclosure in civil trials (although this should be balanced against the risk that in not collecting this data the company may be found to be non-co-operative or frustrating the investigation).[26] Likewise, where the data is held by a subsidiary, considerations as to corporate separateness may require the two companies to enter into co-operation and information sharing agreements with respect to the investigation. It is common in these agreements (especially where the subsidiary is not wholly owned) for the subsidiary to retain a right of consent prior to its data being disclosed to any authority.

26 It is possible for authorities in one jurisdiction to request documents from authorities in other jurisdictions via diplomatic channels, including via mutual legal assistance treaties. In addition, in February 2019, the UK government introduced the Crime (Overseas Production Orders) Act 2019, which aims to simplify and speed up obtaining electronic data located abroad.

The UK authorities tend to be more willing than their US counterparts to engage with companies' representations as to limitations imposed by overseas jurisdictions. A risk remains, however, that in failing to collect, transfer and review relevant data, a company may be found to be non-co-operative or obstructive of the authorities' investigations.

Importance of record-keeping 5.6.5

As referenced above, it is critical at all stages of an internal investigation to keep clear records of key decisions taken, including the drafting of detailed, auditable summaries of the methodology undertaken for data preservation, collection and review. It will also be important to preserve originals of all relevant documents and devices and maintain a full chain of custody records.

The FCA Handbook states that where a firm conducts an internal investigation, it will be 'very helpful' if the firm maintains a proper record of the enquiries made and interviews conducted.[27] Likewise, in its Corporate Co-operation Guidance, the SFO has emphasised the importance of maintaining an audit trail of the acquisition and handling of digital, hard-copy and financial material, and the potential need for companies to identify a person to provide a witness statement covering such issues.[28]

27 FCA Handbook, EG 3.11.9.

28 SFO Operational Handbook, Corporate Co-operation Guidance, August 2019.

6

Beginning an Internal Investigation: The US Perspective

Bruce E Yannett and David Sarratt[1]

6.1 Introduction

The aim of this chapter is to provide the reader with useful tools to navigate the beginning of an internal investigation. Mistakes made in the initial phases of an investigation can have costly repercussions down the road, and, for this reason, it is important to consider all the relevant legal, commercial and logistical factors in making strategic decisions early on.

6.2 Assessing if an internal investigation is necessary

Information giving rise to the need for an internal investigation can come from a variety of sources, including customers, employees, whistleblowers, lawsuits, counterparties, news and social media, as well as from prosecutorial and regulatory authorities. Regulatory changes have created new incentives for individuals to come forward and report suspected wrongdoing. For example, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 and its implementing rules require attorneys who appear and practise before the SEC to report evidence of a material violation up the ladder to a company's chief legal officer and CEO. The reporting obligation is not discharged until the attorney reasonably believes the company has provided an appropriate response.[2] Similar reporting obligations apply to issuers and auditors.[3]

When confronted with information – from whatever source – that the company or its employees may have engaged in serious misconduct, in-house counsel's first step is often to assess whether it would be in the company's interest to conduct an internal investigation. Counsel will want to consider whether government authorities are already investigating, or are likely to investigate, the matter, whether civil litigation will follow and in what form, and the potential (or likely) need for remediation. Depending on the facts, counsel may also want to balance the costs of investigating and the potential disruption to normal business, as well as any potential reputational risk or commercial fallout.

1 Bruce E Yannett and David Sarratt are partners at Debevoise & Plimpton LLP.

2 See Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 § 307, 15 U.S.C.A. § 7245 (2002); 17 C.F.R. Part 205.3(d).

3 See Securities Exchange Act of 1934 § 10A, 15 U.S.C.A. § 78j-1.

In some instances, external legal obligations may require an investigation to be conducted. Board members and management, for example, have a fiduciary duty to protect the interests of the corporation and its shareholders, and in some cases that duty will include an obligation to investigate indications of serious misconduct at the company. An investigation may also be required in certain instances so that company executives can meet any affirmative certification obligations they have, whether under Sarbanes-Oxley or otherwise.

More often, however, counsel will want to conduct an investigation to make an informed decision about whether it is in the company's interest to self-report the matter to law enforcement or regulators. Over the past two decades, the United States Department of Justice (DOJ) has placed an increasing focus on self-reporting both in charging decisions and in the degree of co-operation credit that will be afforded to a company. To guide the charging decisions of its own attorneys, the DOJ has set out a number of factors that prosecutors should consider in determining whether to charge a business entity, including co-operation and voluntary disclosure, the adequacy of the corporation's compliance programmes, and any remedial actions or restitution undertaken.[4] The DOJ has expanded on these factors through subsequent directives.[5] Most recently, in November 2019, the DOJ clarified that under its revised policy, a company seeking co-operation credit is expected to disclose 'all relevant facts known to it at the time of the disclosure, including as to any individuals substantially involved' in the misconduct. This clarification recognises that because 'a company may not be in a position to know all relevant facts at the time of a voluntary self-disclosure, especially where only preliminary investigative efforts have been possible', a full investigation is not required before disclosure, though a company should 'provide a fulsome disclosure' of the relevant facts known at the time.[6] Additionally, in 2016, the Fraud Section of the

See Chapter 4 on self-reporting to authorities

4 See Holder Memorandum, Bringing Criminal Charges Against Corporations, Dep't of Justice, Deputy Attorney General Eric Holder (16 June 1999).

5 See Thompson Memorandum, Principles of Federal Prosecution of Business Organizations, Dep't of Justice, Deputy Attorney General Larry D Thompson (20 January 2003); McCallum Memorandum, Waiver of Corporate Attorney–client and Work Product Protections, Dep't of Justice, Acting Deputy Attorney General Robert D McCallum (21 October 2005); McNulty Memorandum, Principles of Federal Prosecution of Business Organizations, Dep't of Justice, Deputy Attorney General Paul J McNulty (12 December 2006); Filip Memorandum, Principles of Federal Prosecution of Business Organizations, Dep't of Justice, Deputy Attorney General Mark Filip (28 August 2008); Yates Memorandum, Individual Accountability for Corporate Wrongdoing, Dep't of Justice, Deputy Attorney General Sally Q Yates (9 September 2015).

6 United States Department of Justice, Justice Manual § 9-47.120 (updated November 2019). The revised policy also provides that a company must let the DOJ know 'where the company is aware of relevant evidence not in the company's possession'.

DOJ launched a 'Pilot Program' announcing even greater emphasis on voluntary self-reporting in deciding whether to charge or how to resolve corporate criminal matters.[7] The following year, this policy was formally implemented through the DOJ's revised Policy on Corporate Enforcement of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, which was announced on 29 November 2017 and closely tracks the objectives of the Pilot Program, including the incentives for self-disclosure and co-operation with the DOJ's investigations.[8] The DOJ has since indicated that this policy will likely be extended, at least in practice, to cases that come before the Department involving other federal regulations beyond the FCPA.[9]

In light of these policies, for all practical purposes, an internal investigation is often necessary so that the company can identify what, if any, information should be disclosed to the DOJ, and whether co-operation credit is attainable. This, however, may be a false dilemma as, in many instances, a corporation's co-operation can be the most significant determining factor in how the DOJ resolves a case, including the amount of any penalty.[10]

Many regulatory agencies have likewise increasingly come to expect companies to perform a robust internal investigation of any potential legal or regulatory violations and to report such violations to the agency. For example, the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau (CFPB) has stated that 'responsible conduct' – namely proactive self-policing for potential violations, prompt self-reporting of identified violations, complete remediation of resulting harm and co-operation with the CFPB – would influence the CFPB's resolution of an enforcement investigation.[11] Similarly, the US Department of Treasury Office of Foreign Assets Control specifically provides companies with mitigation credit of 50 per cent off its base penalty amounts for voluntary disclosures and further mitigation for co-operation.[12] The SEC similarly identifies '[s]elf-policing, self-reporting, remediation and cooperation with law enforcement authorities' as the primary factors it will consider in determining an appropriate resolution.[13]

---

7 Leslie R Caldwell, Criminal Division Launches New FCPA Pilot Program (5 April 2016) (noting that '[i]f a company opts not to self-disclose, it should do so understanding that in any eventual investigation that decision will result in a significantly different outcome than if the company had voluntarily disclosed the conduct to us.').

8 See Deputy Attorney General Rosenstein Delivers Remarks at the 34th International Conference on the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, U.S. Dep't of Justice (29 November 2017); U.S. Dep't of Justice, Justice Manual § 9-47.120 (updated November 2019).

9 See Head of the Criminal Division John Cronan and Chief of the Securities and Financial Fraud Unit Benjamin Singer Deliver Remarks at the ABA's 32nd Annual National Institute on White Collar Crime (1 March 2018); Letter Declining to Prosecute Barclays PLC (28 February 2018), stating: 'The Department's decision to close its investigation of this matter is based on a number of factors, including . . . Barclays' timely, voluntary self-disclosure.'.

10 U.S.S.G. § 8C2.5(g), cmt. 13 (2015).

11 CFPB Bulletin 2013-06, Responsible Business Conduct (25 June 2013).

12 31 C.F.R. Part 501, Economic Sanctions Enforcement Guidelines (9 November 2009).

13 Report of Investigation Pursuant to Section 21(a) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and Commission Statement on the Relationship of Cooperation to Agency Enforcement Decisions, Release No. 34-44969 (23 October 2001) (Seaboard Report).

Even apart from legal considerations, business and reputational concerns alone may provide grounds for conducting an internal investigation. Indeed, counsel will often need to have a baseline understanding of the underlying facts, and an informed sense of whether there is any substance to the allegations of misconduct, to make a reasonable assessment of the potential business and legal consequences and the need for corrective action. Commencing a thorough internal inquiry will often also be important to any related public relations efforts, and will be critical to maintaining the company's credibility with its customers, business partners and other affected individuals.[14]

Identifying the client 6.3

Once the company decides to commence an internal investigation, the next step is to determine who will conduct the investigation and for what specific client within the organisation. In large organisations, particularly those with multiple subsidiaries across the globe, counsel should think strategically about how to structure the investigation: where to locate the attorney–client relationship, to whom the investigating attorneys should report, and who will be making key decisions as the investigation proceeds. In making these decisions, counsel should consider what relationships will best protect the integrity and confidentiality of the investigation, the location and custody of relevant documents, and the overall aims of the investigation over the short and long term.

In some circumstances, counsel may also want to consider whether the investigation should be conducted on behalf of the board (or its subcommittee), with counsel reporting to and being directed by the board, rather than management. In a shareholder derivative suit, having the board direct the investigation will be the norm, both because the conduct of management will often be at issue and so that the investigation will not be subject to the derivative-claim exception to the attorney–client privilege recognised in some jurisdictions. The board may also be best suited to lead an investigation when the allegations are particularly serious or could have serious consequences for the company, when the allegations concern the actions of senior management, or when reputational or other concerns require that the investigation be conducted independently of management. Making that decision in any particular case will depend heavily on the specific facts involved, the company's business and position in the marketplace, the relationship dynamics at the company and the overall goals of the investigation.

See Chapter 36 on privilege

Whatever decision is made, it is important that the company clearly document who the client is, and the reporting and oversight structure for the investigation.

14 In rare circumstances, some facts will be so clearly unlawful on their face (e.g., if an employee is providing clearly and materially false information to investors) that the company should consider notifying the relevant law enforcement or regulatory authorities even before conducting a complete internal investigation, particularly where time is of the essence and, if appropriate, continue with the internal investigation in parallel.

6.4 Control of the investigation: in-house or external counsel

Although routine matters can often be handled by in-house counsel, an outside firm should ordinarily conduct the investigation where the potential misconduct could produce significant adverse legal or commercial consequences for the company. Though internal investigations can be expensive and time-consuming, these concerns often pale in comparison to the possible legal, financial and reputational risks faced by the company, as well as the need to demonstrate independence. Hiring external counsel allows for a clearer application of attorney–client privilege to the communications and work-product of the outside firm, especially where corporation counsel has both business and legal functions. Often, both commercial and legal concerns can precipitate an internal investigation, so using external counsel can decrease the risk of inadvertently waiving privilege.[15] External counsel also brings expertise, experience and resources to support the company in challenging situations that are unlikely to arise with much frequency at any particular company.

Depending on the circumstances, in-house counsel may want to consider using external counsel that is not the company's usual firm.[16] Bringing in a separate firm that is less familiar with the company's business, of course, will often involve additional time and expense. Whether this step is justified in a particular case will depend on the sensitivity and significance of the investigation, the level of management implicated in the conduct, the need for perceived independence of the investigation, and the attitude of potentially relevant regulators who may be assessing the quality and results of the investigation in considering whether the company deserves credit for co-operation.

6.5 Determining the scope of the investigation

The importance of clarifying the investigation's scope and purpose at the outset cannot be overstated. First, a well-defined and memorialised purpose can help establish the legitimacy of privilege claims over attorney–client communications and work-product produced in the course of the investigation; the claim to attorney–client privilege is likely to be much stronger if an independent investigation has been commenced or litigation is reasonably in contemplation.

See Chapter 36 on privilege

Additionally, defining the investigation's purpose can impose a welcome discipline and accountability on the investigators themselves. Corporate counsel are 15 See, e.g., United States v. Ruehle, 583 F.3d 600, 606-12 (9th Cir. 2009) (statements made for the purpose of disclosure to outside auditors not privileged). In the United States, however, investigations conducted solely by in-house counsel may fall within the scope of attorney–client privilege if they are carefully conducted. See, e.g., In re Kellogg, Brown & Root, Inc. et al., 756 F.3d 754, 758 (D.C. Cir. 2014) ('Upjohn does not hold or imply that the involvement of outside counsel is a necessary predicate for the privilege to apply.'). The extent to which an investigation conducted by in-house counsel outside the United States would be protected by privilege varies widely by jurisdiction.

16 See In re John Doe Corp., 675 F.2d 482, 491 (2d Cir. 1982) (recognising that when corporate counsel finds evidence of criminality protected under Upjohn 'the wiser course may be to hire counsel with no other connection to the corporation to conduct investigations').

quite familiar with the tangents that can cause an investigation to become rudderless and wasteful. As explained below, a short period of preliminary investigation can often be helpful in defining a purpose and scope to the investigation that is reasonably clear and realistic, while identifying key uncertainties and inflection points to come. In defining the scope of the investigation, it can also be valuable to consider how quickly the information is needed, whether based on requests from the government or internal time pressures.

Key documents and scoping interviews 6.5.1

Most investigations will begin with counsel's review of a handful of critical documents that are at the heart of the information triggering the need for the investigation. In many instances, the documents themselves, rather than individuals, may have alerted the company to alleged wrongdoing and precipitated the need for an investigation. In almost every case, however, conducting a small number of initial scoping interviews will be a useful way for the investigators to focus in quickly on the truly important material.

Identifying the most useful individuals to speak with in these scoping conversations can be delicate, as investigators seek to strike a balance between speaking with individuals who are knowledgeable about the issue at hand but who are sufficiently removed from the potential misconduct that they can safely be viewed as reliable in terms of setting the scope and maintaining the confidentiality of the investigation. Of course, interviewing an employee at an early stage, without the benefit of a complete set facts or documents, could result in incomplete information and the need for a further interview.

One logical place for external counsel to start is to thoroughly debrief the in-house legal team and, potentially, the individual or individuals who brought the issue to the attention of the organisation. These interviews can serve to identify key custodians, the nature and volume of relevant documents, the ways documents are stored, and who has access to them. If there is an obvious investigation target, interviewing that individual in the initial stages may be more efficient, but this must be weighed against other strategic considerations, including alerting the target to the focus of the investigation and compromising the investigation later on. The timing and structure of these initial discussions may also be influenced by external deadlines or other business considerations involved in the review.

Identifying necessary partners 6.5.2

Another early consideration for counsel is what outside investigative partners may be needed. These can range from technical subject-matter experts to local counsel in foreign jurisdictions to data processing and hosting services to forensic accountants. Counsel ordinarily will want to interview a number of firms in deciding which vendors to use, and the discussions can sometimes yield helpful insight into the size of the tasks ahead, likely costs, potential alternative strategies and timing. Engaging these third parties at the outset of the investigation – even if their work is not needed immediately – will often be valuable in defining the scope and methods of the investigation. As noted above, given the consideration of attorney–client privilege, generally external counsel will retain the third-party vendors on behalf of the company so that their work and work-product is undertaken on the instruction of external counsel in anticipation of litigation and thereby covered by privilege and attorney work-product protections.

6.5.3 Developing a work plan

Once the investigating attorney has identified the subject matter of the investigation (the who, what, when and where), the scope and the purpose of the investigation and a concrete plan for carrying it out should ordinarily be memorialised by external counsel in a written work plan. This type of memorandum allows for client input on the investigative process, gives in-house counsel clear expectations about how the investigation will progress, and provides investigating attorneys with a benchmark for strategic judgements as the investigation moves forward. It can also serve as a useful tool for dividing responsibilities among the investigating attorneys and tracking progress toward key investigative goals. Keep in mind that the work plan may be a document that the company decides to share with the criminal or regulatory authorities and should be drafted accordingly.

In building the work plan, counsel should consider the time frame and geographical range of the inquiry, as well as which entities of the company (e.g., subsidiaries, affiliates, departments) will be covered and, if applicable, the rationale for not covering other entities at this stage. The memorandum should clearly set forth the subject matter under investigation and, to the extent possible, (1) what company documents will be retrieved (and by whom), (2) how data will be processed (and by whom), and (3) how documents will be reviewed (and by whom). In collecting, reviewing and preserving documents, the investigating attorney should take into account any data privacy concerns that may arise.

See Section 6.6.2

Where possible, the work plan should list any interviews that have been or will be conducted, or at least the categories of people to be interviewed. To the extent there is a rationale for interviewing some individuals and not others, it should be stated. Likewise, if the involvement of other third parties, such as forensic accountants and industry experts, is foreseeable, the document should describe the scope of their expected engagement.

The work plan should also set a rough schedule for key deliverables in the investigation, and at least tentatively identify the form that the ultimate work-product will take. In particular, it is useful to know at the outset of an investigation whether the preparation of a written investigative report will be useful and in the company's interest, or whether an oral presentation of findings to management or the board would be preferable. A written report will most often be advisable when the company believes providing the report to a third party or to the public will be beneficial, whether for reputational, business or legal reasons. In most other cases, an oral report will often serve the client's interests just as well without creating a risk of inadvertent or compelled disclosure.

Finally, the work plan should be flexible. Although careful planning is always beneficial, investigations in the real world are not scripted affairs. The investigative team will have to adapt to new information and challenges as the investigation progresses, and the work plan should lay out a process for making those decisions – particularly in terms of who should be consulted and who should approve – before the investigative team moves in a new direction not contemplated by the plan.

Certain investigations may implicate the general counsel or other members of senior management in alleged misconduct. In that circumstance, the investigating attorneys should report to the board (or a designated member or committee of the board) or to a senior executive who has no involvement in the facts at issue and who does not report to any member of management whose conduct may be under review.

Document preservation, collection and review 6.6

Preservation 6.6.1

As soon as possible after learning of potential misconduct, the in-house attorney should implement a litigation hold and document preservation notice to prevent the intentional or inadvertent destruction of relevant documents and material. In fashioning the document retention policy, it is ordinarily advisable to err on the side of overbreadth, at least at the beginning when the extent of any potential wrongdoing and the relevant actors are unknown. This is critical. Failure to successfully preserve relevant material could be viewed as a dereliction of the attorney's duties and, in some cases, as obstruction of justice.

In issuing preservation or 'hold' notices, the investigating attorneys should consider who should receive these notices (including the IT and records departments), what types of documents and data should be included, and how the investigation should be described. Where notices are sent to different jurisdictions, the investigating attorney may need to consider providing translations as well as addressing data privacy restrictions. The attorney implementing the litigation hold should record the distribution of notices and, where extra caution is warranted, have employees sign and return a copy of the notice or electronically acknowledge receipt so as to create a record. If the company has received a subpoena from law enforcement relating to the subject matter of the investigation, the subpoena will define the minimum universe of documents that require preservation, but counsel should consider whether additional material should be preserved for purposes of the internal investigation or otherwise.

See Section 6.7

The investigating attorneys should consult with the company's records management department to preserve any hard-copy files, including those stored off-site in archives. The investigating attorney should also instruct the IT department to suspend any normal data destruction practices and to create and maintain a list of the relevant sources of data. Such sources may include documents maintained on the company's servers and employees' hard drives, emails saved on exchange servers, data held on employees' home computers, and data saved on employees' work-issued mobile devices. In recent years, regulators have been increasingly focused, not just on collecting and preserving email, but also on collecting and preserving text messages and other communications stored on mobile and other electronic devices.[17] To the greatest extent possible, the company should take steps on its own to preserve this electronic data rather than relying on individual employees to preserve their own documents. The company should also take steps to prevent individuals from destroying or altering potentially relevant data. In some cases the facts will warrant proactive data capturing steps, including forensic images of employee laptops, desktops or mobile devices. Document custodians should be designated as soon as the investigating attorneys reasonably believe such individuals may possess documents relevant to the investigation.

It bears mention that sometimes the document collection process itself can come under scrutiny, particularly if authorities come to believe that relevant (and potentially damaging) documents may have been destroyed. In some extreme cases, someone with first-hand knowledge of the investigation may be called to provide sworn testimony in a deposition or in court. Attorneys should plan and document the collection process with this worst-case scenario in mind, and make clear to their clients the importance of treating the collection process – sometimes viewed as a ministerial chore – with serious care and attention.

6.6.2 Collection

Once preservation measures have been implemented, the investigation can turn its attention to the collection of documents. Almost all investigations require judgement calls to be made on the scope of which documents to collect and from whom, including whether the investigation can be accomplished in whole or in part through collection within the company or, instead, requires collection from third parties. Company policies (e.g., codes of conduct) and local employment law also may impose limitations on the collection process. If the investigation contemplates the collection of personal health information, counsel should ensure that all data collection comports with the requirements of the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1996 (HIPAA). In such circumstances, counsel should take appropriate measures to safeguard personal health data, including assessing whether entering into a business associate contract is appropriate.[18] By the same token, counsel should ensure that any other personally identifiable information (PII) collected as part of the investigation is similarly flagged during review and appropriately safeguarded.

For electronic data, the process of collecting data will often coincide with preserving it. Counsel should make sure that forensic copies of all relevant electronic data (including metadata) has been copied to a secure location, preferably with 17 For example, for a company to receive full credit for timely and appropriate remediation in FCPA matters, the DOJ expects companies to implement 'appropriate guidance and controls on the use of personal communications and ephemeral messaging platforms that undermine the company's ability to appropriately retain business records or communications or otherwise comply with the company's document retention policies or legal obligations.' U.S. Department of Justice, Justice Manual § 9-47.120 (updated November 2019).

18 The HIPAA Rules generally require that covered entities enter into contracts with their business associates to ensure that the business associates will appropriately safeguard protected health information. See 45 C.F.R. Part 160 and Part 164.

at least one backup maintained on a separate system. The data will then need to be loaded into a review platform for review. Evidence that has been collected in paper form will often be most easily reviewed by digitising it and loading it into the same review platform as the electronic documents that have been collected. The data vendor retained by the investigating counsel will provide the collection and hosting support to the company.

As with the preservation process, the steps taken in collecting documents should be recorded. In instances where requested documents cannot be located, the search efforts and results should also be documented.

Review 6.6.3

Regarding the review of the documents, the investigating attorneys should carefully consider how best to manage the volume and formatting of documents. Outside vendors are a useful resource for these matters, and consulting with them early can often save time and money.

Where there is a large volume of documents to be searched, the key objective is to locate the responsive documents quickly and efficiently. Search terms should be broad enough to include responsive materials, but narrow enough not to bog down review teams with a large proportion of unnecessary documents. To the extent certain custodians or groups of documents are more likely to contain relevant content, their review should be prioritised.

In recent years, great advances have been made in the use of predictive coding in e-discovery to more quickly identify relevant documents and reduce the number of non-responsive documents that need to be individually reviewed. In our experience, the judicious use of predictive coding technologies is increasingly acceptable to regulators and prosecutors in the right context, so long as the specific methodologies and rationale for using those tools are clearly discussed with the authorities at the outset. Even in cases where a full human review of a document population is contemplated or required, predictive coding can be a useful tool for internal investigators in locating the most relevant documents quickly, before the full review is complete.

Taking these considerations into account, the investigating attorneys should draft a document review protocol that sets forth in as much detail as possible the purpose of the review, the responsive issues, and how documents should be tagged or marked. Devising the system of tags and codes is a critical step. Counsel should give careful consideration to how they may want to sort the data as the investigation progresses and devise codes that will make that work efficient. On the other hand, counsel should take care not to include so many codes that the review will be unduly slowed or overly confusing to reviewers.

If the need to produce documents to outside parties is likely, responsive documents should be reviewed to see if they are privileged and, if so, which privilege would apply. Disclosure of privileged material to a third party, even the government, can in some instances constitute a waiver of privilege, although steps can be taken to limit the scope of such a waiver.

See Chapter 36 on privilege

In the context of an investigation, gathering material is a dynamic process. Discovery of documents will often require follow-up interviews, and information gleaned in interviews may reveal the need for additional search terms or custodians. Documents retrieved from one custodian may reveal that a previously unknown custodian may have responsive material. The document preservation notice and review protocol should be updated as needed throughout the course of the investigation as this information comes to light.

6.7 Documents located abroad

When documents are located in jurisdictions outside the United States, the first step is to look at the relevant country's data privacy and bank secrecy laws (or whether blocking statutes or state secrecy laws are implicated), many of which may seem counter-intuitive to US practitioners.[19] In the European Union, for instance, employees' personal data can only be collected and processed under certain conditions, and law firms and their clients must protect this data from misuse and respect certain rights of the individual data owners.[20] These requirements and the penalties for non-compliance have been heightened by the recent implementation of the General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR), which superseded the Data Protection Directive governing data privacy and applies directly throughout the European Economic Area. Some countries also have procedural requirements (e.g., notification to a works council) that govern the processing, transfer, storage, maintenance and access to documents.[21] Given the heightened scrutiny surrounding personal information, counsel should take care to collect and store only what the investigation requires, and consider whether any special arrangements, such as a cross-border data transfer agreement, would help mitigate collateral risk.

See Chapter 40 on data protection

In the past, corporate counsel has sometimes relied on these foreign laws to avoid producing documents located abroad to US authorities. Recently, DOJ officials have expressed increasing scepticism toward explanations that documents cannot be provided to the DOJ in the United States because of data privacy restrictions, and, by virtue of handling many cases implicating foreign laws, have themselves become knowledgeable about their limitations and exceptions. In the DOJ's view, '[c]orporations are often too quick to claim that they cannot retrieve overseas documents, emails or other evidence regarding individuals due to foreign data privacy laws . . . . A company that tries to hide culpable individuals or 19 In some cases, data privacy regimes can also apply to documents located within the United States if the data resides there in connection with the activities of a non-US entity. This is true, for example, of the European Union General Data Protection Regulation, which has extraterritorial effect in certain circumstances.

20 See the EU General Data Protection Regulation adopted in April 2016, which came into effect on 25 May 2018 and superseded the EU Data Protection Directive (Directive 95/46/EC). Other notable data privacy laws include Hong Kong: Personal Data (Privacy) Ordinance (Cap 486), Japan: the Act on the Protection of Personal Information (Law No. 57 of 2003) and Russia: the Russian Federal Law 'On Personal Data' (No. 152-FZ).

21 See, e.g., articles 91, 96 and 96a of the Austrian Labour Constitution Act (Arbeitsverfassungsgesetz – ArbVG).

otherwise available evidence behind inaccurately expansive interpretations of foreign data protection laws places its cooperation credit at great risk.'[22] In 2015, the then head of the Criminal Division at the DOJ, Leslie Caldwell, stated that while 'some foreign data privacy laws may limit or prohibit the disclosure of certain types of data or information', the DOJ nonetheless will challenge what it perceives to be 'unfounded reliance on these laws' and encouraged companies to refrain from 'making broad "knee jerk" claims that large categories of information are protected from disclosure'.[23] The following year, Caldwell reiterated that the DOJ was leveraging its relationships with foreign enforcement partners 'to obtain information when non-cooperative companies make invalid assertions about particular data privacy laws in an effort to shield themselves from [DOJ] investigations'.[24]

This is not to say that companies should disregard or be cavalier with foreign data privacy laws. But counsel should look for solutions to this issue. Where potential strategies exist – even creative ones – for obtaining relevant documents that are located abroad, United States authorities have clearly indicated they expect companies to do so to receive co-operation credit. This will almost always require coordination with skilled counsel in the relevant jurisdiction where the documents are located.

22 Remarks by Principal Deputy Assistant Attorney General for the Criminal Division Marshall L Miller at the Global Investigations Review conference, New York, N.Y., United States, 17 September 2014, available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/remarks-principal-deputy-assistant-attorney-general-criminal-division-marshall-l-miller.

23 Remarks by Assistant Attorney General Leslie R Caldwell at the Compliance Week Conference (19 May 2015), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/assistant-attorney-general-leslie-r-caldwell-delivers-remarks-compliance-week-conference.

24 Remarks by Assistant Attorney General Leslie R Caldwell at the American Bar Association's 30th Annual National Institute on White Collar Crime (4 March 2016), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/assistant-attorney-general-leslie-r-caldwell-speaks-american-bar-association-s-30th.

7

Witness Interviews in Internal Investigations: The UK Perspective

Caroline Day and Louise Hodges[1]

7.1 Introduction

Witness interviews are a key part of most corporate investigations. While documentary evidence can provide the underlying facts of a case, it is often the accounts given by witnesses that deliver the context and detail of what has happened. They can provide vital background information, shed light on the motivations of those involved and allow for an individual's credibility to be assessed. However, the timing, preparation, record-taking, content and use of the interviews need careful consideration.

Witness interviews can serve a number of purposes in the context of a corporate investigation, including:

- to scope the investigation;
- to understand the facts and issues;
- to understand accountability and defences; and
- to assess the credibility of individuals and their accounts.

Interviews in this context can present particular difficulties because of the myriad employment, criminal, civil and regulatory issues that can arise, and the fact that the interests of the company and the witness are often not aligned. These interviews are typically conducted confidentially and can be premised on a need to maintain legal privilege and the duty of confidence owed between an employer and employee. This can often be at odds with the expectations of some authorities for the company to provide details of the witnesses' accounts. There is often a tension between a company's right to conduct its own enquiries into allegations of wrongdoing, including interviewing its employees, and the suggestion by the authorities that its enquiries could (depending on how they are conducted) be detrimental to a criminal or regulatory investigation. In addition, the position surrounding legal privilege in the context of witness interviews has become more complex over the past few years following a number of court judgments.

1 Caroline Day and Louise Hodges are partners at Kingsley Napley LLP. The authors would like to thank Will Hayes, an associate at Kingsley Napley LLP, for assistance with this chapter.

This chapter explores these issues, considers the practices that can be adopted when conducting interviews and highlights some of the benefits and risks of these different approaches. It considers the preparation and formalities that may be required for witness interviews in the United Kingdom, and identifies particular complexities that can arise in global investigations when multiple jurisdictions are involved.

Types of interviews 7.2

Broadly speaking, witness interviews in corporate investigations can be split into two categories: preliminary or scoping interviews, and substantive interviews. Generally, they should be distinguished from any employment or disciplinary interviews.

Preliminary or scoping interviews may be appropriate at the outset of an investigation to seek background information, identify further sources of evidence, obtain a quick understanding and provide context to an allegation. These interviews will generally take place at the start of the investigation and, depending on the specific circumstances, may take place before any firm view has been reached on the terms of reference or extent of material that will be reviewed. They are more likely to be conducted with employees who may have knowledge of matters under investigation but are not at direct risk of any criticism. It may also be necessary to undertake interviews with whistleblowers at this stage.

See Chapter 19 on whistleblowers

Substantive interviews will generally take place after most, if not all, the relevant material has been reviewed. The purpose is to obtain a detailed understanding of what went on, to provide explanations of key documents in the case and, if necessary, to test the account given. These interviews will often be used to inform an understanding of any individual and corporate liability and any defences. The timing is important and can depend on a number of factors, including the available evidence, whether the authorities are already involved and whether civil and criminal proceedings are contemplated.

Deciding whether authorities should be consulted 7.3

The decision about whether to consult the authorities in advance of a witness interview is not dictated by statute; no statutory framework explicitly requires it and in general terms a company may manage its internal affairs and make enquiries as it sees fit. Therefore, this decision often rests on whether there is an implicit obligation on the company to notify the authorities under its regulatory reporting regime, or whether it is in the interests of the company to co-operate with the authorities by notifying them of any forthcoming interviews.

Regulated firms may be obliged to report a violation or allegation of wrongdoing. For example, the Solicitors Regulatory Authority's code of conduct requires a law firm to report any allegation of serious misconduct promptly, fully co-operate with its investigation and report any material change about the firm.[2] Accountants may hold similar obligations under the requirements of their regulators. There are reporting requirements under the Listing Rules for those companies admitted to trading on a regulated market,[3] and those in the regulated sector are required to submit a suspicious activity report if they know or suspect (or have reasonable grounds for knowing or suspecting) that another person is engaging in money laundering or terrorist financing.[4] Financial institutions regulated by the UK Financial Conduct Authority (FCA) must under Principle 11 of the FCA's Principles for Businesses act in an open and co-operative manner and disclose anything relating to the firm of which the regulator would reasonably expect notice.

The FCA's expectations under Principle 11 extend to requiring a firm to consider notifying it of a decision to investigate conduct concerns at the earliest opportunity. In November 2015, the Director in Enforcement at the FCA, suggested during a speech[5] that self-reporting is the bare minimum that is required and that a firm should discuss the scope of its investigation with the FCA as early as possible. He identified witness interviews as a key area of risk, suggesting that firms be alive to the possibility that their own investigation could prejudice or hinder a subsequent FCA investigation, and that firms should discuss this with the FCA before taking action. A firm should therefore consider its regulatory obligations when assessing if, and when, to consult its regulator regarding any proposed witness interviews.

During a speech at the 2nd Annual GIR Live London conference,[6] the then-Director in Enforcement at the FCA recognised that there are sometimes good reasons for firms to carry out their own investigations and that the FCA encourages this proactive approach and does not wish to interfere with a firm's legitimate procedures and controls. However, he reiterated that when conducting their own investigations, firms should ensure that they do not take steps that might prejudice or obstruct a subsequent FCA investigation and highlighted the importance of early communication in this regard.

The Serious Fraud Office (SFO) has similarly acknowledged that there are good and proper reasons for a company to carry out its own investigation[7] but has also referred to the potential dangers of an internal investigation 'churning up the crime scene', which could include the taking of first statements from witnesses

2 Solicitors Regulatory Authority (SRA) Code of Conduct, Chapter 10.

3 Also see Prospectus Rules and Disclosure and Transparency Rules.

4 Part 7 Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 and Part 3 Terrorism Act 2000.

5 Speech by Jamie Symington, then Director in Enforcement (Wholesale, Unauthorised Business and Intelligence), FCA, at the Pinsent Masons Regulatory Conference 2015, 5 November 2015.

6 Speech by Jamie Symington, then Director in Enforcement (Wholesale, Unauthorised Business and Intelligence), FCA at the 2nd Annual GIR Live, London, 28 April 2016.

7 Speech by Alun Milford, then SFO General Counsel, at the 14th Annual Corporate Accountability Conference, Congress Centre, London, 9 June 2016 (as reported by GIR on 10 June 2016).

in a way that influences their testimony.[8] In August 2019, the SFO published its Corporate Co-operation Guidance, which sets out how the SFO assesses co-operation from business entities and its potential benefits.[9] Within that there is an expectation by the SFO that companies would consult in a timely way before interviewing witnesses.

Camilla de Silva, Joint Head of Bribery and Corruption at the SFO, commented in a speech in 2018 that, in the context of the company handling the evidence: 'We need to understand the methodology, what's been captured and from where, the use of search terms and be provided with the metadata. [We a]ppreciate it's likely to be dynamic and not a complete set when you speak to us, so update us as you go along.' On contacting the SFO and the timing of this, she said: 'We will not be offering DPAs in cases of a late conversion to the joys of co-operating; DPAs are a reward for openness – the sooner you come in, self-report and the more you are open with us, the more you have to be rewarded for.' On consulting with the SFO, she said: 'We expect to discuss the scope of the investigation, to be notified of conduct which you uncover and what you ought to bring to our attention even if we don't ask, the sequencing of interviews and media contact.'[10]

Where the authorities are not yet aware of the allegations under review, it is likely that preliminary enquiries will be necessary before the company is in a position to reach a view as to whether to self-report. Where this includes witness interviews, it may be inappropriate for the authorities to be consulted in advance. This can create a tension between the authorities' expectations to be notified as well as the need for the company to bear in mind the risks of prejudicing a future investigation.

See Chapter 3 on self-reporting to authorities

Where an investigating authority is already involved, it is prudent for the company to consult or inform it prior to undertaking interviews. Increasingly the SFO and the FCA have sought to impose restrictions on the conduct of interviews in corporate investigations or to prevent them from taking place. While a company cannot be prevented from undertaking its own interviews, there is risk of criticism if it proceeds without the consent of the authority, particularly where it could be suggested that it has prejudiced an investigation. In particular, there may be circumstances where an investigating authority requests that the company refrain from conducting witness interviews during its investigation. The recent judgment handed down by Mr Justice Williams[11] in the DPA reached between SFO and Serco Geografix Ltd confirmed that: 'The SFO requested that Serco Group PLC and its constituent parts should not engage in any internal inquiry by way of interviewing witnesses during the criminal investigation. There was and continues

8 Speech by David Green QC, then Director of the SFO, at the GIR Roundtable: corporate internal investigations, 27 July 2015.

9 SFO Operational Handbook, Corporate Co-operation Guidance, https://www.sfo.gov.uk/download/corporate-co-operation-guidance/.

10 Speech by Camilla de Silva, SFO Joint Head of Bribery and Corruption, at the ABC Minds Financial Services conference, 15 March 2018.

11 SFO v. Serco Geografix Limited, Deferred Prosecution Agreement, (Case No. U20190413) [2019] 7 WLUK 45.

to be full compliance with that request. Rather, Serco Group PLC instructed an independent law firm to conduct a full document review and to provide the SFO with a detailed report of its findings.'[12]

7.4 Providing details of the interviews to the authorities

The introduction to the SFO's Corporate Co-operation Guidance sets out its expectations when assessing a company's level of co-operation:

> Co-operation means providing assistance to the SFO that goes above and beyond what the law requires. It includes: identifying suspected wrongdoing and criminal conduct together with the people responsible, regardless of their seniority or position in the organisation; reporting this to the SFO within a reasonable time of the suspicions coming to light; and preserving available evidence and providing it promptly in an evidentially sound format.[13]

In a section on 'Preserving and Providing Materials', in relation to a corporate dealing with individuals, the SFO's Corporate Co-operation Guidance lists the following indicators of good practice:

> i. To avoid prejudice to the investigation, consult in a timely way with the SFO before interviewing potential witnesses or suspects, taking personnel/HR actions or taking other overt steps.
> ii. Identify potential witnesses including third parties.
> iii. Refrain from tainting a potential witness's recollection, for example, by sharing or inviting comment on another person's account or showing the witness documents that they have not previously seen.
> iv. Make employees and (where possible) agents available for SFO interviews, including arranging for them to return to the UK if necessary.
> v. Provide the last-known contact details of ex-employees, agents and consultants if requested.[14]

When it comes to witness interviews, authorities often expect details of the interviews to be provided. It is therefore crucial to consider the purpose of the interview, its intended audience, record-keeping and, if appropriate, how this information is to be shared.

The SFO's Corporate Co-operation Guidance provides that: 'Organisations seeking credit for co-operation by providing witness accounts should additionally provide any recording, notes and/or transcripts of the interview and identify a witness competent to speak to the contents of each interview.'[15]

12 SFO v. Serco Geografix Limited, Deferred Prosecution Agreement,(Case No. U20190413) [2019] 7 WLUK 45 at para. 24.

13 SFO Operational Handbook, Corporate Co-operation Guidance at p. 1, https://www.sfo.gov.uk/download/corporate-co-operation-guidance/.

14 SFO Operational Handbook, Corporate Co-operation Guidance at p. 4, https://www.sfo.gov.uk/download/corporate-co-operation-guidance/.

There is no statutory duty on a company to co-operate with the authorities with respect to its witness interviews. Instead there is published guidance in the form of codes of practice, speeches and guidelines. This varies between authorities, but for the most part there is an expectation that details of witness accounts should be provided. As the SFO Director, Lisa Osofsky, commented in a recent speech: 'Co-operation is about making the path to admissible evidence easier. This is not rocket science. It is documents. It is financial records. It is witnesses.'[16]

This issue is considered in the Code of Practice on Deferred Prosecution Agreements (the Code)[17] jointly issued by the SFO and the Crown Prosecution Service. The Code states at 2.8.2(i) that co-operation with the authorities will include identifying relevant witnesses, disclosing their accounts and the documents shown to them and, 'where practicable', making witnesses available for interview when requested. The SFO has made clear its expectation that for a deferred prosecution agreement (DPA) to be considered, co-operation must be forthcoming. In the early months of her tenure Lisa Osofsky recalled that: 'I am often asked what prosecutors mean by full cooperation. At its simplest, it's not so hard: Tell me something I don't know. Help the prosecutor find the truth. Don't obstruct, or mislead, or delay. Don't hold things back.'[18]

In 2016, one of the SFO's Joint Heads of Bribery and Corruption at the time commented at a conference: 'There really is a pronounced difference now in the way companies are routinely approaching us – "we think we've got a problem and we're willing to work with you to find out, and if necessary resolve it", not "there's nothing to see here, good luck finding it."'[19] The former Director of the SFO noted in a speech in 2017 that a DPA would not be available to companies under investigation unless they offer 'genuine and demonstrable co-operation'.[20] During a speech in 2018, Camilla de Silva commented: 'To be clear, the co-operation we want is with our investigation into the suspected offence, not the company. This means that, at the end of the process, the company will have helped us move that investigation forward and, in so doing, made it easier for us to investigate and, if appropriate, prosecute other suspects.'[21] More recently, Lisa Osofsky confirmed the SFO's approach in a speech where she stated that companies needed to take

15 SFO Operational Handbook, Corporate Co-operation Guidance, at p. 5, https://www.sfo.gov.uk/download/corporate-co-operation-guidance/.

16 Speech by Lisa Osofsky, SFO Director, at the Royal United Services Institute, 3 April 2019.

17 SFO/CPS Deferred Prosecution Agreements Code of Practice, Crime and Courts Act 2013.

18 Speech by Lisa Osofsky, SFO Director, at the 35th International Conference on the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act in Washington, DC, 28 November 2018.

19 Speech by Ben Morgan, then Joint Head of Bribery and Corruption, SFO, at GIR Live New York, 15 September 2016.

20 Speech by David Green QC, then Director of the SFO, at the International Bar Association's anti-corruption conference, Paris, 13 June 2017 (as reported by GIR on 13 June 2017).

21 Speech by Camilla de Silva, SFO Joint Head of Bribery and Corruption, at the ABC Minds Financial Services conference, 15 March 2018.

certain steps for their efforts to count as co-operation: 'First, in carrying out their own investigation, we need to see the ultimate objective of cooperating with law enforcement by preserving vital evidence such as first-hand accounts and witness testimony.'[22]

While the SFO has clearly set out its expectations to be told what witnesses have to say in interviews with particular emphasis on 'first accounts',[23] what is less clear is how the detail of the accounts should be imparted and the level of detail that is required. The SFO has been inconsistent in its approach. In the case of SFO v. ICBC SB,[24] it was sufficient for oral reports of first-account witness evidence to be provided by the bank to the SFO to enable full co-operation to be established.[25] Alun Milford, former general counsel at the SFO, noted the bank's commitment to supply all relevant non-privileged material and provision of summaries of witness first accounts as an example of its co-operation.[26]

Summaries of witness interviews were similarly supplied by Rolls-Royce in the context of its DPA reached in January 2017.[27] In his judgment, Sir Brian Leveson, then President of the Queen's Bench Division, noted that the company had demonstrated 'extraordinary cooperation', referring to the disclosure of interview memoranda (on a limited waiver basis) as an example of this.[28] The judgment also made reference to the company 'co-operating with the SFO's requests in respect of the conduct of the internal investigation, to include the timing of and recording of interviews and reporting findings on a rolling basis'.[29] This was referenced further in a speech in 2016 by the then Joint Head of Bribery and Corruption: '[T]hey made available to us written accounts of interviews that took place during the evidence gathering exercise, enabling us to understand both what had happened and the strength of the various accounts given about that.'[30] While the SFO acknowledged its acceptance of summary witness accounts instead of transcripts in the DPAs for Standard Bank and Rolls-Royce, at a conference in April 2017, the former SFO General Counsel refuted suggestions that it would be

22 Speech by Lisa Osofsky, SFO Director, at the Royal United Services Institute, 3 April 2019.

23 Speech by Alun Milford, then SFO General Counsel, to an audience of compliance professionals at the European Compliance and Ethics Institute, Prague, 29 March 2016.

24 Serious Fraud Office v. Standard Bank Plc (Now known as ICBC Standard Bank plc): Deferred Prosecution Agreement (Case No. U20150854).

25 Speech by Ben Morgan, then Joint Head of Bribery and Corruption, SFO, at the Managing Risk and Mitigating Litigation Conference 2015, 1 December 2015.

26 Speech by Alun Milford, then SFO General Counsel, at the Handelsbatt Conference 2016, 14 September 2016.

27 SFO v. Rolls-Royce Plc, Deferred Prosecution Agreement (Case No. U20170036) [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249.

28 SFO v. Rolls-Royce Plc, Deferred Prosecution Agreement (Case No. U20170036) [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249 at para. 121.

29 SFO v. Rolls-Royce Plc, Deferred Prosecution Agreement (Case No. U20170036) [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249 at para. 121.

30 Speech by Ben Morgan, then Joint Head of Bribery and Corruption, SFO, at a seminar for General Counsel and Compliance Counsel from corporates and financial institutions, at Norton Rose Fulbright, 8 March 2017.

standard practice in all cases[31] and similarly commented in November 2017 that it is not the case that summaries will always be sufficient.[32]

In the case of SFO v. XYZ Ltd,[33] oral summaries were provided without the company's badge of 'genuine co-operation' being compromised. However, the SFO's decision to accept oral proffers in this case has more recently been subject to judicial scrutiny. In R (on the application of AL) v. SFO,[34] a judicial review was brought against the SFO for failing to pursue XYZ Ltd for non-compliance with its DPA. The terms of the DPA required the company to disclose to the SFO all information and material in its possession that is 'not protected by a valid claim of legal professional privilege or any other applicable legal protection'. Having accepted oral summaries, and following a number of attempts to pursue the full set of notes, the SFO decided to cease pursuing the full set of notes. The SFO's position in defending the judicial review was that there was no need to obtain the interview notes because XYZ's claims of privilege were 'not obviously wrong', and that it had exercised legitimate prosecutorial discretion in accepting the summaries. Although the application was quashed on the grounds that alternative remedies in the Crown Court were available, and therefore judicial review was not the appropriate action to take, the SFO was criticised in the judgment for not pursuing the disclosure. Mr Justice Green described the provision of summaries as an alternative as 'highly artificial' and questioned the SFO's decision not to take a more robust stance. The SFO was similarly criticised for its failure to challenge the assertion of privilege and require the notes in circumstances where it believed the material not to be privileged. The observations made by the High Court will no doubt encourage the SFO to take a robust approach to the disclosure of interview notes and claims to privilege; while the SFO's approach has not always been consistent, it is unlikely that the SFO would accept oral summaries for key witnesses in future.

Despite the inconsistency in how details of accounts have been disclosed to the SFO, in recent years the SFO has been clear that in order to be considered for a DPA, co-operation is required. Its former General Counsel said in a speech in 2017, '[w]e have been clear and consistent that only co-operative companies will ever be offered the opportunity of entering into a DPA with us.'[35] In (SFO) R v. Sweett Group PLC (unreported), Sweett Group's refusal to hand over details of the witness interviews undertaken during its internal investigation was deemed unco-operative by the SFO. The level and extent of co-operation with the SFO will ultimately be determined case by case.

31 Speech by Alun Milford, then SFO General Counsel, at GIR London Live, 27 April 2017 (reported by GIR on 27 April 2017).

32 Speech by Alun Milford, then SFO General Counsel, at the Cambridge Symposium on Economic Crime 2017, Jesus College, Cambridge, 4 September 2017.

33 SFO v. XYZ Limited, Deferred Prosecution Agreement (Case No. U20150856).

34 R (on the application of AL) v. Serious Fraud Office [2018] EWHC 85.

35 Speech by Alun Milford, then SFO General Counsel, at the Cambridge Symposium on Economic Crime 2017, Jesus College, Cambridge, 4 September 2017.

The FCA similarly expects regulated firms to provide notification of any significant matters that occur in the context of an internal investigation, in accordance with its Principle 11 obligation. While this does not explicitly apply to witness interviews, the FCA Enforcement Guide makes clear that if the FCA is ultimately asked to rely on submissions or an investigation report in the context of its own decision-making powers, it would ordinarily expect the firm to provide the underlying material, which could include notes of witness interviews, in addition to the report itself.[36] While the level of information will undoubtedly differ from case to case, the FCA has indicated that an oral report may not be sufficient and that information should be shared in a transparent manner, with a proper record.[37] Furthermore, if an individual performing a controlled function or a member of senior management is suspended, a firm must submit a Form C explaining the reasons for suspension.[38]

The guidance surrounding co-operation with the authorities and what is expected is evolving. In cases where the company or its employees are at risk of further investigation, prosecution or civil action, the company will want to consider the benefits that early co-operation may bring. However, whether it is in the interests of the company to co-operate will depend on the facts of each case.

7.5 Identifying witnesses and the order of interviews

Where interviews are to be conducted, the company or its representatives, or both, should seek to interview all company personnel who were involved in the facts under investigation, including those who should have been involved by virtue of their position. Reporting lines of those involved should also be considered. The witness list may expand as more information becomes known, and therefore should be reviewed regularly.

Employees generally have a duty to co-operate and are likely to owe a duty of candour towards their employer, and a failure to comply could result in disciplinary action.

See Chapter 19 on whistleblowers

Where there is a whistleblower, it may be preferable to interview him or her at the start of the process. The structure of an investigation is very fact-specific, but, broadly, the order of other interviews should be based on the level of risk that the witness poses to the business, beginning with those who present the least risk to the company. For the most part this is likely to follow levels of seniority, starting with lower-level employees and leaving senior management until later. Timing considerations sometimes mean witness interviews need to be taken out of the normal order. For instance, it is generally advisable to ensure that any employees who may be about to leave the company (either permanently or for temporary absence such as maternity leave) are interviewed beforehand and while they still owe a duty to the company to co-operate. In circumstances where there are a number of individuals to be interviewed, consideration should be given to the creation of a 'leavers list' to ensure that potential witnesses who resign from the company are flagged to those undertaking the witness interviews.

36 FCA Enforcement Guide, para. 3.26.

37 Speech by Jamie Symington, then Director in Enforcement (Wholesale, Unauthorised Business and Intelligence), FCA, at the Pinsent Masons Regulatory Conference 2015, 5 November 2015.

38 SUP 10.13 Changes to an approved person's details.

See Section 7.6

The benefit of this approach is that the company may be better positioned to obtain an overall sense of the extent of the issues before focusing on particular areas of risk. Lower-level employees are generally more likely to communicate openly, although it is important that sensitive or confidential information is not referred to unless strictly necessary as there is risk that information may be shared.

While it may be appropriate to conduct early interviews with senior employees to obtain initial accounts (particularly where there is likely to be more than one opportunity to interview), generally members of senior management should be interviewed when the investigation is further advanced. Typically, senior employees are more likely to pose a greater risk from the perspective of corporate liability and therefore it is important that any potential risks are identified beforehand. Under the principle of identification, in the United Kingdom a company can be criminally responsible for the actions of those employees that represent the 'directing mind and will' of that company,[39] generally restricted to board directors, the managing director and other senior officers who carry out management functions on the company's behalf.[40] The principle of identification is explored in more detail in Chapter 1.

This can cause difficulties when interviewing board members and senior management who may be the 'client' for the purposes of the investigation but who may need to be interviewed in the context of their own involvement. For the most part this can be avoided by identifying the 'client' at the outset of the case as made up of a group of senior employees or board members with no involvement in matters under investigation. However, depending on the size of the company and the nature of the case, this is sometimes unavoidable and therefore the basis on which the interview is being conducted must be made clear to the witness.

See Chapter 5 on beginning an internal investigation

There are a number of statutory exceptions to the principle of identification, and the government has been examining the case for reform of the law on corporate liability for economic crime;[41] at the time of writing, however, the Ministry of Justice had yet to publish its response to the Call for Evidence.[42] Under section 7 of the Bribery Act 2010, a corporate can be criminally liable for failing to prevent the acts of its employees or agents unless it can show that it had adequate procedures in place to prevent bribery from taking place. Two corporate offences of facilitating tax evasion under the Criminal Finances Act 2017[43] also adopt a failure-to-prevent model, with criminal liability attaching for the acts of persons acting on the company's behalf unless the corporate can show it had reasonable

39 Lennards Carrying Co and Asiatic Petroleum [1915] AC 705, Bolton Engineering Co v. Graham [1957] 1 QB 159 (per Denning LJ) and R v. Andrews Weatherfoil 56 Cr App R 31 CA.

40 Tesco Supermarkets Ltd v. Nattrass [1972] AC 153.

41 Call for evidence: Corporate and Economic Crime – 13 January 2017 to 31 March 2017.

42 HM Government, National Economic Crime Plan 2019-22, July 2019.

43 Sections 45 and 46, Criminal Finances Act 2017.

prevention procedures in place. Similarly a corporate can be guilty of corporate manslaughter if the management or organisation of its activities causes a person's death, and amounts to a gross breach of a duty of care owed by the organisation to the deceased.[44] When the issues under investigation fall within the statutory exceptions, it can be difficult to identify the appropriate individual to interview on behalf of the company. Again, the purpose of the interview and the basis on which it is being conducted needs to be made clear from the outset.

Senior employees are also more likely to owe fiduciary duties to the company and potentially be liable for breaches of those duties and become defendants in civil proceedings by the company. As a result, these interviews should generally take place when the company is in a better position to identify the extent of any breaches.

See Chapter 5 on beginning an internal investigation

Relevant information could also be sourced through interviews with third parties including former employees, customers and contractors. The obvious benefit is that these witnesses may be more forthcoming where there is no risk of disciplinary proceedings. However, third parties cannot generally be required to attend an interview, and unless there is a contractual obligation requiring their attendance, they could refuse to attend. Even in circumstances where a contractual obligation exists this could be difficult to enforce, as could a confidentiality clause. The interview process itself is likely to notify the third party of the investigation and the subject matter under review and depending on the nature of the relationship, it may not be appropriate to interview him or her at that time, particularly when the decision on self-reporting is outstanding. The timing of these interviews would depend on the facts of each case.

7.6 When to interview

The timing of interviews can be influenced by a number of factors, including the stage of the investigation and whether or not any record of interview would be covered by legal privilege. Scoping interviews usually take place at the outset of an investigation, most likely with a few individuals who have a general knowledge of the subject matter under investigation.

See Section 7.11 and Chapter 35 on privilege

Substantive interviews are likely to be most effective once the bulk of any document review has taken place. This will allow for any key documents to be identified and put to the witness, and for questions to focus on the areas of risk. Furthermore it is best to plan for only one interview; while there may be circumstances where a second or third interview is appropriate, it is by no means guaranteed that the witness would agree.

Timing of the interviews can pose particular difficulties when there are competing considerations. For example, it may be necessary to delay when the company has a claim for injunctive relief against individuals, to avoid assets being dissipated in advance of a freezing order being granted. However, it could be that there is only a limited amount of time to interview an employee who is leaving the company or the company may need to speak to an individual at short notice to assist in an assessment of whether to self-report. Clearly such factors need to be prioritised.

44 Section 1, Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007.

It is important to allow for a degree of flexibility as certain factors outside the company's control can dictate when an interview should take place. Where the corporate investigation is likely to remain an internal review, there is little risk to the company conducting interviews to a timetable that suits it, although the company will wish to consider whether legal privilege would apply. Where there is suspicion of a criminal or regulatory violation and a formal investigation has commenced, there are a number of risks associated with conducting interviews in parallel with these investigations.

See Section 7.11 and Chapter 35 on privilege

As a general point, any interviews with individuals at risk of criminal exposure should be postponed until all evidence has been secured, to minimise the risk of evidence being destroyed. This is particularly important where a criminal or regulatory investigation is likely. Similar concerns apply where the individuals are potential defendants to civil proceedings by the company.

Both the SFO and the FCA place significant emphasis on the first accounts of witnesses, and take the view that they can help inform an understanding of what went on and allow for the accuracy or integrity of a witness to be tested.[45] However, depending on the facts of the case, this view can often be misplaced; the first account given by a witness is not necessarily always the best one, particularly in complex investigations that span a number of years and where there is extensive underlying material. The quality of a witness's evidence can often be improved having been given the opportunity to review the evidence and recall the context. Nonetheless, the SFO and FCA have increasingly sought to place restrictions on interviews of key suspects in corporate investigations and may seek to prevent them altogether.

In such circumstances it may be prudent for a company to seek to agree an approach with the authorities prior to conducting any interviews.

The authorities are also increasingly sensitive to the risks of witness contamination, and a company whose conduct of witness interviews has caused prejudice to a criminal or regulatory investigation could be subject to serious criticism. At best this could involve comment or views that are unhelpful for the company; at worst this could include allegations of perverting the course of justice. In 2016, the then-Director in Enforcement at the FCA, observed that firms must take care not to take steps that might prejudice an FCA investigation and suggested that in certain circumstances it may prefer that a firm does not commission its own investigation, for example, in criminal investigations where alerting the suspects could have adverse consequences.[46] Mark Steward, Director of Enforcement and Oversight at the FCA has commented on the importance of an 'independent public body

45 Speech by Alun Milford, then General Counsel, SFO, to an audience of compliance professionals at the European Compliance and Ethics Institute, Prague, 29 March 2016.

46 Speech by Jamie Symington, then Director in Enforcement (Wholesale, Unauthorised Business and Intelligence), FCA at the 2nd Annual GIR Live London, 28 April 2016.

investigation' being able to conduct itself without 'the crime scene being trampled over'.[47] The SFO has similarly made clear that corporate investigations that 'trample over the crime scene' are unhelpful and that integrity of evidence, especially regarding witness accounts, should be respected,[48] and has noted that internal investigations may result in first statements of witnesses being taken, delivered or recorded in a form which may be less than full and accurate, as opposed to recording the account by way of a transcript.[49] Camilla de Silva, during a speech in 2018, commented: 'The data needs to be identified, collected, preserved and analysed in a way that does not tip off potential suspects into deleting data and protects its integrity and continuity.'[50]

Witness interviews should always be conducted in a manner that minimises the risk of contamination or prejudice.

When a criminal or regulatory investigation is anticipated or already under way, a company may wish to consider engaging with the authorities at an early stage to avoid any criticism that might follow. However, engaging with the authorities may not necessarily be appropriate in every case and runs the risk of loss of control. Each case will need to be assessed on its specific facts and surrounding circumstances.

7.7 Planning for an interview

Interviews in the context of a corporate investigation can be conducted by various people: internal or external lawyers, accountants, forensic experts, specialist investigators, HR or compliance officers, and others. Careful thought should be given to who is best placed to undertake them.

As a general rule, where a company is engaged in a corporate investigation into allegations of criminal or regulatory misconduct, it is preferable to have lawyers (internal, external or both) present at interviews to take notes and identify the key risk areas, to enable confidentiality, and for any claim to privilege to be strengthened. Generally it is preferable for the same person or persons to conduct the interviews of those witnesses who provide similar types of information. This will allow for consistency of approach and for the credibility of witnesses to be more readily assessed. It is also preferable to have two interviewers present to allow for one to take notes while the other asks questions.

Where external lawyers have been instructed, they should generally conduct the interviews. External lawyers often bring (and importantly are seen to bring) expertise, objectivity and independence, which can be very important when 47 Speech by Mark Steward, Director of Enforcement and Oversight at the FCA, at the 14th Annual Corporate Accountability Conference, Congress Centre, London, 9 June 2016 (as reported by GIR on 10 June 2016).

48 Speech by Ben Morgan, then Joint Head of Bribery and Corruption at the SFO, at the Global Anti-Corruption and Compliance in Mining Conference 2015 on 20 May 2015.

49 Speech by David Green QC, then Director of the SFO, at the GIR Roundtable, 27 July 2015.

50 Speech by Camilla de Silva, SFO Joint Head of Bribery and Corruption, at the ABC Minds Financial Services conference, 15 March 2018.

assessing the credibility of the investigation. Although it can bring a degree of formality that can make the experience more daunting for the witness, the use of external lawyers will strengthen a claim to legal privilege.

Where external lawyers have not been instructed, the company may consider resourcing the process internally either by using compliance personnel, internal auditors or HR officers or by using in-house lawyers. Either way, those conducting the interview should not have had any involvement in the allegations under review. While the use of non-lawyers may decrease the levels of concern among employees, in general they may be less skilled in conducting these types of interviews and less familiar with the issues that may arise. In-house lawyers will have a good understanding of the business and legal advice given to the company will generally be privileged in the United Kingdom. However, the protection of legal privilege will not apply to advice given by in-house lawyers in the context of European Commission related investigations,[51] and it may be necessary in those circumstances to engage external lawyers.

See Section 7.11 and Chapter 35 on privilege

Where forensic experts (internal or external) are also engaged it may be prudent to involve them in interviews with key individuals. If so, it is generally advisable for these interviews to be conducted alongside internal or external lawyers to ensure that the contents can be covered by the company's confidentiality and privilege, as appropriate, and to strengthen a claim to this privilege.

Prior to the interview, a core bundle of documents relevant to the particular witness should be prepared. Consideration should be given to whether the witness is given access to documents, either before or during an interview, or as part of staged disclosure, and what documents, if any, should be put to the witness. Referring to documents can be a very useful tool to assist in refreshing a witness's memory and to allow for specific comment. Key documents can be put to provide a better understanding of its content and to give an opportunity for the witness to provide explanation.

In general, copies of confidential or sensitive documents should not be given to witnesses where there is a risk these could be shared or used contrary to the company's interests. In complex matters, providing pre-interview disclosure will enable the witness to prepare; however, where documents are provided to the witness, this should be done on a restricted and confidential basis with the requirement that they are either returned or destroyed at the conclusion of the interview. It is preferable that a witness is not given documents that he or she has not previously seen.

See Chapters 5 and 6 on beginning an internal investigation and Chapter 11 on production of information to authorities

The provision of documents may give rise to data protection issues, particularly in light of the company's obligations under the data protection principles[52] and where multiple jurisdictions are involved.

A detailed interview plan can be useful to ensure that all relevant questions are put to the witness, although the interviewer should not feel restricted by this. In general, topics should be addressed in a chronological order that develops facts in a logical way.

51 Akzo Nobel Chemicals Ltd and Akcros Chemicals Ltd v. European Commission, Case C-550/07 P.

52 Article 5, General Data Protection Regulation.

Regarding the provision of topics in advance of an interview, it is generally helpful to indicate the main areas that may be covered to assist the witness to prepare, particularly where the subject matter is complex. However, giving a list of detailed questions is generally not appropriate, and a witness who has had the opportunity to script his or her answers is less likely to be considered credible. Furthermore, questions are likely to evolve as the interview progresses. There is also a risk that the questions might be shared.

Interviewers should ask questions in a measured and courteous manner with a clear and professional tone. There is little point in adopting an aggressive approach or engaging in lengthy cross-examination; this is unlikely to be effective and could give rise to criticism, or employment or personal injury claims. A skilled interviewer will seek to put the witness at ease before addressing the key topics. Where there are two interviewers, different interviewing styles can often be effective.

7.8 Conducting the interview: formalities and separate counsel

Professional obligations can affect how witness interviews are conducted. Solicitors have a general duty to act in their client's best interests,[53] they must not take unfair advantage of a third party,[54] and they must not take unfair advantage of an opposing party's lack of legal knowledge where they have not instructed a lawyer.[55] These duties do not always align and it is therefore important to balance the competing requirements.

The interviewer should be satisfied that the witness understands the basis on which he or she is being interviewed, the purpose of the interview and the use that could be made of the information provided, because this may impact its admissibility.

In the United States, an Upjohn warning is given at the start of the interview, where lawyers are present. This practice is often adopted in many investigations in the United Kingdom, even where there is no involvement of US authorities at that time. The warning sets out that:

- The lawyers represent the company and not the employee/witness.
- Privilege in the interview belongs to the company and not the employee.
- The company might choose to waive its privilege and disclose matters discussed in interview to the authorities.

Upjohn warnings derive from the case of Upjohn Co v. United States,[56] where it was held that the privilege that attaches to communications between a company's lawyers and its employees is the company's privilege, and not that of its employees.

53 Principle 4, SRA mandatory principles.

54 Chapter 11, SRA Code of Conduct.

55 Chapter 11, SRA Code of Conduct.

56 Upjohn Co. v. United States, 449 U.S. 383 (1981).

While there is no formal requirement for these warnings to be given in the United Kingdom, it is considered best practice to do so.

The witness should be reminded of the confidential nature of the interview and, where appropriate, be told that it is a fact-finding exercise. However, where a company has decided to waive privilege prior to the interview and provide details to the authorities, the Upjohn warning may need to be strengthened. The company could consider whether to give a more formal caution, similar to that given by the police when investigating suspects, although this would rarely be required. If necessary, the witness should be told that while not part of a disciplinary process, the information provided could inform a decision on whether to instigate disciplinary action.

The company should consider whether its own legal advisers can advise the witness or whether to allow the witness to have his or her own lawyer in attendance. The company may wish to offer to pay for the independent legal adviser. Clearly a company cannot prevent its employees obtaining legal advice of their own volition and expense; however, it can control who can be present in an internal interview. If an authority investigation is under way, the witness may have contractual rights or rights under an insurance policy (D&O insurance) to fund an independent legal adviser. Former employees may have an indemnification or contractual right as part of their exit package.

Those witnesses who appear to be at little risk of criminal or regulatory exposure are unlikely to need independent counsel to protect them against any risk of self-incrimination, and the provision of an Upjohn warning or a similarly worded preamble should suffice. However, a company may nonetheless offer separate legal advice to these witnesses if this would allay their concerns or ensure that appropriate advice is given (including from an employment or civil perspective). Perhaps most importantly, an independent adviser's role will assist preparation and increase the likelihood that the individual will give their best account. Moreover, it is often not easy to predict where risks may be at an early stage.

The provision of separate counsel is particularly important where there may be a conflict of interest between the company and a witness. This can arise where a witness is a whistleblower or at risk of criminal or regulatory investigation or where the company could be implicated in corporate wrongdoing. In these circumstances the interests of the company and the witness may not align and it would be prudent to consider suggesting independent counsel. While this might delay the interview to allow advice to be given, it ensures that the witness has had the opportunity to obtain his or her own legal advice and, depending on the facts, could make the interview more effective. However, the involvement of an independent legal adviser could also result in the witness being less inclined to attend the interview or answer questions, although an employee would then be at risk of disciplinary action for not co-operating.

The decision when to offer independent legal advice can also depend on the account given by the witness, and it may be appropriate to stop interviews if witnesses give an account that indicates that the company has a potential civil claim against them or that they are making potentially criminal admissions.

Ultimately it would be difficult for witnesses to assert that they had not been fully informed where they had been separately represented, or that the interviewer or company had taken an unfair advantage.

7.9 Conducting the interview: whether to caution the witness

Where a witness may be suspected of involvement in a criminal offence, a caution may be considered. A caution is used by police officers and other investigators when conducting interviews of suspects to ensure that any resulting account (or refusal to answer questions) is admissible in criminal proceedings.[57]

Section 67(9) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (PACE) provides that 'persons other than police officers who are charged with the duty of investigating offences' shall have regard to the relevant provisions of the PACE Codes of Practice, and Code C 10.1 of the Codes sets out the requirement to caution.

This duty applies to SFO investigators,[58] but is not restricted to state authorities and can also apply to private store detectives[59] and commercial investigators who are appointed by a company to investigate its employees for the commission of criminal offences.[60] Importantly, however, it does not apply in the context of an internal investigation where the sole purpose is to determine what recommendations should be made to an internal disciplinary panel.[61] It is therefore unlikely to apply in circumstances where an employer investigates allegations that could give rise to disciplinary action and where the sole purpose of the investigation was to inform the company how to respond.

Where criminal offences are being considered, section 67(9) would only apply if the investigator was charged with investigating or charging criminal offences at the time.[62] This scenario would arise in circumstances where the interviews had been delegated to those conducting the investigation and where they were effectively acting on behalf of a criminal authority. It would require the authorities to sanction the taking of a suspect's account with a view to it being used in a criminal trial. In light of the authorities' general reluctance for a company to conduct interviews with suspects, particularly when it involves obtaining first accounts, it is unlikely that this situation would arise, and therefore a caution is unlikely to be required.

7.10 Conducting the interview: record-keeping

A record can be kept of a witness interview in a number of ways. It could be audio-recorded and transcribed. A verbatim record would exist, removing the risk of any challenge to the accuracy of what was said, and the recording would capture the tone and any pause or emphasis, which can often give context and allow 57 Code C, 10.1 PACE Codes of Practice.

58 R v. Director of the Serious Fraud Office, ex p Saunders [1988] Crim LR 837.

59 Bayliss (1993) 98 Cr App R 235.

60 Twaites and Brown (1990) 92 Cr App R 106.

61 R v. Welcher [2007] EWCA Crim 480.

62 R v. Seelig [1992] 1 WLR 148 and Joy v. Federation against Copyright Theft [1993] Crim LR 588.

for an overall assessment. However, it could affect the witness's account by adding an element of formality, potentially having an unsettling effect on the interviewee and making him or her less forthcoming. More importantly, there is significant uncertainty over whether legal privilege would apply to a recording, particularly where the interview has been conducted as a fact-finding exercise. Even where privilege can be properly asserted, it is likely to be challenged by the authorities, and where a transcript exists, the authorities are likely to request a copy.

See Section 7.11 and Chapter 35 on privilege

An alternative approach is for the legal adviser to prepare a note of what the witness has said. Legal privilege is more likely to apply in circumstances where notes contain some form of legal comment, advice and analysis. This may include the lawyer's own impressions and assessment of the interview. Alternatively two sets of notes could be prepared, one containing the factual account and one containing the lawyer's own views. If so, at a minimum, the authorities are likely to seek a copy of the factual account.

The company will need to decide whether to provide the witness with a copy of the note. Where it is likely to rely on the witness's testimony in civil proceedings, it may be helpful to agree a note at an early stage to limit any future challenge to its accuracy. This carries the risk that it may be passed on and any applicable privilege would be lost, and may cause issues if the account is materially disputed.

Where proceedings are anticipated, there are some advantages in preparing a witness statement at an early stage. If the witness decides at a later date not to co-operate or for whatever reason he or she is no longer able to assist, the company may be able to rely on the evidence given, or compel the witness to attend and give evidence having already taken a record of the witness's evidence. However, even if privilege can be maintained, it is likely the authorities would nevertheless seek a copy.

Legal privilege in the context of witness interviews 7.11

Legal privilege in the context of witness interviews raises a number of complex issues and a claim to privilege will be closely scrutinised by the authorities. Over the past few years, the SFO has claimed that it does not want to undermine legal privilege, which is respected as a legal principle and fundamental right. In a speech made in November 2018, Hannah von Dadelszen, then Joint Head of Fraud (now Head of Strategy and Policy) at the SFO, stated: 'We do not, and never have required the waiver of privilege, but if you want to waive privilege that will be viewed as a positive feature. We are very disinterested in privileged material that is the proper legal advice you are receiving from your solicitors.'[63] In June 2018, Camilla de Silva noted: 'Recent cases have highlighted that the SFO will challenge overly ambitious claims to privilege and, in specific circumstances, are obliged to do so.'[64] In March 2016, Alun Milford, then General Counsel of the SFO, made it very clear that the SFO will view 'false' or 'exaggerated' claims to privilege as unco-operative, and notwithstanding his acknowledgement that a claim may be well founded, where a company discloses details of witness accounts it will be viewed as a significant mark of co-operation.[65] Furthermore, a company's decision to structure its investigation so as not to attract privilege will be viewed as significant co-operation. Camilla de Silva noted: 'We are not interested in material that is genuinely privileged. We do however reserve the right to question, probe and where necessary challenge assertions of privilege which are[,] in our view, excessive.'[66]

63 Speech by Hannah von Dadelszen, then Joint Head of Fraud, at the Pinsent Masons Business Crime and Compliance conference, London, 9 November 2018.

64 Speech by Camilla de Silva, Joint Head of Bribery and Corruption, at the 12th International Pharmaceutical and Medical Device Compliance Congress, Vienna, 14 May 2018.

In a section on 'Witness Accounts and Waiving Privilege', the SFO's Corporate Co-operation Guidance states:

> In conducting internal investigations, some organisations will have obtained accounts from individuals. . . . Organisations seeking credit for co-operation by providing witness accounts should additionally provide any recording, notes and/or transcripts of the interview and identify a witness competent to speak to the contents of each interview.[67]

When an organisation elects not to waive privilege, the SFO nonetheless has obligations to prospective individual defendants regarding disclosable materials.

The existence of a valid privilege claim must be properly established. During the investigation, if the organisation claims privilege, it will be expected to provide certification by independent counsel that the material in question is privileged. If privilege is not waived, and a trial proceeds, where appropriate, the SFO will apply for a witness summons under section 2 of the Criminal Procedure (Attendance of Witnesses) Act 1965.

An organisation that does not waive privilege and provides witness accounts does not attain the corresponding factor against prosecution that is found in the DPA Code but will not be penalised by the SFO.

It is clear that if a company chooses not to co-operate with the SFO, it is much more likely that the company would not be offered a DPA, with Camilla de Silva stating that the SFO will only invite a company to enter into a DPA where that company has 'genuinely cooperated with the SFO' and that 'the DPA Code provides that co-operation will include identifying relevant witnesses, disclosing their accounts and the documents shown to them'.[68] This was echoed by Hannah

65 Speech by Alun Milford, then SFO General Counsel, to an audience of compliance professionals at the European Compliance and Ethics Institute, Prague, 29 March 2016.

66 Speech by Camilla de Silva, Joint Head of Bribery and Corruption, at the Herbert Smith Freehills Corporate Crime Conference 2018, 21 June 2018.

67 SFO Operational Handbook, Corporate Co-operation Guidance, at pp. 4-5, https://www.sfo.gov.uk/download/corporate-co-operation-guidance/.

68 Speech by Camilla de Silva, Joint Head of Bribery and Corruption, at the Herbert Smith Freehills Corporate Crime Conference 2018, 21 June 2018.

von Dadelszen in a recent speech, who confirmed: 'We are going to ask a lot of companies who self-report to us.'[69]

However, there is a risk that disclosing information relating to witness interviews could result in a waiver of privilege more generally. Ultimately the information could be shared with authorities in other jurisdictions or be disclosable in civil, or other, proceedings that may not be in the company's best interests. While this risk may in part be mitigated by a limited waiver agreement, this would not necessarily extend to other jurisdictions, and there is a risk that confidentiality may in due course be lost. The Law Society of England and Wales provides guidance to lawyers about their duty to act in the best interests of clients, including maintaining their claim to privilege.

The law surrounding legal privilege and records of interviews is complex and evolving. It has recently been made more complicated by the narrow interpretation of privilege that has been taken in several recent court decisions. These cases are summarised below.

See Chapter 35 on privilege

It was held in The RBS Rights Issue Litigation[70] that the interview notes prepared by the bank's legal representatives were not subject to legal advice privilege (it was accepted that litigation privilege did not apply). The court found that, for the purposes of legal advice privilege, the 'client' consists only of those employees authorised to seek and receive legal advice from the lawyer. In relation to interviews with witnesses, it found that privilege does not extend to information provided by employees and ex-employees outside the client group. Furthermore, it was held that in order for the lawyers' working notes of the interviews to attract legal advice privilege, the notes must contain 'some attribute or addition such as to betray or at least give a clue as to the trend of advice being given to the client by its lawyer'.[71] The court held that the bank had failed to demonstrate this.

This judgment was followed by the High Court in Director of the SFO v. ENRC.[72] At first instance, Mrs Justice Andrews rejected ENRC's argument that legal advice privilege applied to lawyers' notes of interviews, and found that the question of whether legal advice privilege applied was an evidential one as to whether the notes demonstrated the legal analysis and 'tenor' of the advice.[73] In her judgment, Andrews J referred to examples of the type of evidence required to attract legal advice privilege, to include a qualitative assessment of the evidence or any thoughts about its importance or relevance to the inquiry, or indications of further areas of investigation that the author of the notes considered might be fruitful. It was noted in the judgment that the betrayal of further lines of investigation would not in itself have been sufficient to render the notes privileged.[74]

69 Speech by Hannah von Dadelszen, then Joint Head of Fraud, at the Pinsent Masons Business Crime and Compliance conference, London, 9 November 2018.

70 The RBS Rights Issue Litigation [2016] EWHC 3161 (Ch).

71 The RBS Rights Issue Litigation [2016] EWHC 3161 (Ch) at para. 107.

72 Director of the SFO v. ENRC [2017] EWHC 1017 (QB); [2017] 1 WLR 4205.

73 Director of the SFO v. ENRC [2017] EWHC 1017 (QB); [2017] 1 WLR 4205 at para. 97.

74 Director of the SFO v. ENRC [2017] EWHC 1017 (QB); [2017] 1 WLR 4205 at para. 180.

Applying the case of Three Rivers (No. 5),[75] Andrews J held that legal advice privilege would only apply to communications between the lawyer and those authorised by the company to obtain legal advice on its behalf, and therefore not to employees or former employees more widely.[76]

Andrews J's decision was appealed, and although the Court of Appeal did not need to reach a decision on issues relating to legal advice privilege (because of its decision on litigation privilege, see further below in this section), it nevertheless gave its view (obiter) on how it would have decided those issues. The Court would have found that Three Rivers (No. 5) had been correctly interpreted by Andrews J (and by courts on other occasions) as having created a general rule that, in a corporate context, only the communications of those employees authorised by the company to seek and receive legal advice on its behalf are capable of attracting legal advice privilege.[77] On this basis, Andrews J was right to conclude that the interview notes were not covered by legal advice privilege. Significantly however, the Court gave a strong indication that it felt Three Rivers (No. 5) had been wrongly decided and would have been in favour of departing from that case had it been open to it to do so, although ultimately it felt this is a question that only the Supreme Court can determine.[78]

In addition, it had been argued by ENRC that the interview notes constituted lawyers' working papers and as such were covered by legal advice privilege. While Andrews J had rejected this argument at first instance, the Court of Appeal declined to give a view.[79]

ENRC's claim for litigation privilege was also rejected by Andrews J at first instance, who was not satisfied that, on the facts, litigation was in reasonable contemplation at the pertinent times or that, in any event, the dominant purpose of the documents coming into existence was for use in the conduct of litigation. The High Court held that an SFO investigation was seen as a preliminary step and that a prosecution only becomes a real prospect once evidence is discovered to substantiate the allegation, or where the accusations appear to be true.[80]

The Court of Appeal took a different approach to the availability of litigation privilege to ENRC's interview notes and disagreed with Andrews J's conclusion of the facts, holding that at the time the documents came into existence, ENRC did reasonably contemplate a prosecution by the SFO.[81] While the Court did not necessarily disagree with Andrews J's view that an SFO investigation in itself could not constitute adversarial litigation for the purposes of litigation privilege, it was of the view that:

75 Three Rivers District Council v. Governor and Company of the Bank of England (No. 5) [2003] EWCA Civ 474.

76 Director of the SFO v. ENRC [2017] EWHC 1017 (QB); [2017] 1 WLR 4205 at para. 180.

77 Director of the SFO v. ENRC [2018] EWCA Civ 2006; [2019] 1 WLR 791 at paras. 123 and 133.

78 Director of the SFO v. ENRC [2018] EWCA Civ 2006; [2019] 1 WLR 791 at para. 130.

79 Director of the SFO v. ENRC [2018] EWCA Civ 2006; [2019] 1 WLR 791 at para. 142.

80 Director of the SFO v. ENRC [2017] EWHC 1017 (QB); [2017] 1 WLR 4205 at paras. 150 to 163.

81 Director of the SFO v. ENRC [2018] EWCA Civ 2006; [2019] 1 WLR 791 at para. 93.

> When the SFO specifically makes clear to the company the prospect of its criminal prosecution (over and above the general principles set out in the [Self-Reporting] Guidelines), and legal advisers are engaged to deal with that situation, as in the present case, there is a clear ground for contending that criminal prosecution is in reasonable contemplation.[82]

In addition, although the Court did not accept ENRC's alternative argument that once an SFO investigation is in reasonable contemplation so too is a prosecution, it held that in this case the evidence 'pointed clearly towards the contemplation of a prosecution if the self-reporting process did not succeed in averting it'.[83] Furthermore, the Court did not feel that the uncertainty a company inevitably experiences when faced with whistleblower allegations is a bar to litigation privilege.[84] Finally, the Court deemed as erroneous Andrews J's suggestion that litigation privilege cannot apply until a defendant either knows the full details of what is likely to be unearthed or a decision to prosecute has been taken.[85]

As to whether the dominant purpose of the documents coming into existence was for conduct of the litigation, the Court of Appeal was satisfied that this requirement was met in this case and disagreed with Andrews J that ENRC had always intended to show the documents to the SFO, even though it had indicated that it would give full and frank disclosure. It held that just because solicitors prepare a document with the ultimate intention of showing it to the opposing party, that does not automatically deprive the preparatory legal work that they have undertaken of litigation privilege.[86] Of particular importance was the Court's view that documents prepared for the dominant purpose of avoiding or settling litigation are just as much covered by litigation privilege as those prepared for defending it.[87] The Court of Appeal concluded that the interview notes were covered by litigation privilege, as a prosecution by the SFO was in reasonable contemplation at the time they came into existence, and they were created for the dominant purpose of resisting or avoiding it.

ENRC provides very helpful guidance and several principles of wider application to assist corporates who find themselves in similar situations. However, it also highlights the extent to which questions of litigation privilege in the context of internal investigations turn on the facts (as indeed is the case with all questions of privilege).

Three other recent cases also illustrate the importance of the facts of the case when it comes to establishing the status of privilege, and a company should

82 Director of the SFO v. ENRC [2018] EWCA Civ 2006; [2019] 1 WLR 791 at para. 96.
83 Director of the SFO v. ENRC [2018] EWCA Civ 2006; [2019] 1 WLR 791 at para. 97.
84 Director of the SFO v. ENRC [2018] EWCA Civ 2006; [2019] 1 WLR 791 at para. 98.
85 Director of the SFO v. ENRC [2018] EWCA Civ 2006; [2019] 1 WLR 791 at para. 100.
86 Director of the SFO v. ENRC [2018] EWCA Civ 2006; [2019] 1 WLR 791 at paras. 102 and 112.
87 Director of the SFO v. ENRC [2018] EWCA Civ 2006; [2019] 1 WLR 791 at paras. 102, 113 and 118.

consider this throughout the internal investigation so it can better judge whether the notes of a witness interview are likely to be privileged at any stage.

In Bilta & Ors v. RBS & Anor,[88] the High Court's Chancery Division was concerned with the status of documents created during an internal investigation carried out by RBS's solicitors, relating to a tax dispute with Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs (HMRC). The documents included transcripts of interviews with employees and ex-employees that had come into existence following HMRC sending RBS a letter claiming there were sufficient grounds to deny it a certain amount of input tax. Bilta and various other claimants subsequently sought disclosure of these documents, which was resisted by RBS on the basis that they were subject to litigation privilege. The Court held that the documents were indeed protected by litigation privilege. As to whether litigation could be said to be reasonably in contemplation at the time the documents came into existence, the sending of HMRC's letter was considered significant and found to have marked a 'watershed moment', and was likened to a letter before claim. While RBS may also have hoped to dissuade HMRC from proceeding, it was found that this was only a subsidiary purpose subsumed into the dominant purpose.

In R (for and on behalf of the Health and Safety Executive) v. Paul Jukes,[89] following a fatality at work, solicitors instructed by the employer concerned carried out an investigation. A statement was obtained from the appellant Mr Jukes, a former manager, as part of the internal investigation, after the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) had begun its investigation but before it commenced proceedings. This statement was relied on heavily during the subsequent prosecution of the appellant, and following his conviction he appealed, partly on the basis that the trial judge had been wrong to allow the prosecution to rely on the statement, as it was protected by privilege. The Court of Appeal did not accept this argument and found that at the time the statement was made there was no evidence that anybody within the company knew what the company's and the HSE's investigations would unearth, such that it could be said that prosecution by the HSE was reasonably in contemplation. It was held that the statement was not therefore protected by litigation privilege.

In Jukes, the Court of Appeal approved part of the first instance ENRC decision. The Court of Appeal in ENRC addressed this potential issue but felt that its conclusions were not invalidated by Jukes, on the basis that the endorsement of Andrews J's judgment in that case had been obiter.

Notes of interviews and the status of privilege were further considered by the High Court in R (on the application of AL) v. SFO.[90] A judicial review was brought against the SFO for failing to pursue an anonymised company, XYZ Ltd, for non-compliance with its DPA through not disclosing the full interview notes, having instead accepted oral proffers.[91] The SFO's position was that there was no need to obtain the interview notes because XYZ's claims of privilege were 'not obviously wrong',[92] and that it had exercised legitimate prosecutorial discretion in accepting the oral proffers. In the judgment, the SFO was criticised for (among other things) its failure to challenge the assertion of privilege and require the notes in circumstances where it believed the material not to be privileged. It was found that, even if the assertion of privilege could be made out (which, in light of recent case law, the court said was not supported), by providing oral summaries the privilege had been waived. The judgment noted the SFO's failure to fully consider whether to require XYZ to waive privilege over the notes, given its contractual duty to co-operate under the DPA,[93] and whether privilege had been waived, even on a limited basis.

88 Bilta & Ors v. RBS & Anor [2017] EWHC 3535 (Ch).

89 R (for and on behalf of the Health and Safety Executive) v. Paul Jukes, [2018] EWCA Crim 176.

90 R (on the application of AL) v. SFO [2018] EWHC 856 (Admin).

At the time of writing and in the absence of any further judicial interpretation, those conducting internal investigations should therefore be conscious that a claim to privilege of records of interviews with those outside the client group could be subject to challenge, notwithstanding the helpful decision of the Court of Appeal in ENRC, and whether a claim to privilege will be successful will depend on the facts of each case. Where the records could be said to form part of the lawyer's working papers in the context of advice, a claim to legal advice privilege would be strengthened if the notes contained sufficient legal analysis, assessment as to relevance and the 'tenor' of the legal advice. Legal advice privilege will also attach to material that forms part of the continuum of the lawyer–client communications even where those documents do not expressly seek or convey legal advice.[94] For litigation privilege to apply, however, litigation must be in reasonable contemplation, and the dominant purpose of the interviews must be the conduct of that litigation. This will depend on the facts of the case, but where litigation is in contemplation, this should be documented to assist in defending any challenge to a claim for privilege.

See Chapter 35 on privilege

Factors that may strengthen a claim to privilege over interview notes include where, for example, notes arise from interviews with likely potential defence witnesses in contemplated litigation or where interviews are conducted with a view to assessing the potential risk the witness may pose in likely proceedings.

Those conducting investigations may wish to consider the timing of witness interviews in the context of when the likelihood of litigation (civil or criminal) is clearer, in the absence of which there is a risk that claims to privilege of records of witness interviews will be challenged.

Where privilege can be established, the best position may be to ensure that any notes taken during interviews are done so as to strengthen a claim to privilege

91 SFO v. XYZ Ltd (Case No. U20150856). The defendant was subsequently identified in July 2019 as Sarclad Ltd following the acquittals of three Sarclad employees.

92 R (on the application of AL) v. SFO [2018] EWHC 856 (Admin) at para. 7.

93 R (on the application of AL) v. SFO [2018] EWHC 856 (Admin) at para. 26.

94 Balabel v. Air India [1988] 1 Ch 317.

and to leave any decision on whether to waive privilege until the course of the investigation and interests of the authorities are clearer.

7.12 Conducting the interview: employee amnesty and self-incrimination

As a general point, an employer cannot provide amnesty from criminal or regulatory action. Similarly, an agreement cannot prevent disclosures to regulators or inhibit criminal investigations.

While in theory amnesty against internal disciplinary action could be offered, this is very rare. More commonly, discussions take place with a view to the employee leaving under the terms of a settlement agreement, which can include a financial settlement and avoids the employee being dismissed. Such discussions can take place 'without prejudice', or they may take place as 'protected conversations' and therefore should not take place during a witness interview. These discussions, providing they meet the required criteria, cannot be used as evidence in unfair dismissal proceedings,[95] although, unless the without prejudice rule can genuinely apply, they could be used in whistleblowing or discrimination claims.

See Chapter 13 on employee rights

Though in theory it is possible for an employer to agree a certain course of action (for example, to retain an employee and waive the right to bring disciplinary action), this would not be advisable in circumstances where facts are not yet known or understood. If an amnesty is given, the employer would want to ensure that any waiver against disciplinary action related to closely defined and identifiable incidents only.

Employers also need to be wary of consistency. Where two employees have committed misconduct, allowing one employee to remain and dismissing another would support an unfair dismissal claim that the dismissed employee may bring. The employer would need to justify the difference in treatment, which may be easier to do when an employee has left under the terms of a settlement agreement.

An employee may also seek to claim privilege against self-incrimination and refuse to answer questions on that basis, particularly where he or she is advised by independent counsel. While there may be clear advantages to this approach from a criminal or regulatory perspective, this in itself would not provide a defence against dismissal. An employer could reach a decision to dismiss on the basis of the information that it had at that time. Though it cannot compel employees to answer questions, their failure to do so could be deemed to be unco-operative and in breach of the terms and conditions of employment, resulting in further grounds for disciplinary action. A dismissal for gross misconduct can still be fair in circumstances where a decision has been made not to prosecute, or where the employee has been acquitted of criminal charges for the same offence.[96] Acts that could constitute gross misconduct are broader than criminal offences and the requirement that gross misconduct be 'fair' is lower than the criminal standard of proof.[97]

95 Section 111A Employment Rights Act 1996.

96 Okhiria v. Royal Mail UKEAT/0054/14/LA.

In addition to employment considerations, it is always possible for an employer to agree not to pursue civil claims against an employee in return for information being provided. However, as set out above, this should generally not be offered until the full facts have been established.

Considerations when interviewing former employees 7.13

In general, unless there is a contractual commitment to do so, former employees can simply refuse to attend a witness interview. It is important to bear this in mind when negotiating an employee's exit, although in reality (depending on the specific contract terms), once the employee has left there may be little a former employer can do to require attendance, even if it enjoys the benefit of a contractual commitment from the employee to co-operate in any future investigation or proceedings. Former employees regulated by the FCA have a duty under Statements of Principle and Code of Practice for Approved Persons (APER) Principle 4 to co-operate with the regulators.[98] It is unlikely that this provision would require them to assist with an internal investigation, and if asked, they could fairly argue that their duty was to the regulator.

Where a former employee is interviewed there are some protections available in respect of whistleblowing, discrimination or victimisation, should they arise in the conduct of the interview or how he or she is treated afterwards. An employer should be wary of giving assurances of anonymity to a former employee in respect of information given, although this could be given on a need-to-know basis. Anonymity should not be guaranteed where regulatory obligations exist or where it could inhibit any criminal investigation, and assurances that any statement provided would not be disclosed to criminal or regulatory authorities should not be given.

See Chapter 5 on beginning an internal investigation and Chapter 11 on production of information to authorities

Data protection issues may also arise if the account or statement given by a former employee contains personal data. Care also should be taken in global investigations that data protection rules from other relevant jurisdictions are considered.

See Chapter 40 on data protection

97 A dismissal for gross misconduct is 'fair' if the employer believed that the employee was guilty of gross misconduct, if it had reasonable grounds on which to base that belief, and if it had carried out as much investigation as was reasonable in the circumstances of the particular case: British Home Stores Ltd v. Burchell [1978] UKEAT 108_78_2007. In a criminal trial the standard of proof required is to prove guilt 'beyond a reasonable doubt'.

98 The Statement of Principle 4 (see APER 2.1A.3 R) is in the following terms: 'An approved person must deal with the FCA, the PRA and other regulators in an open and cooperative way and must disclose appropriately any information of which the FCA or the PRA would reasonably expect notice.'

7.14 Considerations when interviewing employees abroad

Interviewing witnesses abroad can present particular difficulties in global investigations. Statutory employment law is generally of geographical rather than universal jurisdiction and, as a result, statutory employment laws of the jurisdiction where an employee is based will always apply, even if the employment contract is governed by English law. Nonetheless the governing law of the contract should also be considered, as should any rights or protections under that contract.

When planning interviews abroad it is crucial that the law and procedure relevant to those jurisdictions are considered. The employment documents (the staff handbook, for example) should be reviewed to ensure that procedures are followed. It is important to consider whether the employee or employer is covered by any regulatory rules within that jurisdiction (as well as the United Kingdom) to ensure compliance with any parallel reporting obligations.

It would be wise to engage local legal advice on local laws and local culture, which should be factored into the interview strategy. Clearly the interviews should comply with local laws, and in particular those relating to employment, data protection, privacy and privilege. While the English rules of privilege determine whether privilege applies in this jurisdiction, authorities from other jurisdictions may also have an interest, and advice should be sought on how privilege is determined in those jurisdictions.

A witness's procedural rights in the jurisdiction where he or she is based, as well as in the United Kingdom, should also be considered. Compliance with local laws as well as collective consultation and representation rules should be factored in. In addition, the employer should take advice on whether the employee abroad is covered by UK statutory employment rights.

See Chapter 5 on beginning an internal investigations and Chapter 40 on data protection Issues often arise regarding access to documents, particularly where there are restrictions on the movement of information from one jurisdiction to another.[99] Employees may also have a right to access and correct notes and files identifying them.[100] The applicable directives, regulations or rules should be considered in advance to ensure compliance with data protection laws.

Finally, maintaining confidentiality can be particularly difficult when interviewing witnesses abroad. Where witness interviews span a number of countries, the risk of information being shared or leaked is greater and measures should be put in place to ensure that confidentiality remains.

7.15 Key points

Witness interviews are a key part of most internal investigations and can provide vital information for the investigation. Internal investigation interviews can take the form of either preparatory interviews at the outset of an investigation or 99 The General Data Protection Regulation sets limits on the collection and use of personal data within the EU. The provisions were supplemented by the Data Protection Act 2018 (passed 23 May 2018).

100 Right of access by the data subject, Article 15 of the General Data Protection Regulation.

substantive interviews likely to take place once a review of relevant material has taken place.

There can be a tension between the right of a company to investigate allegations of wrongdoing and undertake witness interviews as part of its review, and the expectations of the authorities to be consulted prior to it doing so. Enforcement agencies may seek to restrict how the interviews are conducted or suggest that they be postponed until the authorities have conducted their own investigation. Witness interviews should be conducted in a manner that minimises the risk of contamination or prejudice.

UK enforcement agencies have stated that a refusal to provide details of the accounts given by witnesses in internal investigations could be construed as unco-operative or a breach of regulatory requirements. The provision of this information and the form in which it would be provided needs to be balanced with the need to ensure confidentiality in an investigation and to maintain legal privilege.

Where a company is investigating allegations of criminal or regulatory misconduct, it is preferable to have lawyers (internal, external, or both) present at interviews to take notes and identify the key risk areas that may arise, and to enable confidentiality and for privilege to be asserted, as appropriate. Where external lawyers have been engaged it is preferable for them to conduct the interviews; they often bring (and, importantly, are seen to bring) expertise, objectivity and independence. Preferably there should be two interviewers to ensure all relevant information is captured.

Interviews can be recorded in a number of ways: by recording and transcribing the interview; by counsel preparing notes of the interview; and with the preparation of a witness statement. UK and overseas enforcement agencies are likely to seek details of the accounts provided, and consideration should be given to ensuring legal privilege is capable of being asserted. How an interview is recorded, the privilege that may attach to that record, and whether or not to provide details of the witness's account will depend on the circumstances of each case.

Legal privilege in the context of witness interviews raises a number of complex issues and a claim to privilege will be closely scrutinised by the authorities. Notes of interviews with witnesses who fall outside the 'client' group may attract litigation privilege if circumstances allow, but the facts of each case must be carefully considered. There is a risk that disclosing information relating to witness interviews could result in a waiver of privilege more generally.

When conducting the interview, lawyers should be satisfied that the witness understands the basis on which he or she is being interviewed, the purpose of the interview, and the use that could be made of the information provided. While there is no formal requirement to do so, it is best practice for the witness to be given an Upjohn warning at the outset and to remind the witness of confidentiality. Where a company has decided to waive privilege prior to the interview, the Upjohn (or similar) warning may need to be strengthened. It is unlikely that a formal caution, similar to that given by the police when investigating suspects, would be required.

The company should consider whether its own legal advisers can give advice to the witness or whether to offer (and to pay for) separate independent legal advice, particularly where there may be a conflict of interest between the company and the witness and where the witness is at risk of criminal or regulatory investigation, or where the company could be implicated in corporate wrongdoing.

In general, a company cannot provide a witness with amnesty from criminal or regulatory action. Similarly an agreement cannot prevent disclosures to regulators or inhibit criminal investigations. Amnesty against internal disciplinary action is rare and while it is always possible to agree not to pursue civil claims in return for information being provided, this should generally not be offered until the full facts have been established.

Interviewing witnesses abroad can present particular difficulties in global investigations. It is crucial that the law and procedure relevant to those jurisdictions are considered and that any relevant regulatory rules are complied with. It would be wise to engage local counsel to advise on local laws, regulatory rules and culture to ensure compliance. Any applicable directives or regulations surrounding access to documents should also be considered in advance to ensure compliance with data protection laws. Measures should be put in place to seek to ensure confidentiality.

8

Witness Interviews in Internal Investigations: The US Perspective

Anne M Tompkins, Jodi Avergun and J Robert Duncan[1]

Introduction 8.1

The white-collar practitioner's interview of a company employee or officer is often the main event of an internal investigation or review. Significant planning and execution are required, however, well before a lawyer steps into the interview room. Whether a witness interview is part of an internal or regulator-facing investigation, or general proactive review, they must be designed to extract the necessary information. Some witness interviews may be designed to gain a level of understanding about business operations or controls present in an organisation, while others may seek to determine corporate or individual culpability after a whistle is blown or an accusation levelled. In each case, the white-collar practitioner must focus his or her planning and resources on uncovering the most relevant information. This chapter provides practical considerations to prepare for, perform and report on witness interviews in the typical white-collar case.

Preparation for the interview 8.2

A good interview process starts with identifying the individuals with potentially relevant information to the investigation. In some cases, as with a specific whistleblower allegation, identifying the right interviewee may be easy. Larger or less well-defined reviews require more planning with respect to identifying the interviewees. One practical way to start is to obtain organisational charts, which will allow the practitioner to see reporting relationships and the relative rank of employees within the organisation. Speaking to a mixture of both high- and low-ranking employees can assist in collecting a broad base of information. Although attorneys often focus on higher-ranking employers, lower-ranking employees are closer to the day-to-day operations of an organisation and can provide needed insight into operations and employee relationships.

1 Anne M Tompkins and Jodi Avergun are partners and J Robert Duncan is an associate at Cadwalader, Wickersham & Taft LLP.

Attorneys should be prepared, and even expect, that some employees will not have the knowledge they are seeking or may not have the expected information. Flexibility is important, as interview time is valuable. If chosen carefully, almost all interviewees will have some valuable information, even if the expected information is not available from a particular interviewee. But, when the interviewee lacks the relevant information, careful consideration should be given to cutting a non-productive interview short to avoid unnecessary costs and to leave time for more substantive conversations later.

Once interviewees are chosen, a practitioner should consider the order in which witnesses will be interviewed. Generally, it is best to start with interviewees that may have background information to gain familiarity with the subject of the investigation and general information about both the industry and the particular practices of the company. Background interviews also help define the parameters of more specific and focused interviews of later witnesses. As the interview schedule progresses, more discrete and specific issues can be the focus. If possible, it is best to interview employees in surroundings that are comfortable to them – generally in a conference room at their place of employment. However, certain sensitive interviews may be better conducted at a third-party location, such as a hotel conference room nearby to the interviewee's home or office. It is important that the interviewee feel comfortable to speak freely and honestly, which may dictate a meeting outside the workspace and away from co-workers and supervisors to avoid the perception of corporate control.

Attorneys usually rely on outlines to guide the interview. An outline will annotate the main issues and information sought and provide a checklist to make sure all planned topics are covered in the interview. Key questions or points can be listed to aid in the interview process and flow. Relevant background information, such as key dates or events, or excerpts from key emails should also be included to aid in the event that an interviewee does not recall important details. In addition, an outline will highlight specific documents or exhibits that will be covered with an interviewee to aid in refreshing the witness's memory or elucidating statements made by the witness. The interviewer should, however, remain nimble and be able to veer 'off script' if unexpected information surfaces during the interview. Preparation is key, but not at the expense of gaining valuable information.

Finally, when preparing for interviews in locations outside the United States, planning for the interview should account for local data-privacy laws and blocking statutes and the need for interpreters. Attorneys should understand before conducting interviews abroad any restrictions on recording interviews and leaving the country with notes taken during an interview. Interpreters should be used unless the interviewee is native-language proficient in the language of the interviewer to avoid any misunderstandings. Because it is likely that the interview will deal with complex and technical subject matter, even highly proficient speakers may struggle with some topics.

Upjohn protections 8.3

When a practitioner who represents a corporate client is interviewing an employee, it is important that the attorney ensure that the witness understand the limitations of an attorney's representation and issues surrounding privilege. This is commonly referred to as an Upjohn[2] warning, and entails informing the witness that the attorney represents the company, not the witness individually. In addition, the attorney should inform the employee witness that:

- counsel has been hired to gather information for the purposes of providing legal advice to their client – the corporation;
- their fact-gathering is protected by both attorney–client communications and work-product privilege;
- that privilege belongs not to the witness, but to the company, and it is the exclusive decision of the company whether to waive that privilege – which it can do at any time; and
- the witness must keep the interview and what is discussed during it private and confidential.

Following an Upjohn warning, attorneys should ensure that the witness understood the warning and document that the Upjohn warning was given and understood.

A witness is likely to have questions after being given an Upjohn warning – the most common being 'do I need my own attorney?' Attorneys must take care to develop a strategy for responding to such questions. It is not proper for the attorney to provide legal advice to the witness, having just explicitly disclaimed an attorney–client relationship with that individual. If a witness persists in requesting legal advice, an attorney should confer with internal company counsel, who may then offer the employee names of potential attorneys with whom the witness can consult. Telling the witness that they need their own counsel could constitute legal advice, so attorneys should, wherever possible, refrain from doing so.

See Chapter 14 on employee rights

Protecting work-product and attorney–client privilege 8.4

In the United States, there are two main types of privilege that may protect work-product and communications during an internal investigation: attorney–client privilege and work-product privilege. The attorney–client privilege protects communications between an attorney and his or her client to encourage full and frank communication without fear that confidential information will be disclosed to others.[3] Work-product privilege is broader than the attorney–client privilege, but it does not extend to every document generated or reviewed by the attorney.[4] Work-product privilege applies to materials prepared in the anticipation of litigation, litigation in process, or the prospect of future litigation, and reflects litigation investigation or analysis.[5]

2 See Upjohn Co. v. U.S., 449 U.S. 383, 385 (1981) (stating the privilege protects communications between the client and the attorney, not the underlying facts).

3 Swidler Berlin v. United States, 524 U.S. 399, 403 (1998).

4 NXIVM Corporation v. O'Hara, 241 F.R.D. 109, 126-27 (N.D.N.Y. 2007).

There are many best practices to protect communications and documents – including notes as discussed more fully below – under both privilege doctrines. First, to establish and document the attorney–client relationship and basis for work-product privilege, the corporation should state in writing that the attorney has been hired to conduct an internal investigation in anticipation of government or civil litigation. Corporations can even include this language in their company policy regarding internal investigations. Secondly, although internal investigations are largely a fact-finding mission that do not necessarily require an attorney, it is important to ensure that there is sufficient attorney oversight and involvement in the investigation. Even though the privilege can extend to conversations with a non-attorney as long as that person acts as an agent of the attorney, it is always safer to consistently involve corporate and external counsel in these conversations. Counsel should routinely document that the investigation is made to render legal advice and that these communications are privileged and confidential. This can be accomplished by both marking documents as 'Privileged and Confidential' and giving witnesses an Upjohn warning, informing them of their relationship to counsel and that all communications are confidential.

See Chapter 36 on privilege

Practitioners conducting investigations outside the United States must be aware of different standards for privilege and adjust accordingly. What may be privileged in the United States may be discoverable in other jurisdictions. For example, in the United Kingdom the attorney–client privilege is limited only to discussions of legal advice between an attorney and his or her client – the 'client' may not include lower-level company employees who do not have the authority to seek and receive legal advice on behalf of the company.[6] In addition, the United Kingdom does not extend protection to communications with third parties, even where those third parties, such as accountants, were engaged to assist or enable an attorney to provide legal advice to the client.[7]

8.5 Note-taking and privilege

To ensure that witnesses are comfortable and candid, less formal note-taking should be considered. For example, some attorneys find that typing notes on a laptop during an interview is distracting or intimidating to the witness, so lawyers should be ready to handwrite their notes if this would lead to a better interview outcome. While this may increase witness comfort, it decreases efficiency, as such notes are almost certainly going to have to be typed at a later date. For one or two interviews, this is reasonable, but when interviewing a dozen or more individuals, typing up handwritten notes will be a burdensome task.

5 Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(3); Restatement of the Law, Third, Law Governing Lawyers § 136 – Work Product Immunity.

6 The Director of the Serious Fraud Office v. Eurasian Natural Resources Corporation Limited (2017) EWHC 1017 (QB) at para. 70.

7 Bankim Thanki QC et al., 'Privilege: The UK Perspective' in The Practitioner's Guide to Global Investigations, ¶ 35.3.2.1 (3d ed. 2019).

Special attention should be paid to how notes are taken for the purpose of discoverability under the work-product privilege doctrine. Under the doctrine, protection attaches to the 'thoughts and impressions' of attorney work-product and these thoughts and mental impressions have often been afforded the strongest protections under the principles of evidence and civil procedure.[8] The decision to take notes as opposed to typing a verbatim transcript carries important implications under these doctrines of which interviewers should be aware before making a decision on their preferred method during an interview. Protecting privilege requires a complicated analysis and varies significantly based on the jurisdiction in which the investigation will occur.

For example, if privilege protection regarding the notes of an interview was challenged, it is less likely – in most jurisdictions – that a court would characterise a verbatim transcript as containing the 'thoughts and impressions' of the attorney. Such a ruling would increase the likelihood of its discoverability.[9] Note-taking including summaries and thoughts, on the other hand, is more likely to contain the thoughts and mental impressions that the attorney has throughout the interview, eliciting work-product protection and making this approach both more helpful to the attorney when reviewing the topics discussed in the interview in addition to reducing the likelihood of discoverability. One approach is to take notes on the same, or slightly modified, document used to create the outline. This approach makes it easier for the note-taker to follow the topics in the interview and notify the interviewer of any missed topics, and increases the likelihood that the note-taker will record thoughts and impressions rather than verbatim conversations.

On the other hand, verbatim transcripts are not necessarily without privilege protection and can certainly be helpful if the investigator knows for certain that they will need to recall exactly what has been said during an interview. Depending on the type of interview being conducted or the type of business taking place at the firm under investigation, certain interviews may be extremely fact-intensive and require greater precision during the note-taking. For example, if the investigation hinges on the steps and processes employed throughout a complex financial transaction, it may be beneficial to have a full transcript to review the steps and processes in the future. The need for the protection of privilege versus the need for exactness must be weighed.

8 See Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495 (1947).

9 Courts across the United States are inconsistent on the protection of verbatim transcripts, even when prepared in anticipation of or during litigation. Therefore, the safest course of action when privilege protection is paramount is to prepare notes that reflect the 'thoughts and impressions' of the attorney taking them. Compare Nam v. U.S. Express, Inc., 2012 WL 12840094, at *3 (E.D. Tenn. 15 May 2012) (holding that recordings of non-party witness interviews were not privileged because they were merely recitations of facts and did not contain mental impressions, conclusions, opinions or legal theories of a party's attorney concerning the litigation), with Hatamian v. Advanced Micro Devices, Inc., Case No. 14-cv-00226-YGR (JSC), 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 60551, at *4 (N.D. Cal. 6 May 2016) (preventing discovery of verbatim interview notes as factual work-product).

Immediately following an interview, and before the commencement of the next interview on the schedule, the interviewer and note-taker should confer about the interview, allowing the note-taker – who is usually the more inexperienced party – to jot down any other notes that may be of use at a later date. Once the interviews have concluded for the day, the note-taker should re-review his or her notes, making appropriate edits to allow for the cleaning up of the work-product at a later date. Finally, when all interviews are complete, the note-taker should prepare a clear and concise document that memorialises the contents of the interview and distils all relevant information for easy recall and access.

There is no correct answer for every investigation, and it is up to the interviewer to use his or her best informed judgement when deciding how to take notes through the interview. In most situations, the specific nature of the investigation and the sensitivity of the information will provide sufficient guidance.

8.6 Interactions with witnesses

One of the first challenges that can take place prior to an interview is the consideration of providing counsel for the witness. Often, companies will provide counsel for the witness so that the witness has an advocate and to avoid creating the false impression that the company's counsel is also charged with representing the witness. If both the company under investigation and the specific employee being interviewed are potentially facing criminal charges, it is generally recommended that the employee retain separate counsel in case the interests of the company and individual diverge. Furthermore, the employer and the employee could consent to enter into a joint defence agreement that will facilitate sharing information, based on their common interests in the investigation and defence.

When considering interactions with witnesses, the interviewer should determine whether there is a company policy on co-operation with investigations. Firms may have policies that require co-operation during internal investigation and knowledge of these policies prior to the interview potentially could serve as a helpful starting point. Certain witnesses may be unaware that these policies even exist – which the interviewing attorney may want to bring to their attention should the need arise.

With respect to conducting the interview itself, it is important to tailor the approach according to the particular witness. If a witness is friendly, and not suspected of wrongdoing, it is important to start by being approachable and personable with the witness to avoid any intimidation and potentially evasive or unhelpful answers. The interviewing attorney should begin the interview in a 'light' and non-demanding fashion to put the witness at ease. If the witness does not feel under pressure from direct and pointed questions, then he or she will be much more likely to share information that pertains to the investigation. If, however, an attorney knows that a witness is likely to be adverse or hostile, a different approach may be necessary. Witnesses may be hostile when they have committed a wrongful act – where information from an investigation or previous interviews suggests a witness is culpable. When confronting a witness with documents that show guilt or wrongdoing, conducting a cross-examination with leading questions may be more helpful. Regardless of the witness's posture, the interviewer should also allow for questions from the witness. The goal of the interview process is to allow the witness to 'tell their story' while allowing the interviewer to maintain the role of counsellor and listener. Receiving and responding to the witness's questions thoughtfully and respectfully will quickly establish trust and confidence, as opposed to coldness and hostility.

In addition to allowing the witness to 'tell their story', one of the other major objectives of an interview is to ask the witness about other individuals who may have knowledge on the subject of the investigation. When a witness is describing a certain set of events, it is not uncommon for him or her to discuss conversations held with others as these events took place. The interviewer should make sure to follow up on the other individuals that the witness brings up, both in the interview itself and after deciding who else should be contacted as a new witness.

Because each witness will react differently to certain questions, and there is no set formula for conducting an interview, the interviewers should strive to make the interview as open and conversational as possible while ensuring that the information being shared is both relevant and helpful to the investigation as a whole.

Document review and selection 8.7

In the ideal case, a white-collar practitioner will only conduct an interview of a company witness after a comprehensive document review has been conducted. Of course, some interviews are purely fact-finding and take place in emergent situations, making pre-interview document review unlikely. However, often, the review process should be under way, or ideally, completed before interviews take place.

The key dates and types of documents (e.g., emails, phone logs, text messages and financial documents) must be determined. These parameters will be set based on the type of information sought and the interviewees to be selected.

See Chapter 11 on production of information to authorities

Cost considerations 8.8

In addition to the costs of the attorneys conducting the interviews and of support personnel such as accountants, attorney travel to and from the interview site and lodging while on site can also greatly increase the cost of an interview. To reduce travel costs, many attorneys, and especially their clients, advocate the use of videoconferencing to conduct interviews. There are some challenges to this approach. For example, if it is necessary to show a witness documents and exhibits during the interview, the logistics can be difficult. At the very least, a local company employee who is assisting in the investigation would ideally be present to produce and show the correct exhibits at the correct time, especially if the interviewer wants to keep control of the documents. It is also possible to use Webex or other online meeting programmes to share documents with witnesses during the interview when a locally based assistant cannot be present.

While using videoconferencing certainly reduces or eliminates travel costs, it can also result in a less effective interview. Conducting an interview in person allows the interviewer to view and interpret the interviewee's attitude and body language in real time. In-person interviewing also allows the interviewer to develop a rapport with the interviewee that is usually not possible over video link. It is also likely that a witness will have a harder time being untruthful, evasive or hostile in person than to a face on a video screen. And it is much more difficult to assess an interviewee's credibility from miles away, no matter how good the high-definition screens are. The more important the interview, the more likely an in-person interview will need to be conducted. A proactive review of internal control processes is a better candidate for a telephonic or video meeting than an internal investigation designed to ferret out wrongdoing.

The best cost-control measure, though, is effective and meticulous planning. By focusing on relevant interview topics, interviews can be shortened to allow for more interviews per trip. In addition, good planning hopefully will eliminate follow-up interviews that would require additional trips.

8.9 Reporting the results of interviews

Often the format and type of report for an interview will be determined by the client in advance of any interviews. In large investigations, shorter decks or slides may be more helpful to allow the client to digest large amounts of data from various jurisdictions. These decks should include all pertinent information obtained from interviews as well as data on the number, location and type of interviews. Whether a more summarised slide deck with bullet points, or a more in-depth memo is prepared, the attorney should highlight significant findings and recommendations for next steps and further action.

Especially when preparing less detailed investigation reports, an attorney should schedule time with the client to go through the report and elaborate on key findings and recommendations. The attorney and client must be aligned on the next steps to ensure the best outcome from the investigation and interviews.

8.10 Conclusion

A well-done witness interview in a white-collar case can assist the client in determining case strategy, assessing damage, and uncovering or hopefully disproving wrongdoing. Careful scoping will ensure a focused and cost-efficient interview, and understanding at the outset what the goal of the interview is, as well as local laws and practices that might hinder attaining the goal, will avoid unnecessary hurdles and produce the result that is best for the case.

9

Co-operating with the Authorities: The UK Perspective

Ali Sallaway, Matthew Bruce, Ben Morgan and Nicholas Williams[1]

To co-operate or not to co-operate? 9.1

This chapter focuses on corporate co-operation with regulatory agencies and criminal authorities: where and when co-operation is required, its outcomes and its implications. It examines the increasing expectation that corporates should co-operate with investigations, the ever-expanding definition of 'co-operation' and factors in favour of and against it. The chapter looks at the current practice and guidance, and recent jurisprudence, with a particular focus on the meaning and application of co-operation in the context of investigations and prosecutions by the Serious Fraud Office (SFO), given that authority's clear stance that it will prosecute where the evidence allows unless corporates have genuinely and pro-actively co-operated.

Where co-operation is mandatory, the corporate has no option but to comply, or face criminal or disciplinary sanction. Examples of mandatory co-operation in the United Kingdom are:

- where there is a warrant to enter and search premises, and to seize material found therein;
- where a court issues a witness summons for a representative of the corporate to attend court, often with documents;
- where a compelled notice is issued, requiring the recipient to provide information or documents, or to attend for interview, by, for example:
    - the SFO under section 2 of the Criminal Justice Act 1987;

1 Ali Sallaway, Matthew Bruce, Ben Morgan and Nicholas Williams are partners at Freshfields Bruckhaus Deringer.

- the Financial Conduct Authority (FCA) under section 165 of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 where the recipient is an authorised person, or under section 168 where the recipient is any other corporate;[2] and
- the requirement that an authorised firm (or person) must disclose appropriately to the FCA and the Prudential Regulatory Authority (PRA) anything relating to the firm those regulators would reasonably expect notice of.[3]

Where co-operation is voluntary, the debate becomes more interesting. A corporate might wish to co-operate with an authority for a number of reasons. Co-operation may result in a less serious outcome, for example, a regulatory as opposed to a criminal resolution, a deferred prosecution agreement (DPA), fewer charges, less serious charges, or the period of wrongdoing under investigation being reduced. Sometimes, where an enforcement agency has an interest in a corporate, it can be beneficial to co-operate with the agency to enable it to reach an early decision to take no further action, whether for evidential, jurisdictional, public interest or other reasons. Co-operation is relevant at every stage and will even assist as mitigation in respect of sentence or sanction in the event of a successful prosecution or enforcement action.

See Chapter 39 on protecting corporate reputation

A collaborative approach may enable a corporate to manage publicity and communications in conjunction with the authority and limit reputational damage. It may also provide the opportunity to influence the course of an investigation, to avoid an overly protracted process, and to limit the cost to business that an investigation might otherwise entail. An additional benefit in the criminal sphere is the possibility of entering into a DPA, avoiding a conviction and its collateral consequences. Of course, regulatory agencies and criminal authorities will say that co-operating fully on a voluntary basis is also the right thing to do for any good corporate citizen; and while that may be true, it underestimates the myriad and sometimes competing obligations on corporates to their many stakeholders, including shareholders, employees, partners, customers and the markets generally.

9.2 The status of the corporate and other initial considerations

The status of the corporate is key. Is it a victim or witness? Is it the target or the subject of the investigation? Is it currently a witness, but circumstances indicate that it is at risk of becoming a subject? Understanding status is essential to providing proper, informed guidance.

---

2 Where it appears to the FCA that there are circumstances suggesting that a person may be guilty of one of a number of criminal offences (including insider dealing, market abuse, money laundering or certain regulatory breaches under the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 (FSMA)), it may appoint investigators to conduct an investigation under s.168 FSMA. Once that section is invoked, the investigators assume powers under s.171, s.172 or s.173 FSMA to compel information from non-authorised persons (i.e., corporates or individuals who are not authorised or supervised by the FCA) both in the form of documents and in interview. Where a criminal investigation has commenced, the powers of compulsion are wider than where the investigation is limited to a regulatory breach.

3 Principle 11, Principles for Businesses.

At the outset, establishing the status of the corporate enables the evaluation of potential liability. Is the corporate exposed to risk? Can that risk be mitigated by co-operation? Is immunity a possibility? A consideration of these issues should define how the approach to the authority is made and how the relationship is managed.

If the corporate is a witness, it may be subject to mandatory co-operation requirements, such as compelled requests for information as outlined in Section 9.1. Witnesses face a lower expectation from prosecutors and regulators of voluntary co-operation, in terms of offering up documents and information beyond the scope of specific requests, primarily because additional co-operation offers fewer direct benefits than it might for a suspect. While proactive co-operation may enhance a corporate's relationship with its regulator or enforcement body, and be consistent with its corporate governance values, a corporate may have good reasons to be circumspect in dealings with the authorities in an investigation. In particular, a corporate witness may have an ongoing commercial relationship with the corporate suspect. This is often the case for professional advisers, such as auditors, who are frequently compelled to provide information in the context of investigations into their clients. In these circumstances, the corporate witness will have to consider its obligations to its client, and also the potential for any disclosure to expose it to regulatory investigation or litigation.

Whether a witness or a suspect, co-operation without a proper understanding of the issues and underlying facts may be difficult. Accordingly, the desire or need to co-operate may trigger an internal investigation to establish the veracity of the allegation, at least on a preliminary basis. Consideration must be given to whether the regulator or criminal prosecutor would want or expect involvement in setting the scope of an internal investigation: its subject matter, its jurisdictional and chronological reach, the sequencing of steps to gather evidence and whether it is a superficial review or a deep exploration.

See Chapter 5 on beginning an internal investigation

The corporate should be mindful of any mandatory reporting obligations that arise as its knowledge of the allegation increases. Under the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (POCA), 'nominated persons' in the 'regulated sector' must report to the National Crime Agency (NCA) where they have reasonable grounds for suspecting that another person is engaged in money laundering.[4] There may also be mandatory reporting or disclosure obligations that arise as matters unfold. For example, listed companies will need to consider their disclosure obligations to the market.[5]

Other initial considerations include legal privilege – invoking it where appropriate, but being sensitive to certain authorities' desire to review first accounts of witnesses.

See Chapter 35 on privilege

Where possible, the likely strength of the evidence should be assessed as quickly as possible. Information obtained by a prosecutor during an investigation is generally admissible in criminal proceedings against the corporate.[6] A corporate and its advisers should, therefore, have regard to the potential impact of any documents or information they voluntarily disclose being used in proceedings against them and the extent to which voluntary co-operation may undermine any defence that the corporate later wishes to mount.

4 s.330 of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002.

5 See Part 7 of the Financial Services Act 2012.

9.3 Could the corporate be liable for the conduct?

Where criminal misconduct is suspected, the extent of the corporate's involvement in, or knowledge at the time of, the alleged misconduct will be a relevant factor in whether to co-operate.

See Chapter 1, Section 1.1.1

Where the allegation is confined to an individual in a junior role, the risk of investigation and prosecution of the corporate may be low on the basis that the 'directing mind and will'[7] of the corporate was not engaged. The category of persons who fulfil that definition is narrow and, while the exact parameters are uncertain, it is usually confined to office holders, board members and very senior management – those who have the authority (whether derived from the articles and memorandum of association, or similar) to act as the corporation, rather than as its servant or agent. In these circumstances, the benefits to the corporate of voluntarily co-operating with regulatory and enforcement authorities (beyond its mandatory co-operation requirements) may be outweighed by the risks. By voluntarily identifying witnesses and documents beyond the narrow scope of the investigation, the corporate may invite the authorities to look more widely into the issues than necessary or than they otherwise would.

There are, however, some circumstances in which a special rule of attribution of liability applies – where the purpose of the legislation would be defeated if the usual hurdle to establishing corporate liability were required. The public interest in the legislation in question and the policy behind it are key to this. The court will look at the language and purpose of the statute and the particular offence to determine whose criminal act or knowledge was intended to count as that of the company. This special rule tends to be applied to administrative, regulatory or quasi-regulatory offences. Illustrative examples of offences where the court has held the special rule to apply include:

- licensing offences, including the sale of a video classified as suitable only for adults to an underage customer; the offence was committed by a company but was carried out by a member of staff;[8]

6 Material described in para. 13(6) of Schedule 17 of the Crime and Courts Act 2013 can only be used in limited circumstances but there is no limitation in the use to which other material obtained by a prosecutor during the DPA negotiation period may be put against the corporate or anyone else so far as the rules of evidence permit. See the DPA Code of Practice paras. 4.4 and 4.5 – link to Code of Practice at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/publications/guidance-policy-and-protocols/deferred-prosecution-agreements/.

7 Tesco Supermarkets Ltd v. Nattrass [1972] AC 153.

8 Tesco Stores v. Brent London Borough Council [1993] 1 WLR 1037, 1041.

- environmental offences,[9] including the creation of fraudulent records,[10] where the applicable statutory regime is a combination of offences requiring knowledge or intent and strict liability offences; and
- the requirement on a corporate to disclose its substantial holding of securities in a public issuer.[11] The individual who failed to make the disclosure was found to bind the corporate – absent that interpretation, the obligation to disclose would be rendered unenforceable.

The Court of Appeal has rejected the argument that corporate liability could be founded on a basis other than identification, based on Lord Hoffmann's opinion in the Meridian case. It held that the identification principles in Tesco v. Nattrass still stood and that Lord Hoffmann was doing no more than adapting those principles to a very specific statutory duty.[12] The supremacy of the identification principle was also reaffirmed by the Court of Appeal in the St Regis case.[13]

If the corporate identifies evidence to suggest that the 'directing mind and will' of the company was involved in the misconduct, or there is involvement at a lower level in the company and there is a concern that a special rule of attribution might apply, it should consider the benefits of self-reporting before the regulatory or prosecuting body itself comes to this conclusion.

In addition, 'failure to prevent' type offences (such as section 7 of the Bribery Act 2010 and Part 3 of the Criminal Finances Act 2017) will have a wider application that is not dependent on the identification principle and this should be borne in mind.[14] In a regulatory context, the liability of a firm may also be wider. A firm will, of course, have liability for acts of its employees from a regulatory perspective. And senior executives of relevant regulated firms may be held accountable through the senior managers regime, which imposes a statutory 'duty of responsibility' on those holding senior management functions within such firms – leaving them liable to enforcement action if a breach occurs on their watch.

What does co-operation mean? 9.4

Definition and descriptions 9.4.1

Co-operation with authorities in criminal cases has traditionally been in the form of a guilty plea and the offer to give evidence on behalf of the prosecution. Increasingly, co-operation is a more nuanced concept: self-reporting, saving the 9 Alphacell Ltd v. Woodward [1972] AC 824.

10 Environment Agency v. St Regis Paper Co. Ltd [2012] 1 Cr App R 177.

11 Meridian Global Funds v. Securities Commission [1995] 2 AC 500 PC.

12 Attorney General's Reference (No. 2 of 1999) [2000] 2 Cr App R 207, 217-218.

13 Environment Agency v. St Regis Paper Co. Ltd [2012] 1 Cr App R 177, paras. 10-11.

14 This is an expanding area of the law in England. The Criminal Finances Act 2017 introduced two new corporate offences relating to the failure to prevent the facilitation of tax evasion. In addition, in January 2017 the Ministry of Justice opened up a call for evidence on Corporate Liability for Economic Crime examining the case for reform, including the possibility of introducing further 'failure to prevent' type offences for corporates in the context of other economic crimes. At the time of writing, the outcome of the call for evidence is pending.

authority's time and resources, a willingness to cede a good deal of control of an internal investigation or hand over voluntarily relevant evidence gathered or identified, and genuine and consistent transparency are referred to by courts and authorities as key aspects of co-operation. This attitude towards co-operation was pithily summarised by SFO Director Lisa Osofsky: 'At its simplest, it's not so hard: Tell me something I don't know. Help the prosecutor find the truth. Don't obstruct, or mislead, or delay. Don't hold things back.'[15]

Under 2013 legislation,[16] a DPA is available to a designated prosecutor as an alternative to a criminal prosecution. A court-approved DPA is a method of settling a case without a conviction, where a defendant has co-operated fully with the authority. The SFO concluded its first DPA in November 2015 with ICBC Standard Bank (Standard Bank). Since then, the SFO has used this case and its subsequent DPAs to extol the virtues of voluntary co-operation.

See Chapter 23 on negotiating global settlements

In August 2019, the SFO published an extract of its operational handbook entitled Corporate Co-operation Guidance, which provides guidance to SFO prosecutors on how to assess corporate cooperation.[17] This lists several dozen 'indicators of good practice' that the SFO may take into account when assessing whether a company is genuinely co-operative. Importantly, the list is neither exhaustive nor prescriptive: the SFO acknowledges that each case will be different and a co-operating company will not necessarily display all of the enumerated conduct, or achieve a particular outcome even if it does.

As a summary of how the SFO views co-operation, the Corporate Co-operation Guidance notes:

> Co-operation means providing assistance to the SFO that goes above and beyond what the law requires. It includes: identifying suspected wrongdoing and criminal conduct together with the people responsible, regardless of their seniority or position in the organisation; reporting this to the SFO within a reasonable time of the suspicions coming to light; and preserving available evidence and providing it promptly in an evidentially sound format.
>
> Genuine cooperation is inconsistent with: protecting specific individuals or unjustifiably blaming others; putting subjects on notice and creating a danger of tampering with evidence or testimony; silence about selected issues; and tactical delay or information overloads.[18]

The guidance is considered in detail further below.

15 Speech by Lisa Osofsky, SFO Director, at the 35th International Conference on the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act in Washington, DC, 28 November 2018 (https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2018/12/04/keynote-address-fcpa-conference-washington-dc/).

16 Crime and Courts Act 2013.

17 SFO Operational Handbook, Corporate Co-operation Guidance (https://www.sfo.gov.uk/download/corporate-co-operation-guidance/).

18 Ibid., p.1.

Genuine and continual co-operation 9.4.2

Authorities expect co-operation to be genuine, proactive and continual. For the FCA, a firm's pattern of co-operation over the period leading up to the investigation, as well as during the investigation itself, is relevant. The FCA Handbook notes that:

> An important consideration before an enforcement investigation and/or enforcement action is taken forward is the nature of a firm's overall relationship with the FCA and whether, against that background, the use of enforcement tools is likely to further the FCA's aims and objectives. So, for any similar set of facts, using enforcement tools will be less likely if a firm has built up over time a strong track record of taking its senior management responsibilities seriously and been open and communicative with the FCA.[19]

The Office of Fair Trading (OFT) is the predecessor to the Competition and Markets Authority (CMA) and adopted a similar approach with regard to cartel investigations. The OFT has stated that one condition for leniency is that '[t]he applicant must maintain continuous and complete co-operation throughout the investigation and until the conclusion of any action (including criminal proceedings and defending civil or criminal appeals) by the OFT arising as a result of the investigation'.[20]

Further, the Office of Financial Sanctions Implementation (OFSI) within HM Treasury, which has powers to impose potentially significant monetary penalties on companies and individuals for breaches of financial sanctions law, has noted in its guidance: '[If] we discover that parties have dealt with us in bad faith and if the case is not criminally prosecuted, we will normally impose a monetary penalty.'[21]

In the criminal sphere, both co-operation and remorse are mitigating features for which a defendant can expect a reduction in sentence. Where a DPA is under consideration, the key public interest factor against prosecution is co-operation: considerable weight will be given to a 'genuinely proactive approach adopted by [an organisation]'s management team when the offending is brought to their notice'.[22] Whether a DPA is in the public interest is a focus of the court in its

19 FCA Handbook, EG 2.12.1.

20 Para. 2.7(c) of 'Applications for leniency and no-action in cartel cases', guidance document OFT1495, July 2013 (https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/284417/OFT1495.pdf). The CMA Board has adopted this guidance and references to OFT should be read as to the CMA, which has been retained unamended but does not take account of developments since its publication (see https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/leniency-and-no-action-applications-in-cartel-cases).

21 'Monetary penalties for breaches of financial sanctions – guidance', OFSI, April 2017 (https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/605884/Monetary_penalties_for_breaches_of_financial_sanctions.pdf).

22 DPA Code of Practice, para. 2.8.2.

assessment of the proposed agreement. As such, it is unsurprising that the SFO's expectations of continual co-operation are so high where a DPA is in play.

Co-operation will clearly be considered in the round, by reference to the company's broader attitude towards the investigation. Companies that make incorrect or unsubstantiated arguments about the underlying nature of the misconduct run a real risk of being deemed unco-operative, a point highlighted by the conduct of Sweett Group: the company was heavily criticised by the SFO and the court for apparently attempting to deliberately mislead the SFO, by attempting to obtain a letter characterising the offending payment its subsidiaries had made as a legal finder's fee under United Arab Emirates law.[23] On the other hand, companies that co-operate fully with the SFO can earn significant leniency. For example, in the Rolls-Royce case, the SFO offered, and the court approved, a DPA with a 50 per cent discount to the monetary penalty that would otherwise have been required. This represented the one-third discount that is the equivalent of what is usually available for an early guilty plea plus an additional 16.7 per cent discount in recognition of Rolls-Royce's 'extraordinary cooperation'.[24] The SFO has also agreed DPAs with Tesco Stores Limited, Serco Geografix Ltd and Sarclad Limited that all involved a 50 per cent discount to the monetary penalty.

Of further interest to corporates is the approach to co-operation taken by the Information Commissioner's Office (ICO). The ICO, like the SFO and FCA, will take the level of co-operation provided by companies into account when considering enforcement. In considering any penalty, failure to cooperate with an ICO investigation will be considered an aggravating factor.[25] An instructive example of the ICO's tough approach is the £400,000 fine and criminal penalty handed to Keurboom Communications after Keurboom failed to comply with an information notice regarding a breach of the Privacy and Electronic Communication Regulations.[26]

See Chapter 40 on data protection

9.4.3 Prompt reporting to the SFO

A corporate should report to the SFO as promptly as possible, if it wishes to be considered as co-operating. How early a corporate self-reports is a factor the SFO may consider when deciding to offer a DPA.[27] This does not mean that corporates should report all allegations of criminal behaviour as soon as they become aware of them.[28] The corporate will need to consider and verify such allegations to a certain extent before deciding whether it is necessary and appropriate to take the 23 R v. Sweett Group, Sentencing Remarks.

24 SFO v. Rolls-Royce (Case No. U20170036) [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249, para. 19.

25 ICO, Draft Regulatory Action Policy (https://ico.org.uk/media/about-the-ico/documents/2259467/regulatory-action-policy.pdf), pp. 24 and 28.

26 See ICO Monetary Penalty Notice to Keurboom Communications Ltd (https://ico.org.uk/media/action-weve-taken/enforcement-notices/2014013/mpn-keurboom-ltd-20170503.pdf).

27 DPA Code of Practice, para. 2.9.2.

28 Speech by Lisa Osofsky, SFO Director, at the Royal United Services Institute in London, 3 April 2019 (https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2019/04/03/fighting-fraud-and-corruption-in-a-shrinking-world/).

serious step of reporting itself to the SFO. Reporting wrongdoing but failing to verify it, or reporting it knowing or believing it to be inaccurate, misleading or incomplete, is a factor in favour of prosecution.[29] What level of investigation is required to 'verify' wrongdoing is undefined. This is a judgement for the corporate to make with assistance from its advisers. The following factors should be taken into account:

- where possible, the alleged criminal conduct should be reported to the SFO before it otherwise becomes aware of it. As such, the corporate should be alert to the possibility of whistleblowers or other organisations or individuals (e.g., NGOs) approaching the SFO, and should be conscious of the implications of any other reports that the corporate may have made to other authorities in the United Kingdom or overseas;
- the corporate is entitled to conduct an 'initial assessment' of the allegation but as soon as reasonable grounds to suspect wrongdoing in the way the company or those associated with it conduct business[30] are identified, they should be flagged to the SFO; and
- the extent to which a company involves the prosecutor in the early stages of an investigation is a relevant factor in assessing a company's co-operation.[31]

In the case of Standard Bank, the bank reported the alleged misconduct 'within a matter of days of it coming to its attention',[32] and, in passing sentence on the bank, the court noted that considerable weight was to be attached to the fact that it had 'immediately reported itself to the authorities and adopted a genuinely proactive approach to the matter'.[33] However, it seems likely that Standard Bank had mandatory reporting obligations under POCA given that the bank's solicitors had reported the matter to the Serious Organised Crime Agency (which was subsequently merged into the NCA) six days before the bank reported the matter to the SFO.[34]

In the case of Sarclad, a global programme designed to improve compliance in the relevant subsidiary unearthed concerns about specific contracts; as a result, Sarclad took immediate action by retaining a law firm to undertake an independent internal investigation.[35] Within a month of commencing the investigation, the law firm had informed the SFO that a self-report might be forthcoming. Six weeks later, the lawyers met with the SFO to confirm that Sarclad would 29 DPA Code of Practice, para. 2.8.1(vi).

30 See, for example, Lisa Osofsky's speech of 3 April 2019.

31 See paragraph 2.9.2 of the DPA Code of Practice.

32 SFO v. Standard Bank plc, Statement of Facts prepared pursuant to para. 6(1) of Schedule 17 to the Crime and Courts Act 2013, para. 4.

33 SFO v. Standard Bank plc, Approved Judgment,(Case No. U20150854) [2016] Lloyd's Rep FC 102, para. 27.

34 Press release entitled 'SFO agrees first UK DPA with Standard Bank', 30 November 2015 (https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2015/11/30/sfo-agrees-first-uk-dpa-with-standard-bank/).

35 SFO v. Sarclad Ltd, Approved Judgment, (Case No. U20150856) [2016] 7 WLUK 220; [2016] Lloyd's Rep FC 509, para. 11.

be making a self-report at the conclusion of the investigation. This was supplemented by continuing assistance and two further reports. The court commended 'the promptness of the self-report, the fully disclosed internal investigation and co-operation of Sarclad'.[36]

A corporate is unlikely to get credit from the SFO for self-reporting where there is a sense that its hand has been forced, as was the case with the Sweett Group, who apparently only reported the conduct at issue to the SFO following a tip-off from the Wall Street Journal that it was about to publish a story.[37]

Likewise, a cartel member reporting and providing evidence of a cartel will not benefit from leniency if, for example, the CMA is already investigating the cartel, or if another cartel member reported the wrongdoing beforehand.[38]

In the absence of a self-report, a corporate will likely need to demonstrate a much greater level of subsequent co-operation to earn a comparable degree of leniency from the SFO. In the case of Rolls-Royce, the SFO acknowledged that the initial investigation was not triggered by a self-report. Even so, the 'extraordinary' co-operation offered by Rolls-Royce persuaded the SFO and the court not to 'distinguish between its assistance and that of corporates who have self-reported from the outset.' This was largely due to the fact that what Rolls-Royce subsequently reported during the course of the investigation was 'far more extensive (and of a different order)' than would have otherwise been exposed without the co-operation Rolls-Royce provided.[39]

9.4.4 Conducting an SFO-approved internal investigation

Once a self-report has been made, the SFO expects genuine and constructive co-operation. This means that, following a self-report, any internal investigation conducted by the corporate or its advisers should be done in conjunction with the SFO and with its approval.[40] The SFO will want to have a reasonable degree of involvement in the early stages of an internal investigation – to enable it to discuss work plans and timetabling and to give directions, for example relating to data capture and processing.[41] The SFO will also expect a co-operating company to 'consult in a timely way with the SFO before interviewing potential witnesses or suspects, taking personnel/HR actions or taking other overt steps'.[42]

36 Ibid., para. 16.

37 Speech by Camilla de Silva, Joint Head of Bribery and Corruption at the SFO, at ABC Simple Minds Financial Services conference on 15 March 2018: 'the sooner you come in, self report and the more you are open with us, the more you have to be rewarded for.'

38 Para. 2.9 of 'Applications for leniency and no-action in cartel cases', guidance document OFT1495, July 2013 (https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/284417/OFT1495.pdf).

39 SFO v. Rolls-Royce (Case No. U20170036) [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249, para. 22.

40 DPA Code of Practice, para. 2.9.2.

41 Ibid., para. 2.9.2.

42 Corporate Co-operation Guidance.

SFO expectations on data handling 9.4.5

The SFO is particularly concerned that relevant data is properly preserved. For example, its Corporate Co-operation Guidance advises companies to ensure that the digital integrity of material is preserved; to identify the reasons for any data loss, deletion or destruction; and to create and maintain an audit trail on the acquisition and handling of data including digital material and devices, hard copy files and financial material. While this standard is already well known to global companies, preserving the integrity of data (and later collecting it) may require a significant effort. Companies may consider evaluating, in advance of any investigation, what data sources they have, how data is preserved and stored and over what period, and how it can be accessed at a later date.

The SFO Corporate Co-operation Guidance notes co-operation may involve providing material from overseas where it is in the possession or under the control of the organisation and identifying and facilitating access to data held by third parties.

The assistance provided by Standard Bank, for example, included providing shared documents collected from email servers held in Africa, inboxes, hard drives and shared drives, paper files, CCTV images recorded in Africa and recordings of telephone conversations. The SFO would not have had access to much of this evidence had it not been provided voluntarily by the bank.[43] Similarly, Sarclad identified and provided relevant information that extended the investigation beyond the SFO's original scope. Email caches were volunteered.[44] Rolls-Royce agreed to provide the SFO with unfiltered access to its records – some 30 million documents – and permitted the SFO to conduct its own digital review to identify potentially privileged documents with any issues of privilege to be resolved by an independent counsel.[45]

Facilitating SFO access witnesses 9.4.6

The SFO is particularly concerned that 'first accounts' from witnesses are not prejudiced.[46] Other regulatory and enforcement authorities, including the FCA, are increasingly adopting a similar stance.

See Chapter 3 on self-reporting to authorities

From a prosecutor's perspective, achieving best evidence is a key principle in a criminal prosecution. The first account of a witness is crucial, and the circumstances in which it is obtained can be critical to the credibility and efficacy of the evidence in a trial. Discrepancies between a first account and subsequent testimony can undermine the prosecution case. As such, the SFO places particular significance on obtaining first access to witnesses, or to notes or summaries of

43 SFO v. Standard Bank plc, Statement of Facts prepared pursuant to para. 6(1) of Schedule 17 to the Crime and Courts Act 2013, para. 4.

44 SFO v. Sarclad Ltd, Approved Judgment, (Case No. U20150856) [2016] 7 WLUK 220; [2016] Lloyd's Rep FC 509.

45 SFO v. Rolls-Royce (Case No. U20170036) [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249.

46 DPA Code of Practice, para. 2.9.3.

first accounts.[47] Many defence lawyers would take a different view, arguing that first accounts are not as helpful and reliable, and therefore not as critical, as the SFO maintains. Nonetheless, a failure to co-operate with the SFO in this regard could jeopardise the offer of a DPA.[48] In certain circumstances, the SFO or the FCA may expect corporates not to interview witnesses before consulting with them,[49] or they may request that a company does not interview potential witnesses before a compelled interview has been carried out or a witness statement obtained. Where a corporate is able to interview witnesses, the SFO or the FCA may wish to dictate the order in which interviews are carried out, see materials or questions to be put to witnesses and receive copies of any work-product generated following each interview.

The SFO will also expect co-operating companies to make employees and (where possible) agents available for SFO interviews, including arranging for them to return to the United Kingdom if necessary and identifying third parties to interview.

9.4.7 Privilege and the SFO

The legal professional privilege often claimed to protect from disclosure communications generated during the course of an investigation has been an area of focus for the SFO in recent years, particularly in relation to interview notes. Public statements by the SFO make clear that it considers as a 'significant mark of co-operation a company's decision' to waive privilege over notes of witness interviews.[50] Rolls-Royce received credit for voluntarily disclosing, with limited waiver of privilege, memoranda from over 200 interviews conducted as part of its internal investigation.[51]

Standard Bank on the other hand is understood not to have provided notes (or referred to first-account witness interviews in its internal investigation report to avoid waiving privilege). Instead, it provided oral summaries. The same was true

47 See, for example, Alun Milford's speech of 29 March 2016: 'Why are witness first accounts so important to us? The immediate point is that they simply help us understand quickly what went on. Of course we can and we will go to speak to witnesses ourselves but companies who tell us what they were told during the course of an internal investigation plainly help us in the course of our inquiries. There is a second reason why we want witness accounts. As I have previously made clear, people who give an account to an internal investigation are liable to be witnesses in any criminal case we might bring. In considering the evidence witnesses might give us, we are duty-bound to assess its accuracy and integrity. So fundamental to prosecutors is that duty that it is set out in the Code for Crown Prosecutors. An important way in which accuracy or integrity is tested is by reference to first accounts. Plainly, if we do not have first accounts then our ability to assess witness credibility might be affected to the extent that we might not be able to call them as witnesses.'

48 DPA Code of Practice, para. 2.9.2.

49 Corporate Co-operation Guidance, Preserving and providing material, para. 6(i). Further, the court in SFO v. Rolls-Royce (Case No. U20170036) [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249, para. 20(i) cited Rolls-Royce's deferring of internal interviews until the SFO had first completed its interview as evidence of their co-operation with SFO.

50 See Lisa Osofsky's speech of 3 April 2019.

51 SFO v. Rolls-Royce (Case No. U20170036) [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249, para. 20(ii).

of Sarclad Ltd. However, the decision in R(AL) v. SFO[52] demonstrates the difficulties that can arise for the SFO from this approach.

In R(AL) v. SFO, a former employee of Sarclad Ltd, a defendant in related criminal proceedings, brought a claim for judicial review to challenge the SFO's decision not to require production of witness interview notes, over which the company claimed privilege. The High Court ultimately dismissed the claim since the claimant had not exhausted all available remedies before the Crown Court. However, the Court also made plain its view that the SFO had not complied with its duty, as a prosecuting authority, to take further steps to obtain witness interview notes so that they may be disclosed in the criminal proceedings against the individual in accordance with the defendant's right to a fair trial under Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights. In that case, the Court noted that it was not sufficient for the SFO to apply a 'not obviously wrong' test to examining a company's claims to privilege and its 'duty is to assess claims for privilege properly and not cursorily and superficially'.

This case follows other high-profile decisions in the English courts in relation to interview notes. For example, in the 2016 case The RBS Rights Issue Litigation,[53] the High Court rejected a claim of legal advice privilege over memoranda of employee interviews prepared by the bank's lawyers. 'Client' for the purposes of legal advice privilege was interpreted, by reference to Three Rivers District Council v. Governor of the Bank of England,[54] to cover only those individuals authorised to seek and receive advice from the lawyers. The employees interviewed by the lawyers were not, therefore, considered to be 'clients' of the bank's lawyers.[55] Based on the evidence available to it, the court also rejected the bank's claims that the notes in question were subject to legal advice privilege on the basis that they comprised lawyers' working papers.

Further, in Director of the SFO v. ENRC, the SFO initially successfully challenged claims of privilege over various documents produced during ENRC's internal investigation and subsequent engagement with the SFO.[56] But this decision was overturned on appeal on the basis that the interview notes and other materials (including the work-product of forensic accountants) were protected by litigation privilege.[57] Notably, the Court of Appeal found that criminal proceedings were sufficiently contemplated for litigation privilege purposes at the point at which ENRC commenced an internal investigation following a whistleblower report alleging corruption in parts of its business, and they were certainly contemplated when the SFO subsequently contacted ENRC about the same matter (even though the SFO stated it was not, at that time, carrying out a criminal investigation into ENRC). On the question of legal advice privilege, the Court of 54 Three Rivers District Council v. Governor of the Bank of England [2001] UKHL 16.

52 R(AL) v. SFO and others [2018] EWHC 856 (Admin).

53 The RBS Rights Issue Litigation [2016] EWHC 3161 (Ch).

55 The RBS Rights Issue Litigation [2016] EWHC 3161 (Ch).

56 SFO v. ENRC [2017] EWHC 1017 (QB) (8 May 2017).

57 Serious Fraud Office v. Eurasian Natural Resources Corporation [2018] EWCA Civ 2006.

Appeal clearly indicated that it considered the narrow definition of the 'client' as established in Three Rivers No. 5 to be outdated, and that it would have departed from that decision if it had been able to do so.

Although the decision of the Court of Appeal in SFO v. ENRC may give a company engaging with the SFO greater comfort when asserting litigation privilege over investigation documents, companies seeking a resolution will still need to consider if it is in their strategic interests to waive privilege (on a limited basis) in such documents. As a matter of principle, maintaining privilege should be a 'neutral' factor as far as obtaining credit for co-operation is concerned. Privilege is a fundamental right. The DPA Code of Practice recognises that there is nothing in the existence of the DPA process that alters that right.[58] However, the Court of Appeal in ENRC did note that an examination of a company's co-operation, for the purposes of determining whether a DPA would be in the interests of justice, 'will consider whether the company was willing to waive any privilege attaching to documents produced during internal investigations, so that it could share those documents with the SFO'. In light of this, the SFO may, in practice, consider it to be a positive sign of co-operation if a company chooses to waive privilege in certain documents for the purposes of assisting the SFO in its investigation. On 2 October 2018, the SFO announced that it would not be seeking to appeal against the Court of Appeal's decision.

See Chapter 35 on privilege

In light of these developments over recent years, the Corporate Co-operation Guidance focuses, in large part, on privilege. The language of the guidance is particularly strong on this point, signalling the SFO is continuing its robust stance and willingness to test claims of privilege over internal investigation materials. The guidance establishes two new procedural expectations for companies seeking to assert privilege: first, to provide certification by independent counsel supporting any claim of privilege, and second, to provide 'privilege logs' itemising each document withheld on the basis of privilege and the basis on which each is privileged. These new procedures would, if implemented, generally make asserting privilege meaningfully more time-consuming and expensive. At the same time, they may also signal that, if these procedural steps are taken, there is a clearer path for a company to assert privilege while maintaining a co-operative stance.

The Corporate Co-operation Guidance also reiterates the SFO's previous DPA Code of Practice in providing that, when the SFO is considering a company's co-operation for the purposes of deciding whether to offer a DPA, it will expect the company to disclose 'witness accounts' and documents shown to witnesses.[59] The DPA Code of Practice did not specify what the SFO meant by 'witness accounts' – and in some of the DPA cases the SFO accepted summaries of discussions with witnesses (including 'oral proffers') as sufficient for these purposes. But the Corporate Co-operation Guidance now adds a new express expectation that companies seeking co-operation credit should also provide any recordings, notes and transcripts of witness interviews and identify a witness competent to speak about the contents of each interview.

58 DPA Code of Practice, para. 3.3.

59 DPA Code of Practice, para. 2.8.2(i).

The SFO states that companies that retain a legitimate claim to privilege over such witness material will not be penalised for asserting that claim (where backed up by an independent certification). That said, it is not yet clear whether the SFO will expect such companies to work harder in other areas to 'make up' for the lack of credit they would have otherwise received for disclosing privileged materials.

The SFO has elsewhere made clear that in evaluating the quality of a company's co-operation, it will view the waiver of privilege as a 'strong indicator of co-operation' and an 'important factor' in deciding whether to offer a DPA.[60] Some will undoubtedly question whether the distinction the SFO has drawn in this context is meaningful. Companies facing the threat of prosecution may question if there is a practical difference between failing to achieve a credit and being penalised.

Highlighting exculpatory material to the SFO 9.4.8

In recent years, the SFO has emphasised the importance of holding individuals accountable for criminal behaviour. The Corporate Co-operation Guidance repeats this overarching objective in its introductory remarks. It also articulates a new and controversial expectation that a co-operative company will also assist the SFO in identifying documents or information capable of assisting a potential accused or undermining the case for the prosecution (typically called 'exculpatory material'). This may be a result of the criticisms the SFO faced last year in the case of R(AL) v SFO.[61] In that case, the English High Court made plain its view that the SFO had not complied with its duty, as a prosecuting authority, to take steps to obtain relevant materials (in that case interview notes) so that they could be disclosed in the criminal proceedings against an individual in accordance with the defendant's right to a fair trial under Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights. The extent to which this expectation places a new burden on co-operating companies remains to be seen.

In practice, the overall level of co-operation requested by the SFO in its Corporate Co-operation Guidance may feel uncomfortable for a corporate – particularly one not in a regulated sector – unfamiliar with regulatory oversight. Some practitioners would argue that there should be a curb on the extent of the co-operation expected by the SFO and that corporates should do what they are legally required to do and thereafter exercise careful judgement as to the merits of co-operating further (e.g., there may be risks in identifying and providing material beyond what is sought through mandatory requests).

60 Speech by Lisa Osofsky, Director of the SFO, on 3 April 2019.

61 R. (on the application of AL) v. Serious Fraud Office [2018] EWHC 856 (Admin).

9.5 Co-operation can lead to reduced penalties

Co-operation with authorities in criminal cases has always been rewarded with a more lenient outcome for a defendant: whether through the statutory recognition that a sentence should be reduced for a guilty plea at the earliest opportunity (the current guideline being a reduction of one-third),[62] through the passing of a less onerous type of sentence (a non-custodial as opposed to a custodial sentence), or through a lower multiplier being used to calculate a fine for a corporate. Conversely, attempts to conceal misconduct will be taken into account and result in a more severe sentence.[63]

Individuals who plead guilty and offer significant voluntary co-operation with a prosecutor, may be entitled to a lesser sentence under section 73 of the Serious Crime and Police Act 2005 (SOCPA).[64] A defendant enters into an agreement with the authorities under SOCPA to provide certain assistance, the extent and nature of which is taken into account when he or she is sentenced. The assistance is often directed at obtaining evidence about other individuals, or establishing facts that advance the investigation. This approach is being used increasingly in fraud and organised crime cases. It has been used effectively by the FCA and has resulted in defendants avoiding immediate sentences of imprisonment.[65]

The likelihood of prosecution and the likely sanction in the event of conviction are important factors in any decision voluntarily to co-operate with an investigation by a regulatory or enforcement body. This is primarily because there is no guarantee that voluntary co-operation will result in a reduced sanction or complete immunity. The corporate and its advisers should not lose sight of the fact that, where there are allegations that criminal offences or regulatory breaches have been committed, the regulatory and enforcement bodies' primary role is to properly investigate and prosecute or otherwise sanction the offender.

The more serious the offence, the less likely it is that a DPA (as opposed to prosecution) will be considered to be in the public interest. However, in the Rolls-Royce case, the court acknowledged that, notwithstanding the gravity of the wrongdoing committed by Rolls-Royce, on the right terms it was in the interests 62 s.144 Criminal Justice Act 2003, and the Sentencing Council Definitive Guideline on Reduction in Sentence for a Guilty Plea. See also Attorney General's Guidance on the acceptance of pleas: https://www.gov.uk/guidance/the-acceptance-of-pleas-and-the-prosecutors-role-in-the-sentencing-exercise.

63 See, for example, 'Fraud, Bribery and Money Laundering Offences Definitive Guideline' 1 October 2014, p. 50. (See also Chapter 25 on fines, disgorgement, etc.).

64 This applies where an offence specified under the Schedule to SOCPA has been committed. Prosecutors holding SOCPA powers include the CPS, FCA and SFO. See also CPS Guidance on SOCPA: http://www.cps.gov.uk/legal/s_to_u/socpa_agreements_-_note_for_those_representing_assisting_offenders/.

65 For example, R v. Anjam Ahmed; sentencing hearing at Southwark Crown Court, 22 June 2010; a SOCPA agreement was in place resulting in a suspended, rather than immediate, term of imprisonment. (See also Chapter 25 on fines, disgorgement, etc.).

of justice to resolve the conduct by way of a DPA rather than a trial.[66] The legislation requires any financial penalty that forms part of a DPA (the 'meat' of the sentence for a company) to be broadly comparable to a fine the court would have imposed following a guilty plea.[67] However, in SFO v. Sarclad Ltd, Sir Brian Leveson, President of the Queen's Bench Division, allowed a 50 per cent discount 'given that the admissions are far in advance of the first reasonable opportunity' and therefore represented additional mitigation.[68]

Similarly, in SFO v. Rolls-Royce, a discount of 50 per cent was allowed because Rolls-Royce had demonstrated 'extraordinary cooperation'.[69] This discount comprised a discretionary 16.7 per cent discount in recognition of Rolls-Royce's co-operation, in addition to the one-third discount that is normally available as part of a DPA.[70] This discount was considered appropriate even in circumstances where Rolls-Royce was accused of corrupt practices spanning 24 years in seven countries. Rolls-Royce's co-operation, however, was extensive, including close co-operation with the SFO over the conduct of its internal investigations, granting the SFO full prior access to documents and witnesses, consulting with the SFO over media coverage, and waiving privilege over documents connected to the internal investigation. In addition, Rolls-Royce had taken considerable steps to reform its anti-bribery corruption compliance programme. Various examples of this co-operation by Rolls-Royce were detailed by Leveson P as justification for approving the terms of the DPA, who stated he was satisfied that Rolls-Royce 'could not have done more to have exposed its own misconduct'.[71]

Serco Geografix Ltd (SGL) also received a 50 per cent discount off the penalty as part of its DPA with the SFO. SGL's co-operation included assisting the SFO's criminal investigation by appointing independent lawyers to carry out a document review and provide a report to the SFO, granting the SFO unrestricted access to employee emails and waiving privilege over certain documents. The parent company, Serco Group PLC's co-operation further entailed a full change of senior management, extensive internal and external auditing and the putting in place of a corporate renewal programme aimed at improving operating practices. This DPA was notable for being the first in which a parent company took on undertakings that attached to the now dormant subsidiary. Mr Justice Davis looked to non-binding precedent when calculating the penalty and discount, noting: 'In all but one of the earlier instances of approval of DPAs the financial

66 SFO v. Rolls-Royce, Approved Judgment, (Case No. U20170036) [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249, paras. 61-64.

67 Crime and Courts Act 2013, Schedule 17, para. 5(4).

68 SFO v. Sarclad Ltd, Approved Judgment, (Case No. U20150856) [2016] 7 WLUK 220; [2016] Lloyd's Rep FC 509, para. 57.

69 SFO v. Rolls-Royce, Approved Judgment, (Case No. U20170036) [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249, para. 121.

70 See Appendix B, SFO v. Rolls-Royce, Approved Judgment, (Case No. U20170036) [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249.

71 SFO v. Rolls-Royce, Approved Judgment, (Case No. U20170036) [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249, para. 38.

penalty has been discounted by 50% rather than the one third . . . required by the Sentencing Council.'[72] The judge justified this by noting that DPAs save resources with regard to investigation and prosecution and that significant fine reductions encourage early self-reporting of corporate crime.

Tesco Stores Limited also obtained a 50 per cent reduction on the monetary penalty as part of its DPA.

In light of this string of recent cases, it would appear that companies seeking DPAs should expect at least a 50 per cent discount in return for broad and effective co-operation.

In the regulated space, co-operation can also lead to reduced penalties. Although regulated firms and individuals are required to co-operate with the FCA, the authority makes clear that proactive co-operation can benefit individuals or firms in a number of ways: this can include not pursuing enforcement action,[73] reduced charges or lighter sanctions being sought (something which may ultimately be reflected in the final notice). The FCA's Enforcement Guide makes clear that the settlement discount scheme allows a reduction in a financial penalty or period of suspension, restriction or condition that would otherwise be imposed, if agreement is reached at an early stage. Co-operation appears to be becoming ever more important. FCA procedure allows a firm to settle aspects of a case and achieve a discount in respect of those aspects, while continuing to contest other aspects of the case. Timetables for settlement discussions will be set for efficiency and effectiveness and the FCA will expect firms and others to give it all reasonable assistance in this regard.

In the competition context, cartel members who self-report and provide information about the cartel can benefit from the CMA's leniency regime. To do so, they must be the first member to report the cartel and must do so before the CMA commences an investigation of its own volition. They must also fulfil certain immunity conditions, which include maintaining continuous and complete co-operation throughout the investigation and refraining from further participation in the cartel activity.[74]

Equally, the OFSI within HM Treasury, which may impose potentially significant monetary penalties on companies and individuals for breaches of financial sanctions law, has published guidance that indicates that timely, voluntary and materially complete disclosure, made in good faith, will be a key mitigating factor when it is deciding the level of any penalty (including a potential penalty reduction of up to 50 per cent).[75]

---

72 S*FO v. Serco Geografix Ltd*, Approved Judgment, (Case No. U20190413) [2019] 7 WLUK 45, para 39.

73 See FCA Handbook, EG 2.1.4.

74 https://www.gov.uk/guidance/cartels-confess-and-apply-for-leniency and https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/284417/OFT1495.pdf.

75 'Monetary penalties for breaches of financial sanctions – guidance', OFSI, April 2017 (https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/605884/Monetary_penalties_for_breaches_of_financial_sanctions.pdf).

Other options besides co-operation 9.6

In circumstances where no regulator or enforcement body is yet involved in, or aware of, an issue, whether to co-operate at all (i.e., whether to self-report) remains a judgement call for a corporate taking into account the factors described earlier.

Once a regulator or enforcement body is on the scene, co-operation in its various forms may, as described above, afford significant advantages for a corporate. However, there is still a balance to be struck.

On the one hand, it is important that a corporate does not entirely prostrate itself where that is not warranted, that it constantly keeps under review whether the investigating or prosecuting authority has a provable case, and that it does not admit to facts or enter pleas that it has committed wrongdoing without advice. If the corporate is on reasonable grounds evidentially, it may be well advised to maintain a robust stance in the course of an investigation and even to defend the case at trial. Moreover, other factors may impact the nature and extent of the co-operation that the corporate is prepared, or able, to entertain. For example, some aspects of the voluntary co-operation that an investigative or enforcement authority might expect could be problematic for a corporate where follow-on litigation is pending or threatened, and many corporates will be unwilling to be seen to abandon current or former employees who are themselves under scrutiny and to co-operate in their investigation and prosecution.

On the other hand, where the risk of a conviction (and its potential collateral consequences) cannot be entirely excluded, a guilty plea or a DPA may be more attractive. A DPA will only be available where a corporate is deemed to have been sufficiently co-operative, and, for both pleas and DPAs, the extent of the corporate's co-operation will impact the sentencing or the fine. However, in the bribery space at least, the outcomes of the guilty plea in the Sweett Group case and the DPA in the Standard Bank case (both involving large fines with similar percentage reductions) have led commentators to consider whether fines would have been materially different in the event of a conviction after a trial. Also, a DPA is likely to include terms requiring co-operation with ongoing prosecutions and continuing disclosure obligations in respect of relevant matters (as seen with the DPAs in the Standard Bank case,[76] the Sarclad Ltd case and the Rolls-Royce case). The extent of this ongoing duty was considered, in part, in R(AL) v. SFO. In that case the court criticised the SFO for failing to seek to use Sarclad Ltd's duty of co-operation under the terms of the DPA to require it to disclose to the SFO certain witness interview notes (Sarclad Ltd had refused on the grounds that, it claimed, the notes were privileged). The court also criticised the SFO for failing to consider whether it should require a waiver of such privilege (to the extent any attached to the notes) as part of the duty of co-operation.

The position of individuals connected to alleged corporate wrongdoing is another factor practitioners consider carefully when assessing the merits of co-operation or the desirability of a DPA as opposed to a guilty plea. If the individuals whose alleged misconduct forms the basis of the case against the companies are not routinely charged or successfully prosecuted, that will become a factor corporates will have to take into account in their assessment of the overall exposure to risk.

76 Deferred Prosecution Agreement between Standard Bank PLC (now ICBC Standard Bank PLC) and the Serious Fraud Office (https://www.sfo.gov.uk/cases/standard-bank-plc/).

9.7 Companies tend to co-operate for a number of reasons

With all of that said, corporates increasingly choose to co-operate with regulators and enforcement bodies, in some cases very extensively. In some cases, this is just a matter of being a good corporate citizen and maintaining integrity and credibility in the eyes of stakeholders, government and the general public. Sometimes there will be considerable stakeholder pressure (e.g., from a new board or shareholders). Sometimes there is an ongoing relationship with the investigating authority to think about.

In other cases, there may be significant strategic benefits to co-operating. Without some degree of co-operation, a corporate will have little control over, or ability to influence, a regulatory or criminal investigation. Co-operation will often mean the company has a better view of the investigation and a greater degree of communication with the investigating authority, and these may provide an opportunity to influence the course of the investigation, to offer up mitigation to adverse findings immediately and even to effect the discontinuance of an investigation. Co-operation that is thorough and genuine throughout may help resolve the issue in a non-adversarial way (such as through a DPA), while retaining some control over what, if any, admissions are made and what is said publicly by the relevant authority.[77]

Certainly, few corporates will take lightly the financial implications of a prolonged investigation or the management time and business interruption it will entail. Nor can corporates afford to be dismissive of the impact a drawn-out process will have on the morale of employees and the risk of 'talent flight'. For many companies and their stakeholders, gaining clarity and certainty and being able to return to focusing on their day-to-day business will be an absolute priority.

77 A DPA is not, however, guaranteed, even for companies that co-operate. In R v. Skansen, a case prosecuted by the CPS in March 2018, the corporate defendant – which was by then dormant – was convicted, following a trial under section 7 of the UK Bribery Act. The company had demonstrated co-operation having investigated and self-reported conduct to the police that might not otherwise have come to light, and co-operating with the police and CPS. However, a DPA was not offered. The judge questioned why a prosecution was being brought against a dormant company against whom it was agreed that no financial penalty could be imposed and whose only sentence could be an absolute discharge. The status of the company, and a desire to send a deterrent message appear to have been the reasons: the CPS said that the public interest test for a prosecution was satisfied so that a message could be sent to others in the industry and they had decided that no ongoing benefit could be achieved by a DPA. The SFO has brokered four DPAs to date, while the CPS has not agreed any. This case is a reminder that a DPA is by no means a predictable outcome – particularly with agencies other than the SFO – even where co-operation exists.

Finally, no company will relish the prospect of a criminal conviction and the reputational impact this will have; and for many companies, there may be broader implications of a criminal conviction, such as debarment from public tendering, that outweigh the narrow legal merits of challenging allegations of wrongdoing.

Multi-agency and cross-border investigations 9.8

Overview 9.8.1

The ways regulators and criminal prosecutors choose to co-operate with each other are numerous and varied. There is undoubtedly an increasing desire for agency co-operation on domestic and international levels.

The extent of co-operation between regulators typically only becomes apparent in the event of public resolution of any wrongdoing.[78] For example, in the context of the 2017 Telia case, the DOJ noted the valuable assistance of law enforcement colleagues in 13 jurisdictions, including the United Kingdom, in investigating the matter.[79] In December 2014, the US authorities fined the US division of French infrastructure giant Alstom US$772 million in respect of bribery offences, and expressly acknowledged the assistance received from authorities in Indonesia, Switzerland, the United Kingdom, Germany, Italy, Singapore, Saudi Arabia, Cyprus and Taiwan, and the World Bank during their investigation.[80] The SFO commenced its own investigation into Alstom's UK operations, with information from Poland, Tunisia, Hungary and Lithuania, and sought to rely on the evidence of the US conviction in the UK proceedings. This example highlights the danger that one authority will use information from another to launch an investigation of its own.

Authorities work together in a number of different ways. There are informal channels of communication, agreements or memoranda of understanding (MOU), formal information gateways and treaties for mutual legal assistance. Nevertheless, authorities may assist each other passively, such as by sharing information they have gathered during their investigations or obtaining publicly available records, or by taking a rather more active role, such as by interviewing 78 In response to requests under the Freedom Information Act 2000, the SFO published some limited information as to the volume of referrals it had received, from both domestic and overseas authorities, between 2012 and 2017. Notably, with regard to bribery and corruption referrals, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office was the SFO's greatest source of referrals (https://www.sfo.gov.uk/publications/corporate-information/freedom-of-information).

79 DOJ press release: 'Telia Company AB and Its Uzbek Subsidiary Enter Into a Global Foreign Bribery Resolution of More Than $965 Million for Corrupt Payments in Uzbekistan', dated 21 September 2017 (https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/telia-company-ab-and-its-uzbek-subsidiary-enter-global-foreign-bribery-resolution-more-965).

80 DOJ press release: 'Alstom Pleads Guilty and Agrees to Pay $772 Million Criminal Penalty to Resolve Foreign Bribery Charges', dated 22 December 2014 (https://www.fbi.gov/news/pressrel/press-releases/alstom-pleads-guilty-and-agrees-to-pay-772-million-criminal-penalty-to-resolve-foreign-bribery-charges).

witnesses, providing logistical support to enable foreign authorities to conduct their own witness interviews and allowing secondments.[81]

Authorities share information, increasingly frequently and informally, on an 'intelligence only' basis. This has the advantage of speedily progressing an investigation by the exchange of, for example, banking, trading or company data without the delay associated with formal information channels. If the information is ultimately required for evidence in a criminal case, a formal route (i.e., a letter of request (LOR)) will be used to obtain the same information in evidential form.

9.8.2 Memoranda of understanding

Authorities commonly enter into MOU with authorities in their own or other jurisdictions where both exercise similar functions, or are concerned with the same issues (e.g., the PRA and the FCA have entered into a number of MOU with equivalent authorities in other jurisdictions[82]). Some multi-party MOU exist, such as the International Organization of Securities Commissions' Multilateral Memorandum of Understanding Concerning Consultation and Cooperation and the Exchange of Information, to which over 109 parties are presently signatories.[83] MOU are not legally binding, but declare a shared commitment and aim to provide useful guidelines enabling faster and more efficient sharing of information.

Confidentiality clauses feature in MOU and there are carve-outs where to provide the information requested would violate domestic law or interfere with ongoing domestic criminal proceedings, for example.

9.8.3 Information gateways

There exist a number of statutory powers available to investigatory, regulatory and prosecution bodies to supply and share information with each other, domestically and internationally. These are commonly known as 'information gateways' and have a statutory basis.[84]

---

81 For example, in December 2016 the US DOJ Criminal Division announced it would second a lawyer to the UK for two years to work at the Financial Conduct Authority and the Serious Fraud Office, to further cooperation between the jurisdictions and share best practice. https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2016/12/09/us-department-justice-secondee/.

82 See, for example, the MOU between the Dubai Financial Services Authority and the PRA dated 12 June 2014 and the MOU between the Bank of Korea and the PRA & Bank of England dated 16 December 2014. Other examples include the MOU between the CFTC and FSA dated 17 November 2006 ('developed . . . in order to enhance their respective capabilities to address potential abusive or manipulative trading practices that may involve trading on UK and US derivatives exchanges') and the MOU between the SEC and the FCA dated 22 July 2013 concerning the consultation, co-operation and exchange of information related to the supervision of the relevant entities in the asset management industry.

83 May 2002, revised May 2012. A list of current signatories can be found here: http://www.iosco.org/about/?subSection=mmou&subSection1=signatories.

84 For instance, the information gateway for the SFO is in section 3(5) of the Criminal Justice Act 1987, for the CMA in Part 9 of the Enterprise Act 2002 (EA02) and the FCA and the PRA within section 349 of FSMA 2000.

For example, Part 9 of Enterprise Act 2002 prohibits the disclosure of information received by the CMA except, for example, where it is disclosing that information to another authority for the purpose of criminal proceedings. This gateway could be used in a LIBOR or FX-type investigation involving both criminal and competition issues.

There are limitations on the transmission of information. Any information so disclosed must be used only for the relevant purpose and the CMA must not make the disclosure unless it is satisfied that it is proportionate.[85] The CMA also must (so far as practicable) exclude from disclosure any information that is contrary to the public interest, commercial information that it believes might significantly harm the legitimate business interests of the undertaking to which it relates, or information relating to the private affairs of an individual, disclosure of which might significantly harm the individual's interests. Where the information is being transferred overseas additional limitations apply (e.g., seriousness of offence, appropriate local protection for the privilege against self-incrimination in criminal proceedings, storage of personal data).

Mutual legal assistance 9.8.4

Mutual legal assistance (MLA) is a formal method of co-operation between countries for obtaining assistance in the investigation or prosecution of criminal offences.[86] The nature of the assistance varies, but includes obtaining documentary evidence, conducting interviews, taking witness statements, requesting the execution of search warrants, freezing assets and producing bank documents.[87] Authorities will resort to MLA with their counterparties to receive evidence that cannot be gained through informal (and far quicker) means of co-operation, or where formal evidence is required. For instance, while one authority may ask another to obtain a witness statement, that authority will only be able to comply if the witness voluntarily agrees to give a statement. If that consent is not forthcoming, the requesting authority must instead resort to making an MLA request to compel the witness to provide evidence.

See Chapter 28 on extraterritoriality

An important limitation for requests under legal assistance treaties is that the requesting country must comply not only with its own laws but with the requested country's laws: meaning that in practice, MLA requests can be resource-intensive to prepare and serve.[88] However, in the United Kingdom, Unaoil's application for

85 Ibid.

86 In March 2017, the SFO published a response to a request made pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act listing the number of new and supplemental MLA requests it had executed on an annual basis between 2012 and 2017 (https://www.sfo.gov.uk/publications/corporate-information/freedom-of-information/). In 2016/17, the SFO accepted for execution 20 new MLA requests and 13 supplemental requests (down from 24 and 20 respectively in 2015/16).

87 Further guidance as to the types of assistance available from the UK authorities can be found in section 3 of the Home Office publication 'Requests for Mutual Legal Assistance in Criminal Matters: Guidelines for Authorities Outside of the United Kingdom – 2015' (12th edition – May 2015).

88 In recent years, steps have been taken to simplify the legal framework for co-operation between Member States of the European Union on criminal investigations. European investigation orders judicial review shows that there is a high bar for successfully challenging MLA requests through this mechanism.[89] Unaoil unsuccessfully applied to challenge the SFO's MLA request to the Monaco authorities for assistance in carrying out dawn raids, interviews and seizure of materials in Monaco, arguing that the letter requesting assistance failed to disclose key information about the case. The court made clear that the duty of candour, which attaches to UK search warrants, did not apply to MLA requests and that questions around the fairness of the raids and seizures should be resolved in accordance with local law. A successful judicial review challenge therefore would likely have to show that the SFO had no reasonable grounds for suspicion at the time the MLA request was made or that there was some other breach of the Crime (International Co-operation) Act, which gives the authority the power to request assistance from international authorities.

Voluntary co-operation with an authority can result in requests for the corporate to obtain documents from overseas where it can, as a demonstration of its ongoing and genuine co-operation.[90]

9.9 Strategies for dealing with multiple authorities

Companies should proceed on the assumption that authorities share or will share information and materials. It may be clear from the outset that an issue affecting a corporate operating in multiple jurisdictions would likely attract the attention of authorities in those countries. Alternatively, an authority may effectively be tipped off following a MLA request for assistance from a foreign authority and, on the basis of information provided pursuant to that request, commence its own investigation.

Accordingly, a coherent strategy for dealing with such attention should be formulated from the outset. The company may find it sensible to engage in an open and pragmatic dialogue with each authority regarding matters such as timetables and document requests, and be proactive in encouraging the authorities to take the same approach with each other wherever possible. Ultimately, if more than one agency has a legitimate basis on which to enforce, it is usually preferable to bring the matter to a combined resolution.

(EIOs) are judicial decisions taken in one Member State that are carried out by authorities in another. They relate to specific investigative measures to gather evidence in one Member State on behalf of another and allow for the sharing of evidence between Member States. EIOs were introduced into EU law through the EIO Directive 2014/41/EU and came into force in the United Kingdom on 31 July 2017 through the Criminal Justice (European Investigation Order) Regulations 2017, SI 2017/730.

89 Unaenergy Group Holding Pte Ltd & Ors. v. The Director of the Serious Fraud Office [2017] EWHC 600 (Admin).

90 Where a company does not voluntarily provide such documents, the SFO may seek to compel production. The English High Court ruled in the case of R (KBR Inc.) v The SFO [2018] EWHC 2012 (Admin) that the scope of the SFO's power to compel the production of data extends to: data of a UK company held abroad; and data of a non-UK company held abroad, provided there is a 'sufficient connection' between that company and the United Kingdom.

The following additional points should be considered when dealing with multi-agency investigations:

- Consider what enquiries or internal investigation should be conducted. An internal investigation will enable a company to quantify potential risk and to develop a strategy to cope with concurrent investigations. It can, however, be difficult to structure an internal investigation so that material generated is privileged in each jurisdiction involved (if privilege is even recognised). Moreover, potential exposures in one jurisdiction might mean enquiries elsewhere need to be more circumspect.
- Ensure that an appropriate employee (most likely a member of the in-house legal team) is given specific responsibility for co-ordinating the corporate's response to the investigations. Where international authorities are involved, the corporate should consider whether to form an internal response team to include employees from all affected jurisdictions.
- When formulating a strategy for dealing with concurrent investigations, consider which authorities are likely to be more influential or proactive and consider adopting an approach that takes into account their likely priorities or concerns.
- Engage specialised legal counsel to interface with law enforcement, including, where subject to overseas investigations, instructing and seeking advice from local counsel as necessary. This is particularly important if complying with a request for information from one authority may leave employees at risk of breaching data protection laws in other jurisdictions.
- Make sure that consistent explanations and documents are given (including considering whether developing a narrative 'script' may be helpful) and, so far as possible, that consistent approaches are adopted across all investigations (including coordination with local counsel and any other relevant external advisers).
- Where relevant, attempt to adopt a standardised approach to privilege across all investigations (which may necessitate careful negotiation with all authorities if approaches to privilege in their jurisdictions differ considerably).
- When considering whether to enter into settlement discussions, consider whether it would be beneficial to engage with all authorities at the same time. This may not be possible in circumstances where authorities are at differing stages in their investigation timetables, but would have the benefit of managing negative impacts such as business interruption, and harm to reputation and share price, as well as removing the need for ongoing company resources to be dedicated to overseeing the concurrent investigations. Encourage a holistic approach to sanctions across multiple jurisdictions, so as to avoid multiple monitorships or duplicative reparation and, where possible, to minimise fines.

Conclusion 9.10

Corporates are increasingly expected to co-operate with regulatory agencies and criminal authorities, even when such co-operation is voluntary. The DPAs corporates have entered into with the SFO demonstrate this expectation.

Corporates are coming under pressure from the public, stakeholders and government to act as good corporate citizens. Maintaining credibility with capital markets can be an additional factor in a decision to co-operate.

Co-operation is relevant at every stage of an investigation, and for every outcome. It requires continual and genuine assistance, prompt reporting of wrongdoing, and access to hard copy materials, electronic data and potential witnesses.

The conduct of internal investigations, witness interviews and legal privilege are becoming fraught battlegrounds.

Corporates should expect the involvement of multiple agencies across multiple jurisdictions as the co-operation between agencies and authorities increases.

10

Co-operating with the Authorities: The US Perspective

John D Buretta, Megan Y Lew and Courtney A Gans[1]

Government investigations of corporations can start quietly or loudly. A subpoena might arrive in the mail; an employee might speak up to a manager; federal agents might raid the offices and seize files, computers and cell phones; or border patrol agents might stop an employee, or a CEO, at the airport. However an investigation commences, a critical question at the outset is whether the company should co-operate in a government inquiry, and, if so, how, and to what extent. Like a game of chess, a company's opening moves can dictate the end game and must be chosen with care. In the best case, investigations quickly and cost-effectively point the authorities toward individual wrongdoers, the company's effort is short-lived, and it incurs no penalty. In the worst case, Pandora's box is opened.

While the decision to co-operate will turn on the unique factual and legal circumstances faced by a company, this chapter aims to guide the reader through the decision-making process, whether the investigation concerns the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA), securities, antitrust or sanctions laws, or the False Claims Act, or other government actions. This chapter discusses how US government authorities define co-operation, identifies the pros and cons of co-operating with the authorities and discusses special considerations in multi-agency and cross-border investigations.

What is co-operation? 10.1

Co-operating with a US government authority generally entails providing all relevant, non-privileged information. This can amount to ensuring that key witnesses are available for interviews by the government, sharing information gleaned from internal interviews of employees, providing relevant documents as well as context and background for those documents, giving factual presentations, and agreeing to take remedial action where appropriate.

1 John D Buretta is a partner, Megan Y Lew is a practice area attorney and Courtney A Gans is an associate at Cravath, Swaine & Moore LLP.

10.1.1 Department of Justice's general approach to co-operation

The Department of Justice (DOJ) issues guidance and policies for prosecutors in its Justice Manual. Its chapter on Principles of Federal Prosecution of Business Organizations sets forth ten factors that prosecutors should consider when investigating, deciding whether to charge and negotiating a plea or other agreement with a company. Among these is consideration for 'the corporation's willingness to cooperate, including as to potential wrongdoing by its agents'.[2] The Justice Manual states that a company is eligible for co-operation credit if it:

> identif[ies] all individuals substantially involved in or responsible for the misconduct at issue, regardless of their position, status or seniority, and provide[s] to the Department all relevant facts relating to that misconduct. If a company seeking co-operation credit declines to learn of such facts or to provide the Department with complete factual information about the individuals substantially involved in or responsible for the misconduct, its co-operation will not be considered a mitigating factor under this section.[3]

In other words, to obtain co-operation credit, a company must provide all non-privileged facts concerning misconduct.[4] In addition, the company must not intentionally remain ignorant about misconduct and cannot cherry-pick facts to share with the DOJ.

The DOJ's current approach to co-operation, as reflected in the Justice Manual, emphasises holding individuals accountable for their misconduct and strongly encourages companies to disclose the identities of individuals involved. Prior to September 2015, companies might obtain partial co-operation credit without identifying the individual wrongdoers to the DOJ; this might even have been sufficient to avoid charges in some instances.[5] In September 2015, the DOJ

2 US Dep't of Justice, Justice Manual § 9-28.300. Additional noteworthy factors include 'the adequacy and effectiveness of the corporation's compliance program at the time of the offense, as well as at the time of a charging decision' and 'the corporation's remedial actions, including, but not limited to, any efforts to implement an adequate and effective corporate compliance program or to improve an existing one, to replace responsible management, to discipline or terminate wrongdoers, or to pay restitution'. Id. In April 2019, the DOJ released a guidance document concerning these factors, entitled Evaluation of Corporate Compliance Programs, available at https://www.justice.gov/criminal-fraud/page/file/937501/download.

3 US Dep't of Justice, Justice Manual §§ 9-28.300, 9-28.700.

4 Id. § 9-28.720.

5 Sally Quillian Yates, Deputy Att'y Gen., US Dep't of Justice, Remarks at New York University School of Law Announcing New Policy on Individual Liability in Matters of Corporate Wrongdoing (10 September 2015), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/deputy-attorney-general-sally-quillian-yates-delivers-remarks-new-york-university-school.

announced that co-operation would require disclosure of individual misconduct, regardless of the individual's title or seniority at the company.[6] The DOJ's newly announced approach in part reflected the inherent challenges in charging individuals in complex, white-collar investigations, where prosecutors often must sort through and understand 'complex corporate hierarchies, enormous volumes of electronic documents and a variety of legal and practical challenges that can limit access to the evidence' that the DOJ needs to bring charges against individuals, especially when evidence is located outside the United States.[7]

What does this mean in practice for a company under investigation? The DOJ wants to learn information such as: how and when the alleged misconduct occurred; who promoted or approved it; who was responsible for committing it;[8] and which individuals played significant roles in setting a company on a course of criminal conduct.[9] To provide this, company counsel may relay facts to the DOJ by producing relevant documents, allowing the DOJ to interview employees (including acquiescing to 'deconfliction' requests from the DOJ that the government interview employees before company counsel does so), proffering information obtained from an internal investigation or analysing voluminous or complex documents. To obtain full credit, the DOJ will consider the timeliness of the disclosures, whether the company undertook a proactive approach to co-operating, and the thoroughness of the company's investigation.[10] The DOJ does not expect companies to undertake a 'years-long, multimillion dollar investigation every time a company learns of misconduct'; rather, companies are expected 'to carry out a thorough investigation tailored to the scope of the wrongdoing'.[11] Nor does the DOJ want companies to delay their investigations 'merely to collect information about individuals whose involvement was not substantial, and who are not likely to be prosecuted'. The investigation should instead focus on individuals who had 'significant roles' in the misconduct.[12] In practice, companies seeking co-operation therefore need not 'have all the facts lined up on the first day' they

6 Id.

7 Id.

8 US Dep't of Justice, Justice Manual § 9-28.720.

9 Rod J. Rosenstein, Deputy Att'y Gen., US Dep't of Justice, Remarks at the American Conference Institute's 35th International Conference on the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (29 November 2018), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/deputy-attorney-general-rod-j-rosenstein-delivers-remarks-american-conference-institute-0.

10 US Dep't of Justice, Justice Manual § 9-28.700.

11 Sally Quillian Yates, Deputy Att'y Gen., US Dep't of Justice, Remarks at the New York City Bar Association White Collar Crime Conference (10 May 2016), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/deputy-attorney-general-sally-q-yates-delivers-remarks-new-york-city-bar-association.

12 Rod J. Rosenstein, Deputy Att'y Gen., US Dep't of Justice, Remarks at the American Conference Institute's 35th International Conference on the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (29 November 2018), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/deputy-attorney-general-rod-j-rosenstein-delivers-remarks-american-conference-institute-0.

talk to the DOJ, but they should turn over relevant information to the DOJ on a rolling basis as they receive it.[13]

To ensure that the company's disclosures to the DOJ are extensive and that its internal investigation is thorough, and to fulfil the DOJ's own obligation to make just decisions based on the fullest possible set of facts, the DOJ usually undertakes its own parallel investigation. Accordingly, the Justice Manual instructs prosecutors to:

> proactively investigat[e] individuals at every step of the process – before, during, and after any corporate co-operation. Department attorneys should vigorously review any information provided by companies and compare it to the results of their own investigation, in order to best ensure that the information provided is indeed complete and does not seek to minimize, exaggerate, or otherwise misrepresent the behaviour or role of any individual or group of individuals.[14]

Counsel may encounter situations where it is unclear whether misconduct has actually occurred, either because the corporate client does not have access to the relevant information or, even with full access, cannot discern whether there is malfeasance. In this regard, the DOJ has emphasised that it 'just want[s] the facts' – it does not expect counsel for the company 'to make a legal conclusion about whether an employee is culpable, civilly or criminally'.[15]

In other cases, a company may find that relevant documents in a foreign location cannot be produced to US authorities because of foreign data privacy, bank secrecy or other blocking laws. The Justice Manual recognises that such situations may occur and acknowledges that a company may still be eligible for co-operation credit, though the company will bear the burden of explaining why co-operation credit is still justified despite the restrictions faced by the company in gathering or disclosing certain facts.[16]

The DOJ has emphasised that co-operation does not require a company to waive the attorney–client privilege or the attorney work-product protection.[17] While a company may decide to waive these privileges and protections when it suits its interests to do so, prosecutors may not request such a waiver.[18]

13 Sally Quillian Yates, Deputy Att'y Gen., US Dep't of Justice, Remarks at the New York City Bar Association White Collar Crime Conference (10 May 2016), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/deputy-attorney-general-sally-q-yates-delivers-remarks-new-york-city-bar-association.

14 US Dep't of Justice, Justice Manual § 9-28.700.

15 Id.

16 Id.

17 US Dep't of Justice, Justice Manual § 9-28.710.

18 Id. See also Memorandum from Mark Filip, Deputy Attorney Gen., US Dep't of Justice, to Heads of Department Components and United States Attorneys (28 August 2008), available at https://www.justice.gov/sites/default/files/dag/legacy/2008/11/03/dag-memo-08282008.pdf.

Other Department of Justice policies regarding co-operation 10.1.2

Several components of the DOJ maintain policies regarding company co-operation separate from the guidelines set out in the Justice Manual. Three examples are discussed below: (1) the Criminal Division's policy regarding FCPA enforcement, (2) the Antitrust Division's leniency programme and (3) the Civil Division's False Claims Act enforcement policy.

The FCPA Pilot Program and Corporate Enforcement Policy 10.1.2.1

In April 2016, the DOJ announced a pilot programme for FCPA cases with the goal of motivating 'companies to voluntarily self-disclose FCPA-related misconduct, fully cooperate with the [DOJ Criminal Division's] Fraud Section, and, where appropriate, remediate flaws in their controls and compliance programs'.[19] The Pilot Program, which was initially meant to last one year, became a permanent DOJ programme in November 2017.[20] Known as the FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy, it is designed to encourage companies to self-report any potential FCPA violations and promote increased co-operation with the DOJ.

To be eligible for the full benefits of the FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy, companies must: (1) voluntarily self-report all facts within a reasonably prompt time, (2) offer full co-operation, and (3) undertake remedial measures in a timely fashion. In addition, the company must disgorge itself of all profits related to the misconduct. In exchange, the company is eligible to receive up to a 50 per cent reduction in any applicable fines and may avoid the necessity of appointing a monitor.[21] If a company complies with these three requirements, the DOJ will apply a presumption that the matter will be resolved through a declination.[22] 'That presumption may be overcome only if there are aggravating circumstances related to the nature and seriousness of the offense, or if the offender is a criminal recidivist.'[23] If aggravating circumstances lead the DOJ to determine that declination is not appropriate, the DOJ will nonetheless recommend a 50 per cent reduction off the low end of the US Sentencing Guidelines' fine range appropriate to the offence.[24] To date, the DOJ has issued over a dozen declination letters under the FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy.[25]

In November 2019, the DOJ made clarifying revisions to certain provisions of the FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy. First, the DOJ changed a policy that stated a company must alert theDOJ when it 'is or should be aware of 19 Leslie R Caldwell, Ass't Attorney General (5 April 2016), available at https://www.justice.gov/archives/opa/blog/criminal-division-launches-new-fcpa-pilot-program.

20 Rod Rosenstein, Deputy Attorney General, Remarks at the 34th International Conference on the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (29 November 2017), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/deputy-attorney-general-rosenstein-delivers-remarks-34th-international-conference-foreign.

21 Id.

22 Id.

23 Id.

24 Id.

25 US Dep't of Justice, Declinations (26 September 2019), available at https://www.justice.gov/criminal-fraud/corporate-enforcement-policy/declinations.

opportunities' to 'obtain relevant evidence not in the company's possession and not otherwise known to the Department'. The change removed the wording 'should be' and replaced it with 'is aware', so that the company must now only report opportunities to obtain evidence not in its possession when it is actually aware of such evidence. Second, the November update makes clear that self-disclosure following only a preliminary investigation is acceptable and may earn self-disclosure credit. A footnote in the self-disclosure section now underscores that a company 'may not be in a position to know all relevant facts at the time of a voluntary self-disclosure, especially where only preliminary investigative efforts have been possible' and provides that companies should make clear during a self-disclosure when their knowledge is based on a preliminary investigation. Third, the DOJ clarified that to receive self-disclosure credit, companies must turn over all relevant facts related to 'any individuals' who played a substantial part in the 'misconduct at issue'. The previous version of the policy stated that companies must turn over relevant facts related to 'all individuals' who played a part in a 'violation of law'. This new terminology makes it clear that a company need not determine that there has been a violation early on in the investigation in order to turn over information necessary for self-disclosure credit.[26]

10.1.2.2 The antitrust leniency programme

The DOJ Antitrust Division has a corporate leniency programme granting leniency to the first company that (1) self-discloses conduct related to unlawful anti-competitive conspiracies and (2) co-operates with the DOJ's ensuing investigation.[27] A company that has been granted leniency is only liable for the actual damages in related follow-on litigation, rather than treble damages. Additionally, a company given leniency is not liable for the damages caused by other members of the conspiracy, which a conspirator typically would be responsible for under a theory of joint-and-several liability in antitrust conspiracy cases.

10.1.2.3 The False Claims Act

In May 2019, for the first time, the DOJ issued guidelines for awarding entities with co-operation credit in False Claims Act (FCA) cases. The FCA, frequently used in healthcare litigation, imposes civil liability on entities that defraud government programmes. While the new federal guidance does not present any radically new considerations, it does provide helpful standards and brings FCA cases in line with existing DOJ practices in other types of investigations.[28]

---

26 Judy Godoy, 'DOJ Tweaks FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy for Clarity', Law360 (20 November 2019) available at https://www.law360.com/securities/articles/1221939/doj-tweaks-fcpa-corporate-enforcement-policy-for-clarity; FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy at 9-47.120.

27 Frequently Asked Questions About the Antitrust Division's Leniency Program and Model Leniency Letters (26 January 2017), available at https://www.justice.gov/atr/page/file/926521/download.

28 Peter Hutt, Michael Wagner, Michael Maya and Brooke Stanley, 'New DOJ Cooperation Credit Guidelines a Welcome Sign, but Key Questions Remain Unresolved', available at

The federal guidance contemplates eligibility for co-operation credit in FCA matters in three circumstances. First, eligibility is available for voluntary self-disclosure by entities that discover conduct that violates the FCA. Notably, co-operation credit is not limited to entities that self-disclose before an investigation commences. Rather, if '[d]uring the course of an internal investigation into the government's concerns . . . entities . . . discover additional misconduct going beyond the scope of the known concerns, . . . the voluntary self-disclosure of such additional misconduct will qualify the entity for credit.'[29] Second, co-operation credit is available for entities providing assistance to an ongoing government investigation, including, but not limited to, identifying employees or individuals responsible for the misconduct, accepting responsibility for the misconduct, making employees available for depositions and interviews, and preserving and collecting relevant information and data in excess of what is required by law. Finally, entities that undertake remedial measures in response to an FCA violation may also be eligible for co-operation credit.

Approaches to co-operation by other federal agencies 10.1.3

Other US enforcement agencies take similar approaches to rewarding company co-operation. Two examples of such agency processes – the US Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) and the Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) – are described below.

The SEC's approach to co-operation was first described in a report of investigation and statement regarding the public company Seaboard.[30] This report, which became known as the 'Seaboard Report', concluded that charges against Seaboard were not warranted based on the consideration of four broad factors: (1) self-policing by the company prior to the discovery of the misconduct; (2) self-reporting the misconduct to the SEC, including investigating the misconduct; (3) remediation of the misconduct; and (4) co-operation with the SEC.[31] The benefits of co-operating with the SEC could range from the SEC 'declining an enforcement action, to narrowing charges, limiting sanctions or including mitigating or similar language in charging documents'.[32] Entry into a deferred or non-prosecution agreement may also be an option depending on the level of https://www.insidegovernmentcontracts.com/2019/05/new-doj-cooperation-credit-guidelines-a-welcome-sign-but-key-questions-remain-unresolved/.

29 US Dep't of Justice, Justice Manual § 4-4.112.

30 Report of Investigation Pursuant to Section 21(a) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and Commission Statement on the Relationship of Co-operation to Agency Enforcement Decisions, Release No. 34-44969 (23 Oct. 2001) (Seaboard Report), available at https://www.sec.gov/litigation/investreport/34-44969.htm.

31 Id. See also US Securities and Exchange Commission, Spotlight on Enforcement Cooperation Program (20 Sept. 2016), available at https://www.sec.gov/spotlight/enforcement-cooperation-initiative.shtml.

32 Andrew Ceresney, Director, SEC Division of Enforcement, Remarks at University of Texas School of Law's Government Enforcement Institute in Dallas, Texas (13 May 2015), available at https://www.sec.gov/news/speech/sec-co-operation-program.html.

co-operation from the company.[33] Similar to the DOJ's current approach, the SEC expects a co-operating company to provide 'the Commission staff with all information relevant to the underlying violations and the company's remedial efforts'.[34]

The CFTC, which regulates US derivatives markets, also offers co-operation credit. While the CFTC has had a longstanding policy of offering co-operation credit, in 2017 it issued advisories that further incentivised 'individuals and companies to cooperate fully and truthfully in CFTC investigations and enforcement actions'.[35] Similar to the approaches adopted by the DOJ and SEC, the CFTC will, in its discretion, consider the following broad factors in determining whether to grant co-operation credit: (1) 'the value of the co-operation' to the instant investigation and enforcement action; (2) 'the value of the co-operation to the [CFTC's] broader law enforcement interests'; (3) 'the culpability of the company or individual and other relevant factors'; and (4) 'uncooperative conduct that offsets or limits credit that the company or individual would otherwise receive'.[36] The CFTC's advisories emphasise that co-operation credit will be given to co-operation that is 'sincere', 'robust' and 'indicative of a willingness to accept responsibility for the misconduct'.[37] The benefits of co-operating with the CFTC range from the agency taking no enforcement action to imposing reduced charges against the co-operating company.[38] Furthermore, in March 2019, the CFTC announced a new advisory on self-reporting and co-operation to build on the existing foundation of co-operation to further incentivise 'individuals and

33 Id. See, e.g., Deferred Prosecution Agreement between Tenaris, S.A. and the SEC (23 March 2011), available at https://www.sec.gov/news/press/2011/2011-112-dpa.pdf; Non-Prosecution Agreement between Akami Technologies, Inc. and the SEC (3 May 2016), available at https://www.sec.gov/news/press/2016/2016-109-npa-akamai.pdf.

34 US Securities and Exchange Commission, Spotlight on Enforcement Cooperation Program (20 September 2016), available at https://www.sec.gov/spotlight/enforcement-cooperation-initiative.shtml.

35 US Commodity Futures Trading Commission, Release Number 7518-17, CFTC's Enforcement Division Issues New Advisories on Co-operation (19 January 2017), available at https://www.cftc.gov/PressRoom/PressReleases/pr7518-17. See US Commodity Futures Trading Commission, Enforcement Advisory: Co-operation Factors in Enforcement Division Sanction Recommendations for Companies (19 January 2017), available at https://www.cftc.gov/sites/default/files/idc/groups/public/@lrenforcementactions/documents/legalpleading/enfadvisorycompanies011917.pdf; US Commodity Futures Trading Commission, Enforcement Advisory: Co-operation Factors in Enforcement Division Sanction Recommendations for Individuals (19 January 2017), available at https://www.cftc.gov/sites/default/files/idc/groups/public/@lrenforcementactions/documents/legalpleading/enfadvisoryindividuals011917.pdf.

36 US Commodity Futures Trading Commission, Release Number 7518-17, CFTC's Enforcement Division Issues New Advisories on Co-operation (19 January 2017), available at https://www.cftc.gov/PressRoom/PressReleases/pr7518-17.

37 US Commodity Futures Trading Commission, Enforcement Advisory: Co-operation Factors in Enforcement Division Sanction Recommendations for Companies (19 January 2017), available at https://www.cftc.gov/sites/default/files/idc/groups/public/@lrenforcementactions/documents/legalpleading/enfadvisorycompanies011917.pdf.

38 Id.

companies to self-report misconduct, cooperate fully in CFTC investigations and enforcement actions, and appropriately remediate to ensure the wrongdoing does not happen again'.[39]

The CFTC advisories collectively list dozens of specific and concrete factors that the agency will consider when assessing whether to grant co-operation credit.[40] Company counsel may find it beneficial to refer to these factors when determining the company's course of action at various points in time, such as when learning about misconduct, investigating misconduct, self-disclosing misconduct to government authorities and co-operating with government authorities. For example, the advisory concerning co-operation by companies includes a section concerning the 'quality' of the company's co-operation, which the advisory states should be assessed by looking at whether the company 'willingly used all available means to . . . preserve all relevant information', 'make employee testimony' or company documents 'available in a timely manner', 'explain transactions and interpret key information', and 'respond quickly to requests and subpoenas for information from the CFTC', among other things.[41] Indeed, these considerations are relevant to any situation where a company is considering co-operating with authorities, regardless of the type of misconduct or whether the misconduct falls under the jurisdiction of the CFTC.

Case study: Walmart 10.1.4

Choosing to co-operate with the government is not a one-size-fits-all decision, and companies often may choose to (or be able to) co-operate with some aspects of a government investigation, but not others. For example, in June 2019, Walmart Inc and a Brazilian Walmart subsidiary agreed to pay US$137 million to settle criminal charges brought by the DOJ in connection to alleged FCPA violations. These allegations arose out of conduct that occurred from 2000 to 2011, in which Walmart employees failed to implement and maintain the company's internal accounting controls to prevent improper payments to foreign government officials. This lapse in controls allowed Walmart subsidiaries in Mexico, India, Brazil and China to hire third-party intermediaries who, in turn, made improper gifts and payments to foreign officials to open store locations in those countries without delay, avoiding detection from Walmart's accounting system. Crucially, certain senior executives at the company were aware of this lapse in controls, yet these practices persisted.[42]

39 US Commodity Futures Trading Commission, CFTC Division of Enforcement Issues Advisory on Violations of the Commodity Exchange Act Involving Foreign Corrupt Practices, Release No. 7884-19 (9 March 2019), available at https://www.cftc.gov/PressRoom/PressReleases/7884-19.

40 See US Commodity Futures Trading Commission, Enforcement Advisory: Co-operation Factors in Enforcement Division Sanction Recommendations for Companies (19 January 2017), available at https://www.cftc.gov/sites/default/files/idc/groups/public/@lrenforcementactions/documents/legalpleading/enfadvisorycompanies011917.pdf.

41 Id.

42 US Dep't of Justice, 'Walmart Inc. and Brazil-Based Subsidiary Agree to Pay $137 Million to Resolve Foreign Corrupt Practices Act Case', press release (20 June 2019), available at

Walmart's co-operation with the government led to a reduction in the overall fine that was levied against the company. Walmart fully co-operated with the investigations into conduct in Brazil, China and India; however, it did not provide full documents and information in connection with the Mexican investigation and chose to interview a key witness before making the witness available for a DOJ interview, contrary to the DOJ's request. Furthermore, Walmart did not self-disclose the misconduct that occurred in Mexico, while it had disclosed the conduct in the other countries. Because Walmart fully co-operated with the investigations in Brazil, China and India, it received a 25 per cent reduction in the fines applicable to those jurisdictions under the US Sentencing Guidelines, while it only received a 20 per cent reduction in the fines applicable to the Mexican misconduct.[43]

10.2 Key benefits and drawbacks to co-operation

Deciding whether to co-operate with a government investigation requires careful consideration of the associated benefits and drawbacks. On the one hand, co-operation affords the opportunity of reduced or no charges and penalties; however, co-operation also brings other risks.

10.2.1 Reduced or no charges and penalties

By and large, companies and individuals choose to co-operate with the government to receive some leniency in the form of reduced (or even no) penalties or charges. Research has shown that companies that choose to co-operate with the government tend to achieve better outcomes and typically end up paying lower fines than those that do not.[44] For example, in 2016, Dutch telecommunications company VimpelCom (now known as VEON) paid a criminal fine to the DOJ and Dutch authorities of US$460 million rather than US$836 million to US$1.67 billion, as suggested by the US Sentencing Guidelines, because of the Dutch telecommunications company's co-operation with the DOJ in its investigation of alleged FCPA violations.[45] On the other hand, in 2015, Alstom SA was required to pay a criminal fine of US$772 million, the largest-ever recorded fine for FCPA violations at that time, in part because of 'Alstom's failure to voluntarily https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/walmart-inc-and-brazil-based-subsidiary-agree-pay-137-million-resolve-foreign-corrupt.

43 Id.

44 See, e.g., Alan Crawford, 'Research Shows It Pays To Cooperate With Financial Investigations, Impact' (June 2014), available at http://pac.org/wp-content/uploads/Impact_06_2014.pdf.

45 US Dep't of Justice, 'VimpelCom Limited and Unitel LLC Enter into Global Foreign Bribery Resolution of More Than $795 Million; United States Seeks $850 Million Forfeiture in Corrupt Proceeds of Bribery Scheme', press release (18 February 2016), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/vimpelcom-limited-and-unitel-llc-enter-global-foreign-bribery-resolution-more-795-million.

disclose the misconduct . . . [and] Alstom's refusal to fully cooperate with the department's investigation for several years'.[46]

In addition to the reduced monetary fines that can result from co-operation, the form of a penalty may also vary depending on whether, and how much, a company co-operates with government authorities. If a company has fully co-operated, the government may consider offering a declination (the government declines to prosecute the entity for any alleged wrongdoing), if the facts and circumstances warrant such a resolution. If a declination is not an option, the next best scenario is a non-prosecution agreement (NPA), which is a contractual agreement between the wrongdoer and the government in which the government agrees not to bring criminal charges in exchange for certain requirements from the company (e.g., a fine, admitting to certain facts, further co-operating with the government or entering into compliance or remediation efforts). Another option in the government's toolbox is a deferred prosecution agreement (DPA), which is an agreement with the government where criminal charges are filed with the court but prosecution is postponed for a certain period in exchange for the company undertaking certain conditions (e.g., payment of fines, compliance reforms, further co-operating with the government, annual reporting or certification requirements, or the appointment of a monitor). If the company complies with these conditions, the government will move to dismiss the charges at the end of the term of deferment. Unlike NPAs, DPAs require court approval, which is usually granted. Finally, if the government believes a stronger penalty is warranted, it could request that a subsidiary of the company, rather than the parent, enter a guilty plea, which can reduce some of the collateral consequences facing the parent company had it been required to plead guilty.

Suspension and debarment 10.2.2

In addition to criminal fines, companies may also face collateral damage from pleading guilty, or otherwise admitting to wrongdoing. For instance, companies in the healthcare, defence and construction fields are particularly vulnerable because any admissions of wrongdoing could have the collateral consequence of excluding them from eligibility for the government contracts on which their business heavily relies. Furthermore, any admission of wrongdoing could trigger a host of civil litigation from shareholders or other claimants. Similarly in the Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA) sphere, entities that have registered as a qualified professional asset manager, allowing them to work with pension funds and make investments for ERISA clients, may have their status revoked by the Department of Labor if key individuals or the company has been convicted of a crime. Likewise, for companies regulated by the SEC, enforcement actions can result in suspension, disbarment, or both, from the securities markets. Furthermore, even if an issuer is not disqualified altogether, it can lose its well-known seasoned issuer status if it has been found to violate the securities laws. This can have a significant impact on an issuer's ability to quickly file registration statements with the SEC and the issuer's ability to appropriately time the market when offering securities for sale.[47]

46 US Dep't of Justice, 'Alstom Sentenced to Pay $772 Million Criminal Fine to Resolve Foreign Bribery Charges', press release (13 November 2015), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/alstom-pleads-guilty-and-agrees-pay-772-million-criminal-penalty-resolve-foreign-bribery.

See Chapter 26 on fines, disgorgement, etc

In July 2019, the SEC announced that it was changing certain rules related to settlement offers to streamline the process for issuers seeking to settle violations of the securities laws and, concurrently, requesting a waiver from certain collateral consequences of such violations. Chairman Jay Clayton announced:

> Recognizing that a segregated process for considering contemporaneous settlement offers and waiver requests may not produce the best outcome for investors in all circumstances, I believe it is appropriate to make it clear that a settling entity can request that the [SEC] consider an offer of settlement that simultaneously addresses both the underlying enforcement action and any related collateral disqualifications.[48]

The simultaneous review of offers of settlement and requests for waivers is a noteworthy development because previously the SEC considered these requests separately, resulting in longer delay and uncertainty for issuers it regulates.[49]

10.2.3 Financial cost

While co-operation between company counsel and the DOJ can save scarce government resources, it often represents a significant cost for the company itself. A company may generally be better placed to run an investigation because conceivably it may know where information is housed and whom to talk to, and can more readily determine the relevant facts and documents at issue. Running a high-quality, diligent and thorough internal investigation, despite the relative ease of doing so, is expensive. Document review of company emails, hiring external counsel, travel to and from interviews and preparing presentations to the government, all add up to significant expense. Moreover, if individual employees are implicated in the wrongdoing, they may also choose to hire their own counsel who will also perform an investigation, albeit in a more limited fashion, for which the company may bear financial responsibility. Finally, companies that are found to have committed misconduct may also need to reimburse the victims of their 47 Adam Hakki et al., 'SEC Chairman Announces Significant Changes To Commission Procedures For Considering Disqualification Waivers', Shearman & Sterling (7 August 2019), available at https://www.shearman.com/perspectives/2019/08/sec-chairman-announces-significant-changes-to-commission-procedures.

48 Jay Clayton, Chairman US Securities and Exchange Commission, 'Statement Regarding Offers of Settlement', Public Statement, (3 July 2019), available at https://www.sec.gov/news/public-statement/clayton-statement-regarding-offers-settlement.

49 Adam Hakki et al, Sec Chairman Announces Significant Changes To Commission Procedures For Considering Disqualification Waivers, Shearman & Sterling (7 August2019), available at https://www.shearman.com/perspectives/2019/08/sec-chairman-announces-significant-changes-to-commission-procedures.

misconduct for certain expenses or pay restitution, which could be considerable and affect other aspects of an investigation or settlement. For example, in 2016, asset management firm Och-Ziff (now named Sculptor Capital Management) agreed to a US$213 million criminal settlement with the DOJ and SEC for violations of the FCPA. In September 2019, however, Judge Garaufis of the Eastern District of New York ruled that certain former investors in a Congolese mine should be classified as victims of Och-Ziff's misconduct, raising the question of whether those investors would be entitled to restitution from the firm. While Judge Garaufis has not yet ruled on whether, and in what amount, these investors are entitled to restitution, the investors claim that they are entitled to US$1.8 billion, opening up the possibility that Och-Ziff may be obligated to pay out more than it agreed to in its settlement with the government. Och-Ziff and the DOJ will submit further briefing on this issue.[50]

Recently, there has also been a trend of victims attempting to recoup the costs of their own internal investigations in connection to misconduct under principles of restitution. In May 2018, however, the United States Supreme Court held that the Mandatory Victims Restitution Act's (MVRA) provision for reimbursement of expenses related to investigations only applied to government investigations and not to private investigations undertaken by a victim.[51] The MVRA requires that certain convicted felons 'reimburse the victim for lost income and necessary child care, transportation, and other expenses incurred during participation in the investigation or prosecution of the offense or attendance at proceedings related to the offense'.[52] The Court found that the MVRA does not 'cover the costs of a private investigation that the victim chooses on its own to conduct, which are not "incurred during" participation in a government's investigation'.[53] Even if 'the victim shared the results of its private investigation with the Government', that does not mean that the private investigation was 'necessary' under the MVRA.[54]

Disruption to business 10.2.4

Any business executive or in-house counsel will know keenly that an investigation, regardless of whether the company chooses to co-operate with government authorities, will result in some amount of disruption to key business activities. While declining to co-operate with an investigation should not in and of itself indicate an organisation's culpability, it could have negative public relations consequences as investors and other third-party stakeholders may view this as indicative of guilt or the degree of financial penalty. The Justice Manual does make clear, however, that 'the decision not to co-operate by a corporation . . . is not itself

See Chapter 39 on protecting corporate reputation

50 Dylan Tokar, 'Restitution Battle Throws Three-Year-Old Och-Ziff Settlement Into Limbo', Wall St. J. (7 September 2019), available at https://www.wsj.com/articles/restitution-battle-throws-three-year-old-och-ziff-settlement-into-limbo-11567810832.

51 Lagos v. United States, 138 S. Ct. 1684, 1685-6 (2018).

52 18 U.S.C. § 3663A(b)(4).

53 Lagos v. United States, 138 S. Ct. 1684, 1686 (2018).

54 Id.

evidence of misconduct at least where the lack of co-operation does not involve criminal misconduct or demonstrate consciousness of guilt.'[55]

Whether or not a company chooses to co-operate with the government in an investigation, any investigation will cause disruption to the company's daily operations, and may even affect share prices. For example, an investigation can take up executives' time and attention; in-house counsel must coordinate extensively with external counsel; any key witnesses have to set aside time to be prepped and interviewed and financial resources may need to be diverted to help cover the costs of complying with or conducting an internal investigation.

Furthermore, investigations often bring about significant uncertainty for a business, depending on the seriousness and scale of the investigation. Investors may lose confidence in the company's financial prospects, especially because it may be necessary to divulge details related to the investigation to lenders and other third-party finance partners even before the investigation has been concluded (including details that have not been disclosed publicly). In the event that a company is facing the prospect of paying a substantial financial penalty in an investigation, lenders may choose to withdraw funding or revaluate the terms of any outstanding loans, causing the company's share price to drop accordingly.[56]

10.2.5 Exposure to civil litigation

Companies that co-operate with the government are often at risk of follow-on civil litigation based on any admissions or acceptance of lesser charges in connection with an investigation. Many investigations result in companies making certain admissions to the government, which potential plaintiffs can use to base any civil ligation on, either through class or derivative actions. These civil actions can also have significant financial ramifications. For example, civil penalties in the antitrust sphere can result in treble damages.[57] Because of the associated risks of derivative civil actions, companies may ultimately decide that the cost of co-operation is simply too high, and instead decide to decline to co-operate and deny liability and risk defending the company's innocence at trial.

A government investigation or admission of guilt may only be the first stage of a company's legal issues. For example, in 2014, following an investigation, the SEC charged Avon Products with having violated the FCPA for failing to put in place comprehensive controls for detecting instances of bribery in China. Avon settled the civil and criminal cases by agreeing to a fine of US$135 million. This resulted in shareholders filing several securities class action lawsuits against the company, claiming that Avon's management failed to put in place adequate controls to prevent FCPA violations, causing the company to lose millions of dollars of shareholder money through the cost of the related investigations and government fines. Ultimately, the case was dismissed because the court declined to find that the FCPA created a private right of action; however, the resultant civil litigation cost yet more resources and time.[58]

55 US Dep't of Justice, Justice Manual § 9-28.700.

56 See, e.g., US Dep't of Justice, Justice Manual § 9-28.700 ('a protracted government investigation . . . could disrupt the corporation's business operations or even depress its stock price').

57 15 U.S.C. § 15(a).

VEON (formerly known as VimpelCom) faced similar ramifications following a government investigation in 2017. VEON's share prices dropped after it disclosed that it was under investigation by US and Dutch government authorities for potential FCPA violations and was conducting its own internal investigation. Ultimately, VEON entered into a DPA with the US government and paid roughly US$460 million in penalties. Additionally, the company had spent nearly US$900 million in related investigation and litigation costs. VEON shareholders brought a securities fraud action against the company, claiming that it had failed to disclose that the company's gains were the result of bribes paid to foreign governments in violation of the FCPA. The plaintiffs relied on certain admissions that VEON had made in connection with its deferred prosecution agreement, which the court ultimately decided were actionable.[59]

See Chapter 34 on parallel civil litigation

Excessive co-operation between counsel and the government 10.2.6

At what point is co-operation and coordination between the DOJ and company counsel too much? There have been a few instances where a company's internal investigation is deemed to be so entangled with a government investigation and government and company counsel are so coordinated, that it appears as if the government has 'outsourced' its investigatory authority. This can cause problems later down the line. For example, a company's investigation records could become subject to discovery, even if those records would otherwise be considered privileged. Additionally, a court could decide to exclude certain evidence or testimony for running afoul of certain constitutional provisions, even if that testimony was elicited by company counsel and not the government.

While judicial oversight of internal investigations is rare, recent developments suggest some judges may be more hostile to the perceived 'outsourcing' of criminal investigations to the private sector. In United States v. Connolly, Judge McMahon of the Southern District of New York issued a decision in May 2019 that was highly critical of the degree of coordination between the DOJ and Deutsche Bank's external counsel involving an internal investigation ostensibly run by the bank's external counsel.[60] The investigation involved allegations that several banks, including Deutsche Bank, unlawfully manipulated the setting of LIBOR interest rates.[61] Deutsche Bank launched an internal investigation into the misconduct and eventually entered into a DPA with the DOJ.[62]

58 Benjamin Galdston, 'Shareholder Litigation for Waste of Corporate Assets in Internal FCPA Investigations', The Review of Securities & Commodities Regulation (18 April 2018), available at https://s3.amazonaws.com/documents.lexology.com/9877aa80-bdfa-49fb-871b-734a74300baa.pdf.

59 Id.

60 No. 16 Cr. 0370 (CM) (ECF No. 432) (Opinion Denying Defendant Gavin Black's Motion for Kastigar Relief) (Connolly) (S.D.N.Y. 2 May 2019).

61 Id.

62 Id.

Two former Deutsche Bank traders, Matthew Connolly and Gavin Campbell Black, were subsequently indicted. During his trial, Black moved to suppress statements he had made in connection with Deutsche Bank's internal investigation, arguing that, because the DOJ had effectively 'outsourced' its own investigation function to Deutsche Bank's company counsel, his statements had actually been compelled by the US government in violation of his right against self-incrimination.[63] Because Black's statements were not used at trial, before the grand jury or during its investigation, Judge McMahon found that Black's rights against self-incrimination were not actually violated.[64] She did, however, write a scathing summation of the degree of coordination between the DOJ and Deutsche Bank's company counsel, writing that:

> [R]ather than conduct its own investigation, the Government outsourced the important developmental stage of its investigation to Deutsche Bank – the original target of that investigation . . . Deutsche Bank . . . effectively deposed their employees by company counsel and then turned over the resulting questions and answers to the investigating agencies.[65]

Since Connolly was decided recently, it is currently unclear how it will impact a company's internal investigations and ensuing co-operation with government authorities. Judge McMahon stopped short of saying that any level of coordination at all is impermissible. To steer clear of this risk, company counsel are advised to carefully evaluate (and re-evaluate) their relationship to the government and ensure that they are keenly aware of how their fiduciary duties may differ from and conflict with those of the government.

10.2.7 Other options besides co-operation

Co-operation is not the only option for companies or individuals when facing a government investigation. While companies that co-operate are generally guaranteed leniency, there are situations in which co-operation many not effectively prevent prosecution or reduce a financial penalty, which the Justice Manual guidelines themselves acknowledge: 'The government may charge even the most cooperative corporation . . . if . . . the prosecutor determines that a charge is required in the interests of justice. Put differently, even the most sincere and thorough effort to cooperate cannot necessarily absolve a corporation that has . . . engaged in an egregious, orchestrated, and widespread fraud.'[66] Therefore, there are situations when it is actually pointless to pursue co-operation and other methods must be employed.

First, the company can request a meeting with authorities to explain why the allegations do not amount to an actual violation of law or the particular agency

63 Id.
64 Id.
65 Id.
66 US Dep't of Justice, Justice Manual § 9-28.720.

does not have jurisdiction. Second, the defendant could challenge the jurisdiction of the court or regulator's jurisdiction to investigate the matter. Third, companies always have the option to fight the charges on the merits based on insufficiency of evidence in a court of law. This method was employed to dramatic effect by FedEx, when it refused to settle charges that it had conspired to ship illegal prescription drugs to online pharmacies. Just four days into the trial, the DOJ voluntarily dismissed the charges, stating that it had insufficient evidence to proceed.[67] Meanwhile, United Parcel Service, Google, Walgreens Company and CVS Caremark Corporation had to pay hefty fines after settling with the government.

Special challenges with multi-agency and cross-border investigations 10.3

Multi-agency coordination 10.3.1

Multi-agency coordination is a crucial element of successfully resolving any large, corporate investigation in which multiple US agencies are involved. In 2012, the DOJ issued guidance, which solidified long-standing agency practice, to ensure that 'Department prosecutors and civil attorneys coordinate together and with agency attorneys in a manner that adequately takes into account the government's criminal, civil, regulatory and administrative remedies'.[68] The policy statement emphasises 'that criminal prosecutors and civil trial counsel should timely communicate, coordinate, and cooperate with one another and agency attorneys to the fullest extent appropriate to the case and permissible by law' by ensuring that 'criminal, civil and agency attorneys coordinate in a timely fashion, discuss common issues that may impact each matter, and proceed in a manner that allows information to be shared to the fullest extent appropriate to the case and permissible by law'.[69] Furthermore, the Justice Manual has policies obliging departmental attorneys to consider the possibility of any parallel proceeding '[f]rom the moment of case intake' and discuss remedies and communication with other interested investigatory agents and to 'consider investigative strategies that maximize the government's ability to share information among' various agencies.[70] Additionally, the Justice Manual directs prosecutors to assess '[a]t every point between case intake and final resolution . . . the potential impact of [agency] actions on criminal, civil, regulatory and administrative proceedings'.[71]

In practice, each agency has its own processes and time frames for investigating alleged misconduct and approving settlements. As a result, on occasion, it can 67 Dan Levine, US Ends $1.6 billion Criminal Case Against FedEx (17 June 2016), available at https://www.reuters.com/article/us-fedex-pharmaceuticals-judgment-idUSKCN0Z32HC.

68 US Attorney General, 'Memorandum for all United States Attorneys Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation, All Assistant United States Attorneys, All Litigating Divisions, All Trial Attorneys', US Dep't of Justice, (30 January 2012), available at https://www.justice.gov/jm/organization-and-functions-manual-27-parallel-proceedings.

69 Id.

70 US Dep't of Justice, Justice Manual § 1-12.000.

71 Id.

be difficult for agencies to effectively communicate and coordinate on a particular investigation such that multi-agency resolutions are reached simultaneously. In this regard, a company that co-operates with all of the relevant government agencies could play a role in encouraging agencies to coordinate by ensuring they are aware of each agency's progress in the investigation and settlement discussions, and encouraging agencies to communicate, when appropriate.

See Chapter 24 on negotiating global settlements

10.3.2 Cross-border coordination

Coordination between international law enforcement agencies has only grown in recent years. In 2018, the DOJ announced that FCPA cases typically involve between four and five different international agencies, particularly because many of the largest DOJ bribery cases target foreign companies in coordination with foreign authorities.[72]

Cross-border investigations may present special challenges and opportunities in comparison to single-jurisdiction investigations. A recent trend apparent in large, corporate investigations is the increased level of coordination and co-operation between various law enforcement agencies. This coordination may come in the form of official, administrative channels such as mutual legal assistance treaties (MLATs), memoranda of understanding, or specific agreements between countries in relation to particular subjects.[73]

The MLAT process has undergone significant reform in recent years, in response to the oft-criticised laborious nature of preparing the requests and having them fulfilled. In December 2017, the US Attorney General called on the international law enforcement community to 'expedite mutual legal assistance requests', stating: 'If [requests for information are] not properly shared between nations, then, in many cases, justice cannot be done. It is essential that we continue to improve that kind of sharing.'[74] In accordance with this commitment to improve information sharing between the DOJ and other international law enforcement agencies, the DOJ has (1) allocated increased resources to the office responsible for handing MLAT requests and (2) established a cyber unit to process requests for electronic evidence.

In addition to these formal channels, however, international law enforcement agencies may also informally choose to share investigative strategies, information and access to information and witnesses within their respective jurisdictions. One notable innovation has been the use of text messaging between various

72 Evan Norris, 'How Enforcement Authorities Interact', Global Investigations Review (19 August 2019), available at https://globalinvestigationsreview.com/chapter/1196461/how-enforcement-authorities-interact.

73 Id.

74 Jeff Sessions, Attorney General, 'Attorney General Sessions Delivers Remarks at the Global Forum on Asset Recovery Hosted by the United States and the United Kingdom' (4 December 2017), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/attorney-general-sessions-delivers-remarks-global-forum-asset-recovery-hosted-united.

prosecutorial agencies to compare evidence and coordinate simultaneous raids.[75] For example, in 2016, Brazilian and French prosecutors used WhatsApp to communicate in advance of the raids in the 2016 Rio Olympic Games.[76] Informal coordination presents obvious upsides to the US government. Instead of relying on slow, burdensome and languorous official processes for co-operation, informal co-operation allows US authorities to gain the benefits of shared knowledge in an expedient manner, more akin to the fast-paced nature of the wrongdoer's misconduct in large, complex cross-border investigations.

For companies, this increased co-operation changes the calculus of whether and how to co-operate with authorities, precisely because information that is shared in one jurisdiction may easily and quickly become known in another jurisdiction, potentially with different criteria for liability.

See Chapter 11 on production of information to authorities

DOJ's policy against 'piling on' 10.3.3

Given the number of different government agencies, both foreign and domestic, that could have an interest in any given investigation, in May 2018, Deputy Attorney General Rod Rosenstein announced the DOJ's new policy against 'piling on', which favours a less aggressive approach to cumulative prosecution. In describing this new policy, Rosenstein stated that that the DOJ should 'discourage disproportionate enforcement of laws by multiple authorities', likening it to the football practice of multiple players 'piling on' after a player has already been tackled.[77] He added: 'Our new policy discourages "piling on" by instructing Department [of Justice] components to appropriately coordinate with one another and with other enforcement agencies in imposing multiple penalties on a company in relation to investigations of the same misconduct', noting that often large, regulated companies are accountable to 'multiple regulatory bodies', which created the risk of duplicative and onerous punishments beyond 'what is necessary to rectify the harm and deter future violations'.[78]

Piling on can negatively affect the morale of companies, investors and customers and often can mean that companies seldom have a sense of finality when it comes to investigations by an alphabet soup of different law enforcement agencies or regulatory agencies.

Under this new policy, the DOJ now considers 'the totality of fines, penalties, and/or forfeiture imposed by' all enforcement agencies to avoid excessive punishment. Moreover, Rosenstein emphasised that the new policy reinforces the following core policies: ensuring that the federal government (1) does not

75 Evan Norris, 'How Enforcement Authorities Interact', Global Investigations Review (19 August 2019), available at https://globalinvestigationsreview.com/chapter/1196461/how-enforcement-authorities-interact.

76 See Clara Hudson, 'GIR Live: Brazilian prosecutor says WhatsApp chat group drove investigation forward', GIR (27 October 2017).

77 Rod J Rosenstein, Deputy Att'y Gen., US Dep't of Justice, Remarks to the New York City Bar White Collar Crime Institute (9 May 2018), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/deputy-attorney-general-rod-rosenstein-delivers-remarks-new-york-city-bar-white-collar.

78 Id.

use its enforcement power for impermissible purposes (i.e., leveraging the threat of criminal prosecution to induce a company to settle a civil case), (2) encourages intra-governmental coordination to ensure an 'overall equitable result', (3) encourages DOJ officials to coordinate with other DOJ officials, and (4) specifies concrete factors that the DOJ will evaluate in the event that a case does warrant multiple policies.

In the enforcement of the FCPA, in particular, it has been long-standing practice for the DOJ and SEC to coordinate their investigations and ensuing resolutions; however, the formalisation of the anti-piling-on policy indicates that this practice will become more commonplace in other legal arenas.

It remains to be seen whether companies can successfully use the DOJ's anti-piling-on policy to defend against perceived duplicative charges by various government agencies. Volkswagen, the car manufacturer facing charges by the SEC for failing to disclose its clean diesel emission cheating scheme in a recent bond offering, has argued that the SEC cannot 'pile on' more charges after the company had already pleaded guilty to three felonies and paid US$25 billion in fines, penalties and settlements to US and state authorities, as well as car owners and dealers, in connection to the alleged misconduct.[79] Indeed, the judge presiding over the case has questioned why the SEC brought its case against Volkswagen two years after the company resolved the matter with the DOJ.[80] In addition, the judge acknowledged that it might be possible for Volkswagen's penalty in the SEC case to be reduced in light of the penalties the company has already paid.[81] The judge has strongly encouraged the parties to settle the case.[82]

79 Linda Chan, SEC, VW Must Cut Deal In Emissions Fraud Suit, Judge Says (16 August 2019), available at https://www.law360.com/articles/1189726/sec-vw-must-cut-deal-in-emissions-fraud-suit-judge-says.

80 David Shepardson, US Judge Urges VW, SEC to Resolve Civil Dieselgate Suit (16 August 2019), available at https://www.reuters.com/article/us-volkswagen-emissions/u-s-judge-urges-vw-sec-to-resolve-civil-dieselgate-suit-idUSKCN1V61SN.

81 Id.

82 Id.

11

Production of Information to the Authorities

Hector Gonzalez, Rebecca Kahan Waldman, Caroline Black and Lisa Foley[1]

Introduction 11.1

There are many situations in which a company may face a choice, or a demand, to disclose documents and information to a law enforcement authority or regulator. These range from responding to a raid on corporate and individual premises, to compliance with a subpoena or other compulsory process, to the voluntary provision of information during a self-disclosure. The types of information and the circumstances in which a company is obliged – or even able – to produce relevant documents is circumscribed by various laws. For example, a company must address concerns regarding confidentiality, employee privacy, data protection and legal privilege (and, in certain jurisdictions, bank secrecy restrictions or blocking statutes). This becomes additionally complicated in cross-border cases where multiple legal regimes may apply and may conflict with one another. Add to this the not uncommon scenario of authorities from different countries seeking the same (or slightly different) information and it becomes a legal and practical minefield. This chapter cannot hope to cover the immense number of variables that a company may face in these circumstances, but it does seek to provide practical guidance on some of the most important points.

1 Hector Gonzalez, Rebecca Kahan Waldman and Caroline Black are partners and Lisa Foley is an associate at Dechert LLP.

11.2 Production of documents to the authorities

11.2.1 Formal requests for disclosure (and related document hold issues)

11.2.1.1 Commonly used powers (UK)

Most regulatory and enforcement authorities have formal powers to compel individuals and companies to produce documents and provide information.

In the area of financial crime and corruption involving the United Kingdom, the most likely authority to be seeking to investigate and prosecute will be the Serious Fraud Office (SFO). It has powers to seek the production of documents and information at both a pre-investigation stage in relation to bribery and corruption cases under section 2A of the Criminal Justice Act 1987, and, once it opens a formal investigation, under section 2 of the same Act. These powers can be exercised against companies and individuals to produce documents and information, including by way of compelled interview where there is no right to silence (although the individual cannot be later prosecuted regarding matters arising from the interview, unless the information is found to be false). A failure to provide the documents and information within the time specified in the production notice is a criminal offence, unless the recipient can show that it had a reasonable excuse not to comply (such as an injunction preventing production).

In the field of financial markets regulation, the Financial Conduct Authority (FCA) and the Prudential Regulation Authority (PRA) have powers to compel the production of documents, contained in Part 11 of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 (FSMA). The key provision is section 165, subsections 1 to 6 of which are set out below as an example of how information-gathering powers are conferred:

> 165 Regulators' power to require information: authorised persons etc.
> (1) Either regulator may, by notice in writing given to an authorised person, require him–
> (a) to provide specified information or information of a specified description; or > (b) to produce specified documents or documents of a specified description.
> (2) The information or documents must be provided or produced–
> (a) before the end of such reasonable period as may be specified; and
> (b) at such place as may be specified.
> (3) An officer who has written authorisation from the regulator to do so may require an authorised person without delay–
> (a) to provide the officer with specified information or information of a specified description; or > (b) to produce to him specified documents or documents of a specified description.
> (4) This section applies only to–
> (a) information and documents reasonably required in connection with the exercise by either regulator of functions conferred on it by or under this Act; and

> (b) in relation to the exercise by the PRA of the powers conferred by subsections (1) and (3), information and documents reasonably required by the Bank of England in connection with the exercise by the Bank of its functions in pursuance of its financial stability objective.
>
> (5) The regulator in question may require any information provided under this section to be provided in such form as it may reasonably require.
>
> (6) The regulator in question may require–
>
> (a) any information provided, whether in a document or otherwise, to be verified in such manner; or
>
> (b) any document produced to be authenticated in such manner, as it may reasonably require.

'Authorised person' is defined in section 31 of the FSMA and means, very broadly, a person providing a regulated financial service.

The FCA has set out its policy in relation to its exercise of enforcement powers under the FSMA (and other legislation) in its Enforcement Guide and the FCA's report on its approach to enforcement.[2] The Enforcement Guide is useful as it not only sets out the FCA's approach to its task as the United Kingdom's financial markets regulator, but also it reflects the general approach of UK regulators to their document production powers.

In paragraph 4.7 of the Enforcement Guide, the FCA states that its standard practice is to use its statutory powers to require the production of documents, the provision of information or the answering of questions in interview. The FCA suggests that this is for reasons of fairness, transparency and efficiency. The Enforcement Guide goes on to suggest, however, that it will sometimes be appropriate to depart from this standard practice, as it relates to document production, for example in cases:

- involving third parties with no professional connection with the financial services industry, such as the victims of an alleged fraud or misconduct, in which case the FCA will usually seek information voluntarily;
- where the FCA has been asked by an overseas or EEA regulator to obtain documents on their behalf, in which case the FCA will discuss with the overseas regulator the most appropriate approach.

In the second scenario, it is important to consider the effect of regimes and jurisdictional protections colliding. For example, how might the US right to silence mesh with the UK compelled disclosure regime? The Enforcement Guide states that the FCA will make it clear to the company or individual concerned whether

2 Financial Conduct Authority (FCA), Enforcement Guide (January 2016), available at https://www.handbook.fca.org.uk/handbook/EG/; and FCA Mission: Approach to Enforcement (April 2019), available at https://www.fca.org.uk/publication/corporate/our-approach-enforcement-final-report-feedback-statement.pdf.

See Chapters 15 and 16 on representing individuals in interviews and Chapters 17 and 18 on individuals in cross-border proceedings it requires him, her or it to produce information or answer questions under the FSMA or whether the provision of information is voluntary.[3]

Similar (but unique) powers also lie in the hands of the Competition and Markets Authority, the National Crime Agency, the police, Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs, and the Health and Safety Executive. Many of these authorities may also apply for and obtain search warrants and use these powers more often than their US counterparts do.

11.2.1.2 Commonly used powers (US)

In the United States, most federal agencies, including the United States Department of Justice (DOJ), the Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) and the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) may issue subpoenas (or administrative orders) and compel individuals and companies to produce documents and testimony.[4] In the case of the DOJ, a subpoena may compel the production of documents in connection with either a civil or criminal investigation.[5] The CFTC's regulations provide that:

> The Commission or any member of the Commission or of its staff who, by order of the Commission, has been authorized to issue subpoenas in the course of a particular investigation may issue a subpoena directing the person named therein to appear before a designated person at a specified time and place to testify or to produce documentary evidence, or both, relating to any matter under investigation.[6]

Additionally, state agencies and each state's attorney general can compel the production of documents and testimony. As an example, Section 352 of the New York General Business Law permits the Attorney General to commence an investigation of an individual or corporation and to seek documents and testimony in connection with that investigation. The Securities Act, the Securities Exchange Act, the Investment Advisers Act and the Investment Company Act all permit the SEC to issue subpoenas in connection with an ongoing investigation of misconduct.[7]

---

3 Whether the FCA compels testimony from an individual can have an impact on whether that information can be used in connection with a criminal proceeding in the United States. The Second Circuit Court of Appeals has held that testimony compelled by the FCA cannot be used against a defendant in a criminal prosecution. See United States v. Allen, 864 F.3d 63 (2d Cir. 2017).

4 Other federal agencies, such as the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau and the Federal Trade Commission, are authorised to issue subpoenas. Other agencies are required to seek the assistance of the United States Attorney's Office in seeking documents and testimony. For a discussion of the use of administrative subpoenas, see www.justice.gov/archive/olp/rpt_to_congress.htm.

5 For information regarding criminal matters, see Justice Manual § 9-13. The Civil Division is authorised to issue subpoenas by a number of statutes.

6 17 C.F.R. § 11.4(a).

7 Section 19(c) of the Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C. § 77s(c); Section 21(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, 15 U.S.C. § 78u(b); Section 209(b) of the Investment Advisers Act

Before a subpoena can be issued, the staff of the SEC must obtain a formal order of investigation.[8]

Criminal offences for refusing to comply with a request, providing false or misleading statements, or concealing documents, generally supplement such powers.[9]

Scope and timing 11.2.1.3

In practice, a company can do little to resist complying with a formal request for disclosure without resorting to court proceedings to challenge the validity or scope of the request. However, it can likely negotiate with the relevant authority regarding the scope of documents responsive to the request and the production date to limit the scope of the request to what is proportionate and reasonable.

Broadly drawn requests are unfortunately not uncommon, as investigators seek to ensure the requests will capture all relevant information. Early engagement with the relevant authority will typically ensure that both parties can agree on scope and a timetable for production: a request looking back over a long period, or even without any time limit, could involve a lengthy resource-intensive review and expensive production exercise. This may not be in the interests of the prosecuting agency or the company if a more targeted request could produce the information. Whether an agreement to narrow the scope of the request is possible is likely to depend, in large part, on factors outside the company's control – such as the nature and scope of the authority's investigation (which the authority may be unwilling to share and is likely to base on information and evidence outside the company's knowledge). However, the company and its legal advisers should nonetheless seek a reasonable, proportionate and practically achievable production: for example, by seeking to agree to produce documents relating to X project, between Y and Z dates and if necessary to produce the documents in tranches.

It becomes increasingly difficult to manage the response to multiple authorities, particularly if they are in different countries and have different areas of focus. Similarly, a company must consider whether the production notice extends to materials held overseas.

For responding to broad document requests involving large volumes of data, a company may decide to use artificial intelligence or technology assisted review (TAR) to improve the accuracy and speed within which relevant documents are identified. This is becoming increasingly accepted in the United Kingdom. The of 1940, 15 U.S.C. § 80b–9(b); and Section 42(b) of the Investment Company Act of 1940, 15 U.S.C. § 80a–41(b).

---

8 For information regarding procedures for obtaining a formal order of investigation, see sections 2.2.3 to 2.3.4 of the Enforcement Manual of the Securities and Exchange Commission Division of Enforcement, available at https://www.sec.gov/divisions/enforce/enforcementmanual.pdf (28 November 2017).

9 18 U.S.C. §§ 401, 1001; see also 7 U.S.C. §§ 9, 13(a)(3). Rule 17 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedures, governs subpoenas, including grand jury subpoenas and Rule 17(g) authorises federal courts to exercise its contempt powers for non-compliance. ('The court (other than a magistrate judge) may hold in contempt a witness who, without adequate excuse, disobeys a subpoena issued by a federal court in that district.')

SFO confirmed its use of artificial intelligence technology in the deferred prosecution agreement (DPA) case of SFO v. Rolls-Royce PLC.[10]

In the United States, while TAR might be used appropriately in responding to subpoenas or document requests in some limited instances, its use would likely be subject to an agreement regarding its use with the requesting agency.

11.2.1.4 Practical steps on receipt

Upon receipt of a document request, a company should – in most cases – immediately issue a document retention (or hold) notice (DRN) (if one is not already in place). A company should take care not to inadvertently tip off data custodians, who may also be suspects. In some cases, issuing a DRN is not appropriate; for example, where the company is investigating matters outside the public domain and needs to collect documents covertly at the outset. The issuing of a DRN will assist the company to demonstrate that it has taken steps to preserve all potentially relevant documents in existence at the date of the request. The DRN should track the terms of the production notice, and be sent to all personnel who may have responsive documents, including the IT department and records department. The term 'document' should be widely drawn to include any paper or electronic records present on any media (including instant messaging applications) belonging to the company or its employees, including corporate information located off-site. The company may also need to manage complicated issues around data privacy and personal media.[11]

See Chapters 13 and 14 on employee rights and Chapter 40 on data protection

The DRN should confirm that employees must not delete, alter, conceal or otherwise destroy company documents. Simultaneously, the company should take steps to secure and preserve all relevant information held on the company's servers and backup tapes, including through external providers. It should also immediately suspend routine document and data destruction processes.

Most authorities will have their own technical standards, which the collection and production of electronically stored information must meet. It is therefore likely that a company seeking to respond to a subpoena or production notice will want to consider instructing a forensic IT specialist company to assist with the collection and production efforts. This will have the added benefit of ensuring that a company can demonstrate the independence of this analysis, that it is taking clear co-operative steps, and protects employees, as far as possible, from having to give evidence in any subsequent proceedings.

10 Serious Fraud Office v. Rolls-Royce PLC and Rolls-Royce Energy Systems Inc (Case No. U20170036) [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249.

11 For example, employees' use of disappearing messaging services, such as WhatsApp, raises issues. In March 2019, the Department of Justice (DOJ) relaxed its prior guidance to companies regarding employees' use of those services, removing from the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA) Corporate Enforcement Policy a requirement that employees be prohibited from using those services. Instead, the revised policy requires that each company seeking timely and appropriate remediation credit 'appropriate guidance and controls on the use of personal communications and ephemeral messaging platforms that undermine the company's ability to appropriately retain business records or communications or otherwise comply with the company's document retention policies or legal obligations.' Justice Manual § 9-47.120.

Informal requests for disclosure: voluntary production and co-operation 11.2.2

A company may wish to consider voluntarily providing documents to an authority as part of a self-report or to demonstrate its co-operation with an investigation. Government investigators and investigating authorities regularly hold out the possibility of co-operation credit to companies to encourage them to provide information about their own misconduct.

From February 2014, DPAs have been available in the United Kingdom to the SFO and Crown Prosecution Service for disposing of corporate criminal conduct relating broadly to economic crime (including, in particular, fraud, corruption and money laundering).[12] The SFO and the English courts have emphasised that one of the most important factors for a DPA is early reporting and co-operation by the company. Co-operation should be 'genuinely proactive'.[13] This includes the voluntary production of relevant documents, the importance of which has been demonstrated in one of the early DPA cases of SFO v. Rolls-Royce PLC,[14] discussed later in this chapter. In the United Kingdom, the Director of the SFO since August 2018, Lisa Osofsky, has explained that corporate co-operation means 'making the path to a case easier' for the prosecutor.[15] This means that companies will be expected to provide the SFO with evidence it does not already have and guide the SFO's investigation to help it focus on the most relevant lines of enquiry, including in respect of assistance with future prosecutions of individuals.

In August 2019, the SFO updated its Operational Handbook to provide guidance on corporate co-operation (Corporate Co-operation Guidance), confirming a non-exhaustive list of good practices that SFO officers should consider when assessing an organisation's co-operation with the SFO, with a view to potentially being offered an invitation to enter into DPA negotiations. The Corporate Co-operation Guidance sets forth detailed provisions on the SFO's expectations regarding the preservation and provision of materials relating to digital and hard-copy evidence, financial records and analysis, industry and background information, dealing with individuals connected to the investigation, and more contentious issues such as witness accounts and waivers of privilege. The 12 Deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs) were introduced by s.45 and Sch. 17 of the Crime and Courts Act 2013.

13 Crown Prosecution Service and Serious Fraud Office, Deferred Prosecution Agreements Code of Practice – Crime and Courts Act 2013, 11 February 2014, at para. 2.8.2(i).

14 Serious Fraud Office v. Rolls-Royce PLC and Rolls-Royce Energy Systems Inc (Case No. U20170036) [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249. Rolls-Royce first came to the attention of the Serious Fraud Office (SFO) in early 2012, when a whistleblower raised concerns about Rolls-Royce's business in China and Indonesia. After a lengthy investigation, Rolls-Royce accepted responsibility for criminal offending over 24 years, in seven different countries. Ultimately, Rolls-Royce was granted a DPA, and paid approximately £800 million in financial penalties to authorities in the United Kingdom, United States and Brazil.

15 See https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2018/12/04/keynote-address-fcpa-conference-washington-dc/.

Corporate Co-operation Guidance confirms that 'cooperation means providing assistance to the SFO that goes above and beyond what the law requires' and that this includes identifying individuals involved in the misconduct.[16]

In the United States, too, the authorities have routinely emphasised that they will consider self-reporting and co-operation with government investigations as a key factor when determining whether to charge a corporation.[17] The DOJ encourages corporations to conduct internal investigations and voluntarily self-report misconduct.[18] The Justice Manual states that prosecutors may consider voluntary disclosure when determining whether to bring charges for criminal misconduct.[19] Under the DOJ's Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA) Corporate Enforcement Policy, which has been incorporated into the Justice Manual:

> [W]hen a company has voluntarily self-disclosed misconduct in an FCPA matter, fully cooperated, and timely and appropriately remediated, all in accordance with the standards set forth below, there will be a presumption that the company will receive a declination absent aggravating circumstances involving the seriousness of the offense or the nature of the offender.[20]

Importantly, voluntary disclosure is just one factor that is considered in determining whether to bring an action against the corporation.[21] In November 2019, the DOJ revised its definition of 'voluntary self-disclosure' in FCPA matters.[22] To receive credit for voluntary self-disclosure, a company will need to disclose 'all relevant facts known to it at the time of disclosure, including as to any individuals substantially involved in or responsible for the misconduct at issue'.[23] These changes were necessary to harmonise the standards of the Corporate Enforcement Policy with prior guidance by the DOJ and to acknowledge that a company might not be in a position to know the full extent of wrongdoing at the time of the initial disclosure.[24] The Corporate Enforcement Policy does provide benefits to a company that does not voluntarily self-disclose misconduct but does fully co-operate with an investigation and implement timely and appropriate remediation.[25]

16 Corporate Co-operation Guidance, SFO Operational Handbook (6 August 2019).

17 See, e.g., memorandum dated 5 July 2007 from Paul J McNulty re Principles of Federal Prosecution of Business Organizations available at https://www.justice.gov/sites/default/files/dag/legacy/2007/07/05/mcnulty_memo.pdf.

18 Justice Manual §§ 9-28.900, 9-47.120.

19 Justice Manual § 9-28.900. ('Even in the absence of a formal program, prosecutors may consider a corporation's timely and voluntary disclosure, both as an independent factor and in evaluating the company's overall co-operation and the adequacy of the corporation's compliance program and its management's commitment to the compliance program.')

20 See Justice Manual § 9-47.120.

21 Justice Manual §§ 9-28.300, 9-28.900, 9-47.120.

22 Justice Manual § 9-47.120.

23 Justice Manual § 9-47.120.

24 Justice Manual § 9-47.120 at note 1.

25 Justice Manual §§ 9-28.300, 9-28.900; see also https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/deputy-attorney-general-rosenstein-delivers-remarks-34th-international-conference-foreign.

Timing is important, both for a potential DPA and in relation to anti-cartel regimes, which often provide an amnesty only to the first discloser.[26]

As has been noted above, the FCA's standard practice is to rely on its statutory powers to require the production of documents. While there is merit in adopting this policy, and it does avoid the risks to companies of voluntarily disclosing documents to the FCA set out below, nothing prevents the FCA from seeking voluntary production. Principle 11 of the FCA's Principles for Businesses states: 'A firm must deal with its regulators in an open and co-operative way, and must disclose to the appropriate regulator appropriately anything relating to the firm of which that regulator would reasonably expect notice.' A materially identical provision is included in the PRA's Rulebook as Fundamental Rule 7. While this chapter focuses on the approach of the FCA, it is worth remembering that the PRA has similar enforcement powers (and is using them with increasing frequency). Both regulators interpret these obligations to proactively bring matters to their attention widely, and are prepared to take enforcement action against firms and individuals for failures to discharge these obligations (even in the absence of other underlying failings). Prudential Group (fined £30 million for failing to inform the Financial Services Authority (FSA)[27] of its proposed acquisition of AIA until after it had been leaked to the media), Goldman Sachs (fined £17.5 million for not disclosing an SEC investigation into its staff and members of The Goldman Sachs Group), the Co-operative Bank (issued a final notice for failing to notify the PRA without delay of two intended personnel changes in senior positions) and Bank of Scotland plc (fined £45.5 million for failure to inform the FSA about its suspicions that fraud may have occurred at the Reading-based impaired assets team of Halifax Bank of Scotland) are recent examples. This places regulated firms in a different position from other corporates: it reduces the scope for the decision whether to self-report or not.

Principle 11 is mainly intended as a supervision tool and sets out a broad duty of co-operation that the FCA often relies on to oblige the production of documents prior to formal investigations being commenced (sometimes, but not always, for the purpose of deciding whether an investigation should be commenced and, if so, in respect of which firms and individuals). The FCA's view of what is meant by being open and co-operative within Principle 11 is set out in the FCA Handbook, in the 'Supervision' section (referred to as SUP). SUP 2.3 provides that 'open and co-operative' includes a regulated entity making itself readily available for meetings with the FCA, giving the FCA reasonable access to records, producing documents as requested, and answering questions truthfully, fully and promptly. Where a formal investigation has been commenced, the FCA would not seek to rely on Principle 11 as a substitute for its other statutory powers that compel production. While it would be a clear breach of Principle 11 to fail to comply with a statutory request for the production of documents, a failure to comply with a voluntary request for the production of documents would not, of itself, result in disciplinary proceedings. The Enforcement Guide does state, in the context of co-operation, that:

26 See, e.g., European Commission Notice on Immunity from Fines and Reduction of Fines in Cartel Cases, Official Journal C 298, 8 December 2006, p. 17.

27 The Financial Services Authority was the predecessor to the FCA.

> The FCA will not bring disciplinary proceedings against a person for failing to be open and co-operative with the FCA simply because, during an investigation, they choose not to attend or answer questions at a purely voluntary interview. However, there may be circumstances in which an adverse inference may be drawn from the reluctance of a person (whether or not they are a firm or individual) to participate in a voluntary interview. If a person provides the FCA with misleading or untrue information, the FCA may consider taking action against them.[28]

The Enforcement Guide further provides that if a person does not comply with a requirement imposed by the exercise of statutory powers, he or she may be held to be in contempt of court. The FCA may also choose to bring proceedings for breach of Principle 11.[29] Therefore, while there is no guidance indicating that a failure to produce documents voluntarily (as opposed to attending a voluntary interview) would result in an adverse inference being drawn, a decision by a company not to produce documents voluntarily in any particular case should not be made without careful forethought and proper advice on the potential consequences.

As this suggests, the Enforcement Guide recognises the importance of an open and co-operative relationship with the firms it regulates to the effective regulation of the UK financial system. When deciding whether to exercise its enforcement powers, the FCA considers, among a number of factors, the level of co-operation demonstrated by a firm. When weighing the level of co-operation, the FCA considers whether the firm has been open and communicative with it.

Voluntarily disclosing documents carries a risk that the authority may not give any meaningful credit and may nonetheless decide to prosecute or expand an investigation already under way. Therefore, the company should weigh the likelihood of the authority being able to serve a formal request for disclosure in the relevant jurisdiction.

See Section 11.2.4.6, and Chapters 35 and 36 on privilege

In some instances, a formal notice for disclosure will be preferred: for example, where a company has obligations of confidentiality, preventing voluntary disclosure. The most common examples are lawyers and financial institutions, who could both face an action for breach of confidence for supplying documents or information without a formal regulatory request. In some self-reporting circumstances, it may be appropriate for a company to seek such a notice from the relevant authority to ensure that it does not open itself up to civil action. The notice should be narrowly drawn, in consultation with the regulator, and should not affect the company's co-operation credit. Likewise, in some situations, the company may prefer to ask to be provided with a formal document request to demonstrate that they have been compelled to produce the documents to the authorities and have not done so voluntarily.

28 See Enforcement Guide, at para. 4.7.3.

29 Enforcement Guide, at para. 4.7.4.

Production of information to multiple authorities 11.2.3

The increasingly complex and multi-jurisdictional nature of investigations means that a company may face requests for formal disclosure from more than one authority. These could be authorities with different mandates within the same jurisdiction, or authorities with similar mandates from different jurisdictions. In either case, multi-authority investigations demand holistic strategies and systems to allow a company to keep track of evidence disclosed to (or seized by) different authorities. A company may also want to consider if there is any strategic advantage to disclosing to one authority before another. However, recent large-scale global investigations into the manipulation of LIBOR and foreign exchange rates demonstrate the ever increasing levels of intra- and international co-operation between regulators.[30] Practical steps a company can take when faced with multiple requests for formal disclosure include:

- early engagement with each authority, to communicate expectations and practical difficulties of responding to multiple requests;
- identifying and prioritising information that is commonly responsive to the requests rather than focusing on responding to each individual request in isolation;
- maintaining clear production schedules; and
- ensuring a system for Bates numbering[31] for each authority.

Documents and data outside the jurisdiction 11.2.4

Voluntary production 11.2.4.1

In cross-border fraud or corruption cases, not all of a company's documents will be located or even accessible in the same jurisdiction as the investigating authority. In assessing timely disclosure of documents in connection with obtaining credit for 'Full Cooperation in FCPA Matters', the DOJ will consider 'disclosure of overseas documents, the locations in which such documents were found, and who found the documents'.[32] Importantly '[w]here a company claims that disclosure of overseas documents is prohibited due to data privacy, blocking statutes, or other reasons related to foreign law, the company bears the burden of establishing the prohibition. Moreover, a company should work diligently to identify all available

30 In 2015, Deutsche Bank AG entered into a DPA with the DOJ and settlements with the US Commodity Futures Trading Commission, the Department of Financial Services and the FCA, in connection with its role in manipulating LIBOR rates. DB Group, a subsidiary of Deutsche Bank, also pleaded guilty to wire fraud for its role. Together, Deutsche Bank and its subsidiary agreed to pay over US$2 billion in penalties to US authorities and US$344 million to the FCA – then the second-largest fine in the FCA's history.

31 Bates numbering is a method of indexing legal documents for easy identification and retrieval.

32 Justice Manual §9-47.120(3)(b).

legal bases to provide such documents'.[33] A company should consider what documents are stored overseas, and which of these it should provide to investigators. Recent judicial decisions have furthered the powers of UK authorities to obtain information located outside the jurisdiction for the purposes of an investigation, and the Corporate Co-operation Guidance confirms that co-operating organisations should supply relevant material that is held abroad, where it is in the possession or control of the organisation. A company in receipt of a formal production notice will need to assess whether the notice extends to documents outside the jurisdiction and, if so, the extent to which the company has 'custody or control' over documents held by subsidiaries or overseas branches.[34] The board of a parent company will not necessarily control the management of a subsidiary.[35]

The Corporate Co-operation Guidance also confirms that the SFO will expect co-operating organisations to identify relevant material in the possession of third parties and assist the SFO in obtaining it. Companies should also inform the SFO about relevant material that the company is unable to access (such as messaging apps and bank accounts).

Where production is voluntary, a company may take a more holistic view of the investigation and production (subject to local law restrictions). The extent to which it may want to voluntarily disclose information may depend on the ability of the investigating authority to obtain that information itself. However, given the increasing co-operation between authorities on the international stage, careful voluntary production of material is likely to be preferable, and vital if the company seeks co-operation credit. As previously noted, to receive credit for full cooperation under the FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy, a company cannot simply refuse to produce certain documents on the basis that production is prohibited by rule or regulation. Rather, the company 'bears the burden of establishing the 34 Production notices seeking documents held outside the jurisdiction of the investigating authority are complicated. For example, the authors take the view that a request made under s.165 of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 captures documents in a company's custody or control outside the United Kingdom. In the 2018 case of R (on the Application of KBR Inc) v. The Director of the Serious Fraud Office [2018] EWHC 2368 (Admin), the High Court held that the SFO's compulsory document production powers under section 2(3) of the Criminal Justice Act 1987 could have extraterritorial application, but to issue a notice to a non-UK company in respect of documents held outside the United Kingdom, there must be a 'sufficient connection' between the overseas company and the United Kingdom. Overseas companies should assess the factual connection to the United Kingdom (in terms of its connection to the subject matter of the SFO's investigation), rather than from a business perspective. The UK Supreme Court has granted KBR leave to appeal this decision. In the case of R (on the application of Tony Michael Jimenez) v. (1) First Tier Tax Tribunal and (2) Her Majesty's Commissioners for Revenue and Customs [2019] Civ 51, the Court of Appeal applied the 'sufficient connection' test set out in KBR in determining that HM Revenue and Customs, the UK tax authority, is authorised to serve a 'taxpayer notice' on a UK taxpayer resident overseas to obtain information about that individual's tax position.

33 Justice Manual §9-47.120(3)(b).

35 For the United Kingdom, see Lonrho v. Shell Petroleum [1980] 1 WLR 627.

prohibition' and 'should work diligently to identify all available legal bases to provide such documents'.[36]

Mutual legal assistance 11.2.4.2

In the United Kingdom, sections 7 to 9 of the Crime (International Co-operation) Act 2003 (CICA) govern requests to obtain evidence from abroad in relation to a prosecution or investigation taking place in the United Kingdom, shaping the mutual legal assistance (MLA) powers of UK authorities. Under CICA, an MLA request can only be made if it appears to the investigating authority that an offence has been committed or there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that an offence has been committed, and either proceedings in respect of that offence have been instituted or the offence is being investigated.[37] The request must relate to the obtaining of evidence 'for use in the proceedings or investigation'.[38] But, it could allow an investigating agency to have foreign law enforcement officers launch raids, arrest suspects or conduct interviews on its behalf.[39] If the implementation of an MLA request in the requested state requires a court order, then the court in the requested state is likely to apply the relevant principles in its own jurisdiction to satisfy itself that the requested order is justified.

Note that among the vast majority of EU Member States, European investigation orders (EIOs) now allow streamlined access to evidence and information in criminal investigations. EIOs work on the basis of mutual recognition, and judicial authorities can use them to request assistance with 'any investigative measure' (although the EIO itself will identify a number of investigative activities that it does not permit). More specifically, the EIO:

- replaces the previous fragmented legal framework for obtaining evidence within Europe by providing a single instrument;
- imposes a strict 30-day deadline for the Member State to accept the request, and 90 days to comply;
- limits the reasons for which the Member State can refuse the request;
- introduces a standard form; and
- prioritises the necessity and proportionality of the measure as part of the rights of the defence.

EIOs were created by EU Directive 2014/41/EU, which came into force in the United Kingdom on 31 July 2017 (transposed through the Criminal Justice (European Investigation Order) Regulations 2017). The United Kingdom has opted into the EIO regime even though it has chosen to exit the European Union.

In April 2018, the European Commission issued a proposal for a Regulation on European Production and Preservation Orders for electronic evidence in criminal

36 See Justice Manual § 9-47.120.

37 Crime (International Co-operation) Act 2003, s.7(5).

38 Crime (International Co-operation) Act 2003, s.7(2).

39 See, e.g., Reuters, 'Monaco raids Unaoil offices over global oil corruption probe', available at http://uk.reuters.com/article/uk-oil-companies-corruption-idUKKCN0WY3KM.

matters.[40] The proposal aims to reform cross-border access to electronic evidence and make MLA across Member States more efficient. It would allow Member States to request electronic evidence directly from service providers established or represented in a Member State that provide services in the European Union (regardless of the location of the data requested). The regulation would require the service provider to respond within 10 days or, in cases of emergency, six hours.

In December 2018, the Council of the European Union agreed its position on the proposal, which is currently with a European Parliament committee.[41] The United Kingdom has decided not to opt into the proposal, stating that 'it is not clear how new EU legislation will be a practical and effective way to address the global issue of providing lawful access to data held anywhere in the world'.[42]

In February 2019, the UK Parliament passed its own legislation on cross-border access to electronic evidence, the Crime (Overseas Production Orders) Act 2019. This new legislation gives UK authorities (including the SFO and FCA) the power to apply to a UK court to compel a company operating or an individual based outside the United Kingdom to provide electronic data stored abroad. This new law allows UK authorities to sidestep the notoriously slow process of seeking MLA in favour of obtaining an overseas production order, which can be served directly on the person storing the electronic data.[43] This legal development brings the United Kingdom into alignment with the US regime. In 2018, the US federal government passed the Clarifying Lawful Overseas Use of Data (CLOUD) Act, explicitly authorising US law enforcement agencies to obtain data held by US cloud service providers regardless of where in the world the data is physically stored. The CLOUD Act also created a framework by which foreign countries (such as the United Kingdom) could seek disclosure of data held by US cloud service providers, without US co-operation or oversight.

The MLA process can be cumbersome, but is a very real threat in the event a company does not co-operate. A company should also not overlook the significant scope for informal direct investigator-to-investigator co-operation. Agencies such as Interpol have dedicated programmes to share information between, and support investigations by, investigating agencies in different countries. Communications between the SFO and DOJ are frequent. The FCA, specifically, has a broad discretion to assist foreign regulators. This discretion is set out in section 169 of the FSMA. The statutory power is supplemented by relevant FCA

40 See https://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=COM%3A2018%3A225%3AFIN.

41 See https://oeil.secure.europarl.europa.eu/oeil/popups/ficheprocedure.do?lang=en&reference=2018/0108(COD).

42 http://europeanmemoranda.cabinetoffice.gov.uk/files/2018/10/HOC_Letter_Opt-in_Decision_.pdf.

43 Overseas production orders (OPOs) will only be available where the United Kingdom has a 'designated international co-operation agreement' (DICA) with the country in which the OPO will be served. The United States and the United Kingdom have been negotiating such an agreement since 2015. This means that the United States is likely to be the first country directly affected by OPOs. The fact that a DICA is a precondition of an OPO means we are unlikely to see OPOs in practice in the immediate future.

policy. Subsection 169(4) sets out the considerations in the FCA's decision as to whether to assist a foreign regulator. It provides:

> (4) In deciding whether or not to exercise its investigative power, the regulator may take into account in particular:
>
> (a) whether in the country or territory of the overseas regulator concerned, corresponding assistance would be given to a United Kingdom regulatory authority;
>
> (b) whether the case concerns the breach of a law, or other requirement, which has no close parallel in the United Kingdom or involves the assertion of a jurisdiction not recognised by the United Kingdom;
>
> (c) the seriousness of the case and its importance to persons in the United Kingdom;
>
> (d) whether it is otherwise appropriate in the public interest to give the assistance sought.

In an early decision on this section, Financial Services Authority v. Amro International,[44] the Court of Appeal held that there was nothing in section 169 that required the FCA's predecessor body to satisfy itself of the correctness of what it was being asked to investigate or gather by way of information. At the SEC's behest, the FCA could seek any document that it reasonably considered relevant to the investigation the SEC was conducting. The Court of Appeal made clear that the only requirements the FCA must meet were contained in the statute. The Court of Appeal also noted that in exercising these powers, the stricter rules attaching to the drafting of a subpoena did not apply and the description of the documents sought would be acceptable provided the recipient could identify the documents he or she was required to produce.

In addition to the FCA's statutory powers, a number of memoranda of understanding are in place between UK regulators and their overseas counterparts (most notably the SEC and other US regulators) concerning co-operation and information sharing. Recent years have seen significant co-operation between the SEC and the FCA and its cognate agencies.

Similarly, the United States has entered into mutual legal assistance treaties (MLATs) with more than 70 foreign jurisdictions, which can be used for the sharing of information and taking of evidence abroad.[45] Some US authorities also have 44 Financial Services Authority v. Amro International [2010] EWCA Civ 123.

45 See www.state.gov/j/inl/rls/nrcrpt/2012/vol2/184110.htm; see also In re Premises Located at 840 140th Ave. NE, Bellevue, Wash., 634 F.3d 557, 563–64 (9th Cir. 2011) ('In recent decades, the United States has ratified an increasing number of bilateral treaties with other nations to facilitate legal proceedings, known as mutual legal assistance treaties or MLATs . . . . As their names suggest, these treaties provide for bilateral, mutual assistance in the gathering of legal evidence for use by the requesting state in criminal investigations and proceedings. Viewed through the lens of reciprocity, MLATs represent a direct approach to achieving reciprocity with other nations, in addition to the indirect approach taken by congressional expansion of the scope of § 1782. The ratification of MLATs in recent decades can be seen as yet another step toward the memoranda of understanding in place with sister agencies outside the United States, which can allow for inter-agency sharing of documents.

Recent public policy statements made by UK and US prosecuting authorities demonstrate how important they consider international co-operation to be. In the United Kingdom, SFO Director Lisa Osofsky has publicly affirmed her intention to leverage international contacts she made through her previous roles as a federal prosecutor for the DOJ and Deputy Counsel at the Federal Bureau of Investigation to strengthen the SFO's investigational capacities. As part of her oral evidence to the House of Commons Justice Committee in December 2018, she anticipated that the 'shared use of important intelligence information' would help 'crack open' cases.[46]

Ms Osofsky also confirmed that the SFO is preparing for a no-deal Brexit during her testimony before the House of Commons Justice Committee. If the United Kingdom leaves the European Union without a deal, the SFO will need to rely on pre-existing multilateral treaties for the continued sharing of information and co-operation, and could lose access to some European intelligence-sharing programmes. However, it is likely that international agencies will work together with the SFO to find workable solutions as there is a shared benefit to continuing co-operation and intelligence-sharing. Therefore, while a no-deal Brexit may slow down the process and make it more expensive, it is unlikely to stop access to European information and intelligence.

Ms Osofsky has indicated her aspiration to build on the SFO's co-operation with other agencies and civil society to share best practices. She brought in the US-qualified co-head of Jenner & Block's London investigations practice, Peter Pope, to spend a year at the SFO, to 'assist with building and consolidating relationships with authorities in other jurisdictions and to act as an adviser in case reviews and on compliance issues' according to a press release issued in September 2018.[47] Before Ms Osofsky's arrival, the DOJ had already seconded a lawyer to the SFO, enabling the exchange of ideas, experience and best practice regarding the investigation and prosecution of economic crime with the SFO's US counterpart.[48]

In the United States, the DOJ has recently adopted a 'no piling on' policy regarding penalties. This policy explicitly includes co-operation with foreign agencies. Former Deputy Attorney General, Rod Rosenstein, explained in remarks in May 2018 that the policy discourages 'disproportionate enforcement of laws by multiple authorities' by 'instructing Department components to appropriately coordinate with one another and with other enforcement agencies in goal of greater legal assistance by, and for, other nations, at least with respect to requests by foreign governments for use in underlying criminal investigations and proceedings.').

46 Lisa Osofsky, evidence to House of Commons Justice Committee, 18 December 2018.

47 See https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2018/09/27/new-senior-roles-at-the-sfo/.

48 See https://www.sfo.gov.uk/wp-content/uploads/2019/07/SFO-Annual-Report-and-Accounts-2018-2019.pdf.

imposing multiple penalties on a company in relation to investigations of the same misconduct'.[49]

Data protection 11.2.4.3

Responding to an investigation (and conducting an internal investigation) will require data about individuals to be processed. Such an exercise will engage a number of data protection considerations.[50] A company cannot assume that complying with the data protection requirements in the investigated jurisdiction will mean compliance with overseas data protection laws. Local law may also restrict a company's ability to transfer individual data overseas. The European Union's General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) came into force on 25 May 2018 and applies within the EU and to those data controllers and processors outside the EU who offer goods and services to EU consumers. Chapter 5 of the GDPR deals with transfers of data to third countries (and international organisations) and re-enacts existing restrictions on transferring data to countries that do not have adequate privacy protections in circumstances where other 'appropriate safeguards' are not in place. The GDPR introduces a limited derogation to its principles based on 'compelling legitimate interests', which could cover non-repetitive transfers to foreign regulators, but would require prior notification to the relevant data protection authority.

See Chapter 40 on data protection

Under the GDPR, supervisory authorities from EU Member States may issue fines of up to €20 million or 4 per cent of an organisation's global turnover from the preceding financial year (whichever is higher) for GDPR breaches. Before issuing a fine, the UK's data protection supervisory authority, the Information Commissioner's Office (ICO), must serve a written 'notice of intent' to an organisation, which allows the recipient to make representations.[51] In July 2019, the ICO issued notices of intent to fine British Airways (approximately £183 million)[52] and hotel group Marriott International (approximately £99 million)[53] for GDPR breaches. These are the first fines publicly proposed by the ICO for GDPR infringements. If ultimately issued, these fines will represent the most significant 49 See www.justice.gov/opa/speech/deputy-attorney-general-rod-rosenstein-delivers-remarks-new-york-city-bar-white-collar.

50 The United States does not have a comprehensive, federal data protection law. There are, however, numerous state and federal laws that govern the treatment of personal data. At the federal level, there are protections for, among other things, data collected from children, from financial institutions and that includes medical information. See, e.g., Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 41 to 58; Children's Online Privacy Protection Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 6501 to 6506; Financial Services Modernization Act (Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act), 15 U.S.C. §§ 6801 to 6827; Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPAA), 42 U.S.C. § 1301 et seq. (and the rules and regulations promulgated thereunder); Fair Credit Reporting Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1681.

51 Data Protection Act 2018 (UK implementation of GDPR), Schedule 16.

52 See https://ico.org.uk/about-the-ico/news-and-events/news-and-blogs/2019/07/ico-announces-intention-to-fine-british-airways/.

53 See https://ico.org.uk/about-the-ico/news-and-events/news-and-blogs/2019/07/statement-intention-to-fine-marriott-international-inc-more-than-99-million-under-gdpr-for-data-breach/.

penalties ever issued by the ICO and the largest penalties imposed by any regulator to date under the GDPR. British Airways and Marriott International will now have the opportunity to make representations to the ICO as to the authority's proposed findings and sanction. Under the GDPR 'one stop shop' provisions, the data protection authorities in the EU whose residents have been affected will also have the chance to comment on the ICO's findings.

11.2.4.4 Blocking statutes

Blocking statutes prevent the disclosure of certain documents for the purpose of legal proceedings in a foreign jurisdiction, except pursuant to procedures set out in an international treaty or agreement. Article 1*bis* of the French Blocking Statute provides:

> [I]t is prohibited for any person to request, to investigate or to communicate in writing, orally or by any other means, documents or information relating to economic, commercial, industrial, financial or technical matters leading to the establishment of proof with a view to foreign administrative or judicial proceedings or as a part of such proceedings.

There has historically been very little enforcement of the French Blocking Statute – with some companies choosing to ignore it completely.[54] However, as a consequence of the Sapin II law, which was implemented in June 2017, France's financial crime agency (Parquet National Financier (PNF)) has begun to lead cases involving the enforcement of the Blocking Statute, signalling that the French authorities are considering the issues raised by the Blocking Statute in more depth.

The French government is currently considering a report submitted by a French member of parliament in June 2019, which includes recommended reforms to the French Blocking Statute. The report calls for amendments to force foreign authorities to co-operate with French authorities instead of 'systematically' bypassing conventions of international co-operation. The report also calls for a significant increase in penalties for any violations of the French Blocking Statute.[55] The French anti-corruption regulator (Agence Française Anticorruption (AFA)) is responsible for ensuring compliance with the Blocking Statute.

The joint guidelines on the French equivalent of the DPA (convention judiciaire d'intérêt public (CJIP)) recently issued by the PNF and AFA indicate the French authorities' willingness to enter into coordinated settlement discussions with foreign enforcement authorities in cases involving multi-jurisdictional misconduct. The new guidelines do not set out any differences in complying with the Blocking Statute when co-operating with foreign enforcement authorities.

54 Despite its very protective wording, the French Blocking Statute has received a very limited application – only one criminal conviction (under Article 1*bis*) has ever been recorded (Cass. Crim, 12 December 2007, n°07-83.228).

55 Raphaël Gauvain, 'Rétablir la souveraineté de la France et de l'Europe et protéger nos enterprises des lois et mesures à portée extraterritoriale', National Assembly report (26 June 2019).

Therefore adherence to the Blocking Statute is expected. However, the guidelines suggest that when the PNF negotiates a joint settlement with other authorities, it may propose that the AFA act as a monitor to prevent a violation.[56]

The French authorities have traditionally taken any derogation from the letter of the law seriously and insist on the use of MLA requests and inter-agency communications. This can leave companies in the unenviable position of being caught between authorities (if the US authorities, for example, expect production directly from the corporate). In such circumstances, agency-to-agency communications should be encouraged. Similarly, Article 271 of the Swiss Criminal Code prohibits a person performing an 'official act' on behalf of a foreign authority on Swiss soil. This can block the collection of evidence located in Switzerland intended for use in proceedings outside the country.

China is another jurisdiction to have enacted laws to block the transfer of information to foreign government authorities in criminal proceedings. On 26 October 2018, China enacted the International Criminal Judicial Assistance (ICJA) law with immediate effect, prohibiting institutions, organisations and individuals within China from providing evidentiary materials and assistance to foreign countries in criminal proceedings (e.g., before seeking to comply with a subpoena from a foreign government authority in a criminal investigation) without approval from the competent Chinese authorities. In accordance with the ICJA law, this legislation is to be applied in a manner that does not harm national sovereignty, security or public interests, giving the Chinese government broad discretion to refuse or block foreign governments' requests for assistance. The ICJA law governs all requests for 'judicial assistance' between China and foreign jurisdictions in relation to international criminal proceedings, including the service of documents, evidence collection, witness testimony, seizure and confiscation of illegal assets, and the transfer of convicted persons.

A decision to refuse to disclose documents or information due to a blocking statute may not be respected by the requesting authority[57] and could affect any co-operation credit available – leaving the company between a rock and a hard place. This demands early and detailed dialogue with the relevant authority alongside expert local counsel who can educate the regulators about the relevant laws and any potential workarounds for production of information.

Bank secrecy 11.2.4.5

Bank secrecy laws prohibit banking officials from releasing confidential information about a customer to third parties outside of financial institutions, unless compelled by law. Sometimes, such a disclosure is criminalised.[58] A bank under investigation may seek to rely on this secrecy. It should also be cautious not to infringe this secrecy inadvertently in providing information to a regulator. Note, though, that a historic deference to the banking secrecy rules of foreign jurisdictions, premised on comity or respect for the acts of foreign governments, may slowly be eroding. Even Switzerland, in recent times, has stripped away a number of its many layers of secrecy through international agreements,[59] and, in our experience, has become, in practice, more willing to co-operate with requests for information.

56 See https://www.agence-francaise-anticorruption.gouv.fr/files/files/Lignes%20directrices%20PNF%20CJIP.pdf.

57 For an English case dealing with the French Blocking Statute, see Secretary of State for Health v. Servier Laboratories; National Grid Electricity Transmission v. ABB [2014] WLR 4383.

58 See most famously Article 47 of the Swiss Federal Act on Banks and Savings Banks (1934).

11.2.4.6 State secrets

Sending data outside a jurisdiction may be contrary to state secrecy laws. Some jurisdictions, such as China, have wide definitions of what amounts to a state secret. The Law of the People's Republic of China on Guarding State Secrets, at Article 8, defines state secrets to include 'secrets in national economic and social development' and 'secrets concerning science and technology'. Similarly, Kazakhstan treats some geological data as a state secret. The consequences of violation can be serious. Article 111 of the Chinese Criminal Law makes violating state secrets a capital crime. In countries such as China, where many companies are state-owned, this is not straightforward. Again, locating expert local counsel is a must.

State secrecy laws may also restrict certain categories of documents to authorised eyes only. This is particularly pertinent for defence companies. Withholding production of such documents will require careful negotiation. Remember that the investigating agency is likely to have authorised persons of its own, who can review the documents. Finding a practical way for these to be produced by external lawyers (where prior authorisation is unlikely) will likely be more difficult and undoubtedly will increase the time it will take to respond to a request for documents and may require the review of documents 'in country' instead of producing the documents to the US authorities. Another potential workaround is production of information through MLATs and memoranda of understanding that allow a company to first produce documents to a local authority and thereby comply with the relevant regulations.

11.2.4.7 Whose rules of privilege apply?

It may not be clear whose rules of privilege apply when a company discloses in one jurisdiction documents created in another. English courts will generally apply English law to the question: theoretically, an unprivileged document in its country of origin could be privileged in England and vice versa. In the United States, there is no general rule, although government agencies will generally apply privilege principles broadly, although subject to certain procedural requirements, such as the production of privilege logs.

59 See, e.g., Switzerland's entrance, in October 2013, to the Multilateral Convention on Mutual Administrative Assistance on Tax Matters, and agreement to increase transparency and exchange financial information with approximately 60 other countries.

Companies should also be aware that some countries do not have developed principles of legal privilege and special care is required in creating or sending otherwise privileged documents to such jurisdictions. Likewise, in some jurisdictions privilege does not extend to communications with in-house counsel and the role of internal counsel may be held by someone who is not an attorney, and therefore privilege may not be recognised in connection with their communications.

Further complications come when dealing with international regulatory bodies. In Akzo Nobel, for example, the European Court of Justice held that the law of the European Union superseded that of the relevant national jurisdictions; therefore, in competition cases internal counsel's advice will not be privileged – nor will that of external legal advisers who are not EU-qualified lawyers.[60]

Documents obtained through dawn raids, arrest and search 11.3

During a raid (or execution of a search warrant) on corporate premises, it is important to seek to obtain and understand the terms of the warrant. Check simple facts such as the premises' address, the date and relevant powers and authorisations. If appropriate, a company may challenge the scope of the warrant (if it is unduly wide or based on erroneous facts or information). Importantly, the company and its advisers should ensure during the raid that documents outside the terms of the warrant are not seized (unless taken under relevant search and sift powers,[61] or as can be justified under ancillary legislation)[62] and take care both during the raid and afterwards to protect legally privileged materials. In the United States, it is nearly impossible to challenge the scope of a warrant that calls for the immediate search of a specific location. More likely, a company would have to seek to suppress evidence obtained pursuant to a warrant in a later proceeding. There may, however, be opportunities to challenge the scope of a warrant seeking electronically stored information before the data is actually collected and produced. As an example, where a company is asked to execute a warrant on behalf of the government, such as when a service provider is asked to collect electronic information of a third party, there may be additional opportunities for a company to challenge the scope of a subpoena. It is likely that the vast majority of documents obtained during a search will be electronic. It is important to agree to a process with the authorities for dealing with any electronic media that is privileged. In the United 60 Akzo Nobel Chemicals v. European Commission (Case C-550/07, European Court of Justice, 14 September 2010). Here, the Court held that internal company communications with in-house lawyers subject to a European Commission investigation were not covered by legal professional privilege, as, for the purposes of such an investigation, an in-house lawyer was not sufficiently independent.

61 For the United Kingdom, see s.50 of the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001. In the United States, prosecutors will often establish what are referred to as 'taint teams' to review potentially privileged information. Justice Manual § 9-13.420 (Searches of Premises of Subject Attorneys) provides guidance for the review of material seized not only from an attorney's office but also from 'searches of business organizations where such searches involve materials in the possession of individuals serving in the capacity of legal advisor to the organization'.

62 See s.19(5) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

Kingdom, most investigative agencies have developed sophisticated procedures in this area. The SFO's policy and system for dealing with material covered by legal professional privilege (LPP) is explained in its Operational Handbook:

> When the SFO requires the production of material, or seizes material pursuant to its statutory powers, all material which is potentially protected by LPP must be treated with great care to:
> - Minimise the risk that LPP material is seen or seized by an SFO investigator or a lawyer involved in the investigation.
> - Ensure that any LPP material which is seized is properly isolated and promptly returned to the owner without having been seen by an SFO investigator or a lawyer involved in the investigation.
> - Ensure that any dispute relating to LPP is resolved in advance of the material being seen by an SFO investigator or a lawyer involved in the investigation.
> - Ensure that where an SFO investigator or a lawyer involved in the investigation inadvertently sees LPP material, measures are in place to ensure that the investigation and any subsequent prosecution is not adversely affected as a result. Care must always be taken that LPP material is not viewed by the SFO staff involved in the investigation.[63]

The Operational Handbook then sets out a procedure for dealing specifically with electronic material that may be privileged. Under this procedure, the SFO will first notify the company's lawyers if it believes that IT assets it has seized might contain privileged material (in practice, it is prudent for the company's lawyers to advise the SFO of the potential existence of privileged material at an early stage). A list of search terms should be agreed (including names of lawyers, relevant firms, etc.) to enable the identification and isolation of the material for review by independent counsel. Independent counsel will review the material using search software and return only non-privileged material to the SFO investigative team to examine. It is normally possible to have productive discussions with investigators to determine the relevant search terms that might identify privileged material. It is then possible to make representations on the client's behalf to independent counsel about the extent of privilege. This procedure updates and works alongside the well-established 'blue-bagging' approach used for hard-copy materials that may be privileged, by which authorities will send seized documents that may be potentially privileged, sealed in an opaque bag, to the custody of an independent legal adviser (usually a barrister) for review.

63 Cited in R (on the application of Colin McKenzie) v. The Director of the Serious Fraud Office [2016] EWHC 102, at [8] (original emphasis). In this unsuccessful challenge to this procedure, the essential question was whether, as a matter of law, the process for isolating files that may contain legal professional privilege (LPP) material into an electronic folder for review by an independent lawyer must itself be carried out by individuals who are independent of the seizing body. The court held that the procedure set out in the SFO's Handbook for isolating material potentially subject to LPP, for the purpose of making it available to an independent lawyer for review, was lawful.

The DOJ has used three different procedures for reviewing potentially privileged information, each of which requires a 'neutral' third party to first review potentially privileged data.[64] In certain instances the court may review the data on its own. A court may also appoint a 'special master' to handle the review of privileged information.[65] In other instances, a team of individuals referred to as a 'taint team' may be used to review the files.[66] When a taint team is used, an ethical wall will be placed between the individuals who review the documents and those who are actually participating in the investigation.[67] Importantly, courts have had differing reactions to the use of taint teams and may not always conclude that the procedures implemented to screen materials were sufficient.

Disclosure of results of internal investigation 11.4

In most instances, a company will have to make expansive disclosures regarding its internal investigations to get full co-operation credit. The DOJ has issued guidance in the Justice Manual[68] that explicitly states that companies will have to self-report on both the results of internal investigations and on individual misconduct to receive any co-operation credit.[69] Whether such thorough disclosures are in the best interest of the company is something that will need to be determined in a timely manner.

64 See Searching and Seizing Computers and Obtaining Electronic Evidence in Criminal Investigations, available at https://www.justice.gov/sites/default/files/criminal-ccips/legacy/2015/01/14/ssmanual2009.pdf.

65 See, e.g., Order Appointing Special Master, United States v. Cohen, Dkt No. 30, Case No. 18-mj-3161 (S.D.N.Y. 27 April 2018).

66 Searches of Premises of Subject Attorneys, Justice Manual, § 9-13.420.

67 See, e.g., Order Appointing Special Master, United States v. Cohen, Dkt No. 30, Case No. 18-mj-3161 (S.D.N.Y. 27 April 2018); Order, United States v. Gallego, Dkt No. 65, Case No. 4:18-cr-01537 (D. Ariz. 6 September 2018).

68 The Value of Cooperation, Justice Manual § 9-28.700; Cooperation: Disclosing the Relevant Facts, Justice Manual § 9-28.720; FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy, Justice Manual § 9-47.120, available at https://www.justice.gov/criminal-fraud/file/838416/download (full cooperation requires, among other things, prompt disclosure of 'all facts related to involvement in the criminal activity by the company's officers, employees, or agents; and all facts known or that become known to the company regarding potential criminal conduct by all third-party companies (including their officers, employees, or agents').

69 The November 2019 amendments to the FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy acknowledge that a company may not know all facts relevant to misconduct at the time of a voluntary self-disclosure. The revised policy emphasises that in order to receive cooperation credit, a company should 'make clear that it is making its disclosure based upon a preliminary investigation or assessment of information, but it should nonetheless provide a fulsome disclosure of the relevant facts known to it at the time'. Justice Manual § 9-47.120 at note 1.

11.4.1 Self-reporting of misconduct not yet known to regulators

A company's decision as to whether to self-report is often complicated. There may be opportunities for a company to internally address misconduct without it coming to light. However, it can be very difficult for a company to keep its misdeeds from being disclosed to the relevant authorities. Whistleblower rewards provide incentives for employees to report misconduct. Federal statute provides protections for whistleblowers,[70] and in 2017 the SEC imposed financial penalties on financial institutions that attempt to prohibit employees from seeking those bounties.[71] Disgruntled employees can report corporate misconduct as retaliation, to attempt to prevent prosecution of themselves or simply because they do not feel that the corporate is handling the issue appropriately via its internal process. In the United Kingdom, broadly speaking, those working in the field of financial services are subject to suspicious activity reporting obligations. This means that banks, accountants and transactional lawyers must make reports to the authorities of suspicions of money laundering (including acquiring assets which may be tainted by fraud or corruption). A failure to make a report is a criminal offence – as is tipping off the subject of the report (which in some instances may be the individual's own client). Investigative journalism and non-governmental organisations also continue to be important sources of information for regulators – as the 'Panama Papers' scandal illustrated.[72]

A failure to self-report misconduct before it becomes otherwise known to the authorities can have a significant impact on the resolution of the corporate investigation. The Justice Manual (which governs the conduct of Assistant US Attorneys during the course of civil and criminal investigations, including FCPA investigations) provides that:

> Even in the absence of a formal program, prosecutors may consider a corporation's timely and voluntary disclosure, both as an independent factor and in evaluating the company's overall cooperation and the adequacy of the corporation's compliance program and its management's commitment to the compliance program. However, prosecution may be appropriate notwithstanding a corporation's voluntary disclosure. Such a determination should be based on a consideration of all the factors set forth in these Principles.[73]

70 See Section 922(h) of the Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 78u-6(h)(1)(A) (2010).

71 See https://www.sec.gov/news/pressrelease/2017-14.html (announcing penalty imposed on BlackRock Inc., based on its inclusion of language in separation agreements requiring former employees to waive any incentives they might be entitled to for reporting the company's misconduct); https://www.sec.gov/news/pressrelease/2017-24.html (announcing penalty imposed on HomeStreet Inc. for improper accounting and steps taken to impede whistleblowers).

72 The Panama Papers are available through the International Consortium of Investigative Journalists' dedicated website, at https://panamapapers.icij.org/.

73 Justice Manual § 9-28.900 (internal citations omitted).

As we have already noted, under the FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy, receiving full credit for voluntary self-disclosure requires, among other things, prompt disclosure of 'all relevant facts known to it at the time of the disclosure, including as to any individuals substantially involved in or responsible for the misconduct at issue'.[74] The recent amendments to the Corporate Enforcement Policy clarify that a company does not need to disclose information regarding all individuals that may have been involved in wrongdoing. Instead, it is required to disclose 'any individuals substantially involved in or responsible for the misconduct at issue'.[75] Moreover, the company will have to disclose 'on a timely basis . . . all facts relevant to the wrongdoing at issue, including: all relevant facts gathered during a company's independent investigation; attribution of facts to specific sources where such attribution does not violate the attorney–client privilege, rather than a general narrative of the facts; timely updates on a company's internal investigation, including but not limited to rolling disclosures of information'.[76]

The Deferred Prosecution Agreements Code of Practice (the DPA Code) issued by the SFO and the Crown Prosecution Service[77] indicates that, to be eligible for a DPA, a company will likely have to report voluntarily any misconduct within a reasonable time of becoming aware of it – and prior to it becoming known to the authorities. In fact, in a number of the five DPA cases,[78] the companies self-reported their misconduct to the SFO in circumstances where the SFO had no prior knowledge of the misconduct and, in all likelihood, would not have learnt about the misconduct if the company had not self-reported.

But, in the Rolls-Royce case, which was concluded by a DPA in January 2017, the company did not self-report to the SFO the conduct that led to the SFO's investigation. Instead, the SFO became aware of the need for an investigation through internet postings by a whistleblower. The fact that Rolls-Royce did not self-report weighed against the SFO offering a DPA; yet, Rolls-Royce chose to co-operate fully with the investigation after the SFO approached the company, and undertook its own internal investigation (in close consultation with the 74 Justice Manual § 9-47.120(3)(a). The Justice Manual has recently been revised to acknowledge that a company may not necessarily be in possession of all of the relevant information at the time of its initial disclosures. In such circumstances, a disclosing company should make clear that it is making an initial disclosure based on its preliminary investigation or assessment of information. Justice Manual § 9-47.120 at note 1.

75 Justice Manual § 9-47.120(3)(a) (emphasis added). This change makes the disclosure requirements consistent with prior guidance issued by the US Attorney's Office and other provisions of the Justice Manual.

76 Justice Manual § 9-47.120 (3)(a).

77 DPA Code, para. 2.8.2(i).

78 SFO v. Standard Bank plc (Case No. U20150854) [2016] Lloyd's Rep FC 102 and SFO v. XYZ Ltd (Case No. U20150856) [2016] 7 WLUK 220; [2016] Lloyd's Rep FC 509. In the case of SFO v. Tesco Stores Limited [2019] Lloyd's Rep FC 283, Tesco identified issues in its financial statements, and referred itself to enforcement authorities after revealing that revenues had been incorrectly recorded as profits and made an announcement to the market. In SFO v. Serco Geografix Ltd. (Case No. U20190413) [2019] 7 WLUK 45, the company disclosed material discovered after an initial SFO investigation found no evidence of any dishonest or fraudulent activity.

SFO). In total, Rolls-Royce collected over 30 million documents and subjected them to electronic document review as part of this investigation. One of the main features of Rolls-Royce's co-operation was that it provided all materials requested by the SFO voluntarily, without the SFO having to compel it to provide information. Rolls-Royce also chose not to perform any legal professional privilege review over the documents (instead allowing independent counsel to resolve issues of privilege) and worked with the SFO as the SFO used sophisticated artificial intelligence searches to interrogate the data. This process led to the SFO uncovering information that may not have otherwise come to its attention. Ultimately, SFO counsel described the extent of Rolls-Royce's co-operation with the investigation as 'extraordinary'.

While the decision to provide documents voluntarily to the SFO was one of a number of measures taken by Rolls-Royce to demonstrate its co-operation with the investigation, this decision was of fundamental importance to the court when deciding to approve the DPA. Rolls-Royce's voluntary disclosure of investigation documents therefore mitigated its failure to voluntarily disclose misconduct.

11.4.2 Production of reports of investigation

To obtain co-operation credit, prosecuting and government agencies require that companies provide the complete factual findings of an internal investigation, including relevant source documents. The Justice Manual recognises 'the sort of cooperation that is most valuable to resolving allegations of misconduct by a corporation and its officers, directors, employees, or agents is disclosure of the relevant facts concerning such misconduct'.[79]

Similarly, the DPA Code provides that co-operation will include 'providing a report in respect of any internal investigation including source documents'.[80]

Careful consideration should be given to the manner of disclosure of information. In the United States, the consideration for credit is that the relevant facts are disclosed. The format of the disclosure is irrelevant. The Justice Manual makes it clear that a company does not have to waive privilege to receive co-operation credit.[81] If a company chooses not to waive relevant privileges, it is unlikely to be able to share the investigative reports prepared by counsel conducting the investigation. Instead, it will have to carefully craft presentations that disclose only non-privileged facts. Preparation of such reports can be time-consuming and costly. Further, in preparing any written presentation materials, the company will have to ensure that neither the mental impressions nor advice of counsel are included. Because there can be no claim that the materials are privileged, a company should also expect that they will have to produce presentation materials in any related civil litigation.

79 See Justice Manual § 9-28.720 (Cooperation: Disclosing the Relevant Facts).

80 DPA Code, para. 2.8.2(i).

81 See Justice Manual § 9-28.720. The FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy refers to Justice Manual § 9-28.720 and states that a company will not have to waive privilege to receive full co-operation credit.

In the United Kingdom, there is currently much debate over the production of the first accounts of witnesses, which may have been taken by investigating attorneys. The SFO's preference is that these are taken so that legal privilege does not apply. It also indicates that it does not consider all privilege claims over interview materials to be made out under English law and until the Court of Appeal's decision in The Director of the Serious Fraud Office v. Eurasian Natural Resources Corporation (ENRC),[82] was actively challenging such assertions. Where a valid claim for privilege exists, co-operation credit will be given for the disclosure of interview memoranda. A failure to disclose will be considered co-operation neutral. As Alun Milford, then SFO General Counsel, has previously said: 'If a company's assertion of privilege is well-made out, then we will not hold that against the company: to do otherwise would be inconsistent with the substantive protection privilege offers.'[83] In two of the UK cases in which the court has approved DPAs, the company made oral disclosure only of the content of witness interviews.[84] However, Rolls-Royce chose to provide the interview memoranda to the SFO – even though it considered the memoranda to be privileged – on the basis of a limited waiver of privilege. This was another way Rolls-Royce used the voluntary disclosure of documents to counterbalance its failure to voluntarily disclose the misconduct. Other materials voluntarily provided to the SFO by Rolls-Royce included regular reports on the findings of the internal investigations; unfiltered access to the 'digital repositories or email containers' for over 100 past and present employees; general access to hard-copy documents at Rolls-Royce; and key documents identified by the internal investigations. Finally, Rolls-Royce held off interviewing potential witnesses until the SFO had the chance to do so.[85] How a company makes its employees available to investigating authorities is important, and this chapter will now turn to this issue.

The SFO has recently affirmed its position on witness accounts and privilege as part of the Corporate Co-operation Guidance, which confirms that a company's failure to waive privilege means that it will not attain the corresponding factor against prosecution in the DPA Code, but that the SFO will not penalise the company in this regard. The Corporate Co-operation Guidance suggests that

82 [2018] EWCA Civ 2006.

83 Alun Milford, then SFO General Counsel, 'Speech to compliance professionals' (given to the European Compliance and Ethics Institute, Prague, 29 March 2016.)

84 See, e.g., SFO v. XYZ (Preliminary Judgment) Crown Court, Southwark, U20150856 (20 April 2016): '[C]o-operation includes identifying relevant witnesses, disclosing their accounts and the documents shown to them: see para. 2.8.2(i) of the DPA Code of Practice. Where practicable it will involve making witnesses available for interview when requested. In that regard, XYZ provided oral summaries of first accounts of interviewees, facilitated the interview of current employees, and provided timely and complete responses to requests for information and material, save for those subject to a proper claim of legal professional privilege.'

85 In securing DPAs, both Tesco and Serco received co-operation credit for refraining from interviewing witnesses at the request of the FCA/SFO. See SFO v. Tesco Stores Limited (Case No. U20170287) [2019] Lloyd's Rep FC 283 and SFO v. Serco Geografix Ltd. (Case No. U20190413) [2019] 7 WLUK 45.

while an organisation will not get the full co-operation credit potentially available in these circumstances, the SFO will not automatically refuse a DPA if it can demonstrate other co-operative factors pointing against a public interest in prosecuting the company, in accordance with the DPA Code.[86]

11.4.3 Identification of witnesses to authorities

In connection with its initial assessments of whether to co-operate with authorities, companies will have to consider the implications of disclosing information about key employees. As noted above, US and UK authorities have indicated that co-operation will require disclosure of facts relevant to the misconduct of individual employees.

In the United States, authorities have made clear that obtaining facts relevant to individual prosecutions is a top priority. The Justice Manual provides that '[i]n order for a company to receive any consideration for cooperation under this section, the company must identify all individuals substantially involved in or responsible for the misconduct at issue, regardless of their position, status or seniority, and provide to the Department all relevant facts relating to that misconduct'.[87]

Additionally, the 'unequivocal co-operation' necessary to be eligible for a DPA in the United Kingdom includes identifying relevant witnesses, disclosing their accounts of the alleged misconduct and any documents shown to them and, where practicable, making those witnesses available for interviews by investigators[88] – together with ongoing co-operation with the authorities.

When seeking a DPA, a corporate should consider liaising closely with the SFO, which may wish to undertake witness interviews, or interviews under caution,[89] with individuals prior to corporate counsel doing so. The Corporate Co-operation Guidance confirms that the SFO will expect organisations to identify individuals responsible for the suspected wrongdoing (and support the SFO's disclosure obligations in its prosecution of individuals) and potential witnesses, and that co-operating companies should consult with the SFO before interviewing potential witnesses or suspects, taking HR actions or other overt steps. Once the individuals have been identified to the government or prosecuting authorities it may be difficult, if not impossible, for those individuals to continue working

86 SFO Operational Handbook, Corporate Co-operation Guidance, p. 5.

87 The Value of Cooperation, Justice Manual § 9-28.700; see also Cooperation: Disclosing the Relevant Facts, Justice Manual § 9-28.720. The November 2019 amendments to the FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy made the various provisions regarding disclosures of individuals involved in wrongdoing more consistent.

88 DPA Code, para. 2.8.2(i).

89 Where a defendant in the United Kingdom is suspected of committing a criminal offence, and is questioned in relation to it (whether while under arrest or voluntarily), the questioner must administer a 'caution' for any evidence provided in the interview to be admissible in subsequent proceedings. The caution sets out interviewees' rights and how any evidence they provide at interview may be used against them in a trial. An organisation or company can be interviewed under caution through a nominated spokesperson, who will attend the interview to answer questions on its behalf.

for the company. A company may feel pressure to terminate the employee or place that individual on leave, which could have a significant impact on the operations of a business unit. Even if the company does not terminate an employee under investigation, targets of a government investigation are likely to engage their own counsel who may advise the employee to stop co-operating with its employer – leading to a 'walk or talk' decision. Depending on the nature of any employment agreement, a company may have to advance the individual the fees and costs associated with individual representation. Also, since 2004, the United Kingdom has imposed an extensive Code of Practice for Disciplinary and Grievance Procedures on employers, which sets out standards of procedural fairness that a UK employer should comply with if it takes action that will detrimentally affect an employee's employment.[90]

See Chapters 13 and 14 on employee rights

Privilege considerations 11.5

In the United States, certain portions of internal investigations are protected by the attorney–client privilege and the work-product doctrine, and courts routinely uphold those privileges.[91] This can be true even where the purpose of an investigation is to ensure regulatory compliance, or where non-lawyers are involved in key parts of the investigation.[92]

Generally, the attorney–client privilege entitles a party to withhold from production (1) communications, (2) with an attorney, his or her subordinate or agent, (3) made in confidence, (4) for the primary purpose of securing an opinion of law, legal services or assistance in a legal proceeding. It applies to corporations as well as individuals, and therefore protects communications between corporate employees and a corporation's in-house and external legal counsel on matters within the scope of the employees' corporate responsibilities. Communications between non-legal corporate employees can also be privileged where an attorney neither authors nor receives the communication, if the communication contains or refers to previously transmitted legal advice or identifies specific legal advice that the non-attorneys will seek from attorneys in the near future. Additionally, the work-product doctrine protects documents and tangible things, otherwise discoverable, prepared in anticipation of litigation and in connection with a threatened or pending government investigation. The doctrine can apply to documents prepared by both attorneys and non-attorneys. Attorney notes, research, and compilations of background materials, memoranda, investigative reports, witness statements; and materials prepared by non-legal personnel such as investigators are examples of the types of documents that may be protected. Work-product containing an attorney's mental impressions is referred to as 'opinion' work-product and is afforded greater protection than other 'ordinary' work-product.

90 ACAS 'Code of practice on disciplinary and grievance procedures' (2015) available at https://www.acas.org.uk/media/1047/Acas-Code-of-Practice-on-Discipline-and-Grievance/pdf/11287_CoP1_Disciplinary_Procedures_v1__Accessible.pdf.

91 See In re Kellogg Brown & Root, Inc., 756 F.3d 754 (D.C. Cir. 2014); Cicel (Beijing) Sci. & Tech. Co. v. Misonix, Inc., No. 17CV1642, 2019 WL 1574806 (E.D.N.Y. Apr. 11, 2019); In re Gen. Motors LLC Ignition Switch Litig., 80 F. Supp. 3d 521, 530 (S.D.N.Y. 2015).

92 In re Kellogg Brown & Root, Inc., 756 F.3d 754, 760 (D.C. Cir. 2014), at 760. ('In the context of an organization's internal investigation, if one of the significant purposes of the internal investigation was to obtain or provide legal advice, the privilege will apply. That is true regardless of whether an internal investigation was conducted pursuant to a company compliance programme required by statute or regulation, or was otherwise conducted pursuant to company policy.') (Citation omitted.)

In the United Kingdom, privilege attaches to (1) confidential communications between a lawyer and his or her client for the purpose of seeking and receiving legal advice in a relevant legal context, including factual reporting (legal advice privilege), and (2) confidential communications between a lawyer and his or her client and/or a third party, or between a client and a third party, provided that such communications have been created for the dominant purpose of obtaining legal advice, evidence or information in preparation for actual litigation, or litigation that is 'reasonably in prospect' (litigation privilege). English case law has traditionally called into question the availability of litigation privilege for documents created during a regulatory investigation, as an investigation alone lacks the adversarial character of litigation. In the recent ENRC[93] decision, the Court of Appeal looked at the issue of when a corporate might reasonably contemplate prosecution (and therefore the necessary 'litigation') in the context of a self-reporting process, commenting as follows:

> [W]e are not sure that every SFO manifestation of concern would properly be regarded as adversarial litigation, but when the SFO specifically makes clear to the company the prospect of its criminal prosecution . . . and legal advisers are engaged to deal with that situation, as in the present case, there is a clear ground for contending that criminal prosecution is in reasonable contemplation.[94]

But, the Court went on to say that no particular action in the course of engagement with a regulator will allow a company to say that at a particular date it contemplated a criminal prosecution and privilege crystallised. Every case will turn on its own facts, and the evidence will be assessed in the round.

The corporate must also have created the documents for the dominant purpose of the contemplated litigation. In ENRC, even where ENRC might have created documents for the dominant purpose of merely investigating 'the facts to see what had happened and deal with compliance and governance',[95] the Court said this:

> Although a reputable company will wish to ensure high ethical standards in the conduct of its business for its own sake, it is undeniable that the 'stick' used to enforce appropriate standards is the criminal law and, in some measure, the civil law also. Thus, where there is a clear threat of a criminal investigation, even at one remove from the specific risks posed by the SFO should it start an investigation, the reason for the investigation of whistle-blower allegations > must be brought into the zone where the dominant purpose may be to prevent or deal with litigation.[96]

93 [2018] EWCA Civ 2006.

94 At [96].

95 At [108].

So, litigation privilege may well cover a significant proportion of documents created in the course of an internal investigation into possible criminal activity after the regulator has made clear there is a prospect of prosecution. Again, though, why the corporate created particular documents is important. If a corporate creates documents specifically to disclose to the regulator, then it seems unlikely that a claim to litigation privilege against that same regulator will succeed, at least in relation to the final versions of these documents.

The Court of Appeal also discussed the policy behind applying litigation privilege in this area:

> It is, however, obviously in the public interest that companies should be prepared to investigate allegations from whistle blowers or investigative journalists, prior to going to a prosecutor such as the SFO, without losing the benefit of legal professional privilege for the work product and consequences of their investigation. . . . The remedy for the SFO is not to allow prevarication and delay . . . to prevent a timeous investigation, when it becomes clear that the company is not wholeheartedly reporting its own conduct and making appropriate waivers of privilege.[97]

It went on to make clear that determining the extent of co-operation by a company (in an analysis of whether a DPA was in the public interest) included determining 'whether the company was willing to waive any privilege attaching to documents produced during internal investigations, so that it could share those documents with the SFO'.[98] But, as noted above, past practice in both the United Kingdom and the United States suggests that a corporate does not need to waive privilege over all its investigation documents to receive co-operation credit.

On 2 October 2018, the SFO announced that it would not appeal the ENRC decision further to the Supreme Court.[99]

In presenting the underlying facts of an internal investigation, a company must be mindful of the inherent risk that such a presentation will be deemed a privilege waiver in any subsequent proceedings. If a disclosure of privileged information to a federal office or agency is deemed intentional, the privilege will be waived in any federal or state proceeding.[100] However, if a disclosure of privileged information is unintentional, it will not create a broad waiver so long as the holder of the privilege

96 At [109].

97 At [116].

98 At [117].

99 Kirstin Ridley, 'UK fraud office backs down in ENRC privilege battle', Reuters (2 October 2018), available at https://uk.reuters.com/article/uk-britain-enrc-sfo/uk-fraud-office-backs-down-in-enrc-privilege-battle-idUKKCN1MC1N0.

100 See Fed. R. Evid. 502(a).

took steps to prevent the disclosure and then promptly took reasonable steps to seek return of any inadvertently disclosed information.[101] Accordingly, if a company decides that it does not intend to waive privilege, it should devise reasonable steps that highlight the company's decision not to waive privilege, including providing written notice of the intention not to produce privileged materials in any letter or other correspondence that accompanies a document production. Courts in England and Wales have held that a company can share the contents of a privileged communication with a regulator or other third party, keeping the privilege intact, so long as this desire is made clear, the disclosure is confidential and the communication is not proliferated widely.[102]

See Chapters 35 and 36 on privilege

The SFO has clarified its position on privilege considerations as part of the Corporate Co-operation Guidance, confirming that if an organisation decides to assert legal privilege over relevant materials (such as first accounts, internal investigation interviews or other documents), the SFO may challenge the privilege assertion where it considers it necessary or appropriate to do so. The Corporate Co-operation Guidance also includes an additional step for companies, by requiring organisations claiming privilege over materials to provide certification by independent counsel that the material is privileged. This is a departure from current practice and will serve as an additional cost for organisations under investigation.

11.6 Protecting confidential information

Companies producing information to the government should take steps to protect the confidentiality of that information. Although information produced in response to a grand jury subpoena must be kept confidential,[103] in the absence of a formal request, documents and testimony provided to the DOJ, SEC or other government authority can be shared with others. In many instances, documents under the control of a government agency can be subject to requests made pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA).[104] Further, documents typically shielded from disclosure by the FOIA and other regulations are not exempt from production to the United States Congress, which can, in turn, make the information public.

The procedures necessary to shield confidential information from disclosure can be quite complex. Each regulatory body has its own procedures for seeking confidential treatment of information. The SEC, for example, requires that each page of a document containing confidential information be stamped with a specific legend and that a request for confidential treatment go to the individual receiving the documents and the Office of Freedom of Information and Privacy Act Operations.[105] Many states have their own versions of the FOIA governing the treatment of information provided to, among others, state attorneys

101 See Fed. R. Evid. 502(b).
102 See Gotha City v. Sotheby's [1998] 1 WLR 114 (CA).
103 Fed. R. Crim. Pro. 6(e).
104 5 U.S.C. § 552.
105 17 C.F.R. § 200.83

general.[106] Further, while some congressional committees may implement their own procedures for seeking confidential treatment of information, an entity producing documents will have to consider what regulations apply to the information sought and whether the specific regulations prohibit disclosure in response to the request.

In the United Kingdom, the High Court confronted these issues in Standard Life Assurance v. Topland Col.[107] The SFO had disclosed information it had obtained through its section 2 powers to a Standard Life employee that it wished to interview. The SFO later discontinued the related investigation. Standard Life then used some of this information as part of civil proceedings against Topland. The court noted that the SFO was not entitled to disclose any material obtained by it during an investigation except for the purpose of its investigation (which was the original purpose of the disclosure in this case). A person who wished to prevent disclosure of genuinely confidential information, either by the SFO or by a person it had disclosed documents to, would need to rely on judicial review proceedings or seek an injunction to prevent a breach of confidence. This suggests that, to avoid relying on these indirect remedies, a company should agree with the SFO before disclosure how the SFO might control the further dissemination of confidential or sensitive documents. Safeguards may include the SFO returning the documents following a short time or notifying a disclosing party before the SFO intended to disseminate documents further. On the other hand, a company may also wish to construct potential safeguards around material produced to it during DPA negotiations and that may otherwise be discoverable in subsequent civil proceedings against it.

Concluding remarks 11.7

Companies have an incentive to co-operate with a government investigation, especially if co-operation credit does not necessarily require self-reporting of the misconduct. But self-reporting will assist companies alongside the voluntary provision of relevant materials. The additional advantages of co-operation – control of the investigation process, orderly production of materials and managing press intrusion – are likely to be great when weighed against the disruption and publicity of formal actions including raids, arrests and prosecutions. In cross-border investigations, companies will need to devise due process safeguards to protect the rights of individuals and respect local law requirements. Ensuring local law specialists are instructed to work as part of a multidisciplinary team will be key.

106 See, e.g., New York Freedom of Information Law, Public Officer's Law §§ 84 to 90.
107 Standard Life Assurance Ltd v. Topland Col (Rev 1) [2011] 1 WLR 2162.

12

Production of Information to the Authorities: The In-house Perspective

Femi Thomas and Tapan Debnath[1]

12.1 Introduction

Although less common for small and medium-sized enterprises, it is not unusual for large, particularly multinational, companies to find themselves weighing whether to voluntarily disclose information, or what to do when compelled to disclose information to law enforcement or regulatory authorities. The variables to consider are many and nuanced. They include, without limitation, the potential impact on customers and the business, the nature and pervasiveness of the wrongdoing, and whether mandatory reporting obligations arise. This chapter considers some of the key legal and practical considerations implicated when a company produces information to the authorities.

12.2 Initial considerations

The company should as early as possible seek to establish:

- Its status in the inquiry – is it a suspect or witness? This is not always communicated or readily discernible because the authority, itself, might not have decided either way, or might not wish its view to be known in the early stages of an investigation. There may, however, be some clue in how the authority has gone about requesting or otherwise obtaining the information. For instance, in the United Kingdom, a dawn raid by the Serious Fraud Office (SFO) on company premises implies that the SFO, and the courts, have reasonable grounds to believe, based on some assessment of facts, that it is impracticable

1 Femi Thomas is vice president and global head of business integrity at Nokia Corporation and Tapan Debnath is senior legal counsel in Nokia Corporation's ethics and compliance department and compliance lead for Nokia Enterprise Business Group. The views expressed are the authors' (or as otherwise attributed) and do not represent the views of Nokia Corporation.

to use less intrusive production order powers or doing so creates a risk of destruction of evidence. As such, unannounced raids tend to indicate, though not conclusively, that the company is a suspect.[2]

- Are any of the company's employees suspects, and do they pose any ongoing risks to the business?[3] When employees are suspects, a company should ensure that data collection and any internal investigation is conducted without tipping off the implicated employees or 'trampling over the crime scene', while adhering to local data protection and labour law.
- Which authority is making the request, and is the request reasonable? Some authorities are more aggressive than others; this is worth factoring in when setting the response strategy. Equally important is determining whether there are multiple authorities involved. Requests from less familiar jurisdictions, where the independence of prosecutors and the judiciary might be less assured, pose additional questions: Is there a political or monetary motivation? Are employees at risk of arrest and imprisonment without adequate due process? And what are the rules of corporate liability, if any? A request for information should be carefully reviewed to ensure that it appears reasonable in terms of scope and the basis for the request, and should state the power under which the request was made.

Data collection and review 12.3

The company will at an early stage start to think about whether it has the responsive data and the appropriate process for preserving and collecting it. Data from digital devices to be produced to the authorities should be safeguarded from deletion or destruction and then collected in a forensically sound way. At a high level, this means that the collection is carried out by skilled persons who can retrieve and preserve whole images of various types of devices in a manner that is repeatable with consistent results, and that all steps taken are recorded and auditable. It is vital to capture all relevant material, and having a systematic and methodical approach will help. The investigation support team should include someone with detailed knowledge of the company's IT systems and structure and will, preferably, be experienced in data extractions.

A company is also likely to want to understand for itself what the collected data reveals. The data review is invariably the most time-consuming and costly part of the production exercise. It is therefore imperative to try to agree realistic deadlines with the authorities at the outset and to communicate promptly if any slippage is anticipated. Most authorities will want a written record, usually in the form of witness statements, of the methodology used in the data collection and imaging, the process and rationale behind any filtering of the data, and how the review was conducted and the instructions given to the reviewers. This point is stated explicitly in the Corporate Co-operation Guidance published by the SFO on 6 August 2019 under the heading 'Preserving and providing material'. The SFO Guidance emphasises the need to have an audit trail of the acquisition and handling of digital material and to take all steps to maintain the integrity of systems hosting such material over the life of an SFO investigation, which can run for many years.

2 On 6 August 2019, the SFO published its long-awaited Corporate Co-operation Guidance. At the end of the Guidance, a short passage explains that it may be necessary for the SFO to exercise powers of compulsion to obtain material from a co-operating company. This re-enforces that how the authority seeks material (whether by production order or dawn raid) can be illustrative only of the company's status in the investigation and should not be taken as conclusive.

3 While change of company personnel (and culture) is a desirable outcome in most cases involving serious wrongdoing, it will probably need to be considered after a thorough review of the issues.

A corporate can manage the costs incurred in a data collection and production exercise by: having an established panel of specialist law firms, which should yield discounted rates, but maintaining flexibility to go off-panel as individual case needs dictate; outsourcing the data collection and document review to professional service providers or even doing it in-house[4] if there is the requisite capability, instead of the law firm doing it; ensuring that the document review is as focused as possible through appropriate filtering and, possibly, use of AI technology; setting a budget at the outset and sticking to it unless extensions are approved; and monitoring costs on a monthly basis to ensure the exercise remains within budget.

12.4 Principal concerns for corporates contemplating production

There are numerous, often competing, concerns when a company produces documents to the authorities. One obvious but important concern is the impact that the disclosed material might have on (1) the authority's investigation, or even pre-investigation, and (2) the company's status with the authority. Another concern is to identify and then to protect any intellectual property, trade secrets or proprietary information, or commercially sensitive information that might be contained in, or decipherable from, the material to be disclosed. This concern will accentuate when the company is co-operating with several international and domestic authorities, or where multiple authorities have taken, or could take, an interest. The disclosed material could end up being shared between the various authorities, which could result in the limitations on use that the disclosed material can be put to in one jurisdiction not applying in another. As a result, the disclosing party cannot necessarily ensure that the limitations on use – which applied in the jurisdiction in which the material had been disclosed – will be enforced in a separate jurisdiction in which the material is now available.[5]

4 Some companies have an in-sourced legal support function that handles, for example, initial review of contract terms, which can, with some training and guidance, be used to do the first document review in an internal investigation.

5 In United States v. Allen, 864 F.3d 63 (2d Cir. 2017), the US Court of Appeal overturned the convictions and indictments of two LIBOR traders because, among other things, the testimony given by the defendants to the UK Financial Conduct Authority [FCA] under compulsion was used against them in their US criminal trial, which was held to be an infringement of the defendants' Fifth Amendment rights. This is an example of information given in one jurisdiction (the United Kingdom), in which there were statutory limitations on use of the information, being used without limitation, initially at least, by another (the United States).

Special care must be taken at the start and throughout the investigation to have clear records of who is authorised on behalf of the company to instruct and receive advice from external lawyers, and is therefore the client. The purpose of any internal investigation is important also and should be recorded. Is the purpose to obtain legal advice on the company's position in relation to a law enforcement or regulatory authority's interest? Is it to gather information to disclose to the authorities? Or is it to do with actual or contemplated litigation, or a combination of reasons?

At the time of writing the previous edition of this chapter, the England and Wales High Court in SFO v. ENRC[6] had ruled that a criminal investigation by the SFO does not necessarily equate to adversarial litigation being in reasonable contemplation, which is of course the test for litigation privilege to be applicable.[7] This made the applicability of legal privilege in internal investigations in the United Kingdom, when the authorities were in an investigatory and not in a prosecution phase, quite difficult and widened the transatlantic divide in the approach to legal privilege. However, in September 2018, the Court of Appeal overturned the High Court's ruling and lowered the bar for legal privilege to be available.[8] Although the key question of whether adversarial litigation is in reasonable contemplation is very fact-specific, it will be a little less difficult for corporates to successfully argue that litigation privilege applies to certain parts of its internal investigation, including over employee and third-party interviews and material generated by forensic accountants.

While the question of who is the 'client' remains narrowly construed, namely those who have been authorised by the company to instruct and receive advice from lawyers, the Court of Appeal in SFO v. ENRC expressed a non-binding view that the law in this area could be reviewed and updated. For now, it remains more difficult to apply legal advice privilege to the fact-gathering part of an internal investigation.

A company will also be keen to restrict the ability of third parties to use the information disclosed to the authorities in civil proceedings against the company. Such restrictions could be imposed during the course of negotiations or discussions aimed at resolving, avoiding or reducing the scope of litigation by making clear at the time of production that the information is confidential and, when dealing with UK authorities, stated to be provided on a limited waiver of legal privilege or without-prejudice privilege basis.[9] A company contemplating this approach should

6 The Director of the Serious Fraud Office v. Eurasian Natural Resources Corporation Limited [2017] EWHC 1017 (QB), para. 159. The Chancellor of the High Court ruled in Bilta (UK) Ltd v. Royal Bank of Scotland Plc & Anor [2017] EWHC 3535 that, in the present case, documents created in an internal regulatory investigation after a 'watershed moment' of HMRC writing to allege tax fraud were covered by legal professional privilege.

7 Three Rivers District Council and others v. Governor and Company of the Bank of England (No. 6) [2005] 1 AC 610, HL, para. 53 (per Lord Rogers).

8 The Director of the Serious Fraud Office v. Eurasian Natural Resources Corporation Limited [2018] EWHC Civ 2006.

9 Property Alliance Group Ltd v. Royal Bank of Scotland plc [2015] EWHC 1557 (Ch) without prejudice privilege applied to negotiations with the FCA with a view to arriving at a settlement.

keep in mind that it loses control over material that has been disclosed to authorities. The material might, for example, via court orders for disclosure, end up in the hands of litigants, regardless of attempts to prevent it. Second, the attempt to make the disclosure of material without prejudice to privilege could clash with the authority's expectation of a co-operating entity and negatively affect the chances of non-prosecution. This is particularly the case in view of the 2018 judicial review in which the court criticised the SFO and re-emphasised the SFO's obligation to proactively seek to obtain material that might help the case of individual defendants or undermine the prosecution's case, even if that means testing and challenging a company's assertion of privilege over the product of an internal investigation.[10]

Federal courts in the United States are, however, reluctant to recognise selected waivers of privilege in relation to documents produced as part of an investigation or prosecution.[11] The information may lose the protection of privilege and be subject to discovery by other parties.

See Chapter 36 on privilege

Adherence to data protection principles is another important concern, especially when the information is being provided voluntarily and there is not the protection given by a document production order or subpoena, which usually overrides any local data protection rules. Since 25 May 2018, Article 48 of the EU General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) has restricted the ability of companies to transfer information out of the European Union in order to respond to orders or requests of foreign courts or authorities. Under this Article, personal data can only be transferred outside the European Union to respond to law enforcement or regulatory subpoenas or production orders, or court orders for disclosure, through the mutual legal assistance treaty route or other provisions of the GDPR. As the application of Article 48 is yet to be examined by the courts, it is unclear whether voluntary disclosure to the authorities is caught by the Article.[12]

12.5 Obtaining material from employees

There will often be a wide pool of employees, a few of whom might be 'suspects' or 'targets', who hold relevant information. It is important to first identify which, if any, of those employees should be notified of the data collection, bearing in mind the SFO cautioning against putting employees on notice and its desire to have the data collection undertaken with minimal risk of interference.[13] The Corporate Co-operation Guidance states that the SFO should be consulted before interviewing employees (or taking any HR action). When collecting data from

---

The without prejudice rule applies to exclude negotiations genuinely aimed at settlement from being given in evidence.

10 See R (on the application of AL) v. Serious Fraud Office [2018] EWHC 856.

11 See In Re Columbia/HCA Healthcare Corp. Billing Practices Litig., 293 F.3d 289 (6th Cir. 2002).

12 See, for example, David J Kessler et al., 'The Potential Impact of Article 48 of the The Sedona Conference Journal, volume 17, 2016, No. 2 on Cross Border Discovery From the United States' in The Sedona Conference Journal, Volume 17, 2016, No. 2.

13 Speech by Alun Milford, SFO General Counsel, Annual Employed Bar Conference, 26 March 2014, available at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2014/03/26/corporate-criminal-liability-deferred-prosecution-agreements/.

employees, the corporation should be mindful of local laws and the company's policies on data collection, as well the potential need to give notice or obtain consent from the employee. The key is to weigh any risk of relevant information being destroyed, and displeasing the requesting authority, if notice of the data collection is given to employees against any specific local law requirements and internal data collection policies.

It is common for employees to have personal material on work devices. If there are no reasonable grounds to believe that giving notice of a data collection exercise to an employee creates a risk that data will be destroyed, the employee could be instructed to separate personal material from work material before the device is copied. The personal material would then be safe from inadvertent disclosure to the authorities. If this separation of personal data is not possible because, for instance, the collection needs to be covert, then filtering and review before disclosure, if appropriate, should provide adequate safeguards against personal data being handed over.

A less common problem is where work material has been stored on personal devices. If that same material also exists on a work device or on the company's servers, it can be collected from there rather than from the employee's personal device. Clearly, it is not possible for a company to covertly extract data from an employee's personal device but it may be possible to do so with the employee's express consent. Such situations should be catered for in the contract of employment and the company's internal policies.

As a best practice, companies should guard against this thorny issue of commingling of personal and business information by instituting appropriately tailored policies. It may not, however, be reasonable to expect that a company device will never be used for some personal purposes but companies should provide written limitations on the kinds of use that are acceptable and permitted. In any event, the transfer of business data through personal devices or email accounts should always be prohibited.

Material held overseas 12.6

Because of the global nature of business, information that is required by a law enforcement or regulatory authority might be held by the company's overseas subsidiaries – and in multiple locations at that.

When a company seeks to provide information voluntarily, it should assess whether this would expose it to potential claims of breaching the confidentiality or data protection rights of employees or third parties.

Despite a company's desire to co-operate with a subpoena or production order, there may be significant legal hurdles, such as blocking statutes, preventing it from providing the material.[14] There have been several US and UK court

14 France, Switzerland, Italy and China are some of the countries that have blocking statutes. (See further, Vol. II chapters at question 60.) Breach of the Swiss blocking statute has been prosecuted on several occasions, whereas breach of the French blocking statute has, as far as is known, been prosecuted only once since its inception in 1968. However, Sapin II has a provision for penalising decisions[15] that, applying the 'law of the forum' principle, ruled that the risk of prosecution for breaching an overseas blocking statute is not a reasonable ground for non-compliance with the court's order for discovery. In those circumstances, the company's lawyers must speak with the authority concerned, explain the issues and diplomatically suggest that the authority consider obtaining the information through the MLAT route or through police-to-police information exchange. It is vital for the company to support the process by having the material readily available, and using the contacts that the company's external lawyers might have with prosecutors in the state where the material is held, to try to expedite matters. A legitimate alternative is available if the information also exists independently in another jurisdiction, which does not have blocking statutes, provided it had been transferred there previously for valid business or legal purposes and not to get around the blocking statute.

There have been recent important legislative developments in the United States and United Kingdom that seek to make it easier for law enforcement to access electronic data held overseas. The US Clarifying Lawful Overseas Use of Data Act (CLOUD Act) and the UK's Crime (Overseas Production Orders) Act (COPO Act) 2019 allow the authorities to compel companies, without having to apply to a court, to hand over information even where the information is held overseas. The UK–US Bilateral Data Access Agreement, signed on 3 October 2019, will lead to prosecutors gaining these additional powers. These are the first acts of the kind and reflect the theme of increased cross-border co-operation. While the impact of the legislation remains to be seen, the acts clearly represent another point at which companies can be caught between conflicting laws, with blocking statutes and data privacy laws at the other side of the pincer seeking to limit companies' ability to provide information. Companies should therefore be acutely aware of the potential for such conflicting obligations, and understand who controls their data (third parties may host or store data) and where it is stored. It is also prudent to develop plans of action for how to respond to an order to furnish evidence kept in a jurisdiction with laws prohibiting the transfer.

12.7 Concluding remarks

As explained in Chapter 11, there are many good reasons why a company might wish to take a proactive approach and voluntarily provide information rather than waiting for a subpoena or production order. It could, for example, give the best opportunity for maximising co-operation credit. Indeed, the senior UK judge granting the Rolls-Royce deferred prosecution agreement (DPA) cited voluntary provision of material as one of the ways Rolls-Royce demonstrated 'extraordinary' breach of the French blocking statute, which leads some commentators to believe that it will be more readily enforced. Further, Article 48 of the GDPR has similar effect to blocking statutes across the European Union. (See further, Vol. II chapters at question 60.)

15 For example, Secretary of State for Health and Others v Servier Laboratories and Others (Servier) [2013] EWCA Civ 1234 and National Grid Electricity Transmissions PLC v ABB Limited and Others [2013] EWHC 822 (Ch).

co-operation. Depending on the facts of the case, in the authors' view, there could be little to no loss of credit by asking for a production order rather than voluntarily disclosing – if this is appropriate to overcome data protection or other barriers – provided (1) there is early dialogue with the authorities and (2) the issues are reported before the authority learns of them separately through another source.[16]

In some circumstances a company might wish to think carefully about whether it needs to demonstrate extraordinary levels of co-operation. One way to do so would be to waive legal privilege over certain classes of documents to influence the company's eligibility for the United States Department of Justice's FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy[17] or a DPA.[18] The joint Crown Prosecution Service and SFO Guidance on Corporate Prosecutions[19] explains that 'genuinely proactive' self-reporting is a public interest factor militating against the prosecution of a company. A voluntary waiver of privilege is relevant to determining whether a company has genuinely and proactively co-operated with the SFO or other authority, and consequently to the assessment of whether it is in the public interest to prosecute or to invite the company to DPA negotiations. The SFO Corporate Co-operation Guidance states that a failure to waive privilege and provide witness accounts will not allow the company to avail itself of the corresponding factor weighing against prosecution as found in the SFO and CPS Deferred Prosecution Agreements Code of Practice[20] (but will not be penalised by the SFO). The company might therefore wish to think carefully about which documents it believes are truly legally privileged and whether in fact to assert legal privilege over them.

As stated in opening this chapter, there are many and nuanced factors to consider when a company is required to produce information to the authorities. The key is to be well prepared in terms of knowing where information is stored; to have the relevant expertise, preferably internally, to gather relevant information quickly and forensically; to have an overall strategy and end game as early in the process as possible, but also keeping things under review; and to be able to rely on trusted advisers.

16 Rolls-Royce did not self-report but still received a deferred prosecution agreement because of its 'extraordinary' co-operation. See Serious Fraud Office v. Rolls-Royce PLC and another, Case No. U20170036 (2017), paras. 21, 22.

17 The Corporate Enforcement Policy adapted and replaced the FCPA Pilot Program – see https://www.justice.gov/criminal-fraud/corporate-enforcement-policy. The policy includes a presumption of a declination where the company voluntarily self-reports, fully co-operates with a DOJ investigation and makes timely and appropriate remediation.

18 Of course, the implications of full or selective waiver of privilege must be very carefully thought through.

19 https://www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/corporate-prosecutions.

20 https://www.cps.gov.uk/sites/default/files/documents/publications/dpa_cop.pdf.

13

Employee Rights: The UK Perspective

James Carlton, Sona Ganatra and David Murphy[1]

13.1 Contractual and statutory employee rights

13.1.1 Company policy, manual, contracts, by-laws

13.1.1.1 Suspension

The vast majority of employees implicated in an investigation will be suspended. Generally speaking, employers will rely on the increasingly common express provisions to suspend employees in the course of disciplinary investigations contained in the employment contract, staff handbook or disciplinary policies.

In the absence of such an express provision, employers may still suspend employees on the basis that it constitutes a reasonable management instruction not to work or attend the workplace in circumstances where serious allegations, particularly those of a regulatory nature, have been made or where relationships have broken down.

In such circumstances, however, employees may have greater grounds to challenge the suspension. English case law in relation to garden leave (when an employer requires an employee not to attend work during the notice period) suggests that if the employer does not have an express right to suspend an employee, the employee may have a legal basis for challenging the suspension if he or she can show that he or she needs to be able to use particular professional skills frequently to ensure that they are maintained and do not diminish through lack of use.[2] Even if the employee cannot show this, the longer the period of suspension, the more difficult it may become for the employer to justify it.

---

1 James Carlton, Sona Ganatra and David Murphy are partners at Fox Williams LLP.

2 William Hill Organisation Limited v. Tucker [1998] IRLR 313.

Regardless of whether it has relied on an express right or not, employers must have reasonable grounds for any suspension and these grounds should be kept under review to ensure that the period of suspension is no longer than necessary.

What constitutes a reasonable ground for suspension? 13.1.1.2

Suspension may be reasonable if the individual is suspected of serious misconduct and his or her continued attendance at work creates a potential threat to the employer's business or its other staff or could have an adverse effect on the investigator's ability to investigate the matter appropriately. In the event of a legal challenge to suspension, an employment tribunal or court is likely to consider all the relevant circumstances, including the terms of the employee's contract, what the employer has said about the suspension, the length of suspension and any financial loss it is causing.

Most employers' disciplinary procedures are not contractual, and therefore a failure to follow them does not, generally speaking, constitute a breach of contract (unless the employee can show that the failure was a breach of the implied duty of trust and confidence owed by the employer). However, in the public sector, where contractual procedures seem to be more common, there have been circumstances in which employees have successfully obtained injunctions preventing their employers from proceeding with disciplinary proceedings where to do so in the particular circumstances would constitute a breach of contract.[3]

Given the potential for disciplinary action to have significant adverse consequences on the careers and finances of employees working in regulated sectors, in the coming years we may see employees pursuing creative legal arguments to obtain injunctions against disciplinary action. Such arguments might be based on the implied duty of trust and confidence, with employees arguing that proceeding with disciplinary action in the particular circumstances would breach the duty.

In the United Kingdom, the statutory Code of Practice on Disciplinary and Grievance Procedures (the Code) published by the Advisory, Conciliation and Advisory Service (ACAS)[4] sets out the principles for handling disciplinary and grievance issues in the workplace. Its content in relation to investigations is written with internal investigations in mind, rather than investigations by an external third party, but its principles will be relevant to any disciplinary proceedings instigated by the employer and therefore to all investigations that might lead to disciplinary action. Individuals will not have any free-standing claim for any failure to follow the Code but employment tribunals take into account any such failures when considering relevant cases and the compensation to be awarded.

In practice, in a regulated environment such as the financial services sector, many employers will be far less concerned about compliance with the Code than they will be about satisfying the demands and wishes of the regulators or prosecuting authorities. Nonetheless, an individual who does not consider an investigation is being handled appropriately may find within the Code's principles some helpful points to refer to when explaining his or her concerns to the employer. In particular, that any period of suspension should be kept as brief as possible and should be kept under review.

3 Mezey v. South West London & St George's Mental Health NHS Trust [2010] IRLR 512.

4 https://www.acas.org.uk/media/1047/Acas-Code-of-Practice-on-Discipline-and-Grievance/pdf/11287_CoP1_Disciplinary_Procedures_v1__Accessible.pdf.

13.1.1.3 Remuneration

It is usual for employees to continue to receive basic salary and benefits while an investigation is ongoing, irrespective of whether they are suspended from work. Unpaid suspension is rare and will not be an option open to the employer unless it has a contractual right to do so.

In the financial services sector, variable pay (such as annual bonuses and long-term incentive awards) often forms a significant part of an employee's annual remuneration and normally a proportion of variable pay is deferred and paid out over a number of years.

It is now common to see provisions in employment contracts to the effect that variable pay will not be awarded or delivered if at the time of award or delivery the individual is subject to any kind of investigation. Similar provisions are usually also found within the relevant award plan rules.

Investigations can take many years so their implementation can have a significant financial impact on the employee, particularly as it can affect deferred remuneration from prior years, as well as the current year's bonus or long-term incentive scheme award.

It is not always clear from such provisions what happens to any variable pay that is not awarded or delivered if the investigation finds there has been no wrongdoing. When negotiating employment contracts, employees should seek clarity in the wording of the provisions so they stipulate that if an investigation finds no wrongdoing, the variable pay in question be awarded or delivered.

In relation to variable remuneration awarded by banks, building societies and certain regulated investment firms, the regulatory framework contains strict restrictions for particular classes of employees.[5]

In essence, the rules are intended to discourage excessive risk-taking and encourage more effective risk management.

By way of illustration, the rules provide that, in certain circumstances, deferral (the period during which variable remuneration is withheld following the end of the accrual period) is extended to: (1) a minimum seven-year period with no vesting until three years after award for senior managers (i.e., individuals who have the greatest influence over the strategic direction of the business); (2) five years for Prudential Regulatory Authority (PRA) designated risk managers with senior, managerial or supervisory roles; and (3) three to five years for all other staff whose actions could have a material impact on a firm (material risk-takers).

5 As set out, for example, in SYSC 19D of the FCA Handbook in respect of dual regulated firms: https://www.handbook.fca.org.uk/handbook/SYSC/19D/?view=chapter.

At the same time, regulated firms must include malus provisions (i.e., arrangements that permit the employer to prevent vesting of all or part of deferred remuneration based on risk outcomes or performance) and clawback provisions (i.e., arrangements through which remuneration that has already vested is recouped) for seven years from the award of variable remuneration for all material risk-takers. Importantly, both the PRA and the Financial Conduct Authority (FCA) clawback rules have been strengthened by a requirement for a possible three additional years for senior managers at the end of the seven-year period where a firm or regulatory authorities have commenced enquiries into potential material failures. In effect, therefore, employees operating at a senior level in the financial services sector who are subject to an investigation potentially now face a decade of uncertainty over their pay.

Guidance from the FCA provides that, in relation to issues relating to risk-management failure or misconduct, regulated firms are expected to consider cancelling or clawing back bonus awards in relation to those employees who reasonably could have been expected to be aware of the failure, misconduct or weakness at the time but failed to take 'adequate steps' or who, by virtue of their role or seniority, were 'indirectly responsible or accountable'.[6]

A key related issue is the operation of these malus or clawback provisions in the context of the buy-out of awards when an employee moves from one firm to another. As a result of the regulatory framework, senior employees in the financial services sector may find that their current employer is able to apply clawback based upon the conclusions of their previous employer's investigation. As such those employees who are subject to an investigation in the regulated sector could face further uncertainty and the possibility that previous employers can determine their future pay.

English law 13.1.2

Suspended employees are bound by the express terms of their contracts and by certain terms implied by law, including a duty of fidelity (which includes a duty of confidentiality) and a duty to obey lawful and reasonable orders.

At the same time, employers are also bound by an implied duty of trust and confidence. This duty comes into play when determining whether to suspend employees implicated in misconduct.

Employees have successfully argued that a failure to consider whether suspension could be avoided was a breach of the duty of trust and confidence owed by the employer in numerous cases, paving the way for a claim for constructive dismissal.[7] Such claims are often difficult to pursue but, if successful, release the individual from any post-termination restrictions in his or her contract. Accordingly, prudent employers should keep under continuous review the need for an employee to be suspended.

6 https://www.fca.org.uk/publication/finalised-guidance/guidance-on-ex-post-risk-adjustment-variable-remuneration.pdf.

7 For example Crawford and another v. Suffolk Mental Health Partnership NHS Trust [2012] IRLR 402.

13.2 Representation

13.2.1 Need to collect information on behalf of client

13.2.1.1 Interviewing client

At the outset of an instruction from an individual, independent legal advisers (ILAs) should seek detailed instructions to clarify the full history of employment and determine the potential scope of the misconduct under investigation and the parties implicated. A key component of this stage is to assess the employee's relationship with the employer. Understanding the dynamics of the relationship at the outset will assist in the smooth running of the investigation and allow a better understanding of the support that is likely to be offered by the employer.

13.2.1.2 Requesting documents and information from:

Employer

An employee involved in an investigation (internal or external) may need to request that the employer provides documentation, access to witnesses or other support. This arises as during any period of suspension, the individual is often operating in a vacuum, and he or she is likely to be prohibited from having contact with clients and colleagues and prevented from having access to the employer's IT systems, documents and premises other than to the extent permitted by the employer. From an employer's perspective these restrictions are crucial to ensuring that documentation has not been compromised and that potential witnesses or accomplices have not been tipped off. Indeed, such concerns will probably be as important for the employee.

There is unlikely to be an express or implied right that the employee can rely on such support from the employer.

In the context of an internal investigation, the employer would not want to provide carte blanche access to documentation and information to the employee and is likely to prefer that the employee provide his or her own account of the circumstances.

In the context of an external investigation by law enforcement authorities, the situation is more complex. It may well be in the employer's interests to co-operate with requests for assistance to gain some understanding as to the scope of the investigation and the potential repercussions. At the same time, the employer may have its own regulatory obligations in mind and may be required to co-operate with and disclose documentation to the regulator.

Any rights of the employer to access personal electronic devices used by the employee for work are likely to be set out in the staff handbook. Generally speaking, where such devices are routinely used for work purposes, employers will be permitted to seek access to them.

Law enforcement

In circumstances where a law enforcement authority has announced its intention to interview an individual, a request for a list of questions or topics of discussion together with relevant documentation should be made to the relevant body at the earliest opportunity. In practice, law enforcement authorities seldom provide more than a broad list of areas they wish to explore and often provide limited supporting documentation. Individuals should be advised at the outset that they are unlikely to receive detailed information from the law enforcement authority in advance of the interview and that further documentation is likely to be produced on the day of the interviews. There will be specific, limited circumstances, however, where law enforcement authorities are more receptive to such requests. For example, if the individual is no longer in employment and has no ongoing relationship with the employer or if the employer is no longer operating as a going concern, law enforcement authorities may be more amenable to requests for information as otherwise the employee will have no other avenue to properly prepare a case.

Other witnesses (and their counsel)

As noted above, individuals are likely to be prohibited from having contact with clients and colleagues during suspension. If an individual is aware of colleagues who would be able to provide assistance to clarify aspects of the case, appropriate action should be taken to contact them. Depending upon the ongoing relationship with the employer, in the first instance, it may be sensible to approach the employer to request details of the colleague's legal counsel (if one has been appointed).

Joint defence agreements 13.2.2

Between individuals and the company 13.2.2.1

On balance, in the vast majority of circumstances, co-operation between the employee and employer will be mutually beneficial. From an individual's perspective, while there is a risk of self-incrimination, co-operation with the employer allows the employee to know how the investigation is progressing and whether external regulators are involved, and grants him or her access to materials that are relevant and crucially the opportunity to engage with the employer in agreeing the outcome. Such co-operation often results in work-product produced by and communications between the parties and their legal advisers being protected by common interest privilege.

While perhaps not as frequent as in the United States, settlement discussions with law enforcement authorities in the United Kingdom are a growing trend. At the time of writing, since the introduction of deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs) in 2014, the SFO, for example, has entered into five DPAs. DPAs are not currently available for individuals in the United Kingdom. ILAs should ensure their clients appreciate the risk that the law enforcement authority may still take action against the employee in circumstances where the employer has entered into a DPA.

Between individuals and their counsel 13.2.2.2

In complex cases of misconduct, there are likely to be a number of individuals involved. There are clear advantages to ensuring communication lines are opened and maintained with ILAs engaged by potential 'co-defendants'; such communications have the benefit of being protected by common interest privilege. The many advantages include the sharing of important information and documentation that others may have obtained, as well as the benefit of adopting a common approach with the employer to documentation requests. Employers are more likely to be receptive to common, and therefore more focused, information requests made by several employees rather than numerous different requests received at different times by each employee.

13.3 Indemnification and insurance coverage

13.3.1 Determining whether an individual is indemnified

13.3.1.1 Communications with the employer and company counsel

Upon instruction by an individual, clarification should be sought as to whether the employer will fund the costs of an ILA. From the employee's perspective, access to an ILA from the start of an investigation is essential (regardless of whether the employee is central to the allegations or on the periphery) given the potential dangers ahead. What may start off as the provision of an innocuous witness account to a regulatory authority may turn quickly into the employee being regarded as a suspect as new allegations of misfeasance surface.

13.3.1.2 Potential sources of right to indemnification

Employment contract, company policies, by-laws or local laws

It is generally very unusual to see rights of indemnification set out formally in employment contracts in the United Kingdom. In certain industries, however – for example, the financial services and media sectors – it is becoming increasingly common for employers to maintain formal policies setting out the circumstances in which they will indemnify employees' legal expenses. Such indemnification will be limited to situations where an employee is being investigated solely because of acts performed in the course of and within the scope of his or her employment.

Close attention should be paid to such policies and the restrictions set out in them. In particular, given the difficulties for an employer to determine the potential liability of an employee at the outset of an investigation, it is common for employers to provide indemnification for legal fees incurred at an initial stage while the scope of allegations is clarified and for the employer to have a right to stop further indemnification and seek reimbursement of earlier costs, for example, where the employee is found to have acted outside the scope of his or her employment.

Employers also, generally speaking, provide lists of approved law firms to act as ILAs and generally require employees to seek approval before appointing representatives not on the list.

Unlike other jurisdictions, English law does not provide indemnification rights to employees.

Insurance policies of employer

D&O insurance

At the same time, employees at a senior level may also benefit from directors' and officers' (D&O) insurance.

The coverage of D&O policies should be carefully considered from both the employee's and employer's perspective to ensure that the policy covers investigations, prosecutions and related civil claims.

Generally speaking, UK-based D&O policies provide cover for 'formal' investigations. ILAs should clarify whether the definition of investigations also includes internal investigations and consider why the investigation has commenced. If an internal investigation has been commenced by the employer, for example, as a result of concerns over its own conduct and liability, other insurance policies, such as professional indemnity insurance, might be engaged. At the same time, the D&O policy might include an exclusion in relation to claims in connection with the performance or failure to perform professional services by or on behalf of any director or officer. In such circumstances, the professional indemnity insurance policy should become engaged. The exclusion of the D&O insurance and application of professional indemnity (or other related) insurance is frequently debated at the outset of investigations, particularly where there is concern about the requirement to pay deductibles under the D&O policy or where there are local insurance requirements under a global policy.

Advocating for indemnification when not otherwise clear 13.3.2

From the employer's perspective, the appointment and funding of an ILA has clear benefits where it appears that the interests of both parties are congruent. It encourages the co-operation of the employee and assists in ensuring that certain communications with the employee can be made with the protection of privilege. See Section 13.4

While indemnification policies are becoming more common, many employers choose not to have a formal policy and instead seek to enter into separate arrangements at the time of the investigation. This approach is attractive from the employer's perspective as it enables the employer to select when and how it will indemnify certain individuals without setting a precedent. In such circumstances, the employee should negotiate carefully to ensure that all potential costs and eventualities are covered.

Awareness of situations where indemnification may cease 13.3.3

Violation of undertaking to the company 13.3.3.1

Employer policies will set out the circumstances in which indemnification will cease. A common provision is the employee acting contrary to restrictions and requests set out in the agreement. For example, the indemnification policy or agreement may contain clauses requiring the employee to act in good faith in its dealings with the employer and regulatory authorities or to provide updates to the employer at given stages. Such undertakings should be highlighted in advance to individuals and ILAs should ensure that information is provided to the employer and its counsel.

It is important to advise individuals at the outset that violation of certain provisions may also lead to the employer seeking reimbursement or clawback of fees already incurred.

13.3.3.2 Failure to co-operate with investigation

How to decide whether to co-operate where failure to do so will affect indemnification

Most indemnification policies or agreements will contain provisions setting out the need for full co-operation between the employee and employer. At various stages of an investigation, the employee should consider carefully whether it continues to be in his or her best interests to fully co-operate with the employer. As the investigation develops, matters may come to light that indicate the employee's interests conflict, or are likely to conflict, with the employer's. In such circumstances, ILAs should discuss with the employee whether co-operation remains in the employee's best interests and the consequences that will flow from adopting a stance that is at odds with the employer.

13.3.4 Ensuring sufficient funds for protracted investigation

13.3.4.1 Cap on insurance policy

D&O policies should be reviewed at the outset and during investigations to ensure the scope and limitations of coverage are understood.

Generally, D&O policies include annual or total aggregate limits, or both. In circumstances where the employer and a number of directors are under investigation or where investigations are becoming protracted, it is not uncommon for the aggregate limit to quickly become exhausted. ILAs should ensure that the scope of any insurance cover is kept under constant review.

13.3.4.2 Commitment of company to continue indemnification

As previously noted, employers will continually assess whether it is appropriate to continue to indemnify employees under investigation. If it becomes clear that the employee has acted outside the scope of employment, the employer is unlikely to continue to provide support unless it would be in its interests to do so because, for example, there is a potential for related civil claims to be made against the employer.

13.4 Privilege concerns for employees and other individuals

13.4.1 In communications with other employees

13.4.1.1 Colleagues or people involved in underlying events

See Chapter 35 on privilege

As a matter of English law, communications between an ILA and third parties will only be protected by privilege if they relate to an existing, pending or reasonably contemplated litigation (in other words, litigation privilege applies). This is not always going to be the case in the context of an internal, or indeed external, investigation.

As such, unless the former colleague or associate of the individual is also implicated in the allegations such that common interest privilege may arise in discussions involving their ILA, ILAs should avoid communicating with third parties. Even in circumstances where common interest privilege can be said to arise, this is a developing area of English law and therefore subject to change. ILAs should act with caution and ensure that the common interest between the parties is clearly recorded at the outset.

Company counsel 13.4.1.2

Communications between the employee and legal counsel instructed by the employer will not be privileged unless common interest privilege exists. Whether it exists will depend on the circumstances; even if it does, it will not necessarily encompass all communications with counsel.

Interviews conducted during internal investigations by the employer will not be privileged from the employee's perspective; the privilege, if it exists, lies with the employer.[8]

See Chapter 35 on privilege

Use of employer email to conduct privileged conversations 13.4.2

With internal counsel 13.4.2.1

Employees should be wary of any communications with in-house counsel as such communications are unlikely to be protected by privilege.

See Chapter 35 on privilege

Unless the individual forms part of the client group identified within the employer[9] or unless litigation privilege applies, communications with the in-house counsel will not be protected by privilege.

With external counsel 13.4.2.2

Communications between an individual and an ILA will of course be protected by legal advice privilege. However, there are circumstances in which that privilege may be lost, particularly if it can be shown that the confidentiality in the communication has been lost as it is accessible by third parties.

On balance, it is inadvisable for an employee to use work email accounts to communicate with an ILA as it is likely (depending on the terms of any relevant IT policy maintained by the employer) to lead to a dispute that confidentiality in those communications has been lost.[10]

8 The case of R (on the Application of AL) v. SFO [2018] EWHC 856 (Admin) highlights the fact that the SFO is likely to be under increasing pressure to seek waiver of privilege over interview notes for disclosure in subsequent criminal prosecutions.

9 As required following Three Rivers District Council v. Bank of England [2003] EWCA Civ 474.

10 In Shepherd v. Fox Williams LLP and others [2014] EWHC 1224 (QB) it was held that the claimant remained entitled to assert privilege over documents even though they had been accessible to the defendant employer when they were sent to the work email address of an employee of the defendant.

14

Employee Rights: The US Perspective

Milton L Williams, Avni P Patel and Jacob Gardener[1]

14.1 Introduction

Unless required to by contract or subpoena, employees and former employees may decline to provide information or documents in connection with a corporate investigation. However, many employers will insist on employee co-operation and may impose disciplinary measures – up to and including termination – on those employees who refuse.[2] In the absence of contractual protections, employees may have no legal right to refuse to submit to an interview, even if their answers tend to incriminate them. A 2016 decision from the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in Gilman v. Marsh & McLennan Companies, Inc[3] is instructive. There, two employees argued that Marsh & McLennan's demand they submit to an interview in an internal investigation constituted state action that infringed their right against self-incrimination. The court rejected this argument, calling it 'the legal equivalent of the "Hail Mary pass" in football'.[4]

---

1 Milton L Williams is a partner, Avni P Patel is a senior associate and Jacob Gardener is an associate at Walden Macht & Haran LLP.

2 See Testimony of Henry W Asbill, National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, to the US Sentencing Commission, at 4 (15 November 2005) ('Increasingly, companies do not hesitate to fire individual employees who refuse to "cooperate".'); Sarah Helene Duggin, Internal Corporate Investigations: Legal Ethics, Professionalism, and the Employee Interview, 2003 Colum. Bus. L. Rev. 859, 907 (2003) ('[I]n most states, [an employee's] refusal to cooperate with an internal investigation "constitutes a breach of the employee's duty of loyalty to the corporation and is good grounds" [for dismissal.]').

3 826 F.3d 69 (2d Cir. 2016).

4 826 F.3d at 76 (internal quotation marks omitted). In exceptional circumstances, where the government exerts overwhelming influence over the internal investigation and the employer's decision-making, the employer's actions may be found to constitute state action. See, e.g., United States v. Stein, 541 F.3d 130, 136 (2d Cir. 2008) (holding that 'KPMG's adoption and

Although employees generally cannot refuse to participate in investigations without risking their employment, they do possess various rights implicated by corporate investigations. The sources of those rights include the employer and federal and state law. With respect to the employer, many companies have policies and procedures for internal investigations. For instance, employee handbooks, company by-laws, written guidelines and employment agreements often contain provisions regarding employee data and document collection, workplace searches, communication monitoring, privacy and confidentiality. These documents may also provide guidance on an employee's right to indemnification for legal fees expended during an investigation or related proceedings. In addition, many companies maintain written policies that protect employees from retaliation for participating in an investigation. These documents, and unwritten, established company procedures, should be considered to understand the protection afforded to employees in an investigation.

Federal and state law also govern the rights of employees involved in investigations. These rights, discussed below, can be divided into three general categories: (1) the right to be free from retaliation; (2) the right to representation; and (3) the right to privacy.

The right to be free from retaliation 14.2

Although employees generally have no right to refuse to participate in a corporate investigation, they may be protected from retaliation. A number of federal employment statutes prohibit retaliation against employees who participate in corporate investigations.[5] State and local laws provide similar protection.

Moreover, employees who possess information regarding corporate misconduct have some leverage in that they may become whistleblowers. Whistleblowers are protected from retaliation under federal[6] and state whistleblower laws.

See Chapter 20 on whistleblowers

The Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 (Sarbanes-Oxley) provides for both civil and criminal penalties for employers who retaliate against whistleblowers. Section 806 of the law governs civil penalties. It prohibits publicly traded companies from retaliating against employees who assist or provide information to law enforcement, Congress, or 'a person with supervisory authority over the employee' regarding activity the employee reasonably believes is a violation of: (1) federal law regarding mail, wire, securities, or bank fraud; (2) an SEC rule or regulation; or (3) any provision of federal law relating to fraud against shareholders.[7] enforcement of a policy under which it conditioned, capped and ultimately ceased advancing legal fees to defendants followed as a direct consequence of the government's overwhelming influence, and that KPMG's conduct therefore amounted to state action').

---

5 These statutes include Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Americans with Disabilities Act, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Family and Medical Leave Act, the National Labor Relations Act, and the Occupational Safety and Health Act.

6 The Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 (Sarbanes-Oxley), the Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act (Dodd-Frank), the Consumer Financial Protection Act of 2010.

7 See 18 U.S.C. § 1514A(a).

Section 1107 of Sarbanes-Oxley provides for criminal penalties for retaliation against whistleblowers. Specifically, it criminalises '[w]hoever knowingly, with the intent to retaliate, takes any action harmful to any person, including interference with the lawful employment or livelihood of any person, for providing to a law enforcement officer any truthful information relating to the commission or possible commission of any Federal offense'.[8]

Section 922 of the Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act (Dodd-Frank) provides anti-retaliation protection for whistleblowers who report possible securities law violations to the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC).[9] Similarly, Section 748 of Dodd-Frank protects whistleblowers who report violations of the Commodity Exchange Act to the Commodities Futures Trading Commission.[10] And Section 1057, which codifies the Consumer Financial Protection Act of 2010, forbids retaliation against employees who blow the whistle on possible violations of that statute.[11]

Despite their similarities, there are important differences between the whistleblower protections contained in Sarbanes-Oxley and Dodd-Frank. Procedurally, in contrast to Sarbanes-Oxley's requirement that complaints be filed with the Department of Labor within 90 days of the retaliatory action, Dodd-Frank permits an employee to bring a private cause of action directly, without having to go through an administrative agency,[12] and allows the employee to do so within six to ten years, depending on the circumstances.[13] In addition, Dodd-Frank provides more attractive financial incentives for whistleblowers. A whistleblowing employee who prevails under Dodd-Frank may receive up to twice the amount of wages lost due to retaliation, as well as attorneys' fees.[14]

Under Sarbanes-Oxley, by contrast, a whistleblower's recovery is limited to the 'relief necessary to make the employee whole', including reinstatement, back pay, 'special damages' (which includes damages for non-economic harm such as reputational injury, mental anguish and suffering), attorneys' fees and costs.[15]

Critically, however, whereas Sarbanes-Oxley protects employees who report concerns to supervisors at their company, Dodd-Frank does not. Dodd-Frank defines 'whistleblower' to mean a person who provides 'information relating to a violation of the securities laws to the Commission'.[16]

---

8 See 18 U.S.C. § 1513(e).

9 See 15 U.S.C. § 77a.

10 See 7 U.S.C. § 26.

11 See 12 U.S.C. § 5567.

12 See 15 U.S.C. § 78u-6(h)(1)(B)(i).

13 See 15 U.S.C. § 78u-6(h)(1)(B)(iii)(I)-(II).

14 See 15 U.S.C. § 78u-6(h)(1)(C).

15 See 18 U.S.C. § 1514A(c).

16 See 15 U.S.C. § 78u–6(a)(6). The Supreme Court has held that this provision requires whistleblowers to report to the SEC. See Digital Realty Tr., Inc. v. Somers, 138 S. Ct. 767, 776, 778 (2018). Dodd-Frank's requirement that whistleblowers report information to the SEC for the anti-retaliation provisions to apply may soon be eliminated. On 9 July 2019, the US House of Representatives passed HR 2515, also known as the Whistleblower Protection Reform Act of 2019.

The right to representation 14.3

Employees have no automatic right to counsel during an internal investigation,[17] unless contractually provided under the terms of their employment.[18] Nonetheless, employees may choose to retain counsel, particularly if they face liability.

Concerns over individual criminal liability have increased since September 2015, when then-Deputy Attorney General Sally Yates issued a memorandum titled 'Individual Accountability for Corporate Wrongdoing'. The 'Yates Memo' stresses the importance of combating corporate misconduct by holding individuals accountable. It lists six steps that should be part of all investigations and prosecutions of corporate misconduct, the first of which is that a corporation's eligibility for co-operation credit depends on it providing the Department of Justice (DOJ) with all relevant facts about the individuals involved in the alleged misconduct. The Yates Memo also states that all investigations must focus on individuals from the inception of the investigation, and that barring extraordinary circumstances, which must be personally approved in writing by specified DOJ personnel, DOJ attorneys will not agree to any settlement or corporate resolution that dismisses charges or provides immunity for individual officers or employees.[19]

The bipartisan bill would amend Dodd-Frank to clarify that whistleblowers who report misconduct to their employers and not to the SEC also have protections against retaliation under the law.

17 The Sixth Amendment right to counsel is triggered by a custodial interrogation by law enforcement authorities. See Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 479 (1966). An internal investigation by a private company does not generally implicate this right.

18 Union employees, however, may insist that a union representative attend any investigatory interview that could lead to the employee's discipline. See N.L.R.B. v. J. Weingarten, Inc., 420 U.S. 251, 256 (1975). The union representative may not interfere with the interview. New Jersey Bell Tel. Co. & Local 827, Int'l Bhd. of Elec. Workers, Afl-Cio, 308 NLRB 277, 279, 280 (1992). Employers have no obligation to inform employees of their right to union representation or to ask if they would like a union representative present during the interview.

19 The US Department of Justice under President Trump has reaffirmed the importance of prosecuting individual wrongdoers in corporate investigations. However, in a speech given in November 2018, Deputy Attorney General Rod J Rosenstein announced an updated policy to 'make clear that investigations should not be delayed merely to collect information about individuals whose involvement was not substantial, and who are not likely to be prosecuted.' Department of Justice News, 'Deputy Attorney General Rod J. Rosenstein Delivers Remarks at the American Conference Institute's 35th International Conference on the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act' (29 November 2018), https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/deputy-attorney-general-rod-j-rosenstein-delivers-remarks-american-conference-institute-0. In addition, on 20 November 2019, the DOJ announced changes to its Foreign Corrupt Practices Act Corporate Enforcement Policy, which now requires, among other things, companies seeking co-operation credit to disclose 'all relevant facts known to [them] at the time of disclosure . . . as to any individuals substantially involved in or responsible for the misconduct at issue' (the previous version required companies to disclose 'all relevant facts' regarding individuals substantially involved in a 'violation of law') and to alert the DOJ of evidence of the misconduct when they become aware of it (previously, companies had to disclose evidence they were or should have been aware of). See Justice Manual, 9-47.000, https://www.justice.gov/jm/jm-9-47000-foreign-corrupt-practices-act-1977.

14.3.1 Interviews without employee's counsel

An employer may seek to conduct an interview of an employee, either with or without company counsel present, before that employee has appointed counsel.[20] Once the employee offers an account of events, it may be difficult to offer a different one later. When counsel for individuals are appointed, they should obtain all information regarding their clients' prior statements about the subject of the investigation, including requesting any relevant memoranda created in prior interviews. Individual counsel should also request all documents, data and other information pertaining to their clients' involvement in the subject of the investigation. Requests for such information may be directed to the client, company counsel, law enforcement and other witnesses (or their counsel). Even if counsel is not allowed to participate in a client's investigatory interview, they should use the acquired information to prepare their clients.[21]

During an interview with no employee counsel, the employee may ask whether he or she should obtain individual counsel. This can place the interviewer in an uncomfortable position. An affirmative answer could have undesirable consequences, including delaying the investigation, chilling the employee's candour, and risking that individual counsel may approach law enforcement before the employer concludes the internal investigation. A negative answer creates complications and potential claims against the employer and investigating counsel if the employee self-incriminates or compromises future legal positions during the interview. Generally, the prudent course is to politely decline to answer the question.

Employers often wish to disclose to the government information obtained from employees during investigatory interviews to obtain co-operation credit or general goodwill. However, in the absence of instructions to the contrary, interviewed employees may believe that their company's attorneys represent them, and may attempt to assert attorney–client privilege over their communications with company counsel. To avoid this problem, counsel should provide an Upjohn warning at the start of any interview, and delivery of the warning should be documented by a note-taker.

See Chapter 8 on witness interviews and Chapter 16 on representing individuals in interviews

14.3.2 Separate representation arranged by the employer

Whether the employer agrees to arrange for counsel can depend on a number of factors, such as the employee's contractual and indemnification rights, the

20 If individual counsel is retained, company counsel must be cognisant of Model Rule of Professional Conduct 4.2, which states: 'In representing a client, a lawyer shall not communicate about the subject of the representation with a person the lawyer knows to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has the consent of the other lawyer or is authorized to do so by law or a court order.'

21 If counsel concludes, after reviewing the available information and conferring with the client, that the evidence establishes the client's guilt, counsel may wish to advise the client to decline an interview to avoid making potentially incriminating statements. Although that may prompt the client's termination, counsel may reasonably determine that termination is inevitable regardless of the client's participation in the interview.

corporate by-laws, and the potential conflict of interest between the employee and the corporation. Although separate representation of an employee can increase expenses and lengthen the investigation, it can also provide certain advantages to the company. It can reduce any suggestion of improper influence by the company over the employee, which can bolster the company's credibility with the government when reporting the results of the investigation and increase the company's co-operation credit. In some circumstances (particularly when individual counsel has a good working relationship with company counsel), it can facilitate communication with the employee. Company and individual counsel should come from different law firms. Further, arranging for individual representation can deter the government from communicating directly with the employee.

When confronted with multiple employees who warrant separate counsel, employers may seek to reduce costs by arranging for 'pool counsel' to represent the entire group. However, this pool arrangement must be reassessed if a conflict of interest arises within the group.

The right to privacy 14.4

Workplace searches 14.4.1

In most circumstances, an employer can conduct searches of its workplace and computer system to investigate wrongdoing. Such searches are largely unprotected by personal privacy laws as workspaces, computer systems and company-issued electronic devices are generally considered to be company property. Many companies explicitly address this in written corporate policies and employment agreements. However, unwarranted or unreasonable invasions of privacy during a workplace search may be protected under state law – including state constitutional,[22] statutory[23] and common law.[24]

Employees who use their own personal electronic devices for work should be aware that work-related data stored on those devices belongs to the employer. Therefore, employees are advised to refrain from using their personal devices for work, and instead maintain separate work devices. If an employer seeks to obtain or review work-related data from an employee's personal device, the employer must be careful to exclude any personal data.

22 See, e.g., Cal. Const. art. I, § 1 (protecting right to privacy).

23 See, e.g., Cal. Lab. Code § 980 (2012) (prohibiting an employer from requiring or requesting an employee to: (1) '[d]isclose a username or password for the purpose of accessing personal social media', (2) '[a]ccess personal social media in the presence of the employer', or (3) '[d]ivulge any personal social media, except' in response to a request 'to divulge personal social media reasonably believed to be relevant to an investigation of allegations of employee misconduct or employee violation of applicable laws and regulations, provided that the social media is used solely for purposes of that investigation or a related proceeding'; prohibiting an employer from taking adverse action against an employee or applicant for not complying with a prohibited request or demand for access to social media).

24 See, e.g., claims for invasion of privacy, intentional infliction of emotional distress and negligent infliction of emotional distress.

14.4.2 Workplace surveillance

An employer seeking to investigate wrongdoing through electronic surveillance must be mindful of federal and state law.

Title III of the federal Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968[25] criminalises the intentional interception of any wire, oral or electronic communication unless at least one of the parties to the communication has consented to such interception or the employer is monitoring or recording employee telephone calls 'in the ordinary course of its business'.[26]

Most states (and the District of Columbia) similarly prohibit electronic surveillance of communications unless at least one party to the communication provides consent. Some, but not all, of these jurisdictions provide exemptions for employer monitoring of employee communications. Eleven states – California, Connecticut, Florida, Illinois, Maryland, Massachusetts, Montana, Nevada, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania and Washington – prohibit (either criminally or civilly) surveillance without the consent of all the parties to the communication.[27]

Notably, with respect to email, because employees generally do not possess an expectation of privacy in their work accounts, employers may access personal emails exchanged over these accounts. Employees should be aware that some employers may choose to install surveillance monitoring systems into work accounts, databases and company-provided devices. As technology and communications systems advance, employees should also be conscious of their activities on communications platforms. Some messenger services used by companies, such as Slack, have recently announced new privacy policies that allow employers to download all data from their workspace, including all employee data and messages.

14.4.3 Polygraph testing

An employer's use of polygraph testing in aid of an investigation is limited by the Employee Polygraph Protection Act of 1988.[28] An employer seeking to use a polygraph must: (1) be conducting 'an ongoing investigation involving economic loss or injury to the employer's business, such as theft, embezzlement, misappropriation, or an act of unlawful industrial espionage or sabotage'; (2) possess 'a reasonable suspicion that the employee was involved in the incident or activity under investigation'; (3) show that 'the employee had access to the property that is the subject of the investigation'; and (4) follow a number of statutorily mandated procedural guidelines.[29] If the employer satisfies these requirements, it can terminate

25 See 18 U.S.C. § 2510 et seq.

26 See 18 U.S.C. § 2510(5)(a).

27 See Cal. Penal Code § 632 (a)-(d); Conn. Gen. Stat. Ann. § 52-570d; Fla. Stat. Ann. §§ 934.01 to .03; 720 Ill. Comp. Stat. ANN. § 5/14-1, -2; Md. Code Ann. Cts. & Jud. Proc. § 10-402; Mass. Gen. Laws Ch. 272, § 99; Mont. Code Ann. § 45-8-213; Nev. Rev. Stat. § 200.620; N.H. Rev Stat. Ann. §§ 570-A:2; 18 Pa. Cons. Stat. §§ 5702, 5704; Wash. Rev. Code §§ 9.73.030 to 9.73.230.

28 See 29 U.S.C. §§ 2001-2009.

29 See 29 U.S.C. § 2006(d).

an employee who refuses to take the polygraph test, or takes it and fails, provided there is 'additional supporting evidence' justifying the termination.[30]

The Secretary of Labor may bring court action to restrain employers who violate the statute and may assess monetary penalties. In addition, an employer who violates the law may be liable to the employee or prospective employee for appropriate legal and equitable relief, which may include employment, reinstatement, promotion, and payment of lost wages and benefits.

State law may provide additional restrictions on the use of polygraph tests and other tests purporting to determine truth or falsity.[31]

Indemnification 14.5

Among the significant issues that may arise from in-house counsel, and often external counsel, representing the company and not the individual is whether the employee has a right to be indemnified. The right to be indemnified may extend to legal fees, advancement of legal fees and for any potential judgment debt or settlement. As discussed above, an employee has a right to have his or her own counsel, even if the company pushes for joint representation by company counsel, but the complicated question of whether the company must indemnify the employee for costs around separate representation may arise. Determining a company's indemnification obligations requires close review of any agreements and understandings that might give rise to indemnification or advancement of fees. It is critical that an employee communicate closely with company counsel to come to a mutual understanding of the company's obligations.

Determining whether an individual is indemnified 14.5.1

Employees should ask their counsel to assertively engage in communications with the employer and company counsel to determine whether the company will agree to indemnify the individual employee and to advance fees. This conversation should also specifically discuss the exact scope of any indemnification. If the company agrees to, or must, indemnify from any agreement or source of this right, employee's counsel should draft and execute a written agreement binding the company. Although the company may seek to impose unfavourable terms, it is generally advisable to reduce the indemnification obligation to writing.

Employees and their counsel should carefully review potential sources of the right to indemnification. These sources may include company by-laws, local law in the state of incorporation, company policies and insurance policies of the employer.

30 See 29 U.S.C. § 2007.

31 See, e.g., N.Y. Lab. Law §§ 733, 735 (prohibiting employer from using 'psychological stress evaluator examination' to determine truth or falsity); Cal. Lab. Code § 432.2 (prohibiting employers from 'demand[ing] or requir[ing] any applicant for employment or prospective employment or any employee to submit to or take a polygraph, lie detector or similar test or examination as a condition of employment or continued employment').

14.5.2 Potential sources of right to indemnification

14.5.2.1 Corporate by-laws

Corporate by-laws often delineate the company's obligation to indemnify an employee's costs arising out of representation for internal investigations or any matters related to his or her official duties. Employee counsel must carefully review corporate by-laws because, even if indemnification obligations are provided, they are often listed with limitations or releases from obligation. For example, many companies include release provisions releasing the company from its obligations or entitling it to repayment of any indemnified cost if the costs subsequently transpire not to be indemnifiable. If these provisions exist, it is likely that the company will require the employee to sign an undertaking letter, in which the employee agrees to repay any amounts advanced if it is later determined that the employee was not entitled to indemnification. Similarly, there is a difference between the duty of an employer to indemnify an employee of costs incurred and any duty to advance defence costs. Some corporate by-laws regarding indemnification may require advancement of attorneys' fees. However, the by-laws should be reviewed carefully, because absent such language, the employee has no right to advancement of attorneys' fees.[32]

Many corporate by-laws also include specific language of which employee categories have a right to indemnification. For example, it is common for company by-laws to indicate that the company must indemnify an officer or director who is successful on the merits or otherwise in the defence of a qualifying claim, but remain silent on the issue of whether other private employees have a right to indemnification. These other employees, or their attorney, should ask for indemnification whenever a claim or investigation arises.

14.5.2.2 Local law in state of incorporation

Employees and their counsel should also review state and local laws in the state of incorporation. Review of state and local laws is often overlooked because employees assume indemnification provisions are exclusively contained in corporate by-laws and any employment or subsequent agreements with the company. However, a number of states impose indemnification obligations on companies in local and state laws for private employees, especially for directors and officers.

Under Delaware corporate law, directors generally have a right to indemnification if they are, or face being, parties to a proceeding or subject to investigation, unless they did not act in good faith and in a manner reasonably believed to be in, or not opposed to, the best interests of the corporation.[33] Directors and officers who succeed in their defence are indemnified. On the other end of the permissive spectrum, if a director or officer acts in 'bad faith', they are not entitled to indemnification. Delaware courts have stated that the 'boundaries for indemnification'

32 In practice, more often than not, by-laws will entitle employees to have their attorneys' fees advanced.

33 See 8 Del. C. § 145(c).

are 'success' and 'bad faith'.[34] To determine where on the permissive spectrum their situation lies, directors and officers should turn to any governing documents for additional language. Delaware law also allows directors and officers the right to indemnification through advanced costs for pending litigation.[35]

Both Oregon and Washington law also provide for mandatory indemnification of a director who successfully defends, on the merits or otherwise, any proceeding in which the director was made a party due to his or her position as a director with the company, unless the articles of incorporation provide otherwise.[36]

California is an example of a state that extends indemnification protections to any private employee, not only directors or officers. The California Labor Code provides that an employee has a right to reimbursement. The obligation is found in California Labor Code Section 2082, which states:

> Any employer shall indemnify his or her employee for all necessary expenditures or losses incurred by the employee in direct consequence of the discharge of his or her duties, or of his or her obedience to the directions of the employer, even though unlawful, unless the employee, at the time of obeying the directions, believed them to be unlawful.[37]

The California Supreme Court explained the statute's application to indemnification as a public policy obligation. In Edwards v. Arthur Andersen LLP,[38] the Court stated:

> California has a strong public policy that favors the indemnification (and defence) of employees by their employers for claims and liabilities resulting from the employees' acts within the course and scope of their employment. Labor Code section 2082 codifies this policy and entitles employees to indemnification from their employer.

Company policies 14.5.2.3

Employees should also look at company policies and employment contracts or subsequent agreements as sources of indemnification rights. In addition to indemnification required by corporate law, individual employees may have contractual indemnification rights in their employment agreements. Even if the company by-laws do not indicate a right to indemnification, a company must honour any obligations in individual employment agreements. For example, as good business practice and to promote co-operation with an investigation, some companies may decide to expand the scope of indemnity to include employees who might not be covered by the by-laws or state and local laws that are likely to be witnesses

34 Hermelin v. K-V Pharm. Co., 54 A.3d 1093, 1094 (Del. Ch. 2012).

35 See 8 Del. C. § 145(e).

36 See ORS 60.394 and RCW 23B.08.520.

37 See Cal. Labor Code § 2802(a).

38 44 Cal. 4th 937, 952 (2008).

or subjects. As a strategic point, employers may expand the scope of indemnity to ensure co-operation of employees, which may show the company in a more favourable light to any regulator or investigative body.

14.5.2.4 Insurance policies of employer

Some employers may choose to purchase directors' and officers' (D&O) insurance to supplement or provide an alternative to indemnification. Some indemnification agreements require companies to purchase insurance. If the employer has D&O insurance, the nature of the allegation and the terms of the specific policy may trigger payment of defence costs.

D&O insurance is increasingly important in corporate culture owing to the increase in shareholder, class action, derivative action and other prosecutorial and regulatory investigations targeting not only companies, but also their directors and officers. If any employee is also a director or officer of the company, it is important to understand that D&O insurance policies are not standard and can vary in terms of protection. It is crucial for employees and their counsel to review terms, conditions, provisions and exclusions.[39]

14.5.3 Advocating for indemnification

Despite numerous possible sources giving rise to the right to indemnification, companies are not always eager to indemnify employees for representation or costs incurred during an investigation or defence. However, employees should advocate for the company to indemnify them for incurred costs or advancement of fees. The benefits to both the employer and employee should be emphasised, as indemnification can protect both parties' interests. When entering an employment or separation agreement, an employee should request and push for a specifically defined indemnification provision.

The employer or company may become more credible and promote efficiency and effectiveness of an internal investigation by ensuring that employees are adequately represented. If company counsel recognises a conflict of interest and the need for the employee to have separate representation, the corporation benefits if the employee is co-operative. Therefore, the company may assess the employee's involvement and whether failure to pay individual counsel fees or to advance attorneys' fees will make the employee's co-operation less likely. While in some instances employees may be required to co-operate by subpoena, it is in the best interest of the corporation to work jointly with the employee to prepare its own defence and receive information in advance through a joint defence agreement.

In addition, regulators and prosecutors cannot take into account during an investigation whether a corporation is advancing or reimbursing attorneys' fees or providing counsel. Along the same lines, a prosecutor or regulatory body cannot request that a company refrain from taking such action. In 2008, the 39 See generally Matthew L Jacobs, Julie S Greenber, Basic Principles of D&O Coverage and Recent Developments, 741 PLI/Lit 29, *35 (2006).

Department of Justice published the 'Filip Memo',[40] which laid out the principles of federal prosecution of business organisations. The guidelines, codified in the US Attorney's Manual (now called the Justice Manual), state that: 'In evaluating cooperation, however, prosecutors should not take into account whether a corporation is advancing or reimbursing attorneys' fees or providing counsel to employees, officers, or directors under investigation or indictment.'[41]

Situations where indemnification may cease 14.6

Employees should be aware of the circumstances in which a company's obligations to indemnify may cease. As mentioned above in Section 14.5, a company's obligations to indemnify an employee may be contingent on, and circumvented by, any undertaking agreement between the parties. An undertaking agreement requires an employee to repay any advanced or covered costs in the event the costs were ultimately not deemed indemnifiable. A company is generally released from its indemnification obligations for any violation of an undertaking agreement (substantive or procedural) and fraud or bad faith.

Failure to co-operate with investigation

See Chapter 10 on co-operating with authorities

In some instances, an employee's failure to co-operate with a company's investigation could absolve the company's obligation to cover individual costs. This can create a difficult decision for an individual employee regarding whether to co-operate where failure to do so will affect indemnification. Even if an employee does not want to co-operate with company counsel – internal or external – and submit to an interview or otherwise co-operate, he or she may still be called to produce testimony or information pursuant to a subpoena. Failure to initially co-operate may preclude an employee from securing indemnification for assumed costs. However, it is still often in the best interest of an employer to offer to indemnify employees who may initially seem unco-operative, because in the event they are called to testify, it is probably safer for the company if they are represented.

Privilege concerns for employees 14.7

Privilege considerations become central during investigations. Because of the various permutations of attorney–client relationships with both internal and external counsel, it is important for employees to remember that they only enjoy protections over communications with individual counsel. If an employer requests an interview with an employee, employee counsel and company counsel, the communications and testimony at the interview are not privileged.

40 Memorandum from Deputy Attorney General Mark Filip to Heads of Department Components and United States Attorneys, Principles of Federal Prosecution of Business Organizations 8 August 2008), available at https://www.justice.gov/sites/default/files/dag/legacy/2008/11/03/dag-memo-08282008.pdf.

41 USAM 9-28-730 Obstructing the Investigation.

An employee and his or her counsel should note whether the company counsel issued a proper Upjohn warning and whether it was documented. If an inadequate Upjohn warning was given, an employee's individual counsel may attempt to prevent or limit disclosure of any statements made by the employee in an interview where individual counsel was not present.

The Third Circuit established the Bevill standard to determine whether a company employee holds a joint privilege with the employer company over communications with corporate counsel, which has since been adopted by the First, Second, Ninth and Tenth Circuits. The Bevill standard holds that 'any privilege that exists as to a corporate officer's role and functions within a corporation belongs to the corporation, not the officer'.[42] The Court in Bevill extended the privilege to officers and employees in an individual, personal capacity only when the employee satisfies the following five-factor test. First, they must show that they approached counsel for the purpose of seeking legal advice. Second, they must show that when they approached counsel, they made it clear that they were seeking legal advice in their individual capacity rather than in their representative capacities. Third, they must demonstrate that the counsel saw fit to communicate with them in their individual capacities, knowing that a possible conflict could arise. Fourth, they must prove that their conversations with counsel were confidential. And fifth, they must show that the substance of their conversations with counsel did not concern matters within the company or the general affairs of the company.[43] Notwithstanding the foregoing, an employee would be ill-advised to confide in, or speak candidly with, company counsel given the subjective nature of the standard. Whenever possible, an employee should make efforts to secure personal individual counsel.

See Chapter 8 on witness interviews and Chapter 16 on representing individuals in interviews

Finally, as a practical matter, employees should be aware that communications with other employees or colleagues regarding the investigation are not privileged regardless of whether the colleague is also involved in the investigation or represented by the same counsel. Even if an employee believes he or she is sharing attorney communications with other employees who need to know the attorney's advice and who also have an attorney–client privilege with the same counsel because he or she is involved or implicated in the investigation and also represented by company counsel, it is always prudent to refrain from sharing privileged information. If an attorney's communication is shared beyond those who need to know, the attorney–client privilege, may be destroyed. In addition, employees should attempt to communicate with individual counsel on personal and non-company devices to ensure that the privilege is protected.

See Chapter 35 on privilege

42 In re Bevill, Bresler & Schulman Asset Mgmt. Corp. 805 F.2d 120 (3d Cir. 1986).

43 US v. Graf, at 8 (citing Bevill, 805 F.2d 120 (3d Cir. 1986)).

15

Representing Individuals in Interviews: The UK Perspective

Jessica Parker and Andrew Smith[1]

Introduction 15.1

This chapter considers the representation of individuals in three types of interviews: interviews in corporate internal investigations, interviews of witnesses in law enforcement investigations, and interviews of suspects in law enforcement investigations.[2]

Interviews in corporate internal investigations 15.2

When should employees have their own lawyer? 15.2.1

In many corporate internal investigations, it is common for employees not to receive or be offered legal advice, either before or during their interviews. This is because the employee is not normally treated as a suspect in what is commonly referred to as a 'fact-finding investigation'. Their position is analogous to but distinct from an employee interviewed in disciplinary proceedings, in which an employee suspected of misconduct has no right to legal representation at the interview, but is usually entitled to be accompanied by a fellow employee or trade union representative.

However, in some corporate internal investigations, the corporate may recommend a lawyer (often called an independent legal adviser or ILA) who can represent

1 Jessica Parker and Andrew Smith are partners at Corker Binning.

2 By 'law enforcement investigations' we mean investigations by UK public bodies such as the National Crime Agency and regional police forces exercising a statutory function of investigating criminal offences. Some of these bodies also act as prosecutors, for example the Serious Fraud Office and the Financial Conduct Authority. In other cases, the Crown Prosecution Service will be responsible for prosecuting. There are other types of interviews in law enforcement investigations which fall outside the scope of this chapter, for example interviews of co-operating witnesses under the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005.

the employee. Alternatively, the employee may prefer to benefit from legal advice, regardless of whether a lawyer has been recommended by the corporate.

Legal representation for an employee may be desirable in two main situations. First, if the employee risks self-incrimination or admitting regulatory breaches, there may be a conflict of interest between the employee and the corporate. In particular, conducting the interview without first offering the employee legal representation may place the corporate's lawyers in breach of their professional ethical duty not to take 'unfair advantage' of a third party.[3]

Secondly, legal representation for an employee may be desirable where the employee's acts and omissions determine the criminal or regulatory liability of the corporate, for example where the employee is the 'controlling mind' of the corporate or an 'associated person' for the purposes of the Bribery Act 2010.[4] In these circumstances, the corporate may consider that legal advice will enable the employee to render a more reliable account in an interview – an outcome that furthers the corporate's interests in helping it more accurately to assess its own exposure to criminal or regulatory liability.

15.2.2 The role of the employee's lawyer prior to the interview

While the lawyer will always owe professional obligations to the client (i.e., the employee), the corporate may require the employee to agree to the lawyer acting on restricted terms. Such terms may define the scope of the lawyer's work and outline circumstances in which the lawyer's fees will not be paid or can be clawed back from the employee (e.g., if the employee becomes a whistleblower or is charged with a criminal offence). There may be other terms dictated by the corporate's insurers. However, nothing in such terms can derogate from the lawyer's professional ethical duty to act in the employee's best interests.[5]

It is not uncommon for a single lawyer (or law firm) to be asked to act for a number of employees all of whom will be interviewed in the internal investigation. Whether this is permissible is purely a question of professional ethics.[6]

While the employee's lawyer must be independent from those conducting the investigation, it is nearly always beneficial for the employee's lawyer to form a constructive relationship with the corporate's lawyers. This relationship should enable the employee's lawyer to understand the allegations being investigated, the employee's perceived role in relation to the allegations, and whether the corporate has reported the allegations to a law enforcement body. The lawyer should seek comprehensive disclosure prior to the interview of all documents the employee

3 Outcome 11.1 of the SRA Solicitors Code of Conduct. However, whether this outcome is likely to be breached in a corporate internal investigation has not been explored in any case law, and will depend on precisely how the interview is conducted.

4 Tesco Supermarkets Ltd v. Nattrass [1972] AC 153; sections 7 and 8 Bribery Act 2010.

5 Fundamental Principle 4, SRA Code of Conduct.

6 See Chapter 3, SRA Code of Conduct: the solicitor proposing to act for two or more witnesses must be satisfied there is no conflict between them, or no substantial risk of a conflict arising in future, unless specified appropriate safeguards are observed.

will be asked about and ensure that the employee has sufficient preparation time for the interview.

Clearly the employee's lawyer needs competence in the areas of law relevant to the allegations being investigated (e.g., bribery or the Financial Conduct Authority's (FCA) Senior Managers Regime). This competence will enable the lawyer to pre-empt the questions that are likely to be asked in the interview, to take meaningful instructions from the employee, to structure those instructions in a logical fashion, and to assess how well the employee would perform in the interview. This may require separate advice on employment law as well as advice from other jurisdictions if the allegations are international in nature or the corporate has self-reported to overseas law enforcement bodies.

The work performed by the employee's lawyer should lead to two fundamental tactical decisions. First, is it in the employee's best interests to attend the interview? Second, if the employee attends the interview, how should the questions be answered to advance his or her best interests?

Advising the employee whether to attend the interview 15.2.3

In most investigations, employees are told that they have a duty to co-operate with the investigation under their employment contract. Failing to attend the interview will ordinarily lead to the employee being suspended or dismissed. However, this outcome should never be the sole or even the primary factor to consider when advising an employee. Of equal or greater importance is the impact of the interview on any existing or future legal proceedings involving the employee.

The employee's duty to co-operate with the investigation is not akin to a statutory compulsion.[7] Equally, however, employees cannot sensibly attend the interview and then elect not to answer certain questions on the basis that they will incriminate themselves. Electing to answer some questions but not others is overwhelmingly likely to lead to the same result as refusing to attend the interview, namely suspension or summary dismissal.

If by co-operating and answering all questions the employee self-incriminates or admits to regulatory breaches, the interview is unlikely to serve his or her best interests. Not only is the employee likely to be dismissed or suspended given the nature of the admissions (the same outcome that would have occurred had he or she refused to attend the interview), but the corporate will obtain a damaging interview record which could be handed over, and used, in a law enforcement investigation. While the recent Court of Appeal judgment in Director of the SFO v. ENRC[8] clarifies the circumstances in which an interview record may be protected by litigation privilege, the corporate may choose to waive privilege as a hallmark of its co-operation. The interviewee must therefore be advised that he or she should only proceed with the interview if prepared to accept the real risk that a law enforcement body will ultimately review an audio recording or transcript of it, and potentially make important decisions about his or her status in any future criminal or regulatory investigation based on the answers given in the interview.

7 It is merely a breach of a private employment contract and carries no statutory penalty.

8 [2018] EWHC 2006.

Whether the record of an interview in an internal investigation constitutes admissible evidence against the employee in legal proceedings has not been explored in any case law. However, there are analogous cases which suggest that, as long as warnings akin to Upjohn warnings are delivered at the commencement of the interview, the interview record would probably be admissible in criminal proceedings.[9]

Given that the interview record could be admissible against the employee, the employee's lawyer needs to balance the risk of dismissal or suspension against the risk of increasing the employee's exposure to personal liability in criminal and regulatory proceedings. If the employee is able to deliver a credible account without self-incrimination or admitting regulatory breaches, it will ordinarily serve his or her interests to attend the interview. Equally, there are circumstances in which employees will be advised to attend the interview even though they will admit criminal or regulatory offences, for example, the employee was junior, the offending is relatively trivial, and the employee wishes to be able to say, in any subsequent legal proceedings, that he or she gave the employer an explanation consistent with what he or she now asserts to the law enforcement body. However, if the employee is likely to admit serious offences in the interview, then attending the interview simply to advance mitigation is unlikely to be advisable.

See Chapter 13 on employee rights

15.2.4 The role of the lawyer in the interview

An employee attending the interview will typically be advised that, to advance his or her best interests, answers should be concise, contain no speculation and provide no extraneous detail beyond that required by the particular question. Ideally, this process occurs organically and the lawyer does not need to intervene during the interview. Nonetheless, the lawyer's presence is important, and interventions may become necessary, so as to ensure that:

- the employee is asked questions that are clear and fair;
- the employee is given an adequate opportunity to answer the questions without interruption, intimidation or improper pressure;
- the interviewers do not misconstrue any answers given by the employee;
- the employee does not inadvertently waive privilege over advice;
- the employee can take advice on an ongoing basis about issues that arise during the interview or previously undisclosed documents which he or she is asked to comment on;
- an accurate record is kept of the questions and answers; and
- the employee raises all material facts, defences and mitigation identified during the preparatory work conducted with the lawyer.

See Chapter 7 on witness interviews

9 R v. Twaites and Brown (1991) 92 Cr App R 106 CA; R v. Smith [1994] 1 WLR 1396; R v. Welcher [2007] Crim LR 804 CA.

Interviews of witnesses in law enforcement investigations 15.3

Law enforcement investigations are conducted under distinct statutory regimes, depending on the nature of the conduct under investigation and the agency conducting it.[10] However, in general terms, there are two types of witness interviews: interviews conducted voluntarily and interviews conducted compulsorily.

Voluntary interviews 15.3.1

The majority of interviews are conducted without the witness being subject to legal compulsion. In other words, the witness is interviewed as a volunteer. While being interviewed voluntarily may seem attractive in that it suggests a co-operative attitude toward law enforcement, the record of the voluntary interview (including any admissions made by the witness) could be used in evidence against the witness in subsequent legal proceedings. In criminal proceedings, this risk increases if the witness has received legal advice prior to the interview, because it becomes less likely that a court would use its discretionary power to exclude the interview.[11]

If there is a risk, however remote, that the witness will self-incriminate in the interview, it is unlikely to be in the witness's interests to attend voluntarily. In these circumstances, being compelled to attend the interview is likely to be advantageous.

Compulsory interviews 15.3.2

Where a witness owes a duty of confidentiality to another party concerning the subject of the investigation, or is concerned about the potential use of the interview record against him or her in subsequent proceedings, the witness will ordinarily refuse to attend the interview voluntarily. In some circumstances, the witness can be compelled to attend and answer questions under statutory powers available to all major investigators, including HM Revenue and Customs, the FCA, the Serious Fraud Office (SFO) and the police.[12] Where this compulsory power is used, the witness is protected from civil suit for breach of confidence. Moreover, the answers given cannot be used in evidence in criminal proceedings against the witness – an important protection that is not available in a voluntary interview.

There are two exceptions to this latter protection: first, where criminal proceedings are brought in respect of false or misleading statements made during the course of the interview; second, where the witness, who later becomes a defendant, advances a different version of events in subsequent proceedings.

The role of the lawyer and the reasons for intervening in compulsory interviews are similar to those in the interview of an employee in a corporate internal investigation.

See Section 15.2.4

10 For example, under section 1 of the Criminal Justice Act 1987 the SFO has a mandate to investigate serious or complex fraud; the FCA's statutory objectives are set out in the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000.

11 Section 78 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

12 See, for example, section 2 Criminal Justice Act 1987; section 62 Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005; section 165 Financial Services and Markets Act 2000.

15.3.3 Right to legal representation in a compulsory interview

There is no absolute right to a lawyer in a compelled interview, although usually a lawyer will be allowed to attend. In the context of compelled interviews with the SFO under section 2 of the Criminal Justice Act 1987, this principle was confirmed in R v. Lord and others.[13] In this case the SFO challenged a witness's choice of lawyer on the basis that it was the same lawyer that represented a corporate suspect in the same investigation. The SFO refused to permit the lawyer's attendance at an interview and the witness sought relief by way of judicial review of the SFO's decision. Permission for the judicial review was not granted and the Administrative Court upheld the SFO's decision to exclude the lawyer.

The SFO's response to this case was to withdraw its existing guidance on section 2 interviews and issue further guidance in June 2016.[14] This guidance creates inroads into the right to legal representation that go far beyond the factual scenario examined in Lord. Under the guidance, witnesses are reminded that they may consult a lawyer before and after an interview, but a request for representation by a lawyer during an interview will only be granted if, inter alia, the following conditions are met:

- a written request is provided in a prescribed period prior to the interview;
- the reasons that a lawyer is requested are set out;
- the lawyer agrees to undertake to a list of restrictions generally aimed at ensuring that information imparted or documents provided by the SFO remain confidential;
- the lawyer undertakes not to act for a suspect in the investigation; and
- the lawyer agrees to provide 'legal advice and essential assistance and otherwise not interrupt the free flow of truthful information which the interviewee, by law, is required to give'.

Despite these attempts to restrict a lawyer's role during the interview, it is important for a lawyer always to act in the best interests of the witness and in accordance with his or her professional obligations. The guidance was amended in February 2019 to allow an additional legal representative to attend the interview for the sole purpose of taking notes. (The original guidance had only permitted one lawyer to attend in most cases.)

The Law Society has issued a practice note that is essential reading for those advising the recipient of a section 2 notice.[15]

Any undertaking requested should be carefully considered. The Law Society practice note advises as follows: 'You should consider whether it is appropriate and necessary to agree the undertakings sought by the SFO on a case-by-case basis.

13 R v. Lord and others [2015] EWHC 865 (Admin).

14 https://www.sfo.gov.uk/publications/guidance-policy-and-protocols/codes-and-protocols/.

15 https://www.lawsociety.org.uk/support-services/advice/practice-notes/representing-clients-at-section-2-cja-interviews/#cp21.

You should carefully consider the implication of agreeing to any undertaking and, if necessary, seek to amend the terms of the undertaking before agreeing it.'[16]

By way of example:

- Has sufficient information been provided to enable the lawyer to undertake whether he or she acts for another suspect?
- Do the undertakings on confidentiality relate to documents that are actually confidential (i.e., if the witness has obtained them from another source, this undertaking should be drafted to exclude such items)?
- Are the undertakings relating to the provision and retention of pre-interview disclosure practicable?

In respect of the conduct of the interview, the lawyer must give advice that the SFO may consider conflicts with the 'free flow of truthful information', for example:

- The lawyer must also ensure that the interview is conducted within the parameters of the section 2 power.
- The lawyer must ensure that the SFO respects the statutory exception to its compulsory power, such as a refusal to answer questions that are properly the subject of legal professional privilege.[17]
- The lawyer must ensure that the witness is able to deal with the interview properly: the lawyer must ensure that answers given by the witness are not misconstrued, that the witness has sufficient time to consider the documents put to him or her, etc.

Confidentiality of the interview 15.3.4

At the conclusion of an interview with a witness (and some interviews with suspects), the investigator will often inform the witness that they consider the interview to be confidential and that the witness should not discuss it with anyone other than their legal adviser. There is no legal force in these statements. In Lord, for example, the court confirmed that there is no obvious bar to an interviewee discussing their interview as they wished.[18] Indeed, there may be good reason for a witness (or his or her lawyer) to discuss what was learned in an investigator's interview with others; careful thought should therefore be given to whether this would be in the witness's best interests. The only exception to this is where the investigation is a money laundering investigation, in which case thought should be given to whether the prohibition on tipping off set out in section 333 of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 applies.

16 Paragraph 2.2 of the Law Society's practice note.

17 Section 2(9) Criminal Justice Act 1987. Legal professional privilege may be claimed over any communication between a client and their lawyer seeking or giving legal advice and over communications between a lawyer and a third party if litigation was in contemplation and the document or communication was created for the dominant purpose of litigation.

18 R v. Lord and others, paragraph 21.

15.4 Interviews of suspects in law enforcement investigations

15.4.1 The caution

Law enforcement interviews of suspects are conducted in accordance with the protections set out in the Codes of Practice (PACE Codes) issued pursuant to section 66 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (PACE). Among the most important of these protections is the caution administered to a suspect at the start of an interview.

An investigator must caution a person if there are 'reasonable, objective grounds for suspicion, based on known facts or information which are relevant to the likelihood the offence has been committed and the person to be questioned committed it'.[19] The failure to administer a caution may render the interview record inadmissible in subsequent criminal proceedings.

The caution is as follows:

> You do not have to say anything. But it may harm your defence if you do not mention when questioned something which you later rely on in Court. Anything you do say may be given in evidence.[20]

The caution confers on the suspect a right to silence. It also reminds the suspect that if he or she chooses to answer questions, the answers will be admissible in evidence against the suspect at any criminal trial. Finally, the caution alerts the suspect to a rule called the adverse inference. This rule means that, if the suspect fails to mention a fact that in the circumstances existing at the time could reasonably have been mentioned at the interview and later relies on that fact in his or her defence, there is a risk that the trial judge directs the jury that they may draw an adverse inference against the suspect.[21] The jury could draw an adverse inference, for example, if they found that the reason that no answer was given was because there was no good or true answer that would stand up to scrutiny, or if they found that any subsequent fact raised in the defence could be fabricated.

Jurors may not be asked about their deliberations and so the impact of a judicial invitation to draw an adverse inference is not known. Nonetheless, it is believed that jurors do not always draw an inference even when invited to do so.

15.4.2 Deciding on the suspect's approach

The single most important decision taken by a lawyer representing a suspect in an interview under caution is whether to answer questions, exercise the right to silence or read from a prepared statement. This decision is rarely straightforward; care must be taken to protect the suspect from a variety of risks, including the risk of making damaging admissions, the risk of being ambushed by previously undisclosed documents and the risk of an adverse inference being drawn in any future trial.

19 See Note 10A to paragraph 10.1 of Code C of the PACE Codes.

20 per PACE Code C, paragraph 10.5.

21 Section 34(1) and (2) Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994.

To advise on this decision, the lawyer should seek pre-interview disclosure from the investigator, namely an explanation of the evidential basis of the allegations against the suspect. There is no legal requirement to provide pre-interview disclosure, although case law suggests that where none is given, disclosure is very limited or what is given is misleading, the court may decline to draw an adverse inference or may even exclude the interview from evidence.[22] In practice, most investigators will provide some pre-interview disclosure in an attempt to prevent these outcomes. If the disclosure is limited, for example if it contains a summary of facts with no contemporaneous documents, the lawyer should ask a series of questions to establish what evidence has been collected in the course of the investigation and seek sight of any document that will be put to the suspect in the interview. A note should be taken of these discussions so that it can be used in any subsequent application for exclusion of evidence or objection to an adverse inference.

If thorough disclosure is provided, a full comment interview may add credibility to a defence advanced at trial or give the investigator reasons to re-evaluate the factual basis of his or her suspicions. However, if disclosure is inadequate, answering questions may simply provide an account that is inconsistent with material already gathered by the investigator (and that may be deployed by the investigator during the interview to discredit the suspect's account). Moreover, answering questions without fully understanding the basis of the allegations may simply extend the scope of the investigation into new, problematic areas.

In complex financial crime cases, reading from a prepared statement may often be preferable to a suspect answering questions or exercising the right to silence. An effective prepared statement will set out the salient points in the suspect's defence in a structured format and guard against the risk of the adverse inference being drawn. However, there is always a risk in relying on these statements if disclosure is inadequate, such that the statement could be undermined at a later stage of the investigation or omit facts that could have reasonably been mentioned in interview. Practices vary as to whether such statements should be read out at the beginning or end of the interview.

Lawyers advising a suspect should ask themselves two questions. First, are there factors that may suggest the suspect is not able to provide a full and clear account of the conduct? Secondly, are there tactical reasons to adopt a certain approach? Some of the factors that feed into these questions are as follows:

- there are no facts on which the suspect will rely in his or her defence;
- pre-interview disclosure is so limited that it is not possible properly to evaluate and advise on the case against the suspect;

22 R v. Mason [1987] 3 All ER 481.

- limited disclosure may indicate that the investigator's case is weak and there is a risk that the suspect would make admissions that may strengthen the case or lead to new lines of enquiry;
- the disclosure, however briefly put, reveals the type of case that calls for a defence to be put in evidence at an early stage;
- the case disclosed is not based on admissible evidence;
- the conduct under investigation is historic or complex, such that inadequate time or disclosure has been provided to prepare effectively (this may not necessarily be the investigator's strategic decision but because evidence is still being obtained);
- the lawyer knows or suspects that the investigator plans to provide documents in the course of the interview that have not been shown to the lawyer in advance; and
- the suspect is by reason of illness, cognitive impairment, drink or drugs, fatigue or other mental state not able to provide an accurate account or take advice on board.[23]

15.4.3 The lawyer's role in the interview

The lawyer's role in an interview of a suspect is similar to the roles described above when acting for employees in corporate internal investigations or for witnesses in law enforcement investigations. However, there are additional considerations when acting for a suspect. For example, in some circumstances, he or she should be warned not to accuse others of lying or other reprehensible behaviour, as to do so will automatically risk their own 'bad character' (which includes non-conviction material such as disciplinary matters) being admitted in evidence.[24]

23 If any of these conditions are apparent, the suspect is likely to be unfit to be interviewed and medical advice should be obtained.

24 Under section 101(1)(g) of the Criminal Justice Act 2003.

16

Representing Individuals in Interviews: The US Perspective

John M Hillebrecht, Lisa Tenorio-Kutzkey and Eric Christofferson[1]

Introduction 16.1

When representing individuals in investigations, determining whether to consent to an interview and any interview itself can be pivotal. The following sets forth some potential pitfalls and suggests certain best practices.

Kind and scope of representation 16.2

Even leaving aside the multifarious sorts of industries and issues that can be relevant to the representation of an individual, there are various kinds of representations, presenting different types of challenges.

Representing current or former employees 16.2.1

Most typically in sophisticated white-collar matters, a company is either conducting an internal investigation into suspected misconduct or responding to a government investigation (regulatory or criminal, or both) of similar misconduct. The former often morphs into the latter, one way or the other. In those contexts, the individual client is usually a current or former employee or board member. Inevitably, the individual's relationship with the company is crucial, and can materially impact (for good or ill) counsel's approach to the interview. At the most basic level, the company may or may not have an obligation to advance reasonable legal fees and expenses to the client.[2] Even in the absence of a contractual or other obligation, the company will sometimes agree (or be persuaded) to do so. In either scenario, the company might impose a cap or other conditions on payments. In any event, there are significant advantages to the client establishing a co-operative

See Chapter 4 on self-reporting to authorities and Chapter 20 on whistleblowers

1 John M Hillebrecht, Lisa Tenorio-Kutzkey and Eric Christofferson are partners at DLA Piper.

2 See, e.g., 8 Del. C. § 145 (discussing advancement).

and cordial relationship with the company (including, at minimum, access to documents and other information) – although this is not always possible.

16.2.2 Pool counsel

At times, largely for reasons of efficiency and economy, the client may be one of multiple individuals a single lawyer concurrently represent as a 'pool' of clients who are witnesses or potential witnesses in the same investigation – subject to the ethical rules governing conflicts of interest and confidentiality.[3] This usually occurs where the members of the pool are viewed at that time as less culpable and whose interests are thought to be aligned. Such an arrangement presents obvious advantages to each individual. Pool counsel, by definition, obtains a broader perspective and usually has access to more documents than he or she would otherwise, has the benefit of each client's recollection, and can use insights gleaned from the first client's interview or interviews to prepare for subsequent client interviews. To be clear, it is usually best practice not to 'cross-pollinate' clients (by, for example, telling one client what another said about a particular issue), but pool counsel can appropriately use such information to formulate questions and strategies. Before agreeing to represent multiple individuals, counsel must take substantial steps to ensure that there are no conflicts, document the risk of future conflicts and the waiver of any future conflicts in appropriate engagement letters, and remain hyper-vigilant for developing conflicts.[4] The authors recently experienced a situation in which it emerged – a year into representing a pool of individuals – that one client had negative information about a second client (information both had concealed), leading to significant issues during fraught negotiations with the government regarding one of the two clients. Only the existence of an appropriate engagement letter forestalled more serious problems.

16.2.3 Joint defence agreements

Although 'entering into a joint defense agreement is often, indeed generally, beneficial to its participants, like skating on thin ice, dangers lurk below the surface'.[5] These dangers are illustrated by court rulings disqualifying counsel based on a joint defence agreement, precluding counsel from cross-examining a defector who becomes a cooperating witness, and holding that communications thought to be protected by a joint defence agreement were not in fact privileged.[6] Most of these risks can be mitigated substantially if counsel for the participants consider, discuss and record in some fashion the parameters of their agreement, including the

3 See generally Association of the Bar of the City of New York Committee on Professional Ethics, Formal Opinion 2019-4: Representing Multiple Individuals in the Context of a Governmental or Internal Investigation (Opinion 2019-4).

4 See generally Opinion 2019-4.

5 United States v. LeCroy, 348 F. Supp. 2d 375, 387 (E.D. Pa. 2004), as amended on reconsideration (10 January 2005).

6 See generally United States v. Hatfield, 2009 WL 3806300 (E.D.N.Y. 2009).

consequences of one or more participants withdrawing from the agreement.[7] On more than one occasion when the authors represented individuals, we received a voluminous quantity of documents from the clients' former employers, all Bates-numbered to the effect that they were produced pursuant to a joint defence agreement, when there had been no discussion about any such agreement. The tendency of many practitioners to prefer informal joint defence agreements with no specific clarity or agreement on the consequences of withdrawal is puzzling, and the consequences can be severe.[8]

In some jurisdictions, including the Southern District of New York (SDNY),[9] practitioners often prefer to use verbal joint defence agreements. While the agreement need not be recorded in writing, there are numerous advantages to doing so. Although courts may find the existence of a joint defence agreement, despite the agreement being purely verbal, the existence of a written document obviates this inquiry. In a December 2018 decision, a judge in the SDNY held that a former employee failed to establish a common interest agreement with his former employer – even though the individual's lawyer emailed company counsel a draft document with the subject line 'Common Interest Privilege Document', specifically noting that the draft document was being shared 'pursuant to our common interest', without any objection or clarification from company counsel.[10] This underscores the importance of documenting explicitly the existence of such an agreement.

Companies under investigation will at times enter into a joint defence agreement with employees or, more commonly, former employees. We have seen such agreements stating that information disclosed to the company will not be disclosed to the government or third parties. This practice is problematic where a company would prefer to disclose illegal or wrongful conduct to the government and minimise its exposure by obtaining co-operation credit, or where the company operates in a regulated industry that imposes a legal obligation on the company to disclose wrongdoing. As a result, counsel for a corporation typically include language in the joint defence agreement that explicitly authorises the corporation to disclose joint defence materials (or a subset of them) at its sole discretion. This kind of joint defence agreement is little more than a glorified Upjohn warning.[11] In representing entities, the authors have in the past used joint defence agreements that protect most joint defence materials – strategy discussions, draft work

See Chapter 4 on self-reporting to authorities

7 Unfortunately, far too often the sum total of counsels' 'discussion' along these lines can be summarised as 'This is a joint defence meeting, right?'.

8 See John M Hillebrecht and Jessica Masella, 'Understanding Joint Defense Agreements: The Implications for White-Collar Defendants in the Second Circuit,' New York L. J. (25 January 2019).

9 The Southern District of New York (SDNY), centred on New York City, is home to many of the US Department of Justice's (DOJ) most significant international prosecutions and one of its largest US Attorneys' Offices.

10 SEC v. Rashid, 17-cv-8223 (PKC) (S.D.N.Y. 13 December 2018).

11 See generally Upjohn Co. v. United States, 449 U.S. 383 (1981). See also Chapter 8 on witness interviews.

product, updates on interactions with the government – but specifically carve out 'historical' interviews of the individual, which are governed by a standard Upjohn warning. As a practical matter, however, whatever the form of the joint defence agreement, an individual may have little choice but to agree so as to obtain information (including documents) necessary to present a defence.

16.3 Whether to be interviewed

16.3.1 Internal investigation

At times a client faces real risk in consenting to an interview by the company. Admitting misconduct, even mere violations of company policy well short of criminal violations, can result in discipline, termination and severe financial consequences. Also, one must assume (and advise one's client to assume) that the company will disclose its version of the interview to the government. Hence, before consenting to an interview, it is crucial to understand the facts (including the documents, the context of the transaction or trading strategy etc., and the client's version of events), as well as the views of company counsel (to the extent they can be elicited). That said, the client often faces a Hobson's choice. The company's advancement of fees (which the client may regard as crucial) may well be conditioned on co-operation and, more fundamentally, in the United States (as opposed to virtually all EU countries) an employer can generally fire an executive who refuses to be interviewed.[12] Even where there is some degree of risk, when the client wants to continue employment, protect his or her financial situation, or simply continue working for a different employer in the same regulated industry, the incentives to consent to an interview will be strong. Even leaving those concerns aside, failure to consent to an interview will almost certainly lead to a cessation of reciprocal co-operation from the company – halting the flow of documents and updates and putting an end to coordination. Obviously, there will be cases where the risks of a truthful interview are so palpable that, regardless of the consequences, declining to be interviewed is the only prudent choice. Similarly, many individual clients face close to no risk. The troublesome choices concern those clients who fall in between.

16.3.2 Government investigation

Consenting to a government interview obviously carries additional risks. Therefore, assessing the client's exposure in advance is even more crucial in this context. In addition to assessing the facts and documents, prudent counsel will seek the views of company counsel, speak to counsel for other potential witnesses (whom company counsel will usually identify), and if applicable review public record documents, related civil lawsuit filings and media reports (and, increasingly, blogs and other internet commentaries). Equally important are the views, if they can be obtained, of the government lawyers seeking the interview. The United States Department of Justice (DOJ) has a formal taxonomy between 'target', 'subject' and (less formally) witness.[13] Often, but not always, counsel representing an individual can at minimum get an Assistant US Attorney to answer a question regarding the client's formal status (although it is imperative that the client understand that the status can always shift). Other agencies – for example the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) and the Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) – usually will not provide even such minimal information, but there are frequently exceptions.

12 See Gilman v. Marsh & McLennan, 826 F. 3d 69 (2d Cir. 2016); see also Michael D Hynes, Brett Ingerman, John M Hillebrecht, 'Second Circuit Affirms Employers' Right to Terminate Employees Who Fail to Cooperate With Internal Investigations,' DLA Piper Client Alert (1 July 2016), https://www.dlapiper.com/en/us/insights/publications/2016/06/second-circuit-affirms-employers/.

Of course, even when contemplating a government interview there are often similar employment-related considerations – an obligation to co-operate to avoid a cut-off of legal fees, termination of employment, or even attempted clawbacks of vested bonuses, etc. And, again, certain executives in regulated industries (e.g., registered broker-dealers) can be easily placed between a rock and a hard place. Also, unlike company counsel, the government can always threaten to use grand jury or other subpoenas.[14]

See Chapter 14 on employee rights

Preparation for interview 16.4

For both internal and government interviews, the typical preparation is much the same. This is where having a good relationship with company counsel becomes so important. If company counsel has provided the key documents, identified counsel for other individuals and shared (within reason) the focus of the investigation (from the company's perspective or that of the government), counsel for the individual client will be well positioned to prepare the client for the interview. Conversely, if company counsel has not been co-operative, preparing the client becomes more difficult. Counsel should in any event push the interviewer (company counsel or the government) to identify in advance the topics to be covered and to share in advance the documents to be used during the interview. How much of this is actually made available varies enormously, based on a number of factors. Sometimes everything requested is supplied; sometimes next to nothing is forthcoming; but usually the requests are partially satisfied. As a very general observation, certain government entities (e.g., the CFTC) are usually more forthcoming than others (e.g., the DOJ). But in any event, there is no harm in asking, if necessary repeatedly.

Even where company counsel shares 'all' the key documents, more often than not crucial – unfortunately, at times the most crucial – documents are omitted. Often, company counsel will produce to the individual client's counsel 'all' the 13 See generally Justice Manual § 9-11.151.

14 The foregoing discussion focuses on the US perspective for individuals located in the United States. For clients located abroad, the calculus may differ in nuanced ways. Among other things, the ability of companies to compel co-operation is markedly less in other jurisdictions (e.g., the European Union) and the ability of US agencies to effectively subpoena persons abroad (through mutual legal assistance treaties or otherwise) is much more limited. (See Chapter 11 on production of information to authorities and Chapter 28 on extraterritoriality.)

documents the client saw in real time that have been produced to the government and a separate subset of the most important documents. One should never rely on the company's selection. Instead, counsel should run targeted searches on the broader universe of documents. Even then, counsel must bear in mind that that universe (1) obviously does not include documents produced by other entities (which are frequently encountered for the first time when the client is confronted with them during a government interview or SEC testimony); (2) might not include all documents produced by the company; and (3) might also not include other documents (texts, instant messages, WhatsApp messages, private emails, etc.) that may have escaped the company's net. In this regard, it is important to remember to ask the individual client early on whether he or she has access to any pertinent documents or communications (including texts and other messages on a work or personal cellphone or other device).

Recognising these limitations and risks, the documents are typically an essential part of preparing for an interview. It is often helpful to conduct a preliminary debriefing of the client without delving too deeply into large numbers of documents. Then, armed with the context and insights provided by that preliminary conversation, counsel typically spends substantial time alone with the documents – reviewing, highlighting, annotating, cross-referencing and generally striving to internalise the pertinent documents. While the initial cut of such a review will typically be performed by junior lawyers on whatever electronic document review platform they favour, depending on volume and lawyer predilections it is often easier for the senior lawyer to review and annotate the most significant documents in hard copy, in binders, with highlighters and post-it flags. Every lawyer's methodology will differ, but the point of the exercise should be a constant: identify those documents that are central to the narrative; flag the phrases, paragraphs and emoticons that will grab the attention of a prosecutor, regulator or company counsel; and put together a comprehensible chronology.

A written chronology is often a helpful vehicle to identify salient points and, at a minimum, provides a helpful tool to refresh recollections. During the life of many investigations, there will often be dormant periods where months go by without much or any activity. When the SEC subsequently calls, having a detailed chronology document to reference is a good way to get back up to speed quickly. In building out a chronology, the precise time of day a message was sent is often overlooked. At times, such details support inferences, good or bad, and the reviewing attorneys must be sensitive to that.

Once counsel has done their level best to carefully scrutinise and organise all the relevant documents available, they should be reviewed in detail with the client. In some cases, there are multiple discrete issues (e.g., a revenue-recognition matter raising different issues for a company's different customers) and some where there is really a single issue (e.g., an insider trading investigation focused on a single trade by one trading desk). In the former situation, one would generally break up the documents by issue, whereas, in the latter, chronological order usually makes most sense. Even in a case involving multiple different issues, it is important not to be too rigidly siloed. Often, the fact that an email or text regarding one subject was sent shortly before a seemingly-unrelated message regarding another can loom large as to the client's state of mind or other important issues.[15]

After the documents are reviewed and organised, the client should be walked through them. It often makes sense to provide the client with a collection of the pertinent documents in advance. (On occasion, company counsel will put restrictions on the use of the documents it has provided, including precluding the individual client from reviewing the documents outside the presence of counsel. Where required, clients can review the documents with a junior lawyer or paralegal in the room.)

An important goal of such preparation is to refresh the client's recollection as to documents and events that often are from years earlier. But almost invariably, portions of some documents will suggest improper conduct as to which the client must be prepared (if possible) to offer a cogent explanation. Sometimes what looks bad to an outside observer turns out to be perfectly proper when put in the context of the industry or transaction at issue. Sometimes what looks bad is truly a joke or sarcasm. And sometimes what looks bad is, frankly, bad.

In identifying potentially problematic aspects of documents, it is important for counsel to put his or her prosecutor's cap on and cast a jaundiced eye on the documents. To the extent possible, it is also important to speak with counsel for other individuals who received the same document to try to elicit the other individuals' understanding of it and the views of the government or company counsel (to the extent there have already been interviews).

One strategic issue that sometimes arises has to do with whether ignorance is bliss. There may be times when not refreshing the client's recollection or, more frequently, not educating him or her about an issue (e.g., an accounting rule, a regulatory requirement) makes sense.

Once the client is as well versed in the documents and other information at issue as can be expected, it is sometimes a good idea to pressure-test his or her explanations and recollection by conducting what is tantamount to a mock cross-examination. This enables the client to become familiar with limiting answers to what he or she knows and remembers, to avoid speculation or characterisations, and to make what was known and understood at the time as opposed to now (following focused review of documents and awareness of the investigation).

Procedures for government interview 16.5

After tentatively deciding to consent to a government interview, it may be prudent to preface the actual client interview with an attorney proffer. These are more commonly used with some government agencies than others. For example, they are commonly welcomed by the Antitrust Division of the DOJ. Although practices differ among jurisdictions and government regulators, typically counsel would prepare a detailed outline of a proffer, vetted and approved by the client, and stick to it while presenting to the government.

15 At least some of the authors have had the unpleasant experience of realising such a connection only in the middle of a DOJ interview, a situation that should be avoided at all costs.

Counsel should inform the government that the proffer is hypothetical but that the information is what counsel expects the client would say. Counsel should then recount the information prepared in advance and typically not answer any questions the government asks with additional information not vetted with the client. The purpose of such a proffer is to gauge the government's view of the client's exposure. Typically, an attorney proffer is used in the context of DOJ criminal investigations where counsel believes the client is in some degree of jeopardy. Often the proffer will conclude with some version of: 'If the client tells you what counsel has just summarised, would you agree that a non-prosecution agreement would be proper?'[16]

Some years ago, such proffers were very common in criminal cases, particularly where counsel was seeking a co-operation agreement or non-prosecution agreement. Many US Attorney's Offices have in recent years taken the position that an attorney proffer is no different from a client proffer in that the attorney's statements are treated as statements of the client for purposes of the Jencks Act and therefore must be disclosed to defence counsel if the client becomes a government witness.[17] Accordingly, prosecutors have been more reticent about agreeing to attorney proffers.

Assuming the decision is made (either given positive feedback from an attorney proffer or otherwise) to go forward with the government interview or proffer, a number of important preliminary matters must be resolved in advance. Perhaps most importantly, counsel must clearly explain to the client – and document – all the risks and benefits of making a proffer, and that it would be voluntary and the Fifth Amendment generally precludes anything but a voluntary proffer.[18] Equally fundamentally, counsel must confirm which agencies, and what offices from each agency, will be attending; not only may the risk profiles differ, but each agency may have different ground rules, including different proffer agreements or no proffer agreements at all.

Although, as discussed below, many proffer agreements today provide imperfect protections, they do provide some protection. Accordingly, one crucial requirement of any proffer agreement is a 'most-favoured nation' clause – a commitment from the government agency that it will not share the substance of any proffer with any other agency (foreign or domestic) not bound by the agreement. In this regard, the standard proffer agreement used by the SEC and the typical proffer agreement used by many US Attorney's offices provides that they will not 16 Some jurisdictions (such as SDNY) often use non-prosecution agreements for individuals, while others (such as the District of Massachusetts) never do.

17 18 U.S.C. § (Jencks Act); see generally United States v. Triumph Capital Group, 544 F. 3d 149, 161 to 165 (2d Cir. 2008) (reversing conviction because government failed to produce government notes of an attorney proffer).

18 Curiously, if a proffer does not produce the desired result, some clients have a tendency to forget that the risks were clearly explained to them.

share the proffer with another enforcement agency unless that agency agrees to be bound by the terms of the proffer agreement.

The most common types of proffer agreements (such as those used by the SEC and most US Attorney's offices, including the SDNY) have become longer and more complicated over the years. But the basic minimal protection provided by such an agreement has long ensured that the government cannot use the words the client says in the proffer as direct evidence in seeking an indictment (or filing a civil complaint) or as proof in the government's case-in-chief. This is a material benefit to the client. Absent the proffer agreement (or the agreement by the government to take a proffer subject to the plea-negotiation protections of Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 11 or Evidence Rule 410 – which the authors have never known to have happened), the government could simply treat the client's statements as a confession and use them accordingly.

But the exceptions that have been added to these typical proffer agreements over the years, largely supported by the courts, have denuded this basic protection of much of its robustness. Indeed, many savvy practitioners as a matter of near uniform policy will virtually never advise their clients to proffer. One thing is patently clear: if the strategy of consenting to a proffer does not succeed and the client ends up getting indicted, the fact that the client proffered will almost invariably put the client in a worse position.

Assuming the client told a version of his or her state of mind or other issues inconsistent with the government's view of those matters, the typical proffer agreement permits the government to prosecute the client for false statements – basically, for denying culpability or contradicting what others say.[19]

More commonly, the government uses various terms of the typical proffer agreement to essentially eviscerate the ability a defendant who has proffered to defend himself or herself. Years ago, the typical agreement allowed the government to impeach a defendant who takes the stand with arguably inconsistent statements from the proffer session. That baseline exception has been expanded throughout the years. It is now broadly accepted that if defence counsel makes an argument in opening statement arguably contrary to the proffer statements or cross-examines government witnesses in the wrong way, the government can use the proffer statements – an obviously devastating piece of evidence.[20] Even something as simple as offering documentary evidence tending to show that the defendant was not at the scene of the crime can have the same effect.[21] In at least one case, omissions from a proffer statement were deemed admissible based on cross-examination of a government witness.[22]

19 See, e.g., United States v. Percoco, 16 Cr. 776 (VEC) (S.D.N.Y. 11 December 2017) (individuals who proffered exculpatory explanations during meeting with government after being 'told that they were "subjects" of the investigation', not 'targets', subsequently indicted for false statements.)

20 See generally United States v. Barrow, 400 F. 3d 109, 113 to 119 (2d Cir. 2005) (where proffer agreement stated that statements could be used 'as substantial evidence to rebut any evidence offered or elicited, or factual assertions made by' defence, assertion in opening that another person made certain specific narcotics sales opened the door to prosecution using proffer statements in case-in-chief which discussed drug dealing more broadly; 'proper rebuttal is not limited to direct contradiction').

21 See generally United States v. Roberts, 660 F. 3d 149 (2d Cir. 2011).

So the risks of a proffer, and the loopholes in standard proffer agreements, are very substantial. Again, counsel must make a risk assessment, weigh the pros and cons, and explain all of this clearly to the client and document it.

Probably the last significant preliminary matter (other than pressing, yet again, for advance notice of the documents and topics the government expects to cover) is to determine in what fashion the government agency intends to record the interview. At least some government agencies (in our experience, often Inspectors General of various executive branch agencies) have a policy of seeking to audio-record voluntary interviews. Counsel and client should only consider consenting if the agency agrees to share the recording.

In the ordinary course (and certainly in the typical DOJ and SEC interviews), the government will have a designated note-taker (generally a law enforcement agent in a DOJ investigation) using a laptop or pen and paper. It is crucial that counsel for the client has a note-taker who has clear instructions as to what he or she should be doing. Unlike notes of a preparation session protected by attorney–client privilege, notes of a proffer to the government are protected only as work product. The note-taker in that context should strive to record all substance, even at times in 'Q and A' fashion and including interjections, objections, and clarifications by counsel for the client. While in the authors' experience it happens rarely, there are times when the government's notes as to a proffer are completely wrong on crucial issues (e.g., state of mind 'at the time' of the conduct in question) and the existence of painstakingly detailed notes proved to be an essential weapon in arguments with the DOJ and the SEC. Accurate, detailed note-taking is a must.

See Chapter 36 on privilege

Every proffer interview is different. Government lawyers are only human, so the approaches and temperaments of those lawyers run the gamut. Some ask almost entirely respectful open-ended questions. Some start an aggressive cross-examination shortly after initial introductions. Some are respectful and even-keeled but relentlessly ask the same exact question over and over again in an effort to get the client to shift his or her answer and adopt a specific formulation or term that is important to the prosecutor's theory. All of these happen – often during the same interview – because in a typical sophisticated white-collar matter, there can be two, three, four or more government lawyers asking questions. When this is the case, the individual client's lawyer must not be 'a potted plant'. The practitioner has a duty to stop a client answering unfair questions, to rephrase questions that are formulated in a misleading fashion, and to challenge the government lawyers when they misstate the client's earlier answers or misleadingly summarise documents or ask questions about one document while ignoring another equally relevant one (which counsel will hopefully know because he or she is conversant with all the documents that have been produced). A good proffer is one where counsel largely stands mute. But one cannot be shy when shenanigans like those summarised above are playing out. To be clear: the government lawyers will not like it. They will accuse you of 'coaching' the client. They may ask you to step out of the conference room and tell you (in essence) to shut up. That is them doing their job. But you have to keep doing your job – respectfully, strategically and within reason. Counsel will, of course, have prepared the client for this potential dynamic.

22 United States v. Vella, 2011 WL 652752 (3d Cir. 2011).

Conclusion 16.6

Representing individuals in white-collar matters is always fraught with risk. The interview – whether by company counsel or the government – is a key step in any investigation, and one that typically crystallises the risks to the client. Advising a client on whether or not to consent to such an interview is thus something that must reflect your considered judgement. A well-prepared client, whose context you fully understand and whose documents you are confident have been reviewed, may materially advance his or her position by consenting to such an interview. But these risks should always be in the forefront of your mind.

17

Individuals in Cross-Border Investigations or Proceedings: The UK Perspective

Richard Sallybanks, Ami Amin and Jonathan Flynn[1]

17.1 Introduction

In any cross-border investigation, invariably suspects will either be located in different jurisdictions, or subject to investigation by authorities from different jurisdictions, or both.

This chapter looks at the key issues that can arise when acting for an individual who is present in the United Kingdom and subject to a criminal investigation or proceedings here or in one or more overseas jurisdictions.[2]

17.2 Cross-border co-operation

See Chapter 9 on co-operating with authorities

There are various ways in which the United Kingdom might co-operate with overseas agencies or regulators when investigating or prosecuting an individual, ranging from informal 'intelligence sharing' to mutual legal assistance (MLA).

In the United Kingdom, the framework governing MLA requests is contained, primarily, in the Crime (International Co-operation) Act 2003 (CICA), Part 1 of which deals with criminal cases. Under CICA, an MLA request can only be made if it appears to the investigating authority that an offence has been committed (or there are reasonable grounds to suspect that an offence has been committed), and proceedings have been initiated or an investigation has begun.[3] MLA requests

1 Richard Sallybanks is a partner, and Ami Amin and Jonathan Flynn are associates at BCL Solicitors LLP.

2 Whereas England and Wales have a common legal system, there are certain substantive and procedural differences in the Scottish and Northern Irish systems. This chapter focuses on the English and Welsh legal system.

3 Section 7, Crime (International Co-operation) Act 2003.

are made to the UK Central Authority (UKCA)[4] through a formal international letter of request, known as a commission rogatoire in civil law jurisdictions. The UK Home Office has published detailed guidance on how authorities outside the United Kingdom can make such requests.[5] MLA requests will only be considered appropriate, however, when the request is for evidence (and not intelligence).[6]

Where overseas police and other law enforcement agencies request assistance directly from a UK law enforcement agency, a formal MLA request is not required. A number of UK law enforcement agencies[7] can receive direct requests, and often this form of co-operation is governed by data sharing agreements or memoranda of understanding.

In some instances, cross-border co-operation may extend to the establishment of a joint investigation team (JIT) between investigating agencies in more than one country.[8] The establishment of a JIT is another means by which information or evidence gathered in one country can be shared with another without the need for MLA.

Practical issues 17.3

Asset freezing and restraint 17.3.1

During a cross-border investigation, an overseas authority may seek to freeze or restrain an individual's assets in the United Kingdom. The Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (External Requests and Orders) Order 2005 (the 2005 Order) sets out the provisions for the United Kingdom to respond to and co-operate with other countries in freezing and confiscating assets.[9] Under section 444(1)(a) of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (POCA), property in the United Kingdom can be frozen in accordance with an external request relating to proceedings for the recovery of criminal proceeds.[10]

In the first instance, external requests will be addressed to the Secretary of State for the Home Department (SSHD), who will in turn refer the matter to the relevant UK authority.[11] The relevant authority will then apply to the Crown Court

4 The UKCA is the Home Office department responsible for receiving, acceding to and ensuring the execution of MLA requests in England, Wales and Northern Ireland. Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs (HMRC) is responsible for MLA requests in England, Wales and Northern Ireland relating to tax and fiscal customs matters. The Crown Office is responsible for MLA requests in Scotland, including devolved Scottish matters.

5 https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/415038/MLA_Guidelines_2015.pdf.

6 Section 7(2), Crime (International Co-operation) Act 2003.

7 These are: the UK Liaison Bureau at Europol via the National Crime Agency, Interpol via the National Crime Agency, UK Visas & Immigration; HMRC; Police Services; Financial Intelligence Units; Asset Recovery Offices.

8 Sections 103 and 104 of the Police Reform Act 2002.

9 The Order is made in exercise of the powers conferred under section 444 and 459(2) POCA.

10 An external request is a request by an overseas authority to prohibit dealing with property identified in the request. Section 447(1) POCA.

11 The relevant authority will be the Director of the National Crime Agency or the Director of Public Prosecutions and, in respect of offences involving serious or complex fraud, the Director of the

for the assets to be restrained. For the Crown Court to give effect to an external request: the property in England and Wales must be identified; a criminal investigation or proceedings relating to the relevant offence must have commenced in the requesting state; and there must be reasonable cause to believe that the alleged offender has benefited from his or her criminal conduct.[12] Furthermore, under section 447(8) of POCA, the criminal conduct must meet the dual criminality requirement, in that it must also amount to an offence in the United Kingdom, or would do so if it occurred there.

Where the Crown Court is satisfied that these conditions are met, it may make a restraint order prohibiting a person from dealing with the property identified in the external request, subject to certain exceptions.[13] A restraint order must be served on the suspect and any other person affected by it, and the UK courts will require confirmation this has been done. Failure to do so could result in the order being discharged.

Where a restraint order is obtained, it is likely that any banks or financial institutions to which the individual is connected will be served with a copy of the order in order to freeze any assets (ensuring that they remain available for confiscation).

The provisions of the 2005 Order correspond to provisions in Parts 2 to 4 and Part 5 of POCA (excluding Chapter 3), applicable to UK investigations. As with Parts 2 to 4 of POCA, section 444 enables restraint orders to be granted from the outset of a criminal investigation.

17.3.2 Account monitoring orders

CICA implements the 2001 Protocol to the Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters (the 2001 Protocol), which creates obligations for participating countries to respond to requests from overseas authorities for assistance locating bank accounts or to provide banking information relating to criminal investigations.[14] Account monitoring orders under CICA only apply to an investigation by a 'participating country' into serious criminal conduct.[15]

Account monitoring procedures were first introduced in the United Kingdom under POCA. However, separate provisions have been created under CICA to ensure that the United Kingdom can meet the requirements of the 2001 Protocol, which has a wider scope than POCA.

Where the SSHD receives a request from the relevant overseas authority, he or she may direct a senior police officer to apply, or arrange for a constable to apply, for an account monitoring order.[16] A judge can make an account monitor-

Serious Fraud Office (article 6, the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (External Requests and Orders) Order 2005).

12 Article 7, The Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (External Requests and Orders) Order 2005.

13 Ibid., article 8.

14 Sections 36 to 42, Crime (International Co-operation) Act 2003.

15 The request must be from an EU Member State, Iceland, Japan, Switzerland or the United States.

16 Section 35, Crime (International Co-operation) Act 2003. An account monitoring order is an order made by a judge to enable transactions on a particular account to be monitored for a specified period.

ing order where he or she is satisfied that there is an investigation into criminal conduct in the country in question and the order is sought for the purposes of that investigation.[17] Applications can be made, without notice, to a judge in chambers.[18] The court may discharge or vary an account monitoring order, but not on an application by the account holder.[19]

An account monitoring order can also be requested under Part 5 of the Proceeds of Crime (External Investigations) Order 2014 for the purposes of a criminal investigation[20] or criminal proceedings.[21] The request must demonstrate reasonable grounds for believing that the account information requested is of substantial value to the overseas investigation, and that it is in the public interest for it to be provided.[22]

Under POCA, account monitoring orders may be made for up to 90 days and the same restrictions apply to requests under the 2001 Protocol. Arrangements will be made between the relevant authorities case by case.[23]

Asset tracing 17.3.3

All asset tracing should be conducted via law enforcement co-operation through financial intelligence units. The United Kingdom has no central record for bank accounts. Therefore, any information should be sought via police co-operation before an MLA request is made.

In the United Kingdom, property or a sum of money is recoverable if it has been specified in an external order.[24] However, if the property (including money) specified in the external order has been disposed of, it is only recoverable if it is held by a person into whose hands it may be followed.[25]

Under the 2005 Order, any property deemed to represent the original recoverable property is also recoverable.[26] If a person disposes of recoverable property that represents the original property, the property may be followed into the hands of the person who obtains it (and it continues to represent the original property).[27]

17 Section 36, Crime (International Co-operation) Act 2003.
18 Ibid.
19 Ibid.
20 Provided that the investigation falls within a confiscation investigation or a civil recovery investigation.
21 Part 8, POCA.
22 Article 30, Proceeds of Crime (External Investigations) Order 2014.
23 Article 3(4) of the 2001 Protocol to the Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters.
24 Article 202, the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (External Requests and Orders) Order 2005.
25 Ibid.
26 Ibid., Article 203.
27 Ibid.

17.3.4 Confiscation and forfeiture

Under the 2005 Order, property within the United Kingdom may be subject to confiscation proceedings following the receipt of an external order.[28]

Upon receipt of an authenticated external order, the SSHD may refer it to the relevant UK authority to process.[29] Only the relevant Director (as defined in article 18 of the 2005 Order) may then make an application to the Crown Court to give effect to it.[30] The Crown Court must decide to give effect to an external order by registering it where certain conditions are met. Those conditions are that (1) the external order was made following a conviction of the person named in the order, and no appeal is outstanding, (2) the external order is in force and there is no appeal outstanding in respect of it, (3) giving effect to the order would not be incompatible with the Convention rights[31] of the individual concerned, and (4) the property is not subject to charges under the provisions set out in article 21(6) of the 2005 Order.[32]

Where the Crown Court decides to give effect to an external order, it must register it and provide for notice of the registration to be given to any person affected by it,[33] who may apply to vary the property to which it applies.[34]

Under article 26 of the 2005 Order, the amount ordered to be paid is due on the date notice is given to the affected person. The Crown Court has discretion to allow for more time to pay.[35] Where the external order specifies a sum of money in another currency, the sterling equivalent in accordance with the exchange rate prevailing at the end of the working day immediately preceding the day of registration of that order will be sought.[36]

17.3.5 Interviews

See Chapter 15 on representing individuals in interviews

An individual suspected of criminal activity who is resident or temporarily present in the United Kingdom and whom the UK authorities wish to question will be interviewed 'under caution'. This is usually done voluntarily unless it is 28 An external order is made by an overseas court where property is found, or believed to have been obtained, as a result of, or in connection with, criminal conduct. Section 447(2)(b) POCA.

29 The relevant authority will be the Director of the National Crime Agency or the Director of Public Prosecutions, and, in respect of offences involving serious or complex fraud, the Director of the Serious Fraud Office (article 18, the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (External Requests and Orders) Order 2005).

30 Article 20, the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (External Requests and Orders) Order 2005.

31 Rights under the European Convention on Human Rights.

32 The fourth condition is that the specified property must not be subject to a charge under: (a) section 9 of the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986(2); (b) section 78 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988(3); (c) article 14 of the Criminal Justice (Confiscation) (Northern Ireland) Order 1990(4); (d) section 27 of the Drug Trafficking Act 1994(5); (e) article 32 of the Proceeds of Crime (Northern Ireland) Order 1996(6) (article 21, the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (External Requests and Orders) Order 2005).

33 Ibid., article 22.

34 Ibid., article 22.

35 Ibid., article 26.

36 Ibid., article 25.

considered necessary to arrest the individual and there are legitimate reasons for doing so, such as a reasonable belief that, unless placed under arrest, the suspect will abscond from the jurisdiction or will somehow attempt to improperly interfere with the investigation.[37]

Either way, the interview will be conducted in accordance with the procedures laid down in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (PACE) and the accompanying Code C. The suspect has a number of rights, including the right to have a lawyer present.[38] A lawyer is defined as a UK solicitor holding a current practising certificate or an accredited or probationary representative.[39] This means that the suspect cannot be represented during the interview by an overseas lawyer. However, the suspect may have an approved interpreter present if he or she does not speak, or has only limited, English.[40]

The question of whether the interview is admissible in proceedings in any other jurisdiction will depend on the laws of that country. This means that, in cross-border investigations, serious consideration must be given by all the suspect's legal advisers prior to any interview in the United Kingdom as to whether his or her answers (or silence) may be admissible in any other investigating jurisdiction and, if so, the resulting potential benefits or disadvantages of the strategy adopted.

When a suspect is resident in the United Kingdom, but is wanted for questioning by an overseas authority, the individual (or his or her legal advisers) may be approached with a request that the suspect travel to the country of the requesting authority for interview voluntarily.

In the absence of any such request, or if it is refused, the requesting authority may be able to gain evidence from the suspect in the United Kingdom through MLA. In brief, an overseas authority can request that a statement be taken from the suspect on a voluntary basis. Alternatively, where the evidence needs to be taken on oath or where the suspect refuses to co-operate, the request can be for the suspect to be compelled to attend court for questioning.

Once before the court, the suspect can then be questioned under oath (although an oath need not be administered if this is allowed under the laws of the requesting state). The suspect retains the right against self-incrimination and may refuse to answer any question.

If a suspect consents to giving the overseas authority a statement voluntarily, or answers questions in court, this is likely to be admissible in any future proceedings in the requesting jurisdiction (subject to the applicable law in that jurisdiction). Again, the question of whether statements are also admissible in proceedings in any other jurisdiction will depend on local laws, and serious consideration must be given by all the suspect's lawyers of the implications.

37 Section 24 and Code G Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (PACE).

38 Paragraph 6, Code C PACE.

39 Paragraph 6.12, Code C PACE.

40 Paragraph 13, Code C PACE.

Often the requesting state seeks to obtain evidence from an individual who is not a suspect, but who is a witness, in the investigation. In such situations, the same MLA procedures can be used to obtain evidence.

However, if it is believed that the non-suspect individual will be unco-operative or unwilling to assist in any circumstances other than by compulsion, and assuming that the investigation is into a serious or complex fraud of the type that would fall under the remit of the Serious Fraud Office (SFO), a MLA request can be made to direct the SFO to obtain such evidence from the individual using its compulsory section 2 powers.[41] Answers obtained via this process are not generally admissible as evidence against the interviewee in criminal proceedings,[42] although they will inform the rest of the investigation.

Before granting the request, the requesting authority will be expected to provide an undertaking that any statement, or the contents of any interview, made by an individual pursuant to a compulsory section 2 notice will not be used in evidence against that person in any subsequent prosecution.[43]

17.3.6 Search and seizure

Under section 16 of CICA, an overseas authority can request the search or seizure of property in the United Kingdom. However, a request will not be granted automatically, even in circumstances where a search warrant has been issued in the requesting country.

See Section 17.3.7

In the first instance, the UK authorities may choose to implement the request less invasively, such as by seeking the production of documents. Moreover, even if the UK authorities accede to the request they do not have the power to grant the search warrant themselves, but must apply to a UK court.

Under section 17 of CICA, a court in England, Wales or Northern Ireland[44] may only issue a warrant at the request of an overseas authority where they are satisfied that the following three conditions are met: first, that criminal proceedings have been instituted, or a person has been arrested during the course of a criminal investigation, outside the United Kingdom; second, that the offence at issue would constitute an indictable offence in England or Wales (or an arrestable offence in Northern Ireland); and third, that there are reasonable grounds to suspect that the premises in question are occupied or controlled by that person and contain evidence relating to the offence.[45]

An application for a search warrant must be supported by a written document, known as an information, setting out the factual basis on which the warrant is sought. Since search warrant applications are made ex parte, the officer making the 41 Section 2 of the Criminal Justice Act 1987 (CJA). The Financial Conduct Authority has a similar power under section 171 of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 (FSMA).

42 Answers given in compelled interviews will, however, be admissible against the interviewee in most types of non-criminal proceedings.

43 Saunders v. The United Kingdom [1996] ECHR 65, para. 68 in particular.

44 Different conditions apply to warrants issued in Scotland (see section 18 CICA).

45 Section 17(3) CICA.

application must furnish the court with the full facts at their disposal (including those that militate against the granting of a warrant).[46]

Where a warrant is granted under section 17 of CICA, an officer from the executing UK authority may enter the property to seize and retain evidence relating to the offence. All search warrants executed in the United Kingdom must comply with the requirements of PACE and Code B.[47] This includes a requirement to provide the occupier of the premises with a copy of the warrant.

Where evidence is seized under CICA, either the original or a copy will be sent via the UKCA to the court in the territory that requested the seizure.[48] However, further considerations will apply in the event that the material seized is subject to legal professional privilege or constitutes 'special procedure material'.[49]

See Chapter 35 on privilege

In this regard, it is worth noting that an individual may hold privileged material belonging not only to themselves, but also to their current or former employer (such as legal advice given to the company or material generated during the course of an internal investigation).[50] In the event of seizure of such material, the company that has the benefit of the privilege may itself wish to make representations to the authority receiving the material.

Production of documents 17.3.7

See Chapter 11 on production of information to authorities

In cross-border investigations involving financial crime, the most common mechanism to compel individuals to produce information, whether by answering questions in interview or by producing documents, is through the SFO's powers under section 2 of the Criminal Justice Act 1987 (CJA).[51]

The territorial scope of the SFO's powers under section 2 is not defined by the CJA. However, in the recent case of R (KBR Inc) v. Serious Fraud Office,[52] it was determined that section 2 powers can, in certain circumstances,[53] have extra-territorial effect (circumventing the requirements of MLA).[54] Accordingly, consideration should be given early in any cross-border investigation to what documents

46 R (Energy Financing Team) v. Bow Street Magistrates' Court [2006] 1 WLR 1317.

47 Section 15(6) PACE specifies what a warrant should contain.

48 Section 9 CICA.

49 Special procedure material includes journalistic material, or material acquired or created in the course of any trade, business, profession or other occupation, which is held subject to a duty of confidentiality (section 14 PACE 1984).

50 The recent decision in The Director of the Serious Fraud Office v. Eurasian Natural Resources Corporation [2018] EWCA Civ 2006 has broadened the scope of material that might arguably be subject to legal professional privilege.

51 Equivalent powers under Part XI of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 in respect of FCA investigations and section 62 of the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 in respect of National Crime Agency, HMRC and police investigations into 'specified offences'.

52 [2018] EWHC 2012 (Admin).

53 The notice was challenged on jurisdictional grounds. However, the High Court ruled that there was a 'sufficient connection' between KBR Inc and the UK.

54 On 8 April 2019, the UK Supreme Court granted KBR Inc leave to appeal the decision, although the basis of the appeal is not known.

an individual has in his or her possession (whether in hard copy or electronically) and where they are held.

In addition, under section 20 of CICA, a participating country[55] may request a freezing order in relation to evidence (this does not extend to property or money). Requests would be made to the Home Office and must relate to a listed offence.[56] Once evidence has been frozen it must be retained until instructions have been received to transfer that evidence to the requesting state, or to release it.[57]

In the future, the Crime (Overseas Production Orders) Act 2019 (COPOA)[58] will enable an 'appropriate officer'[59] to apply to the Crown Court for an overseas production order[60] requiring a person based in a country outside the United Kingdom that is party to, or participates in, a 'designated international co-operation arrangement' to produce or give access to 'electronic data'[61] regardless of where it is stored. At present, no designated agreements are in place, meaning certain operative parts of COPOA are not yet in force. However, the United Kingdom is in the process of negotiating a designated agreement with the United States pursuant to the US Clarifying Lawful Overseas Use of Data Act 2018.

17.4 Extradition

In cross-border criminal investigations, suspects are often resident outside the jurisdiction conducting the investigation.[62] As such, a critical question will be whether, and how, they may be subjected to extradition.

The answer lies in the legislation of, and arrangements between, the requesting and requested states.

The UK position is governed by the EU Framework Decision[63] and its obligations are implemented through the Extradition Act 2003 (the 2003 Act).

---

55 One of the EU Member States, Iceland, Japan, Switzerland and the United States.

56 Article 3, Council Framework Decision 2003/577/JHA of 22 July 2003 on the execution in the European Union of orders freezing property or evidence.

57 Section 24 CICA.

58 COPOA received royal assent on 12 February 2019.

59 The 'appropriate officers' include a constable, an officer of HMRC, a member of the SFO and a person appointed by the Financial Conduct Authority (section 2(1)(a) COPOA).

60 The requirements of which the Crown Court judge must be satisfied before granting an overseas production order are set out in section 4 COPOA.

61 'Electronic data' is broadly defined as 'any data stored electronically', although OPOs cannot require the production of material that is protected by legal professional privilege, or personal confidential records relating, for example, to an individual's physical or mental health (section 3 COPOA).

62 The focus of this chapter is on extradition from the United Kingdom. However, individuals wanted by overseas authorities may be the subject of an Interpol red notice. Red notices can be issued on the basis that the individual is sought for prosecution or to serve a sentence. Once issued, a red notice alerts police and border officials around the world, and therefore affected individuals may encounter difficulties when travelling internationally, even if they are not subject to an investigation or arrest warrant in the jurisdiction they are travelling from or to. For more information see: https://www.interpol.int/INTERPOL-expertise/Notices/Red-Notices.

63 2002/584/JHA.

The 2003 Act is divided into two parts. Part 1 applies to requests made by 'category 1 territories' (EU countries and Gibraltar) through the European arrest warrant (EAW) procedure.[64] Part 2 applies to requests made by 'category 2 territories', namely those other countries with which the United Kingdom has extradition relations.[65]

It is not yet clear what impact the United Kingdom's decision to leave the European Union will have, but it is likely that legislators will be revisiting this sometimes controversial area of law.

Extradition from the UK – category 1 territories: the EAW 17.4.1

The EAW is a fast-track procedure that allows the requesting state to secure the return of a requested person quickly and effectively.

The National Crime Agency certifies the EAW on receipt from the requesting state before liaising with the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) for advice on the validity and content of the request.

The requesting state must identify the offence of which the requested person is accused and confirm that the EAW is issued with a view to his or her arrest and extradition for the purpose of prosecution or, where the requested person has been convicted, for the purpose of being sentenced or to serve a sentence already passed. The information must include details such as the requested person's identity and particulars of the alleged offence or conviction. Failure to comply with these requirements invalidates the EAW.[66]

Following the certification of the EAW, a warrant for the requested person's arrest is issued. On arrest, the individual will initially be taken to a police station and held there under the provisions of PACE and the accompanying Code C. The individual has various rights, including the right to have someone informed of the arrest, the right to free independent legal advice, and the right to consult privately with a solicitor. A formal custody record will be opened, detailing key aspects of the detention, but the individual will not be interviewed as it is not the role of the police to investigate the offence. However, given the significance of identification to the extradition process, fingerprints, non-intimate samples and photographs may be obtained from the individual in accordance with PACE Code D.[67]

Following the requested person's arrest and initial detention, he or she must be brought before a court[68] 'as soon as practicable' for an initial hearing and fixing of the extradition hearing within the next 21 days.[69] Depending on the day and time of the arrest, this requirement can mean that the individual spends only hours in

64 Extradition Act 2003 (Designation of Part 1 Territories) Order (SI 2003/3333).

65 Extradition Act 2003 (Designation of Part 2 Territories) Order (SI 2003/3334).

66 Section 2, the 2003 Act.

67 Sections 166 to 168, the 2003 Act.

68 In England and Wales, cases are heard at Westminster Magistrates' Court; in Scotland, cases are heard at the Edinburgh Sheriff Court; and in Northern Ireland, cases are heard by designated county courts or resident magistrates.

69 Sections 3 and 4, the 2003 Act.

police detention before being brought before the court although, if arrested at the weekend, it can mean spending up to two nights in police custody.

At the extradition hearing, the judge must be satisfied that the alleged conduct constitutes an extraditable offence[70] and that no bar to extradition applies. If the judge orders extradition, and in the absence of any appeal, the requested person must be extradited within 10 days of the order, or later if agreed with the requesting state.

Either party may appeal the judge's decision to the High Court.[71] Thereafter, an appeal may be made to the Supreme Court if the matter concerns a point of law of general public importance.[72]

17.4.2 Extradition from the UK – category 2 territories

Part 2 of the 2003 Act provides for the extradition to those non-EAW territories with which the United Kingdom has bilateral or multilateral extradition treaties.[73]

Such territories are usually required to provide prima facie evidence of the case against the requested person unless they are signatories to the European Convention on Extradition,[74] or the United States, New Zealand, Australia or Canada.

Requests must be certified by the Home Secretary as being valid before being sent to the appropriate judge.[75] The judge then considers whether there are reasonable grounds to issue an arrest warrant,[76] which include that the evidence produced would justify the issue of a warrant for the individual's arrest if it were a domestic case.[77]

Once an arrest warrant has been issued and executed, the requested person must be brought before the magistrates' court as soon as practicable. Unless the requested person consents to extradition, the court will fix a date for the extradition hearing, usually within the next two months, and decide whether to grant bail.

At the extradition hearing, the judge must first consider the sufficiency of the extradition request and supporting documentation. If the documents do not meet the requirements set out in section 78(2) of the 2003 Act, the judge must discharge the person whose extradition is sought (the requested person).[78] Where the judge is satisfied that the requirements have been met, he or she will then go on to consider whether the person before the court is the requested person, the 70 Sections 64 and 65, the 2003 Act.

71 Sections 26 to 29, the 2003 Act.

72 Section 32, the 2003 Act.

73 A list of category 2 territories is provided here: https://www.gov.uk/guidance/extradition-processes-and-review.

74 http://www.coe.int/en/web/conventions/full-list/-/conventions/treaty/024/signatures?p_auth=4WJ8nibX.

75 Sections 69 and 70, the 2003 Act.

76 Sections 137 and 138, the 2003 Act.

77 Section 71, the 2003 Act.

78 Section 78, the 2003 Act.

offences specified are extraditable and copies of the documents have been served on the person.[79]

In cases where prima facie evidence must be provided, the judge must then decide if the evidence supporting the request is 'sufficient to make a case'. This is the same test that applies in domestic UK criminal proceedings in determining whether a criminal prosecution should be allowed to continue.

If the judge is satisfied that all the conditions have been met, and that no bars to extradition exist, the matter is referred to the SSHD for his or her decision whether to extradite. Representations may be made by the requested person to the SSHD for consideration when deciding whether to extradite.

See Section 17.4.4

The judge's decision to refer may be appealed within 14 days of the date of the decision and thereafter appeals may be lodged with the High Court or, if appropriate, the Supreme Court.

Extradition from the UK – other territories 17.4.3

For countries that are neither category 1 nor category 2 territories, section 194 of the 2003 Act allows the SSHD to certify that 'special extradition' arrangements have been made between the United Kingdom and that country for the extradition of a person.

These special arrangements must comply with the 2003 Act's Part 2 procedures, and the procedure is then as for a category 2 territory.

In addition, a territory party to an international convention to which the United Kingdom is also a party may, under section 193 of the 2003 Act, be designated a territory to which Part 2 of the 2003 Act applies.[80]

Bars to extradition 17.4.4

Under the 2003 Act a properly issued extradition request will be honoured, unless one of the bars to extradition applies.

Sections 11 and 79 of the 2003 Act set out specific bars to extradition for Part 1 and Part 2 requests respectively. These include but are not limited to the rule against double jeopardy, extraneous considerations and the passage of time.

In addition to the specific bars, there are a number of general bars as detailed below.

The human rights bar 17.4.4.1

Under sections 21, 21A (Part 1 cases) and 87 (Part 2 cases) the judge must determine 'whether extradition would be compatible with the [requested person's] Convention rights' within the meaning of the Human Rights Act 1998.[81]

79 Ibid.

80 SI 2005 No. 46, the Extradition Act 2003 (Parties to International Conventions) Order 2005: provides that a state will only be designated a category 2 territory in this way in relation to conduct to which the convention applies, e.g., drug trafficking offences in contravention of the UN Convention against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances.

81 Sections 21(1), 21A(1)(a) (Part 1 cases) and 87(1) (Part 2 cases), the 2003 Act.

A request may be refused where it is shown that there are substantial grounds to believe that the requested person, if extradited, faces a 'real risk of exposure to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment'[82] contrary to Article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) (for example, in relation to prison conditions in the requesting state); or that the interference with the private and family lives of the requested person, and members of his or her family, contrary to Article 8 of the ECHR, outweighs the public interest in extradition.[83] Arguments under Article 5 of the ECHR (the right to liberty and security)[84] and Article 6 of the ECHR (right to a fair trial)[85] can also be invoked under the human rights bar.

17.4.4.2 The proportionality bar

This bar applies to EAW cases only.[86] When considering a request, the judge may consider the seriousness of the alleged conduct, the likely penalty to be imposed and whether there are alternatives to extradition.

17.4.4.3 The forum bar

The forum bar provides that extradition may be barred if it would not be in the interests of justice.[87] This will be considered where the nature of the criminal conduct means that the alleged offence could potentially be prosecuted in more than one country, and is particularly relevant to parallel or cross-border investigations. It was introduced into the 2003 Act by the Crime and Courts Act 2013 as a result of concern in particular in the context of extraditions to the United States and has been in force as a bar to extradition since October 2013.

Extradition would not be in the interests of justice if the judge decides that a substantial measure of the criminal activity took place in the United Kingdom and, having regard to 'specified matters', the judge decides extradition should not take place.[88] The specified matters include consideration of where most of the loss or harm occurred or was intended to occur; the interests of any victims; any belief of a prosecutor that the United Kingdom is not the most appropriate jurisdiction in which to prosecute; desirability and practicability of all prosecutions relating to the extradition offence taking place in one jurisdiction; and the requested person's connections with the United Kingdom.

82 Soering v. United Kingdom (1989) 11 EHRR 439.

83 HH v. Deputy Prosecutor of the Italian Republic, Genoa (2012) 3 WLR 90 – summarised conclusions of Baroness Hale re: case law interpreting Article 8.

84 Shankaran v. India (2014) EWHC 957 (Admin).

85 Vincent Brown aka Vincent Bajinja, et al. v. The Government of Rwanda, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (2009) EWHC 770 (Admin).

86 Section 21A, the 2003 Act.

87 Sections 19B (Part 1 cases) and 83A (Part 2 cases), the 2003 Act; not in force in Scotland.

88 Section 19B(2), the 2003 Act.

The forum bar was successfully invoked in two recent cases concerning extradition to the United States (Love and Scott).[89] Attempts to appeal these decisions were unsuccessful in both cases.

Settlement considerations 17.5

The scope for an individual to settle cross-border investigations or proceedings is in practice limited and will realistically arise either in circumstances where the individual can obtain an immunity from prosecution or where his or her co-operation in one jurisdiction (whether or not involving a guilty plea) effectively resolves the investigations in other jurisdictions.

Sections 71 to 75 of the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 (SOCPA) set out the statutory framework in which an individual may enter into such an agreement with a UK prosecutor.[90]

Under section 71, a designated prosecutor[91] may grant a suspect immunity from prosecution subject to certain conditions. These conditions invariably require a suspect's full co-operation with the prosecuting authority in the United Kingdom (and, in the context of cross-border investigations, with all relevant overseas authorities). The section 71 notice, which is prepared in writing, also specifies the offences for which the individual cannot be prosecuted. If, however, the conditions of the notice are breached, the immunity will ordinarily be revoked.

Whereas section 71 grants immunity from prosecution, section 73 requires an individual to plead guilty to the offence, but enables the court to take into consideration the assistance the individual has provided to the authorities. This will often result in a substantial reduction in sentence.[92] For this reason a section 73 agreement is often referred to as a 'co-operating defendant' agreement and, in practice, in cross-border investigations will require the individual to co-operate not only with the UK authorities (which can extend to giving evidence, if required, in any UK proceedings against other suspects) but also with overseas investigating authorities.

Therefore, when advising an individual in a cross-border investigation about the possibility of either form of SOCPA agreement, it will be necessary simultaneously to engage with the other investigating authorities so that, for example, a resolution in the United Kingdom through a section 73 agreement will be reflected by equivalent action by the other investigating authorities (such as a non-prosecution agreement in the United States).

Note also that during parallel and cross-border investigations and proceedings a corporate entity will sometimes commence settlement discussions with the authorities (be they regulators or criminal enforcement agencies).

89 Love v. Government of the United States and another [2018] EWHC 172 (Admin) and Scott v. Government of the United States of America [2018] EWHC 2021 (Admin).

90 In this context, the UK refers to England, Wales and Northern Ireland.

91 Defined by section 71(4) of SOCPA as a prosecutor from the CPS, HMRC, SFO or the DPP of Northern Ireland.

92 R v. Dougall [2010] EWCA Crim 1048.

Within the United Kingdom, such discussions are most likely to be with the SFO or the FCA, or both, and, as regards criminal investigations, they are most likely to be centred on the possibility of the authorities agreeing to a deferred prosecution agreement (DPA).[93]

A DPA can only be concluded between the authority (usually the SFO) and the suspect corporate entity; there is no provision for an individual to enter into a DPA. The use to which the authority can put the information it obtains during the DPA negotiations in criminal proceedings against others, including individuals employed by the corporate entity, is unrestricted.[94] This means that an employee suspect is at great risk of having his or her position seriously compromised, including a heightened risk of criminal prosecution, as a result of the co-operation the employer must demonstrate as a prerequisite to being invited by the authority to enter into DPA negotiations.

If a corporate with which the client is connected enters into a DPA, the client may be named in the statement of facts. The current state of the law is unsatisfactory in that a third party does not have to be notified that he or she may be so named. Further, the terms of a DPA and the supporting statement of facts cannot be altered or modified once approved by the court.[95]

If there are extant criminal proceedings against individuals, or the possibility of such proceedings, protection will be put in place to seek to avoid the risk of the DPA causing prejudice to the individuals facing those proceedings. This will be either by anonymising the name of the entity entering into the DPA and the individuals referred to in the statement of facts[96] or by imposing reporting restrictions on the publication of the statement of facts until the conclusion of the associated proceedings.

In all likelihood, the corporate entity will enter (and conclude) settlement negotiations with the authorities without the knowledge of the individuals involved, let alone their input. In trying to put itself into a position where it can reach a DPA, the corporate entity will be anxious to demonstrate its co-operation with the authority, an obligation under the joint SFO and CPS Code of Practice,[97] and that it has severed its links with those individuals responsible for the misconduct. To allow those individuals to participate in the negotiations, or to be seen to be seeking to protect their position, would be likely to prejudice the position of the corporate entity in the eyes of the authority.

93 Schedule 17, Crime and Courts Act 2013.

94 Paragraph 13(6), Schedule 17, Crime and Courts Act 2013.

95 SFO v. Tesco Stores Limited [2019] EW Misc 1 (Crown C), para. 4.

96 For example the DPA in SFO v. XYZ Limited (U20150856).

97 Paragraph 2.8.2(i), DPA Code of Practice, Crime and Courts Act 2013.

Reputational considerations 17.6

Throughout any parallel or cross-border investigation or proceeding, those representing an individual must always consider the potential impact on their client's reputation. Reputation may include the client's professional reputation among his or her peers or wider public reputation, particularly if the client is a well-known figure. Matters are further complicated because the individual may have a low profile in one jurisdiction, but a high profile in another, or, despite having a low media profile, may have become embroiled in a high-profile investigation.

An associated issue that can often arise in practice is when the details surrounding the criminal investigation or proceedings are in the public domain and the individual is included in a due diligence database, such as World Check or World Compliance. Entry in these databases, which are largely based on open source (and sometimes unreliable) material, can have a profound effect on an individual's ability to access financial services.

As regards criminal investigations, the case of Richard v. The BBC affirmed that, as a starting point, a suspect should not be named by the press.[98] Although this position had already, in effect, been adopted following the Leveson Inquiry in 2012 and the College of Policing's Guidance on the Relationships with the Media in 2013, it was the first time that the UK courts had ruled on the issue.[99]

Although this is undoubtedly a positive step for suspect anonymity in the United Kingdom, there is an obvious caveat in the context of cross-border investigations; namely, that since different jurisdictions have different rules on publishing a suspect's identity, an individual who avoids having their details published by the UK press may nevertheless find themselves named overseas. Furthermore, different considerations will apply where, for example, an individual is charged in a criminal investigation or, in the context of FCA proceedings, 'identified' in corporate decision notices.[100]

Recently in the United Kingdom, reputation management has been seen as a distinct professional discipline, with a number of lawyers specialising in the field. They often work together with, rather than in competition with, those from the more traditional public relations firms and consultancies. In any event, those acting for individuals who have reputational considerations, but who lack their own specialised in-house resource, are best advised to turn to one or more of these specialists at as early a stage as possible and integrate them into the client's team of professional advisers. Only through mutual work as part of an integrated team can properly informed consideration be given on the key issues of whether the client's reputation is at risk and, if so, how it can be best protected without adversely affecting his or her position in the ongoing investigation or proceedings.

98 Richard v. The British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) & Anor [2018] EWHC 1837 (Ch), paras. 248-251.

99 Ibid., para. 234.

100 Financial Conduct Authority v. Macris [2017] UKSC 19.

18

Individuals in Cross-Border Investigations or Proceedings: The US Perspective

Amanda Raad, Michael McGovern, Meghan Gilligan Palermo, Zaneta Wykowska and Sara Berinhout[1]

18.1 Introduction

There has been a consistent trend in the United States in the past decade towards increased prosecution of individuals in white-collar cases, including for financial fraud and foreign corruption offences. Following widespread criticism after the 2008 financial crises for failing to criminally charge individual wrongdoers, the US Department of Justice (DOJ) implemented a policy shift towards individual accountability, focusing on prosecuting individuals responsible for corporate misconduct and financial fraud.[2]

Three years into the Trump administration, the DOJ and the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) continue to focus on prosecuting and charging individuals in white-collar cases.[3] The number of individuals prosecuted by the

1 Amanda Raad and Michael McGovern are partners, and Meghan Gilligan Palermo, Zaneta Wykowska and Sara Berinhout are associates, at Ropes & Gray LLP.

2 Beginning with the 'Yates Memo', issued in late 2015 by former US Deputy Attorney General Sally Yates, the DOJ instituted a policy emphasising the need for US prosecutors to pursue prosecutions of individuals involved in corporate wrongdoing. To effectuate this policy, the Yates Memo mandated that, for a company to receive any co-operation credit, it must provide the DOJ with 'all relevant facts about the individuals involved in corporate misconduct' in both criminal and civil cases, regardless of the level of their involvement in the alleged misconduct. See Memorandum from Sally Quillian Yates, Deputy Att'y Gen., U.S. Dep't of Justice, Individual Accountability for Corporate Wrongdoing (9 September 2015), https://www.justice.gov/dag/file/769036/download.

3 In recent years, the DOJ has relaxed the rigid requirements of the Yates Memo, no longer requiring companies to identify every person with a role in wrongdoing, regardless of culpability level. However, DOJ policy still mandates that companies identify all individuals who were 'substantially involved in or responsible for the misconduct at issue' to receive any co-operation credit. In the civil context, the DOJ has implemented a 'sliding scale' approach where co-operation credit is

DOJ Criminal Division's Fraud Section substantially increased in 2018 over the preceding years, with 406 individuals charged.[4] And as with the ever-increasing globalisation of the world economy, white-collar enforcement against individuals is increasingly cross-border.[5]

For American white-collar practitioners, this means representing clients in all corners of the world as they navigate cross-border criminal prosecutions, civil enforcement actions and corporate internal investigations. Although there are important distinctions unique to each, many of the issues discussed in this chapter are common to all three. Counsel representing overseas clients will need to consider a host of additional issues, including jurisdiction, extradition and collateral consequences, to name a few.

Preliminary considerations 18.2

Arrest and bail 18.2.1

The first critical issue counsel face in criminal proceedings is counselling a client through arrest and bail. US authorities have various means for apprehending criminal defendants,[6] including arrest in the United States, arrest in a foreign jurisdiction and extradition to the United States, or using Interpol red notices to detain foreign individuals travelling abroad.[7] If a client is arrested abroad, counsel should immediately arrange for experienced local counsel. The availability of provisional arrest and bail pending extradition will depend on the laws of the arresting jurisdiction.

---

awarded based on the degree of co-operation. See Rod J Rosenstein, Deputy Attorney General, U.S. Dep't of Justice, Prepared Remarks for the 35th International Conference on the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (29 November 2018), https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/deputy-attorney-general-rod-j-rosenstein-delivers-remarks-american-conference-institute-0.

4 See U.S. Dep't of Justice, Criminal Division Fraud Section Year in Review 2018, https://www.justice.gov/criminal-fraud/file/1123566/download; U.S. Dep't of Justice, Criminal Division Fraud Section Year in Review 2017, https://www.justice.gov/criminal-fraud/file/1026996/download (301 individuals charged in white-collar cases in 2017 and 300 in 2016).

5 For example, one of the DOJ's headline cases in 2018 saw numerous individuals charged in a scheme to pay bribes to government officials in Venezuela in exchange for business with Venezuela's state-owned energy company, Petróleos de Venezuela S.A. (PDVSA), Press Release, U.S. Dep't of Justice, Five Former Venezuelan Government Officials Charged in Money Laundering Scheme Involving Foreign Bribery (12 February 2018), https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/five-former-venezuelan-government-officials-charged-money-laundering-scheme-involving-forei-0.

6 See U.S. Dep't of Justice, Justice Manual § 9-15.635 (2018), https://www.justice.gov/jm/jm-9-15000-international-extradition-and-related-matters (Justice Manual); see also U.S. Dep't of Justice, Justice Manual: Criminal Resource Manual § 611 (2018), https://www.justice.gov/jm/criminal-resource-manual-601-699 (Criminal Resource Manual).

7 For this reason, counsel engaged during the investigatory phase of a cross-border DOJ investigation should carefully consider the client's exposure to prosecution and risk of arrest while overseas. The client should be advised to carry counsel's contact details at all times. In some cases, and taking into consideration the client's home country, counsel may advise the client to refrain from international travel while the DOJ's investigation is pending.

Arrest in the United States presents its own difficulties. Counsel will need to arrange for the client to appear in US court and apply for bail.[8] In most cases, an overseas client will naturally wish to return home pending proceedings in the United States. However, the client's foreign status may be the very thing that makes it difficult to obtain a bail package allowing international travel. The court is more likely to find that the client poses a flight risk (i.e., a risk of fleeing the jurisdiction to avoid criminal prosecution) due to limited US ties. This concern is greater where the client has substantial financial resources or ties to a country that has not entered into an extradition treaty with the United States.[9] Counsel should discuss these risks with the client and obtain a complete understanding of his or her financial and personal circumstances to submit a bail application that mitigates flight-risk concerns. Even if pretrial release is granted, courts commonly impose a stringent set of conditions to guarantee the defendant's ongoing appearance. These conditions may include, for example, home confinement, restrictions of travel to certain countries or districts within the United States, confiscation of travel documents and electronic monitoring.

18.2.2 Preservation of evidence and maintaining confidentiality

Counsel must promptly ascertain whether the client has physical evidence relating to the matter in question. This may include emails, hard drives, text and instant messaging, financial records, and documentary evidence. Counsel should advise clients of the obligation to preserve and not destroy evidence, and consider whether to procatively collect and review such data.

Counsel will likewise need to preserve the integrity of the client's factual recollection. This includes assessing whether the client has discussed relevant matters with potential co-defendants or other parties. Clients should be advised not to communicate with any third parties regarding the matters under investigation and, in most cases, to cease communications with co-defendants entirely.[10]

18.2.3 Initial conversations with the client

Counsel should meet with the client to assess the facts and available evidence as quickly as possible. These early conversations will inform counsel's strategy for reviewing evidence, pursuing additional lines of inquiry, assessing strategic 8 Under the Bail Reform Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3142(b) & (c)(1)(B), US courts must order a defendant's pretrial release unless the court 'determines that such release will not reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required or will endanger the safety of any other person or the community.' Where a defendant is released, the court must do so 'subject to the least restrictive further condition, or combination of conditions that . . . will reasonably assure the appearance of the person.' On the other hand, a court must order detention if it 'finds that no condition or combination of conditions will reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required and the safety of any other person and the community.' Id. § 3142(e).

9 See, e.g., United States v. Zarrab, 15-CR-867, 2016 WL 3681423, at *7 (S.D.N.Y. 16 July 2016); United States v. Epstein, 155 F. Supp. 2d 323, 326 (E.D. Pa. 2001).

10 Communications with such parties should be through counsel and only pursuant to common interest privilege.

options, identifying potential common interest discussions[11] and determining what resources are needed,[12] such as specialised counsel.[13]

Extradition 18.3

It is of increasing importance that counsel representing individuals in cross-border proceedings have, at a minimum, working knowledge of extradition law given the frequency with which extradition issues arise. In 2019, the United States continued the trend of recent decades of aggressively pursuing extradition, including in white-collar cross-border proceedings involving Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA), money laundering, and securities and commodities law violations.[14]

Applicable law 18.3.1

The US government often is able to secure the presence of a criminal defendant for trial only with the assistance of foreign authorities. While there are technically no limitations on US authorities' ability to seek extradition of individuals abroad, the United States typically does so through extradition requests made pursuant to a treaty.

Extradition treaties form the basis for extradition law and procedure. Signatory states agree to extradite individuals within their jurisdiction who have been charged with an extraditable offence to the requesting state for trial and punishment.[15] Each treaty specifically defines which offences are 'extraditable'.[16] Most modern treaties permit extradition where the alleged conduct is criminal and

11 See id.

12 Initial discussions with the client should include a detailed and candid conversation about the client's financial resources, goals for how those resources are deployed and the availability, if any, of insurance coverage. Litigating criminal actions has grown increasingly expensive in recent decades. Counsel should ensure that the client has a complete understanding of the resources necessary to defend the case, particularly if the client fights the charges and all the more so if the client is self-funding the representation. Where a client is able to be covered under a 'D&O' (directors and officers) policy or similar liability insurance, counsel may advise the client to retain specialised insurance counsel to assist in obtaining and understanding potential limitations on coverage, for example, policy provisions allowing the insurer to claw back legal fees if the client later pleads or is found guilty of criminal charges.

13 In all cases, it is important to consider at the outset the need for other counsel, including employment counsel, extradition counsel, regulatory counsel or counsel specialising in the privacy laws of the relevant jurisdiction.

14 Bruce Zagaris, International White Collar Crime: Cases and Materials 413 (2d ed. 2015), https://www.cambridge.org/core/books/international-white-collar-crime/extradition-and-alternatives/ A89CB30F7457E4EFCD81B046DB0833A5 ('According to the Department of State, U.S. courts certified 137 extradition requests between 1945 and 1960 – an average of only 9 per year. In 1995, in contrast, the U.S. extradited 79 people to other countries and received custody of 131.').

15 See Ronald J Hedges, Federal Judicial Center International Litigation Guide: International Extradition: A Guide for Judges 1, 4 (2014), https://www.fjc.gov/sites/default/files/2014/International-Extradition-Guide-Hedges-FJC-2014.pdf.

16 For instance, the treaty between Albania and the United States includes an inventory of more than two dozen crimes. Extradition Treaty, Alb.-U.S., art. 2, 1 March 1933, 49 Stat. 3313.

punishable as a felony in the signatory states (the 'dual criminality' approach).[17] Treaties may also specify which offences are not extraditable, for example military offences or those punishable by death.[18] Other common provisions include prohibitions on double jeopardy, limitation periods and restrictions on the extradition of nationals.[19]

To date, co-operation has bilateral extradition treaties with approximately two-thirds (over 100) of the world's nations[20] and is party to two multilateral extradition agreements.[21]

18.3.2 Extradition procedure

Extradition procedure is determined by treaty, the responding state's extradition laws, and considerations of diplomacy and foreign policy. Typically, US authorities must first obtain approval from the DOJ's Office of International Affairs (OIA).[22] The OIA advises prosecutors regarding what filings are required under the applicable treaty, and the US Department of State issues a formal request to 17 Justice Manual, supra note 6, § 9-15.635 (2018); see also Criminal Resource Manual, supra note 6, § 603.

18 See, e.g., Extradition Treaty, U.K.-U.S., art. 4(1)-(2), 31 March 2003, T.I.A.S. 07-426 (UK Extradition Treaty).

19 Historically, the most common extradition treaty provision provided that signatory countries were not required to extradite their own citizens. See M Cherif Bassiouni, International Extradition: United States Law and Practice 746 (6th ed. 2014). This practice has evolved, however, and many modern treaties contain provisions either prohibiting signatory countries from denying extradition on the basis of nationality, or providing that denial on the basis of nationality is permissible only if the case is referred to local authorities for prosecution. See, e.g., U.K. Extradition Treaty, supra note 18, art. 3; Extradition Treaty, Peru-U.S., art. 3, 26 July 2001, T.I.A.S. 03-825; Extradition Treaty, Belize-U.S., art. 3, 30 March 2000, T.I.A.S. 13089; Extradition Treaty, Para.-U.S., art. 3, 9 November 1998, T.I.A.S. 12995; Extradition Treaty, S. Kor.-U.S., art. 3, 9 June 1998, T.I.A.S. 12962; Extradition Treaty, Pol.-U.S., art. 4, 10 July 1996, T.I.A.S. 99-917. Certain countries do, however, continue to prohibit extradition of their nationals but retain the discretion to do so. See, e.g., Extradition Treaty, Fr.-U.S., art. 3(1), 23 April 1996, T.I.A.S. 02-201 (France Extradition Treaty); Extradition Treaty, Ger.-U.S., art. 7(1), 20 June 1978, 32 U.S.T. 1485.

20 See U.S. Dep't of State, Treaties in Force: A List of Treaties and Other International Agreements of the U.S. in Force on January 1, 2019, https://www.state.gov/wp-content/uploads/2019/06/2019-TIF-Bilaterals-6.13.2019-web-version.pdf.

21 See Inter-American Convention on Extradition, 26 December 1933, 49 Stat. 3111 https://www.oas.org/juridico/MLA/en/Treaties/en_Conve_Extra_Inter_American_1933_Montevideo.pdf; Extradition Agreement, European Union-U.S., 25 June 2003, S. Treaty Doc. No. 109-14, https://www.congress.gov/109/cdoc/tdoc14/CDOC-109tdoc14.pdf. In addition, the United States is party to several multilateral international conventions that further reinforce bilateral extradition treaties by binding member states to either extradite or prosecute individuals charged with particular offences. See, e.g., United Nations Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft art. 8, 16 December 1970, 860 U.N.T.S. 105; United Nations Convention against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances art. 6, 20 December 1988, 1582 U.N.T.S. 95.

22 Justice Manual, supra note 6, § 9-15.210.

the responding state.[23] The responding state's judiciary then determines whether extradition is permissible.[24]

The US government may also seek provisional arrest, namely a request to the responding state to arrest the individual pending submission of a formal extradition request.[25] The DOJ deems provisional arrests appropriate where there is a risk that the individual will flee the foreign jurisdiction.[26] The conditions under which provisional arrest is permissible, and the duration an individual may be held until a formal request is filed,[27] vary by treaty.[28]

The timeline for extradition to the United States varies depending on the circumstances of the case and the responding state involved.[29] On average, it takes more than a year from the time the formal request is made until the individual is surrendered to US authorities.[30] While US courts have held that the Speedy Trial Clause of the Sixth Amendment requires that extradition be sought as soon as the individual's location becomes known,[31] this has no bearing on how long it takes 24 Specifically, the presiding judge in the foreign jurisdiction will confirm the identity of the individual, that the relevant treaty and domestic laws support extradition for the alleged offence, that the complaint filed by the United States sets forth sufficient facts to support probable cause to believe that the alleged offence was committed, and that all other elements of the extradition request comply with treaty provisions. See Hedges, supra note 15, at 10-11. The individual is then provided an opportunity to challenge the validity of the extradition request on various factual and procedural grounds. The Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, Civil Procedure and Evidence do not apply in extradition proceedings. See In re Requested Extradition of Kirby, 106 F.3d 855, 867 (9th Cir. 1996) (Noonan, J., dissenting); Fed. R. Evid. 1101(d)(3); Fed. R. Crim. P. 1(a)(5). Accordingly, hearsay evidence and unsworn statements may be admissible. See, e.g., Haxhiaj v. Hackman, 528 F.3d 282, 292 (4th Cir. 2008); Zanazanian v. United States, 729 F.2d 624, 626 (9th Cir. 1984); Collins v. Loisel (Collins II), 259 U.S. 309, 317 (1922); Artukovic v. Rison, 784 F.2d 1354, 1356 (9th Cir. 1986).

23 Id. § 9-15.300.

25 All modern US extradition treaties include articles providing for provisional arrest. See S. Exec. Rep. No. 106-26, at 31 (2000) (report from U.S. Senate Committee on Foreign Relations); see, e.g., Extradition Treaty, Canada-U.S., art. 11(1), 3 December 1971, 27 U.S.T. 983.

26 Criminal Resource Manual, supra note 6, § 615.

27 Typically, once a provisional arrest is made, prosecutors have between one and three months to submit a formal extradition request. See Justice Manual, supra note 6, §§ 9-15.210, 9-15.230; see, e.g., Extradition Treaty, Canada-U.S., art. 11(1), 3 December 1971, 27 U.S.T. 983 (requiring release 'upon the expiration of forty-five days from the date of his arrest' if an extradition request is not received within that time).

28 If a client is taken into custody under a provisional arrest warrant, counsel likely will need to advise the client regarding bail, which may be sought in the responding jurisdiction while extradition is pending. Clients may need to mobilise significant resources and assemble bond guarantors to effectuate bail as quickly as possible. For this reason, too, it is essential that experienced extradition counsel in the relevant jurisdiction be engaged to navigate bail issues in the responding state.

29 Justice Manual, supra note 6, § 9-15.400.

30 Jonathan Masters, What is Extradition?, Counsel on Foreign Relations (11 April 2019), https://www.cfr.org/backgrounder/what-extradition.

31 United States v. Blanco, 861 F.2d 773, 780 (2d Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1019 (1989); United States v. Pomeroy, 822 F.2d 718, 720 nn.3-4 (8th Cir. 1987); United States v. Walton, 814 F.2d 376, 380 (7th Cir. 1987); see also Criminal Resource Manual, supra note 6, § 601-99.

the responding state to surrender the individual according to its laws or due to other considerations.[32]

18.3.3 Strategic options: litigating or waiving extradition

Key factors affecting the decision to litigate or waive extradition include:

- Strength of available extradition defences: The advisability of litigating extradition turns primarily on whether it can be resisted successfully. While there are several defences available to extradition, they are limited.
- Strength of evidence in the US criminal case: The strength of US authorities' evidence of the charged crimes is also relevant. If the evidence is strong and there may be viable extradition defences, attempting to defeat extradition may be the best (and perhaps only) way to avoid liability on the criminal charges.[33] If, however, the evidence is strong and there are no viable or weak extradition defences, it is advisable to consider how best to mitigate eventual liability in the United States, including by considering consent to extradition in the hope of obtaining a favourable plea offer and sentence.[34] On the other hand, if the 32 For example, extradition proceedings in the foreign jurisdiction may be susceptible to political considerations, which may influence the timeline for extradition and even whether it occurs at all. The US government's ongoing effort to extradite WikiLeaks founder Julian Assange from the United Kingdom is a prime example. After a long criminal investigation beginning in 2010, Mr Assange was charged by US authorities in 2018 with conspiracy and espionage related to the leak of classified documents. See Indictment at 4-6, United States v. Assange, No. 1:18-cr-111 (E.D. Va. 6 March 2018), https://www.justice.gov/opa/press-release/file/1153486/download. After spending seven years in the Ecuadorian embassy in London resisting extradition in connection with an unrelated prosecution in Sweden, Mr Assange lost the extradition case and Ecuador withdrew his asylum in early 2019. See Assange v. Swedish Prosecution Auth. [2011] EWHC 2849. He was thereafter arrested by UK authorities on a provisional arrest warrant in 2019 and faces an extradition hearing in the United Kingdom in 2020. Current political uncertainties, likely will impact whether Mr Assange is ultimately extradited to the United States. See John T Nelson, L'Affaire d'Assange: Why His Extradition May Be Blocked, Just Security (7 June 2019), https://www.justsecurity.org/64425/laffaire-dassange-why-his-extradition-may-be-blocked/.

33 This approach, however, requires careful consideration of the collateral consequences of successfully defeating extradition, including the possibility that the United States may bring new charges and initiate another extradition proceeding even after their first attempt at extradition fails. In addition, the client likely will be effectively prohibited from travelling to any country with which the United States has an extradition agreement because of the risk that the United States could initiate extradition proceedings in that jurisdiction.

34 Another consideration relevant to assessing the strength of the evidence is that a client is not legally entitled to discovery from the US government related to the underlying criminal charges until he or she makes an appearance in a US court. While the foreign court presiding over the extradition proceeding may have have discretion to grant discovery pursuant to its 'inherent power', any discovery obtained (if at all) will be limited in scope and nature. See Quinn v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 776, 817 n.41 (9th Cir. 1986); see also Oen Yin-Choy v. Robinson, 858 F.2d 1400, 1407 (9th Cir. 1988). Accordingly, in most cases, clients will not receive any discovery until extradited (by force or consent), making it challenging to accurately assess the strength of the government's evidence. Counsel likely will have access only to evidence the client has in his or her possession, information gleaned from co-defendants (pursuant to a joint defence agreement), and evidence provided by the US government, which is likely to be scant (or non-existent) if the client is resisting extradition.

client has a strong case to defend against the underlying charges, he or she may wish to waive extradition, fight the charges in the United States, and attempt to assert the rule of speciality should the United States later try to supersede with additional or more serious charges.[35]

- The client's goals: Clients may nonetheless prefer to defer extradition for personal, family or similar reasons, even if they are unlikely to succeed. For example, if the client has health issues requiring treatment, or wants to remain close to relatives, it may be prudent to litigate. Conditions of confinement may also impact the decision, for example, if the client obtains a favourable bail package in the arresting state, he or she may prefer to delay extradition to the United States, where bail conditions may be uncertain and conditions of confinement more difficult.
- Costs and resources: Litigating extradition is expensive and resource-intensive. Clients, especially those with limited resources, may wish to direct finite resources to fighting the underlying criminal case.

These considerations must be balanced against the risk that if the United States successfully extradites the client, authorities likely will view prior resistance to extradition as avoiding responsibility or purposefully delaying the criminal case. Both could negatively impact the disposition of the case, impeding an effort to secure bail upon extradition and foreclosing or limiting favourable plea offers, co-operation opportunities, or sentencing recommendations.[36]

If a client waives extradition, the procedure typically involves filing an affidavit of consent in the responding state acknowledging that the extradition requirements have been met.[37] Individual states may have additional requirements to perfect waiver. Not all treaties allow waiver, in which case waiver may be denied.[38]

Regardless of which option a client chooses, it is critical to retain extradition counsel in the responding state. Extradition proceedings have serious implications

35 US courts are divided on whether an individual defendant has standing to raise a 'rule of specialty' challenge. In some circuits, the defendant has the right to raise a doctrine of specialty challenge. See, e.g., United States v. Stokes, 726 F.3d 880, 889 (7th Cir. 2013) (collecting cases). Other circuit courts hold, on the other hand, that rule of specialty objections can be raised only by the sending nation, not the individual defendant. See, e.g., United States v. Suarez, 791 F.3d 363, 366-67 (2d Cir. 2015); United States ex rel. Saroop v. Garcia, 109 F.3d 165, 168 (3d Cir. 1997). Some of the remaining circuits take the middle ground, allowing the defendant to raise a rule of specialty claim unless the sending nation consents to the deviation, while others still have not expressed an opinion. See Stokes, 726 F.3d at 889 (collecting cases). See note 40 infra.

36 This risk is particularly acute for clients who are likely to become co-operating witnesses or plead guilty, as US authorities typically view resisting extradition as non-co-operation. For this reason, it is not uncommon for US authorities to require waiver of extradition as a precondition to co-operation or before they will even consider the client as a potential co-operating witness.

37 Hedges, supra note 15, at 8-10.

38 See Bruce Zagaris, U.S. Efforts to Extradite Persons for Tax Offenses, 25 Loy. L.A. Int'l & Comp. L. Rev. 653, 676 (2003) (US extradition treaties that entered into force prior to 1980 do not provide for waiver of extradition); see, e.g., Extradition Treaty, Austl.-U.S., 8 May 1976, 27 U.S.T. 957; France Extradition Treaty, supra note 19, art. 3(1).

for a client's liberty and involve multiple foreign jurisdictions. Experienced counsel is necessary to identify potential defences, attend court appearances, and communicate with foreign counterparts.

18.3.4 Defences to extradition

Defences to extradition are limited, as the responding state generally must grant extradition provided treaty requirements are met. Ultimately, the specific language of the treaty at issue and, in some cases, the laws of the responding jurisdiction,[39] determine which defences are available.[40] Common defences include:

See Chapter 17 on individuals in cross-border proceedings: the UK perspective

- Where the offence occurred: Historically, many treaties did not permit extradition for crimes for which the United States asserts extraterritorial jurisdiction.[41] Another example of the location of the alleged misconduct operating as a defence is found in the UK's 'forum bar', which has recently been successfully invoked in multiple cases. The majority of modern treaties now require extradition regardless of where the offence occurred or allow extradition provided that the signatory countries' criminal laws are compatible.[42]
- Nature of the offence: The next defence is whether the offences in question are extraditable under the language of the applicable treaty. For example, in dual criminality treaties, extradition typically is denied where the alleged offence is not a crime in the responding state.[43]

39 For instance, in the United Kingdom, local law provides several specified grounds for defending against extradition. See Extradition Act 2003, c. 41, §§ 81, 87, 13.

40 Defences that may be available to a client upon arriving in the United States for trial typically are not available at the extradition stage. For example, the foreign judge presiding over the extradition proceeding may refuse to admit evidence supporting a defence of insanity or alibi, which may be raised as defences to the underlying substantive offences in the US criminal proceeding. See, e.g., Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447, 462 (1913) (holding that the extradition magistrate properly excluded the evidence of insanity at the hearing stage); see also Shapiro v. Ferrandina, 478 F.2d 894, 901 (2d Cir. 1973). These defences are likely to be available only when the client arrives in the United States. Similarly, once a client has been extradited to the United States, he or she may assert the rule of specialty, which provides that defendants may be tried by the requesting state only for the specific offences for which extradition is granted. See United States v. Lopesierra-Gutierrez, 708 F.3d 193, 205–06 (D.C. Cir. 2013); United States v. Lomeli, 596 F.3d 496, 501 (8th Cir. 2010).

41 Criminal Resource Manual, supra note 6, § 603.

42 See, e.g., Extradition Treaty, Jordan-U.S., art. 2(4), 28 March 1995, S. Treaty Doc. No. 104-3; Extradition Treaty, Austria-U.S., art. 2(6), 8 January 1998, T.I.A.S. 12916; Extradition Treaty, Lux.-U.S., art. 2(1), 1 October 1996, T.I.A.S. 12804; Extradition Treaty, Hung.-U.S., art. 2(4), 1 December 1994, T.I.A.S. 97-318; Extradition Treaty, Bah.-U.S., art. 2(4), 9 March 1990, T.I.A.S. 94-922; France Extradition Treaty, supra note 19, art. 2(4).

43 See, e.g., UK Extradition Treaty, supra note 18, art. 2(1). This defence may be particularly relevant in the FCPA context, as many countries do not outlaw certain forms of payment to government officials that are prohibited as bribery under the FCPA. For example, in 2005, the US authorities indicted a Czech national residing in The Bahamas for participating in a scheme to bribe foreign government officials. Despite the existence of a U.S.-Bahamian extradition treaty, the Bahamian courts ruled that the defendant could not be extradited because the charges against him were for

- Procedural issues: Procedural defences may be available based on deficiencies in the extradition proceeding,[44] for example insufficiencies in the United States' filings such as a lack of signature or failure to produce the warrant.[45] Counsel also should consider whether any statute of limitations or double jeopardy defences apply.[46]
- Humanitarian considerations: Humanitarian defences may apply. Many states deny extradition where the requesting state may pursue the death penalty[47] or has inhumane prison conditions.[48] A handful of states allow individuals to assert lack of mental competency as a defence.[49] However, humanitarian defences often can be defeated by the US government by certain undertakings, for example agreement that the United States will not seek the death penalty.[50]

Appealing extradition orders 18.3.5

Although extradition orders typically are not appealable,[51] counsel should consult with experienced counsel in the responding state, as local law may allow for appeal.[52] Even if no appeal is made, the United States may file a new complaint acts that, if committed in the Bahamas, would not constitute a crime. See Superintendent of Her Majesty's Foxhill Prison & U.S. v. Kozeny, Privy Council Appeal No. 0073, § 53 (Judicial Comm. of the Privy Council 28 March 2012) (Bah.).

---

44 Justice Manual, supra note 6, §§ 9-15.240, 9-15.250.

45 Id. § 9-15.240.

46 These defences typically can be raised only where the applicable treaty specifically provides for such defences. See In re Extradition of Chan Seong-I, 346 F. Supp. 2d 1149, 1157 (D.N.M. 2004); United States v. Neely, 429 F. Supp. 1215, 1225 n.9 (D. Conn. 1977); Michael John Garcia & Charles Doyle, Cong. Research Serv., 98-958, Extradition to and from the United States: Overview of the Law and Recent Treaties 15–16 (2010), https://fas.org/sgp/crs/misc/98-958.pdf (citing extradition treaties that include provisions addressing lapse of time); UK Extradition Treaty, supra note 18, arts. 2, 5, 6; In re Ryan, 360 F. Supp. 270, 275 (E.D.N.Y. 1973), aff'd, 478 F.2d 1397 (2d Cir. 1973).

47 See, e.g., UK Extradition Treaty, supra note 18, art. 7.

48 For instance, in May 2019, a Dutch court suspended the extradition of an individual to the United Kingdom due to 'inhuman or degrading' conditions in a British prison. See Kaya Burgess & Jonathan Ames, Dutch court refuses extradition to UK's 'inhumane' prisons, The Times (11 May 2019), https://www.thetimes.co.uk/article/dutch-court-refuses-extradition-to-uk-s-inhumane-prisons-w9dvjkqpm.

49 Jennifer Piel et al., Determining a Criminal Defendant's Competency to Proceed With an Extradition Hearing, 43 J. Am. Acad. Psychiatry & L. 201, 202-03 (June 2015), http://jaapl.org/content/jaapl/43/2/201.full.pdf.

50 In 2001, for example, the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that it would not extradite two individuals who allegedly confessed to a brutal triple murder unless the Canadian government received assurances that the individuals would not be subject to the death penalty in the United States. Canada is entitled to seek such assurances under its extradition treaty. Extradition Treaty, Canada-U.S., art. 6, March 22, 1976, 27 U.S.T. 983.

51 Collins v. Miller, 252 U.S. 364, 369 (1920) ('proceeding before a committing magistrate in international extradition is not subject to correction by appeal'); In re Mackin, 668 F.2d 122, 127-28 (2d Cir. 1981) (citing over a dozen cases holding the same).

52 In the United Kingdom, for example, extradition decisions are appealable by both the individual and requesting state. Extradition: processes and review, Gov.UK, https://www.gov.uk/guidance/extradition-processes-and-review#extradition-from-the-uk-category-2-territories.

to begin a separate extradition proceeding if unsuccessful in the first. Courts have uniformly held that there is no limit to how many times the United States may renew an extradition request,[53] even when based on the same evidentiary facts as the earlier request and regardless of whether it was previously denied on the merits or procedural grounds.[54] Similarly, clients may always challenge an adverse extradition ruling by petitioning for a writ of habeas corpus in the United States.[55] The US court's ruling on such a petition is appealable,[56] and the court may choose to stay the foreign extradition proceeding during the appeal.[57]

18.3.6 Recent developments

2019 saw significant extradition activity. New extradition treaties took effect, including treaties between the United States and Serbia and Kosovo.[58] The US government also sought and successfully executed a number of extraditions.[59] In perhaps the highest-profile case of 2019, UK authorities provisionally arrested

53 See Collins v. Loisel, 262 U.S. 426, 429 (1923) (holding that double jeopardy does not apply to extradition decisions).

54 Renewed requests are generally heard by a different judicial officer and reviewed de novo. See Ahmad, 910 F.2d 1063, 1065 (2d Cir. 1990); In re Extradition of Mackin, 668 F.2d 122, 137 n.20 (2d Cir. 1981); Hooker v. Klein, 573 F.2d 1360, 1369 (9th Cir. 1978); In re Gonzalez, 217 F. Supp. 717, 720 (S.D.N.Y. 1963). Subsequent extradition requests may be based exclusively on evidence submitted in the initial request or supplemental evidence. See, e.g., Hooker, 573 F.2d at 1366 (government's renewal of its extradition request was valid despite its first request being 'denied following an extensive evidentiary hearing and full consideration of the merits of the case by an extradition court'); accord Mirchandani v. United States, 836 F.2d 1223, 1226 (9th Cir. 1988); In re Extradition of Tafoya, 572 F. Supp. 95, 97 (W.D. Tex. 1983); cf. Ahmad v. Wigen, 726 F. Supp. 389, 397 (S.D.N.Y. 1989), aff'd 910 F.2d 1063 (2d Cir. 1990); see also Ntakirutimana v. Reno, 184 F.3d 419, 423 (5th Cir. 1999); In re Extradition of Mackin, 668 F.2d 122, 137 n.20 (2d Cir. 1981).

55 See 28 U.S.C. § 2241; see, e.g., Ahmad, 910 F.2d at 1065 ('An extraditee's sole remedy from an adverse decision is to seek a writ of habeas corpus; the Government's sole remedy is to file a new complaint.'). The scope of habeas review is narrower than traditional appellate review and essentially limited to three inquiries: (1) the adequacy of the trial judge's jurisdiction; (2) whether the offence is covered by the relevant treaty; and (3) whether there was sufficient evidence to support probable cause. John T. Parry, The Lost History of International Extradition Litigation, 43 Va. J. Int'l L. 93, 97 (2002).

56 Criminal Resource Manual, supra note 6, § 622.

57 The writ of habeas corpus may be filed before an individual is extradited to the United States. However, the DOJ takes the view that '[t]he filing of the [habeas] petition does not automatically stay further proceedings, and in certain cases the government may go forward with the extradition if the proceedings are not stayed by the order of the [US federal] court.' Criminal Resource Manual, supra note 6, § 622.

58 U.S. Dep't of State, 2019 Treaties and Agreements, https://www.state.gov/2019-TIAS/.

59 Among others, the United States was successful in extraditing an individual from Kosovo under the new extradition treaty with that state for his alleged involvement in a multimillion-dollar securities fraud. See U.S. Dep't of Justice press release, 'Manhattan U.S. Attorney Announces Extradition of Kosovar Man for Securities Fraud Offenses' (26 August 2019), https://www.justice.gov/usao-sdny/pr/manhattan-us-attorney-announces-extradition-kosovar-man-securities-fraud-offenses.

WikiLeaks founder Julian Assange to face extradition to the United States.[60] Extradition for FCPA offences also continued to be active,[61] consistent with the DOJ's and SEC's increasingly broad view of their mandate to enforce the FCPA.[62]

Strategic considerations 18.4

There are a number of strategic considerations counsel must bear in mind in advising a white-collar client navigating a criminal, civil or internal investigation or proceeding. While certain of these considerations are common to all three contexts, others are particular to criminal actions or internal investigations.

Assessing the client's status 18.4.1

In all three contexts – criminal, civil and internal – counsel must first assess a client's status with respect to a current or potential criminal action (should one later be initiated). Individuals who come into the orbit of a US criminal investigation fall into one of three categories: witness, subject or target.[63] Counsel must 60 Mr Assange continues to fight the extradition case, which is expected to last years. See supra note 32; Isaac Stanley-Becker & William Booth, Julian Assange, expelled from his embassy perch, will fight extradition from jail, Washington Post (12 April 2019), https://www.washingtonpost.com/world/europe/julian-assange-expelled-from-his-embassy-perch-will-fight-extradition-from-jail/2019/04/12/d388584c-5cb2-11e9-98d4-844088d135f2_story.html. While the particular defences Mr Assange intends to raise are yet unknown, it is likely that he will argue, at a minimum, that the charges against him are political, rather than criminal, and therefore extradition would violate the U.S.-U.K. extradition treaty. Lauren Said-Moorhouse & Muhammad Darwish, Julian Assange starts extradition fight from UK prison, CNN (2 May 2019), https://www.cnn.com/2019/05/02/uk/julian-assange-extradition-fight-gbr-intl/index.html; see U.K. Extradition Treaty, supra note 18, art. 4(1). ('[E]xtradition shall not be granted if the offense for which extradition is requested is a political offense.').

61 For example, in May 2019, a Malaysian national previously arrested in Malaysia waived extradition and made his first appearance in US federal court to face charges for conspiring to engage in a multibillion-dollar money laundering scheme and violate the FCPA by bribing foreign public officials to embezzle billions of dollars from 1MDB, Malaysia's sovereign wealth fund. See U.S. Dep't of Justice press release, 'Former Banker Extradited from Malaysia to United States to Face Charges in Multi-Billion Dollar Money Laundering and Bribery Scheme Relating to the 1MDB Fund' (6 May 2019), https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/former-banker-extradited-malaysia-united-states-face-charges-multi-billion-dollar-money. Notably, the Malaysian authorities have described the defendant's extradition to the United States. as a 'temporary surrender' so that they might later pursue charges for similar conduct brought against him in Malaysia. See Matthew Goldstein, Former Goldman Sachs Banker Pleads Not Guilty in Malaysia Fraud Case, N.Y. Times, 6 May 2019 at B3, https://www.nytimes.com/2019/05/06/business/goldman-sachs-roger-ng-1mdb.html.

62 See generally U.S. Dep't of Justice & U.S. Sec. Exch. Comm'n, A Resource Guide to the U.S. Foreign Corrupt Practices Act 11 (14 November 2012); see also Should FCPA 'Territorial' Jurisdiction Reach Extraterritorial Proportions?, Am. Bar Ass'n, (8 November 2018), https://www.americanbar.org/groups/international_law/publications/international_law_news/2013/winter/should_fcpa_territorial_jurisdiction_reach_extraterritorial_proportions/.

63 Under federal law, a 'witness' is someone who authorities believe has information about facts relevant to a criminal investigation and that assist prosecutors in obtaining indictments against other individual or companies. A 'subject,' by contrast, is a 'a person whose conduct is within the assess the client's status to advise on strategic options, which will vary depending on status. For this reason, it is common for counsel to seek clarification from the DOJ regarding a client's status. However, even if a client is a witness, the designation may change as the investigation progresses. It is therefore critical to independently and continuously assess the client's exposure to advise on the relevant risks and strategic options.

18.4.2 Decision to co-operate

18.4.2.1 Co-operating with or defending a criminal or civil proceeding

A client facing criminal or civil prosecution must choose whether to co-operate with authorities or fight the case.[64] Co-operation may be an attractive option to reduce the potential sentence or financial penalties. But these potential benefits are not without risks. The client must understand the duties that accompany co-operation, including admitting criminal conduct, meeting with the government to provide information about his or her (and others') involvement, and potentially testifying against others at trial. The client also must disclose any other potential misconduct, even if outside the scope of the investigation, and be fully transparent about his or her finances. In determining whether to recommend co-operation, counsel should assess the quality of the client's information, its likely usefulness to the government's case, and the client's capacity for candour and ability to endure probing proffer sessions or trial.

Co-operation typically begins with attorney proffers, during which counsel 'previews' for the government the information that the client can provide.[65] The client will then typically meet with the government for multiple proffer sessions before entering into a formal co-operation agreement to resolve the charges. Client proffers should typically be conducted only after negotiating a proffer agreement, which provides limited protections from the government's future use scope of the grand jury's investigation,' i.e., someone who engaged in activity or conduct at issue in the prosecutor's investigation, but who the prosecutor has not yet determined participated in criminal activity. A 'target' is 'a person as to whom the prosecutor or the grand jury has substantial evidence linking him to the commission of a crime and who, in the judgment of the prosecutor, is a putative defendant.' Justice Manual, supra note 6, § 9-11.151.

64 The government often relies on co-operating witnesses in white-collar cases, both during the investigatory phase and also at trial, e.g., to explain otherwise complicated and document heavy cases. See, e.g., Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441, 446 (1972) ('[M]any offenses are of such a character that the only persons capable of giving useful testimony are those implicated in the crime.') Individual co-operators tend to be lower-level employees or those who are less culpable in the criminal conduct. In particularly complex white-collar cases, the government may rely on more culpable individuals to co-operate against the primary target of an investigation or a company involved in a criminal scheme.

65 During the attorney proffer, counsel should explain to the government counsel's understanding of how the client was involved in the conduct under investigation and outline the information the client will be able to provide to the government. The attorney proffer is a critical opportunity to assess how the government is likely to react to the client's testimony, identify potential risk areas, and potentially learn more about the government's evidence and theory of the case depending upon the prosecutors' questions and reactions.

of any statements made. In addition, before the proffer, counsel should advise the client that he or she cannot be forced to provide information to the government, discuss the consequences of voluntarily speaking with the authorities, and ensure that the client understands the limited protections and potential pitfalls of any proffer agreement.[66]

Clients co-operate with the hope, but no guarantee, of receiving a recommendation from the government for a reduced sentence. Practically speaking, this is delivered in a '5K1.1 letter' from the government recommending a lower sentence than would otherwise be imposed in exchange for co-operation (or 'substantial assistance').[67] Alternatively, clients may receive a deferred prosecution agreement (DPA), under which all charges are dropped after certain conditions are met.[68] A DPA is preferable to a 5K1.1 letter but is harder to obtain.

Many clients choose to co-operate after they have been indicted. In these circumstances, clients usually must decide relatively quickly whether to co-operate, as timeliness of co-operation and acceptance of responsibility will impact the government's plea offer, sentencing recommendation and, ultimately, the court's sentence.[69] Clients may have the opportunity to co-operate pre-indictment, though this typically requires that counsel be involved and proactively engage with the government from the investigation's outset. In these situations, clients may be able 66 The proffer agreement typically includes a provision that the government will not use statements made during the interview directly against the client. See United States v. Rosemond, 841 F.3d 95, 109–10 (2d Cir. 2016). However, the government may use the statements for other purposes, e.g., as a lead to obtain other evidence or, if the client later testifies at trial in his own defence, the government can usually offer into evidence contradictory statements made during proffer sessions.

67 Section 5K1.1 of the US Sentencing Guidelines enables the government to make a motion to allow the court to sentence a defendant below the applicable Sentencing Guidelines range. See Federal Sentencing Guidelines Manual § 5K1.1. In such motions, the government typically will set forth the nature, usefulness and significance of the client's assistance during the proffer process. To receive credit for substantial assistance, the client will at a minimum need to be fully transparent about his own illicit conduct and to provide information about other people involved in the criminal activity. The client may also be required to produce documents, participate in investigatory operations (e.g., wearing a wire to record conversations with other defendants or targets), or testify before a grand jury or at trial. Importantly, a 5K1.1 letter is no guarantee of a favourable or reduced sentence, as the court retains discretion to impose a sentence up to the statutory maximum. See Federal Sentencing Guidelines Manual § 5K1.1 (2018) (explaining that a court 'may depart from the guidelines' in the case of a defendant's substantial assistance to authorities) (emphasis added).

68 A DPA sets out certain conditions that must be met before charges in the indictment will be dropped. Such conditions typically include a fine, term of supervision by pretrial services, or community service. DPAs are typically available only after the client has provided substantial co-operation, including potentially acting as an informant. See, e.g., Enforcement of the FCPA – Criminal Procedures – Deferred Prosecution Agreements, 13 Bus. & Com. Litig. Fed. Cts. § 134:34 (4th ed.).

69 See Federal Sentencing Guidelines Manual § 5K1.1(5).

to resolve the proceedings through a non-prosecution agreement (NPA), in which authorities decline to bring any charges.[70]

Co-operation is not the right path for all clients. Several legal and personal factors may lead the client to fight the case. In those cases, counsel must carefully research and evaluate the client's likelihood of criminal liability and potential defences, including limitation periods and jurisdiction. It is also important to understand the client's personal, financial and family circumstances. Some clients who have a reasonable likelihood of successfully defending the case may nevertheless choose to co-operate because of the collateral consequences of a criminal trial.

18.4.2.2 Co-operating with an internal investigation

In advising a client on co-operating with an internal investigation, counsel should first assess whether the client is a current employee with a duty to co-operate under relevant laws, employment agreements or company policies.[71] If a client is a former employee, he or she nonetheless may be required to co-operate under the terms of any deferred compensation or separation package.[72] Counsel should advise all clients to consider the ramifications of not co-operating on employment prospects and their relationship with the company.

Counsel must also assess whether co-operation will jeopardise Fifth Amendment protections. While private employees generally do not have a Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination in internal investigations, the right applies where co-operation is compelled (e.g., threat of termination or economic consequence such as unpaid suspension), and the employer's actions are 'fairly attributable' to the government.[73] For example, earlier this year, a federal district court held that an employee's statements were 'compelled testimony' protected by the Fifth Amendment in an internal investigation conducted by his employer at the direction of an enforcement agency.[74] Accordingly, while a client cannot assert the Fifth Amendment in a purely internal investigation, he or she can likely do so where the investigation is conducted at the government's behest, the government 70 To obtain an NPA, the client usually must pay a fine and co-operate with the government. In exchange, the relevant agency will refrain from filing criminal or civil charges. In deciding whether to enter into an NPA, DOJ policy provides that prosecutors should balance the cost of forgoing prosecution with the need for the co-operation to the public interest. Justice Manual, supra note 6, § 9-27.600 (2018).

71 It is now commonplace for employers to write into employment agreements and internal policies a requirement that employees co-operate in internal investigations. Failure to do so can be grounds for disciplinary action, including suspension without pay or termination. It may be necessary to engage employment counsel to advise the client on co-operation obligations under relevant employment agreements, policies or labour law in the relevant jurisdiction.

72 Clients should be made aware that, even where no formal or legally enforceable co-operation obligation exists, employers may withhold deferred compensation or post-employment remuneration to incentivise co-operation with an internal investigation.

73 Garrity v. New Jersey, 385 U.S. 493, 497 (1967); see also United States v. Connolly, No. 16 CR. 0370 (CM), 2019 WL 2120523, at *10 (S.D.N.Y. 2 May 2019).

74 Connolly, 2019 WL 2120523, at *14.

has substantial input into the investigation or the government has effectively 'outsourced' its investigation to the employer or its counsel.[75]

See Chapter 10 on co-operating with authorities and Chapter 14 on employee rights

Finally, counsel must consider the criminal, civil or regulatory consequences of co-operation, including the possibility that the company will share the substance of the client's interview with criminal or civil enforcement authorities.[76] While the client's communications during such interviews are typically privileged in the United States, the underlying facts are not. Further, the privilege belongs to the employer,[77] and the employer may choose to waive privilege, including through self-reporting or compelled disclosure.[78] By the same token, counsel should consider the consequences of not co-operating, particularly in jurisdictions such as the United Kingdom, where FCA-approved persons have an positive obligation to co-operate and failure to do so could jeopardise licensed status.[79]

See Chapter 8 on witness interviews

Dealing with multiple authorities 18.4.3

Voluntary interviews 18.4.3.1

An additional consideration that often arises in cross-border proceedings is how evidence collected and statements made in one jurisdiction can be used by authorities in another. This issue is increasingly important because the United States is more frequently coordinating white-collar investigations with foreign authorities. It has also become common for foreign authorities to conduct parallel investigations into the same or related conduct, regardless of whether there is express coordination with US authorities.[80]

Counsel must consider what impact investigations and corresponding procedures in other jurisdictions may have on US proceedings. One key consideration in this respect is whether a client might waive Fifth Amendment rights by testifying in a foreign proceeding, opening the door for that testimony to be used against the client in a present or future criminal or civil proceeding against the 75 See id. at *11-14. On the other hand, if the company acted entirely on its own, the resulting statements are not 'compelled' by state actors within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment and are therefore freely usable by the government at any later point in time.

76 For example, counsel should carefully assess whether co-operation will increase the risk that a parallel criminal action is brought against the client by US prosecutors or by civil authorities in a foreign jurisdiction in which the client is licensed or regulated.

77 Company counsel likely will inform the client accordingly in an Upjohn warning at the beginning of any interview. See Upjohn, 449 U.S. 383, 394 (1981); Model Rules of Prof'l Conduct r. 1.13(f), 4.3. Counsel should similarly advise clients, particularly where they may provide information that could be used against them in a future enforcement proceeding.

78 The company may even decide to turn over the notes or summaries of the interview, or may be required to do so under the laws of the relevant jurisdiction.

79 See Statement of Principle and Code of Practice for Approved Persons, U.K. Fin. Conduct Auth., § 2.1A.3 (September 2019), https://www.handbook.fca.org.uk/handbook/APER.pdf (Statement of Principle 4 provides that '[a]n approved person must deal with the FCA, the PRA and other regulators in an open and cooperative way and must disclose appropriately any information of which the FCA or the PRA would reasonably expect notice') (emphasis in original).

80 See, e.g., infra note 81.

client in the United States.[81] Providing some comfort to clients who are compelled to provide testimony in foreign proceedings, at least one US court has held that the Fifth Amendment's prohibition on the use of compelled testimony extends to testimony compelled by a foreign authority, 'even when the testimony was compelled . . . in full accordance with [foreign] law'.[82]

Counsel should also consider whether a client's voluntary interview with a foreign authority would require discussion of subject matter otherwise protected by the attorney–client privilege and therefore waive privilege, permitting US authorities to use that information in their own proceedings. In these situations, it is often advisable to consult with local counsel to confirm the client's obligations and potential risks of refusing the interview request in the foreign jurisdiction.

18.4.3.2 Evidence obtained pursuant to mutual legal assistance treaty (MLAT)

If a client does not co-operate, US authorities may seek testimonial or documentary evidence via an MLAT request.[83] The MLAT process can be slow, taking more than a year between the time a request is made and the time testimony is taken or documents produced.[84] Although most MLATs permit the requesting authority to be present during questioning, the interviews are typically conducted by foreign law enforcement officials pursuant to local procedural rules. This means that certain protections available in the United States may not apply, for example the 81 U.S. Const. amend. V; see United States v. Saechao, 418 F.3d 1073 (9th Cir. 2005).

82 United States v. Allen, 864 F.3d 63 (2d Cir. 2017) (reversing convictions of two Rabobank traders who provided testimony to the UK's Financial Conduct Authority (FCA) in an investigation into LIBOR manipulation under threat of prosecution for non-cooperation under UK law, because the Fifth Amendment 'prohibits the use and derivative use of such compelled testimony in an American criminal case against the defendant who provided that testimony').

83 The United States has entered into MLATs or similar bilateral agreements with approximately 70 states allowing it to enlist the investigatory authority of those states to procure evidence. See Mark A Rush and Jared A Kephart, Lifting the Veil on the MLAT Process: A Guide to Understanding and Responding to MLA Requests (20 January 2017), http://m.klgates.com/lifting-the-veil-on-the-mlat-process-a-guide-to-understanding-and-responding-to-mla-requests-01-20-2017/. In addition, the United States is party to an agreement with the European Union that enhances mutual legal assistance mechanisms with EU Member States. See Mutual Legal Assistance Treaty, European Union-U.S., 16 January 1998, T.I.A.S. 12923. The DOJ's OIA, together with the Department of State, negotiates and implements MLATs, administers mutual legal assistance operations, and coordinates incoming and outgoing requests. Notably, unlike extradition treaties, MLATs generally do not require dual criminality.

84 See United Nations, Manual on Mutual Legal Assistance and Extradition (September 2012), https://www.unodc.org/documents/organized-crime/Publications/Mutual_Legal_Assistance_Ebook_E.pdf. For this reason, a request for mutual legal assistance to a foreign authority is often accompanied by a petition to a US court under 18 U.S.C. § 3292 to suspend the running of the statute of limitations during the pendency of a request. A court will grant the request if it finds by a preponderance of the evidence that an official request has been made and it reasonably appears that the evidence is or was in a foreign country. See, e.g., T Markus Funk, Federal Judicial Center International Litigation Guide: Mutual Legal Assistance and Letters Rogatory: A Guide for Judges 15 (2014), https://www.fjc.gov/sites/default/files/2017/MLAT-LR-Guide-Funk-FJC-2014.pdf.

right to counsel or attorney–client privilege. Accordingly, local counsel is essential to navigating the interview process in the foreign jurisdiction.

Counsel selection 18.4.4

A client must also select counsel, which entails deciding whether to engage independent counsel or pursue joint or pool counsel representation with counsel for an employer or colleagues, or both.

Where the representation relates to a client's current or former employment, many employers encourage retaining company counsel, particularly when the client is a current employee. For purely internal investigations, or where there is no indication of individual wrongdoing, an employee may not feel the need for counsel or may be happy working with company counsel. While joint representation by company counsel is often the most expedient and economical choice for employers, company counsel is not always the right choice for the client and ultimately may be problematic for the company. The opportunity for conflicts to arise in a joint representation is substantial, particularly where the client may give testimony contradicting the employer's position or creating liability for the employer.[85] For former employees, the risk of conflict is even more acute, as employee–employer interests are even less likely to be aligned. If clients elect not to co-operate, they will have no choice but to appoint independent counsel, owing to the inherent conflict created.[86]

A client may alternatively choose to appoint pool counsel, wherein the client is represented along with several other clients by one counsel. Pool counsel is an efficient way to provide representation for multiple employees while saving time and resources. It is typically appropriate when the clients are fact witnesses with minimal or no personal exposure, or fall into the same category (e.g., former employees); the subject of the interviews is likely to be similar; or the investigation is expected to be finite. Pool counsel is not appropriate when clients may contradict or give testimony creating liability for one another. Pool counsel must vigilantly monitor for conflicts and ensure that each client is aware of the duty owed to the others. To this end, clients should be counselled about the potential conflicts and 85 See also Model Rules of Prof'l Conduct r. 1.13 cmt. (Am. Bar Ass'n 2018) (providing that investigating counsel should advise employees whose interests may be adverse to the corporation that he or she 'may wish to obtain independent representation').

86 Counsel should also bear in mind that US authorities may take a dim view of joint representation, questioning the independence of the client's testimony or, at the most extreme, alleging that a conflict has arisen and insisting that independent counsel be retained.

See Chapter 16 on representing individuals in interviews privilege implications[87] of pool counsel, and engagement letters should require clients' informed consent to the arrangement.[88]

Regardless of the type of counsel selected, clients should also consider whether to engage specialised counsel, such as employment counsel to advise on co-operation obligations under applicable labour law or employment agreements, or counsel specialising in the law of the foreign jurisdiction, for example in jurisdictions with stringent privacy laws or circumscribed attorney–client privilege protections.

18.4.5 Impact of company settlement

Counsel must consider the impact of a company's settlement or plea agreement, which may name individual employees, reference employee conduct or admit facts implicating individual employees. The risk that a company names individual employees is particularly acute given the DOJ's policy requiring companies to report misconduct by individual wrongdoers to receive co-operation credit. Counsel should advise clients that a company's settlement or plea agreement with enforcement authorities does not necessarily extinguish potential criminal liability for the client, nor does it eliminate the potential for claims in separate civil litigation, for example a shareholder derivative suit.

See Chapters 10 on co-operating with authorities, 24 on negotiating global settlements and 34 on parallel civil litigation

87 While '[a]n employee's cooperation in an internal investigation alone is not sufficient to establish a common interest', the privilege will be deemed waived where there is 'some form of joint strategy' among the parties. In re Grand Jury Subpoena: Under Seal, 415 F.3d 333, 341 (4th Cir. 2005) (quoting United States v. Weissman, 195 F.3d 96, 100 (2d Cir.1999)); see also United States v. Aramony, 88 F.3d 1369, 1392 (4th Cir. 1996) ('To be entitled to the protection of this privilege the parties must first share a common interest about a legal matter.'). Furthermore, it has become increasingly common for companies to include in joint defence agreements language that expressly allows the company to unilaterally disclose joint defence materials and information to other parties to the representation. See Ed Magarian and Surya Saxena, 'Joint Defense Agreements: What Is A Responsible Company To Do?', 22 Andrews Corp. Officers and Directors Liability Litig. Rep., September 2008, at 1 (2008).

88 In both pool and company counsel representations, counsel will need to obtain the client's consent to disclose confidential information to others in the pool and 'use' such information for the benefit of other clients (while maintaining the privilege to outside parties) under the joint defence privilege. Engagement letters also should clearly explain that pool counsel may use information provided by one client to zealously represent all clients in the pool (though information identified by a client as being confidential will only be shared with express authorisation). Relatedly, clients should be advised not to speak with any third parties about the substance of the investigation to preserve the integrity of the respective clients' recollections, and also because those communications will not be protected by the common interest or joint defence privilege. See, e.g., United States v. Austin, 416 F.3d 1016, 1021 (9th Cir. 2005) (joint defence privilege protects the confidentiality of communications 'passing from a party to his or her attorney' and 'from one party to the attorney for another party', but only 'where a joint defense effort or strategy' exists) (quoting United States v. Schwimmer, 892 F.2d 237, 243 (2d Cir. 1989)).

Evidentiary issues 18.5

Privilege laws across jurisdictions 18.5.1

A key consideration in cross-border proceedings is whether legal communications will be protected from disclosure to regulators and other parties. While in the United States these communications are protected by the attorney–client and work-product privileges, analogous protections are not always available in foreign jurisdictions.[89]

Additionally, in certain circumstances, US counsel's own communications with a foreign client may not be protected under US law. To determine whether such communications are privileged, US courts apply the 'touch base analysis', deferring to the privilege laws of the country with the 'predominant' or 'most direct and compelling interest'.[90]

Privilege protections may also diverge among jurisdictions with respect to communications with in-house counsel, an issue that typically arises in internal investigations. Under US federal law and the laws of each state, the attorney–client privilege applies equally to communications with external and in-house counsel.[91] In many European countries, however, the equivalent privilege applies only to written communications between clients and external counsel.[92]

Foreign privilege rules have a meaningful impact on the scope of materials and information available to investigating authorities and even counsel. It is therefore prudent to consult with local counsel to understand the scope of protections in the relevant jurisdiction.

---

89 In China, for example, there is no doctrine of legal privilege. Richard Bartlett and Yuan Min, A Lawyer's guide to working in China, King & Wood Mallesons (15 November 2017), https://www.kwm.com/en/knowledge/insights/a-lawyers-guide-to-working-in-china-20171113. And while the European Union provides for the 'legal professional privilege', it is comparatively limited, covering only counsel who are admitted to the bar in one of the Members States of the European Union. Patrick Doris and Steve Melrose, Privilege: European Union, Global Investigations Review. (12 October 2018), https://globalinvestigationsreview.com/preview_jurisdiction/1005270/european%20union?preview=1000391.

90 Cadence Pharm., Inc. v. Fresenius Kabi USA, LLC, 996 F. Supp. 2d 1015, 1019 (S.D. Cal. 2014). The country with the 'predominant interest' is either 'the place where the allegedly privileged relationship was entered into' or 'the place in which the relationship was centered at the time the communication was sent.' Id.

91 See, e.g., Swidler & Berlin v. United States, 524 U.S. 399, 408 (1998); see also Doug Gallagher, Manasi Raveendran, Attorney–Client Privilege for in-House Counsel, Am. Bar Ass'n (2017), https://www.americanbar.org/groups/intellectual_property_law/publications/landslide/2017-18/november-december/attorney-client-privilege-inhouse-counsel/. Privilege issues arise more often in the context of communications with in-house rather than external counsel because, for example, in-house counsel may often play the dual role of offering both legal and business advice.

92 Ava Borrasso, Privilege and International Implications against the Backdrop of the Panama Papers, Am. Bar Ass'n (20 July 2016), https://www.americanbar.org/groups/business_law/publications/blt/2016/07/12_borrasso/.

18.5.2 Foreign restrictions on information transfer

Many countries have data protection laws restricting extraterritorial transfer of personal and corporate information. The General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR), which came into force in 2018, effected significant changes in data privacy.[93] The data protection and transfer laws of some countries further restrict how data can be shared or used.[94]

The practical effect is that counsel may not be able to transfer data to the United States and will need to review relevant material in a foreign jurisdiction.[95] Similarly, there may be restrictions on the materials or information a client can disclose to US authorities in interviews or productions. Clients (and counsel) could expose themselves to sanctions for failing to comply with these regimes[96] and should consult local counsel to ensure compliance.

See Chapter 40 on data protection and Chapter 12 on production of information to authorities

18.5.3 Evidentiary considerations in internal investigations

In internal investigations, clients may be asked to provide documents, emails or other records to company counsel. Clients typically must comply if the materials were created or maintained in the course of employment, as they are considered the employer's property.[97] Failure to comply risks disciplinary action, termination

93 The GDPR imposes certain obligations on individuals, organisations and companies who are 'controllers' or 'processors' of personal data and restricts how they may process and transfer that data. If the controller or processor wishes to transfer the data to a country the European Commission has not deemed adequate, such as the United States, it must identify whether a sufficient basis, or 'derogation', applies under the GDPR and implement safeguards to ensure GDPR compliance. One such derogation applies when the transfer is necessary for the establishment, exercise or defence of legal claims, which commonly applies in the context of criminal or other regulatory investigations, where transfer of data is necessary for the purpose of defending the individual client. See European Data Protection Board, Guidelines 2/2018 on derogations of Article 49 under Regulation 2016/679, 11 (25 May 2018), https://edpb.europa.eu/sites/edpb/files/files/file1/edpb_guidelines_2_2018_derogations_en.pdf.

94 See, e.g., Schweizerisches Strafgesetzbuch (Swiss Criminal Code), 21 December 1937, art. 349.

95 See, e.g., Loi 80-538 du 16 juillet 1980 relative à la communication de documents et renseignements d'ordre économique, commercial ou technique à des personnes physiques ou morales étrangères (Law 80-538 of 16 July 1980 Relating to the Communication of Economic, Commercial or Technical Documents or Information to Foreign Natural or Legal Persons), Journal Officiel de la République Française, 17 July 1980, art. 1A (Fr.).

96 See, e.g., Swiss Criminal Code 21 December 1937, SR 757 (1938), as amended by Gesetz, 4 October 1991, AS 2465 (1992).

97 The law is not entirely settled on this issue. The critical inquiry is whether (1) the materials were created or maintained in the course of employment, and (2) the employee had a reasonable expectation of privacy with respect to the materials. See, e.g., Smyth v. Pillsbury Co., 914 F. Supp. 97, 101 (E.D. Pa. 1996) (no reasonable expectation of privacy in email communications made voluntarily over company email system even where employer told employees electronic communications would be kept confidential); but see Levanthal v. Knapek, 266 F.3d 64, 73 (2d Cir. 2001) (public employee had reasonable expectation of privacy in contents of office computer because, inter alia, employee occupied private office with closed door and had exclusive use of desk, filing cabinet and computer); Kellher v. City of Reading, No. CIV.A.01-3386, or being reported to authorities as unco-operative or obstructionist.[98] For this reason, too, clients should be counselled to carefully abide by any legal holds. Even if a hold has not issued, clients should preserve all potentially relevant materials to avoid even the appearance of potential spoliation.[99]

Notwithstanding the above, former employees may be able to assert the Fifth Amendment in refusing to produce incriminating documents to US authorities.[100] Current employees generally do not have this right.[101] Before turning over any documents to company counsel that may be shared with authorities, counsel should seek advice from local counsel regarding the client's (and counsel's) exposure for doing so under applicable data privacy or other local laws.

Finally, in most internal investigations, individual counsel is dependent on company counsel to obtain relevant materials. To this end, a cordial and co-operative relationship with company counsel is critical to facilitate information sharing.

See Chapter 16 on representing individuals

Asset freezing, seizure and forfeiture 18.6

Counsel should advise clients regarding the potential for asset freezing, seizure or forfeiture. In criminal proceedings, the DOJ may pursue criminal or civil forfeiture of tainted assets, that is, property derived from the criminal conduct, or substitute assets up to an equivalent value, if tracing the directly forfeitable property is impossible or the tainted assets are no longer available.[102] Criminal forfeiture 2002 WL 1067442, at *1 (E.D. Pa. 29 May 2002) (acknowledging that employee may have reasonable expectation of privacy in certain company email communications depending on the communication at issue and configuration of the relevant email system).

98 Note, however, that the client may have a cognisable claim that the materials are protected by the attorney–client or other applicable privilege. See e.g., Sims v. Lakeside School, No. C06-1412RSM, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 69568 (W.D. Wash. 20 September 2007).

99 Even where a company has not requested materials, it is prudent to advise clients to preserve any emails, notes or other documents that they believe may bear on the investigation. To assure adequate preservation, it may be necessary to engage a reputable third-party forensic technician to image or otherwise preserve the documents or data in question.

100 Former employees may claim an 'act of production' privilege in refusing to produce documents 'where the act of production is, itself, (1) compelled, (2) testimonial, and (3) incriminating.' In re Three Grand Jury Subpoenas Duces Tecum Dated Jan. 29, 1999, 191 F.3d 173, 178 (2d Cir. 1999). It is not clear, however, how a court might rule where the documents in the former employee's possession are deemed to be the company's property, e.g., where the employee took the documents upon leaving the employer without permission and/or in violation of company policy. But see id. at 182-83.

101 In Braswell v. United States, 487 U.S. 99, 102 (1988), the Supreme Court held that current employees may not claim the act of production privilege, even if those documents are incriminating against the employee, because the employee is an agent of the company and the records were in the employee's custody in his capacity as an agent. The Court did not address whether the outcome might differ if the records in question were personal to the employee or not maintained in his capacity as an agent of the company. In light of Connolly, former employees in an internal investigation conducted at the behest of the government might have an argument that the act of production privilege applies to them as well.

102 See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. §§ 981, 982; 21 U.S.C. § 853.

charges must be included in the indictment.[103] A criminal forfeiture order typically cannot be obtained unless the client is criminally convicted of, or has pleaded guilty to, a forfeiture offence.[104] In civil proceedings, the DOJ must file an in rem action, namely one against the property derived from or used to perpetrate the crime,[105] and usually seizes the property (with the exception of real property) before the court's entry of a civil forfeiture order.[106]

The DOJ also may obtain a pre-indictment or pretrial restraining order to freeze assets that have not yet been seized.[107] The SEC may similarly freeze assets through a temporary pretrial restraining order to ensure that funds for a future disgorgement order are available.[108]

If the assets subject to forfeiture are unavailable as a result of the client's act or omission, US authorities can satisfy the forfeiture order through substitute assets (other assets of the client of comparable value).[109] Counsel should discuss with clients the impact this may have on joint assets such as a home or other property shared with a spouse.[110]

See Chapter 31 on individual penalties

US authorities have increasingly sought to freeze and seize assets in white-collar cases involving securities fraud, bribery, money laundering and insider trading, even when the assets in question are located outside the United States.[111] 2019 was no exception to that trend.[112]

103 See Fed. R. Crim. P. 32.2(a).

104 See 18 U.S.C. §§ 982(a), 1963(e); Fed. R. Crim. P. 32.2(b)(1)(A).

105 See 18 U.S.C. §§ 983(a)(4), 984(a)(1), 985(c); see also 18 U.S.C. § 983(a)(1); 19 U.S.C. § 1607.

106 Id. § 985(b)(1).

107 Id. § 983(j). The government must have probable cause to believe the property constitutes proceeds of crime or was used during the commission of a crime. See 21 U.S.C. 853(e)(2). An indictment returned by a proper grand jury 'conclusively determines the existence of probable cause'. Kaley v. United States, 571 U.S. 320, 328 (2014) (citing Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103, 117 n.19 (1975)).

108 SEC v. One or More Unknown Traders in the Securities of Onyx Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 296 F.R.D. 241, 254 (S.D.N.Y. 2013) (citing SEC v. Unifund SAL, 910 F.2d 1028, 1041 (2d Cir. 1990)).

109 21 U.S.C. § 853(p).

110 See, e.g., United States v. Butler, 543 F. App'x 95, 97 (2d Cir. 2013).

111 The United States is a party to a number of treaties, as well as other formal and informal agreements, that provide for freezing or seizure of assets in foreign jurisdictions. See, e.g., U.S. Internal Revenue Service, Internal Revenue Manual § 9.7.10.1.2 (28 July 2003), https://www.irs.gov/irm/part9/irm_09-007-010#idm140235861363504. In addition, US authorities (and private civil litigants) may register seizure or forfeiture orders issued by US courts in foreign jurisdictions in hopes of enforcing those judgments abroad. See, e.g., Mutual Legal Assistance Treaty, U.S.-U.K., art. 19(2) 6 January 1994, T.I.A.S. No. 96-1202.

112 For example, in 2019, the DOJ announced the filing of a third round of civil forfeiture complaints in the 1MDB prosecution, bringing the total seizure amount over $1.5 billion. See U.S. Dep't of Justice press release, 'Former Banker Extradited from Malaysia to United States to Face Charges in Multi-Billion Dollar Money Laundering and Bribery Scheme Relating to the 1MDB Fund' (6 May 2019), https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/former-banker-extradited-malaysia-united-states-face-charges-multi-billion-dollar-money; see also supra note 61.

Collateral consequences 18.7

Counsel must be attuned to numerous collateral consequences of a cross-border proceeding. These include the potential for (1) parallel actions by other authorities (domestic or foreign), (2) follow-on civil litigation by shareholders or victims, (3) revocation or suspension of regulatory or professional licences or registrations, (4) difficulty obtaining requisite background or 'know your customer' clearance for employment or personal finances, (5) reputational harm and (6) immigration or travel consequences, particularly if the offence is deportable or where extradition has been defeated.

The human element: client-centred lawyering 18.8

Individual representations raise unique issues concerning client-centred lawyering beyond those that typically arise in a corporate representation. Criminal actions are particularly traumatic for both clients and their families, particularly given that most white-collar clients are interacting with the criminal justice system for the first time. While the luxury of time is not always available, counsel should strive to allow the client enough of it to process the situation before making any irreversible decisions.

Counsel also must be attuned to the impact of the proceeding on the client's physical and mental health. Preliminary discussions should cover these issues, as well as the client's support system. Engaging with the client's support system is essential at all stages, including fact gathering, assessing strategic options, deploying financial resource and determining resolution. For clients facing criminal proceedings, family support impacts all aspects of the case, from bail conditions to the sentence imposed.

Finally, counsel must be sensitive to the impact of the proceeding on the client's professional and personal reputation. Even if no enforcement action is taken, mere association with a proceeding – particularly if criminal – may so negatively impact the client's reputation that he or she is unable to work in the industry again or live in the same community.[113] Counsel should be prepared to advise clients on how to mitigate reputational risks and expect that these considerations will impact clients' decisions.

See Chapter 38 on publicity

113 Reputational concerns are likely to be heightened when the proceeding is high profile and the client faces media inquiries. While clients may wish to hire a public relations firm, any decision to engage a third party should be carefully considered in light of the fact that those communications are often not privileged and could adversely affect the outcome of the proceeding. See, e.g., Haugh v. Schroder Inv. Mgmt. N. Am. Inc., 02-7955, 2003 WL 21998674, at *3 (S.D.N.Y. 25 August 2003).

19

Whistleblowers: The UK Perspective

Jillian Naylor, Alison Wilson, Sinead Casey and Elly Proudlock[1]

19.1 Introduction

Recent years have seen an increasing focus on whistleblowing as a cornerstone of good corporate culture. By helping to uncover wrongdoing or errors within an organisation, effective whistleblowing procedures are integral to good governance and risk management. They allow problems to be identified early, providing an opportunity to rectify shortcomings and to prevent a crisis. Being aware of issues also allows businesses to manage market-notification obligations and public relations, identify poor performance and potentially avoid costly employment litigation.

The focus on whistleblowing as fundamental to good governance has been particularly evident in the financial sector, where a key feature of the Senior Managers and Certification Regime (SMCR) is a requirement for firms to appoint a 'whistleblowers' champion'. However, the role of whistleblowing has also been the subject of scrutiny outside the regulated sector. For example, a 2015 report into whistleblowing in the National Health Service (NHS) provoked a series of reforms aimed at ensuring that speaking up becomes 'business as usual' within the NHS. A principal aim of those reforms was to mirror the open reporting culture in other safety-critical sectors, most notably aviation.[2]

---

1 Jillian Naylor, Alison Wilson and Sinead Casey are partners, and Elly Proudlock is counsel at Linklaters LLP. The authors wish to acknowledge the contribution of Peter Binning, a partner at Corker Binning, and Elisabeth Bremner, a partner at CMS Cameron McKenna Nabarro Olswang LLP, for their contributions to a previous version of this chapter.

2 Freedom to Speak Up, Sir Robert Francis QC, February 2015. See http://freedomtospeakup.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/2014/07/F2SU_web.pdf.

While there is no general obligation on workers to disclose wrongdoing, certain categories of employee – particularly those in the regulated sector – may have specific reporting obligations to their employers or regulators. The Employment Rights Act 1996 (ERA), as amended by the Public Interest Disclosure Act 1998 (PIDA), provides protection to workers who blow the whistle by protecting them against detrimental treatment and (in the case of employees) from being dismissed for making certain specified types of 'qualifying protected disclosures'. Compensation for successful Employment Tribunal whistleblowing claims is uncapped. Such legal protections relate only to dismissal or detriment in an employment context and do not provide immunity from criminal prosecution where a whistleblower is implicated in criminal conduct.

Outside the financial services sector, there is currently no requirement for organisations in the United Kingdom to have whistleblowing mechanisms. However, the EU Directive on the protection of persons reporting on breaches of Union law (the Whistleblower Directive) was formally adopted in October 2019. Among other measures, the Directive – which Member States have until October 2021 to implement – will require organisations with 50 or more employees to establish internal reporting channels and respond to reported concerns within three months.[3] In addition, in July 2019 a report of the All Party Parliamentary Group (APPG) for Whistleblowing recommended the introduction of mandatory internal and external reporting mechanisms along with meaningful penalties for those who fail to meet the requirements across all sectors.[4]

The APPG has also urged the government to ban the use of non-disclosure agreements (NDAs) in whistleblowing cases.[5] The use of NDAs in settlements with employees has attracted considerable media attention in the wake of the #MeToo movement.[6]

The legal framework 19.2

Public Interest Disclosure Act 1998 and Employment Rights Act 1996 19.2.1

Whistleblowing legislation was introduced in 1998 following the realisation that a number of high-profile disasters may have been prevented or their effect reduced

3 Directive (EU) 2019/1937 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 23 October 2019 on the protection of persons reporting on breaches of Union law. Whether the United Kingdom remains under such an obligation will depend on the terms of its anticipated departure from the European Union.

4 See https://www.appgwhistleblowing.co.uk/.

5 Ibid., Recommendation 7 in the '10 Point Plan'.

6 See, for example, 'British #MeToo scandal' puts non-disclosure agreements in spotlight, The Guardian, Esther Addley and Dan Sabbagh, published 24 October 2018 (https://www.theguardian.com/world/2018/oct/24/british-metoo-scandal-puts-non-disclosure-agreements-in-spotlight) and NDAs: The Cause Of #metoo?, Forbes, Sarah Chilton, published 24 February 2019 (https://www.forbes.com/sites/sarahchilton/2019/02/24/ndas-the-cause-of-metoo/#7194cfc02de5).

if a worker had spoken up, or their employer had listened to them.[7] PIDA came into force in July 1999, inserting new sections into ERA. PIDA provides two key protections: unlawful detriment (protecting employees and workers, including some LLP members[8]) and automatically unfair dismissal (protecting employees). There is no qualifying length of service for bringing whistleblowing claims.

19.2.1.1 Unlawful detriment

Subjecting a worker to a detriment because they have made a protected disclosure is unlawful. Detriments include, but are not limited to, pay cuts, limiting career prospects and disciplinary action. Detriments after termination of employment also qualify,[9] so employers should proceed cautiously when drafting references.

19.2.1.2 Automatically unfair dismissal

Dismissing an employee who has blown the whistle is automatically unfair if the reason, or principal reason, for the dismissal is that they have made a protected disclosure. Since compensation for successful whistleblowing unfair dismissal claims is uncapped, compensation can be high – especially if the individual encounters difficulty finding a new job because of the dismissal.

19.2.1.3 Qualifying disclosures

Six categories of disclosure are protected as 'qualifying disclosures'. The disclosure must, in the worker's reasonable belief, tend to show that one or more of the following failures has occurred or is likely to occur:

- a criminal offence;
- breach of a legal obligation;
- a miscarriage of justice;
- danger to the health and safety of any individual;
- damage to the environment; or
- the deliberate concealment of information about any of the above.

Since 2013, to make a qualifying disclosure the worker must reasonably believe that the disclosure is in the public interest.[10] 'Public interest' is not defined, but in Chesterton Global and Verman v. Nurmohamed,[11] the Court of Appeal decided that the interests served by the disclosure do not have to extend outside the workplace. The Court found that four considerations are relevant:

- the number of people affected by the disclosure;

7 For example, the Zeebrugge ferry disaster in 1987, the Clapham rail crash in 1988 and the BCCI collapse in 1992.

8 In C*lyde & Co LLP v. Bates van Winkelhof* (2014) UKSC 32, the Supreme Court held that a former equity partner of a law firm incorporated as a limited liability partnership (LLP) was a worker under section 230(3) of ERA and therefore eligible to bring a whistleblowing claim against the LLP.

9 Woodward v. Abbey National Plc (2006) EWCA Civ 822.

10 Section 17 of the Enterprise and Regulatory Reform Act 2013 amended ERA at section 43B(1).

11 (2017) EWCA Civ 979.

- the nature of the interests affected;
- the extent to which those interests are affected; and
- the identity of the alleged wrongdoer.

Anything that affects a class of people could potentially be caught, so employers should take a cautious approach. It is possible that 'everyday' employment disputes over contractual terms will have a public interest element, especially where these have serious implications or impact large numbers of people (for instance, remuneration issues in public limited companies and financial institutions). Issues such as discrimination or equal pay at work might also have a public interest element.

So long as the worker believes, acting reasonably, that the relevant failure has occurred or is likely to occur, they will be protected even if their belief turns out to be wrong.[12] However, for a belief to be 'reasonable' it must be founded in more than unsubstantiated rumour or opinion.

Since 2013, there is no longer any requirement for the disclosure to be 'in good faith'. However, if an employment tribunal upholds an employer's argument that a disclosure was made in bad faith, it has the power to reduce compensation by up to 25 per cent. Case law suggests that disclosures made predominantly for personal interest or with malice are not in good faith.[13]

Vicarious and personal liability 19.2.1.4

Vicarious liability

In June 2013, the Enterprise Regulatory and Reform Act 2013 introduced the concept of vicarious liability into whistleblowing law. It imposes vicarious liability on an employer for detriments caused to a worker by co-workers (and in some cases by agents of the employer) on grounds that the worker made a protected disclosure.[14]

The employer will have a defence if it took all reasonable steps to prevent the detrimental treatment. Having an appropriate whistleblowing policy and providing training to support this will be key to an employer's ability to evidence this.

Personal liability

Claimants can pursue individuals personally for liability arising from whistleblowing detriments. Doing so is often tactical. In Timis and another v. Osipov,[15] the employment tribunal and Employment Appeal Tribunal held that two non-executive directors were jointly and severally liable for the losses flowing from Mr Osipov's dismissal (totalling approximately £1.75 million).

12 Babula v. Waltham Forest College (2007) EWCA Civ 174.

13 Bachnak v. Emerging Markets Partnership Europe (2006) UKEAT/0288/05/RN.

14 Enterprise and Regulatory Reform Act 2013, section 19.

15 [2018] EWCA Civ 2321.

19.2.2 EU Directive and UK implementation

In October 2019, the Council of the European Union formally adopted the Whistleblower Directive.

Since the United Kingdom already grants whistleblowers comprehensive protection, for the most part the provisions of the Whistleblower Directive do not supplement the whistleblower protection already available under the UK domestic legislation. However, the following differences should be noted:

- organisations with 50 or more employees will be required to establish internal reporting channels for the reporting of breaches of Union law, to acknowledge receipt of a report within seven days and to respond to reported concerns within three months; and
- whistleblowers will also have the right to make an external disclosure to a competent national authority or, in limited cases, a public disclosure.

Member States have until October 2021 to implement the Directive. Whether the United Kingdom remains under such an obligation will depend on the terms of its anticipated departure from the European Union. Protect,[16] the whistleblowing charity, has urged the UK government to bring the new provisions into domestic law post-Brexit.

19.2.3 Non-disclosure agreements and whistleblowing

An NDA – a contractual commitment that a party (or parties) will keep certain information confidential – is a provision commonly included in settlement agreements between employers and departing employees. Under an NDA, confidentiality may attach to the terms of the settlement agreement and to the amount of any sums paid under it, as well as to the underlying complaints that the employee made. If the NDA is breached, the other party can seek damages for breach of contract.

In the wake of the #MeToo movement, the use of NDAs by employers has come increasingly under the spotlight and has been criticised, in particular, as a means of silencing whistleblowers. In July 2019, the APPG for Whistleblowing urged the government to ban the use of NDAs in whistleblowing cases.[17]

Any NDA clause designed to prevent a worker from making a whistleblowing disclosure is void under section 43J of ERA and therefore unenforceable. Seeking to rely on an NDA to prevent whistleblowing disclosures could amount to an unlawful detriment against the employee or worker, as well as risking additional adverse publicity if the issue becomes public.

See Sections 19.2.4 and 19.4.3

Firms authorised by the Financial Conduct Authority (FCA) are under specific obligations when it comes to settlement agreements with workers. Lawyers advising clients on NDAs must also consider their professional obligations.

16 Previously known as Public Concern at Work. See https://protect-advice.org.uk/.

17 See https://www.appgwhistleblowing.co.uk/.

FCA/PRA systems and controls requirements 19.2.4

Both the FCA and the Prudential Regulation Authority (PRA) expect firms to implement and maintain appropriate and effective internal whistleblowing arrangements as part of an effective risk management system.[18] The FCA's rules and guidance are contained in SYSC 18 of its Handbook, which applies to SMCR banking and insurance sector firms. SYSC 18 also serves as non-binding guidance to all other firms authorised under the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 (FSMA). The PRA's rules are higher level and found in Section 2A of the PRA Rulebook.

The SYSC 18 requirements fall into three categories:

- maintenance of appropriate and effective arrangements for whistleblowing;[19]
- appointment of a whistleblowers' champion;[20] and
- settlement agreements with workers.

Maintaining appropriate internal whistleblowing arrangements 19.2.4.1

While firms are required to establish, implement and maintain appropriate and effective arrangements for the disclosure of reportable concerns (including concerns related to suspected market abuse) by whistleblowers, neither regulator has prescribed what the arrangements should be. FCA guidance suggests that firms may choose to draw on relevant resources prepared by whistleblowing charities or recognised standards-setting organisations, such as Protect. The regulators recognise that whistleblowing arrangements may vary between firms[21] and that firms may use third parties to provide aspects of their whistleblowing services, with appropriate quality controls and monitoring.

The arrangements that a firm has in place should allow effective escalation of reportable concerns, including to the FCA and PRA. This requirement is aligned with PRA Fundamental Rule 7 and FCA Principle 11, according to which firms must deal with their regulators openly and co-operatively and disclose appropriately anything relating to the firm of which the regulators would reasonably expect notice. Beyond these broad principles, a firm's arrangements should:

- allow for disclosure to be made through a variety of means (for many firms this will mean through an online system, a telephone hotline, a third-party provider or a designated team);
- handle a whistleblower's request for confidentiality or anonymity;
- include reasonable measures to ensure whistleblowers are not victimised;
- provide feedback to whistleblowers on their concerns, where appropriate and feasible;
- include record-keeping of reportable concerns;

18 FCA Handbook, SYSC 18.3.1(1)R; PRA Rulebook Whistleblowing 2A.2(1).

19 FCA Handbook, SYSC 18.3.

20 FCA Handbook, SYSC 18.4.

21 Whistleblowing in deposit-takers, PRA designated investment firms and insurers – SS39/15 (Supervisory Statement, October 2015, updated July 2018).

- include maintenance of up-to-date whistleblowing policies and procedures that are readily available to the firm's employees;
- allow for the preparation of an annual report to the firm's governing body on the effectiveness and operation of the firm's processes;
- include training for employees, managers and those responsible for operating the firm's internal arrangements;
- include reporting to the FCA and PRA if firms lose an employment tribunal claim based on detriment suffered from making a protected disclosure; and
- ensure UK employees are made aware of the FCA's and PRA's whistleblowing services and that they can approach either regulator direct without first raising a concern internally.

19.2.4.2 The whistleblowers' champion

A key component of the SMCR is a requirement for firms to appoint a whistleblowers' champion with responsibility for ensuring and overseeing the integrity, independence and effectiveness of the firm's policies and procedures on whistleblowing. The FCA expects that this role will be filled by a non-executive director.[22] Assignment of specific responsibility for whistleblowing to a senior person – preferably the chairman – was a recommendation of the June 2013 report of the Parliamentary Commission on Banking Standards, Changing Banking for Good, and is consistent with the broader trend towards senior management responsibility in the UK regulatory regime. This is reflected both in the fact that the whistleblowers' champion is now a prescribed responsibility under the SMCR,[23] and in the guidance that the whistleblowers' champion should have a level of authority within the firm sufficient to carry out their function.[24]

The whistleblowers' champion is also expected to ensure that an annual report is presented to the board regarding the effectiveness of whistleblowing systems and controls. The FCA and PRA have not been prescriptive about how whistleblowers' champions perform their role, and have acknowledged that firms are likely to take different approaches depending on their structure and size.[25] In smaller firms, the whistleblowers' champion may choose to take a 'hands-on' role, possibly in concert with his or her support staff, receiving disclosures personally and taking responsibility for disseminating reports within the firm, tracking progress, making external reports, feeding back to whistleblowers where appropriate and reviewing settlement agreements. In larger firms, whistleblowers' champions are more likely to perform their function by delegating day-to-day operations to a dedicated whistleblowing function while retaining an oversight role. The PRA expects the whistleblowers' champion to have access to resources and information

22 FCA Handbook, SYSC 18.4.1(4)G.

23 FCA Handbook, SMF 13, see SYSC 24.2.6R.

24 FCA Handbook, SYSC 18.4.5(1)G.

25 Whistleblowing in deposit-takers, PRA designated investment firms and insurers – FCA CP15/4, PRA CP6/15 (FCA/PRA Consultation Paper, February 2015) sufficient to carry out their role.[26] In practice this is likely to include a regular suite of management information on the number and outcome of reportable concerns, as well as analysis or oversight of patterns in data – for example particular business units or offices in respect of which reportable concerns are more frequently raised.

Settlement agreements with workers 19.2.4.3

The FCA's rules require a firm to include in a settlement agreement with a worker a term making clear that nothing in that settlement agreement prevents the worker from making a protected disclosure. [27]

Competition and Markets Authority and whistleblowers 19.2.5

In exceptional circumstances, the Competition and Markets Authority (CMA) offers rewards of up to £100,000 for information about cartel activity. The rewards are provided at the discretion of the CMA subject to factors including the value of the information, the harm done to consumers and the risk the whistleblower has taken to provide the information.[28]

The CMA also operates a leniency programme according to which businesses and individuals who have participated in cartel activity may apply for immunity or leniency from financial penalties and immunity from criminal prosecution and director disqualification.[29] Complete immunity from sanctions might be granted provided the individual or business is the first to report and confess their involvement, they co-operate fully and there was no pre-existing investigation by the CMA.

Companies or individuals thinking about applying for leniency may, before doing so, approach the CMA for confidential guidance on a no names basis by calling the dedicated CMA's cartels hotline.[30] On 22 October 2018, the CMA launched its nationwide 'Stop Cartels' campaign, designed to encourage whistleblowing.[31] Following its launch, tip-offs to the CMA have risen by over 30 per 26 Whistleblowing in deposit-takers, PRA designated investment firms and insurers – SS39/15 (Supervisory Statement, October 2015, updated July 2018).

27 FCA Handbook, SYSC 18.5.1R. A pro forma clause is provided in SYSC 18.5.2.

28 The CMA's published policy on rewards for information about cartels is available at https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/299411/Informant_rewards_policy.pdf.

29 For guidance on applications for leniency and no-action in cartel cases, see the CMA's Applications for leniency and no-action in cartel cases (OFT 1495, July 2013).

30 The CMA will give its views, by which it will consider itself bound, provided the discussion is followed-up by an application within a reasonable time and provided the information given when the advice was sought was not false or misleading and there has been no material change of circumstance.

31 See https://www.gov.uk/government/news/cma-sends-tough-message-to-business-cheats-with-cartel-campaign.

cent,[32] with approximately 22,000 people having visited the campaign page.[33] However, the CMA's whistleblowing statistics from 2017 to 2018 indicate that only 23 cases required initial investigation or further investigation by the CMA.[34]

19.2.6 Serious Fraud Office and online whistleblowing

The SFO launched its whistleblowing service in 2011. Originally established as a telephone hotline, reports are now made electronically to the SFO's Intelligence Unit through its secure reporting form.[35] The SFO reporting service enables companies' executives, staff, professional advisers and business associates to provide information about cases of serious fraud, bribery or corruption – whether as a whistleblower or on behalf of a company making a self-report. Whistleblowers are initially encouraged to follow the whistleblowing procedures in their own organisation if they suspect wrongdoing in the workplace. If the whistleblower is not comfortable, or there are no procedures, then they should approach the SFO or another prescribed body.[36]

See Chapter 3 on self-reporting to authorities

Between 1 April 2017 and 31 March 2018, the SFO's Intelligence Unit managed 102 qualifying[37] whistleblowing disclosures. The SFO took further action in relation to 91 disclosures.[38] However, the take-up of cases for investigation by the SFO remains low, with only 10 criminal investigations opened in 2018.[39] In considering whether to authorise an investigation, the Director of the SFO will take into account the actual or intended harm that may be caused to the public, the reputation and integrity of the United Kingdom as an international financial centre or the economy and prosperity of the United Kingdom.[40]

Although there are means to report online via the SFO or National Crime Agency (NCA) websites, no single centralised mechanism exists to report bribery offences. To address this, the Home Office has committed to launching a new reporting mechanism for allegations of bribery and corruption in line with the 32 Sean McNabb, 'Working with us to tackle cartels' (CMA, 9 August 2019). Available at https://competitionandmarkets.blog.gov.uk/2019/08/09/working-with-us-to-tackle-cartels/.

33 CMA, Annual Report and Accounts 2018/19, page 17. Available at https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/818478/CMA_Annual_Report_and_Accounts_2018_19_web_accessible_proof.pdf.

34 https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/whistleblower-statistics-2017-to-2018/whistleblowing-statistics-2017-to-2018.

35 The 'Secure Reporting Form' is available at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/contact-us/reporting-serious-fraud-bribery-corruption/.

36 See https://www.sfo.gov.uk/publications/information-victims-witnesses-whistleblowers/#whistleblowers.

37 To qualify for inclusion in the report, a disclosure must relate to serious or complex fraud (including bribery or corruption), civil recovery of the proceeds of crime, civil recovery investigations or disclosure orders in relation to confiscation investigations.

38 See https://www.sfo.gov.uk/download/annual-report-on-whistleblowing-disclosures-2017-18/#.

39 Number of SFO Investigations, July 2019. Available at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/publications/corporate-information/freedom-of-information/.

40 See https://www.sfo.gov.uk/contact-us/reporting-serious-fraud-bribery-corruption/.

government's anti-corruption strategy.[41] How this will interact with existing reporting mechanisms remains to be seen.

Human rights considerations 19.2.7

Demonstrating respect for human rights is increasingly important for businesses. In recent years, there has been a proliferation of 'soft law' standards encouraging companies to manage more closely their human rights risks and impacts. The key development in this area were the UN Guiding Principles on Business and Human Rights (UNGPs),[42] around which there has been widespread business convergence since their endorsement by the UN in 2011. The UNGPs require that business enterprises 'respect human rights',[43] which means that they should avoid infringing on the human rights of others and should address adverse human rights impacts with which they are involved.

While business and human rights was previously the domain of 'soft law' instruments, we are increasingly seeing laws that require companies to report on their human rights risks and impacts. For example, section 54 of the Modern Slavery Act 2015 requires companies with an annual turnover of £36 million or more to produce a slavery and human trafficking statement for each financial year, either illustrating the steps the organisation has taken to ensure slavery and human trafficking is not taking place in any of its supply chains and any part of its business or confirming that the organisation has taken no such steps. Similarly, section 414CA of the Companies Act 2006[44] requires certain large companies to prepare a non-financial information statement containing information on a company's respect for human rights and a description of policies pursued by a company in relation to respect for human rights.

Businesses have realised that, to fulfil their obligations to respect human rights under the UNGPs and report effectively pursuant to these disclosure regimes, they need to conduct more extensive due diligence on their operations to understand their potential human rights risks and impacts. A properly functioning whistleblower system should enable human rights impacts to be identified, managed and (hopefully) remediated early and completely, preventing harm from escalating. Many companies have implemented whistleblowing policies to support the 41 House of Lords, Select Committee on the Bribery Act 2010, Report of Session 2017–19, 'The Bribery Act 2019: post-legislative scrutiny'. Available at https://publications.parliament.uk/pa/ld201719/ldselect/ldbribact/303/303.pdf.

42 UN High Commissioner for Refugees, Guiding Principles on Business and Human Rights, 2011, available at https://www.ohchr.org/documents/publications/GuidingprinciplesBusinesshr_eN.pdf.

43 UNGP 11, ibid., p.13.

44 Inserted by The Companies, Partnerships and Groups (Accounts and Non-Financial Reporting) Regulations 2016 published in 2016 as part of the UK Government's implementation of Directive 2014/95/EU of the European Parliament, commonly known as the 'EU Non-Financial Reporting Directive' or 'NFRD'.

management of human rights and supply chain risk, which is recommended in Home Office guidance.[45]

While whistleblowing can serve as a tool for identifying potential human rights risks and impacts, it is important to recognise the potential human rights consequences if the whistleblowing procedures do not contain sufficient protections for the whistleblower. This includes impacts on the rights to privacy and freedom of speech, which are protected under Articles 8 and 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights. These human rights are qualified, in that they need to be balanced against the public interest (or indeed the corporate interest) in identifying where human rights impacts have occurred and where laws may have been broken. The regulatory regimes governing the design and implementation of whistleblowing procedures are designed to balance these competing interests. However, human rights considerations should underpin the design and operation of an effective whistleblowing regime and used to resolve any ambiguity in the regulation.

19.3 The corporate perspective: representing the firm

19.3.1 Responsibility for whistleblowing among senior managers under SMCR

When representing a regulated firm involved in a whistleblowing investigation, regard must be had both to the firm's compliance with the systems and controls requirements outlined above and to individual managers' personal obligations under the SMCR.

The SMCR requires most individuals employed in the UK banking and insurance sectors to adhere to the FCA's and PRA's Individual Conduct Rules.[46] Senior managers must also comply with the Senior Manager Conduct Rules, while non-executive directors (who are not themselves senior managers) are subject to Senior Manager Conduct Rule 4 as well as the Individual Conduct Rules. At the time of writing, the SMCR was due to be extended to certain other financial services firms, including asset management firms and non-bank mortgage lenders, from 9 December 2019.

Certain individual rules may require the relevant individuals to disclose information to the regulators. In the context of whistleblowing, this means that information received via internal whistleblowing channels may, in turn, need to be escalated to the appropriate regulator.

19.3.1.1 Individual Conduct Rules

The FCA/PRA Individual Conduct Rule 3 stipulates that relevant individuals must be open and co-operative with the FCA, the PRA and other regulators with appropriate jurisdiction. The FCA's Code of Conduct Handbook (COCON) provides specific guidance as to what this rule requires.

45 UK Home Office, 'Transparency in Supply Chains etc. – A practical guide', p. 29. available at https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/649906/Transparency_in_Supply_Chains_A_Practical_Guide_2017.pdf.

46 See Code of Conduct (COCON) 2.1, FCA Handbook.

COCON 4.1.10 provides guidance that there is no duty on a person to report information directly to the regulator concerned unless they are one of the persons responsible in the firm for reporting matters to the regulator (although if a person takes steps to influence the decision not to report or acts in a way that is intended to obstruct the reporting of the information to the regulator, they will be treated as if they had taken on responsibility for deciding whether to report that matter).

Those operating a whistleblowing function will not therefore automatically assume direct responsibility for escalating reportable concerns to the regulator. However, firms should ensure that appropriate arrangements are in place so that those responsible for regulatory reporting are informed on a timely basis of issues likely to be of interest to the regulator identified through the whistleblowing channels.

Senior Manager Conduct Rules 19.3.1.2

The FCA/PRA Senior Manager Conduct Rule 4 requires senior managers and non-executive directors to disclose appropriately any information of which the FCA, PRA or other regulator with appropriate jurisdiction would reasonably expect notice (even where the regulator has not requested such information). While there is overlap between FCA/PRA Senior Manager Conduct Rule 4 and Individual Conduct Rule 3, COCON 4.2.26 makes clear that these are distinct obligations requiring proactive disclosure rather than just accurate responses to regulatory enquiries. COCON 4.2.28 clarifies that senior managers (or non-executive directors) need not report information outside the scope of their responsibility. However, once they become aware of the information (including through whistleblowing) they should make enquiries to satisfy themselves that it is being dealt with by the appropriate individual.

Approved persons 19.3.1.3

Until the SMCR is extended in December 2019, relevant individuals employed by firms outside the banking and insurance sectors will continue to be governed by the approved persons regime. Statement of Principle 4 of the Statements of Principle and Code of Practice for Approved Persons broadly reflects Senior Manager Conduct Rule 4, although the accompanying guidance differs slightly.[47]

Whistleblowing as part of adequate or reasonable systems and controls 19.3.2

Bribery Act 2010 and adequate procedures 19.3.2.1

Under section 7 of the Bribery Act 2010, a company can be criminally liable for failing to prevent bribery committed for its benefit by one of its associated persons.

See Chapter 28 on extraterritoriality

47 Statements of Principle are found in APER 2 and guidance in APER 3 and APER 4, FCA Handbook, Statements of Principle and Code of Practice for Approved Persons.

It is a defence for a company to show that it had adequate procedures in place designed to prevent bribery by its associated persons.[48] Guidance published by the Ministry of Justice suggests that such procedures are likely to include, among other measures, procedures for the reporting of bribery including 'speak up' or 'whistleblowing' procedures.[49]

19.3.2.2 Criminal Finances Act 2017 and reasonable procedures

Under sections 45 and 46 of the Criminal Finances Act 2017, a company can be criminally liable for failing to prevent the facilitation of UK or foreign tax evasion offences by its associated persons.

It is a defence for a company to show that it had reasonable prevention procedures in place. Guidance issued by HM Revenue and Customs (HMRC) suggests that such procedures are likely to include, among other measures, protection for whistleblowers (with no retribution).[50] In February 2019, HMRC launched an online reporting form for authorised representatives to self-report a failure to prevent the facilitation of tax evasion on the part of their organisation.

See Chapter 3 on self-reporting to authorities

19.3.3 Changing regulatory expectations

In November 2018, following its review of firms' whistleblowing arrangements in the retail and wholesale banking sector, the FCA published examples of good practice and areas for improvement with respect to policies and procedures, the role of the whistleblowers' champion and the annual whistleblowing report and training.[51]

The FCA noted that some firms had a clear policy and other arrangements for ensuring whistleblowers were protected against victimisation, both during and following an investigation. For example, one firm monitored employment records for 12 to 18 months after a reportable concern had been investigated, to identify victimisation. The FCA also commended firms that had a variety of reporting channels for employees to raise concerns, with one firm providing whistleblowers the option of giving their contact details to a third-party hotline provider instead of to the firm. In contrast, the FCA was concerned by incorrect statements on the part of some firms that employees must raise whistleblowing concerns internally before contacting the FCA.

Good practice observed in respect of the whistleblowers' champion and annual report included senior individuals being able clearly to articulate the importance of a 'speak up' culture; champions having a good understanding of their roles

48 Section 7(2) of the Bribery Act 2010.

49 Ministry of Justice, The Bribery Act 2010: Guidance, paragraph 1.7. Available at https://www.justice.gov.uk/downloads/legislation/bribery-act-2010-guidance.pdf.

50 Page 23. Available at https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/672231/Tackling-tax-evasion-corporate-offences.pdf.

51 Retail and Wholesale Banking: review of firms' whistleblowing arrangements (first published 14 November 2018). Available at www.fca.org.uk/publications/multi-firm-reviews/retail-and-wholesale-banking-review-firms-whistleblowing-arrangements.

and responsibilities, including providing independent oversight; one champion contacting whistleblowers to determine whether they had suffered adverse consequences or victimisation; reviews of effectiveness of whistleblowing arrangements by either the second or third line of defence or through third-party whistleblowing organisations; and staff surveys to ensure that employees knew how to raise concerns. The FCA did, however, find firms whose annual reports lacked detail or were still under development.

Good practices observed by the FCA with respect to training included the provision by some firms of separate training for managers and investigation teams. In the FCA's view, this approach helped to ensure that managers were equipped to provide the necessary management and support to those raising concerns. Good firms also provided training to senior leadership teams, especially where they were involved in assessing reportable concerns. At the same time, the FCA noted that most firms needed to improve the content of their training.

In May 2019, the FCA published its industry feedback with respect to wholesale banking.[52] It identified several practices as examples of 'encouraging' whistleblowing initiatives implemented by firms, including:

- engagement by managers and staff directly with a whistleblower to understand fully what he or she would like to achieve and make a sustained effort to manage appropriately the whistleblower's expectations;
- outsourcing of analysis on all whistleblowing cases to ensure fair and confidential treatment;
- detailed end-to-end reviews of the process for whistleblowing events involving all disciplines (e.g. HR, legal, compliance, business heads) to make it more transparent, fairer and quicker;
- creation of a 24-hour, multilingual hotline for anonymous escalations; and
- discreet monitoring for a minimum of three years following a whistleblowing event, to ensure a whistleblower was not treated badly as a consequence of their disclosure.

The importance of ensuring that a firm's systems and controls afford protection to whistleblowers was highlighted in the FCA and PRA final notices issued to Mr James Staley, Chief Executive of Barclays Group, in May 2018. Mr Staley was fined £642,430 following his attempts to identify the author of an anonymous letter received by Barclays. The regulators concluded that Mr Staley had made serious errors of judgement and had not acted with integrity or due skill, care and diligence as required by the Individual Conduct Rules. They also found that he had acted unreasonably and risked undermining confidence in Barclays' whistleblowing policy and the protections it afforded. Before the final notices were issued, Barclays voluntarily and successfully applied to be subject to special requirements until the end of 2020, made under section 55L and 55M(5) of FSMA. Under these requirements, Barclays must report annually to the FCA and PRA detailing any whistleblowing cases involving allegations made against its senior managers and any cases where Barclays has sought to identify any anonymous whistleblowers. It is also required to provide attestations about the soundness of its whistleblowing systems and controls and senior managers' completion of annual whistleblower training.

52 See 'Progress and challenges' Industry Feedback for 2018/2019 Wholesale Banking Supervision (FCA, May 2019).

As part of its continued focus on culture in financial services, the FCA is particularly interested where whistleblowing allegations are raised against those designated as senior managers or material risk takers, being those with the greatest potential to cause harm to a firm's customers or the markets in which it operates. A number of firms have undertaken to notify the FCA of such allegations immediately on receipt and before investigation.

Megan Butler, FCA Executive Director of Supervision – Investment, Wholesale and Specialists Division,[53] in correspondence with the Chair of the Women and Equalities Committee of the House of Commons, set out her views on firms' approach to handling of '#MeToo' or sexual harassment allegations. She confirmed that sexual harassment and other forms of non-financial misconduct (such as racial or homophobic harassment or bullying) can amount to a breach of the FCA's conduct rules, including the requirement to act with integrity, and that firms' whistleblowing arrangements should be able to deal appropriately with escalation of such concerns. She noted that the FCA would be 'especially interested if firms were systematically mishandling allegations or incubating a culture of sexual harassment'. Since the letter, the FCA has engaged directly with some firms to request that it be notified of whistleblowing allegations of sexual harassment or other forms of non-financial misconduct promptly – even before investigation. This raises challenges for firms in terms of how to ensure fairness towards senior individuals where as yet unsubstantiated allegations are received.

Outside the financial regulatory sector, listed companies are required under the UK Corporate Governance Code 2018 to ensure that members of the workforce can raise concerns in confidence (and anonymously if they wish). The board should ensure that arrangements are in place for the proportionate and independent investigation of such matters and for follow-up action.

Also of wider relevance, in July 2019 the APPG for Whistleblowing published its report on the UK whistleblowing regime. Among its ten recommendations for what it calls a 'radical overhaul' were the introduction of mandatory internal and external reporting mechanisms across all sectors, greater legal protections for whistleblowers and the creation of an Independent Office for the Whistleblower.[54]

53 Letter dated 28 September 2018, https://www.fca.org.uk/publication/correspondence/wec-letter.pdf.

54 See https://www.appgwhistleblowing.co.uk/.

Practical considerations 19.3.4

Effective reporting channels and protecting anonymity 19.3.4.1

A whistleblowing policy should detail the process of making internal disclosures and should be disseminated across the organisation through regular communications and training that encourage a 'speak up' culture. Small and medium-sized organisations might consider appointing a dedicated whistleblowing officer in order to foster an open working culture, whereas in larger organisations an anonymous whistleblowing hotline is likely to be more practical. Ideally there should be a range of channels through which disclosures can be made.

It is often the case that workers report concerns anonymously out of fear that they will be victimised should they be identified as raising such concerns. This raises broader considerations in relation to how employers foster a culture in which workers feel 'psychologically safe' to raise concerns openly. However, a 2013 report by the Whistleblowing Commission on the effectiveness of existing arrangements for workplace whistleblowing suggested that, if a worker raises a concern anonymously, the organisation should assess the anonymous information as best it can to establish whether there is substance to the concern and whether it can be addressed.[55] Employers should also be aware that attempts to identify whistleblowers may constitute a breach of the employer's obligations under the Data Protection Acts of 1998 and 2018 or the General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR).[56]

Conduct of the investigation 19.3.4.2

Internal investigations involving whistleblower allegations require particularly careful handling because of the reputational and employment law consequences that may follow if a whistleblower is not afforded the required legal protections. No investigation is the same, and the right approach will depend on the circumstances and facts. Isolated incidents of minor misconduct may be capable of investigation internally by a combination of the legal, human resources and internal audit functions, whereas allegations of systematic or potentially criminal conduct are more likely to require the assistance of external counsel. Where there is a whistleblower involved, it is often advisable to interview them at the start of the process – particularly if they are relatively junior. Consideration should be given as to whether to offer them independent legal representation.

See Chapter 5 on beginning an internal investigation

See Chapter 7 on witness interviews

Where possible the whistleblower should be kept informed about the progress of the investigation, although extreme care should be taken not to take any steps that might result in a loss of privilege or confidentiality. Expectations should be effectively managed and care taken not to promise outcomes that may not be deliverable. For example, there may be circumstances in which a whistleblower's

See Chapter 35 on privilege

55 The Whistleblowing Commission, Report on the effectiveness of existing arrangements for workplace whistleblowing in the UK (November 2013) (https://www.tuc.org.uk/sites/default/files/Whistleblowing%20Commission%20Report%20Final.pdf).

56 (EU) 2016/679.

desire to remain anonymous places constraints on the extent to which the allegations can be investigated.

19.3.4.3 Data protection

A whistleblowing process will inevitably involve the processing of personal data and so must comply with the GDPR. The United Kingdom takes a more relaxed approach to this issue than many other European jurisdictions, in part because of the statutory framework set out in PIDA. However, it is still important to ensure that the whistleblowing process, and any subsequent investigation, complies with the GDPR. Particular issues to consider include keeping the whistleblowing information secure and limiting access to it, setting an appropriate retention period, not collecting excessive amounts of personal data, being alert to the right of individuals to access a copy of their personal data and, at least in general terms, being transparent about the operation of the whistleblowing process.

See Chapter 40 on data protection

19.3.4.4 Interaction with regulatory obligations

Principle 11 / Fundamental Rule 7

Firms must deal with their regulators in an open and co-operative way and proactively disclose anything relating to the firm of which the regulators would reasonably expect notice. Information that comes to light via a whistleblowing report may therefore have to be escalated to the relevant authority. In accordance with the FCA's Supervision manual (SUP), firms must notify the FCA of matters having a serious regulatory impact. This includes, for example, any matter that could have a significant adverse impact on the firm's reputation.[57] As noted above, in the current regulatory climate there may be a regulatory expectation that whistleblowing reports against senior managers or allegations of serious sexual harassment or other forms of serious non-financial misconduct will be disclosed immediately. In other situations, it may be more appropriate for a firm to undertake an internal investigation before deciding whether notification to the regulator would be proportionate.

Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (POCA)

Depending on the subject matter of the allegation, those in receipt of whistleblower reports will need to consider whether the information disclosed raises potential money laundering issues such that the reporting obligations under POCA are triggered (for those in the regulated sector) or it is otherwise necessary to seek a defence against money laundering from the NCA to deal with certain property.

See Chapter 3 on self-reporting to authorities

Particular considerations for listed companies

When receiving whistleblowing reports, listed companies should also have regard to their disclosure obligations under the Disclosure Guidance and Transparency

57 See SUP 15.3.1R.

Rules (DTR) and the Market Abuse Regulation (MAR).[58] In accordance with Section 2.2 DTR and Article 17(1) MAR, for example, listed companies must disclose inside information to the market as soon as possible. To determine whether the information constitutes 'inside information' for the purposes of DTR and MAR, however, it is likely that the firm will first have to undertake an internal investigation into the allegations.

Cross-border considerations 19.3.4.5

Exchange of information in relation to whistleblowers or disclosures

See Chapter 3 on self-reporting and Chapter 40 on data protection

Data protection issues will need to be considered in the context of any transfer of data overseas.

Territorial application of UK whistleblower legislation

Recent case law has determined that a tribunal can only hear a whistleblowing claim against a British employer brought by an employee working abroad if there is a stronger connection with Britain or British employment law than with the country in which they are working. In Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) v. Bamieh,[59] the Court of Appeal held that an employment tribunal had no territorial jurisdiction to hear whistleblowing detriment claims brought by an FCO employee working in Kosovo against co-workers who were also employed by the FCO and working in Kosovo. The tribunal held that the focus should be on the relationship between the claimant and the co-workers rather than on the relationship between the co-workers and the employer. Moreover, the fact that the individuals concerned have a common employer is not sufficient to give the tribunal jurisdiction.

The individual perspective: representing the individual 19.4

Legal risks associated with whistleblowing 19.4.1

A decision to make a whistleblowing disclosure can have far-reaching consequences and requires a careful assessment of the legal risks. Despite the protections afforded by PIDA, whistleblowers may be exposed to the risk of criminal investigation or prosecution if they are personally implicated in the conduct disclosed. Those in regulated professions may be vulnerable to regulatory or disciplinary action by their regulators or professional bodies. Where the matter potentially spans more than one jurisdiction, individuals will need to bear in mind that different jurisdictions apply different standards in the protection of whistleblowers. Advice on local employment and possibly criminal laws should be sought where necessary.

See Section 19.2.1

Whistleblowers might also commit criminal offences in the course of obtaining information to support their disclosures. Such offences might include securing unauthorised access to computer material,[60] unlawfully obtaining personal data,[61] unlawful interception of communications,[62] theft or even fraud. Whistleblowers may also be vulnerable to civil actions for breach of confidence.

58 See DTR, FCA Handbook, Disclosure Guidance and Transparency Rules sourcebook.

59 (2019) EWCA Civ 803.

19.4.2 Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005: immunity and leniency

Where an individual faces criminal liability, they may be able to obtain immunity from prosecution. Section 71 of the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 (SOCPA) empowers most criminal prosecutors to offer an individual immunity from prosecution by issuing a written immunity notice. However, this power is used rarely and only in very exceptional circumstances.

As an alternative, section 73 of SOCPA provides that if an offender pleads guilty and offers assistance to an investigator or prosecutor, the sentencing court may pass a reduced sentence to reflect that assistance.

The historic reluctance by the SFO to invoke these statutory tools may be set to change following the appointment of Lisa Osofsky as Director of the SFO in August 2018. Ms Osofsky has publicly expressed an intention to make greater use of the powers contained in SOCPA,[63] though it remains to be seen whether this is achievable. The level of co-operation required to qualify for leniency is onerous and the risks to the individual are significant, particularly in cross-border investigations where there remains a risk of prosecution overseas.

See Chapter 17 on individuals in cross-border proceedings

19.4.3 Professional obligations

Those in regulated professions may have a duty to report certain information to the appropriate regulator. For example, FCA/PRA Senior Manager Conduct Rule 4 requires senior managers and non-executive directors to disclose appropriately any information of which the FCA, PRA or other regulator with appropriate jurisdiction would reasonably expect notice.

See Section 19.3.1

In March 2018, the Solicitors Regulatory Authority (SRA) issued a warning notice to legal professionals in relation to the use of NDAs,[64] which sets out the obligations that exist when a law firm is considering an NDA with a person who has made a complaint about misconduct within a law firm, or when legal professionals are advising clients on NDAs with individuals. The warning notice recognises that NDAs, including with employees, can legitimately be used to protect commercial interests and confidentiality and, in some circumstances, reputation. It also recognises that NDAs can operate to the mutual benefit of both parties and that the warning notice and the SRA's Standards and Regulations (replacing 60 Section 1 of the Computer Misuse Act 1990.

61 Sections 170 and 196 of the Data Protection Act 2018.

62 Section 3(1) of the Investigatory Powers Act 2016.

63 GIR Live Women in Investigations Conference on 12 June 2019. Report available at https://globalinvestigationsreview.com/article/1193967/osofsky-sfo-can-and-will-offer-immunity-deals.

64 See https://www.sra.org.uk/solicitors/guidance/warning-notices/use-of-non-disclosure-agreements-ndas--warning-notice/, as updated on 25 November 2019.

the SRA Handbook) should not be taken to prohibit the use of NDAs. However, it states that legal professionals (and those responsible for managing complaints within law firms) should ensure that they do not:

- use NDAs in circumstances in which the subject of the NDA may, as a result of its use, feel unable to notify the SRA or other regulators or law enforcement agencies of conduct that might otherwise be reportable;
- fail to notify the SRA of misconduct, or a serious breach of regulatory requirements, by any person or firm, including wrongdoing by the firm or harassment or other misconduct towards others such as employees or clients; or
- use NDAs as a means of improperly threatening litigation or other adverse consequences, or otherwise exerting inappropriate influence over people not to make disclosures which are protected by statute, or reportable to regulators or law enforcement agencies.

Inappropriate use of NDAs may constitute a breach of the SRA's Standards and Regulations (replacing the SRA Handbook) and lead to disciplinary action. The SRA's warning notice of March 2018 was echoed in the Law Society's practice note on 'Non-disclosure agreements and confidentiality clauses in an employment law context' published in January 2019.[65] This reiterates that NDAs cannot be used to prevent protected disclosures from being made to relevant bodies. It notes that whistleblowing in the public interest is a complex matter and that parties who wish to blow the whistle will often need professional help.

Practical questions 19.4.4

To whom to blow the whistle 19.4.4.1

An individual will need to give careful consideration to a decision to blow the whistle externally because this may result in the loss of statutory protection. To be a protected disclosure, the whistleblower must make a qualifying disclosure to an appropriate person or organisation.

In most cases, disclosures should be made to the employer. However, in some circumstances individuals may be protected if they disclose information externally.

Parliament has approved a list of 'prescribed persons' to whom a worker or an employee can make a disclosure, provided they believe the information is substantially true and concerns a matter within that person's area of responsibility. They include (but are not limited to) the SFO, the NCA, HMRC, the Health and Safety Executive and the CMA. There is no requirement to alert the employer beforehand.

Where the worker or employee reasonably believes a third party (such as a client or supplier) is responsible for the wrongdoing, they can report it to that third party without telling the employer.

65 See https://www.lawsociety.org.uk/support-services/advice/practice-notes/non-disclosure-agreements-and-confidentiality-clauses/.

Disclosure to other external sources (e.g. the media) is protected only if the individual believes that the information is substantially true and they do not act for gain. So, an individual who receives payment for a story to a newspaper will not be protected. Unless the matter is 'exceptionally serious', they must have already disclosed it to the employer or a prescribed person (or believe that, if they did, evidence would be destroyed or they would suffer reprisals). Disclosure to that person must also be reasonable.

19.4.4.2 Requests to sign an NDA

Any request to sign an NDA purporting to prevent an individual from raising whistleblowing concerns should be resisted and will be unenforceable.

See Section 19.2.3

19.4.4.3 Challenges to unfair treatment of whistleblowers

An individual who is a worker or employee and who is subjected to unfair treatment by their employing or engaging entity or by other employees or co-workers may have a claim in the employment tribunal against individuals and the entity.

See Section 19.2

20

Whistleblowers: The US Perspective

Daniel Silver and Benjamin A Berringer[1]

Overview of US whistleblower statutes 20.1

The US legal system contains a multitude of state and federal laws that protect individuals who report potential misconduct (whistleblowers) from retaliation for making the report.[2] Some of these laws protect specific classes of individuals, such as truck drivers,[3] nuclear engineers,[4] pilots[5] and miners.[6] Others relate to specific

1 Daniel Silver is a partner and Benjamin A Berringer is an associate at Clifford Chance US LLP.

2 The exact nature of this protection depends significantly on the statute that creates the protection. For example, the Surface Transportation Assistance Act states that 'no person' is allowed to 'discriminate' against truck drivers and certain other employees 'with respect to his compensation, terms, conditions, or privileges of employment' for making a whistleblower report. 49 U.S.C. § 31105. On the other hand, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act prohibits a broader range of conduct, but applies to a narrower class of employers. See infra notes 17 to 24 and accompanying text.

3 The Surface Transportation Assistance Act protects truck drivers and certain other employees from retaliation for reporting violations of regulations related to the safety of commercial vehicles. 49 U.S.C. § 31105.

4 The Energy Reorganization Act protects employees of operators, contractors and subcontractors of nuclear power plants licensed by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission from retaliation for reporting violations of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954. 42 U.S.C. § 5851.

5 The Federal Airline Deregulation Act's Whistleblower Protection Program protects employees, contractors, and subcontractors of air carriers from retaliation for, inter alia, reporting violations of laws related to aviation safety. 49 U.S.C. § 42121.

6 The Federal Mine Safety and Health Act of 1977 prohibits employment discrimination against a miner, representative of miners, or applicant for employment in any coal or other mine as a reprisal for making safety-related complaints. 30 U.S.C. § 815.

conduct such as motor vehicle safety issues,[7] violations of the Clean Air Act,[8] violations of the Clean Water Act[9] or violations of the Affordable Care Act.[10] Each of these laws is structured differently. As a result, the precise steps that a whistleblower must take to file a report, whether the whistleblower has a private right of action and the scope of protection may vary depending on the statutory basis for the whistleblower claim.[11]

20.1.1 The SEC whistleblower regimes

US securities laws protect whistleblowers who report potential misconduct by entities and individuals subject to regulation by the US Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC). This protection was originally created by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act (SOX) in 2002. It was then strengthened and expanded by the Dodd-Frank Act (DFA) in 2009, which created the Whistleblower Protection Program (the Program), pursuant to which individuals who voluntarily report 'original information'[12] about potential violations of federal securities laws are protected from retaliation and entitled to a financial award if the information leads to a successful judicial or administrative enforcement action in which the SEC obtains monetary sanctions over US$1 million.[13] The Program has been a significant success for the SEC. Since August 2011, the Program has received over 33,300 whistleblower reports from individuals in all 50 US states and 123 foreign countries.[14]

7 The Moving Ahead for Progress in the 21st Century Act prohibits discrimination by motor vehicle manufacturers, parts suppliers or dealerships against employees who provide information about any motor vehicle defect or violation of the Motor Vehicle Safety Act. 49 U.S.C. § 30171.

8 The Clean Air Act contains a provision protecting employees from retaliation for reporting violations of the Clean Air Act. 42 U.S.C. § 7622.

9 The Water Pollution Control Act contains a provision protecting employees from retaliation for reporting violations of the Act. 33 U.S.C. § 1367.

10 The Affordable Care Act protects employees from retaliation for reporting violations of certain of its provisions, including, inter alia, discrimination based on an individual's receipt of health insurance subsidies, denial of coverage for a pre-existing condition, and an insurer's failure to rebate a portion of an excess premium to customers. 29 U.S.C. § 218c.

11 Compare, e.g., 42 U.S.C. § 7622 (no private cause of action for whistleblower retaliation under the Clean Air Act), with 29 U.S.C. § 1132(a) (creating a private cause of action for the enforcement of ERISA provisions, including anti-retaliation provisions).

12 The US Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) has defined original information as 'information derived from your independent knowledge (facts known to you that are not derived from publicly available sources) or independent analysis (evaluation of information that may be publicly available but which reveals information that is not generally known) that is not already known by us.' SEC, Office of the Whistleblower, Frequently Asked Questions, https://www.sec.gov/about/offices/owb/owb-faq.shtml. The SEC has also stated that information from certain individuals, including attorneys and fiduciaries, may not be deemed original. See infra notes 73 to 75 and accompanying text.

13 See 15 U.S.C. § 78u-6. Dodd-Frank also imposed a similar regime under the Commodity Exchange Act. See 7 U.S.C. § 26.

14 SEC, 2019 Annual Report to Congress – Whistleblower Program, 22 to 25 (2018), https://www.sec.gov/files/sec-2019-annual-report-whistleblower-program.pdf [2019 Annual Report on Whistleblower Program].

In fiscal year 2018 alone, the SEC received over 5,200 whistleblower reports, including 479 (9.5 per cent) from foreign whistleblowers.[15] As a result of these reports, the SEC has instituted enforcement actions that have resulted in penalties of more than US$2 billion and awarded over US$387 million to 67 different whistleblowers.[16]

The Program rewards individuals for making reports pursuant to both SOX and the DFA whistleblower provisions. Under both statutes, individuals qualify as whistleblowers if they report alleged misconduct and have 'a reasonable belief that the information [they are] providing relates to a possible securities law violation . . . that has occurred, is ongoing, or is about to occur'.[17] A belief is reasonable if it is both subjectively and objectively reasonable; that is, the employee must have both 'a subjectively genuine belief that the information demonstrates a possible violation, and that this belief is one that a similarly situated employee might reasonably possess'.[18]

To satisfy the subjective component of this standard, the employee must have 'actually believed the conduct complained of constituted a violation of pertinent law'.[19] For the objective component, '[the] employee need not show that an actual violation occurred so long as "the employee reasonably believes that the violation 15 Id. at 22, 33. A significant number of the international reports came from Germany (44 reports), the United Kingdom (44 reports) and Canada (71 reports).

16 Id. at 1.

17 17 C.F.R. § 240.21F-2(b)(i). Prior to 2011, the Department of Labor applied a 'definitively and specifically' standard to claims under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act (SOX), which required that the whistleblower show that the conduct was definitively and specifically related to one or more of the laws listed in SOX. See, e.g, Welch v. Cardinal Bankshares Corporation, ARB No. 05-064, ALJ No. 2003-SOX-15 (ARB 31 May 2007) (Whistleblower report related to deviation from generally accepted accounting practices was not necessarily protected activity under SOX because an accounting deviation is not inherently a violation of the securities laws). However, in a 2011 decision, the Department of Labor clarified that the reasonable belief standard applied. Sylvester v. Parexel Int'l LLC, ARB No. 07-123, ALJ Nos. 2007-SOX-039 to -042 (ARB 23 May 2011). The SEC has stated that a reasonable belief is sufficient under either statute. See Implementation of the Whistleblower Provisions of Section 21f of the Sec. Exch. Act of 1934, Release No. 64545 (S.E.C. Release No.), Release No. 34-64545, 101 S.E.C. Docket 630, 2011 WL 2045838, at *7, n. 36 (25 May 2011) [DFA Implementation Release] (adopting the reasonable belief standard and noting that the SOX anti-retaliation provision has the same requirement). However, at least some courts still apply the definitively and specifically standard for SOX claims. See, e.g., Riddle v. First Tenn. Bank, 497 F. App'x. 588 (6th Cir. 2012) ('[A]n employee's complaint must "definitively and specifically relate" to one of the six enumerated categories found in 18 U.S.C. § 1514A'). But see Genberg v. Porter, 882 F.3d 1249, 1255 (10th Cir. 2018) (holding that the 'definitive and specific' standard used by the District Court was 'obsolete' and reversing grant of summary judgment for defendant based on that standard); Wiest v. Lynch, 710 F.3d 121, 131 (3d Cir. 2013) (adopting reasonable belief standard based on Sylvester decision).

18 Ott v. Fred Alger Mgmt., Inc., 2012 WL 4767200, at *4 (S.D.N.Y. 27 September 2012) (quoting DFA Implementation Release, at *7).

19 Welch v. Chao, 536 F.3d 269, 277 n.4 (4th Cir. 2008) (interpreting whether a plaintiff qualified for whistleblower status under SOX).

is likely to happen"'.[20] 'A belief is objectively reasonable when a reasonable person with the same training and experience as the employee would believe that the conduct implicated in the employee's communication could rise to the level of a violation of' the securities laws.[21]

While the standard for whistleblower status is similar under both statutes, there are also some material differences. First, there are differences in who is protected. SOX protects employees, contractors and subcontractors of publicly traded companies[22] and rating agencies from retaliation for reporting certain criminal offences (mail or wire fraud) or the potential violation of 'any rule or regulation of the Securities and Exchange Commission, or any provision of federal law relating to fraud against shareholders' either internally or to certain government entities.[23] The DFA, on the other hand, prohibits any employer from taking adverse employment actions against employees who report potential violations of the securities laws to the SEC.[24]

Second, there are differences in what misconduct can be reported. DFA protections only apply to whistleblowers who report potential violations of the securities laws, while SOX prohibits retaliation against whistleblowers who report potential violations of a wider range of laws.

Third, there are differences in the definition of retaliation. The DFA prohibits a broader range of retaliatory conduct. Pursuant to the statute, no employer 'may discharge, demote, suspend, threaten, harass, directly or indirectly, or in any other manner discriminate against, a whistleblower in the terms and conditions of employment because of any lawful act done by the whistleblower'.[25] The SOX prohibition is substantially similar, but it does not specifically prohibit indirect action against employees.[26]

Fourth, there are procedural differences in how whistleblowers must report the conduct. SOX specifically states that whistleblowers are protected against retaliation if they report misconduct internally to 'a person with supervisory authority 20 Stewart v. Doral Fin. Corp., 997 F. Supp. 2d 129, 137 (S.D.N.Y. 2014) (quoting Sylvester, 2011 WL 2165854, at *13).

21 Wiest, 710 F.3d at 132.

22 The Supreme Court has ruled that this protection extends to employees of a non-public company who report fraud against shareholders of a public company that receives services from the non-public company. Lawson v. FMR LLC, 571 U.S. 429, 440 (2014).

23 18 U.S.C. § 1514A. Judicial decisions have made clear that disclosures regarding third parties are protected activity. See, e.g., Sharkey v. J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., No. 10 Civ. 3824, 2011 WL 135026, at *5 to 6 (S.D.N.Y. 14 January 2011) (finding that the plaintiff properly pleaded that a report concerning a third-party client's illegal activity constituted a protected activity under SOX).

24 The Dodd-Frank Act (DFA) defines a whistleblower as 'any individual who provides . . . information relating to a violation of the securities laws to the Commission.' 15 U.S.C. § 78u-6(a)(6).

25 15 U.S.C. § 78u-6(h)(1)(A).

26 18 U.S.C. § 1514A(a) (identified classes of employers may not 'discharge, demote, suspend, threaten, harass, or in any other manner discriminate against an employee in the terms and conditions of employment because of any lawful act done by the employee').

over the employee (or such other person working for the employer who has the authority to investigate, discover, or terminate misconduct)' or externally to a federal regulatory or law enforcement agency, or to the US Congress.[27] The DFA, on the other hand, statutorily defines a whistleblower as 'any individual who provides . . . information relating to a violation of the securities laws' to the SEC.[28] Recognising that SOX whistleblowers – who can report internally – are also protected under the DFA, the SEC attempted to extend DFA protection to whistleblowers who report internally pursuant to SOX.[29] This interpretation, however, was unanimously rejected by the Supreme Court, which held that the DFA only protects employees who report misconduct to the SEC.[30]

Finally, there are significant differences in how a whistleblower can bring a claim for retaliation. SOX is enforced by the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA), which is responsible for investigating claims.[31] Once a whistleblower makes a claim, OSHA will conduct an initial investigation to determine if the whistleblower has made a prima facie showing that their whistleblower report was a contributing factor to an unfavourable employment decision.[32] If OSHA comes to this determination, the employer can then rebut the claim with clear and convincing evidence.[33] Once OSHA makes a final finding, either party may appeal to the Department of Labor's Office of Administrative Law Judges (ALJ).[34] The regulations then allow for limited discovery, after which an ALJ will conduct a hearing and render a decision.[35] The ALJ's decision can be appealed by the unsuccessful party to the Department of Labor's Administrative Review Board,[36] with further appeal to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the circuit in which the employee resided or the violation allegedly occurred.[37] Additionally, a SOX whistleblower may bring a retaliation claim in federal court

27 18 U.S.C. § 1514A. Administrative decisions have made clear that disclosures to other entities, including the IRS and local law enforcement, may also be protected. See, e.g., Vannoy v. Celanese Corp., ARB No. 09-118, ALJ No. 2008-SOX-064 (ARB 28 September 2011) (finding that disclosures to the IRS constituted protected activity under SOX); Funke v. Federal Express Corp., ARB No. 09-004, ALJ No. 2007-SOX-043 (ARB 8 July 2011) (finding that reports to local law enforcement constituted protected activity).

28 15 U.S.C. § 78u-6(a)(6). This provision arguably conflicts with the broader anti-retaliation provision of the DFA, which states that an employer cannot 'discharge, demote, suspend, threaten, harass, directly or indirectly, or in any other manner discriminate against, a whistleblower in the terms and conditions of employment' in retaliation for: (1) providing information to the SEC; (2) initiating, testifying in, or assisting an SEC investigation or action; or (3) making disclosures that are protected by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act or 'any other law, rule, or regulation subject to the jurisdiction of' the SEC. 15 U.S.C. § 78u-6(h)(1)(A).

29 17 C.F.R. § 240.21F-2.

30 Digital Realty Tr., Inc. v. Somers, 138 S. Ct. 767 (2018).

31 See 29 C.F.R. § 1980.104(e).

32 Id.

33 29 C.F.R. § 1980.104(e)(4).

34 29 C.F.R. § 1980.106.

35 29 C.F.R. §§ 1980.107, 1980.109.

36 29 C.F.R. § 1980.110.

37 29 C.F.R. § 1980.112.

if the Secretary of Labor 'has not issued a final decision within 180 days of the filing of [a] complaint and there is no showing that such delay is due to the bad faith of the claimant'.[38]

Individuals claiming DFA protections, on the other hand, may immediately bring a claim in federal court. There, courts will employ a burden-shifting standard. The employee must initially meet the 'rather light burden of showing by a preponderance of evidence that [the whistleblower report] tended to affect [the adverse action] in at least some way'.[39] Once the employee has made this prima facie showing of retaliation, the burden shifts to the employer to prove that there was a legitimate non-retaliatory reason for the decision.[40] Only if the employer is able to provide a non-retaliatory reason does the burden shift back to the employee to show that the proffered legitimate reason is a pretext.[41]

20.1.2 The CFTC whistleblower regime

The DFA added Section 23 of the Commodity Exchange Act (CEA), which provides for whistleblower protections. The CEA anti-retaliation provision is identical to the DFA provision in the Exchange Act. Although the CEA has been used less frequently than the SEC provision by employees, given the similarities between the two, the Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) began, among other things, to strengthen its anti-retaliation protections for whistleblowers and harmonise its rules with those of the SEC's Program in May 2017. The CFTC has also explicitly stated that it will rely on SEC precedent.[42]

20.2 The corporate perspective: preparation and response

20.2.1 Preparing for a whistleblower report

There is no legal requirement to create whistleblower policies, but companies that are potentially subject to SOX or DFA whistleblower requirements should ensure that they are prepared by creating policies and procedures that address how they will respond to and protect whistleblowers. These policies and procedures must be appropriately tailored to take into account factors such as the size of the company, the statutory whistleblower provisions that apply, and the nature of its business. At a minimum, whistleblower policies should include the following three types of guidance.

38 18 U.S.C. § 1514A(b)(1)(B).

39 Feldman v. Law Enf't Assocs. Corp., 752 F.3d 339, 348 (4th Cir. 2014).

40 Implementation Release at 18, n. 41.

41 Id.

42 See In the Matter of Claims for Award by: Redacted WB-APP Redacted; and Redacted WB-APP Redacted, in Connection with Notice of Covered Action Redacted (1 January 2018) (The CFTC adopted principles 'consistent with those of the SEC's whistleblower program' to evaluate a whistleblower's award claim.). See also 17 C.F.R. §§ 165.15(A)(2), 165.7(F)–(1) (2017). (The CFTC replaced the Whistleblower Award Determination Panel with the Claims Review Staff (CRS). The CFTC stated that the CRS would include an enhanced review process 'similar to that established under the whistleblower rules of the US Securities and Exchange Commission.)

First, the whistleblower policy needs to make clear how an employee or external party can report information about potential misconduct. There are a number of methods that firms can use to facilitate whistleblower reports, including designating an employee from legal or compliance who will receive those reports, creating a web-based interface for making reports, or creating a telephone hotline. Ultimately, the company should adopt one or more methods that will best facilitate reports. Regardless of the method chosen, whistleblowers must also be able to escalate the report to a designated senior employee or board member in the event that the conduct implicates legal, compliance or senior executive management.

Second, the policy should explain how the company will investigate a whistleblower claim. This aspect of the policy should not mandate that specific steps will be followed in each case, as the actual nature and scope of any investigation will depend heavily on the nature and circumstances of the claim. Among the aspects that may be included are: (1) who is responsible for initially investigating a whistleblower claim; (2) who is responsible for making an initial determination on the merit of the claim; (3) the circumstances under which the company will conduct a more extensive investigation; and (4) who is responsible for ultimately evaluating the whistleblower report and implementing remedial improvements if necessary.

Finally, the policy should ensure that when the identity of a whistleblower is known and the whistleblower is an employee, steps are taken to protect that person from retaliation. This protection could include designating an employee from legal or compliance to monitor the status of the whistleblower to ensure that they are not subject to adverse actions. Additionally, the policy should make clear that any personnel who retaliate against a whistleblower will be subject to discipline.

Responding to a whistleblower report 20.2.2

Once a company learns that a whistleblower report has been made, it should adhere to its whistleblower policy. First, the company should assess the whistleblower's claim to determine what responsive action is appropriate. As discussed above, the nature of the inquiry will depend on the claim, but could range from an informal assessment by the compliance team to a formal investigation conducted by external counsel. Ultimately, the determination of how to investigate the claim will depend on the severity of the alleged conduct and the credibility of the claim. In conducting the inquiry, it is critical that the company make clear to any employees who are interviewed that even though the substance of the interview may be protected by the company's attorney–client privilege, the employee retains the right to disclose the facts discussed during the interview to the appropriate authorities.[43]

43 See, e.g., In re KBR, Inc., Securities Exchange Act Release No. 74619 (1 April 2015) (KBR agreed to settle charges that its standard form confidentiality provision, which stated that witnesses needed permission of the company to disclose matters discussed in internal investigation interviews, undermined the Program.). The company should also ensure that similar language is used in any interview conducted by counsel as part of an internal investigation.

Second, in the case of a whistleblower report by an employee whose identity is known, in addition to the steps outlined in the whistleblower policy to protect the employee, the company should also ensure that it has documented any previous warnings or disciplinary actions taken against the employee, as well as adhere to consistent disciplinary procedures. Such documentation and adherence will, if necessary, support the company's position that a whistleblower employee was disciplined or terminated for conduct unrelated to a whistleblower report.

20.2.3 Defending anti-retaliation suits

If a whistleblower brings a retaliation action it will be difficult, if not impossible, to defeat the action at an early stage in the litigation. This difficultly exists because the standard for what constitutes an adverse employment action is purposely vague to allow for 'a factual determination on a case-by-case basis',[44] which has been interpreted by courts to reflect a 'congressional intent to prohibit a very broad spectrum of adverse action against . . . whistleblowers'.[45] As a result, courts have refused to create a bright-line standard for what constitutes an adverse employment action and instead 'pore over each case to determine whether the challenged employment action' constitutes an adverse action.[46] While any action can be construed by an employee as retaliatory, in practice, whistleblower claims are generally predicated on conduct, such as dismissals,[47] demotions[48] or decreased compensation.[49]

Despite these difficulties, there are certain defences that may be successfully asserted in a retaliation lawsuit. First, an employer can argue that there was no causal connection between the protected activity and the adverse employment decision.[50] Two factors that can sever the causal connection are the passage of time or a legitimate intervening event. The passage of time between a whistleblower's report and their termination can demonstrate that the adverse action was not retaliatory. The Second Circuit has declined to establish a bright-line rule,[51]

44 DFA Implementation Release, at *8.

45 Anthony Menendez v. Halliburton, Inc., 2011 WL 4915750, at *10 (ARB 13 September 2011) (SOX anti-retaliation claim).

46 Wanamaker v. Columbian Rope Co., 108 F.3d 462, 466 (2d Cir. 1997) (ADEA anti-retaliation claim).

47 See e.g., Ott, 2012 WL 4767200 at *3 (employee alleged that she was terminated for reporting to the SEC that she believed that the hedge fund's trading policy allowed the firm to trade ahead of customer orders).

48 See, e.g., In re Paradigm Capital Management, Inc., S.E.C. File No. 3-15930 (2014) (hedge fund settled claims by SEC that it retaliated against an employee who was relieved of his responsibilities following complaint).

49 See, e.g., O'Mahony v. Accenture Ltd., 537 F. Supp. 2d 506, 508 (S.D.N.Y. 2008) (SOX whistleblower allegations were adequately pled where defendant reduced plaintiff's level of responsibility and compensation shortly after plaintiff reported defendant's alleged fraudulent activity).

50 Fraser v. Fiduciary Trust Co. Int'l, No. 04 CIV. 6958 (PAC), 2009 WL 2601389, at *6 (S.D.N.Y. 25 August 2009) aff'd, 396 F. App'x 734 (2d Cir. 2010).

51 Gorman–Bakos v. Cornell Coop. Extension, 252 F.3d 545, 554 (2d Cir. 2001).

but in the absence of additional evidence of a defendant's retaliatory motive, the passage of two months may be sufficient to sever the causal connection.[52] However, to the extent that there is evidence of other retaliatory actions against the whistleblower, courts will allow for a longer gap between the protected activity and termination.[53] Similarly, a legitimate intervening event that occurs after the whistleblower's disclosure to the SEC will sever the causal connection and create a non-retaliatory justification for the termination. For example, one court granted summary judgment for an employer because, after making his disclosure to the SEC, the whistleblower told investors that the external directors were 'worthless', which provided a non-retaliatory justification for the whistleblower's dismissal.[54] However, because causation is generally a question of fact, a court is unlikely to decide as a matter of law that either the passage of time or an intervening event has severed the causal chain.[55]

An employer could argue that the whistleblower did not have a reasonable belief that the alleged conduct constituted a violation or potential violation of the securities law. In particular, whistleblower complaints need to provide more than 'self-serving averments'[56] or 'bald statement[s]'[57] in support of the claim that the plaintiff had a reasonable belief that the conduct was illegal.

There are certain defences that may be more applicable to either DFA or SOX whistleblower claims. First, DFA whistleblower claims may be amenable to arbitration. As a general principle, US federal courts 'strongly [favour] arbitration as an alternative dispute resolution process',[58] and statutory claims may be submitted to arbitration unless the statute explicitly prohibits arbitration.[59] As a result, some courts have held that DFA retaliation claims are amenable to arbitration, although a prohibition on arbitration was added to other whistleblower retaliation statutes by the DFA.[60] The Third Circuit, the only circuit court to examine this issue

52 Garrett v. Garden City Hotel, Inc., No. 05-CV-0962, 2007 WL 1174891, at *21 (E.D.N.Y. 19 April 2007) (collecting cases).

53 See, e.g., Mahony v. KeySpan Corp., No. 04 CV 554 SJ, 2007 WL 805813, at *6 (E.D.N.Y. 12 March 2007) (denying motion for summary judgment in SOX whistleblower case despite 13-month gap between protected activity and termination because a 'reasonable juror could find that the string of retaliatory acts culminating in Plaintiff's termination is evidence that Plaintiff's protected activity was a contributing factor in the adverse employment action').

54 Feldman, 752 F.3d at 349.

55 See, e.g., Mahony, 2007 WL 805813, at *6. ('The gap in time between protected activity and adverse employment action is merely one factor which a jury can consider when determining causation. A jury may look to other facts to decide whether the protected activity precipitated the adverse employment action, including evidence of a strained relationship between the parties that portended the employee's termination.')

56 Livingston v. Wyeth Inc., 2006 WL 2129794, *10 (M.D.N.C. 28 July 2006).

57 Nielsen v. AECOM Tech. Corp., 762 F.3d 214, 223 (2d Cir. 2014).

58 Nat'l City Golf Fin. v. Higher Ground Country Club Mgmt. Co., LLC, 641 F. Supp. 2d 196, 201 (S.D.N.Y. 2009).

59 Shearson/Am. Express v. McMahon, 482 U.S. 220, 226 (1987).

60 See, e.g., Murray v. UBS Sec., LLC, 2014 WL 285093, *11 (S.D.N.Y. 27 January 2014) (holding SOX's prohibition on predispute arbitration does not apply to DFA retaliation claims); Ruhe v.

so far, has concluded that 'although Congress conferred on whistleblowers the right to resist the arbitration of certain types of retaliation claims, that right does not extend to Dodd-Frank claims arising under [the Dodd-Frank whistleblower provision]'.[61] SOX claims, on the other hand, are not arbitrable as a result of an amendment to SOX that was passed as part of the DFA.[62]

Finally, in some instances, an employer can argue that an anti-retaliation claim is barred because it is extraterritorial. In Liu Meng-Lin v. Siemens AG, for example, the Second Circuit held that DFA whistleblower protection does not generally apply extraterritorially and that the plaintiff, a resident of Taiwan who was employed by the Chinese subsidiary of a German company, did not have a valid anti-retaliation complaint because neither his report to superiors in China and Germany regarding allegedly corrupt activities that took place outside the United States, nor the decision by Siemens in Germany or China to terminate him, had a sufficient connection to the United States to treat it as a domestic application of the statute.[63] The Second Circuit, however, declined to 'define the precise boundary between extraterritorial and domestic applications' of the anti-retaliation provision because the case was 'extraterritorial by any reasonable definition'.[64] Nonetheless, this suggests that many foreign whistleblowers may not be protected by the DFA.[65]

20.2.4 Anti-retaliation suits by the SEC

In addition to potential suits by a whistleblower, the SEC has asserted an independent right to bring whistleblower retaliation claims. In June 2014, the SEC brought its first enforcement action against a registered investment adviser for retaliation.[66] Subsequent actions show that this remains an enforcement priority for the SEC.[67] In particular, the SEC may enforce the DFA anti-retaliation provision for 'conduct occurring outside the United States that has a foreseeable Masimo Corp., 2011 WL 4442790, *5 (C.D. Cal. 16 September 2011) (refusing to read an anti-arbitration provision into 15 U.S.C. § 78u).

61 Khazin v. TD Ameritrade Holding Corp., 773 F.3d 488, 493 (3d Cir. 2014).

62 18 U.S.C. § 1514A(e)(2).

63 Liu Meng-Lin v. Siemens AG, 763 F.3d 175, 179-180 (2d Cir. 2014).

64 Id.

65 Employers may also be able to argue that the SOX whistleblower provisions do not apply to foreign employees. See, e.g., Asadi v. G.E. Energy (USA) LLC, No. 4:12-345, 2012 WL 2522599 (S.D. Tex. 28 June 2012) (Neither SOX nor DFA anti-retaliation provisions protected US citizen employed by US company who was temporarily relocated to a foreign country because 'the majority of events giving rise to the suit occurred in a foreign country'). But see Walters v. Deutsche Bank, et al., 2008-SOX-70, slip op. at 41 (ALJ 20 March 2009) (US citizen working in Switzerland was protected as a whistleblower because 'all elements essential to establishing a prima facie violation of Section 806 allegedly occurred in the United States').

66 In re Paradigm Capital Management, Inc., S.E.C. File No. 3-15930 (2014).

67 See, e.g., In re KBR, Inc., S.E.C. File No. 3-16466 (2015) (cease and desist order forbidding KBR, Inc. from violating Rule 21F-17, which prohibits companies from taking any action to impede whistleblowers from reporting possible securities violations to the SEC and imposing civil monetary penalties of US$130,000 for violations).

substantial effect within the United States'.[68] Therefore, even if a company can successfully avoid a retaliation suit by a whistleblower on extraterritorial grounds, the SEC could still bring a suit for the same conduct.

The whistleblower's perspective: representing whistleblowers 20.3

In determining whether to advise a client to make a whistleblower report, there are several key preliminary considerations. First, if the client is implicated in the wrongdoing this will impact whether they receive a whistleblower award and the amount of any award. The SEC in the DFA Implementation Release noted that 'culpable whistleblowers can enhance the Commission's ability to detect violations of the federal securities laws, increase the effectiveness and efficiency of the Commission's investigations and provide important evidence for the Commission's enforcement actions'.[69] As such, pursuant to SEC regulations, the SEC 'will assess the culpability or involvement of the whistleblower in matters associated with the Commission's action or related actions' in determining the amount of a whistleblower award.[70] In at least one case, it appears that the SEC gave an award to a culpable whistleblower. In an April 2016 order, the SEC stated that a whistleblower was subject to a parallel proceeding and that the award was 'subject to an offset for any monetary obligations', including disgorgement, prejudgment interest, and penalty amounts that the whistleblower had yet to pay towards a judgment.[71] In ordering this relief, the SEC noted that the whistleblower had previously been advised of the potential offset and did not object.[72]

Second, counsel should consider whether the putative whistleblower is subject to any professional confidentiality obligations that would be implicated. In particular, SEC regulations generally exclude attorneys from recovering under the Program. Information obtained through communications that are subject to the attorney–client privilege or information obtained 'in connection with the legal representation of a client' is generally not considered 'original information'.[73] These exclusions are clearly directed at attorneys to 'send a clear, important signal to attorneys, clients, and others that there will be no prospect of financial benefit for submitting information in violation of an attorney's ethical obligations'.[74] Similarly, certain fiduciaries and professionals engaged by the company

68 15 U.S.C. § 78aa(b)(2).

69 DFA Implementation Release, at *89.

70 17 C.F.R. § 240.21F-6(b)(1).

71 Order Determining Whistleblower Award Claim, Exchange Act Release No. 34-77530, 2016 WL 1328926 (5 April 2016).

72 Id.

73 See 17 C.F.R. § 240.21F-4(b)(4)(i)-(ii).

74 See DFA Implementation Release, at *27. The SEC has, however, provided for exceptions to the attorney exclusions in order to balance an attorney's ethical obligations with the desire to prevent securities law violations. As a result, information obtained through a confidential communication or legal representation will be deemed 'original information' in three situations: (1) if the attorney is representing an issuer and reasonably believes that the disclosure is necessary to prevent the issuer from committing a material violation of the securities law or to rectify a material violation, who obtained the information through those roles are generally not deemed to have 'original information' about misconduct.[75] However, there is no general bar on the use of information that is otherwise deemed confidential by a company.

20.3.1 Disclosing to the SEC

Neither DFA nor SOX whistleblower provisions mandate that a whistleblower make their initial disclosure to the SEC. Therefore, a whistleblower can choose to disclose initially to the SEC or first make an internal report to the employer.

From a rewards perspective, there is no benefit to disclosing first to the SEC. Pursuant to SEC regulations, the date of a whistleblower's initial internal report will be treated as the date of disclosure to the SEC, so long as the whistleblower makes a report to the SEC within 120 days of the internal report or a report to another federal agency.[76] Therefore, delaying SEC disclosure to make an internal report first will not affect whether the whistleblower is the first person to provide original information and thereby qualifies for an award.[77]

Moreover, reporting directly to the SEC could, in theory, reduce an award as one of the factors that the SEC considers in determining the amount of an award is whether the whistleblower reported the potential misconduct through internal company compliance systems and whether the whistleblower co-operated with any internal investigations.[78] Therefore, reporting directly to the SEC could reduce an award if the whistleblower is perceived to have circumvented the company's internal reporting system.

However, there is one major potential benefit to first disclosing to the SEC – guaranteed protection as a whistleblower under the DFA. In particular, the Supreme Court has held that individuals must report to the SEC in order to which is likely to cause substantial injury to financial interests, or to prevent perjury or fraud upon the SEC in the course of an SEC investigation or administrative proceeding; (2) when allowed to make the disclosure pursuant to applicable state attorney conduct rules; or (3) 'otherwise'. The SEC has not provided guidance on the circumstances that would qualify an attorney to invoke the 'otherwise' exclusion.

---

75 17 C.F.R. § 240.21F-4(b)(4)(iii). The SEC has stated that information from these sources will not be deemed 'original' if: (1) the whistleblower is in a leadership position and learned the information either from another person or in connection with internal compliance procedures; (2) the whistleblower is an internal audit or compliance employee or external adviser; (3) the whistleblower was retained to conduct an internal investigation into the company; or (4) the whistleblower is an employee of a public accounting firm, and the information was obtained while performing a function required under the federal securities laws, and relates to a violation by the client or its employees.

76 17 C.F.R. § 240.21F-4(b)(7); see also, In re the Claim for an Award in Connection with [Redacted], Securities Exchange Act of 1934 Release No. 82996 (5 April 2018) (awarding US$2.2 million to whistleblower who initially provided notification to another federal agency).

77 See 17 C.F.R. § 240.21F-4(b) (defining 'original information' as information '[n]ot already known to the Commission for any other source').

78 See 17 C.F.R. § 240.21F-6(a)(4).

be protected as whistleblowers under the DFA.[79] Therefore, if an employee only makes an internal report, the employee will lose the anti-retaliation protection provided by the DFA.[80] Moreover, because the SEC treats all whistleblower complaints as confidential and the Program provides additional confidentiality protections to ensure that a whistleblower's identity is protected, whistleblowers receive an added protection through SEC disclosure.[81]

Once a whistleblower decides to make a report to the SEC, the process itself is fairly simple. Whistleblowers may submit a complaint either through the online Tips, Complaints, and Referrals (TCR) Portal on the SEC's whistleblower website or by mailing or faxing a TCR Form to the SEC Office of the Whistleblower.[82] Once the form is received, it will be reviewed by Division of Enforcement staff, who will then determine who is best placed to investigate the allegations.[83] In some instances, the TCR will be sent to another federal or state enforcement agency, in which case information that could identify the whistleblower is generally withheld.[84]

Recent SEC and CFTC awards 20.3.2

The SEC awarded over US$168 million in whistleblower awards to 13 individuals in fiscal year 2018, including the largest awards to date.[85] On 19 March 2018, the SEC awarded US$83 million to three whistleblowers related to the SEC's US$415 million settlement with Merrill Lynch in 2016, with two whistleblowers sharing approximately US$50 million and the third receiving US$33 million for their significant information, prompting the SEC to open two investigations and their ongoing assistance.[86] On 6 September 2018, the SEC awarded US$39 million to one whistleblower, the second-largest award in history of the Program, and US$15 million to another for their critical information and continued assistance

79 Digital Realty, 138 S. Ct. at 769; see also Verble v. Morgan Stanley Smith Barney, LLC, No. 3:14-CV-74, 2015 WL 8328561 (E.D. Tenn. 8 December 2015) (employee who was dismissed for assisting federal authorities, including the FBI, was not a protected whistleblower because he had not provided information to the SEC).

80 Digital Realty, 137 S.Ct. at 769.

81 17 C.F.R. § 240.21F-7. For added protection, a whistleblower may also submit a complaint anonymously through an attorney. See 2015 Annual Report at 17.

82 See https://www.sec.gov/about/offices/owb/owb-tips.shtml.

83 See SEC, Division of Enforcement, Enforcement Manual (4 June 2015), https://www.sec.gov/divisions/enforce/enforcementmanual.pdf.

84 Id.

85 2019 Annual Report on Whistleblower Program, supra note 14, at 1.

86 SEC, press release, 'SEC Announces Its Largest-Ever Whistleblower Awards', https://www.sec.gov/news/press-release/2018-44; see also Pete Schroeder, 'U.S. SEC Awards Merrill Lynch Whistleblowers a Record $83 Million', Reuters, 19 March 2018, https://www.reuters.com/article/us-usa-sec-whistleblower/u-s-sec-awards-merrill-lynch-whistleblowers-a-record-83-million-idUSKBN1GV2MT; 2019 Annual Report on Whistleblower Program, supra note 14, at 10.

related to an undisclosed investigation.[87] On 26 March 2019, the SEC awarded US$50 million to two whistleblowers related to the SEC's US$367 million settlement with JPMorgan Chase & Co in 2015, with one whistleblower receiving US$37 million – the third-largest award – and the other US$13 million for their information and assistance.[88]

In addition to the aforementioned trend, on 24 May 2019, the SEC granted its first award under the internal reporting provision of the Program.[89] According to the SEC, the whistleblower sent an anonymous tip-off of alleged wrongdoings to his company before submitting the same information to the SEC within 120 days. The company opened an internal investigation and reported the allegations of misconduct to the SEC, which then opened its own investigation. The company also reported the results of its internal investigation, leading the SEC to take enforcement actions. The SEC credited the whistleblower for the results of the company's internal investigation and awarded him over US$4.5 million.

The SEC has also granted whistleblower awards to individuals who have engaged in reported misconduct. On 14 September 2018, the SEC provided a financial award to a claimant, although the claimant 'unreasonably delayed in reporting information to the Commission and was culpable'.[90] Similarly, on 26 March 2019, the SEC awarded a whistleblower (Claimant A) an unreported sum, despite Claimant A's participation in the reported misconduct.[91]

The CFTC has also shown an upward trend in granting whistleblower awards in increasing amounts. Starting with its first award of US$246,000 on 20 May 2014, the CFTC issued one award for US$300,000 in 2015, two awards for a total of US$11,551,320 in 2016, five awards for a total of US$75,575,113 in 2018, and five awards for a total of approximately US$15 million in the 2019 fiscal year.[92] Similarly, the CFTC's whistleblower programme has seen significant advancement and growth.

The three most notable CFTC whistleblower awards took place in 2018. On 12 July 2018, the CFTC granted its largest award of approximately US$30 million to one whistleblower who provided key information related to the 2015 settlement

87 SEC, press release, 'SEC Awards More Than $54 Million to Two Whistleblowers', https://www.sec.gov/news/press-release/2018-179.

88 SEC, press release, 'SEC Awards $50 Million to Two Whistleblowers', https://www.sec.gov/news/press-release/2019-42; see also Matt Robinson and Neil Weinberg, 'Whistleblowers Awarded $50 Million by SEC in JPMorgan Case', Bloomberg, 26 March 2019, https://www.bloomberg.com/news/articles/2019-03-26/two-whistleblowers-awarded-50-million-for-aiding-sec-case.

89 SEC, press release, 'SEC Awards $4.5 Million to Whistleblower Whose Internal Reporting Led to Successful SEC Case and Related Action', https://www.sec.gov/news/press-release/2019-76.

90 SEC, Release No. 84125 (14 September 2018).

91 SEC, Release No. 85412 (26 March 2019). Claimant A's reward was reduced because Claimant A delayed reporting and continued to passively benefit financially from the 'underlying misconduct during a portion of the period of delay'.

92 US Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC), Annual Report on the Whistleblower Program and Customer Education Initiatives (October 2019), https://whistleblower.gov/sites/whistleblower/files/2019-10/FY19%20Annual%20Whistleblower%20Report%20to%20Congress%20Final.pdf.

with JPMorgan Chase & Co, which also settled with the SEC.[93] On 16 July 2018, the CFTC gave an award to a foreign whistleblower for the first time, providing over US$70,000 for significant contributions to the CFTC investigation and demonstrating the international reach of the whistleblower programme through an online system.[94] On 2 August 2018, the CFTC granted multiple whistleblower awards of more than US$45 million in total, and the Director of the CFTC's Division of Enforcement announced he expected the trend to continue.[95]

Filing a qui tam action under the False Claims Act 20.4

Individuals who report fraud against the United States government have another option for disclosing information – the False Claims Act. This Act was created in 1863 initially to combat price-gouging during the Civil War, but the modern incarnation of the statute is a result of congressional concern regarding defence procurement fraud.[96] Since the statute was enhanced in 1986, there has been a significant growth in False Claims Act suits, from 30 in 1987 to 674 in 2017.[97] As a result of these suits, the US Department of Justice (DOJ) collected US$56 billion between 1986 and 2017, including US$3.4 billion in the 2017 fiscal year alone.[98]

The False Claims Act can be used to prosecute claims for false monetary claims against the government, false statements in aid of false claims, conspiracies to defraud the government into paying a false claim, or false statements intended to reduce an obligation to the government.[99] Moreover, pursuant to the False Claims Act, private individuals – referred to as relators – may bring qui tam claims on behalf of the government alleging that a defendant has committed fraud against the US government.[100] If the prosecution of the qui tam claim is successful, the 93 CFTC, press release, 'CFTC Announces Its Largest Ever Whistleblower Award of Approximately $30 Million', https://www.cftc.gov/PressRoom/PressReleases/7753-18; Henry Cutter, 'JPMorgan Whistleblower Set to Get Largest Payout from CFTC', Wall St. J., 12 July 2018, https://www.wsj.com/articles/jpmorgan-whistleblower-set-to-get-largest-payout-from-cftc-1531421603?mod=djemRiskCompliance&ns=prod/accounts-wsj.

94 CFTC, press release, 'CFTC Announces First Whistleblower Award to a Foreign Whistleblower', https://www.cftc.gov/PressRoom/PressReleases/7755-18.

95 CFTC, press release, 'CFTC Announces Multiple Whistleblower Awards Totaling More than $45 Million', https://www.cftc.gov/PressRoom/PressReleases/7767-18.

96 United States ex rel. Springfield Terminal Ry. Co. v. Quinn, 14 F.3d 645, 649-51 (D.C. Cir. 1994). Defence contracting remains one of the most frequent targets of qui tam complaints, constituting approximately 14 per cent of qui tam complaints. The healthcare industry is the most frequent target, accounting for approximately 58 per cent of qui tam complaints. US Dep't of Justice (DOJ), Fraud Statistics – Overview: 1 October 1987 – 30 September 2017 (19 December 2017), https://www.justice.gov/opa/press-release/file/1020126/download.

97 Id.

98 DOJ, press release, 'Justice Department Recovers Over $3.7 Billion From False Claims Act Cases in Fiscal Year 2017', (21 December 2017), https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/justice-department-recovers-over-37-billion-false-claims-act-cases-fiscal-year-2017.

99 31 U.S.C. § 3729.

100 31 U.S.C. § 3730(b).

relator may receive between 15 per cent and 30 per cent of the recovery.[101] This can result in substantial compensation for a whistleblower, as False Claims Act defendants may be liable for penalties of US$5,000 to US$10,000 per violation and for treble damages.[102]

20.4.1 How a qui tam action operates

To bring a qui tam action, the relator must file their complaint in federal court under seal.[103] The initial complaint is only served on the DOJ, which has 60 days to examine the merits of the claim.[104] During this 60-day period (which is often subject to extensions), the DOJ will determine whether to terminate or settle the claim, intervene and take 'primary responsibility' for the claim, or decline to intervene and allow the relator to proceed alone.[105] After this period expires, the complaint is unsealed and the defendant will receive notice of the claim.

At this stage, the government's 'ultimate election among the options has a direct effect on the relator's right to share in a recovery'.[106] If the government decides to intervene in the action, the relator is entitled to 15 per cent to 25 per cent of any recovery, while the government receives the remaining recovery.[107] The precise amount will 'depend upon the extent to which the person substantially contributed to the prosecution of the action'.[108] If, on the other hand, the government decides not to pursue the case, the relator will be entitled to 25 per cent to 30 per cent of the recovery, with the government again receiving the remainder of the recovery. The relator is also entitled to 'an amount for reasonable expenses which the court finds to have been necessarily incurred, plus reasonable attorneys' fees and costs'.[109] However, one study has revealed that the majority of plaintiffs voluntarily dismiss the qui tam action if the DOJ declines to intervene,[110] despite the potential for a larger award.

In addition to this basic framework, there are also limitations on awards, which may reduce or eliminate a possible award. First, a relator's award will be reduced if they 'planned and initiated' the False Claims Act violation.[111] Second, if the court determines that the information is 'based primarily on disclosures of 101 See 31 U.S.C. § 3730(d). However, as discussed further below, this can in some circumstances be reduced to 10 per cent or less. See infra notes 112 to 114 and accompanying text.

102 31 U.S.C. § 3729.

103 31 U.S.C. § 3730(b).

104 31 U.S.C. § 3730(b).

105 31 U.S.C. § 3730(b)-(c).

106 *Roberts v. Accentur*e, LLP, 707 F.3d 1011, 1015 (8th Cir. 2013).

107 31 U.S.C. § 3730.

108 Id.

109 Id.

110 See David Freeman Engstrom, 'Public Regulation of Private Enforcement: Empirical Analysis of DOJ Oversight of Qui Tam Litigation Under the False Claims Act', 107 Nw. U. L. Rev. 1717, 1718 (stating that in a randomly selected 460 case subsample of the 4,000 unsealed qui tam actions filed between 1986 and 2011 'roughly 60% of cases in which DOJ declined intervention appeared to generate no further litigation prior to a voluntary dismissal by the relator').

111 31 U.S.C. § 3730(d)(3).

specific information' relating to governmental investigations or news accounts, the award will be reduced to no more 'than 10 percent of the proceeds, taking into account the significance of the information and the role of the person bringing the action in advancing the case to litigation'.[112] Finally, a relator is entitled to no award if they are 'convicted of criminal conduct arising from his or her role in the violation'.[113] Additionally, there are provisions that preclude filing additional suits based on substantially similar qui tam or government enforcement proceedings.[114] These provisions are intended to achieve 'the golden mean between adequate incentives for whistle-blowing insiders . . . and discouragement of opportunistic plaintiffs who have no significant information to contribute of their own'.[115]

In addition to determining the quantum of a qui tam award, the DOJ's decision may also have a substantial impact on the outcome of the lawsuit. Statistics published by the DOJ show that cases where the DOJ intervenes are substantially more likely to generate recoveries than declined cases.[116] DOJ declination may also signal a lack of merit to the court.[117]

Recently enacted DOJ policy also encourages DOJ attorneys to 'consider whether the government's interests are served' by seeking dismissal of the qui tam action.[118] Pursuant to this policy, DOJ attorneys are encouraged to seek dismissal in order to (1) curb meritless qui tam actions, (2) prevent 'parasitic or opportunistic' actions that duplicate a pre-existing investigation, (3) prevent interference with government programmes, (4) preserve the DOJ's litigation prerogatives, (5) safeguard national security, (6) preserve government resources or (7) address 'egregious procedural errors' that would frustrate a proper investigation.[119]

---

112 31 U.S.C. § 3730(d)(1).

113 Id.

114 31 U.S.C. § 3730(e)(4)(A).

115 United States ex rel. Springfield Terminal R. Co. v. Quinn, 14 F.3d 645, 649 (D.C. Cir. 1994).

116 See DOJ, Fraud Statistics – Overview: 1 October 1987 – 30 September 2015 (12 July 2016), https://www.justice.gov/civil/file/874921/download (indicating that settlements and judgments in qui tam actions where the government intervened represented 94 per cent of all qui tam settlements and judgments obtained between 1987 and 2015).

117 See, e.g., United States ex rel. Jamison v. McKesson Corp., 649 F.3d 322, 331 (5th Cir. 2011) (noting that DOJ decision to intervene in cases involving 7 of 400 defendants suggested that the unintervened claims 'presumably lacked merit'); United States ex rel. Karvelas v. Melrose-Wakefield Hosp., 360 F.3d 220, 242 n.31 (1st Cir. 2004) ('[T]he government's decision not to intervene in the action also suggested that [relator's] pleadings of fraud were potentially inadequate.'); United States ex rel. Mikes v. Straus, 78 F. Supp. 2d 223, 225-26 (S.D.N.Y. 1999) (suggesting that 'the reason the Government chose not to intervene in this matter is its recognition that Relator's allegations . . . were a 'stretch' under the False Claims Act'). But see United States ex rel. Williams v. Bell Helicopter Textron Inc., 417 F.3d 450, 455 (5th Cir. 2005) (noting that 'a decision not to intervene may not [necessarily be] an admission by the United States that it has suffered no injury in fact, but rather [the result of] a cost-benefit analysis' (citations and internal quotation marks omitted)); United States ex rel. Downy v. Corning, Inc., 118 F. Supp. 2d 1160, 1170 (D.N.M. 2000) (noting that intervention decision may have been driven by a 'lack of available Assistant United States Attorneys' or 'respect for the skill of the relator's attorneys').

118 DOJ, Justice Manual § 4-400.

119 Id.

However, even if the DOJ decides not to intervene a case, it still has an oversight role in the litigation. First, the DOJ retains the continuing right to dismiss or settle an action being prosecuted by a relator,[120] although at least some courts have suggested that this is not an absolute right.[121] Second, the DOJ retains the right to veto private dismissals or settlements because any judgment will have preclusive effect on a future lawsuit by the US government based on the same facts.[122] That said, a minority of courts have held that the DOJ can only object by showing 'good cause' in a case where it has not intervened.[123]

20.4.2 Effects of filing a qui tam action

A qui tam action can have a substantial impact on both the relator and the defendant. First, the relator faces both reputational and financial risk. By filing a qui tam action the relator has agreed to be publicly identified because the unsealed complaint will identify them as the complainant.[124] Relators have tried to avoid this consequence by moving to dismiss and seal cases if the DOJ declines to intervene, but have met with, at best, limited success.[125] For relators who are still employed by the defendant, this risk is mitigated by the anti-retaliation provisions in the False Claims Act, which provide for reinstatement and double damages in the event of retaliation.[126] Nonetheless, depending on the situation, relators may have legitimate concerns about the impact on their professional reputations.

Relators often face additional financial risks if the government declines to intervene. In particular, relators may be responsible for the defendant's reasonable legal fees if the defendant prevails and 'the court finds that the claim of the person

120 31 U.S.C. § 3730(c)(2)(b).

121 See United States ex rel. Sequoia Orange Co. v. Baird-Neece Packing Corp., 151 F.3d 1139, 1145 (9th Cir. 1998) ('A two step analysis applies here to test the justification for dismissal: (1) identification of a valid government purpose; and (2) a rational relation between dismissal and accomplishment of the purpose.') [Internal citations and quotations omitted.]

122 See, e.g., Searcy v. Philips Elecs. N. Am. Corp., 117 F.3d 154, 160 (5th Cir. 1997) (noting the 'danger that a relator can boost the value of settlement by bargaining away claims on behalf of the United States').

123 United States ex rel. Killingsworth v. Northrop Corp., 25 F.3d 715, 722 (9th Cir. 1994); but see Ridenour v. Kaiser-Hill Co., 397 F.3d 925, 931 n.8 (10th Cir. 2005). ('Even where the Government has declined to intervene, relators are required to obtain government approval prior to entering a settlement or voluntarily dismissing the action.')

124 United States ex rel. Wenzel v. Pfizer, Inc., 881 F. Supp. 2d 217, 222–23 (D. Mass. 2012) ('[Relator] filed his claim with the expectation that his identity would be revealed to the public in the event that the government entered the case'). Relators have attempted to avoid this outcome by filing under a pseudonym or creating a corporation to file the complaint. This strategy, however, will only work if the case is not litigated. If it is litigated, this is unlikely to provide significant protection because the defendant is likely to seek discovery regarding the relator's identity and the basis of their knowledge. Moreover, in some cases there is no way to effectively hide the source of the information. See, e.g., id. at 223 (noting that 'it is doubtful that redaction would provide any protection given the very specific allegations contained in the complaint').

125 Id. at 221 (collecting cases and noting that '[m]ost courts have . . . decided that a relator's general fear of retaliation is insufficient to rebut the presumption of public access').

126 31 U.S.C. § 3730(h).

bringing the action was clearly frivolous, clearly vexatious, or brought primarily for purposes of harassment'.[127]

A qui tam action also creates financial and reputational risks for a defendant. A successful qui tam action could cost a corporation millions, if not billions, of dollars.[128] Moreover, defendants also risk debarment from additional federal contracts.[129] From a reputational perspective, the corporation faces negative publicity associated with public accusations of committing fraud against the government, although at least one court has suggested that this impact is minimised when the DOJ declines to intervene.[130]

127 31 U.S.C. § 3730(d)(4). US courts also have the inherent authority to impose sanctions, as well as authority pursuant to Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

128 See DOJ, press release, 'GlaxoSmithKline to Plead Guilty and Pay $3 Billion to Resolve Fraud Allegations and Failure to Report Safety Data' (2 July 2012), https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/glaxosmithkline-plead-guilty-and-pay-3-billion-resolve-fraud-allegations-and-failure-report (announcing settlement of civil and criminal actions against pharmaceutical company, including a US$1.043 billion settlement resolving four related qui tam actions).

129 31 U.S.C. § 3729 (2012).

130 United States ex rel. Pilon v. Martin Marietta Corp., 60 F.3d 995, 999 (2d Cir. 1995). ('[A] defendant's reputation is protected to some degree when a meritless qui tam action is filed, because the public will know that the government had an opportunity to review the claims but elected not to pursue them.')

21

Whistleblowers: The In-house Perspective

Steve Young[1]

21.1 Initial considerations

Most whistleblowing policies provide several channels for staff to raise concerns. These often include the staff member's line manager (or a more senior manager), human resources, audit, legal, compliance or dedicated ethics, or integrity, departments.

The desired culture of any corporate must be that staff feel entirely comfortable raising concerns with their immediate line manager, who in turn will escalate the issue to the appropriate department. Should whistleblowers prefer not to go to their line manager, they should feel able to approach someone in the organisation they trust. The culture corporates should aspire to must be one where employees may raise concerns with the full confidence they will be treated with respect, will be taken seriously and will suffer no retaliation in any form.

From an in-house perspective, it is always an initial concern that an employee has not had sufficient confidence in the organisation to raise the concern via internal personnel in the normal course of business. Resorting to the whistleblowing channels sends a message itself, and more so if the employee has chosen to remain anonymous. Monitoring and analysing whistleblowing cases can provide a measure of the organisation's culture and confidence levels for raising concerns. While much depends on the nature of the concern, the tone from the top and creating a culture that speaking up is the right thing to do are imperative. Many organisations now include questions in employee opinion surveys to try to gauge the level of confidence staff have in raising their concerns. Some other initial considerations are pointed out below.

1 Steve Young is the CEO of the Association of Corporate Investigators and head of fraud and investigations at Banque Lombard Odier & Co Ltd.

Culture: Creating a culture in which staff have confidence to raise concerns internally is becoming increasingly important as some regulatory authorities now mandate regulated firms to include regulatory whistleblowing hotline numbers and email addresses in corporate whistleblowing policies, for example at UK branches of overseas banks.[2] Additionally, proposals to extend the scope of whistleblower awards, for example the US Securities and Exchange Commission's proposal to allow awards based on information from a whistleblower that leads to deferred prosecution agreements and non-prosecution agreements entered into by the US Department of Justice,[3] if adopted, raises the possibility of direct reporting to regulators bypassing internal reporting channels.

Anonymity: Anonymous whistleblowers can deny the investigator the opportunity to open a constructive dialogue to seek further information, put matters into context and limit feedback. A key challenge for the investigator is why the whistleblower wished to remain anonymous. It can be helpful to simply ask the question if there is a communication channel, such as webmail, open with the whistleblower.

The nature of the allegation and motive for reporting: While investigators should always keep an open mind, the motive of the whistleblower often becomes apparent as the facts are established. If a dialogue with the whistleblower exists, they can be asked their motive for reporting.

Duration: How long the alleged conduct has been taking place is material. Aged issues can present problems such as records retention periods. In addition, because of staff turnover, accessibility to ex-employees can be a problem.

Existing knowledge from another source: Investigators should check corporate records, such as audit, risk, legal and compliance, to check if the alleged activity is known and was previously or is currently the subject of investigation.

Need for external counsel: Investigators should lean towards caution during the initial review of a whistleblower allegation and take legal advice at an early stage. Assessment of the legal risks by an internal or external lawyer will prevent problems arising later if the investigation uncovers serious wrongdoing.

The welfare of the whistleblower and duty of care: Investigators should keep in mind the welfare of the whistleblower. For most it will not have been an easy decision to speak up. Stay mindful of health and performance impacts – and the legal risk of these to the organisation.

Protecting the whistleblower from retaliation: In the event that a whistleblower is identified, immediate steps may need to be considered to prevent retaliation. These could include moving the whistleblower to another part of the organisation, or transferring to an alternative line manager. Much depends on the nature of the case.

2 See https://www.fca.org.uk/publication/policy/ps17-07.pdf.

3 See https://www.sec.gov/news/press-release/2018-120.

21.2 Identifying legitimate whistleblower claims

Given the wide range of concerns raised by whistleblowers, distinguishing between legitimate and non-legitimate allegations should be dictated by the facts gathered during the the investigation. In some cases, a prompt review of the matters alleged by a subject-matter expert can quickly point to whether something is 'off-target' or requires further investigation. During the normal course of document examination, email reviews, staff interviews and data analysis generally the allegations can be substantiated or disproved. While some allegations will always be inconclusive, more frequently in human resources cases, generally a determination can be reached on the facts. Whistleblowing cases that contain multiple allegations require a detailed breakdown of each allegation as some parts may prove substantive while others will be off-target. Whistleblowing allegations are never suited to a one-size-fits-all approach and much depends on the nature of each case.

On receipt of a whistleblowing allegation, first steps should include checks to ascertain if the matters raised are known or the subject of an ongoing or previous investigation.

Generally, allegations can be split into three categories:

- Material allegations that expose the corporate to regulatory action, civil claims or criminal investigation. These require experienced legal advice and depending on the jurisdiction investigation by external counsel to preserve privilege and advise the corporate accordingly.
- Allegations of wrongdoing, including internal fraud and breaches of the code of conduct or policies and procedures. These generally can be investigated by internal corporate investigators, or external forensic firms with internal or external legal advice and oversight if required.
- Behavioural allegations such as bullying, harassment, inappropriate relationships, etc., which can generally be investigated by human resources or independent line management. Allegations of a sexual nature may require specialist investigative expertise. The nature of these allegations should be reviewed to consider who is best suited to undertake the investigation. The #MeToo movement has seen an increase in sexual allegations that may require specialist investigative, legal and victim care management.

21.3 Employee approaches to whistleblowers

A key component of any corporate whistleblowing policy must include a zero-tolerance approach to any retaliation against a whistleblower. Retaliation or perceived retaliation against a whistleblower raises cultural and legal risk, and undermines the effectiveness of a whistleblowing programme. Frequently during whistleblowing investigations, especially ones involving allegations of wrongdoing by senior management, interviewees speculate as to who the whistleblower might be. Ideally, in the absence of a legal obligation to do so (e.g., in litigation or in some jurisdictions) it is preferable that there is no such disclosure.

Speculation among staff should be discouraged, as it can increase the risk of retaliation.

Retaliation against whistleblowers can take many forms; examples include silence, isolation, inappropriate remarks, threats and work sabotage. In the event that a staff member or number of staff members are acting inappropriately towards a whistleblower, action will need to be taken.

Good investigation process separates the collection of facts and evidence gathering from decision-making to determine outcomes. This is particularly important when an investigator is putting forward information concerning retaliation against a whistleblower. As a general rule the investigator should not be involved in the sanctions or enforcement actions against retaliators – it is a separate legal and HR issue.

If the whistleblower's identity is known, dialogue should take place about the treatment the whistleblower is receiving and whether he or she has disclosed to anyone that they have raised the matter. Special care is required if the retaliation is by a line manager. The whistleblower should be given an opportunity to express his or her expectations and view as to what could be done. Investigators should be mindful that the organisation will generally have a duty of care and the whistleblower could take action against the organisation in the future.

Frequently whistleblowers experiencing retaliation or those believing they are being treated differently suffer health problems, such as stress leading to time off work. In these circumstances, referrals via human resources to confidential staff welfare support schemes should be considered. In determining the action to be taken against staff involved in retaliation against a whistleblower, the investigator should consult with human resources, legal, compliance and business management functions for the next steps, which could include disciplinary action up to and including dismissal.

Appropriate action taken against those who retaliate against whistleblowers can send a strong message to reinforce the culture of the organisation.

Distinctive aspects of investigations involving whistleblowers 21.4

Corporates with in-house investigation departments generally have investigation procedures in place that also apply to whistleblowing cases. The substantive difference is how the matter was raised. Investigators should proceed with the protection of the whistleblower as a top priority. Thought should be given to lines of enquiry or staff interviews that could identify the whistleblower. The general rule to note is that it is the matter under investigation that is the issue, not how the matter came to the organisation's attention.

Investigators should check if local law requires disclosure that the matter was raised as the result of a whistleblower. It is generally not a requirement in law to disclose to those facing allegations that the matter under investigation was raised by a whistleblower.

A good example of an exception is France, where it is generally required that accused persons be informed of whistleblowing allegations made against them so they may respond to them. They also have protection against malicious allegations. In this respect investigators should be mindful that, in the rare cases of malicious allegations, the alleged party, or the employer, may consider legal action against an identifiable whistleblower.

Equally, as with many investigations, consideration must be given to the collection and recording of personal data. Legal advice should be taken on data protection obligations, as again, in some jurisdictions such as France, an accused person may be informed of the accusation and have a right of challenge when his or her personal data is recorded during a whistleblowing investigation.

With the protection of the whistleblower and disclosure obligations at the top of the investigator's priority list, it is important the internal investigation proceeds as with any other investigation to establish the facts. Establishing a dialogue with the whistleblower, if possible, allows for further information, context and feedback to take place. It can be that allegations are raised in good faith but are off-target owing to facts unknown to the whistleblower.

In the event the allegation, or allegations, are substantiated and lead to regulatory enforcement action, litigation by way of civil claims or criminal investigation, or all three, it may be that the identity of the whistleblower, if known, must be disclosed. Investigators should be mindful not to give whistleblowers definitive commitments of non-disclosure, even if authorities have whistleblower protections in place. In serious cases, this aspect requires early legal advice when the allegation is first received and assessed, as the legal risks will require consideration.

Everyone involved in the whistleblowing investigation and management process should remain aware that whistleblowers are free to speak to whomever they wish and this can include law enforcement, external regulators and taking their own external legal advice. Specialist legal advice should be taken in respect of employees who have raised concerns where the employer is considering reaching a settlement involving a non-disclosure agreement. Some jurisdictions consider these counterproductive to the aims of whistleblowing programmes. In the United Kingdom, the All Party Parliamentary Group on Whistleblowing[4] has called for legislation to ban the use of non-disclosure agreements for whistleblowers.

4 https://www.appgwhistleblowing.co.uk/.

22

Forensic Accounting Skills in Investigations

Glenn Pomerantz, Nicole Sliger and Michael Barba[1]

Introduction 22.1

The purpose of this chapter is to explain key steps and best practices in investigations from an accounting perspective. The term forensic, as defined in Webster's Dictionary, means 'belonging to, used in or suitable to courts of judicature or to public discussion and debate'. Accordingly, forensic accounting involves the application of specialised knowledge and investigative skills to matters in anticipation of possible litigation or dispute resolution, including in civil, administrative or criminal enforcement matters. Forensic accounting skills can be applied to a wide variety of investigations into alleged corporate and individual wrongdoing, including:

- misappropriation of assets by employees;
- bribery and corruption;
- money laundering;
- financial reporting fraud;
- non-compliance with laws, regulations or provisions of contracts; and
- fraud perpetrated by vendors or suppliers and other third parties.

We may refer to non-compliance instead of fraud. Non-compliance often lacks the intent of fraud and may manifest itself in the violation of an agreement, policy or otherwise acceptable behaviour. Investigations may focus on allegations of fraud or non-compliance.

The range of specialisations within the field of forensic accounting is diverse, but at the core is a focus on accounting systems, processes, records, data and reports. A logical order in which forensic accountants will proceed in an investigation is as follows:

1 Glenn Pomerantz and Nicole Sliger are partners and Michael Barba is a managing director at BDO USA, LLP.

- gaining a broad understanding of allegations, accounting systems, employee responsibilities and business processes;
- preserving records and other evidence;
- mitigating losses;
- developing a workplan for the investigation;
- considering and carrying out data analytics, email review (often with counsel) and review of books and records;
- conducting (often with counsel) information-gathering interviews; and
- conducting (often with counsel) investigative interviews.

Many of the most important steps involved in this process are explained below.

22.2 Preservation, mitigation and stabilisation

See Chapters 5 and 6 on beginning an internal investigation

An important consideration at the outset of an investigation is to identify the necessary steps to mitigate loss of funds or other assets and to preserve data and relevant records. This may entail closing of bank accounts, freezing of email and other communications, deactivating user passwords and other steps to deny access to subjects of the investigation. Where the nature of the investigation requires it, financial and accounting information will need to be preserved and stabilised. Physical documents in this category may include a wide variety of records, such as purchase orders, invoices, customer orders, delivery records, etc. Every step of the transaction cycles involved in the scheme under investigation should be considered at this stage to identify all potentially relevant documents and electronic records (including audio).

22.3 e-Discovery and litigation holds

Owing to the proliferation of electronic data, an increasingly important early step in many investigations is to determine what relevant information exists, in what form (paper or electronic), where it is located (e.g., an on-site data centre, off-site at vendors, in the cloud), what security measures are in place over the data, and what the organisation's standard record retention and destruction policies and practices are. The process of identifying, taking inventory of, and preserving relevant data that may be of use in an investigation is often referred to as e-discovery.

In addition, as soon as it becomes apparent that an investigation is necessary, a litigation or preservation hold notice should be issued. These notices require the suspension of any destruction or deletion of paper or electronic records that could be relevant to the investigation. Proper communication of a litigation hold or preservation order to all pertinent individuals and department which may include third parties who, for example, are responsible for archiving the organisation's data off-site, is important to avoid accidental destruction of critical records.

Violation of internal controls 22.4

An important part of an investigation is establishing whether the act was intentional. Demonstrating that a subject was aware of and violated a documented, well-established internal control is often a relevant factor. For example, determining how an internal control was circumvented or otherwise violated is also an important part of understanding how fraud or corruption was perpetrated, because establishing that a subject intentionally violated internal controls can be important in connection with criminal prosecution or the regulatory enforcement process, and understanding precisely how internal controls were violated is critical to developing a remediation plan to enhance controls and to prevent future occurrences. In addition, understanding how internal controls were bypassed or overridden will often provide critical insight into who knew what and when.

The first step in determining whether policies or procedures were violated is to gain a thorough understanding of the accounting behind the controls as well as the identities of employees responsible for accounting, internal controls and the business processes being investigated. Upon gaining this basic knowledge, we identify the established policies and procedures (the current state). This normally entails reviewing documented policies and procedures, and walkthroughs, and may also include interviews with employees to help clarify any ambiguities in the documentation. Some considerations include:

See Chapters 7 and 8 on witness interviews

- which employees are authorised to initiate and process a transaction;
- which employees are authorised to approve a transaction;
- which employees can approve new vendors;
- which employees are responsible for account reconciliations;
- which employees have physical access to assets, including cash;
- documentation requirements for the transaction;
- how and where electronic and paper records are stored; and
- how exceptions or unusual transactions are handled, including budget variance analysis.

It may also be important to review any training programmes that the subject of the investigation has received. Doing so can establish more firmly that the subject had an understanding of the proper method of handling the transactions.

Most accounting cycles, such as procurement, disbursement of funds and payroll, include many steps. Some of these are evidenced manually, such as with written approvals by signature and supporting documents such as invoices and delivery confirmations. Other steps require analysis of electronic records. Examples of critical pieces of electronic evidence related to internal controls include:

- Date and time stamps: Most systems leave a valuable trail that can be used to establish an accurate and detailed timeline of events. For example, a vendor invoice may be put into the accounts payable system late at night during non-work hours, approved for payment moments later and payment is made to the vendor the very next day. Why the rush? Is there a legitimate need or is something more devious involved? Does payment so quickly comply with the organisation's normal cash management and bill-paying policies?

- User identification numbers: Systems maintain a record of user log-ins, along with date and time of information access and updates. Directly or indirectly, it is often possible to determine exactly which user of a system performed each step in the chain of activities comprising a transaction – who set a vendor up in the master file, who authorised the purchase and whether it was competitively bid, who entered the vendor invoice, who approved it for payment, who scheduled it for disbursement, who transmitted payment, etc.
- Security matrices: Often reviewed in connection with the preceding step, determining which users have access to specific components of each system can play a vital role in assigning responsibility for specific steps in a matter under investigation. Access to a system often does not mean access to every part of that system. Analysis of a security matrix provides details of this information. Who has 'read only' access to vendor and invoice data? Who has input capability? Who has approval authority to release payments to vendors? Aligning this information with information gleaned from the preceding steps can find exactly where internal controls were compromised, including identification of instances of unauthorised access through password theft or sharing.

Physical documents are often important pieces of evidence in an investigation. But electronic evidence associated with a transaction cycle tends to be equally or more important. Proper analysis of this evidence enables an investigator to draw conclusions and gain insight that would be impossible in an entirely paper-based system. For example, a paper copy of a vendor invoice can be analysed to establish whether a subject signed or initialled it, and perhaps whether any alterations were made to the document. But if the organisation's vendor invoice approval and payment system is electronic, the investigator can also determine with precision the date and time of the approval of the invoice and perhaps even where the subject performed these steps (from home, from a workstation in the office, etc.).

22.5 Forensic data analysis

Forensic analysis of data refers to analysis of electronically stored data. The most commonly analysed data are accounting and financial, but several non-financial categories of data are also very useful to investigators. Each is explored below.

Data analysis generally has three applications in the investigative process:

- to initially detect fraud or non-compliance (e.g., monitoring performed by internal audit);
- to corroborate an allegation in order to justify launching an investigation (e.g., proving that an allegation received via a hotline appears to have merit); and
- to perform certain parts of the investigation (e.g., analysis of payments made to suspicious vendors).

Each of these will be explained further. But first, a few important points about data analytics are essential.

Data analytics rarely prove that fraud or non-compliance occurred. Rather, data analysis identifies transactions or activities that have the characteristics of fraud or non-compliance, so that they can be examined further. These are often referred to as anomalies in the data.

If an investigation ultimately leads to employee terminations or legal proceedings to recover losses, it is critical to have properly analysed the anomalies that data mining has identified. Could the anomaly in the data, or an anomaly in a document, while often identified as a characteristic of fraud, also simply indicate a benign deviation? Failing to investigate and rule out non-fraudulent explanations for anomalies can have consequences that many investigators have learned about the hard way.

Identifying and exploring all realistically possible non-fraudulent, non-corrupt explanations for an anomaly is also called reverse proof. Examining and eventually ruling out all of the valid possible non-fraudulent explanations for an anomaly in the data or documentation can prove that the only remaining reasonable explanation is fraud or corruption.

Take a simple example to illustrate this important concept. An employee is found to have submitted the same business expenditure twice for reimbursement (paid for using a personal credit card). Further analysis shows that this is not an isolated incident. In fact, the rate at which the employee submitted duplicate expenditures has increased over time – a classic red flag commonly associated with perpetrators of fraud. Is this a sufficient basis to support an allegation of misconduct?

This would be premature. What if, on further analysis, the investigator also finds that the employee has been asked to work an increasing number of hours every week and travel much more extensively over time. Investigating further, it is found that this employee is particularly disorganised and has never been asked to do this much business travel before. These additional facts make the distinction between an intentional act of fraud and an escalating series of honest mistakes a bit blurry.

Careful consideration of alternative theories for data and document anomalies is critical to protecting the organisation and the investigator from liability stemming from falsely accusing someone of wrongdoing.

Data mining to detect fraud or non-compliance 22.5.1

Depending on which application or phase of the investigative process is involved, the nature of forensic data analysis can vary. For example, as an initial detector of fraud or non-compliance through ongoing monitoring, forensic data analytics usually takes one of two broad, but opposite, approaches: identification of any activity that deviates from expectations, or identification of activity that possesses specific characteristics associated with fraudulent or corrupt behaviour or other non-compliant conduct.

The former approach is taken when acceptable behaviour is narrowly defined, such that the slightest deviation warrants investigation. The latter approach is the more common. It is driven by a risk assessment and is based on what this type of fraud or non-compliance would look like in the data. For example, a shell company scheme might evidence itself by an address in the vendor master file matching an address in the employee master file. Any instances of such a match would be investigated.

In some cases, basing the 'investigate' or 'don't investigate' decision on a single characteristic in the data can result in numerous false positives. For this reason, more sophisticated data analytics often rely on the consideration of multiple characteristics in assessing the risk of activity being fraudulent or corrupt.

Regardless of which of these two approaches is taken, data analytics often represents an essential tool for gathering evidence to lay the foundation for substantive examination of books, records and other evidence. Following the reverse-proof concept described above is critical once anomalies indicative of possible wrongdoing are uncovered.

22.5.2 Corroborating allegations

See Chapters 19 and 20 on whistleblowers

As a method of corroborating an allegation that has been received, data analysis can be of great value. It is a significant advantage to the investigator because, more often than not, it can be performed on electronic data without alerting the subject of the allegation. In this application, the allegation is first assessed in terms of what impact the alleged fraudulent or corrupt act would have on financial or non-financial data. To illustrate, take the example of an allegation that workers in the shipping department of a warehouse are stealing inventory by short shipping orders to customers. There are numerous sources of data, both financial and non-financial, that could be analysed to assess the validity of this allegation:

- gross profit margins – an unexplained decline in gross profit margins by product, or by location (as a result of having to re-ship additional items, with no associated revenue, to satisfy the customer);
- inventory purchases – unexplained increases in purchases of certain inventory items without a corresponding increase in sales;
- customer complaints – customer service data indicating complaints about incomplete shipments, especially if those complaints can be correlated back to specific orders; and
- shipping records – using the customer complaint data, orders are correlated to specific shipments and employee names associated with filling and shipping these orders. Shipping records might also reveal more shipments to a customer than orders, indicating a second shipment was needed to complete the order after the customer complained.

This is a simple example, but one that illustrates that for every allegation, there likely exists data associated with either the perpetration or concealment of the fraud or non-compliance. And this data normally exhibits one or more anomalies in comparison with data from similar transactions that do not involve fraud or non-compliance.

Using data analysis in an investigation 22.5.3

The final application of forensic data analysis is performed during the investigation itself. Once an anomaly has been found to involve fraud or non-compliance, additional forensic data analysis, along with substantive forensic examination of the evidence, may be performed to:

1 determine how long the activity has occurred;
2 determine which employees (or third parties) have participated in the fraud (i.e., assessing whether collusion was involved);
3 measure the financial damage resulting from the activity;
4 identify other fraudulent or corrupt conduct by the same individuals; and
5 determine how the fraudulent or corrupt act was concealed and how internal controls were circumvented.

Determining who is involved in the fraud as well as who possessed knowledge of it is critical to the mitigation and control enhancement objectives. According to a 2016 report by the Association of Certified Fraud Examiners (ACFE), nearly 45 per cent of all fraud and corruption schemes investigated involve multiple perpetrators.[2] This figure has been steadily rising since the ACFE began studying fraud. The 45 per cent is split nearly evenly between cases involving multiple internal perpetrators and those involving collusion between insiders and outsiders, such as vendors or customers.

Point 4, above, may also come as a surprise to some, but is important. The ACFE report indicates that 31.8 per cent of the time an individual engages in fraud (especially with respect to asset misappropriations), they employ multiple methods to commit their crimes. The allegation or investigation may have initially focused on only one specific method. Exploring what other activities the subject might have the capability of engaging in is an integral element of the investigation. Investigators and victims attempt to 'put a fence around the fraud' as early in the investigative process as possible. Understanding the responsibilities of the subject and the potential for unrelated schemes is essential for erecting the fence. Victims often desire a narrow investigative scope – a sort of wishful thinking. An investigator's worst-case scenario is missing a scheme conducted by a subject despite investigating the subject.

The question of who knew what and when can be particularly important in satisfying auditors in the context of financial reporting fraud. In addition to quantifying the financial statement impact from fraud, auditors rely on representations from management. Knowledge of whether previous representations came from fraudsters and the auditor's assessment of management's integrity are often important aspects of financial reporting fraud investigations.

In the next sections, the distinction between financial and non-financial data will be explored, followed by a discussion of internal versus external data.

2 2016 ACFE Report to the Nations on Occupational Fraud and Abuse, published by the Association of Certified Fraud Examiners. Available at http://www.acfe.com/rttn2016.aspx.

22.6 Analysis of financial data

Most analyses of internal data relevant to an investigation begin with financial data, much of which comes from the organisation's accounting system. Accounting data can exist in several separate systems, such as:

- general ledger, the master ledger that reflects all accounts and the sum of all accounting activity for the organisation;
- general journal, where journal entries are initially recorded before being posted to the general ledger;
- books of original entry, which contain details of certain types of financial transactions, summaries of which are posted to the general ledger. Examples of books of original entry include sales, cash receipts, cash disbursements and payroll; and
- subsidiary ledgers, which contain additional details of transactions and activities that appear only in summary form in the general ledger. Examples of subsidiary ledgers are accounts receivable and accounts payable ledgers.

Performing an investigation often requires the extraction and analysis of data from all these systems to see the big picture or to properly trace the history of a transaction or series of activities. The days of manually maintained books of original entry are gone. The vast majority of organisations now use electronic accounting and financial software, and in larger organisations these systems are included as part of a broader ERP system.

Some systems are hybrids of financial and non-financial information. Examples of these systems include:

- Inventory: in addition to cost information associated with purchases, the system may also provide data on quantities and dates of purchases, deliveries, shipments, inventory damaged or scrapped, and counts resulting from physical observation.
- Payroll: in addition to data on net amounts paid to employees, the payroll system will usually include other relevant data needed to calculate an employee's gross and net pay, including various worker classification codes, hours worked during a pay period, rates of pay, tax and withholding information, along with bank account information for the electronic transfer of funds to employees.
- Human resources: in most large organisations a human resources system that is separate from payroll is maintained. Included in this system are data on rates of pay and past raises, incentive payments, and other financial data about each employee, as well as significant amounts of non-financial data, such as each employee's home address. Human resource information systems may also include vital information associated with an employee's initial hiring, such as background and reference checks, verification of information provided on an employment application, etc. This information can be important if the organisation anticipates filing an insurance claim to be indemnified for losses attributable to an employee.

Availability of and legal considerations associated with each of these sources of internal data vary from one jurisdiction to another, particularly with respect to payroll and personnel information. Privacy issues must be considered before embarking on any use of such data in an investigation.

Analysis of non-financial records 22.7

Increasingly, non-financial data is being analysed as a standard element of an investigation. Non-financial data can be classified into two broad categories: structured and unstructured.

Structured data is the type of data that generally conforms to a database format. It is often numeric (e.g., units in inventory, hours worked by an employee, calendar dates), but can involve alpha data as well (e.g., codes associated with types of customer or employee, certain elements of an address).

Structured non-financial data is found in many systems, including those that include financial data mentioned above. Other systems, however, are entirely non-financial, but provide data that can be important to an investigation. Examples of non-financial systems commonly used for investigative purposes include:

- Security: many organisations now use tools that leave an electronic trail of the exact times and dates when specific employees entered or left the building. Records of visits by vendors and other visitors may be included in this system or may be kept separately. Security information can be very useful in establishing timelines or the whereabouts of specific individuals.
- Network data: much like accessing a building, networks maintain electronic records each time an authorised user logs on or off the system, and may retain a record of various aspects of the user's network activity, such as which folders were accessed, which data was downloaded, which systems were used, etc.
- Customer service: as the earlier example illustrates, data collected in the customer service system can have numerous applications in an investigative setting. Customer complaints about items missing from their orders may indicate theft in the warehouse.

Unstructured data refers to data that does not readily conform to a database or spreadsheet format. Text associated with messages in emails, explanations for journal entries and other communications are the most common. Unstructured data also includes photographic images, video and audio files.

Emails and text messages of interest to an investigator may involve messages within the organisation, between employees and communications between organisation employees and vendors, customers or other third parties.

Similar to other electronic data, when a user 'deletes' this information, a backup or archive version is often left behind and is available to an investigator. Understanding an organisation's backup, archiving and storage practices is crucial to this part of an investigation.

Careful reviewing of email, instant messaging or text message chains (and, if available, recordings of telephone calls) is vital to most investigations and can provide an investigator with vital clues, such as:

- the timeline of events;
- the level of knowledge of events that specific individuals may have had;
- the extent of collusion among individuals;
- whether a subject or witness deleted email evidence; and
- whether there are indications of intent.

Establishing a timeline can be one of the most important requirements of an investigation. A complete timeline of events can often be established by integrating the separate timelines learned from a review of:

- systems and facilities access records;
- electronic transaction information (e.g., entries, approvals);
- documentation (e.g., invoices, shipping records); and
- electronic communications, including metadata (e.g., emails).

Email (and where available, audio) review is of particular importance in establishing intent. Intent, particularly to a civil standard, may be inferred from communications that indicate an awareness that planned transactions or activities are in conflict with established policies and procedures or treatment of similar transactions. Sentiment analysis can also be performed in connection with email, instant messaging or text message communications. This type of analysis can identify pressures or rationalisations associated with fraudulent or corrupt behaviour. For example, an employee stating in these communications that he or she feels unfairly treated or resentment towards management might be expressing a rationalisation for stealing from an organisation.

One example of the use of both financial and non-financial data is in the investigation of alleged financial reporting fraud. When an allegation is made that a company's financial statements have been intentionally manipulated, any of a large number of schemes come to mind. The most common fraudulent financial reporting schemes involve improper recognition of revenue, inflating turnover or sales through fictitious transactions or accelerating the recognition of legitimate transactions. So, a revenue inflation scheme will serve as our example.

To establish that the financial statements improperly reflect sales, electronic data from the sales and accounts receivable systems will need to be analysed in conjunction with physical or electronic records associated with customer orders, inventory, shipping and delivery, among others. By analysing these records, the investigator may establish that sales recognised by the company failed to conform to applicable accounting standards (e.g., International Financial Reporting Standards).

But accounting mistakes are common. For this scheme to be fraudulent, the subjects' dishonest intent to violate the accounting rules must be established. This is where analysis of emails and other electronic communications may be valuable. Perhaps email exchanges can be located documenting discussions of revenue shortfalls and methods of meeting budgeted figures. In this case, analysis of unstructured non-financial data may be one of the keys, along with interviews of subjects, to proving that the company intentionally violated their own policies and pertinent accounting principles.

Analysis of both financial and non-financial data is an important step in preparing to interview witnesses and subjects. Reading email and other communication chains before conducting the interview allows an investigator to plan the order and structure of questions to put the interviewer in the best position to identify conflicting statements and to obtain a confession.

Other investigation scenarios in which analysis of unstructured data association with communications between individuals include:

- collusion between multiple employees involved in the theft of cash or other tangible or intangible assets;
- bribery schemes in which the organisation has paid bribes, directly or indirectly, to obtain or retain business; and
- kickback schemes in which a vendor has paid a procurement official of the organisation to steer business to the vendor.

Use of external data in an investigation 22.8

Most data and documentation used in an investigation is internally generated – it comes from within the organisation or (in the case of invoices from a vendor) is otherwise readily available within the organisation. Occasionally, however, data or documentation that is only available from external sources becomes essential. External sources of data fall into two broad categories, public and non-public.

Public data and documents are those that are usually available to the general public either by visiting a website or facility or on request from the holder of the records. In most cases, public records are maintained by government agencies. Examples of public records vary significantly from one jurisdiction to another, but some that may be useful to investigators are:

- licences and permits issued by government agencies to individuals or businesses;
- records of ownership or transfers of ownership of property (e.g., sales of land and buildings);
- criminal convictions of individuals and organisations, and certain other court records; and
- business registrations and certain filings made by organisations.

Availability and the extent of these records can differ markedly as an investigator seeks information from different parts of the world.

Increasingly, public records may also include information that an individual voluntarily makes publicly available. For example, when an individual posts photos or makes statements on social media, this information might be readily available to any and all viewers. Once again, investigators should always use caution when accessing this information, especially if the information is only available to 'friends' or other contacts that the individual has granted special access to. But when social media information is made fully available to the general public, it can provide a treasure trove of information about a subject, such as:

- places the subject has visited;
- individual contacts;
- business relationships;
- assets owned; and
- past and present employers.

Another public source of information involves websites that do not require special password or other access privileges. For example, a company's website or that of a trade association or other membership group that a subject might be involved with could provide clues about the subject's relationships, travels and past.

Even information that is no longer on a website might still be available to an investigator. The Wayback Machine at www.archive.org is an archive of almost 500 billion past pages on the internet. Simply typing the URL of a website into the Wayback Machine will produce an index by date of prior versions of that website which have been archived and are available for viewing. Accordingly, an investigator may be able to find useful information from past editions of websites long after the information has been deleted.

Non-public records are private and confidential. Holders of these records are under no obligation to produce these records unless they have provided their consent or they are compelled to do so as a result of a legal process, such as a court order or subpoena. Records such as personal bank statements of individuals who may be the subject of an investigation fall into this category. Investigators normally do not have ready access to these records.

When assisting counsel with preparing a request for a subpoena or other court-ordered production of private records, an investigator should be as detailed and specific as possible. Overly broad requests are normally either denied or result in potentially lengthy delays. For example, if records associated with a bank account are requested, rather than requesting 'all records associated with the account', it is normally better to itemise a list of those records, such as by requesting copies of:

- bank statements for the relevant period;
- images of cleared checks;
- supporting documents for other debits from the account;
- signature cards; and
- application or other forms prepared to open the account.

A vendor's internal records would normally be non-public and the vendor may be under no obligation to provide them to an investigator. However, a properly worded right to audit or access to records provision included in the contract between the organisation and the vendor may provide access to some of the most important records an investigator might need if fraud or corruption involving a vendor is suspected. A well-crafted access-to-records clause can enable an investigator to request and view a wide variety of records, including:

- supporting documentation for invoices sent to the organisation by the vendor;
- accounting and payroll records;
- time records supporting employees' work efforts; and
- communications relevant to the vendor's relationship with the organisation.

If a vendor is suspected of inflating their billings to the organisation in any manner, or there are indications of collusion between an organisation employee and a vendor, one of the first steps an investigator should perform is to carefully review the terms of the contract to assess the organisation's rights to access these records.

Review of supporting documents and records 22.9

Studying the processes and internal controls involved in the transaction cycle in the investigation and the results from data analytics and email review will result in a population of documents and electronic records that are relevant. For example, in a corruption investigation, several paper documents or records may need to be reviewed:

- budgets;
- agent, distributor, supplier and customer contracts;
- bidding documents;
- margin data;
- price lists;
- market data;
- vendor set-up documents;
- sales by region, agent, territory and product;
- background checks;
- purchase order or purchase request;
- bill of lading or other confirmation of delivery of goods;
- signed confirmation for services provided;
- invoice from a vendor or supplier;
- cheque or disbursement request form; and
- banking records.

These records might be reviewed for many different reasons. Among the most common are:

- establishing a timeline of events;
- testing their clerical accuracy;
- reviewing for inconsistencies, anomalies and trends;
- reviewing for agreement with accounting records;
- reviewing for compliance with internal controls; and
- determining authenticity of the document, the vendor and the services rendered.

Testing for authenticity of the record itself or of individual signatures on documents normally involves a highly specialised skill, unless an anomaly is obvious. Accordingly, if an investigator suspects that a document on file is fraudulent or has been physically altered, or that a signature is not authentic, the document should be protected until someone with the specialised skills necessary to assess authenticity is called on. Examples of obvious deficiencies in documentation include:

- inconsistencies in addresses;
- lack of letterhead or other characteristics normally expected of a legitimate vendor;
- misspellings or other typographical errors;
- document at variance with vendor master file;
- inconsistencies in dates; and
- inconsistencies in vendor invoice numbers and sequencing.

In a corruption investigation, the authenticity or business purpose of an intermediary may be in question. The investigator should determine:

- the purpose of the intermediary;
- the principals behind the intermediary;
- the value, if any, of services rendered by the intermediary, to rule out use of the intermediary to create a slush fund or otherwise bribe a customer or influencer;
- life before or after the intermediary; and
- if the company documentation in connection with the intermediary is consistent with other intermediaries, policies and best practices.

22.10 Tracing assets and other methods of recovery

If the subject has misappropriated cash (via intercepting incoming funds intended for the organisation, stealing cash on hand, or fraudulently transferring funds from the organisation in connection with a disbursement fraud) one of the goals of most investigations is to secure the return of the funds. To do so, the investigation team must determine what the subject did with the money. Other sources of recovery may include culpable outside parties, including but not limited to collusive vendors, customers and agents. Coverage for employee dishonesty losses under insurance policies and fidelity bonds may also be possible.

If the subject misappropriates other assets, a similar question must be addressed – where are they? Often, when assets are stolen, the subject's goal is a conversion to cash by selling the stolen assets. In other cases, the stolen asset itself may be of use to the subject.

Depending on how assets were stolen, varying degrees of a trail might be left by the perpetrator, enabling the investigation team to forensically determine the flow of money after it has left the organisation. The trail may begin with the company's books and records. However, it is usually intentionally made opaque by fraudsters through money laundering techniques such as layering, transfers to shell companies, nominee shareholders and the use of clandestine communication techniques, cryptocurrencies, and tax havens where criminal law enforcement assistance may be less effective. Many of the records necessary to fully trace assets are non-public. But investigators are sometimes surprised to learn that a subject has left a public trail of valuable clues regarding the disposition or location of illegally obtained funds or assets that can be identified through indirect techniques, such as social media and internet due diligence, interviews of people in the know, establishing connections to the fraudster's other assets in more vulnerable venues and through multinational co-operation of law enforcement agencies.

Development bank forensic audit 22.11

One setting where forensic accountants have increased their presence in recent years is in forensic audits[3] in connection with multilateral development banks.

Multilateral development banks such as the World Bank Group, Inter-American Development Bank (IDB) and Asian Development Bank (ADB), have investigative offices within their organisations known as integrity departments.[4] Each of these integrity departments differs in name – Integrity-Vice Presidency (World Bank), Office of Institutional Integrity (at the IDB), Office of Anticorruption and Integrity (at the ADB) – but they share a similar mandate: the investigation of allegations of sanctionable practices within the scope of the broader development agenda of each bank.[5] These development banks have harmonised their anti-corruption principles and share many investigative approaches.[6] Since the purpose of these investigations is to determine the merits of allegations of corrupt and fraudulent practices, with the standard of proof being preponderance of the evidence, they are also an integral tool used more broadly in the oversight and mitigation functions of multilateral development banks. One senior forensic

3 A forensic audit is the application of specialised knowledge and investigative skills used to collect, analyse and evaluate evidential matter and to interpret and communicate findings in the courtroom, boardroom or other legal or administrative venue (Durkin and Ueltzen, 2009).

4 Other multilateral development banks also have integrity departments. These include European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, African Development Bank, European Investment Bank and Asian Infrastructure Development Bank, but for the purpose of this chapter, the writers are limiting their comments to the World Bank Group, Inter-American Development Bank and the Asian Development Bank.

5 World Bank, 'Annual Update Integrity Vice Presidency Fiscal Year 2017', http://www.worldbank.org/en/about/unit/integrity-vice-presidency (last accessed 20 August 2018); World Bank, 'Who We Are', http://www.worldbank.org/en/who-we-are (last accessed 20 August 2018); Inter-American Development Bank, '15 Years Standing Against Corruption', Office of Institutional Integrity and Sanctions Systems, 2017 Annual Report, http://idbdocs.iadb.org/wsdocs/getdocument.aspx?docnum=EZSHARE-1138756496-150 (last accessed 24 August 2018); Inter-American Development Bank, 'About Us', https://www.iadb.org/en/about-us/overview (last accessed 24 August 2018); Asian Development Bank, 'iACT for Integrity and Respect Office of Anti-corruption and Integrity 2017 Annual Report', https://www.adb.org/sites/default/files/institutional-document/408321/oai-ar2017.pdf (last accessed 24 August 2018); Asian Development Bank, 'Who We Are', https://www.adb.org/about/main (last accessed 24 August 2018).

6 Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank, 'AIIB Yearbook of International Law: Good Governance and Modern International Financial Institutions', https://www.aiib.org/en/about-aiib/who-we-are/yearbook/index.html (last accessed 22 August 2018); Asian Development Bank, 'Integrity Principles and Guidelines (2015)', https://www.adb.org/documents/integrity-principles-and-guidelines (last accessed 24 August 2018).

accountant from the World Bank noted the significance of forensic accounting in the bank's oversight function and its use to proactively reduce financial losses.[7] Moreover, in the World Bank's Integrity Vice Presidency's 2017 annual report, the forensic services unit conducted a total of 13 audits involving 19 entities and 31 contracts valued at more than US$518 million.[8] This annual report noted that 'forensic audits' were also utilised to strengthen the World Bank's fiduciary role and for risk management, in particular on the riskier projects.[9] In its 2017 annual report, the IDB's Office of Institutional Integrity noted its audit and inspection powers in its investigations. The IDB also alluded to the 'forensic audit' as an investigative tool.[10] Although the ADB's Office of Anticorruption and Integrity 2017 annual report did not cite forensic audits or inspection rights as an investigative tool, as discussed further below, the ADB in fact also has similar audit and inspection rights.[11]

The possible upshot of the significance of forensic accounting and exercise of audit and inspection rights in these multilateral development banks' investigation and oversight functions is that forensic accounting will continue to evolve and is likely to become one of the most valuable tools to protect their policies.

Procurement guidelines and inspection clauses

The procurement guidelines or policies from the World Bank, IDB and ADB in general state that all borrowers, bidders, suppliers, consultants and contractors must observe the highest ethical standards.[12] The purpose of these high standards is to ensure that these parties will not be involved in sanctionable practices such

7 Ferlatte, Ryna, 'Fighting corruption behind the scenes: The evolving and ever important role of forensic audits in international development', People, Spaces, Deliberation, World Bank, 13 May 2016, http://web.worldbank.org/archive/website01603/WEB/FIGHTING.HTM (last accessed 13 November 2019).

8 World Bank, 'Annual Update Integrity Vice Presidency Fiscal Year 2017', http://www.worldbank.org/en/about/unit/integrity-vice-presidency (last accessed 20 August 2018).

9 Ibid.

10 Inter-American Development Bank, '15 Years Standing Against Corruption', Office of Institutional Integrity and Sanctions Systems, 2017 Annual Report, http://idbdocs.iadb.org/wsdocs/getdocument.aspx?docnum=EZSHARE-1138756496-150 (last accessed 24 August 2018).

11 Asian Development Bank, Procurement Guidelines (April 2015) and Asian Development Bank, Guidelines on The Use of Consultants by Asian Development Bank and its Borrowers (March 2013).

12 World Bank, Guidelines: Procurement of Goods, Works, and Non-Consulting Services under IBRD Loans and IDA Credits & Grants by World Bank Borrowers (January 2011, revised July 2014) and World Bank Guidelines: Selection and Employment of Consultants under IBRD Loans and IDA Credits & Grants by World Bank Borrowers (January 2011, revised July 2014); Inter-American Development Bank, Policies for the Procurement of Goods and Works financed by the Inter-American Development Bank GN-2349-9 (March 2011) and Inter-American Development Bank, Policies for the Selection and Contracting of Consultants financed by the Inter-American Development Bank (March 2011); Asian Development Bank, Procurement Guidelines (April 2015) and Asian Development Bank, Guidelines on The Use of Consultants by Asian Development Bank and its Borrowers (March 2013).

as corrupt, fraudulent, coercive and collusive practices.[13] Within the context of these anti-corruption clauses, these procurement or policy guidelines also provide that a provision is required to be included in the request for proposals (or bidding documents) and any subsequent contracts that would permit the respective Banks to inspect documents related to the submission of proposal (or bids) and contract performance.[14] For example, the IDB's procurement policies provide for the insertion of an inspection clause, 'to permit the Bank to inspect any and all accounts, records and other documents relating to the submission or proposal (bid) and contract performance, as well as to have them audited by auditors appointed by the Bank.'[15] This clause provides for potential inspection or audit to be very broad in scope. The guidelines and policies from the World Bank, IDB and ADB provide no definitions or clarifications as to what specific accounts, records or other documents should be part of inspections and audits.[16]

When these inspection clauses are exercised during investigations by the integrity departments at these banks as part of their broader investigation against bidders, suppliers, consultants and contractors for alleged violations of sanctionable practices, a forensic accountant potentially has a wide latitude to review all kinds of financial documents, namely bank statements, tax invoices and vouchers. The senior forensic accountant at the World Bank mentioned above said that some of the World Bank forensic audits begin with complaints received by their integrity department and that, most commonly, their forensic audits reveal patterns of procurement fraud, conflict of interest, self-dealing, kickbacks, fraud in implementation and embezzlement of project funds.[17] In such cases, professional accounting skills coupled with an investigative mindset are used to uncover the misconduct.[18]

In summary, the forensic auditing of multilateral development banks as well as advising on the prevention, detection and mitigation of fraud and corruption constitute a significant growth area for forensic accountants.

Investigations involving national security interests 22.12

Forensic accountants engaged on investigations that involve national security interests require heightened sensitivity. Forensic accountants may find themselves involved in engagements where state secrets are either an integral or a tangential part of the assignment. For example, engagements related to the Committee on 13 Ibid.

14 Ibid.

15 Inter-American Development Bank, Policies for the Procurement of Goods and Works financed by the Inter-American Development Bank GN-2349-9 (March 2011) and Inter-American Development Bank, Policies for the Selection and Contracting of Consultants financed by the Inter-American Development Bank (March 2011).

16 Ibid.

17 Ferlatte, Ryna, 'Fighting corruption behind the scenes: The evolving and ever important role of forensic audits in international development', People, Spaces, Deliberation, World Bank, 13 May 2016, http://web.worldbank.org/archive/website01603/WEB/FIGHTING.HTM (last accessed 13 November 2019).

18 Ibid.

Foreign Investment in the United States (CFIUS), cross-border investigations or those involving entities employing a cross-border investment strategy may also, by their nature, involve intellectual property secrets of US companies who are contracted by the US government. This information may also be defined by CFIUS as 'protected data' in that any inadvertent or malicious release of this data can impact the national security of the United States. Several other types of engagements, including US Foreign Corrupt Practices Act investigations, international arbitrations and monitorships may present state-secret issues while not representing the core of the matter.

As technological innovation continues to dictate the rules of modern-day business, forensic accountants investigating entities employing a cross-border investment strategy should be cognisant of the complexities and heightened risks that arise due to national security interests. Special consideration should be given to the following emerging issues when dealing with companies that potentially pose national security risks.

22.12.1 IT infrastructure and potential segregation of client data

Forensic accountants should develop a customised risk profile at the onset of the investigation to assess possible cyberthreats, gaps in firm IT infrastructure controls, intrusion points and other high-risk scenarios. Subject to local law restrictions, the investigative team should consider separating physically and logically any client data received to prevent potentially virus-ridden files or malicious codes from being introduced or injected into firm networks. For example, consider using stand-alone servers with remote access (e.g., a Citrix environment) to review documents and conduct normal business activities during the investigation.

These safeguards, however, must be weighed against the practicalities of how the forensic accountants conduct their work – a careful balance needs to be struck between being vigilant and creating inefficiencies for the investigative team. Additionally, the views of the investigative team members should be taken into account – despite having the appropriate policy or protocols, a risk exists that they may be ignored if viewed by the engagement team members to be too strict or rigid. To the extent possible, less complex, user-friendly protocols should be implemented to encourage compliance, for example, the use of computers or devices with built-in heightened security features. Engagement teams may also consider implementing a cyber management centre operating round the clock to monitor and support the field team to lessen the burden on individuals.

While these options may be costly, it may be the most prudent approach to protect the investigative team from cyberthreats.

22.12.2 Compliance with data privacy laws and state secrecy law

Investigative teams should engage legal and IT infrastructure specialists experienced in navigating data privacy and state secrecy law issues to assist them with developing the appropriate protocols to ensure compliance. The specialists should have specific knowledge and experience of the local laws and regulatory authorities in the countries involved in the investigation. Forensic accountants should be cognisant that even the company under investigation may not have the authority to determine whether the information and data being provided to them in the normal course of its investigation is considered a state secret. It is important not to rely solely on the company's corporate legal and IT departments to make such determinations.

Nonetheless, forensic accountants should obtain written confirmation from the company under investigation explicitly stating that no state or commercial secret information is being provided, or to the extent it is, the company has obtained the appropriate authorisation to share such information. Furthermore, additional precautionary measures such as entering into confidentiality agreements for information exchanges should be considered.

Without external legal and IT infrastructure specialists, serious repercussions and risks potentially exist for the engagement team, including but not limited to possible arrest, detainment, etc. Depending on the nature of the investigation and the risk profile of the countries involved, the investigative team should develop a contingency plan and emergency protocol in the event a team member is detained, arrested or otherwise compromised.

Involvement of foreign nationals 22.12.3

If the engagement requires assistance from foreign nationals, the forensic accounting team should consider implementing safeguards to limit access to potentially sensitive documents to prevent unauthorised or inadvertent sharing of information. Any potentially sensitive documents should be shared on a 'need to know' basis and appropriately segregated from other engagement data and documents. Depending on the risk involved, certain engagements may, for example, necessitate compartmentalising any foreign national team member's access to systems to prevent 'insider threat' scenarios. While the foreign national team members themselves may not pose any imminent threat individually, their access to the data and the inner workings of the investigative team may subject them to be targeted by the intelligence services of the foreign country who may have a vested interest in the investigation.

Careful consideration should be given to the assigned roles and responsibilities of any foreign nationals. Additionally, forensic accountants should consider designating an engagement team coordinator to manage and track activities of foreign nationals to mitigate risks.

Use of translators 22.12.4

Forensic accountants should exercise caution when using translators on its investigations involving national security concerns. Translator candidates should undergo a full scope background check prior to being engaged to identify potential areas of concern (e.g., former media reporters, prior government employment, ties to other parties of interest). Additionally, it is not uncommon for embassies and other foreign government agencies to engage translators for their own purposes – potentially from the same translation vendors as the investigative team. As such, an increased counterintelligence risk exists. The forensic accounting team should develop specific protocols in regard to sharing information with translators providing them with only the basic information needed to perform their duties (e.g., brief background, objectives, specialised terms). The engagement team should avoid broader discussions on investigation planning or findings and observations when translators are present, to limit the potential risk of infiltration.

22.12.5 Countries with advanced intelligence gathering capabilities

Investigations involving countries, such as Russia or China, with advanced intelligence gathering may pose an increased risk to friends and family members of the engagement team and engagement vendors or contractors. It is not uncommon for the intelligence agencies of such countries to make contact with individuals associated with highly sensitive investigations to collect any intelligence available. Forensic accountants should consider imposing a strict travel protocol to prevent team members from having contact with foreign nationals or even friends and family residing in the countries where the company under investigation has a presence to avoid any unnecessary risks. Moreover, the investigation team should frequently reiterate the importance of confidentiality throughout the investigation to deter inadvertent leakage of information.

22.12.6 Companies with significant state support

Investigations into companies that receive significant state support may pose additional risk for engagement team members. Nation states could potentially target the investigation for surveillance. As such, forensic accountants should consider engaging counterintelligence professionals to assist from an engagement planning perspective. For example, investigative teams may consider engaging security professionals to perform due diligence on hotels and other locations to be frequented by the engagement team. Additionally, security professionals can assist with developing travel protocols, including best practices such as using the 'buddy system' (i.e., never travel alone), keeping a low profile and limiting travel within designated safe areas.

22.12.7 Foreign investment and particular US national security concerns

In addition to the foregoing engagement-specific considerations, forensic accountants should also be generally familiar with the impact of foreign investments in the United States and how those investments are viewed by the US government as a potential threat to national security. Although forensic accountants may not have any specific charge to review such foreign investments in conducting their work, their investigative procedures may reveal a percentage of foreign funds invested in US companies that constitutes 'control' of the company under investigation. CFIUS oversees the national security aspects of foreign direct investment in the US economy. Forensic accountants may have an obligation to report findings regarding foreign control to a company's general counsel to ensure awareness of the CFIUS regulations. The company's general counsel would then decide whether to file a voluntary notice with CFIUS.

Forensic accountants should be aware that CFIUS's purview now expands well beyond the common critical infrastructure industries, such as aerospace and defence, and other US government contractors that support US government agencies since President Trump signed into law the bipartisan Foreign Investment Risk Review Modernization Act in October 2018. The intensified scrutiny of certain industries expanded CFIUS's purview and designated 27 new 'critical technology' sub-industries.

CFIUS can no longer be an afterthought. Forensic accountants should recognise that investors are considering CFIUS reviews as a priority. Recent regulatory updates have empowered CFIUS to intervene much earlier in the investment transaction negotiation process. As a result, legal teams for potential foreign investors who are seeking to invest in certain US industries no longer question whether CFIUS should be involved, but rather how, and how early.

Conclusion 22.13

The rapid conversion of accounting and other records from paper-based systems to electronic systems, coupled with the explosion in the quantity and types of electronic data, has resulted in many changes in the field of forensic accounting and the requirements for investigations. Expertise in the evaluation and handling of electronic evidence is just one way in which forensic accounting has evolved. Focused and efficient use of data analytics as well as the ability to mine a universe of publicly available yet critical information regarding subjects, companies and their relationships are two additional ways in which forensic accounting has matured. On the other hand, operating within a web of global data privacy and other complex regulatory constraints can complicate the job of the forensic accountant. All in all, today's forensic accountants are significantly more successful in identifying, investigating and mitigating fraud than their counterparts in the past.

23

Negotiating Global Settlements: The UK Perspective

†Rod Fletcher and Nicholas Purnell QC[1]

23.1 Introduction

This chapter discusses the three main options that corporates typically consider when they are seeking to settle criminal and related proceedings in England and Wales – negotiated plea agreements, civil recovery orders (CROs) and, as of 24 February 2014, deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs).

Central to any consideration of criminal settlements in England and Wales is the identification principle under the common law, which defines the scope of corporate criminal liability. The principle states that the 'acts and state of mind' of only those who represent the 'directing mind and will' of the corporate will be imputed to it.[2] The application of this principle is generally restricted to the actions of the board of directors, the managing director and other senior officers carrying out managerial functions and acting and speaking as the corporate.[3] Historically, the identification principle has made it very difficult for authorities in the United Kingdom to convict corporates of any significant size. The English courts have, in certain situations, applied this rule of attribution to persons outside the board level, but this will depend on the construction of the particular offence in question.[4] This relatively narrow position should be contrasted with that in the United States, where corporates may be vicariously liable for the acts

1 Rod Fletcher was a partner at Herbert Smith Freehills LLP until his death in November 2019. Nicholas Purnell QC is head of Cloth Fair Chambers. This chapter was reviewed before publication by Susannah Cogman, a partner in Herbert Smith Freehills' corporate crime and investigations practice.

2 Lennards Carrying Co v. Asiatic Petroleum [1915] AC 705, Bolton Engineering Co v. Graham [1957] 1 QB 159 (per Denning LJ) and R v. Andrews Weatherfoil [1972] 56 Cr App R 31 CA.

3 Tesco Supermarkets Ltd v. Nattrass [1972] AC 153.

4 Meridian Global Funds Management Asia Ltd v. Securities Commission [1995] 2 AC 500 PC.

of their employees. This difference in the probability of a successful prosecution explains, in part, why settlement agreements are far more prevalent in the United States than in the United Kingdom.

The statutory landscape in the United Kingdom is changing to make the prosecution of corporates easier for authorities. Section 7 of the Bribery Act 2010 created criminal liability for corporates who fail to prevent 'associated persons' (potentially including agents, subsidiaries and other third parties as well as employees) from committing bribery. The Criminal Finances Act 2017 includes a similar offence of failure to prevent the facilitation of tax evasion. Under this offence (which came into force on 30 September 2017) prosecutors will need to prove that tax evasion has occurred, that a person facilitated this evasion and that the facilitator was a person associated with the accused corporate. This type of offence of 'failure to prevent' may become increasingly common. The former Director of the Serious Fraud Office (SFO), Sir David Green QC, called on a number of occasions for the failure-to-prevent offence to apply to all financial and economic crimes and in early 2017 the Ministry of Justice called for evidence in relation to the introduction of such an offence. The current Director of the SFO, Lisa Osofsky, has also advocated for such an extension, although her preference would be to replace the identification principle for corporate criminal liability with a vicarious liability model.[5] In March 2019, the UK Parliament's Treasury Select Committee published a report following its economic crime inquiry,[6] which included suggestions received from the SFO either to replace the identification principle with a form of vicarious liability[7] or to introduce a new offence of failing to prevent economic crime. The committee made no recommendation as to which suggestion it preferred but appears to have favoured extending the failure-to-prevent offence.[8] On 7 May 2019, the government published its response to the Treasury Select Committee's report, stating that its analysis of the responses to the call for evidence was concluded and that the Ministry of Justice will respond 'shortly'.[9] The heightened threat of a successful prosecution, which would result from the introduction of a broad failure-to-prevent offence for all financial and economic crimes, may in turn lead to an increase in the prevalence of settlements of criminal proceedings in England and Wales.

Each option for settlement currently available to a corporate has its own particular advantages and disadvantages, but a common feature is that they are all

5 http://data.parliament.uk/writtenevidence/committeeevidence.svc/evidencedocument/justice-committee/serious-fraud-office/oral/94785.pdf; https://www.lawgazette.co.uk/law/parliament-urged-to-create-all-encompassing-failure-to-prevent-law/5068369.article.

6 https://www.parliament.uk/business/committees/committees-a-z/commons-select/treasury-committee/news-parliament-2017/report-published-economic-crime-17-19/.

7 The SFO's proposal was that a company would be guilty of an offence if a person associated with it commits the relevant offence intending to obtain or retain business for the company; to obtain or retain a business advantage for the company; or otherwise to benefit the company (financially).

8 See comments made by a specialist legal adviser to the committee, https://www.lawgazette.co.uk/peers-call-for-speedier-bribery-investigations-/5069588.article.

9 https://publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm201719/cmselect/cmtreasy/2187/2187.pdf.

jurisdictionally limited in their effect to the United Kingdom. Where there are multiple investigating authorities, settlement negotiations in the United Kingdom will typically be approached as part of a larger, overarching strategy to settle current and prospective proceedings globally.

UK authorities are increasingly participating in global settlements, particularly with their US counterparts. It may yet be too early to identify any trends, although one distinct feature has emerged: the central role of the UK judiciary. The Innospec settlement was criticised by the senior judge who heard the case, Lord Justice Thomas, for being presented as a 'done deal',[10] and the DPA model introduced in the United Kingdom departs significantly from its US counterpart by being conditional on substantial judicial review and approval.[11]

Until the cases of SFO v. Sarclad Limited[12] and SFO v. Rolls-Royce PLC and Rolls-Royce Energy Systems Inc,[13] a further feature of settlements concluded by the UK authorities appeared to be that they were more likely to be successful if the criminal conduct had been contained to an isolated incident. For example, the Balfour Beatty plc settlement (which resulted in the first CRO against a corporate in the United Kingdom) related to one particular contract.[14] The first DPA in the United Kingdom, involving Standard Bank plc (now ICBC Standard Bank plc (Standard Bank)), concerned a particular debt transaction.[15] XYZ Ltd (Sarclad) involved an SME that generated the majority of its revenue via sales to Asian markets, through the systematic offer and payment of bribes to secure contracts in a number of foreign jurisdictions over the course of roughly eight years.[16] This conduct could not be said to be contained, involving as it did at least 28 separate contracts, although the misconduct was alleged to have been carried out by a small number of employees. Rolls-Royce involved corruption across multiple business lines in seven jurisdictions over the course of 24 years with the involvement of senior management, described in the judgment as 'egregious criminality' involving 'truly vast corrupt payments'.[17] Whether Rolls-Royce is the high-watermark of criminality in corporate settlements remains to be seen, but the trend in these cases suggests that isolated or contained criminality may no longer be a prerequisite for securing a settlement with UK authorities.

10 R v. Innospec Ltd [2010] 3 WLUK 784, [2010] Lloyd's Rep FC 462, [2010] Crim LR 665, at paras. 26 to 29 (Innospec).

11 Section 45 and Paragraph 7, Schedule 17, Crime and Courts Act 2013 (UK).

12 Serious Fraud Office v. XYZ Ltd (Case No. U20150856) [2016] 7 WLUK 220, [2016] Lloyd's Rep FC 509; the company in this case was originally anonymised as 'XYZ' to avoid prejudicing criminal proceedings against individuals arising out of the same facts. Following the acquittals of the individuals, the company was identified.

13 SFO v. Rolls-Royce PLC and Rolls-Royce Energy Systems Inc (Case No. U20170036) [2017] 1 WLUK 189, [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249 (Rolls-Royce).

14 'Balfour Beatty plc', press release dated 6 October 2008, SFO.

15 SFO v. Standard Bank plc (now ICBC Standard Bank Plc) (Case No. U20150854) [2015] 11 WLUK 804, [2016] Lloyd's Rep FC 102 (Standard Bank plc).

16 Serious Fraud Office v. XYZ Ltd (Case No. U20150856) [2016] 7 WLUK 211, [2016] Lloyd's Rep FC 517 at paras. 6, 7.

17 Rolls-Royce (Case No. U20170036) [2017] 1 WLUK 189, [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249, at para. 61.

Corporates facing proceedings in more than one jurisdiction could seek to settle each set of proceedings individually, but the idea behind a global settlement is to coordinate these negotiations. In theory, a global settlement should be a 'win-win' scenario for both the corporate and the investigating authorities. By acting in concert, the investigating authorities are able to exert more pressure on the corporate to settle than they each are likely to have been able to do in isolation. For the corporate, a global settlement is potentially a fairer outcome as the penalty will be assessed holistically. A global settlement also achieves more finality than a domestic prosecution, which confers only limited double jeopardy protection (in those jurisdictions where such protection is granted). As in Standard Bank, in Rolls-Royce, the corporate was required under the terms of the DPA to assist law enforcement agencies, regulators and multilateral development banks, including those overseas, at the reasonable request of the SFO. It was also recognised in the judgment that there remained a risk that Rolls-Royce would face liability in jurisdictions not covered by the global settlement involving the United Kingdom, the United States and Brazil.[18]

In practice, global settlements can involve significant risks. A recent example is the prosecution in Greece of former employees of Johnson & Johnson and its subsidiary, DePuy International Limited (DePuy), which included the prosecution of one individual, Robert Dougall, notwithstanding his 2010 prosecution by the SFO and conviction and sentence.[19] Although Dougall was acquitted in the Greek proceedings, this case demonstrates that no settlement can confer an absolute guarantee against further proceedings in any jurisdiction – particularly not in jurisdictions where there is no limitation period for criminal offences (as in the United Kingdom, other than for summary offences). Dougall's prosecution must be contrasted with the outcome of the SFO's investigation of DePuy. The company was investigated by the SFO following a referral from the United States Department of Justice (DOJ), which, along with other domestic and foreign authorities, had been investigating Johnson & Johnson in relation to payments made by DePuy to intermediaries for the purpose of making corrupt payments to Greek medical professionals working in the Greek public health system.[20] The DOJ concluded a DPA with Johnson & Johnson in the United States as part of a global settlement over the unlawful conduct in Greece.

The SFO sought a CRO against DePuy rather than pursuing any criminal prosecution on the basis that such prosecution was prevented in the United Kingdom by the principle of double jeopardy. The former Director of the SFO, Sir David Green QC, had taken the view that the underlying purpose of the rule against double jeopardy is to stop a defendant from being prosecuted twice for the same offence in different jurisdictions: Johnson & Johnson's DPA with the DOJ had the legal character of a formally concluded prosecution and punished

18 Ibid. at para. 68.

19 R v. Dougall [2010] EWCA Crim 1048 (Dougall).

20 'DePuy International Limited ordered to pay £4.829 million in Civil Recovery Order', press release dated 8 April 2011, SFO.

the same conduct in Greece that had been investigated by the SFO. That double jeopardy will be a bar to prosecution where a defendant has been convicted or acquitted by a foreign court on the same facts is uncontroversial,[21] but whether the conclusion of a DPA in the United States is equivalent to a formally concluded prosecution has not been tested in the courts. The SFO gave no detailed argument as to why it concluded that DePuy's prosecution in the United Kingdom was barred, and the application of the principles of double jeopardy in global settlements remains unclear.[22] The SFO's reasoning in relation to DePuy will also be problematic where as part of a global settlement it is seeking to agree its own DPA in the United Kingdom following their introduction in 2014. If the SFO considers itself prevented by the rules of double jeopardy from pursuing criminal prosecution against a corporate that has agreed a DPA or other settlement with foreign authorities, then it may be prevented from agreeing a DPA under the statutory regime in the United Kingdom as prosecution may always follow a DPA if its terms are breached.[23]

Furthermore, no settlement can prevent private civil litigation, which could potentially be assisted or even encouraged by material generated in connection with the settled proceedings. However, settlement could make civil action less likely (or at least less likely to be successful), than were a contested criminal trial to take place, by reducing the volume of material entering into the public domain as compared to a full trial of the facts.

Whether a global settlement is worth pursuing is therefore likely to depend very much on the circumstances of each case. A key consideration will be the jurisdictions and agencies involved, and the particular form or forms of settlement contemplated.

23.2 Initial considerations

This chapter assumes that the corporate has already decided that a settlement is desirable in principle. This is not a straightforward exercise and will involve many of the considerations discussed in the other chapters in this book. This is likely to include a comparison of the cost involved of agreeing a settlement (and any agreed financial penalty) as against the cost involved of defending criminal proceedings and the probability of a conviction (and any penalty imposed). It will also include the reputational damage that contested criminal proceedings may have on a corporate. Corporates should also consider that a criminal conviction

21 Treacy v. DPP [1971] AC 537 per Lord Diplock; see also the Decision of the Grand Chamber of the European Court of Justice in Kossowski (C-486/14, 29 June 2016), setting out the court's views on double jeopardy and its operation across EU Member States.

22 See the issue discussed in more detail in 'Deterring and Punishing Corporate Bribery: An evaluation of UK corporate plea agreements and civil recovery in overseas bribery cases', Transparency International UK policy paper published in May 2012, at paras. 353 to 361.

23 Paragraph 9, Schedule 17, Crime and Courts Act 2013 (UK).

for certain economic and financial crimes may exclude them from competing for certain public contracts.[24]

Of course a corporate may also successfully argue that the authority should not institute any proceedings against it: prosecutors must be satisfied of the evidential basis of the prosecution as well as the public interest in prosecuting.[25] Many investigations in the United Kingdom result in no further action being taken against the subject of the investigation.

The attractiveness of a settlement is likely to vary considerably depending on the conduct under investigation and the investigating authorities involved. It is also likely to depend on the form of settlement available – for example, the advantages to a corporate of agreeing to a DPA in the United Kingdom are likely to be very far removed from the advantages of agreeing to a DPA in the United States. In some circumstances a settlement in the United Kingdom might not be an attractive prospect when considered in isolation, but the ability to secure a linked settlement with investigating authorities in another jurisdiction could tip the balance in favour of seeking a UK settlement as part of a global resolution.

Given that a settlement may not always be an obvious choice, the reasons for seeking to settle and the reasons for choosing a particular form of settlement should be clear before negotiations commence. The initial assessment of the corporate's eligibility for the kind of settlement sought must be realistic, based on the best available information about the conduct and a thorough understanding of the attitude and approach adopted by the relevant authorities. The corporate will also need to be clear about the risks that settlement negotiations entail. In the event that the negotiations break down, the corporate might find itself in a worse position than it would have been in had it not entered into the negotiations in the first place. Finally, to demonstrate compliance with fiduciary obligations it will also be important to ensure that any decision makers have no personal interest in the outcome of settlement negotiations, as they would have if they were exposed to individual liability in connection with the conduct under investigation. This may be particularly complex in relation to small corporates where any decision-makers face individual liability for criminal conduct while simultaneously attracting liability to the corporate by acting as the directing mind and will.

Options for seeking a settlement 23.2.1

Civil recovery orders 23.2.1.1

A corporate could seek to persuade an investigating authority to dispose of an investigation by initiating civil recovery proceedings rather than a prosecution. This decision is not subject to judicial approval, as the decision on whether to prosecute rests solely with the prosecutor.

24 Public Contracts Regulations 2015 (UK); Public Contracts Directive, 2014/24/EU.

25 Crown Prosecution Service Guidance on Corporate Prosecutions, https://www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/corporate-prosecutions.

Civil recovery proceedings can be brought in the High Court by a number of UK enforcement agencies against property of a value in excess of £10,000 believed to have been obtained through unlawful conduct.[26] As a form of settling criminal proceedings a CRO has many features that could be helpful when a UK settlement is sought as one aspect of a global settlement. No prior UK conviction is required. The standard of proof is the civil one of the balance of probabilities. Judicial approval does not need to be sought before a claim can be brought, and the High Court's jurisdiction to make the order extends over assets located overseas; although it may in practice be tempered by the local law position on enforcement of orders that are not based on a conviction.

A CRO was for many years regarded as the best possible settlement outcome for corporates facing potential criminal proceedings in the United Kingdom, and an outcome that could plausibly be expected in a corporate self-reporting case. Two developments have impacted on this view.

First, under its current policy, the SFO will be less ready than it historically has been to dispose of an investigation by way of a CRO.[27] In part, this is a response to the OECD's criticisms of the UK's lack of commitment to combating bribery of foreign public officials.[28] In the event that the SFO were to agree to a CRO, its terms will now be published in full, which removes some of the historically perceived benefit of this form of settlement.[29]

Secondly, the SFO has demonstrated that civil recovery proceedings and criminal proceedings are not necessarily mutually exclusive provided that the conduct can be divided. In conjunction with the conviction of Bruce Hall in 2012 and the making of a confiscation order and compensation order against him, the SFO brought civil recovery proceedings in respect of conduct falling outside the scope of the indictment because UK jurisdiction did not arise.[30] This has to be considered, however, against the background of the criticism by Thomas LJ in Innospec of the use of a CRO in addition to trial on indictment; Thomas LJ concluded that where the facts and public interest determined that a prosecution was appropriate, the use of the civil jurisdiction was consequently inappropriate. In particular, the 26 Part V, Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (UK) (POCA). Section 316 of POCA defines 'enforcement authority' in England and Wales as the National Crime Agency, the Director of Public Prosecutions or the Director of the SFO. The financial threshold of £10,000 is set in section 287, POCA and the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (Financial Threshold for Civil Recovery) Order 2003 (UK).

27 Guidance on Corporate self-reporting, issued by the SFO, revised in October 2012. Note also the position in Scotland where the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service issued guidance in June 2017 stating that prosecutors may consider civil settlement for corporates that self-report offences under the Bribery Act 2010.

28 'Report on the Application of the Convention on Combating of Foreign Public Officials in International Business Transactions and the 1997 Recommendations on Combating Bribery in International Business Transactions', approved and adopted by the OECD Working Group on Bribery in International Business Transactions on 16 October 2008.

29 Statement of David Green QC, then Director of the SFO, 17 April 2013. See, e.g., 'Oxford Publishing Ltd to pay almost £1.9 million as settlement after admitting unlawful conduct in its East African operations', press release dated 3 July 2012, SFO.

30 'Bruce Hall sentenced to 16 months in prison', press release dated 22 July 2014, SFO.

judge deprecated the possibility of matters arising in the same case coming within the jurisdiction of two separate judges from two separate courts. In contrast, the use of a CRO for DePuy was less problematic as the corporate was not the subject of an indictment.

See Section 23.1

Deferred prosecution agreements 23.2.1.2

A DPA may be regarded as the half-way house between a negotiated plea agreement and a CRO. It remains to be seen whether it will be a popular form of settlement or whether it will be confined to isolated instances. First, a DPA is only available in limited circumstances. Secondly, the power to apply to the courts for a DPA rests solely with the prosecutor,[31] and the DPA provisions reserve to the prosecutor (currently only the SFO or the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS)) the right to extend any invitation to enter into DPA negotiations. Thirdly, as was identified by the former Director of the SFO,[32] the high threshold for corporate criminal liability under English law reduces the incentive for corporates to enter into a DPA at all. To date, all five DPAs secured in the United Kingdom have not faced any difficult application of corporate criminal liability: Standard Bank plc related to the strict liability offence of failing to prevent bribery under section 7 of the Bribery Act 2010; XYZ Ltd (Sarclad) applied to a small company in which the directing mind and will was easily identified; Rolls-Royce related to the strict liability offence of failing to prevent bribery as well as substantive offences of bribery and corruption involving, on the facts as admitted by Rolls-Royce for the purposes of the DPA, controlling minds of the company; and in Tesco Stores Limited[33] and Serco Geografix Limited,[34] the alleged offences were said to have been committed by a number of senior individuals who the parties accepted constituted the directing mind and will of the respective companies. Experience will demonstrate to what extent a corporate entity can introduce the possibility of a DPA into any discussions it may hold with the SFO.[35]

In theory, a DPA should be an attractive form of settlement as the corporate is never actually prosecuted, avoiding some of the stigma and adverse publicity necessarily associated with a criminal trial and a conviction. A corporate will have the opportunity to make representations on and to influence the terms of the settlement that is made public, and there will be no mandatory debarment from public contracts. Importantly, a DPA may be part of a global resolution that may be in the overall commercial interests of the corporate.

The corporate is nevertheless the subject of criminal proceedings that are suspended. The offences alleged to have been committed are particularised in an 31 See Paragraph 8, Schedule 17, Crime and Courts Act 2013 (UK).

32 Sir David Green QC, then Director of the SFO, speech given at Pinsent Masons and Legal Week Regulatory Reform and Enforcement Conference, 24 October 2013.

33 SFO v. Tesco Stores Limited (Case No. U20170287) [2017] 4 WLUK 558.

34 SFO v. Serco Geografix Limited [2019] 7 WLUK 45 (Serco Geografix Limited).

35 Deferred Prosecution Agreement Code of Practice, issued by the Director of Public Prosecutions and Director of the SFO (DPA Code of Practice), at para. 2.1.

indictment, and further detailed in the statement of facts accompanying the DPA. The terms of the DPA will include not only a penalty intended to reflect the penalty that would have been imposed on a guilty plea but also disgorgement of profits and potentially compensation payments. Unlike a criminal sentence, a DPA may extend to requiring the corporate to submit to a compliance monitor for a specified period.[36]

The terms of the DPA may require the corporate to disgorge the gross profit made as a result of the criminal conduct.[37] The DPA may also impose a financial penalty,[38] which must be broadly comparable to the fine that a court would have imposed on conviction and is accordingly assessed by reference to the relevant Sentencing Guideline for fraud, bribery and money laundering offences (Sentencing Guideline).[39] Where the corporate has limited means and ability to meet these financial obligations, the court may nevertheless approve a penalty that would render the corporate insolvent where it would be in the interests of justice to do so.[40] Among other things, the court will consider the impact of any financial penalty on the corporate's staff, service users, customers and the local economy. In XYZ Ltd (Sarclad), the corporate's parent agreed to provide financial support to Sarclad by returning almost £2 million from dividends received for Sarclad to pay towards disgorgement.[41] The court made clear that the innocent parent was under no contractual or legal obligation to contribute towards the financial penalty imposed on its subsidiary for the criminal conduct.[42] However, the court did point out that the parent had received £6 million in dividend payments since acquiring Sarclad.

In Rolls-Royce, the total financial orders (including those imposed in the United States and Brazil) amounted to over £650 million even after a 50 per cent reduction to the UK element of the financial penalty in recognition of Rolls-Royce's 'extraordinary' co-operation.[43] The Court was satisfied that this figure was sufficient to bring home to both management and shareholders the need to operate within the law without being so high as to put Rolls-Royce out of business, which would have been inappropriate in the circumstances.[44]

In Serco Geografix Limited, the company was ordered to pay a financial penalty of £19.2 million and the SFO's investigative costs of £3,723,679. The company would also have been required to pay compensation of £12.8 million, but this was 36 Schedule 17, Crime and Courts Act 2013 (UK).

37 Paragraph 5(3)(d), Schedule 17, Crime and Courts Act 2013 (UK).

38 Paragraph 5(3)(a), Schedule 17, Crime and Courts Act 2013 (UK).

39 Fraud, bribery and money laundering offences: Definitive guideline, issued by the Sentencing Council, in force from 1 October 2014.

40 Serious Fraud Office v. XYZ Ltd (Case No. U20150856) [2016] 7 WLUK 220, [2016] Lloyd's Rep FC 509 at paras. 23, 24.

41 Ibid. at para. 22.

42 Ibid. at para. 21.

43 Rolls-Royce (Case No. U20170036) [2017] 1 WLUK 189, [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249 at para. 128.

44 Ibid. at para. 127.

fully offset by payments made pursuant to Serco Limited's 2013 settlement agreement with the UK Ministry of Justice.[45]

The process of negotiating a DPA could itself deter a corporate from seeking this sort of settlement. It is lengthy and uncertain, as any agreement reached with the relevant prosecuting authority is ultimately conditional on judicial approval. It is accompanied by potentially as great a degree of public scrutiny as may be attracted by contested criminal proceedings. The provision of false, misleading or incomplete information to the relevant prosecuting authority could amount to an offence,[46] and it can be extremely challenging for a corporate, and the relevant individual within the management structure, to certify that the material provided to the investigating agency is complete.

The DPA may become a more attractive option for corporates if there is more flexibility on the terms imposed and if higher discounts to financial penalties or sentences continue to be applied. With respect to increased discounts, the DOJ's enhancements to its Pilot Program could be of interest to the SFO. In November 2017, the DOJ announced that the Pilot Program it launched in 2016 to encourage companies to self-report potential violations of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA) would be made permanent and incorporated into the United States Attorneys' Manual (now known as the Justice Manual), subject to some amendments.[47] Under the revised FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy, where a company 'satisfies' the DOJ's standards of self-reporting, co-operating and remediating, there will be a 'presumption' that the government will resolve the matter with a declination – unless there are aggravating circumstances (for example, recidivism). However, even where circumstances 'compel' an enforcement action, the DOJ will recommend a 50 per cent reduction off the low end of the Sentencing Guideline fine range for self-reporting companies.

In the DPA reached with Sarclad, the court stated that a discount of 50 per cent to the financial penalty that would have been imposed[48] was appropriate, given that the corporate had self-reported and admitted the criminal conduct far in advance of the earliest possible opportunity that would have applied after a criminal charge.[49] This sizeable reduction was not based on an application of the Sentencing Guideline or the DPA statutory provisions themselves.

45 Serco Geografix Limited [2019] 7 WLUK 45 at para. 37.

46 For example, for attempting to pervert the course of justice, contrary to the common law. Prosecution of the offence that is the subject of the DPA can also follow if the organisation provided information to the SFO that it knew or ought to have known was inaccurate, misleading or incomplete, see XYZ Ltd (Sarclad) and Rolls-Royce.

47 'Deputy Attorney General Rosenstein Delivers Remarks at the 34th International Conference on the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act' Press release, 29 November 2017.

48 In fact, as the judge made clear, the question of a penalty was 'academic because, given the amount disgorged, whatever multiplier is chosen and however substantial the discounts, the result is a figure which Sarclad simply cannot pay and which would result in its insolvency.', at para. 55.

49 Serious Fraud Office v. XYZ Ltd (Case No. U20150856) [2016] 7 WLUK 211, [2016] Lloyd's Rep FC 517.

Even more surprising (at first glance) was the application of a 50 per cent discount to the financial penalty in Rolls-Royce, where the corporate did not make the initial self-report.[50] The initial report of suspicions of criminality in the corporate's civil business in Asia came from public internet postings and precipitated the SFO's investigation; however, this led to an immediate and extensive investigation by the corporate during which it made a number of voluntary reports to the SFO in respect of other business lines in multiple jurisdictions.[51] Rolls-Royce's co-operation with the SFO and other authorities was said to be 'extraordinary'.[52] Rolls-Royce took a number of steps in addition to the extensive investigation and voluntary reports to authorities: it reviewed relationships with intermediaries, agents, advisers and consultants; provided over 30 million documents in electronic and hard copy form (Rolls-Royce agreed to the use of digital methods to identify privilege issues in the material and the use of independent counsel in relation to the privilege review); allowed the SFO to interview witnesses first and waived privilege over its own internal interview memoranda; provided material to the SFO voluntarily (without need for recourse to compulsory powers); consulted with the SFO in respect of media coverage; provided all financial data sought by the SFO and co-operated with financial assessments undertaken; and sought the SFO's permission before winding up companies that may have been implicated in the SFO's investigation.

The SFO submitted that in the particular circumstances of the case, the Court should not distinguish between the corporate's assistance and that of those who have self-reported from the outset. This was accepted on the basis that what Rolls-Royce reported was far more extensive and of a different order than might have been exposed without its co-operation.[53] The Court was satisfied that, from the moment of the initial question from the SFO prompted by the public postings on the internet, Rolls-Royce could not have done more to expose its own misconduct. Self-reporting was said in the judgment to be a core purpose of DPAs, and the weight this attracts depends on the totality of the information provided; it seems that the measures that Rolls-Royce took to unearth and report the extent of the criminality made up for the absence of an initial self-report.[54]

The decision in Serco Geografix Limited revisited the issue of self-reporting and co-operation. In his concluding comments, Mr Justice Davis noted that any cynicism about the process by which a corporate entity can take advantage of a DPA 'is not well-founded' and that approval will only be given where there is the 'clearest possible demonstration of integrity' on the part of the relevant company, which will require self-reporting, full co-operation with the investigation, a willingness to learn lessons and acceptance of an appropriate penalty. He added that a willingness to learn lessons must be shown via 'real, substantial and continuing

50 Rolls-Royce (Case No. U20170036) [2017] [2017] 1 WLUK 189, Lloyd's Rep FC 249 at para. 123.

51 Ibid. at para. 17.

52 Ibid. at paras. 16 to 20 and 121.

53 Ibid. at para. 22.

54 Ibid. at para. 38.

remedial measures'.[55] The court proceeded to apply a 50 per cent discount and referred to the fact that in all but one of the earlier instances of approval of DPAs, the financial penalty has been discounted by 50 per cent rather than one third. This was found to 'encourage corporate responsibility in terms of early reporting of criminal conduct'.[56]

There is a clear view among practitioners that the incentives to enter into a DPA, in particular the apparent maximum discount on penalty, embedded within the statutory scheme,[57] of one-third (the same as for an early guilty plea) is insufficient and fails to recognise the positive factors in the conduct of the corporate that will have led to the offer of a DPA in the first place. This view appears to have been accepted by the SFO and the judiciary, as a 50 per cent reduction has been applied on each occasion since the Standard Bank plc DPA.

Negotiated plea agreements 23.2.1.3

A plea agreement can be negotiated with the prosecutor at any stage after indictment, up to the conclusion of the trial. It may be preceded by advance representations on charge, which a prosecutor is under no obligation to consider but may do so at his or her discretion. Both advance representations and plea agreements could potentially reduce the scope of the conduct charged, or even determine the nature of the offence charged; as seen in BAE Systems,[58] where the corporate had been investigated for overseas corruption but pleaded guilty to knowingly procuring the failure of its subsidiary, British Aerospace Defence Systems Ltd (BADS), to comply with the provisions of section 221 of the Companies Act 1985, and thereby aiding and abetting, counselling and procuring the commission of the offence contrary to section 225 of the Companies Act, by the officers of BADS.[59] In BAE Systems, Mr Justice Bean was critical of the restriction on the scope of the conduct in the settlement reached between the corporate and the SFO, and in light of these criticisms prosecuting authorities may in future be less willing to minimise the conduct in negotiated plea agreements.[60] Mr Justice Bean made clear that in cases involving negotiated plea agreements the judge will not be bound by the agreement between the prosecution and the defence, and the prosecution's view on the proposed basis of the plea is deemed to be conditional on the judge's acceptance of the basis of the plea.[61] The judge made clear that the involvement of the criminal courts precludes the passing of a sentence on an artificial

55 Serco Geografix Limited [2019] 7 WLUK 45 at para. 47.

56 Ibid. at para. 37.

57 Schedule 17 Paragraph 5(4), Crown and Courts Act 2013 (UK).

58 R v. BAE Systems plc [2010] EW Misc 16 (CC) (BAE Systems).

59 Corruption and Misuse of Public Office (2nd Ed.), Collin Nichols QC, Timothy Daniel, Alan Bacarese and John Hatchard, at p. 39.

60 BAE Systems at para. 13.

61 R v. Underwood [2004] EWCA Crim 2256; BAE Systems at para. 13.

basis. While Mr Justice Bean accepted the basis of the sentence in BAE Systems, this may not always be the case.[62]

The judge also expressed surprise that the SFO had committed to a blanket indemnity against investigations or prosecutions of any member of the BAE Systems group for past conduct whether disclosed or otherwise.[63]

However, even if the charges remain unchanged, a guilty plea at the earliest possible stage makes the corporate eligible for a reduction of up to one-third off the sentence that would otherwise have been imposed on conviction.[64]

UK prosecutors will always be open to negotiations on plea. The prosecution and the defence are in all cases required to resolve issues and agree evidence wherever possible prior to trial.[65] The prosecutor must, however, have regard to any applicable restraints on the exercise of discretion, including the Witness Charter and the Code of Practice for Victims of Crime.[66] In accordance with the Code for Crown Prosecutors, prosecutors will also need to ensure that the plea reflects the seriousness and extent of the offending.[67] The Attorney General's Guidelines to the legal profession state that prosecutors must not agree to a basis of plea that is misleading, untrue or illogical or insupportable.[68] Where a case involves multiple defendants, the bases of plea must be factually consistent. Trial judges may ultimately, of their own motion, disregard the agreement and direct a 'Newton' hearing to establish the relevant facts.[69]

Just as the decision on whether to accept a proposed basis of plea is ultimately one for the trial court, it is similarly for the sentencing court to impose the sentence on conviction. In cases of serious and complex fraud the Attorney General's Guidelines permit the prosecution and defence to present a joint written submission to the court on sentence but this is not binding on the court. In Dougall, the court declined to impose the SFO's suggested suspended sentence on an assisting offender, although the custodial sentence that the court did impose was overturned on appeal. The Court of Appeal criticised the SFO for adopting a role that was more akin to that of the defence. The courts in BAE Systems and in Innospec felt compelled to accept the suggested sentences because they formed part of a global settlement that the corporate entity had been invited to accept (and 62 The principles underlying this reasoning are also reflected in the statutory regime for DPAs, which must be approved by a judge as being in the interests of justice; see further Section 23.2.1.2.

63 BAE Systems at para. 5.

64 Reduction in Sentence for a Guilty Plea: Definitive guideline, Sentencing Council, 23 July 2007, at para. 4.2 (for cases where the first hearing was before 1 June 2017); Reduction in Sentence for a Guilty Plea: Definitive Guideline, Sentencing Council, 7 March 2017, para. D1 (for cases where the first hearing was after 1 June 2017).

65 Rule 3.3, Criminal Procedure Rules 2015 (UK).

66 The Witness Charter, issued by the Ministry of Justice, December 2013; Code of Practice for Victims of Crime, issued by the Ministry of Justice, October 2015, last updated 8 October 2018.

67 The Code for Crown Prosecutors, October 2018, at para. 9.

68 See 'Plea discussions in cases of serious or complex fraud', 29 November 2012; and 'The acceptance of pleas and the prosecutor's role in the sentencing exercise', 30 November 2012, Attorney General's Office.

69 Consolidated Criminal Practice Direction, at para. IV.45.10.

because of the corporate's limited financial resources in Innospec), but Thomas LJ in Innospec warned that this approach would not be repeated in the future.

The attractiveness of a plea agreement to a corporate will depend largely on the weight of the prosecution evidence, including the existence of any co-operating co-offenders under the 'offender assistance' provisions set out in sections 71 to 75 of the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005. In particular, the corporate's willingness to plead is likely to reflect an assessment that the prosecutor would be able to establish corporate criminal liability. As mentioned in the introduction to this chapter, guilty pleas by corporates are more likely to be forthcoming for offences where the identification principle does not apply or liability is strict, or both, or where the corporate is small and lines of responsibility are clear; by contrast, the prosecution might in other cases struggle to identify culpable senior management.

The size of the likely penalty will also be a factor when the corporate is considering whether to plead. There is an established procedure in place by which a defendant in Crown Court proceedings can seek a binding indication from the trial judge of what sentence would be imposed on a guilty plea (Goodyear indication).[70] That Guideline may have similarly increased the attractiveness of plea agreements for corporates, not only by making the likely sentence more predictable at an even earlier (pretrial) stage but also by increasing the risk of higher penalties being imposed than has historically been the case and thereby incentivising an early, negotiated settlement.

The downsides of a plea agreement include the inability to contest the charges in a public forum, and loss of the opportunity of an acquittal. The advantages of a plea agreement also decline rapidly with time once a trial is under way.

There are also risks arising from plea negotiations. The Attorney General's Guidelines state that the prosecutor may not rely on the defendant's participation in plea negotiations or on any information disclosed during those negotiations as evidence against the defendant in the event that the negotiations fail but a signed plea agreement can be relied on as confession evidence against the defendant. A prosecutor would normally be free to rely on any evidence gathered as a result of enquiries made on the back of information disclosed in the course of the negotiations, and information provided by the defendant in connection with the negotiations could normally be relied on both in related prosecutions of other defendants and in a prosecution of the defendant for another offence. In addition, the prosecutor might be obliged to disclose material relevant to the negotiations to a co-defendant.

70 In accordance with R v. Goodyear [2005] EWCA Crim 888 and by reference to the Sentencing Guideline.

23.2.2 Strategic considerations when seeking a settlement in the United Kingdom

Once a corporate has decided in principle to seek to settle criminal proceedings in the United Kingdom, the objective will be to achieve the desired form of settlement as effectively as possible, avoiding or minimising, to the extent possible, adverse consequences. This section will discuss common strategic considerations that are likely to arise at the outset and during the early stages of settlement negotiations.

23.2.2.1 Timing of settlement

A preliminary strategic consideration will be the point at which to approach the relevant authority. On the one hand, a successful outcome is more likely the earlier an approach is made. The financial and reputational costs to a corporate of being a subject of a criminal investigation and prosecution will increase incrementally and early self-reporting is an important factor in determining whether a DPA will be offered. Clearly, however, the corporate needs to have sufficient knowledge about the conduct it proposes to report.

A corporate may self-report the conduct in question or otherwise bring it to the attention of relevant authorities, for example, pursuant to money laundering reporting obligations or, for listed corporations, obligations to disclose information to the market. The SFO had published guidance on self-reporting in 2012[71] and has recently published internal guidance outlining what it considers to be good practice with respect to co-operation by a company under investigation.[72]

In all other cases the determining factor is likely to be the type of settlement sought. Where the favoured outcome is a CRO, the driver will be to reach agreement on this form of alternative disposal before any steps are taken to initiate criminal proceedings. If the preferred form of settlement is a DPA, the timing of the settlement will be dictated by the DPA Code of Practice, but again will involve negotiations with the authority before the commencement of criminal proceedings. A settlement could be reached at any of the following points in time.

See Section 23.2.1.2

Before major production of documents

A corporate must balance the need to understand any potential criminal liability it faces with the benefit of making an early report to an authority. As stated above, corporates should establish sufficient knowledge of the circumstances before deciding to seek a settlement. Once that decision has been made, it is unlikely that an agency in the United Kingdom will be prepared to reach a settlement agreement without receiving all relevant documentation and undertaking some form of investigation. Once in the hands of the authorities, any material provided could be used against the corporate and individuals. In addition, such 71 Guidance on Corporate self-reporting, issued by the SFO, revised in October 2012. See also the Guidance on corporate prosecutions issued by the Director of Public Prosecutions, the Director of the SFO and the Director of the Revenue and Customs Prosecutions Office, issued in 2009/2010.

72 Corporate Co-operation Guidance, issued by the SFO, on 6 August 2019.

material can be provided to other domestic and international agencies and may ultimately be disclosed in any related civil proceedings. It has to be assumed that documents provided to investigating agencies may ultimately end up in the public domain.

Before witness testimony

To the extent that corporates record any interviews they conduct, UK authorities are likely to want access to these first accounts, which may raise issues of legal professional privilege. The Court of Appeal's judgment in Director of the SFO v. ENRC[73] has brought some much-needed clarity to this area of the law, following two conflicting first-instance decisions of the English High Court.[74]

The Court of Appeal in ENRC disagreed with the High Court's strict approach to whether notes of interviews attract litigation privilege. The High Court had concluded that only a prosecution, and not an investigation, amounts to 'litigation' and that 'contemplation' of a criminal investigation does not necessarily equate to the contemplation of prosecution, such that the first limb of the test for litigation privilege would be satisfied (namely that litigation is in progress or in reasonable contemplation). However, the Court of Appeal disagreed with this analysis, finding that uncertainty over whether criminal proceedings were likely would not in itself prevent litigation from being in reasonable contemplation, and that the whole subtext of the relationship between the relevant company and the authorities was important. In this case, the court found that the relationship between ENRC and the SFO meant that there was a possibility, if not a likelihood, of prosecution if the self-reporting process did not result in a settlement. The court also said that where the SFO made explicitly clear in its communications to the company that there was the prospect of a criminal prosecution, and external legal advisers were engaged to deal with that possibility, there was a clear ground for contending that criminal prosecution, and therefore litigation, was in reasonable contemplation at the time the interview notes were prepared.

The Court of Appeal also disagreed with the High Court's restrictive position on whether notes of interviews were prepared for the dominant purpose of litigation, which is the second limb of the test for litigation privilege. It found that the need to investigate the existence of alleged corruption was a subset of defending the litigation, and hence that notes made in interviews during the investigation stage were made for the dominant purpose of litigation.

This decision underlines the importance of obtaining advice when corporates need to conduct and create records of interviews during the fact-finding stage of an investigation, and before a prosecution decision is made by the authorities, to understand the alleged facts and any potential liability. Ordinarily, the SFO will still conduct interviews as part of its investigations following a self-report, even where there have already been interviews by the corporate. Nevertheless, the authorities may in some cases expect a corporate that wishes to obtain credit for co-operating, to waive privilege over certain documents that have been prepared during the investigation stage for the dominant purpose of engaging in settlement negotiations with the authorities. The SFO's recently published internal guidance on corporate co-operation[75] states that in addition to witness accounts, companies seeking credit for co-operating should provide any recording, notes and transcripts of interviews and identify a witness competent to speak to the contents of each interview. Legal advice on the limitations that should be explicitly placed on any privilege waiver a corporate proposes to provide is an essential safeguard.

73 Director of the SFO v. ENRC [2018] EWCA Civ 2006.

74 Director of the SFO v. ENRC [2017] EWHC 1017 (QB) and Bilta (UK) Ltd & Ors. v. Royal Bank of Scotland and Mercuria Energy Europe Trading Ltd [2017] EWHC 3535 (Ch.).

Before indictment

In most cases, corporates will be seeking to settle before indictment. As discussed above, settlement negotiations may provide an opportunity to influence the content and timing of the indictment.

Before trial

A settlement at the early stages of criminal proceedings may help to mitigate reputational damage by reducing the amount of material made available to the authorities and, through them, potentially becoming available in the public domain or to other overseas agencies.

There may yet be benefits of settling after the commencement of trial. Although disclosure obligations will have been complied with and material may have been referred to in open court (thereby becoming accessible to the public), by avoiding witness testimony the corporate may minimise the risk of further reputational and other costs as a result of adverse prosecution testimony or unpredictable defence witnesses. Settling before conviction could potentially also serve a public relations objective in presenting the corporate publicly as being somewhat co-operative (despite initially contesting the proceedings).

23.2.2.2 Ability to secure a global settlement

An early settlement of UK criminal proceedings may also increase the prospects of concluding a global settlement. In the global settlement scenario, timing is likely to be primarily driven by the authority 'leading' the settlement negotiations. As press reports suggested in relation to the LIBOR investigation, there can be a 'race' among investigating authorities to charge defendants as a means of securing jurisdiction.[76]

Where a number of authorities may be investigating or have an interest in investigating the conduct, the potential for conflicts of jurisdiction to arise should be addressed by communications between prosecutors pursuant to multilateral

75 Corporate Co-operation Guidance, issued by the SFO, on 6 August 2019.

76 See, e.g., 'US DoJ issues arrest warrant for Briton in Libor probe', Caroline Binham, 6 February 2015, Financial Times.

and bilateral agreements such as the Eurojust guidelines for deciding which jurisdiction should prosecute and the Agreement for Handling Criminal Cases with Concurrent Jurisdiction between the United Kingdom and the United States.[77] Prosecutors engaged in plea negotiations in serious and complex fraud cases are directed by the Attorney General's Guidelines to liaise with any counterparts known to have an interest in the defendant, in accordance with the Prosecutors' Convention and any other relevant agreement or guidance.[78] However, these arrangements would not be enforceable by corporates who find themselves adversely affected by any departures from their terms; in any event, such agreements do not tend to address settlements.

In practice, constructive global settlement discussions require a high level of communication between the investigating agencies involved and also between the lawyers acting for the corporate and those investigating agencies. By way of example, in Standard Bank plc there was clearly a high level of communication between the SFO and the US DOJ (as well as between the bank's lawyers and both the SFO and the DOJ), which ultimately resulted in the DOJ confirming in writing in advance of the UK settlement that in view of the terms of the proposed settlement it did not propose to continue its own investigation.

The SEC, on the other hand, decided to continue with its own investigation into the civil (as opposed to criminal) consequences of the alleged conduct, which resulted in a separate settlement with the bank. Although the SEC's investigation related to separate issues, the bank completed its settlement with the SEC very shortly before the final DPA hearing in the United Kingdom and the settlement was announced on the same day. Coordinating the timing of the settlement so that it was announced at the same time was clearly in the bank's interests, as it ensured that the UK and US investigations into the conduct were resolved simultaneously, with the bank able then to draw a line under the events and focus on the future.

Similarly, in Rolls-Royce it was clear that substantial discussions had taken place between the SFO, the US DOJ and the Brazilian public prosecutor to ensure a coordinated global resolution of the relevant conduct; indeed, its DPA with the US DOJ was fully disclosed in the UK DPA proceedings,[79] and the DPA hearing in the United Kingdom was brought forward for reasons linked to the change in administration in the United States in January 2017.[80] Rolls-Royce announced settlements with those authorities in parallel with its DPA with the SFO. The corporate was apparently able to coordinate between prosecuting authorities such that it was prosecuted for different conduct in different jurisdictions;[81] it was also 77 Annex A – Eurojust Guidelines – 'Which Jurisdiction Should Prosecute?', Annual Report 2003, issued by Eurojust (revised in 2016); Agreement for Handling Criminal Cases with Concurrent Jurisdiction between the United Kingdom and the United States of America, January 2007.

78 Prosecutors' Convention 2009, agreed by a number of UK prosecuting authorities including, inter alia, the SFO, the FCA, the Crown Prosecution Service and the Attorney General's Office.

79 Rolls-Royce (Case No. U20170036) [2017] 1 WLUK 189, [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249 at para. 5.

80 Ibid. at paras. 10 and 12.

81 Ibid. 17 January 2017 at para. 5.

given US$25 million credit by the DOJ for fines paid in Brazil in relation to conduct that was overlapping between its DPA in the United States and its leniency agreement in Brazil.[82]

It is important to keep in mind when negotiating simultaneous settlements with multiple authorities and regulators (both at home and abroad) that the subject ensures that the published findings in each investigation concluded by a negotiated settlement are consistent, as authorities may have an incomplete understanding, or different interpretation, of the facts.

23.2.3 Written submissions to UK prosecuting authorities

One important risk that settlement negotiations pose for corporates is that the material generated will be relied on in the event that the negotiations break down; whether by the recipient authority or by third parties. Even if settlement negotiations will attract confidentiality to varying degrees, there will always be a number of avenues through which material provided to the authorities may be made available to other authorities and to third parties.

The extent to which settlement negotiations will generate material, and the extent to which such material may be protected from onwards disclosure, will depend on the form of settlement in question. Written submissions made to a prosecutor in the course of negotiating a plea agreement are confidential and will only be made available to third parties where it can be shown that the prosecutor's obligation to preserve confidentiality is outweighed by a countervailing interest.[83] In DPA negotiations, both the form and content of documents are governed by statute and are not negotiable. These documents will include the draft statement of facts and the terms of the proposed DPA, as well as the preliminary application to the court.[84] The prosecutor will require these documents to be agreed before the application to the court can proceed. They will also include any submissions contained in related correspondence with the prosecutor, as well as minutes of any meetings between the corporate and the prosecuting authority.

23.2.4 Oral presentations to UK prosecuting authorities

Presenting information orally, as an alternative to written submissions, could in theory reduce the risk that settlement negotiations pose for corporates by limiting the amount of incriminating documentary material generated in settlement negotiations or otherwise provided to the authorities. As a strategy it is obviously conditional on securing the agreement of the prosecuting authority, and is not as frequently encountered in the United Kingdom as in the United States; but the SFO is known to have acceded to requests of this nature on occasion. Notably, this 82 'Rolls-Royce plc Agrees to Pay $170 Million Criminal Penalty to Resolve Foreign Corrupt Practices Act Case', press release dated 17 January 2017, United States Department of Justice.

83 Guidance to accompany the Attorney General's Guidelines on Plea Discussions in cases of Serious or Complex Fraud, issued by the Director of Public Prosecutions, the Director of the SFO and the Director of the Revenue and Customs Prosecutions Office, 24 May 2012.

84 Paragraph 5, Schedule 17, Crime and Courts Act 2013 (UK).

approach was employed in relation to the first and second DPAs entered into in the United Kingdom. However, in the recent Administrative Court case of AL v. SFO,[85] the court, in the context of a criminal trial of individuals following the corporate's[86] entry into a DPA, criticised the use of 'oral proffers' as 'highly artificial' and expressed its surprise that the SFO did not more robustly demand the written notes of interviews made during an internal investigation. The judgment is likely to cause the SFO to be cautious about relying on oral proffers in future investigations and instead to more robustly challenge broad claims to privilege; a senior SFO manager has stated[87] that this decision emphasised the danger for the SFO in not challenging excessively wide claims of privilege. However, given the less restrictive approach taken to legal professional privilege by the Court of Appeal in ENRC, there is likely to be a tension between the authorities' desire to challenge wide claims to privilege and demand written notes of interviews, and the Court of Appeal's decision that written interview notes made during an internal investigation are capable of being covered by litigation privilege. Therefore although oral proffers may no longer be acceptable, the authorities and co-operating corporates may find themselves in a predicament. The corporate should avoid inadvertent waivers of privilege, and the SFO is also unable to demand written interview notes made while litigation was reasonably in contemplation, and for the dominant purpose of litigation, as interpreted by the Court of Appeal in ENRC. In such cases, it is possible that the authorities may stress the importance of a corporate's co-operation in settlement discussions and therefore seek voluntary waivers of privilege over such documents by the corporate.

See Section 23.4

It also raises the prospect that, in multi-agency settlements, there might be a divergence of approach between agencies that are content to receive oral proffers (e.g., the US Department of Justice, which regularly accepts them) and those that are not. Oral summaries of privileged information and material could still be considered by the prosecuting authority as a limited (or indeed full) waiver of privilege, as there is no settled case law in the United Kingdom on this point, which could create a risk of collateral waiver of privilege in other jurisdictions or over other material. If the underlying interviews were not privileged, a prosecutor's notes from the presentation could potentially be disclosed to third parties, without the corporate having an opportunity to confirm whether the impressions recorded are correct.

See Section 23.2.2.1

An indication of the possible approach of courts in the United Kingdom can be gleaned from a ruling in proceedings against Dennis Kerrison and Miltiades Papachristos (employees of Innospec)[88] in which His Honour Judge Goymer considered whether a PowerPoint presentation to the SFO/DOJ that referred

85 [2018] EWHC 856.

86 Now known to be Sarclad Limited.

87 20 June 2018 speech given at Herbert Smith Freehills Annual Corporate Crime and Investigations Conference 2018, available at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2018/06/21/corporate-criminal-liability-ai-and-dpas/.

88 13 May 2013 unreported.

to the notes of interviews conducted by the corporate with a prosecution witness amounted to a waiver of legal professional privilege in those interviews. The judge decided that there was not sufficient deployment of the interview notes in the PowerPoint presentation such as would amount to a collateral waiver of legal professional privilege in respect of those notes. It was conceded in argument that the PowerPoint presentation was subject to privilege, and as such there was no detailed discussion of the application of the principles of litigation privilege in this case. This is not always so in the investigations context, following Three Rivers No. 5.[89] The Court of Appeal has considered more recently the ambit of litigation privilege in one of the many cases relating to the SFO's investigation into the Tchenguiz brothers, stressing the importance of the 'dominant purpose' test.[90]

23.3 Legal considerations

Settlement negotiations should only be undertaken with a thorough understanding of the legal framework that governs the particular form of settlement pursued, and any relevant policies that govern the approach adopted by the relevant prosecuting authority. A number of relevant legal principles will also need to be borne in mind as crucial background context, regardless of the form of settlement pursued.

23.3.1 Legal professional privilege

Prosecuting authorities are increasingly requesting or encouraging corporates to waive privilege as a sign of their co-operation, or even as a precondition to concluding a settlement. The extent to which the prosecuting authority and a corporate may diverge in their interpretations or application of legal professional privilege (LPP) is dealt with in Chapter 35 but the appropriateness of putting pressure on a corporate to waive LPP is far from clear; particularly in the context of a multi-jurisdictional investigation where a number of different legal systems may be in play, all with varying degrees of protection for lawyer–client communications. The collateral damage to the corporate's interests in other jurisdictions if LPP were to be waived could potentially be substantial, and would need to be carefully considered before the corporate agreed to a global settlement involving a waiver on this basis. Attempts to resolve these difficulties by offering limited waiver may work but in practice are certainly not without risk (including, in particular, in relation to collateral waiver risks in jurisdictions that do not recognise limited waiver).

The SFO's guidance on corporate co-operation[91] states that a corporate that does not waive privilege and provide witness accounts will not attain the corresponding factor against prosecution found in the DPA Code, although the corporate will not be penalised by the SFO for electing against waiving privilege. This guidance also states that, if a corporate claims privilege during an investigation, the SFO will expect it to 'provide certification by independent counsel that the material in question is privileged'. How this will work in practice remains to be seen.

89 Three Rivers District Council and Others v. The Governor and Company of the Bank of England [2003] EWCA Civ 474.

90 Tchenguiz v. Director of the Serious Fraud Office (Non-Party Disclosure), also known as Rawlinson and Hunter Trustees SA v. Akers [2014] EWCA Civ 136 at para. 15.

91 Corporate Co-operation Guidance, issued by the SFO, on 6 August 2019.

Admissions 23.3.2

Unlike a plea agreement, the settlement of criminal proceedings by way of a CRO or DPA does not require the corporate to make formal admissions of guilt. However, the effect in practice of agreeing to a CRO or a DPA may be equivalent to an admission. An application for a CRO will be accompanied by a detailed statement of claim,[92] and by agreeing to the CRO the defendant may be taken as confirming its agreement to the contents. Similarly, whereas an admission is not a prerequisite for a DPA, once the DPA is approved, the statement of facts on which it is based becomes admissible in subsequent proceedings in England and Wales (not limited to related criminal proceedings) as if it were the corporate's admission of its contents.

Indirect admissions of this kind entail risk for both the corporate and any other persons concerned in the conduct. They could potentially be relied on by third parties in support of civil or criminal proceedings brought against the corporate, both in the United Kingdom and overseas. They are also likely to prejudice the position of any other persons concerned in the conduct, not limited to the corporate's officers. This exposure increases the more extensive the indirect admissions are. In negotiating the first UK DPA, the SFO considered it necessary for the statement of facts to be lengthy (in this instance, 55 pages) to put the judge in a position to approve the agreement on the most complete basis available. The other published approved statements of facts to date generally follow a similar approach.

A corporate could seek to avoid or at least mitigate some of these adverse consequences by concluding a settlement under which a subsidiary accepts liability and makes any necessary admissions, as in the MW Kellogg Limited CRO in 2011.[93] Note, however, that a corporate will not be able to hide behind a subsidiary that has been set up as a vehicle through which a corrupt payment may be made so that the subsidiary can be abandoned if the corrupt payment comes to light.[94] Alternatively, a corporate could seek to negotiate a settlement under which an individual officer accepts liability instead of the corporate. However, if there is a prospect of a successful prosecution of the corporate entity, this may be unlikely to succeed. As a general matter, risk mitigation strategies of this kind are likely to be highly context-specific, and subject to the willingness of the relevant prosecuting authorities to recognise the interests at stake.

92 Practice Direction – Civil Recovery Orders, at paras. 4.1 to 4.5.

93 'MW Kellogg Limited to pay £7 million in SFO High Court action', press release dated 16 February 2011, SFO.

94 Serious Fraud Office v. XYZ Ltd (Case No. U20150856) [2016] 7 WLUK 220, [2016] Lloyd's Rep FC 509 at para. 28.

23.4 Practical issues arising from the negotiation of UK DPAs

DPAs have to date been made available only for a limited range of corporate economic offences prosecuted by either the CPS or the SFO. Statute governs eligibility for a DPA, its contents and the manner in which it is to be negotiated and approved, with limited discretion left to either the corporate or the prosecuting authority. This departure from the much more flexible US model complicates any predictions as to how frequently DPAs will be relied on in practice in the United Kingdom, but this section will consider practical issues arising from the negotiation of the first UK DPA as part of a global settlement.

The legislation requires the judge hearing the application to be satisfied that a DPA is in the interests of justice (as opposed to prosecution of the corporate). The first four DPAs agreed at the time of writing, Standard Bank plc, XYZ Ltd (Sarclad), Rolls-Royce and Tesco Stores Limited, were all heard by Sir Brian Leveson, President of the Queen's Bench Division, who (as is clear from the judgments) went to considerable lengths to satisfy himself that the proposed DPAs were in the interests of justice and that the terms were fair, reasonable and proportionate. Notably in Rolls-Royce he said that the involvement of prosecutors in different countries (in this case, the United States and Brazil) should not preclude a DPA in the United Kingdom, but the extension of criminality to these countries is relevant to the balancing exercise of whether the DPA is in the interests of justice.[95] Following Leveson P's retirement in 2019, Davis J heard the fifth DPA, Serco Geografix Limited, and adopted a similar approach.

In the Standard Bank decision, Leveson P noted that the first consideration must be the seriousness of the conduct and in this regard emphasised that the potential criminality faced by the bank was the failure to prevent intended bribery committed by senior officers of a sister company. He also noted the SFO's conclusion that there was insufficient evidence to suggest that any of Standard Bank's employees had committed an offence. Nevertheless, in the Rolls-Royce DPA, Leveson P described the conduct of the company as some of the 'most serious' breaches of criminal law in the areas of bribery and corruption but found that a DPA was ultimately in the interests of justice because of the extent of other factors, demonstrating that, in certain circumstances, the seriousness of the conduct need not be a bar for a company looking to agree a DPA with the authorities. In particular, Rolls-Royce was unique because of the extent of the negative impact that a prosecution of the company would have had on employees and others innocent of any misconduct – factors that were taken into account by Leveson P when balancing the public interest and interests of justice in ultimately approving the DPA. The public interest factors in Serco Geografix Limited also outweighed the seriousness of the offence, despite Davis J describing it as 'a substantial fraud' reflecting business practices 'apparently ingrained in the company' and which was compounded by the serious impact the conduct had on the integrity of the process of outsourcing public functions to private companies.[96]

95 Rolls-Royce (Case No. U20170036) [2017] 1 WLUK 189, [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249 at para. 42.

Leveson P also attached considerable weight to the early report made by Standard Bank to the authorities, noted that the bank had made significant enhancements to its compliance policies and procedures since 2011 and that the bank in its form as at November 2015 was effectively a different entity from that which had been involved in the events that were the subject of the DPA. Notably, these two factors were also critical in the other four DPAs.[97] However, in Rolls-Royce there was no self-report; the SFO had been prompted to ask questions of the company by public postings on the internet. However, Rolls-Royce's co-operation with the SFO was praised by Leveson P, who found that the company could not have done more to expose its own misconduct, limited neither by time, jurisdiction nor area of business. It is this co-operation, in conjunction with extensive ethics and compliance measures and procedures that the company had put in place, and were committed to continuing, that was determinate in the agreement of a DPA, despite the lack of self-reporting.

In Serco Geografix Limited, Davis J also placed significant weight on the fact that Serco Geografix Limited was a dormant company, meaning that the obligations imposed on it under the DPA were of limited value, whereas the decision of its parent, Serco Plc, to provide undertakings 'of genuine and substantial effect' allowed the goals of the DPA to be achieved, which he described as an important development in the use of DPAs.[98]

DPA negotiations are held under strict confidentiality restrictions imposed by the SFO pursuant to the DPA Code of Practice. The Code of Practice requires the corporate entering into DPA negotiations to provide an undertaking in respect of the confidentiality of the fact the DPA negotiations are taking place.

What this means in practice is that third parties with whom the corporate needs to share the fact of the negotiations or any information relating to the DPA negotiations must sign a confidentiality undertaking. Any potential disclosure to the market has to be carefully considered and discussed with the SFO at an early stage (i.e., prior to the relevant obligation arising), and with the judge once an application to the court has been made.[99] Rule 5.8 Criminal Procedure Rules

96 Serco Geografix Limited [2019] 7 WLUK 45 at para. 22.

97 Serious Fraud Office v. XYZ Ltd (Case No. U20150856) [2016] 7 WLUK 220, [2016] Lloyd's Rep FC 509 at paras. 15 to 18; Rolls-Royce, Crown Court (Southwark), 17 January 2017 at paras. 48 to 51, 60 and 63; Tesco Stores Limited (Case No. U20170287) [2017] 4 WLUK 558, at paras. 51 to 60; and Serco Geografix Limited [2019] 7 WLUK 45 at paras. 23, 25.

98 Serco Geografix Limited [2019] 7 WLUK 45 at para. 42: 'The nature of modern corporate structures means that it may be problematic to show that a controlling mind of the parent company was involved in the criminality carried out by a subsidiary company even where the benefit of the criminality tended to accrue to the parent company. Yet it will be the parent company which necessarily must engage in any compliance programme and cooperate with law enforcement agencies. The approach taken by Serco Group PLC in this case strengthens the public interest in the approval of this DPA.'

99 Rolls-Royce (Case No. U20170036) [2017] 1 WLUK 189, [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249 at para. 14.

2015 stipulates that details of a court hearing must appear on the court list at most 48 hours before the court hearing, and the listing must include the names of the parties. This in itself may give rise to press and market speculation on the subject matter of the DPA and the size of the financial penalty. If an announcement is required, an application should be made to the nominated judge.

The legislation does not address anonymity of individuals in the statement of facts. There are protections afforded in US DPAs and in the course of FCA investigations by the third-party rights provisions, and by the 'Maxwellisation' process in public inquiries. In Standard Bank plc, the conclusion reached was that those named on the draft indictment would be named, as would be the bank's senior deal team member, but that the remaining individuals whose conduct was relevant to the factual narrative would remain anonymous. The potential consequences of the naming of individuals following the DPA's publication can be seen in the fact that Ms Shose Sinare, one of the Tanzanian individuals allegedly responsible for the underlying offence in Standard Bank plc, has brought a civil claim against Standard Bank in the Tanzanian courts alleging, among other things, that she had a right to see and respond to the allegations in the statement of facts.

Tesco Stores Limited and XYZ Ltd (Sarclad) are the only cases to date where the SFO has pursued charges against individuals following entry into a DPA. The DPA judgment in Tesco Stores Limited was embargoed for almost two years pending the conclusion of the prosecution of the three former employees, owing to the risk of the details of the DPA undermining or prejudicing those proceedings.[100] The first trial of the three former employees was abandoned after the former UK financial director suffered a heart attack. The former UK managing director and former UK food commercial director were retried and acquitted of all charges, after the trial judge ruled that they had no case to answer. The trial judge's decision was upheld, in emphatic terms, by the Court of Appeal. Subsequently, the former UK financial director, who had been severed from the retrial, was acquitted of all charges after the SFO offered no evidence, and the embargo on the DPA was lifted on the same day. Counsel for the three former employees had made representations to Leveson P, both before the DPA was approved and also before it was published, that the statement of facts should be published in a form that did not identify the three former employees, as it would be unfair for the individuals' names and the conduct ascribed to them in the DPA to be publicly available in perpetuity when they had not been found to have committed any offence. On each occasion the request was declined, on the basis that the statement of facts had been ratified by that stage and the legislation does not address anonymity of individuals.

XYZ Ltd (Sarclad) was anonymised on the basis that there were ongoing criminal proceedings arising out of the same facts; to avoid the risk of prejudice in those proceedings, the court ordered that the judgment providing full details of the parties involved only be made public following the conclusion of those proceedings.[101] Sarclad was a small company and was charged with both substantive offences, requiring the application of the identification principle through the involvement of very senior former employees, and for the offence of failing to prevent bribery under the Bribery Act, which may have related to both agents and employees. On 16 July 2019, all three defendants were acquitted of all counts and the judgment providing full details of the facts, the DPA and the statement of facts were published. As with the Tesco DPA, this has resulted in the individuals being identified in the publicly available DPA judgment (by role) and the statement of facts (by name) and said to have committed criminal offences, despite having been acquitted of all counts.

100 As Tesco plc had publicly announced entering into the DPA, and its quantum, pursuant to its regulatory obligations as a publicly listed company, no attempt was made to anonymise its identity.

See Section 23.1

The Tesco Stores Limited and XYZ Ltd (Sarclad) DPAs have led to strong calls from a wide range of practitioners and commentators that consideration be given to introducing mechanisms to protect the interests of individuals in the DPA process. A DPA is likely to take less time than a contested trial, so the basis of the DPA will normally be determined before any trial of individuals, which creates a risk that the findings of fact will differ between the two. This risk arises whenever different people are the arbiters of fact, but it is heightened in these circumstances, as the DPA process requires close co-operation between the prosecutors and company to agree on the facts, whereas a trial is a judicially overseen adversarial process in which the jury decides any issues in dispute. Additionally, the company may not have access to the evidence of the natural persons under investigation at the time of a DPA negotiation (e.g., the enforcement agency may have requested the company not to interview the individuals or the individuals may have refused to answer questions at interview, for fear of self-incrimination) and may only come to understand their position if they enter the witness box.

Rolls-Royce did not include the identities of the individuals involved in the criminal conduct for the same reason of avoiding prejudice to potential criminal proceedings.[102] In addition to this, the Court did not name the recipients of corrupt payments or bribes in certain countries on the basis that that this could lead to action or the imposition of penalties which would be regarded in the UK as contravening Article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights.[103] The Rolls-Royce DPA itself says in terms that it does not provide any protection against prosecution of any present or former officer, director, employee or agent of Rolls-Royce, and further, Rolls-Royce is required to co-operate with the investigation and prosecution of the individuals involved in the relevant conduct.[104] The SFO ultimately decided against prosecuting any individuals in the Rolls-Royce investigation.[105]

101 Serious Fraud Office v. XYZ Ltd (Case No. U20150856) [2016] 7 WLUK 220, [2016] Lloyd's Rep FC 509 at para. 3.

102 Rolls-Royce (Case No. U20170036) [2017] 1 WLUK 189, [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249 at para. 32.

103 Ibid. at para. 32.

104 Ibid. at paras. 71, 72.

105 https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2019/02/22/sfo-closes-glaxosmithkline-investigation-and-investigation-into-rolls-royce-individuals/.

The negotiation process in Standard Bank plc did not move as quickly as originally anticipated. It became apparent that an adversarial stance would not be appropriate in seeking to negotiate an agreement, and over time communications became more focused and more effective. It is also clear from the facts available that XYZ Ltd (Sarclad) and Rolls-Royce took considerable periods to resolve; so, while the process towards a DPA is likely to be shorter than a contested trial, it will probably still take a considerable period to agree and be approved.

Before the preliminary application is filed at court by the SFO, the corporate is required to provide a declaration regarding the information supplied to the SFO, as well as the declaration of the individual through whom the corporate made its declaration. The declarations are required to be made pursuant to the Criminal Procedure Rules 2015.[106]

To provide comfort to the corporate and the individual it may be necessary to follow a similar process to that used when individuals sign regulatory attestations – including understanding the documentation provided and questioning those involved in the data collection process. This is something to consider as early as possible in the DPA negotiations.

It is also clearly important to seek to ensure that the scope of any compliance review or monitorship is limited to the matters that are relevant to the circumstances of the case, as these can be intrusive, lengthy and costly exercises.

In global investigations and settlement discussions it is essential to keep in close contact with other investigating agencies, where necessary providing detailed explanations of the DPA process and the basis on which the statement of facts and DPA terms have been agreed.

23.5 Resolving parallel investigations

In the United Kingdom, historically civil proceedings were generally stayed pending the outcome of any parallel criminal proceedings. However, courts consider this approach case by case and the emphasis has increasingly moved away from the presumption of a stay. Specifically in the context of contemplated CROs, the current policy (set out in the Attorney General's Guidelines on asset recovery)[107] should prevent civil recovery proceedings from being pursued in parallel with criminal proceedings; although the Bruce Hall example discussed above demonstrates there is no bar against such proceedings being pursued in tandem with criminal proceedings provided the conduct that is the subject of the respective proceedings can be appropriately distinguished.[108]

106 Rule 11.2(3)(c) Criminal Procedure Rules 2015 No. 1490 (L.18).

107 Guidance for prosecutors and investigators on their asset recovery powers under Section 2A of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, 29 November 2012, Attorney General's Office.

108 cf. Thomas LJ in Innospec.

Other domestic authorities 23.5.1

We have already identified some of the difficulties of negotiating a truly 'global' settlement and their inherent limitations; many of which are equally relevant where there are multiple domestic authorities investigating the same conduct and both civil and criminal proceedings are in contemplation. Corporates seeking to reach a settlement with other domestic authorities are likely to be assisted by agreements and memoranda of understanding (MOU) already in place between the main authorities, including, for example, the MOU between the Competition and Markets Authority and the SFO,[109] and the FCA's Enforcement Guide.[110] The DPA agreed between the SFO and Tesco Stores Limited was coordinated with an agreement with the FCA that Tesco Stores Limited and its parent company, Tesco plc, had committed market abuse.[111] Leveson P did not order Tesco Stores Limited to pay any compensation as part of the DPA as the SFO had said that this would not be a straightforward position; the SFO had not been approached by any investor seeking compensation; and Tesco Plc and Tesco Stores Limited had previously agreed with the FCA to pay an estimated £84.4 million under a statutory compensation scheme. The UK criminal courts have historically been reluctant to determine complex issues of compensation and this case demonstrates how DPAs can work in conjunction with regulatory arrangements to compensate victims.

Foreign authorities 23.5.2

The interplay of agencies becomes even more complex where foreign agencies are involved. The participation of UK authorities in global settlements has to date typically been driven by the US authorities, reflecting the relative ease with which US prosecutors can establish corporate criminal liability. One potential issue arises from divergent and sometimes conflicting requests from authorities, typically in connection with communications, disclosure of materials and confidentiality. The aim of any settlement negotiations should be to encourage one authority to take the lead, in accordance with any applicable guidelines or agreements concluded by the relevant authorities for this purpose.

109 Memorandum of understanding between the Competition and Markets Authority and the Serious Fraud Office, 29 April 2014.

110 FCA Handbook, Enforcement Guide, E.G. 12 and E.G. Appendices 2 and 3.

111 'Tesco to pay redress for market abuse', press release, 28 March 2017, FCA.

24

Negotiating Global Settlements: The US Perspective

Nicolas Bourtin[1]

24.1 Introduction

Strong incentives exist for corporations – particularly those in highly regulated industries that are vulnerable to potentially debilitating collateral consequences – to avoid litigating a case brought by the government. Among other considerations, protracted and unpredictable litigation can create risks of (1) financial and reputational harm to the company, (2) weakening relationships with regulators, (3) significant legal expense, and (4) severe legal and regulatory consequences associated with an unfavourable litigation outcome. As a result, when threatened with enforcement action, corporations often seek to enter into settlement negotiations with investigating authorities. Nevertheless, a corporation entering into such negotiations must carefully weigh the various attendant burdens and collateral consequences of such agreements.

24.2 Strategic considerations

As a preliminary matter, it is important to consider the impact of all interactions with US authorities on the company's ability to reach a settlement on favourable terms. Even early in an investigation, a corporation can develop a co-operative working relationship with an enforcement agency through prompt and complete disclosure and assistance with requests and inquiries. While co-operation is not the right strategic approach in all cases – companies may choose to take a more adversarial approach, even early in an investigation – establishing a record of proactive and complete co-operation can have a substantial effect on the final terms of any resolution, as US government authorities typically consider the nature and extent of a corporation's co-operation with the investigation in contemplating whether to settle a matter and on what terms. Indeed, both the US Department of Justice (DOJ) and the US Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC, or the Commission) have explicitly included voluntary disclosure and co-operation in their enforcement policies. As outlined in the DOJ's Justice Manual, in determining whether and to what extent to award a company co-operation credit, the DOJ considers, among other things, 'the timeliness of the co-operation, the diligence, thoroughness and speed of the internal investigation, and the proactive nature of the co-operation'.[2] Similarly, the SEC Enforcement Manual provides that a company's co-operation is evaluated by considering self-policing, self-reporting of misconduct, remediation and co-operation with the investigation.[3] As a result, by conducting an internal investigation and self-reporting potential misconduct to the authorities, a corporation may increase its chances of receiving co-operation credit and, in turn, more favourable settlement terms.[4]

1 Nicolas Bourtin is a partner at Sullivan & Cromwell LLP. The author acknowledges the contributions of former Sullivan & Cromwell associates Kate Doniger, Stephanie Heglund and Ryan Galisewski to earlier editions of this chapter.

At the close of the government's investigation, when beginning to negotiate the terms of a potential settlement agreement, a corporation must be particularly attuned to both the timing and the breadth of such an agreement. Regarding timing, certain stages of litigation can be particularly costly for a corporation; securing settlements early may be advantageous for a corporation. For example, in some cases – particularly where the key facts are known early and there is public pressure on the government to act quickly – a speedy settlement may be struck before a lengthy and expensive investigation is conducted. Such circumstances are rare, however, and the government will normally be reluctant to reach a settlement before a full investigation has been completed.

---

2 United States Department of Justice (DOJ) Justice Manual § 9-28.700, Principles of Federal Prosecution of Business Organizations, The Value of Cooperation (rev. November 2017); see also Justice Manual § 9-47.120, FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy (added November 2017). On 20 November 2019, the DOJ announced further revisions to its Foreign Corrupt Practices Act Corporate Enforcement Policy that, while modest, reflect DOJ's commitment to providing incentives for companies to self-disclose suspected FCPA violation. The policy revision makes clear that a company's notice to the DOJ of potential criminal conduct can earn it self-reporting credit even if the company does not at the time of the notification understand the full scope of the conduct or the involvement of all relevant employees. In such circumstances, the DOJ will not later penalise the company's self-report for failure to include 'all relevant facts'.

3 SEC, Office of Chief Counsel, Enforcement Manual, Framework for Evaluating Cooperation by Companies § 6.1.2 (28 November 2017); see also SEC Release No. 44969, Report of Investigation Pursuant to Section 21(a), Exchange Act Release No. 44,969, 76 SEC Docket 220 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and Commission Statement on the Relationship of Cooperation to Agency Enforcement Decisions (23 October 2001); SEC Release No. 34-61340, Policy Statement Concerning Cooperation by Individuals, in its Investigations and Related Enforcement Actions Exchange Act Release No. 34-61340, 75 Fed. Reg. 3122-02 (13 January 2010), www.sec.gov/rules/policy/2010/34-61340.pdf (last accessed 12 November 2019).

4 See, e.g., Report of Investigation Pursuant to Section 21(a), Exchange Act Release No. 44,969, 76 SEC Docket 220 (23 October 2001) (declining to take action against the parent company given the company's response to the apparent misconduct and setting forth criteria the SEC considers in determining whether, and how much, to credit self-reporting).

Another pivotal point to consider is whether settlement can be achieved before indictment or the filing of a complaint, as such public actions carry the risk of significant legal, financial and reputational consequences. And in fact most negotiated corporate resolutions are reached before charges are filed, as companies are eager to avoid the uncertain public and shareholder reaction to a contested litigation. A recent economic study showed that a company's share price generally decreases more dramatically as a result of the announcement of a government investigation if there is no concurrent resolution.[5] The extent of share price declines can, among other effects, have great significance in follow-on civil litigation.

In terms of the breadth of a potential settlement agreement, a corporation must consider the scope of the conduct being investigated and the scope of the potential release from liability. At the conclusion of the government's investigation, to the extent that it opts to pursue charges related to certain alleged misconduct, it can be advantageous for those charges to be reflected in a single settlement agreement or in distinct agreements announced simultaneously, so as to mitigate the risk of legal, financial and reputational harm associated with multiple days of negative press, carry-over investigations and future litigation. In the event that the government determines not to pursue charges against the company or its employees,[6] it can be advantageous to diplomatically encourage a declination – a formal notice that the government has declined to pursue the case further,[7] to provide the company valuable closure.

5 See Declaration of Stephen Choi, Ph.D., In re Goldman Sachs Grp., Inc. Sec. Litig., No. 1:10-cv-03461-PAC, 2015 WL 5613150 (S.D.N.Y. 6 April 2015), ECF No. 145 (finding that the average impact of an investigation announcement was -3.8 per cent when there was no concurrent resolution, compared to 0.22 per cent when there was a concurrent resolution). In one particularly striking example, Goldman Sachs settled a case for US$550 million in 2010 to avoid the difficulty and notoriety of litigation; after news of the settlement hit the market, Goldman's shares increased 5 per cent, resulting in a market value increase greater than the cost of the settlement. Sewell Chan & Louise Story, 'Goldman Pays $550 Million to Settle Fraud Case', The New York Times (15 July 2010), www.nytimes.com/2010/07/16/business/16goldman.html.

6 The Justice Manual lists 10 factors that prosecutors should weigh in determining whether to charge a corporation, including: (1) the nature and seriousness of the offence; (2) the pervasiveness of wrongdoing within the corporation; (3) the corporation's history of similar misconduct; (4) the corporation's willingness to co-operate including as to potential wrongdoing by its agents; (5) the existence and effectiveness of the corporation's pre-existing compliance programme; (6) the corporation's timely and voluntary disclosure of wrongdoing; (7) the corporation's remedial actions; (8) collateral consequences; (9) the adequacy of other remedies; and (10) the adequacy of the prosecution of individuals responsible for the corporation's malfeasance. Justice Manual § 9-28.300, Principles of Federal Prosecution of Business Organizations, Factors to Be Considered (rev. November 2018). The SEC considers its own factors in determining whether to close an investigation, including: (1) the seriousness of the conduct and potential violations; (2) the staff resources available to pursue the investigation; (3) the sufficiency and strength of the evidence; (4) the extent of potential investor harm if an action is not commenced; and (5) the age of the conduct underlying the potential violations. SEC, Office of Chief Counsel, Enforcement Manual § 2.6.1, Policies and Procedures.

Owing to the government's focus on the prosecution of individuals, however, it is unlikely that the government will release from liability company employees who engaged in potential wrongdoing as part of a settlement with a company.[8] The DOJ formalised its increased focus on the prosecution of individuals with the publication of a 2015 policy memorandum signed by then-Deputy Attorney General Sally Quillian Yates regarding individual accountability for corporate wrongdoing.[9] The Yates Memorandum memorialised certain government sentiments demonstrating an inclination toward the prosecution of individuals in corporate fraud cases,[10] and specified that 'absent extraordinary circumstances or approved departmental policy, the Department will not release culpable individuals from civil or criminal liability when resolving a matter with a corporation'.[11]

---

7 Precise practices may differ. The policy of the SEC, for example, is to send 'termination letters' to 'notify individuals and entities at the earliest opportunity when the staff has determined not to recommend an enforcement action against them to the Commission'. SEC, Office of Chief Counsel, Enforcement Manual § 2.6.2, Termination Notices. These SEC termination letters provide somewhat less assurance than a formal declination, because '[a]ll that such a communication means is that the staff has completed its investigation and that at that time no enforcement action has been recommended'. Id.

8 One exception is found in settlements with the DOJ's Antitrust Division. Historically, antitrust settlements regularly contained non-prosecution provisions that protected a company's employees from criminal liability related to the antitrust activity at issue. Antitrust settlements may 'carve out' certain individuals from this protection based on their level of culpability. See Sally Quillian Yates, Memorandum from the U.S. Dep't of Justice on Individual Accountability for Corporate Wrongdoing (9 September 2015), https://www.justice.gov/dag/file/769036/download.

9 Id.

10 See, e.g., Marshall Miller, Principal Deputy Assistant Attorney General for the Criminal Division, Remarks at the Global Investigations Review conference (17 September 2014), https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/remarks-principal-deputy-assistant-attorney-general-criminal-division-marshall-l-miller (explaining that 'when [corporations] come in to discuss the results of an internal investigation to the Criminal Division . . . expect that a primary focus will be on what evidence you uncovered as to culpable individuals, what steps you took to see if individual culpability crept up the corporate ladder, how tireless your efforts were to find the people responsible'); Sung-Hee Suh, Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Remarks at the PLI's 14th Annual Institute on Securities Regulation in Europe: Implications for U.S. Law on EU Practice (20 January 2015), https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/deputy-assistant-attorney-general-sung-hee-suh-speaks-pli-s-14th-annual-institute-securities (explaining that 'corporations do not act criminally, but for the actions of individuals . . . the Criminal Division intends to prosecute those individuals, whether they are sitting on a sales desk or in a corporate suite'); Leslie Caldwell, Assistant Attorney General for the Criminal Division, Remarks at New York University Law School's Program on Corporate Compliance and Enforcement (17 April 2015), https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/assistant-attorney-general-leslie-r-caldwell-delivers-remarks-new-york-university-law (explaining that '[t]rue cooperation . . . requires identifying the individuals actually responsible for the misconduct – be they executives or others – and the provision of all available facts relating to that misconduct').

11 Sally Quillian Yates, Memorandum from the U.S. Dep't of Justice on Individual Accountability for Corporate Wrongdoing at p. 2 (9 September 2015), https://www.justice.gov/dag/file/769036/download.

Following the change of administration in 2017, the DOJ revised the Yates Memorandum's guidance to restore some discretion to civil prosecutors, who are now empowered to 'negotiate civil releases for individuals who do not warrant additional investigation in corporate civil settlement agreements'.[12] The revised guidance also states that a corporation will be eligible for co-operation credit if it operates in good faith to identify individuals who were 'substantially' involved in or responsible for the potential misconduct, a move away from the Yates Memorandum's more stringent requirement that 'the company must identify all individuals responsible for the misconduct at issue, regardless of their position, status, or seniority'. However, the revised guidance emphasises the DOJ's ongoing commitment to and focus on individual accountability.[13]

Similarly, in the securities enforcement context, the SEC has expressed a focus on charging individuals responsible for wrongdoing.[14] In particular, Mary Jo White, the former Chair of the SEC, has highlighted that one new approach to charging individuals is to use Section 20(b) of the Exchange Act[15] to target those who have 'engaged in unlawful activity but attempted to insulate themselves from liability by avoiding direct communication with the defrauded investors'.[16]

24.3 Legal considerations

24.3.1 Privilege considerations

At times during the investigative process, legal considerations may be in tension with strategic ones – a corporation should be cognisant of the potential for such tensions to navigate toward an agreeable settlement without unnecessarily waiving

12 Rod J Rosenstein, Deputy Attorney General, Remarks at the American Conference Institute's 35th International Conference on the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (29 November 2018), https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/deputy-attorney-general-rod-j-rosenstein-delivers-remarks-american-conference-institute-0. When announcing these changes, Deputy Attorney General Rod Rosenstein emphasised that this policy shift was in 'response to concerns raised about the inefficiencies of requiring companies to identify every employee involved regardless of relative culpability' and was 'consistent with our commitment to hold individuals accountable in every appropriate case.' Id.

13 Id.

14 Joshua Gallu and David Michaels, SEC to Shift Enforcement Focus to Individuals, White Says, Bloomberg News (26 September 2013), www.bloomberg.com/news/articles/2013-09-26/sec-to-shift-enforcement-focus-to-individuals-white-says-1-; Mary Jo White, SEC Chair, Speech at the New York City Bar Association's Third Annual White Collar Crime Institute: Three Key Pressure Points in the Current Enforcement Environment (19 May 2014), https://www.sec.gov/news/speech/2014-spch051914mjw.html (noting that an 'internal, back-of-the[-]envelope, analysis the staff did recently indicates that since the beginning of the 2011 fiscal year, we charged individuals in 83% of our actions . . . , [a]nd we look for ways to innovate in order to further strengthen our ability to charge individuals').

15 Section 20(b) of the Securities Act of 1933 allows the Commission to bring enforcement actions against 'any person' who does 'any act or thing which it would be unlawful for such person to do under the provisions of this chapter or any rule or regulation thereunder through or by means of any other person'. See 15 U.S.C. § 78t(b) (2011).

16 Id.

any valuable rights. In particular, a company may need to weigh the value of additional co-operation credit for disclosing relevant privileged documents to the government against the value of protecting privileged documents from future discovery in follow-on civil litigation.

On the one hand, the government may consider the disclosure of privileged documents in determining the corporation's level of co-operation. Under current DOJ policy, for example, 'cooperation credit is not predicated upon the waiver of attorney–client privilege or work-product protection', although co-operation still requires the timely disclosure of 'relevant facts',[17] which may require the disclosure of some privileged materials, such as memoranda of witness interviews prepared during an internal investigation.[18] On the other hand, disclosure to the government of documents prepared during the course of an investigation may waive any relevant protections during follow-on civil litigation.[19] In such instances, a company may consider entering into a limited waiver agreement with the government as a middle ground, but it must keep in mind that courts may be sceptical of a limited waiver agreement, even when paired with a confidentiality agreement.[20]

17 Memorandum from Mark Filip, Deputy Att'y Gen., U.S. Dep't of Justice, Principles of Federal Prosecution of Business Organizations (28 August 2008), at pp. 9 to 11, https://www.justice.gov/sites/default/files/dag/legacy/2008/11/03/dag-memo-08282008.pdf.

18 Id., at pp. 8, 9. This reflects a steady retreat in the DOJ's position. In 1999, then-Deputy Attorney General Eric Holder noted in a memorandum that the DOJ would consider the waiver of corporate attorney–client and work-product privileges as, although not an 'absolute requirement', at least 'one factor in evaluating the corporation's cooperation'. Memorandum from the DOJ on Bringing Criminal Charges Against Corporations §§ II.A.4, VI.A-B (16 June 1999), https://www.justice.gov/sites/default/files/criminal-fraud/legacy/2010/04/11/charging-corps.PDF.
After some Congressional interest in corporate attorney–client privilege, the DOJ issued another memorandum in 2006 stating that, although '[w]aiver of attorney–client and work product protections is not a prerequisite to a finding that a company has cooperated', prosecutors could request carefully limited waivers only in limited circumstances 'when there is a legitimate need for the privileged information to fulfil their law enforcement obligations'. Memorandum from Paul J McNulty, Deputy Att'y Gen., U.S. Dep't of Justice, Principles of Federal Prosecution of Business Organizations (12 December 2006), at pp. 8, 9, https://www.justice.gov/sites/default/files/dag/legacy/2007/07/05/mcnulty_memo.pdf.

19 A court in the Southern District of New York recently held that briefs, written memos, white papers and presentations shown to the CFTC were discoverable in a subsequent civil action. See Alaska Electrical Pension Fund v. Bank of America Corp., 2017 WL 280816, at *2, 3 (S.D.N.Y. 20 January 2017). The court's decision, however, noted the lack of confidentiality agreements between the government and the defendants, and the court did not claim to apply a categorical rule about confidentiality agreements and waiver of work-product privilege. See ibid., at *2. ('[T]he Court need not decide categorically whether confidentiality agreements can ever protect work product that is shared voluntarily with a government agency because, at most, they are just one of several factors to be considered, and they are not enough to carry the day here.') (Internal quotation marks and citations omitted.)

20 Most federal courts of appeal have declined to allow a selective disclosure to regulators during an investigation of documents protected by the attorney–client privilege or work-product doctrine without a resultant waiver of the privilege or protection with respect to third-party civil litigants. See In re Pac. Pictures Corp., 679 F.3d 1121 (9th Cir. 2012), at pp. 1127, 1128 (U.S. Attorney investigation); In re Qwest Commc'ns Int'l, Inc., 450 F.3d 1179 (10th Cir. 2006)

Recent amendments to the SEC Enforcement Manual indicate that advocacy materials presented to the SEC may be discoverable and admissible in evidence, notwithstanding the protections of Federal Rules of Evidence 408 and 410.[21]

As part of its investigative process, the government may also engage the company in discussions as to whether charges are warranted. Government authorities may convey this information to the company orally, through reverse proffers,[22] or in writing, through a document such as the SEC's Wells notice.[23] Upon receipt of such information, the company then generally may respond with its arguments as to why the government should not bring an enforcement action. While providing a response is usually advisable and carries the prospect of success, in certain circumstances, a corporation may determine that it is not in the company's best interest. Among other considerations, a Wells submission is not privileged or confidential, and therefore can be used later against the corporation in civil litigation or made publicly available. In the alternative, the corporation may opt to initiate a meeting

(SEC and DOJ investigations); SEC, Office of Chief Counsel, Enforcement Manual § 4.3.1, Confidentiality Agreements (28 October 2016) ('While obtaining materials that are otherwise potentially subject to privilege or the protections of the attorney work-product doctrine can be of substantial assistance in conducting an investigation, the staff should exercise judgment when deciding whether to enter into a confidentiality agreement with a company under investigation. Considerations include [that] . . . [s]ome courts have held that companies that produce otherwise privileged materials to the SEC or the US Department of Justice, even pursuant to a confidentiality agreement, waived privilege in doing so.'). But see In re Steinhardt Partners, L.P., 9 F.3d. 230 (2d Cir. 1993), at p. 236 ('[W]e decline to adopt a per se rule that all voluntary disclosures to the government waive work product protection . . . . Establishing a rigid rule would fail to anticipate . . . situations in which the SEC and the disclosing party have entered into an explicit agreement that the SEC will maintain the confidentiality of the disclosed materials.'); see also In re Natural Gas Commodity Litigation, 2005 WL 1457666, at *8 (S.D.N.Y. 21 June 2005) (discussing how an explicit confidentiality agreements combined with a non-waiver agreement went a 'long way' toward establishing non-waiver).

21 See SEC, Office of Chief Counsel, Enforcement Manual § 3.2.3.2, White Papers and Other Materials (excluding Wells submissions) (28 October 2016).

22 See Andrew Ceresney, Director, SEC Division of Enforcement, Remarks at University of Texas School of Law's Government Enforcement Institute: The SEC's Cooperation Program: Reflections on Five Years of Experience (13 March 2015), https://www.sec.gov/news/speech/sec-cooperation-program.html. ('One thing we are doing more of is using reverse proffers at key points in our investigations. When appropriate, we will invite counsel in for a meeting in which we share key documents and expected testimony that will implicate the defendant. This is another practice that is well established among criminal prosecutors and FBI agents but historically has been used less frequently at the SEC. Sometimes we might do a reverse proffer at a more advanced stage of an investigation in order to attempt to bring the investigation swiftly to a close on settlement terms that we deem favourable and appropriate. But we also might do it much earlier in an investigation, in order to demonstrate to a witness why cooperation is worthwhile.')

23 A Wells notice is a letter that a securities or commodities regulator, such as the SEC, the Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC), or the Financial Industry Regulatory Authority (FINRA), sends to a corporation or individual when it intends to bring a civil action against them. See, e.g., Richman v. Goldman Sachs Grp., Inc., 868 F. Supp. 2d 261 (S.D.N.Y. 2012), at p. 272 ('The SEC provides a target of an investigation with a Wells Notice "whenever the Enforcement Division staff decides, even preliminarily, to recommend charges".') (Citation omitted.)

with the authorities to discuss the proposed charges, to prevent the creation of discoverable material and foster a dialogue between the company and the government.

During settlement negotiations, a corporation must also be careful in sharing drafts of settlement documents because materials shared with the government may become discoverable in civil litigation. Although Federal Rule of Evidence 408 generally protects documents related to settlement negotiations,[24] the documents may nonetheless ultimately be deemed discoverable,[25] or even admissible as evidence.[26]

Limitations and tolling agreements 24.3.2

In the course of a government investigation, statutes of limitation will often come into play.[27] At the outset of an investigation, particularly if the investigation commences toward the end of a particular statutory period, the government may ask the company to sign a tolling agreement, an agreement to waive a right to claim that litigation should be dismissed owing to the expiry of a statute of limitations for a particular period. It may be in the best interest of the company to sign it, as a form of co-operation and to avoid a precipitous filing of charges by the government. If a tolling agreement has not been signed at an earlier stage in the investigation, the government may ask a corporation to sign one during the settlement negotiation process, especially if a potential limitations period is about to close. In this context, tolling agreements serve to relieve the government of the pressure of taking formal action before the relevant limitations period runs, and allow for time for additional sharing of information in the hope of facilitating a settlement agreement.[28]

---

24 See Fed. R. Evid. 408 advisory committee's note. ('[S]tatements made during compromise negotiations of other disputed claims are not admissible in subsequent criminal litigation, when offered to prove liability for, invalidity of, or amount of those claims.')

25 For example, courts in the Southern District of New York consistently hold that 'Rule 408 does not apply to discovery'. E.g., Small v. Nobel Biocare USA, LLC, 808 F. Supp. 2d 584 (S.D.N.Y. 2011), at p. 586; accord Conopco, Inc. v. Wein, 2007 WL 1040676, at *5 (S.D.N.Y. 4 April 2007); ABF Capital Mgmt. v. Askin Capital, 2000 WL 191698, at *1 (S.D.N.Y. 10 February 2000). Rather, courts apply the discovery standard of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26(b)(1) to determine the discoverability of settlement negotiations. E.g., Small, 808 F. Supp. 2d at pp. 586, 587; ABF Capital Mgmt., 2000 WL 191698, at *2. Some courts require a 'particularized showing' of the need for the discovery. See Bottaro v. Hatton Assocs., 96 F.R.D. 158 (E.D.N.Y. 1982), at p. 160; see also Tribune Co. v. Purcigliotti, 1996 WL 337277, at *2 (S.D.N.Y. 19 June 1996) ('slightly heightened showing of relevance'); SEC v. Thrasher, 1996 WL 94533, at *2 (S.D.N.Y. 27 February 1996) ('modest presumption against disclosure').

26 E.g., In re Gen. Motors LLC Ignition Switch Litig., 2015 WL 7769524, at *2 (S.D.N.Y. 30 November 2015) (admitting consent decree as evidence 'not . . . to prove that New GM violated the Safety Act . . . but for other purposes that are plainly relevant').

27 Unless otherwise provided by statute, an enforcement action by a federal regulator that seeks a civil fine or penalty is generally subject to the standard five-year limitations period for proceedings. 28 U.S.C. § 2462.

28 See SEC, Office of Chief Counsel, Enforcement Manual § 3.1.2, Statutes of Limitations and Tolling Agreements (28 October 2016). ('If the assigned staff investigating potential violations of the federal securities laws believes that any of the relevant conduct arguably may be outside the five-year limitation period before the SEC would be able to file or institute an enforcement

24.4 Forms of resolution

24.4.1 Prosecutorial settlements: DPAs, NPAs and guilty pleas

In past years, most corporate criminal investigations initiated by US prosecutors were resolved by deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs) and non-prosecution agreements (NPAs).[29] DPAs and NPAs are generally thought of as a middle ground between declining prosecution and obtaining a conviction.[30] Although in action, the staff may ask the potential defendant or respondent to sign a "tolling agreement." Such requests are occasionally made in the course of settlement negotiations to allow time for sharing of information in furtherance of reaching a settlement.').

---

A tolling agreement signed by the corporation will not toll the statute of limitations against individuals. Rather, to toll the time to bring charges against an individual, the government will have to secure a separate tolling agreement with that person. See Sally Quillian Yates, Memorandum from the U.S. Dep't of Justice on Individual Accountability for Corporate Wrongdoing at p. 6 (9 September 2015) ('[W]here it is anticipated that a tolling agreement is . . . unavoidable and necessary, all efforts should be made either to resolve the matter against culpable individuals before the limitations period expires or to preserve the ability to charge individuals by tolling the limitations period by agreement or court order.'), https://www.justice.gov/dag/file/769036/download.

29 For examples of DPAs and NPAs, see In re Legg Mason, Inc. (4 June 2018), https://www.justice.gov/criminal-fraud/file/1072461/download (NPA, FCPA claims); In re Credit Suisse (24 May 2018), https://www.justice.gov/criminal-fraud/file/1079596/download (NPA, FCPA claims); In re Las Vegas Sands Corp. (17 January 2017), https://www.justice.gov/opa/press-release/file/929836/download (NPA, FCPA claims); In re Gen. Cable Corp. (DOJ, 22 December 2016), https://www.justice.gov/criminal-fraud/file/921801/download (NPA, FCPA claims); In re JPMorgan Securities (Asia Pacific) (DOJ, 17 November 2016), https://www.justice.gov/criminal-fraud/file/911356/download (NPA, FCPA claims); In re IAP Worldwide Servs. Inc. (DOJ, 16 June 2015), https://www.justice.gov/opa/file/478281/download (NPA, FCPA claims); In re Dallas Airmotive, Inc. (DOJ, 10 December 2014), https://www.justice.gov/file/181831/download (DPA, FCPA claims); In re HSBC Holdings plc (10 December 2012), https://www.justice.gov/sites/default/files/opa/legacy/2012/12/11/dpa-executed.pdf (DPA, IEEPA & TWEA claims); In re ING Bank N.V. (8 June 2012), https://www.sec.gov/Archives/edgar/data/1039765/000119312513120728/d501093dex45.htm (DPA, IEEPA & TWEA claims); In re Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. (DOJ, 8 December 2011), https://www.justice.gov/sites/default/files/atr/legacy/2011/12/08/278076a.pdf (NPA, anticompetitive conduct claims); In re Tenaris S.A. (DOJ, 17 May 2011), https://www.sec.gov/news/press/2011/2011-112-dpa.pdf (DPA, FCPA claims); In re Barclays Bank PLC (DOJ, 16 August 2010), www.federalreserve.gov/newsevents/press/enforcement/enf20100818b1.pdf (DPA, IEEPA & TWEA claims); In re ABN AMRO Bank N.V. (DOJ, 9 May 2010), (DPA, IEEPA & TWEA claims); In re Wachovia Bank, N.A. (DOJ, 16 March 2010), https://www.sec.gov/litigation/complaints/2011/comp22183.pdf (DPA, money laundering claims).

30 See Justice Manual § 9-28.1100, Principles of Federal Prosecution of Business Organizations, Collateral Consequences (rev. November 2015) ('[W]here the collateral consequences of a corporate conviction for innocent third parties would be significant, it may be appropriate to consider a non-prosecution or deferred prosecution agreement with conditions designated, among other things, to promote compliance with applicable law and prevent recidivism. Such agreements are a third option, besides a criminal indictment, on the one hand, and a declination, on the other.'); see also Mary Jo White, SEC Chair, Speech at the New York City Bar Association's Third Annual White Collar Crime Institute: Three Key Pressure Points in the Current Enforcement Environment (19 May 2014), https://www.sec.gov/news/speech/2014-spch051914mjw.html. ('[S]ome have questioned whether it is appropriate for prosecutors to consider the consequences – direct and collateral – when they make a decision whether to indict a company. Of course recent years there have been some high-profile corporate guilty pleas, there is no indication yet that these guilty pleas will overtake NPAs and DPAs as prosecutors' primary settlement mechanism.[31]

In a deferred prosecution, the government brings criminal charges against the company, which it agrees to dismiss at the end of a specified period if the company complies with the DPA's terms. Because a DPA is filed with the court, it becomes a public document.

A non-prosecution differs in that no criminal charges are filed against the company. As a result, an NPA need not be made public unless prosecutors seek to publicise the results of the investigation or the company is itself required to disclose the agreement. The DOJ commonly uses both forms of agreement to resolve investigations concerning, among other things, fraud, the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act,[32] the False Claims Act,[33] the Bank Secrecy Act[34] and antitrust laws. In previous years, DPAs and NPAs were the exclusive domain of the DOJ, but the SEC and state prosecutors have also recently adopted their use, using the agreements to resolve certain securities law violations.[35]

Unlike an NPA, over which the government has full discretion to adopt terms and conditions, a DPA may be subject to some level of judicial review pursuant to the Speedy Trial Act. Because a DPA involves the filing of an information or indictment, the Speedy Trial Act requires trial to start within 70 days.[36] However, the Speedy Trial Act allows this 70-day period to be tolled with the 'approval of the court, for the purpose of allowing the defendant to demonstrate his good they should; we want their decision to be thoughtful and in the public interest. And the DOJ's Principles of Federal Prosecutions of Business Organizations indeed require them to weigh the collateral consequences of a corporate indictment among a number of other factors.')

---

31 Although there is no standard form or precedent for these agreements, most prosecutorial settlement agreements include some or all of the following provisions: (1) a statement of facts describing illegal acts and/or an admission of wrongdoing; (2) an agreement that the company, its employees and its agents will not publicly contradict the statement of facts; (3) co-operation with the government for the duration of the agreement, including the provision of documents and efforts to secure employee testimony; (4) some form of remedial action, including terminating or disciplining culpable employees, implementing revised internal controls and procedures, and/or, in some cases, appointing an independent compliance monitor; (5) fines and penalties; (6) obligations to report future violations of law; and (7) an acknowledgement that the government has the sole discretion to determine whether the agreement has been breached. For both an NPA and a DPA, because the company has generally admitted to the conduct at issue, if a company is indicted upon breach of the agreement, conviction is almost certain.

32 15 U.S.C. §§ 78dd-1, et seq.

33 31 U.S.C. §§ 3729-3733.

34 31 U.S.C. §§ 5311–5330.

35 Andrew Ceresney, Director, SEC Division of Enforcement, Remarks at University of Texas School of Law's Government Enforcement Institute: The SEC's Cooperation Program: Reflections on Five Years of Experience (13 March 2015), https://www.sec.gov/news/speech/sec-cooperation-program.html; Enforcement Cooperation Program, SEC (16 February 2016), https://www.sec.gov/spotlight/enfcoopinitiative.shtml.

36 See 18 U.S.C. § 3161(c)(1); see also Justice Manual: Criminal Resource Manual § 628, Speedy Trial Act of 1974 (rev. November 2015).

conduct'.[37] Although this provision suggests that courts have a role in overseeing DPAs, judges have historically been relatively deferential to the government in approving them.

Two recent decisions from the Courts of Appeals for the DC and Second Circuits confirm that the long-standing practice of limited judicial oversight over consensual enforcement settlements is the favoured approach. In each case, the district court refused to approve a settlement that the court deemed too lenient, and was reversed by the Court of Appeals on the grounds that the trial court's discretion in such circumstances is quite limited. In April 2016, in United States v. Fokker Services BV,[38] the DC Circuit Court of Appeals issued a writ of mandamus and vacated a decision by District Judge Richard Leon, rejecting as too lenient a proposed DPA between the DOJ and Fokker Services. The Court of Appeals reasoned that 'the court's withholding of approval would amount to a substantial and unwarranted intrusion on the Executive Branch's fundamental prerogatives'.[39] Similarly, in June 2014, the Second Circuit issued a decision in SEC v. Citigroup Global Markets,[40] calling into question the appropriateness of judicial scrutiny of consensual settlements with the SEC. In a decision that reversed a notable opinion written by Judge Jed Rakoff criticising an SEC settlement with Citigroup as insufficient, the Second Circuit made clear that courts must afford the SEC's policy judgements 'significant deference', including whether, when and how to resolve enforcement proceedings. Under Citigroup, a district court's review of a settlement agreement is narrow and limited.[41] Subsequent cases have added glosses to the Citigroup holding, with some district courts exerting discretion over certain aspects of settlement agreements,[42] including the selection of an independent monitor.[43]

Despite the reversals, the district courts' criticisms are broadly consistent with those expressed in recent years by a number of federal judges who have hesitated before ultimately approving DPAs and other similar government settlements. In those other instances, the courts' criticisms commonly have included assertions

37 18 U.S.C. § 3161(h)(2).

38 818 F.3d 733 (D.C. Cir. 2016), at p. 747, vacating 79 F. Supp. 3d 160 (D.D.C. 2015).

39 Id., at p. 744.

40 752 F.3d 285 (2d Cir. 2014). The Second Circuit further emphasised this holding in a recent decision, United States v. HSBC Bank, which overturned a district court's decision to unseal a monitor's report and found that the district court erred in involving its supervisory authority over the DPA. 863 F, 3d 125 (2d Cir. 2017).

41 Id., at p. 294 (quoting eBay, Inc. v. MercExchange, 547 U.S. 388 (2006), at p. 391).

42 See, e.g., U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission v. Aronson, 665 F. App'x 78 (2d Cir. 2016), at p. 80 (holding that the district court did not abuse its discretion in ordering briefing on an issue before a related criminal case was completed, even though the consent decree provided that the parties would propose a briefing schedule after the completion of the criminal case).

43 See U.S. Commodity Futures Trading Commission v. Deutsche Bank AG, 2016 WL 6135664, at *1 to 3 (S.D.N.Y. 20 October 2016) (holding that it was proper for the court to select an independent monitor, when the parties' proposed monitors were inadequate).

that those settlements lacked (1) a large enough penalty amount[44] (relatedly, there is concern that companies will begin to view monetary penalties merely as 'a cost of doing business'[45]), (2) admissions of wrongdoing by the company,[46] (3) charges against the individuals who were responsible for the offence,[47] (4) sufficient factual detail for the judge to evaluate the agreement,[48] (5) sufficient remedial obligations for the company[49] and (6) sufficient reporting to the court about the company's compliance with the agreement.[50]

In recent years, perhaps as a result of political and public pressure,[51] including such public criticism of DPAs from the federal courts, there has been an uptick in guilty pleas to resolve criminal actions.[52] The major difference between a guilty plea and an NPA or DPA is that a guilty plea results in a conviction, which

44 See U.S. v. Saena Tech Corp., 140 F. Supp. 3d 11 (D.D.C. 2015), at p. 31. ('An agreement that contained neither punitive measures (such as fines) nor requirements designed to deter future criminality (such as compliance programs and independent monitors) could not be said to be designed to secure a defendant's reformation and should be rejected. Even an agreement that contained some of these elements could be ineffective if the obligations were found to be so vague or minimal as to render them a sham.')

45 See, e.g., Brett Wolf, 'U.S. Warns Banks It May Revoke Some Money-Laundering Settlements', Reuters (15 March 2015), http://www.reuters.com/article/us-banks-moneylaundering-idUSKBN0MC1ZE20150316 (quoting Assistant Attorney General Caldwell as saying 'We don't want DPAs and NPAs to be perceived as a cost of doing business'); Peter J Henning, 'Guilty Pleas and Heavy Fines Seem to Be Cost of Business for Wall St.', The New York Times (20 May 2015), https://www.nytimes.com/2015/05/21/business/dealbook/guilty-pleas-and-heavy-fines-seem-to-be-cost-of-business-for-wall-st.html?_r=0. ('Banks appear willing to plead guilty as long as the collateral costs are not too heavy. Thus, the potency of a criminal conviction as a deterrent seems to have been dissipated, perhaps to the point that it is just another business expense.')

46 See, e.g. S.E.C. v. CR Intrinsic Investors, LLC, 939 F. Supp. 2d 431 (S.D.N.Y. 2013), at pp. 436 to 439 (discussing concerns about allowing 'neither admit nor deny' provisions in a consent judgment).

47 See Saena Tech Corp., 140 F. Supp 3d at 35-36 (discussing potential concerns with a DPA that effectively immunised an individual).

48 Cf. U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission v. Mulvaney, 2012 WL 12930425, at *1 (E.D. Wis. 20 November 2012) (granting consent decree only after ordering further briefing on its factual basis).

49 See Saena Tech Corp., 140 F. Supp. 3d at p. 31 (discussing the necessity of sufficient deterrent effects).

50 Cf. U.S. v. HSBC Bank USA, N.A., 2013 WL 3306161, at *11 (E.D.N.Y. 1 July 2013) (ordering the parties to file quarterly reports and stating that it will 'notify the parties if, in its view, hearings or other appearances are necessary or appropriate').

51 See, e.g., Danielle Douglas, 'Holder Concerned Megabanks Too Big to Jail', The Washington Post (6 March 2013), https://www.washingtonpost.com/business/economy/holder-concerned-megabanks-too-big-to-jail/2013/03/06/6fa2b07a-869e-11e2-999e-5f8e0410cb9d_story.html.

52 Notably, in May 2015 Citicorp, JPMorgan Chase & Co., Barclays PLC, Royal Bank of Scotland and UBS all pleaded guilty in May 2015 to felony charges for conspiring to manipulate foreign exchange benchmark rates. 'Five Major Banks Agree to Parent-Level Guilty Pleas', press release, DOJ (20 May 2015), https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/five-major-banks-agree- parent-level-guilty-pleas; see also DB Group Servs. Plea Agreement, 3:15CR62 (D. Conn. 23 April 2015), https://www.justice.gov/file/628871/download; BNP Paribas S.A. Order to Cease and Desist (Fed. Reserve Sys. 30 June 2014), generally comes with harsher collateral regulatory consequences and more significant reputational harm. Such risks for a corporation are significant, especially in a heavily regulated industry – the ramifications can be wide-ranging and unclear.

See Section 24.5.3

24.4.2 Regulatory settlements: consent orders and civil NPAs and DPAs

Companies under investigation by federal and state regulators whose enforcement mechanisms are administrative or civil may resolve an investigation by voluntarily entering into a consent order where an institution typically consents to the issuance of a cease-and-desist order or the assessment of a civil monetary penalty, or both. A consent order, like a cease-and-desist order or a civil monetary penalty assessment, is a formal enforcement action; it is a public document and, although it may not always be filed, its terms are enforceable in court. Consent orders often vary in the level of detail they provide concerning the wrongdoing, although they are often less detailed than a criminal settlement. A consent cease-and-desist order may oblige the company to undertake remedial measures to correct the misconduct and ensure future compliance. The term of the order is usually indefinite. A consent civil monetary penalty assessment merely obliges the institution to pay a penalty, and the order's terms are fully satisfied by the payment.

Some regulators have adopted NPAs and DPAs that are similar to their criminal counterparts'. For example, the SEC, which is responsible for civil enforcement and administrative actions to enforce the securities laws,[53] has begun to use NPAs and DPAs to resolve cases 'where an entity or person has engaged in misconduct and where the co-operation is extraordinary, but the circumstances call for a measure of accountability'.[54] Although available as an option, NPAs and DPAs remain relatively uncommon for civil enforcement actions by the SEC.[55]

24.5 Key settlement terms

Whether negotiating a settlement agreement in the criminal or regulatory context, many common principles come into play. To facilitate a successful negotiation, a company must have a comprehensive understanding of (1) benchmark terms for https://www.federalreserve.gov/newsevents/press/enforcement/enf20140630a1.pdf; Credit Suisse AG Plea Agreement, 1:14-cr-00188 (E.D. Va. 19 May 2014), https://www.justice.gov/iso/opa/resources/6862014519191516948022.pdf; Marubeni Corporation (March 2014).

53 See SEC, How Investigations Work (rev. 15 July 2013), https://www.sec.gov/News/Article/Detail/Article/1356125787012; Mary Jo White, SEC Chair, Speech, 'All-Encompassing Enforcement: The Robust Use of Civil and Criminal Markets to Police the Markets' (31 March 2014), https://www.sec.gov/News/Speech/Detail/Speech/1370541342996.

54 Andrew Ceresney, Director, SEC Division of Enforcement, Remarks at University of Texas School of Law's Government Enforcement Institute, The SEC's Cooperation Program: Reflections on Five Years of Experience (13 March 2015), https://www.sec.gov/news/speech/sec-cooperation-program.html.

55 Id. ('[T]hey have been a relatively limited part of our practice. I think this is appropriate and should continue to be the case.'); see also SEC, Office of Chief Counsel, Enforcement Manual § 6.2.3, Non-Prosecution Agreements (28 October 2016). ('A non-prosecution agreement is a written agreement . . . entered in limited and appropriate circumstances.') historical settlements regarding similar misconduct, (2) those terms that are most significant to the company and (3) any distinguishing factors in the matter at issue that encourage terms less severe than the benchmarks.

Monetary penalties 24.5.1

Nearly all corporate settlements with US authorities include some form of monetary penalty. The form largely depends on the regulator and its practices.[56] Typically, monetary penalties in regulatory settlements consist of a civil monetary penalty. Disgorgement of profits or restitution to harmed parties may also be required.[57]

The SEC considers two principal factors in determining monetary penalties: the presence or absence of a direct and material benefit to the corporation itself as a result of the violation and the degree to which the penalty will recompense or further harm the injured shareholders.[58] The SEC will also consider factors such as deterring the conduct, the extent of the injury, any complicity on the part of the corporation, the intent of the individuals committing the wrong, the difficulty in detecting that particular type of wrongdoing, any remedial steps taken by the corporation and the extent of its co-operation.[59] Generally, the factors that US authorities consider in determining monetary penalties mirror those used to determine whether to bring charges against the corporation in the first place, including the nature of the offence, the company's timely and voluntary disclosure of wrongdoing, and the company's remedial actions.

While settlement values generally increased between 2010 and 2015, there is some indication that this trend may be slowing, at least with respect to DOJ actions. For example, from 2005 to 2015, the total criminal fines and penalties assessed by the DOJ's Antitrust Division increased an entire order of magnitude, 56 See, e.g., Cornerstone Research, SEC Enforcement Activity Against Public Company Defendants: Fiscal Years 2010–2015, www.law.nyu.edu/sites/default/files/SEC-Enforcement-Activity-FY2010-FY2015.pdf. The SEC's monetary fines generally fall into three categories: (1) monetary penalties, (2) disgorgement with prejudgment interest, and (3) monetary relief for harmed investors. Id.

57 Forfeiture, the seizure of assets that comprised the proceeds of the wrongdoing, or were used to facilitate it, is rarely used in regulatory actions against business entities even when available, because the government is generally reluctant to seize property related to an ongoing business. See Justice Manual § 9-111.124 (Business Seizures ('Due to the complexities of seizing an ongoing business and the potential for substantial losses from such a seizure, a United States Attorney's Office must consult with the Asset Forfeiture and Money Laundering Section prior to initiating a forfeiture action against, or seeking the seizure of, or moving to restrain an ongoing business.')). Restitution, the compensation of individuals harmed by illegal conduct, is also rarely a part of any settlement. In particularly complex cases involving many different classes of individuals that may have been harmed, calculation of restitution may be especially difficult, and a corporation may find the government amenable to not seeking restitution in its settlement, with the understanding that compensation of harmed individuals is more efficiently and accurately handled through related civil litigation.

58 SEC Release No. 2006-4 (4 January 2016), Statement of the Securities and Exchange Commission Concerning Financial Penalties, https://www.sec.gov/news/press/2006-4.htm.

59 Id.

from US$338 million in 2005 to US$3.6 billion in 2015.[60] However, the total decreased to US$399 million in fiscal year 2016[61] and to US$67 million in 2017, and in 2018, the total was US$172 million.[62] In 2018, the DOJ collected more than US$2.8 billion in settlements and judgments from civil cases involving fraud and false claims against the government – the lowest recovery total since 2009.

The SEC has also increased its use of 'aggressive' monetary penalties in a trend that appears to be continuing.[63] Whereas a record-setting penalty in 2002 reached a mere US$10 million, the mean payment for certain cases between 2010 and 2013 was over US$50 million.[64] Three of the top 10 monetary settlements imposed in public company-related actions were imposed in 2016.[65] These include a US$415 million action against Merrill Lynch and a US$267 million action against JP Morgan wealth management subsidiaries. As of October 2016, SEC enforcement settlements related to misconduct leading to or arising from the financial crisis exceeded US$3.76 billion for the 204 entities and individuals charged.[66] An important June 2017 decision that may diminish the SEC's leverage in settlement negotiations is Kokesh v. SEC,[67] in which the Supreme Court held that a five-year statute of limitations applies to SEC enforcement actions seeking disgorgement.[68] The decision also raises the question of whether the Court would, in fact, recognise disgorgement as an available remedy in SEC enforcement 60 DOJ, Total Criminal Fines and Penalties (updated 28 January 2019), https://www.justice.gov/atr/total-criminal-fines.

61 Id.

62 Id.

63 SEC Enforcement Activity Against Public Companies and Their Subsidiaries, Cornerstone Research (2016), https://www.cornerstone.com/GetAttachment/1a6f93a7-3859-4e7e-841f-65241c49c123/SEC-Enforcement-Activity-against-Public-Companies.pdf.

64 Sonia A Steinway, Comment, SEC 'Monetary Penalties Speak Very Loudly,' But What Do They Say? A Critical Analysis of the SEC's New Enforcement Approach, 124 Yale L.J. 209 (October 2014) (analysing SEC trends in monetary penalties).

65 SEC Enforcement Activity Against Public Companies and Their Subsidiaries: Fiscal Year 2016 Update, Cornerstone Research (2016), https://www.cornerstone.com/Publications/Reports/SEC-Enforcement-Activity-Against-Public-Company-Defendants-2016.

66 SEC, SEC Enforcement Actions: Addressing Misconduct That Led To or Arose From the Financial Crisis, key statistics (22 February 2017), www.sec.gov/spotlight/enf-actions-fc.shtml (summarising all settlements resulting from the financial crisis). Other regulatory agencies have followed suit, with the CFTC enforcing a record US$3.144 billion in civil monetary penalties and US$59 million in restitution and disgorgement in 2015. Between 2010 and 2014, the New York Department of Financial Services (NYDFS) issued monetary penalties totalling near US$6 billion. Completed mainly through consent orders, NYDFS's most notable settlements include a US$600 million penalty against Deutsche Bank and a US$2.243 billion penalty against BNP Paribas, which eventually pleaded guilty to criminal charges and paid a total of US$8.9 billion to resolve the numerous investigations.

67 137 S. Ct. 1635 (2017).

68 Id., at 1645. Prior to this ruling, the SEC relied disproportionately on disgorgement penalties: in 2015, the SEC obtained US$3 billion in disgorgement payments and US$1.2 billion in other civil monetary penalties. See SEC, 'Select SEC & Market Data: Fiscal 2015' (2016), https://www.sec.gov/reportspubs/select-sec-and-market-data/secstats2015.pdf.

proceedings.[69] In 2017, the SEC collected US$1.2 billion in settlements with public companies and subsidiaries, almost all of it within the first half of the year, and in 2018, the SEC collected US$2.4 billion in settlements, more than the total in any fiscal year since 2010.[70]

The DOJ recently announced a written policy formalising how the Criminal Division should consider a company's argument that it is financially unable to pay an otherwise appropriate penalty.[71] Under the new policy, which aims to promote transparency around corporate penalties, the parties must first agree on the form of a corporate criminal resolution and the otherwise appropriate monetary penalty in the absence of the inability-to-pay considerations. The company must then complete an 11-point questionnaire, which requires the disclosure of, among other things, cash-flow projections, federal income tax returns for the past five years, operating budgets, acquisition or divestiture plans, encumbered assets and payments to the business's highest-earning executives.[72] DOJ lawyers are then directed to consider that information in light of statutory sentencing factors, the US Sentencing Guidelines, and the Justice Manual's principles regarding the consideration of collateral consequences in resolving a corporate criminal case.[73]

See Chapter 26 on fines, disgorgement, etc.

Continuing obligations 24.5.2

In addition to monetary penalties, settlement agreements will often include other continuing obligations. In particular, settlement agreements almost always contain language stating that the company will commit to undertake remedial efforts, such as the enhancement of its compliance programmes or an obligation to report potential violations of law in the future. To ensure ongoing compliance and 69 Id., at 1642, n. 3 ('Nothing in this opinion should be interpreted as an opinion on whether courts possess authority to order disgorgement in SEC enforcement proceedings or on whether courts have properly applied disgorgement principles in this context. The sole question presented in this case is whether disgorgement, as applied in SEC enforcement actions, is subject to § 2462's limitations period.'). See also Transcript of Oral Argument at 7 to 9, Kokesh, 137 S. Ct. 1635 (No. 16-529). Not surprisingly, the Supreme Court recently agreed to take up that very question. On 1 November 2019, the Supreme Court granted certiorari in Liu v. SEC, No. 18-1501, to decide whether the SEC may obtain disgorgement as 'equitable relief' in a civil action to enforce securities law violations. Should the Supreme Court conclude that the SEC has no such authority, absent a legislative fix, the SEC will be further limited in its ability to collect large financial awards in enforcement actions filed in court. The SEC would maintain such authority, however, in administrative actions, where the SEC's right to seek disgorgement is expressly authorised by statute.

70 SEC Enforcement Activity Against Public Companies and Their Subsidiaries, Cornerstone Research (2017), https://www.cornerstone.com/Publications/Reports/SEC-Enforcement-Activity-2017-Update; SEC Enforcement Activity Against Public Companies and Their Subsidiaries, Cornerstone Research (2018) (https://www.cornerstone.com/Publications/Reports/SEC-Enforcement-Activity-2018-Update).

71 Memorandum from Brian A Benczkowski, Assistant Att'y Gen., U.S. Dep't of Justice, Evaluating a Business Organization's Inability to Pay a Criminal Fine or Criminal Monetary Penalty (8 October 2019), https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/file/1207576/download.

72 Id. at Attachment A.

73 Id. at p. 1.

satisfactory remedial efforts, in recent years, government agencies have increasingly required the use of corporate monitors to keep corporations accountable.

See Chapter 32 on monitorships

One common obligation in corporate settlements is the imposition of a monitor to oversee a company's compliance with a settlement agreement and report back to the government on the company's progress. Monitorships, which may last for a number of years, are a financial and functional burden on a company. Monitorships can be draining in terms of the cost of retaining the monitor itself, the costs required to implement recommended reforms, the cost of staffing and maintaining an internal team to work closely with the monitor and the disruption to the company's business and management. Another important consideration when contemplating a monitorship as a term of settlement is that monitors are generally given broad access to the corporation's files, outside the protection of an attorney–client relationship. This lack of attorney–client relationship can pose a risk of further legal exposure for the company. Given that a monitor is tasked with reviewing the corporation's practices, and reporting the findings of the review to relevant authorities, it is possible that the monitor will identify and be obliged to disclose additional violations of law to relevant authorities. In addition, once a monitor's reports are submitted to the relevant authorities, those reports and any documents contained in them can be subject to Freedom of Information Act requests, which may create additional exposure in follow-on civil litigation.

Given the substantial expense and disruption caused by a monitorship, it is in a corporation's interest to try and avoid the imposition of a monitor – especially in instances where corporate culpability is relatively low and the company has already undertaken substantial remedial efforts. The most effective means for a company of avoiding the imposition of a monitor continue to be to voluntarily report its misconduct, to co-operate fully with the government's resulting investigation and to demonstrate to the government that the company has already undertaken a comprehensive remediation plan. Where a monitor is imposed, a corporation can mitigate the disruption by negotiating the monitor's duration of assignment, scope of responsibility, decision-making capacity and accessibility to corporate files.

24.5.3 Collateral consequences

A criminal or regulatory settlement can also trigger a number of collateral consequences, which can vary depending on the types of violations the settlement covers and the industry of the affected entity. For example, a guilty plea for a bank could mean the loss of its financial holding company status and federal deposit insurance, the appointment of a receiver or conservator, and, for foreign banks, the potential termination of offices in the United States. A guilty plea for a broker-dealer could mean automatic loss of broker-dealer registration, a bar from acting as a registered investment adviser, and revocation of its status as a well-known seasoned issuer. A guilty plea for a corporation could also result in, among other things, disqualification from membership of certain self-regulatory organisations, a temporary or permanent bar from participation in federal procurement contracts (debarment), or loss of state licences. Compounding these difficulties, many of the collateral consequences that arise upon conviction travel within a corporation's legal structure, so that even regulated businesses that were not involved in the offence can be subject to licence revocations, loss of securities law safe harbours and other consequences.

Corporations may need to seek waivers or exemptions from multiple regulators, including the SEC, the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, the Federal Reserve, the Department of Labor and the Financial Industry Regulatory Authority, to allow them to continue engaging in the affected business activities, a process that should be planned well in advance of settlement. Each regulator may have more than one relevant exemption.[74] The company will therefore need to assess the relevant regulations for each authority that oversees the company's activities. The permutations of collateral consequences are many and depend on the form of the settlement (e.g., DPA, NPA, guilty plea, conviction or consent order)[75] or even the nature of the offence.[76] In addition to automatic disqualifications, there is a wide array of discretionary actions available to regulators for which waivers or exemptions could be sought.[77]

The method of receiving a waiver or exemption from these collateral consequences depends on the agency. For the SEC, a corporation requests an exemption from the SEC Staff, which can either make a recommendation to the Commission or act directly on the application with delegated authority from the Commission.

74 The SEC has many, including: (1) status as a well-known seasoned issuer (WKSI); (2) status under § 9(a) of the 1940 Act as an investment adviser, depositor or principal underwriter of registered investment companies; and (3) exemptions from certain capital-raising restrictions, under Regulations A and D. See also generally Richard A Rosen and David S Huntington, 'Waivers from the Automatic Disqualification Provisions of the Federal Securities Laws', 29 Insights: The Corp. & Sec. Law Advisor at p. 2 (August 2015) (cataloguing various SEC waivers).

75 Naturally, criminal convictions have much more severe consequences than a DPA, NPA or administrative consent order. For instance, Section 9(a) of the Investment Company Act of 1940 automatically bars an entity from acting as investment adviser or providing certain other services to registered investment companies if that entity or an affiliated entity has been convicted within the past ten years of any felony or misdemeanour arising out of the conduct of the business of a bank. 15 U.S.C. § 80a-9(a)(1).

76 For example, under the Commodities Exchange Act, an entity may be disqualified from registration under the Act if the entity has been found to have committed some kind of fraud by a settlement agreement with any federal or state agency. 7 U.S.C. § 12a(2), (3); see also No Action and Interpretation, Letter No. 12-70 (CFTC 31 December 2012), www.cftc.gov/idc/groups/public/@lrlettergeneral/documents/letter/12-70.pdf. The SEC has a policy of not enforcing the disqualifications under Section 206(4) of the Investment Advisers Act for administrative (but not civil) orders. See No-Action Letter, Dougherty & Co., 2003 WL 22204509 (SEC 3 July 2003).

77 For example, under Section 15(b)(4) of the Securities Exchange Act, the SEC has the discretion after a conviction to suspend or revoke the registration of a broker-dealer if it finds, after notice and comment, that it is in the public interest. See 15 U.S.C. § 78o(b)(4)(B).

The SEC generally grants a waiver under a finding of 'good cause'.[78] In contrast, the Department of Labor, in granting exemptions for qualified professional asset manager status, engages in a formal rule-making process, including a public notice and comment period.[79] The Federal Reserve, which can take a range of discretionary actions, generally engages in a more informal regulatory-relations dialogue when considering the collateral consequences of a significant settlement.

Timing is critical for the waiver process, because a company will need to ensure that there is no gap in its licences and statuses. Complicating matters, regulators often take different views as to when statutory disqualifications based on convictions or settlements commence. The SEC views 'conviction' as entry into a guilty plea, so any relevant SEC waivers need to be lined up before then. In contrast, the Department of Labor says that conviction is at sentencing, which can take place well after the entry of the guilty plea. For this reason, sentencing after the entry of a guilty plea can be delayed for the purpose of obtaining the necessary exemption from the Department of Labor.[80]

In recent years, the granting of waivers in connection with corporate settlements has drawn criticism by some in the government and the media that enforcement agencies have been too lenient in releasing companies from the consequences of their settlements, particularly in the case of companies that have been the subject of multiple enforcement actions.[81] There is every reason to believe that going forward the relevant agencies will require increasingly high showings by companies before agreeing to grant the necessary waivers.

78 17 C.F.R. § 230.405, Ineligible Issuer § 2 ('An issuer shall not be an ineligible issuer if the Commission determines, upon a showing of good cause, that it is not necessary under the circumstances that the issuer be considered an ineligible issuer.'); see also SEC, Div. of Corp. Fin., Revised Statement on Well-Known Seasoned Issuer Waivers (24 April 2014), www.sec.gov/divisions/corpfin/guidance/wksi-waivers-interp-031214.htm.

79 29 C.F.R. pt. 2570, subpt. B.

80 For example, in the set of plea agreements associated with manipulating foreign exchange benchmark rates, there was a term that the United States would support any motion or request to delay sentencing until the Department of Labor had issued a ruling on the request for exemption. E.g., Barclays Plea Agreement, Case No. 3:15CR00077 (D. Conn. 20 May 2015), at para. 12(e), https://www.justice.gov/file/440481/download; UBS Plea Agreement, Case No. 3:15CR00076 (D. Conn. 20 May 2015), at para. 28, https://www.justice.gov/file/440521/download.

81 See, e.g., Letter from Office of Sen. Elizabeth Warren, Rigged Justice: 2016: How Weak Enforcement Lets Corporate Offenders Off Easy (January 2016), https://www.warren.senate.gov/files/documents/Rigged_Justice_2016.pdf (describing major criminal and civil cases from 2015 in which report authors found government enforcement 'feeble' and insufficient to deter corporate crime); Kara M Stein, SEC Commissioner, Dissenting Statement in the Matter of the Royal Bank of Scotland Group, plc, Regarding Order Under Rule 405 of the Securities Act of 1933, Granting a Waiver from Being an Ineligible Issuer (28 April 2014), www.sec.gov/News/PublicStmt/Detail/PublicStmt/1370541670244 ('I fear that the Commission's action to waive our own automatic disqualification provisions arising from RBS's criminal misconduct may have enshrined a new policy – that some firms are just too big to bar.').

Admissions and follow-on civil litigation 24.5.4

With increasing frequency, as a condition of settlement, government authorities are requiring corporations to make factual or legal admissions, or both. For example, prior to 2013, the SEC had a long-standing policy of settling cases without requiring admissions from defendants.[82] In June 2013, however, following public criticism, including in the wake of Judge Rakoff's denial of approval of the SEC's settlement with Citigroup, the Commission changed its policy 'by requiring admissions of misconduct in certain cases where heightened accountability and acceptance of responsibility by a defendant are appropriate and in the public interest'.[83] The SEC has defined these types of cases as including instances (1) where the violation of the securities laws involved particularly egregious conduct, (2) where large numbers of investors were harmed, (3) where the markets or investors were placed at significant risk, (4) where the conduct obstructs the Commission's investigation, (5) where an admission can send an important message to the markets or (6) where the wrongdoer poses a particular future threat to investors or the markets.[84] Nevertheless, the SEC has also acknowledged that 'for reasons of efficiency and other benefits', including getting significant relief, eliminating litigation risk, returning money to victims expeditiously and conserving enforcement resources for other matters, 'most cases will continue to be resolved on a "neither admit not deny" basis'.[85] Indeed, even under the new policy, admissions still appear to be infrequent.[86]

In addition to the reputational impact and collateral consequences that such admissions can impose on a corporation, admissions can expose a company to significant liability in follow-on civil litigation. Plaintiffs may be able to rely on factual or legal admissions in settlement agreements to support a complaint,[87]

82 See SEC Release No. 33-337, Consent Decree in Judicial of Administrative Proceedings, 1972 WL 125351 (28 November 1972) (formally permitting respondent to avoid admitting or denying the allegations).

83 Andrew Ceresney, Director, SEC Division of Enforcement, Testimony on Oversight of the SEC's Division of Enforcement (19 March 2015), https://www.sec.gov/news/testimony/031915-test.html.

84 Id.; see also Mary Jo White, SEC Chair, Speech for the Council of Institutional Investors fall conference in Chicago, IL, 'Deploying the Full Enforcement Arsenal' (26 September 2013), https://www.sec.gov/News/Speech/Detail/Speech/1370539841202.

85 Id.

86 As at October 2015, according to one count, the SEC had only required admissions of fact in 18 settlements. See Marc S Raspanti et al., 'The SEC's New Admissions Policy Means Sometimes Having to Say You're Sorry', The Champion 16 (September/October 2015), at p. 17.

87 The following decisions allowed plaintiffs to rely on admissions made in a prior government settlement agreement: Davis v. Beazer Homes, U.S.A. Inc., 2009 WL 3855935, at *7 (M.D.N.C. 17 November 2009) (finding company's statement in DPA was a significant factor contributing to the validity of plaintiff's claim); Somerville v. Stryker Orthopedics, 2009 WL 2901591, at *3 (N.D. Cal. 4 September 2009) (determining defendant's prior NPA contributed to the sufficiency of plaintiff's claim).

and may attempt to introduce them as evidence later.[88] A corporation will have a strong argument that an administrative consent order does not represent an adjudication and cannot be relied on in a complaint;[89] DPAs and NPAs have been used in follow-on litigation with mixed results.

A corporation entering into a settlement agreement ideally should, to the extent possible, try and neither admit nor deny the charges, in which case the findings of the order are less likely to be able to be used against it.[90] In the event that a corporation is unable to do so, a company should strategically negotiate for narrowly tailored factual statements and flexible language to enable it to defend itself in follow-on civil litigation. In particular, admitting to a generalised violation of law may be less likely to have future adverse consequences than admission of a specific legal violation that shares elements of claims that could be brought in follow-on civil litigation. For example, a corporation could admit to various controls-based violations in a settlement with the SEC rather than admitting to securities fraud. Or, a corporation could admit to a violation that does not contain a scienter element or does not concede that anyone was harmed as a result – necessary elements for many private causes of action.

Furthermore, a corporation should be aware that settlement agreements that dictate that the corporation cannot contradict the findings of facts can restrict the corporation's positions in follow-on civil litigation.[91] Because any statement that

88 E.g., In re Gen. Motors LLC Ignition Switch Litig., 2015 WL 7769524, at *2 (S.D.N.Y. 30 November 2015) (admitting consent decree as evidence 'not . . . to prove that New GM violated the Safety Act . . . but for other purposes that are plainly relevant').

89 For example, the Second Circuit has held that 'a consent judgment between a federal agency and a private corporation which is not the result of an actual adjudication of any of the issues . . . can not be used as evidence in subsequent litigation between that corporation and another party'. Lipsky v. Commonwealth United Corp., 551 F.2d 887 (2d Cir. 1976), at p. 893; see also Waterford Tp. Police & Fire Ret. Sys. v. Smithtown Bancorp, Inc., 2014 WL 3569338 (E.D.N.Y. 18 July 2014) (striking from complaint references to consent agreements with the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and the New York Banking Department); In re Platinum & Palladium Commodities Litig., 828 F. Supp. 2d 588 (S.D.N.Y. 13 September 2011) (striking from complaint references to CFTC's findings of fact contained in an administrative consent order). But see In re Bear Stearns Mortg. Pass-Through Certificates Litig., 851 F. Supp. 2d 746 (S.D.N.Y. 2012), at p. 768 n. 24 ('[S]ome courts in this district have stretched the holding in Lipsky to mean that any portion of a pleading that relies on unadjudicated allegations in another complaint is immaterial under Rule 12(f). Neither Circuit precedent nor logic supports such an absolute rule.') (citation omitted); Tobia v. United Grp. of Cos., Inc., 2016 WL 5417824, at *3 (N.D.N.Y. 22 September 2016) (holding that while the SEC complaint and consent order are inadmissible to prove liability under Lipsky, the allegations and findings enumerated in the SEC complaint are not made inadmissible merely by virtue of their inclusion therein).

90 See, e.g., J.P. Morgan Securities Inc. v. Vigilant Ins. Co., 126 A.D.3d 76 (N.Y. App. Div. 1st Dep't 2015) (holding the insurer could not rely on the 'Dishonest Acts Exclusion' of policies to avoid indemnification of US$160 million disgorgement and US$90 million civil penalties required by an SEC cease-and-desist order).

91 See, e.g., In re IAP Worldwide Services Inc., NPA, FCPA claims (DOJ, June 2015), https://www.justice.gov/opa/file/478281/download ("The Company admits, accepts, and acknowledges that it is responsible under United States law for the acts of its officers, directors, employees, and agents as set forth in the Statement of Facts . . . and that the facts described could be viewed by the government as contradictory to the facts of the agreement may then be seen as a breach – thereby reviving a prosecutorial or regulatory action – it is important that such agreements, at a minimum, contain exceptions that allow a company to take good-faith positions in follow-on civil litigation.[92]

Resolving parallel investigations 24.6

Other domestic authorities 24.6.1

Most large-scale investigations of corporations involve a number of government agencies from federal and state governments, both prosecutorial and regulatory. The degree of coordination among these agencies varies case by case, and coordinating with multiple agencies can be challenging. However, there can be benefits to coordinated settlements, including closure for the company, enhanced legal certainty and the avoidance of unnecessary duplication,[93] or undue burdens of disclosure.[94] In addition, because the settlement announcements can occur on a single day, a company may be better able to control the release of information concerning the settlements and thereby limit the effect of any harmful disclosures on the market.[95] There is a distinct trend toward more and more multi-agency

. . . are true and accurate.'); c.f. SEC Release No. 9453, Order Instituting Cease-and-Desist Proceedings, In the Matter of TD Bank, N.A. (23 September 2013), https://www.sec.gov/litigation/admin/2013/33-9453.pdf (clarifying that '[t]he findings herein are made pursuant to Respondent's Offer of Settlement and are not binding on any other person or entity in this or any other proceeding').

92 See, e.g., In the Matter of Citibank, N.A., CFTC Docket No. 16-16 (25 May 2016), at p. 26, www.cftc.gov/idc/groups/public/@lrenforcementactions/documents/legalpleading/enfcitibankisdaorder052516.pdf. ('Respondent agrees that neither it nor any of its successors and assigns, agents, or employees under its authority of control shall take any action or make any public statement denying directly or indirectly, any findings or conclusions in this Order or creating, or tending to create, the impression that this Order is without a factual basis; provided, however, that nothing in this provision shall affect Respondent's (i) testimonial obligations, or (ii) right to take positions in other proceedings to which the Commission is not a party.')

93 On 12 June 2018, the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, and Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation released a 'Policy Statement on Interagency Notification of Formal Enforcement Actions.' The statement requires the agencies to notify each other of enforcement actions against financial institutions, especially when the action they are pursuing involves the interests of another agency. If two or more of the agencies consider bringing complementary actions, they 'should coordinate the preparation, processing, presentation, potential penalties, service, and follow-up' of the enforcement action. A legislative effort to require eight federal agencies, including the DOJ and the SEC, to implement policies and procedures to minimise duplication of enforcement actions against financial institutions was approved by the US House of Representatives but was never voted on in the Senate.

94 SEC, press release, 'CFTC Sign Agreement to Enhance Coordination, Facilitate Review of New Derivative Products' (11 March 2008), https://www.sec.gov/news/press/2008/2008-40.htm.

95 See, e.g., SEC, press release, 'JPMorgan Chase Agrees to Pay $200 Million and Admits Wrongdoing to Settle SEC Charges' (19 September 2013), https://www.sec.gov/News/PressRelease/Detail/PressRelease/1370539819965 ('As part of a coordinated global settlement, three other agencies also announced settlements with JPMorgan today: the UK Financial Conduct Authority, the Federal Reserve, and the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency.'); SEC, press release, 'Standard Bank to Pay $4.2 Million to Settle SEC Charges' (20 November 2015), settlements, as agencies increase collaboration, even across borders.[96] Recently, the DOJ announced a new policy intended to encourage coordination between it and other enforcement agencies and to discourage the disproportionate enforcement of laws by multiple authorities. Among other things, the new policy sets forth factors that DOJ attorneys may evaluate in determining whether multiple penalties serve the interests of justice in a particular case, including the egregiousness of the wrongdoing and the adequacy and timeliness of a company's disclosures and co-operation.[97] It remains to be seen to what degree this policy will result in meaningful changes to the DOJ's approach to settling investigations involving multiple agencies.

---

https://www.sec.gov/news/pressrelease/2015-268.html; SEC, press release, 'VimpelCom to Pay $795 Million in Global Settlement for FCPA Violations' (18 February 2016), https://www.sec.gov/news/pressrelease/2016-34.html. ('"This closely coordinated settlement is a product of the extraordinary efforts of the SEC, Department of Justice, and law enforcement partners around the globe to jointly pursue those who break the law to win business," said Kara N. Brockmeyer, Chief of the SEC Enforcement Division's FCPA Unit.')

96 Recent examples of multi-agency settlements include In Re: Volkswagen 'Clean Diesel' Marketing, Sales Practices, and Products Liability Litigation, 3:15-mc-02672-CRB (N.D. Cal. 17 May 2017) (consent decree with the DOJ, on behalf of the EPA and stipulated order for permanent injunction and monetary judgment for the FTC); SEC v. Teva Pharmaceutical Industries, Ltd., 1:16-cv-25298 (S.D. Fla. 22 December 2016), https://www.sec.gov/litigation/litreleases/2016/lr23708.htm (DPA with the DOJ and interest and disgorgement payments to the SEC in connection with civil and criminal violations of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act); SEC Release No. 78989, Order Instituting Administrative and Cease-and-Desist Proceedings (29 September 2016) (Och-Ziff DPA with the DOJ and interest and disgorgement payments to the SEC to resolve criminal charges arising out of bribes paid to public officials in the Democratic Republic of Congo and Libya), https://www.sec.gov/litigation/admin/2016/34-78989.pdf; Commerzbank AG Plea Agreement (D.D.C. 12 March 2015), https://www.justice.gov/sites/default/files/opa/press-releases/attachments/2015/03/12/commerzbank_deferred_prosecution_agreement_1.pdf (DPAs with the DOJ and DANY and consent orders with OCC and FinCEN); JPMorgan Chase Bank, N.A. Deferred Prosecution Agreement (S.D.N.Y. 6 January 2014), https://www.justice.gov/sites/default/files/usao-sdny/legacy/2015/03/25/JPMC%20DPA%20Packet%20%28Fully%20Executed%20w%20Exhibits%29.pdf (DPA with the DOJ and consent orders with the Federal Reserve, OFAC and NYDFS); SEC Release No. 9453, Order Instituting Cease-and-Desist Proceedings, In the Matter of TD Bank, N.A. (23 September 2013), https://www.sec.gov/litigation/admin/2013/33-9453.pdf (consent orders with the OCC and FinCEN and cease-and-desist order with SEC).

97 DOJ, Deputy Attorney General Rod Rosenstein Delivers Remarks to the New York City Bar White Collar Crime Committee (Remarks as prepared for delivery) (9 May 2018), https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/deputy-attorney-general-rod-rosenstein-delivers-remarks-new-york-city-bar-white-collar.

Foreign authorities 24.6.2

Owing at least in part to the internationalisation of enforcement, the global nature of modern-day securities frauds, increased regulatory activity on the state level and the increased complexity of the markets,[98] regulatory investigations today tend to involve a variety of authorities.[99] Thus a corporation must carefully evaluate whether a settlement with certain authorities should be postponed until a global resolution can be reached. Coordinated global settlements often afford the company the opportunity to predict and prevent excessive, cumulative or unnecessary monetary penalties, continuing obligations and collateral consequences.[100]

98 Mary Jo White, SEC Chair, Speech at the New York Bar Association's Third Annual White Collar Crime Institute, 'Three Key Pressure Points in the Current Enforcement Environment' (19 May 2014), https://www.sec.gov/news/speech/2014-spch051914mjw.html.

99 Examples of global settlements involving regulators from multiple jurisdictions include Odebrecht SA and Braskem SA Plea Agreements, see DOJ, press release, 'Odebrecht and Braskem Plead Guilty and Agree to Pay at Least $3.5 Billion in Global Penalties to Resolve Largest Foreign Bribery Case in History' (21 December 2016), https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/odebrecht-and-braskem-plead-guilty-and-agree-pay-least-35-billion-global-penalties-resolve (plea agreements with the DOJ, in which Odebrecht and Braskem agreed to pay a combined total penalty of at least $3.5 billion to resolve charges with authorities in the US, Brazil and Switzerland arising out of their schemes to pay hundreds of millions of dollars in bribes to government officials around the world); SEC v. Embraer S.A., see SEC, press release, 'Embraer Paying $205 Million to Settle FCPA Charges' (24 October 2016), https://www.sec.gov/news/pressrelease/2016-224.html (DPA with the DOJ, and interest and disgorgement payments to the SEC and Brazilian authorities to resolve criminal and civil charges arising out of bribery of government officials in the Dominican Republic, Saudi Arabia and Mozambique, and the false recording payments in India via a sham agency agreement); SEC v. VimpelCom Ltd, see SEC, press release, 'VimpelCom to Pay $795 Million in Global Settlement for FCPA Violations' (18 February 2016), https://www.sec.gov/news/pressrelease/2016-34.html (settlement with US and Dutch regulators, with significant assistance from Norwegian, Swedish, Swiss, and Latvian authorities); Citicorp, JPMorgan Chase & Co., Barclays PLC and The Royal Bank of Scotland plc Plea Agreements, see DOJ, press release, 'Five Major Banks Agree to Parent-Level Guilty Pleas' (20 May 2015), https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/five-major-banks-agree-parent-level-guilty-pleas (global settlement of claims against five banks involving DOJ, the Federal Reserve, CFTC and the New York State Department of Financial Services in the US, and the Financial Conduct Authority in the UK).

100 For example, as part of a global settlement regarding Odebrecht, the DOJ's plea agreement provided that 'the United States will credit the amount that Odebrecht pays to Brazil and Switzerland over the full term of their respective agreements.' DOJ, press release, 'Odebrecht and Braskem Plead Guilty and Agree to Pay at Least $3.5 Billion in Global Penalties to Resolve Largest Foreign Bribery Case in History' (21 December 2016), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/odebrecht-and-braskem-plead-guilty-and-agree-pay-least-35-billion-global-penalties-resolve. And, as part of a global settlement with Embraer to resolve alleged FCPA violations, the SEC announced that 'Embraer may receive up to a $20 million credit depending on the amount of disgorgement it will pay to Brazilian authorities in a parallel civil proceeding in Brazil.' SEC, press release, 'Embraer Paying $205 Million to Settle FCPA Charges' (24 October 2016), https://www.sec.gov/news/pressrelease/2016-224.html.

25

Fines, Disgorgement, Injunctions, Debarment: The UK Perspective

Kelly Hagedorn, Robert Dalling and Matthew Worby[1]

25.1 Criminal financial penalties

Criminal offences of fraud, bribery and money laundering are covered by sentencing guidelines (the Guidelines) whether the offender is a company or an individual, and whether the conviction follows an investigation by the Serious Fraud Office (SFO), the National Crime Agency (NCA), Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs (HMRC), or other law enforcement authority.[2] The Guidelines apply in England and Wales and must be followed unless the court is satisfied that to do so would be contrary to the interests of justice.[3]

The Guidelines apply to all sentences passed on or after 1 October 2014, regardless of the date of the offence, and regardless of the date of the legislation under which the prosecution is brought (such as the Fraud Act 2006, the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, and the Bribery Act 2010 (and their predecessors)).[4] In applying the Guidelines to offences prosecuted under legislation that pre-dates them, the court may reflect 'modern attitudes' to historic offences and make due

1 Kelly Hagedorn is a partner, Robert Dalling is special counsel and Matthew Worby is an associate at Jenner & Block London LLP. The authors wish to acknowledge the contributions of Peter Burrell, Simon Osborn-King and Paul Feldberg, the original authors of the chapter in previous editions, on which this chapter is partly based.

2 The Sentencing Council's Definitive Guideline for Fraud, Bribery and Money Laundering, published on 31 January 2014, available at https://www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/Fraud-Bribery-and-Money-Laundering-offences-definitive-guideline-Web.pdf. We further note that the Sentencing Council is introducing a general sentencing guideline, effective from 1 October 2019, to cover offences that are not already the subject of a pre-existing guideline (available at https://www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/overarching-guides/magistrates-court/item/general-guideline-overarching-principles/).

3 s.125, Coroners and Justice Act 2009.

4 See p. 4, the Guidelines.

allowance for any change in maximum sentence for that particular offence, to ensure that the sentence passed is in the interests of justice.[5] While in some cases that can result in an increase in penalty, in others it may mean a decrease. For example, under the Bribery Act the maximum sentence is 10 years' imprisonment, whereas before it had been seven.[6] On that basis, it could be argued that a fine for a pre-Bribery Act offence calculated using the new Guidelines should be discounted by up to 42 per cent to reflect that while the Guidelines apply to pre- and post-Bribery Act conduct, the fine should recognise that Parliament intended conduct after the Bribery Act came into force to be punished more severely.

The Guidelines set out a step-by-step guide to be used by the court in assessing the sentence to be imposed on individuals and corporates. Set out below are the steps the sentencing court must follow when assessing the penalties to impose on a corporate defendant for offences of fraud, money laundering and bribery.

Compensation 25.2

The court must first consider whether any compensation should be paid by the company to the victim for any personal injury, loss or damage resulting from the offence.[7] The amount of the order will be the amount the court considers appropriate, having regard to any evidence and to any representations made by or on behalf of the offender (or prosecutor).[8] In respect of such claims, the SFO will need to provide evidence to the court of a request for compensation by the victim. In the case of R v. Smith & Ouzman Ltd,[9] Recorder Mitchell QC indicated that he would have refused the SFO's request for a compensation order, as the SFO had not produced evidence of a request for compensation from the victim.

The making of a compensation order is not mandatory, but the court should provide reasons as to why it has not made one.[10] The court must have regard to the financial means of the defendant. If the defendant's means are limited, priority should be given to the payment of compensation over any other financial penalties.

Confiscation 25.3

Confiscation must be considered if either the Crown asks for it or the court thinks that it may be appropriate.[11] The aim of confiscation is to deprive defendants of the benefit that they have gained from their criminal conduct,[12] and it is irrelevant for the purposes of calculating a benefit figure whether the defendant has retained the benefit of his or her conduct. The benefit figure will represent the total value of the benefit obtained by the defendant, although the final confiscation order

5 R v. Hall [2011] EWCA Crim 2753; R v. Clifford [2014] EWCA Crim 2245.
6 s.11, Bribery Act 2010.
7 s.130(1)(a), Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000.
8 s.130(4), Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000.
9 Unreported, Southwark Crown Court, 7 January 2015.
10 s.130(3), Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000.
11 The Guidelines, p. 48.
12 s.6, Proceeds of Crime Act 2002.

cannot be for a greater sum than the value (at the time the order is made) of (1) the assets the defendant has available and (2) any property transferred by the defendant during the six years preceding the date of charge, for less than market value (tainted gifts). The court must address the following factors before making a confiscation order: (1) whether the defendant has benefited from the criminal conduct; (2) the value of the benefit obtained; and (3) the sum that is recoverable from the defendant.[13]

The application of the confiscation regime as regards the calculation of benefit has become less harsh in recent years. In corruption cases, for example, a prosecutor could previously have claimed that the benefit obtained was the entire value of the contract won through the criminal conduct, and request that that amount be confiscated. However, recent case law indicates that a 'judge should, if confronted by an application for an order which would be disproportionate, refuse to make it but accede only to an application for such sum as would be proportionate'[14] when calculating the amount of an offender's benefit. When the offender is a company, this should be restricted to gross profit earned together with any other pecuniary advantage flowing from the corruption.[15] In a separate case, it has been held that where the defendant can establish that VAT output tax on revenue obtained from criminal conduct has been properly accounted for to HMRC, it would be disproportionate to make a confiscation order calculated on the basis that a sum equivalent to that VAT paid has been 'obtained' by the defendant.[16]

When calculating the gross profit, the approach is typically to 'add back' the amount of bribes paid that may have been deducted as an 'expense' before arriving at the gross profit.

An important consideration, particularly where companies participate in joint ventures or collaborate on projects, is that if a benefit is determined by the court to have been obtained jointly by co-defendants, the court may make a confiscation order against each defendant for the whole amount of the benefit obtained.[17]

Companies and individuals should also be aware that the prosecutor may ask the court to apply the criminal lifestyle provisions. If the court determines that a defendant has a criminal lifestyle, the consequences can be serious.[18] The lifestyle provisions apply in a number of prescribed circumstances, including where it can

13 R v. May [2008] 1 AC 1028.

14 R v. Waya [2012] UKSC 51, [2012] 3 WLR 1188, para. 16: courts must consider Article 1 of Protocol 1 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) when making a confiscation order, and ensure in particular that confiscation is proportionate to the legitimate aim of recovery of the proceeds of crime.

15 R v. Sale [2013] EWCA Crim 1306.

16 R v. Harvey [2016] 4 All ER 521.

17 R v. Ahmad and Fields [2015] AC 299. However, any sum recovered from one defendant must be taken into account when bringing an action against another.

18 s.75, Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 sets out a three-limbed test, namely where the offence in question (1) is specified in Schedule 2 of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, (2) constitutes conduct forming part of a course of criminal activity, or (3) was committed over a period of at least six months, and the defendant has benefited from the conduct.

be shown that the conduct in the indictment was committed over at least six months. If one considers an allegation of bribery, this is often charged as both a conspiracy to bribe, as well as a substantive offence of bribery. Typically, a conspiracy charge will involve the offer of a bribe, the award of a contract and then the payments. This may well take much longer than six months, bringing the lifestyle provisions into play for even a simple one-off corrupt payment. If the conditions above are met, it will be assumed that property transferred or expenditure incurred by a corporate defendant over the six years preceding the charge was obtained from general criminal conduct, and is therefore liable to be confiscated, unless the company can show this assumption to be incorrect or that applying the criminal lifestyle provision would risk serious injustice.[19]

Fine 25.4

When considering the extent to which a fine would be appropriate, the court must take into account compensation[20] or confiscation[21] orders made against the offender. Any fine imposed is calculated by reference to the harm caused by the particular criminal conduct. For bribery offences, the appropriate figure is normally the gross profit obtained from the criminal conduct. For fraud offences, it is normally the actual or intended gross gain to the offender, and for money laundering offences, the amount of money laundered.[22]

Once the relevant harm figure is determined, the court will apply a multiplier, to reflect the culpability of the defendant. The Guidelines provide a non-exhaustive list of factors to be taken into account to assess the level of culpability, which will either be high, medium or low. The factors include the role played by the corporate entity in the unlawful activity, the duration of the offence, any obstruction of detection, the scale and vulnerability of the victims, and whether the offence involved the corruption of government officials.[23] The multiplier will either be 300 per cent (high), 200 per cent (medium) or 100 per cent (low). The court will then adjust the percentage within the relevant category range (from 20 per cent up to 400 per cent) depending on any aggravating or mitigating factors, a non-exhaustive list of which is set out in the Guidelines.[24] The fine must represent the seriousness of the offence, as well as the financial circumstances of the defendant.

The court should then 'step back' and consider adjusting the level of the fine based on the effect of compensation, confiscation and fine taken together, which should remove the gain, provide appropriate punishment and act as a deterrent. If a defendant is being sentenced for more than one offence, the court must also consider whether the total sentence imposed on the defendant is just

19 s.10, Proceeds of Crime Act 2002.

20 s.130, Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000.

21 ss.6 and 13, Proceeds of Crime Act 2002.

22 The Guidelines, p. 49.

23 Ibid.

24 Ibid., p. 50.

and proportionate based on the misconduct. It is perhaps this step-back element which increases the uncertainty as to the size of fine.

Before the Guidelines were introduced, Lord Justice Thomas stated in relation to the fine element: 'I approach sentencing on the basis in this case that a fine comparable to that imposed in the US would have been the starting point.'[25] This quote was referred to in the first deferred prosecution agreement (DPA).[26] Following that dictum, a judge may decide to step back and increase the fine to the level a US court would impose. Anecdotally, we are aware from recent cases that in one instance the judge did enquire of the SFO what the fine would have been if the US Sentencing Guidelines were being followed. Owing to this level of uncertainty and because the fine cannot be agreed by the prosecution and defence even as part of a plea bargain (or DPA), some corporate offenders may wish to consider asking the court for an indication of the sentence it could expect to receive should it plead guilty, often known as seeking a Goodyear indication.[27]

The procedure governing such requests is set out in the case of R v. Goodyear and the Criminal Practice Directions.[28] If the request is granted, the indication will be confined to the maximum fine the court would impose if the defendant pleaded guilty at that stage in the proceedings. It will not include ancillary matters such as confiscation. The court cannot give an indication where there is a dispute between the parties as to the factual basis for sentencing. The agreed factual basis should be reduced to writing and placed before the judge. Crucially, the judge has absolute discretion to decline to give any indication. If an indication is given and the defendant does not plead guilty having had a reasonable opportunity to consider it, then the indication will fall away. If the case proceeds to trial, the prosecution will not be able to refer to the request for a Goodyear indication. A Goodyear indication cannot be sought pre-charge and is therefore unlikely to be of assistance in DPA cases.

25.5 Guilty plea

If a guilty plea is entered by the defendant, the court must give the defendant credit.[29] The Reduction in Sentence for a Guilty Plea: Definitive Guideline recommends a sliding scale of discount, which will be applied to the harm figure, dependent on the stage at which the plea is entered: one-third for a plea at the first stage of the proceedings and a maximum of one-quarter thereafter.[30] The 25 R v. Innospec Ltd, [2010] Crim LR 665, Southwark Crown Court, 26 May 2010, unreported.

26 SFO v. Standard Bank Plc (Case No. U20150854) [2016] Lloyd's Rep FC 102 30 November 2015.

27 See R v. Goodyear [2005] 1 WLR 2532.

28 Criminal Practice Directions VII Sentencing C: Indications of Sentence.

29 s.144, Criminal Justice Act 2003.

30 The Reduction in Sentence for a Guilty Plea: Definitive Guideline (https://www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/publications/item/reduction-in-sentence-for-a-guilty-plea-definitive-guideline-2/) applies, regardless of the date of the offence, to all offenders aged 18 or older and to organisations, where the first hearing in respect of the case is held on or after 1 July 2017. This chapter proceeds on the basis that these guidelines apply.

reduction should be further decreased to a maximum of one-tenth on the first day of trial, having regard to the time when the guilty plea is first indicated relative to the progress of the case and the trial date.[31] The first stage will normally be the first hearing at which a plea or indication of plea is sought and recorded by the court. The Reduction in Sentence for a Guilty Plea: Definitive Guideline explains that where the court is satisfied there were particular circumstances that significantly reduced the defendant's ability to understand what was alleged or otherwise made it unreasonable to enter a guilty plea sooner, a reduction of one-third should still be made. The court should distinguish between cases in which it is necessary to receive advice or see the evidence to understand whether the defendant is guilty of the offence and cases in which a defendant merely delays a guilty plea to assess the strength of the prosecution evidence and the prospects of conviction or acquittal.[32] The court should also consider applying a further discount to reflect any assistance provided by the defendant to the prosecution.[33]

Costs 25.6

The court may make an order in favour of either the prosecution or the defendant.[34] Ordinarily, in the event of a plea or a conviction, the court will make an order that the defendant pay the investigation and court costs of the prosecuting body. If a defendant is acquitted or the prosecution does not proceed to trial, the court may make an order in favour of the defendant. A defendant's costs will be met out of 'central funds' (i.e., public money)[35] in an amount the court considers reasonably sufficient to compensate the defendant for any expenses properly incurred in the proceedings. An award may also be made against a party for unnecessary or improper acts or omissions that result in another party incurring costs.[36] A court may also make an award against a representative (not a party) who conducts litigation in a way that results in wasted costs.[37] A defendant's costs order should usually be made unless there is a positive reason for not doing so.

Private prosecutions are subject to the same costs regime. As a result, while persons who bring a private prosecution without any realistic chance of success will likely be faced with a costs order, they will not generally be liable for costs simply because the prosecution failed or was withdrawn. The justification is that 'the law should guard against inadvertently discouraging the bringing of private prosecutions because of a fear of adverse costs consequences.'[38] A court may also 31 The Reduction in Sentence for a Guilty Plea: Definitive Guideline, Revised June 2017, s.D2.

32 Ibid., s.F1.

33 R v. Wood [1992] 2 Cr App R (S) 347.

34 Prosecution of Offences Act 1985; Access to Justice Act 1999; Lord Chief Justice's Practice Direction (Costs in Criminal Proceedings) 201; and Costs in Criminal Case (General) Regulations.

35 s.16, Prosecution of Offences Act 1985.

36 Ibid., at ss.19 and 19A.

37 Evans v. SFO [2015] 1 WLR 3595.

38 The Queen on the Application of David Haigh v. City of Westminster Magistrates' Court [2017] EWHC 232 (Admin), para. 35.

make an award in favour of a private prosecutor in respect of that party's own costs, to be paid out of central funds, whether or not the defendant is convicted.[39]

25.7 Director disqualifications

Under the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986 (CDDA), any director convicted of misconduct in connection with a company (either in the United Kingdom or overseas) or considered unfit to be concerned with the management of a company, may be disqualified from the right to manage a company by a disqualification order.[40] A disqualification order may bar a person from acting as a director of any UK company for up to 15 years, and the person will be entered on the register of disqualified directors.

Proceedings for a disqualification order are not brought by the company itself. If a director is convicted of an indictable offence in connection with the promotion, formation or management of a company,[41] usually the court before which the director is convicted will consider whether a disqualification order ought to be made and impose it. The Insolvency Service,[42] however, may look to bring disqualification proceedings before, separately from, or even alongside, a criminal prosecution brought by the SFO or other agency, irrespective of whether the company in question is solvent.

In such instances parties should be wary of competing court timetables and the need to ensure their pleadings are consistent. This is of particular importance because the Insolvency Service may share documents produced to it,[43] and given the wide ambit of any such investigation into the general 'fitness' of an individual to be a director, the production orders issued by the Insolvency Service may be wider than those of another agency. Moreover, the Insolvency Service has a memorandum of understanding with the Financial Reporting Council (FRC),[44] and so it is possible that any such information received is shared on a voluntary basis to the extent 'one regulator considers that information it has gathered will be materially relevant to the other'.[45]

The standard of proof in such proceedings is to the civil standard, but given disqualification involves 'a substantial interference with the freedom of the individual . . . [t]he more serious the allegation, the more the court will need the assistance of cogent evidence'.[46]

---

39 s.17, Prosecution of Offences Act 1985.

40 ss.2(1), 5A(2) and 8(2), CDDA.

41 In addition, any conviction in connection with the liquidation or striking off of a company, with the receivership of a company's propertyor with being an administrative receiver of a company's property may also result in a disqualification order: s.2(1), CDDA.

42 See https://www.gov.uk/government/organisations/insolvency-service.

43 s.447, Companies Act 1985.

44 The Financial Reporting Council (FRC), in turn, has separate memoranda of understanding with the SFO, Financial Conduct Authority and Prudential Regulation Authority.

45 5.2.b, Memoranda of Understanding between the FRC and the Insolvency Service, 18 January 2018.

46 Re Living Images [1996] BCC 112, page 116.

In the case of an offence committed outside the United Kingdom, the Secretary of State has standing to apply to the court for a disqualification order, if it appears expedient in the public interest. The Secretary of State also may apply to court for a disqualification order against a person who is (or has been) a director or a shadow director of a company, if it appears expedient in the public interest. On an application, the court may make a disqualification order where it is satisfied that a person's conduct in relation to the company (alone or taken together with their conduct as a director or shadow director of one or more other companies or overseas companies) makes that person unfit to be concerned in the management of a company.

A disqualification order for unfitness may be made on any information properly put before the court that demonstrates that the director or shadow director is unfit to be concerned in the management of a company.[47] As an alternative, the Secretary of State may accept a disqualification undertaking, if it is expedient to do so instead of applying for a disqualification order.

The matters to be taken into account by the court or the Secretary of State, in considering whether a person's conduct makes him or her unfit to be concerned in the management of a company, whether to make a disqualification order and what the period of disqualification should be, are set out in Schedule 1 to the CDDA. Specific matters are to be taken into account where the person is or has been a director, including (1) any misfeasance or breach of fiduciary duty in relation to a company or overseas company, (2) any material breach of any statutory or other obligation that applies as a result of being a director of a company or overseas company, and (3) the frequency of any such conduct.

If a company enters formal insolvency proceedings, the appointed liquidators or administrators must submit reports about directors (including shadow directors) to the Secretary of State if it appears to them the conditions for disqualification are satisfied.[48] For companies entering insolvency proceedings starting on or after 6 April 2016, this obligation to report will apply in respect of all directors and shadow directors (current and past within the previous three years), irrespective of their conduct.[49]

See Chapter 41 on directors' duties

Civil recovery orders 25.8

Companies should also be aware of the SFO's ability to obtain a civil recovery order (CRO) to recover property it has proved, on the balance of probabilities, is or represents property obtained through unlawful conduct, pursuant to Part 5 of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (POCA 2002).

The SFO is not required to obtain a conviction to apply for a CRO. The civil standard of proof and the absence of the need for a conviction have historically made the use of CROs attractive to both the SFO and corporate entities alike.

47 s.109 of the Small Business, Enterprise and Employment Act 2015 removed the previous reference to 'investigative material' in s.8 of the CDDA, with effect from 1 October 2015.

48 s.7, CDDA 1986.

49 s.7A, CDDA 1986.

CROs have also been used by the SFO in addition to a prosecution, to target tainted assets. However, CROs, which are in rem actions, have rarely been used by the SFO in this way, as the SFO must show that the property it seeks to recover is the property that has been created by the criminal conduct. Such difficulties associated with proving the exact nature of the property can of course be dealt with by the respondent entity admitting that the property is tainted in the way alleged by the applicant.[50]

One notable case in which the SFO used a CRO to recover tainted assets followed a guilty plea to corruption offences and breaches of UN sanctions in 2009 by the engineering firm Mabey & Johnson Ltd. In 2012, the SFO then successfully obtained a CRO of approximately £130,000 against its parent company, Mabey Engineering (Holdings) Ltd, even though the parent company had no knowledge of the unlawful conduct. The CRO was obtained to recover a sum representing the value of the dividends received by the parent that were derived from contracts won through Mabey & Johnson Ltd's unlawful conduct.

However, the SFO's use of CROs as an alternative to prosecution in corporate matters received considerable criticism, concerning the lack of detail surrounding the underlying criminal conduct, and the basis on which the SFO decided to pursue a CRO rather than a criminal conviction.

Perhaps in light of this criticism, in 2012 the Attorney General's Office published guidance for prosecutors and investigators on how they should use these asset recovery powers.[51] The Attorney General's guidance sets out a non-exhaustive list of circumstances in which these powers might be appropriately used when it is not feasible to secure a conviction. It also sets out a non-exhaustive list of circumstances in which these powers could still be properly used when a conviction is feasible, but the use of asset recovery powers that do not require a conviction might better serve the overall public interest.

The SFO now states that it may use these powers as an alternative (or in addition) to prosecution, but states that if it does so, it will publish its reasons, the details of the illegal conduct and the details of the disposal. In 2018, the SFO obtained a significant CRO (against an individual) following the guilty plea by Griffiths Energy to charges brought by the Canadian authorities for bribing Chadian diplomats to secure contracts. The £4.4 million CRO was brought against the wife of a former Chadian diplomat who received an improper inducement from Griffiths Energy to obtain contracts. The traceable proceeds of this inducement were located in a bank account in London.[52] At the time of writing, the SFO's CRO proceedings against Gulnara Karimova (a daughter of the former 50 As the DPA regime has not been adopted in Scotland, civil recovery remains the route to a negotiated outcome in this jurisdiction.

51 Guidance for prosecutors and investigators on their asset recovery powers under section 2A of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, 29 November 2012.

52 SFO v. Saleh [2018] EWHC 1012 (QB). For another example of a significant CRO against a corporate, see the 2012 CRO against Oxford Publishing Limited: https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2012/07/03/oxford-publishing-ltd-pay-almost-1-9-million-settlement-admitting-unlawful-conduct-east-african-operations/.

Uzbekistan president Islam Karimov) and Rustam Madumarov continue in connection with alleged corruption in that country.[53] It is as yet unclear what assets the SFO is attempting to seize, or to which deals the assets relate. The SFO has been granted until 3 January 2020 to submit its claim.

Under section 20 of the Criminal Finances Act 2017, the Financial Conduct Authority (FCA) may recover property in cases where there has not been a conviction, but where it can be shown, on the balance of probabilities, that property has been obtained through unlawful conduct. Applications are made in the High Court.

The Criminal Finances Act 2017, Part 1, sections 1 to 9 amends section 362 of POCA 2002 and empowers the High Court to make unexplained wealth orders (UWOs). These require persons suspected of involvement in, or association with, serious criminality to explain the origin of assets that appear to be disproportionate to their known income. A failure to provide a response will give rise to a presumption that the property is recoverable, to assist any subsequent civil recovery action. Persons may also be convicted of an offence if they make false or misleading statements in response to a UWO. Applications can be made by the SFO, NCA and FCA, among others. The NCA secured its first two UWOs in February 2018, against the wife of an individual serving a prison sentence in Azerbaijan for embezzlement, in respect of properties that reportedly cost £22 million. Three further UWOs, in addition to interim freezing orders, were obtained by the NCA in May 2019 in respect of three residential properties in 'prime locations'[54] linked to a politically exposed person believed to be involved in serious crime.

See Chapter 17 on individuals in cross-border proceedings and Chapter 30 on individual penalties

Criminal restraint orders 25.9

The SFO and other enforcement authorities may also apply for a restraint order in the Crown Court. This prevents a defendant from dissipating, disposing of or detrimentally dealing with its assets. The Crown Court may impose a restraint order, which applies to all 'realisable property' currently in the defendant's possession or subsequently acquired by the defendant.[55] As such, restraint orders are the criminal law equivalent of freezing injunctions.

The legislation stipulates five different scenarios in which a restraint order may be imposed.[56] The common thread is that there must normally be reasonable cause to believe that the defendant has benefited from his or her criminal conduct and is likely to dissipate the assets prior to any fine or confiscation order being imposed. If that is the case, an application for a restraint order may be made after commencement of a criminal investigation, during proceedings for an offence, 53 https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2018/10/03/sfo-begins-action-to-recover-proceeds-of-alleged-corrupt-telecoms-deals-in-uzbekistan/.

54 29 May 2019, NCA press release, 'NCA secures Unexplained Wealth Orders for prime London property worth tens of millions'.

55 s.41(2), Proceeds of Crime Act 2002; this is subject to a number of exceptions, such as for legal fees and ordinary living expenses.

56 Ibid., at s.40.

or in the context of specific applications filed by the prosecution. In the event of suspected non-compliance the enforcement authorities may apply to appoint a management receiver[57] or an enforcement receiver,[58] depending on the specific circumstances of the case.

The court has broad discretion in defining the terms of a restraint order,[59] but must require the applicant, usually the SFO or the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) (which pursues restraint proceedings in cases involving investigations by police or HMRC), to report to the court on the progress of the investigation at specified intervals.[60] A breach of a restraint order constitutes civil contempt.[61]

A considerable challenge presented by restraint orders is that they may prevent individuals or companies from using their funds to obtain legal representation in the proceedings to which the order relates.[62]

25.10 Serious crime prevention orders

Unlike the orders discussed above, Serious Crime Prevention Orders (SCPOs), which were first introduced in the Serious Crime Act 2007 (SCA) and which have been significantly broadened by the Serious Crime Act 2015, can be imposed prior to any finding of criminal liability. SCPOs are civil orders.[63]

SCPOs may be imposed only upon application by the Director of Public Prosecutions (or equivalents in Scotland and Northern Ireland) or the Director of the SFO[64] where the court is satisfied that the person concerned has been involved in 'serious crime' anywhere in the world, and that there are reasonable grounds to believe that an SCPO would protect the public by preventing, restricting or disrupting involvement by the person in serious crime in England and Wales.[65] The CPS will also 'make applications on behalf of other prosecutors for SCPOs' within the Whitehall Prosecutors Group, further to a memorandum of understanding published on 9 October 2017.[66] A recent example of this can be seen when the CPS sought an SCPO on behalf of the FCA in February 2018.[67]

The prosecution needs to prove these matters to the civil standard of proof: namely, it must be more likely than not that the defendant has been involved in serious crime, and that the order would protect the public.[68] However, there is

57 s.48, Proceeds of Crime Act 2002.

58 s.50, Proceeds of Crime Act 2002.

59 Ibid., at s.41(7).

60 Ibid., at s.41(7B)(a).

61 Director of the Serious Fraud Office v. O'Brien [2012] EWCA Crim 67.

62 AP v. CPS [2008] 1 Cr App R 39.

63 s.35(1), SCA.

64 s.8, SCA. SCPOs are therefore not available in private prosecutions.

65 s.1(1), SCA.

66 Signed by individuals on behalf of the Director of Public Posecutions, the Food Standards Agency, the Insolvency Service, the FCA, Natural Resource Wales, the Environment Agency and the Competition and Markets Authority.

67 Referenced in R v. Gopee [2019] EWCA Crim 601.

68 s.35(2), SCA.

authority from the House of Lords regarding antisocial behaviour orders, which are similar to SCPOs in nature and operation, to the effect that the standard of proof in proceedings where 'allegations were made of criminal or quasi-criminal conduct which, if proved, would have serious consequences for the person' is the criminal standard of proof, namely beyond reasonable doubt.[69] It is unclear whether this would apply to SCPOs notwithstanding the statutory provisions, but the CPS has taken the view that the criminal standard does apply to the issue as to whether a defendant was 'involved' in serious crime.[70]

There are two types of SCPO: Crown Court orders and High Court orders. The Crown Court may impose an SCPO only upon conviction of a person for a serious crime. The High Court may make an order without the need for a conviction.[71] The distinction turns on proof of 'involvement in' as opposed to 'conviction of' a serious offence. It follows that 'involvement' is broader than 'conviction', and includes conduct that may have facilitated the commission by another of a serious offence in England and Wales,[72] or that was likely to facilitate such offence, whether or not it was actually committed.[73]

'Serious crime' is defined broadly, and includes any offence listed in Part 1 of Schedule 1 to the SCA, as well as any other offence 'which, in the particular circumstances of the case, the court considers to be sufficiently serious to be treated' as serious crime for the purposes of an SCPO application.[74] Schedule 1 lists an array of specific offences under 16 headings, ranging from trafficking in arms, to substantive money laundering offences, fraud, tax evasion, bribery and offences in relation to breaches of sanctions.[75]

SCPOs may be imposed on individuals as well as bodies corporate, partnerships and unincorporated associations.[76] Where a corporation is in breach of an order, the court may order its dissolution where to do so would be 'just and equitable'.[77] The court has wide discretion in formulating the terms of the SCPO.[78] The overriding test for imposition of an SCPO is that the court may include such terms as

69 R v. Manchester Crown Court ex p McCann [2002] UKHL 39, [2003] 1 AC 787.

70 CPS guidance on serious crime prevention orders, available at https://www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/serious-crime-prevention-orders.

71 s.1(1), SCA.

72 s.2(1)(b), SCA.

73 s.2(1)(c), SCA.

74 s.2(2), SCA.

75 Sched. 1, SCA. In particular offences under: Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, ss.327 (concealing, etc. criminal property), 328 (facilitating the acquisition, etc. of criminal property) and 329 (acquisition, use and possession of criminal property); Fraud Act 2006 ss.1 (fraud by false representation, failing to disclose information or abuse of position) and 11 (obtaining services dishonestly); Bribery Act 2010 ss.1 (offences of bribing another person), 2 (offences relating to being bribed) and 6 (bribery of foreign public officials).

76 s.30, SCA.

77 s.27(4)(b), SCA.

78 The court may include a provision allowing a law enforcement agency to enter into a monitoring arrangement with a third-party contractor, and to have the subject of the SCPO pay some of the costs: s.39(4) and (5), SCA.

it considers 'appropriate for the purpose of protecting the public by preventing, restricting or disrupting involvement by the person concerned in serious crime in England and Wales'.[79] Section 5 of the SCA contains a non-exhaustive list of restrictions that might be imposed, such as limitations on financial, property or business dealings;[80] a person's associations or communications;[81] use of any item;[82] and travel both within and outside the jurisdiction.[83] Notably, an SCPO may also include a requirement to provide specified information or disclose documents to law enforcement.[84] While this is subject to legal professional privilege,[85] there is no provision in the SCA to protect the right against self-incrimination. However, a statement made by the defendant in compliance with a request for information may not be given in evidence against the defendant.[86]

The NCA has published a list of all SCPOs in force. In May 2019, 203 were in effect.[87] They have been imposed for a range of offences, ranging from drug trafficking (by far the largest category) to money laundering, illegal immigration and fraud. The conditions imposed in the orders vary in severity, but include restrictions on possessing cash and financial reporting requirements. However, this list does not include SCPOs obtained by local police authorities or HMRC that the NCA was not notified of.

Although at the time of writing there are no publicised examples of SCPOs having yet been used for this purpose, they could allow enforcement authorities to instal monitors in cases involving corporate organisations. To date, monitors have only been appointed in cases involving CROs and DPAs where the corporate organisations have co-operated with enforcement authorities. The SCA provides for the possibility of the appointment of an 'authorised monitor' following conviction regardless of whether the defendant has co-operated during the preceding investigation and proceedings (although there clearly would be significant difficulties associated with appointing a monitor in respect of an unco-operative corporate defendant).

79 s.1(3), SCA (High Court); s.19(5) (Crown Court). Other legislation dealing with civil orders in furtherance of the criminal law, such as ABSOs, sexual offences prevention orders and terrorism prevention and investigation measures impose a requirement of 'necessity' rather than 'appropriateness'. As most applications for an SCPO will engage one or more rights under the ECHR, however, the court will need to consider the Human Rights Act 1998, in particular the precept of proportionality, which includes necessity. See also CPS guidance on serious crime prevention orders (Terms of orders), available at https://www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/serious-crime-prevention-orders.

80 s.5(3)(a), SCA.

81 s.5(3)(c), SCA.

82 s.5(3)e), SCA.

83 s.5(3)(f), SCA.

84 s.5(5)(a), SCA. But a requirement to provide information orally is not permissible: s.11, SCA.

85 s.12, SCA.

86 s.15, SCA. This is similar to the provisions under s.2 of the Criminal Justice Act 1987.

87 See https://nationalcrimeagency.gov.uk/who-we-are/publications/299-nca-ancillary-order-register.

DPAs 25.11

The legislation and DPA Code[88] state that the level of financial penalty imposed as part of a DPA should be broadly comparable to a fine that a court would have imposed following an early guilty plea,[89] which would ordinarily be a reduction of one-third. However, in all but the first DPA[90] approved by the court, a discount of 50 per cent to the financial penalty imposed has been applied. In the XYZ DPA (now known to be agreed with Sarclad Limited, following the lifting of reporting restrictions), Sir Brian Leveson, then President of the Queen's Bench Division, considered that a 50 per cent reduction was appropriate as the company had self-reported in a timely way and had fully co-operated with the SFO. The court in its judgment stated that the reduction was made to encourage others to act similarly when confronting corporate criminality.[91] A similar justification also prompted a 50 per cent discount for the Tesco DPA[92] and the Serco DPA.[93]

In the Rolls-Royce DPA, no such initial self-report was made by the company but the court still reduced the financial penalty by 50 per cent. Leveson P cited the following as factors that he took into consideration when reducing the financial penalty: Rolls-Royce's 'extraordinary cooperation' in the SFO's investigation, including voluntary disclosure of internal investigation materials; not winding up companies of interest to the SFO's investigation; and identifying conduct to the SFO that went beyond that which had triggered the SFO's initial investigations.[94]

See Chapter 23 on negotiating global settlements

In addition to a reduced criminal penalty, the mandatory debarment provisions of the Public Contracts Regulations 2015 (the Regulations) will not apply because the entry into a DPA does not constitute a conviction. However, if a DPA is agreed and approved by the court, the DPA and the underlying facts and conduct will be published. A contracting authority (as defined by the Regulations) may consider that the underlying facts and conduct as set out in the DPA are an 'appropriate means' of demonstrating that a company is guilty of 'grave professional misconduct', in accordance with the Regulations, resulting in discretionary debarment from public procurement procedures, as considered below.

Debarment 25.12

In addition to financial penalties, companies will need to be mindful of the impact that any conviction, or misconduct not resulting in a conviction, may have on their ability to tender for public contracts. The rules governing debarment are 88 Deferred Prosecution Agreements Code of Practice; Crime and Courts Act 2013.

89 Crime and Courts Act 2013, Schedule 17, para. 5(4).

90 Rolls-Royce [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249; Sarclad Limited [2016] Lloyd's Rep FC 509; Tesco Ltd [2017] 4 WLUK 558; Serco Geografix Ltd [2019] 7 WLUK 45.

91 SFO v. XYZ, Redacted Approved Judgment (Case No. U20150856), para. 57.

92 In a judgment issued by Leveson P.

93 In a judgment issued by Davies J.

94 SFO v. Rolls Royce PLC and Rolls Royce Energy Systems Inc, [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249, paras. 16 to 24.

contained in the Regulations, which came into force on 26 February 2015, and which implemented the EU Procurement Directive in the United Kingdom.[95]

Debarment can be mandatory or discretionary. Debarment is mandatory if the tendering company has been convicted of a specific category of offence, including economic crimes such as bribery,[96] corruption, money laundering, fraud or conspiracy to defraud affecting the European Union's financial interests. Debarment will also be mandatory if an individual who is a member of the relevant company's administrative, management or supervisory body, or has powers of representation, decision or control in the company, is convicted of one or more of these offences.[97]

In comparison with the prior legislation, which imposed an automatic, indefinite debarment for companies convicted of these types of offence, mandatory debarment now only applies for a maximum of five years.

Discretionary debarment applies to a different range of conduct, including insolvency, the distortion of competition or where a contracting authority is able to demonstrate by appropriate means that a company is guilty of grave professional misconduct rendering its integrity questionable. A contracting authority may exclude a company from participation in procurement procedures[98] for three years following such conduct.[99]

While the Regulations do not define 'grave professional misconduct', the European Court of Justice has interpreted this term as covering 'all wrongful conduct which has an impact on the professional credibility of the operator'.[100] Reference to a conviction for an economic crime not within the remit of mandatory debarment could form the basis for demonstrating such misconduct.

The most significant change in respect of debarment in the United Kingdom is the introduction of 'self-cleaning', which is applicable to both mandatory and discretionary debarment. The Regulations set out a number of conditions that, if met, can demonstrate a company's suitability for access to public procurement tenders, despite the existence of grounds for mandatory or discretionary debarment. The conditions include the payment of compensation, co-operation with investigative authorities, and the taking of concrete measures to prevent further criminal offences or misconduct being committed. If a contracting authority considers that the evidence of self-cleaning provided to it by a company is sufficient, 95 Directive 2014/24/EU on public procurement.

96 Specifically, the common law offence of bribery; corruption within the meaning of s.1(2) of the Public Bodies Corrupt Practices Act 1889; corruption within the meaning of s.1 of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1906; bribery within the meaning of ss.1, 2 or 6 of the Bribery Act 2010; or bribery within the meaning of s.113 of the Representation of the People Act 1983. The failure of a commercial organisation to prevent bribery, contrary to s.7 of the Bribery Act 2010, will not trigger mandatory debarment but may result in discretionary debarment.

97 Regulation 57(1).

98 Regulation 57(8)(c).

99 Regulation 57(12).

100 Case C-465/11 Forposta v. Poczta Polska, para. 27. This was in light of Article 45(2) of the previous Public Procurement Directive, Directive 2004/18/EC, though it remains persuasive in relation to interpretation of the new Public Procurement Directive.

it must not debar the company.[101] The gravity and circumstances of the misconduct are relevant factors when evaluating whether a company has self-cleaned; the graver the offence, the more comprehensive these self-cleaning steps need to be.[102]

Until the Serco DPA, there had been no substantive discussion as to what impact a DPA would have in the context of debarment. In the Serco DPA, Mr Justice William Davis expressly noted that in his opinion (on the facts of the case) he was satisfied that:

> [A]pproval of this DPA will not be the determining factor in what is a political decision. Public procurement is subject to statutory regulation, namely by the Public Contracts Regulations 2015. The Regulations provide for mandatory or discretionary debarment in different situations. They also provide for what is known as self-cleaning by which a company can provide that it has taken appropriate remedial action sufficient to satisfy the contracting authority that it has demonstrated its reliability.[103]

He added: 'The same exercise must follow in the event of the DPA.'[104]

In light of a letter received by William Davis J from the government's Chief Commercial Officer, addressed to the SFO, it was clear that in Serco's case a DPA would not be a mandatory or discretionary bar to contracting with the government. The letter stated that 'we see no current reason why Serco should not continue to be a key strategic supplier to [the UK government]',[105] and, on this basis, William Davis J stated that his 'approval of the DPA, although of relevance, is not the determining factor in terms of Serco PLC or its subsidiaries continuing to provide services to HM Government'.[106] This would appear to also be the case for other companies that have agreed a DPA with the UK government, as on 5 August 2019, when Rolls-Royce announced a contract with the Ministry of Defence to continue to provide support to the Royal Air Force's Typhoon aircraft as 'a follow-on to the 10 year Partnered Support Operational Phase arrangement'.[107]

Regulatory financial penalties and other remedies 25.13

Companies and individuals may also face regulatory sanctions for their misconduct separately and sometimes in addition to any criminal penalties. The primary regulatory authority is the FCA, which regulates firms (such as banks, credit unions and insurance firms) and individuals performing regulated financial services activities. The FCA may bring enforcement action against these firms (as well 101 Regulation 57(13) and 57(14).

102 Regulation 57(16).

103 Serco Geografix Ltd [2019] 7 WLUK 45, para. 28.

104 Ibid., at para. 29.

105 Ibid., at para. 30.

106 Ibid.

107 Rolls-Royce press release, 'Rolls-Royce continues to support EJ200 engine for RAF's Typhoon fleet', 5 August 2019.

as individuals) in connection with economic crimes to the extent that it considers there has been a regulatory breach. In certain areas (such as cases concerning market abuse and unauthorised business), it may also take action against persons who are not authorised by it to carry on regulated activities.

On 6 March 2010, the FCA adopted a new method of calculating financial penalties and published the procedure in the Decision Procedure and Penalties Manual (DEPP). This procedure allows the FCA to take into account the revenue generated by the relevant part of the financial institution when determining the level of the fine, which may well be in excess of any gain made through misconduct. In relation to an individual, the FCA will look at the gross amount of any benefit received by the individual in connection with the breach when assessing the fine figure.

The use of the new procedure has resulted in the FCA imposing fines on financial institutions for conduct after 6 March 2010 that are substantially higher than fines that would have been imposed under the previous penalty regime. If the relevant conduct spans the date of both the old and new penalty procedures, the FCA will apply the old procedures to the conduct preceding 6 March 2010 and the new procedures to the subsequent conduct.[108]

Penalty regime after 6 March 2010

Under the penalty regime, the FCA uses five steps to determine the level of a financial penalty it will impose on a firm for a regulatory breach:[109]

1 disgorgement of the financial benefit derived directly from the breach (which may include the profit made or loss avoided);
2 seriousness of the breach;[110]
3 any mitigating and aggravating factors;
4 adjustment for deterrence;[111] and
5 settlement discount.[112]

---

108 We do not consider the penalty regime prior to 6 March 2010 in this chapter, as we anticipate that the number of matters involving conduct that pre-dates March 2010 will likely be small at the time of writing.

109 FCA Handbook, Decision Procedure and Penalties manual (DEPP) 6.5 (current version November 2019).

110 In relation to financial institutions this figure will typically be determined by reference to the 'relevant revenue' from the particular product line or business during the period of the breach. The FCA will determine what percentage of the revenue figure it considers to be an appropriate basis for the financial penalty, from a minimum of 0 per cent to a maximum of 20 per cent. The assessment is based on a number of factors including the impact and nature of the breach, and whether the breach was deliberate or reckless. A Level 5 breach is most serious at 20 per cent of relevant revenue, reducing in 5 per cent increments, such that a Level 1 breach is 0 per cent. The figure to be imposed under this section is in addition to the disgorgement amount.

111 If the FCA considers the figure arrived at after Step 3 is insufficient to deter the firm that committed the breach, or others, from committing further or similar breaches, the FCA may increase the financial penalty.

112 If the financial institution settles all issues of fact and liability at the earliest stage, it will receive a 30 per cent reduction on the financial penalty. However, this will not apply to any disgorgement sum due.

Since the introduction of this regime, the FCA has an increased flexibility in determining the level of financial penalty to imposed on a financial institution. For any misconduct after 6 March 2010, the penalty regime gives the FCA wide discretion in determining the 'relevant revenue' forming the basis for the penalty, and this can now include the underlying revenue of the relevant part of the financial institution. However, the FCA may consider other factors when considering the seriousness of the breach, such as market capitalisation, where 'relevant revenue' is not deemed to be an appropriate measure of the harm caused by the breach.[113]

After the introduction of the revised DEPP, there was a marked increase in the fines imposed by the FCA (or its predecessor) from just over £66 million in 2011 to nearly £1.5 billion in 2014.[114] However, in 2018 the FCA levied fines totalling just under £60.5 million.[115] It is the authors' view that the introduction of the revised DEPP happened to coincide with a period of increased regulatory enforcement activity, for example in connection with the benchmark manipulation and foreign exchange manipulation cases, which resulted in an unusual spike in financial penalties, rather than the spike being attributable solely to the revisions to DEPP.

On 1 March 2017, the FCA introduced a new enforcement procedure for disciplinary cases.

Under this procedure, four options are available to parties looking to resolve cases at an early stage in proceedings. These are:

- obtain a 30 per cent discount on the penalty if the firm or individual settles both the factual issues, the fact of a regulatory breach and the amount of penalty with the FCA;
- obtain a 30 per cent discount if the firm or individual agrees with the FCA all the relevant facts and accepts that they amount to regulatory breaches, whether or not the firm or individual disputes the penalty to be imposed;
- obtain a 15 to 30 per cent discount if the firm or individual agrees with the FCA all the relevant facts but disputes that they amount to regulatory breaches and disputes the penalty. The percentage of the discount made available to the firm or individual is at the discretion of the Regulatory Decisions Committee (RDC), the decision-making board responsible for deciding if enforcement action is appropriate; or
- obtain a 0 to 30 per cent discount in penalty if the firm or individual partly agrees with the FCA some of the facts, liability and penalty, but disputes a narrow set of issues. Again, the percentage of the discount made available to the firm or individual is at the discretion of the RDC.[116]

113 https://www.fca.org.uk/publication/final-notices/tejoori-limited-2017.pdf, paras. 6.5 to 6.11; https://www.fca.org.uk/publication/decision-notices/cathay-international-holdings-limited-2019.pdf, section 6.

114 http://www.fca.org.uk/firms/being-regulated/enforcement/fines.

115 https://www.fca.org.uk/news/news-stories/2018-fines.

116 https://www.fca.org.uk/publication/corporate/enforcement-information-guide.pdf.

As a result, settlement discounts will now be available in a wider range of circumstances allowing regulated firms to challenge aspects of the FCA's enforcement team's findings before the RDC.[117]

25.14 Withdrawing a firm's authorisation

In addition to imposing financial penalties on authorised firms and individuals, the FCA has a number of other powers at its disposal to meet its strategic and operational objectives, in particular ensuring that financial markets function well, protecting consumers and ensuring integrity and competition in the markets.[118] Perhaps the most draconian measure the FCA can impose on a firm is the withdrawal of its authorisation to engage in regulated activities.

The Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 (FSMA), as substantially revised by the Financial Services Act 2012, imposes a general prohibition on a person or entity engaging in 'regulated activities', which are defined in Schedule 2 to FSMA, but include most financial advisory and transactional work.[119] The general prohibition applies unless a person, legal or natural, is exempt or has been 'authorised' to engage in such activity under FSMA.[120] A common form of such authorisation is permission given by the FCA to a firm under Part 4A of FSMA. In granting permission, the FCA must ensure that the authorised person is satisfying certain 'threshold conditions', and will continue to do so. One key threshold condition is suitability: an authorised person must be 'a fit and proper person having regard to all the circumstances'.[121] The FCA's powers include a right to cancel this permission if it appears to the FCA that the authorised person is failing or is likely to fail to fulfil the threshold conditions.[122]

The withdrawal power is exercisable where the FCA believes that it is 'desirable to exercise the power to advance one or more of its operational objectives'.[123] While the power is broadly worded, the FCA's Enforcement Guidelines state that the cancellation power will be exercised mainly where the FCA has 'very serious concerns' about a firm, or the way its business is or has been conducted.[124] More specifically, this will be the case where the firm has repeatedly failed to comply 117 See, e.g., Linear Investments Limited v. Financial Conduct Authority [2019] UKUT 0115 (TCC) https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/media/5cac6ef3e5274a42a5619fcf/Linear__Investements_Ltd_v_FCA.pdf. Linear Investments Limited entered into a focused resolution agreement with the FCA, by which is agreed matters of fact and liability with the FCA. However, it disputed the FCA's proposed penalty of £409,300 and appealed to the Upper Tribunal, in the first case of its kind. The Upper Tribunal confirmed the amount of the penalty.

118 s.1B(1) to (3), FSMA.

119 Sched. 2, FSMA.

120 s.19, FSMA.

121 Sched. 6, para. 2E, FSMA. Other threshold conditions relate to matters such as office location, effective supervision, resources and business model.

122 s.55J(1)(a), FSMA. The FCA may also cancel permission if the authorised person has not engaged in regulated activity in the previous 12 months: s.55J(1)(b).

123 s.55J(1)(c), FSMA.

124 EG 8.5.1, FCA.

with FCA rules and requirements, or has failed to co-operate with the FCA to the extent that it is no longer satisfied that the firm is fit and proper.[125] Withdrawal of permission means that the person ceases to be authorised and cannot engage in any regulated activities.[126] As an alternative to withdrawing permission, the FCA has broad powers to vary a Part 4A permission, or to impose specific conditions on its exercise instead.[127]

Senior Managers and Certification Regime 25.15

Both the Senior Managers and Certification Regime (SMCR) and the Approved Persons Regime regulate individuals exercising functions on behalf of regulated entities. At the time of writing, the SMCR applies to UK banks, building societies, credit unions, Prudential Regulatory Authority-designated investment firms, branches of foreign banks operating in the United Kingdom, and insurance and reinsurance firms. In December 2019, the SMCR will be extended to apply to all firms authorised under FSMA. We only consider the SMCR in this chapter.

The SMCR contains the following three elements:

- Senior Managers Regime: This applies to all individuals performing Senior Management Functions (SMF). These individuals need to be approved by the FCA or PRA as appropriate.
- Certification Regime: This applies to all employees of regulated firms who could pose a risk of significant harm to the firm or its customers. These individuals are not approved by the FCA or PRA; rather, the employing firm must certify (both at the outset of employment and on a continuing basis) that the individual is fit and proper to carry out his or her functions.
- Conduct Rules: Both the FCA and the PRA have issued high-level requirements that apply to individuals falling within the ambit of the SMCR. These replace the Statements of Principle and Code of Practice for Approved Persons. In practice, the FCA Conduct Rules apply to all employees of the FCA, except those performing ancillary functions (for example, receptionists and post room staff). They apply to almost all staff of FCA authorised firms in the United Kingdom, and to those staff based outside the United Kingdom who deal with UK customers.

Section 59ZA of FSMA defines SMF as follows:

> A function is a 'senior management function', in relation to the carrying on of a regulated activity by an authorised person, if – (a) the function will require the person performing it to be responsible for managing one or more aspects of the authorised person's affairs, so far as relating to the activity, and (b) those aspects involve, or might involve, a risk of serious consequences (i) for the authorised person, or (ii) for business or other interests in the United Kingdom.

125 EG 8.5.2(7) and (8), FCA.
126 ss.19 and 31(1)(a), FSMA.
127 ss.55J and 55L, FSMA.

The FCA has designated a number of particular positions within firms as being SMFs (including some 'catch-all' functions designed to cover firms' particular arrangements). Not all of these positions will be applicable in every authorised firm. The FCA and PRA have also specified over 30 prescribed responsibilities within authorised firms (again, not all will apply in every case). These responsibilities, if applicable, must be formally assigned to an SMF within the firm. The individuals holding those positions are then accountable for the proper performance of those responsibilities, and applications for approval to the FCA and PRA must be accompanied by corresponding statements of responsibility.

The FCA and the PRA can take enforcement action against senior managers if:

- the manager is responsible for any activities in the firm in relation to which the firm contravenes a regulatory requirement; and
- the manager has not taken such steps as a person in his or her position could reasonably be expected to take to avoid the contravention occurring (or continuing).

The regulators therefore must prove a contravention of a regulatory requirement by the firm, in an area for which the senior manager was responsible. The burden of proof is on the regulators.

The designation of SMF does not necessarily entail an increase in personal liability from that which existed prior to the introduction of the SMCR; it enables the FCA and the PRA to more effectively identify those individuals responsible for areas of firms in which there has been a breach. Senior managers remain liable for being knowingly concerned with breaches by firms of relevant rules, and the FCA and PRA can take enforcement action against senior managers and certified individuals for breaches of the Conduct Rules.[128]

25.16 Restitution orders

The FCA may also seek restitution where it seeks to compensate those adversely affected by a breach of regulatory provisions.

The FCA will take the following considerations into account in determining whether to seek restitution, in the light of 'all the circumstances of the case': whether the profits are quantifiable or the losses identifiable; the number of persons affected; costs to the FCA; alternative redress, such as compensation schemes or another regulator; whether victims can be expected to bring proceedings in their own right; the firm's solvency; alternative powers available to the FCA; and the conduct of persons having suffered loss, for example whether they have contributed to their loss.[129] This list is not exhaustive. The FCA can apply to court for restitution, and if it finds that these requirements are met, the court may order payment of a sum it considers 'just' having regard to the profits made or loss 128 Only FCA Conduct Rules 1 to 5 apply to certified persons or other employees falling within scope; all of the FCA's Conduct Rules apply to senior managers. Only PRA Conduct Rules 1 to 3 apply to certified persons.

129 EG 11.2.1, FCE.

caused.[130] If the court orders restitution, the money will be paid to the FCA rather than to the person who has suffered loss or at whose expense a profit has been made (FSMA refers to these as 'qualifying persons').[131] However, the FCA must then disburse the money among the qualifying persons according to the terms of the court order.[132] The payment of restitution does not bar an ancillary civil claim for damages being brought by qualifying persons.[133]

See Chapter 33 on parallel civil litigation

Where appropriate, the FCA will consider imposing a restitution order using its administrative powers.[134] A restitution order may be imposed where the FCA is 'satisfied that a person has contravened a relevant requirement, or been knowingly concerned in the contravention of such a requirement'.[135] Further, the person against whom the order is sought must either have profited from the contravention, or must have caused loss or an otherwise adverse effect to another.[136] The FCA will usually choose to apply to the court (rather than using its administrative powers) for a restitution order where there is another factor requiring the involvement of the court. For example, where there is a risk of dissipation, a need to combine the restitution order with a separate order or a concern that the individual subject to the order may not comply.

On 28 March 2017, the FCA used its powers[137] for the first time to require a listed company to pay compensation for market abuse. Tesco agreed that it committed market abuse in relation to a trading update it published on 29 August 2014, which gave a false or misleading impression regarding the value of publicly traded Tesco shares and bonds. Tesco agreed to pay compensation to investors who purchased Tesco securities on or after 29 August 2014 and who still held those securities when the statement was corrected on 22 September 2014. Under the compensation scheme, Tesco must pay each investor an amount equal to the inflated price of each security. The FCA estimated that the total compensation payable under the scheme was likely to be in the region of £85 million, plus interest.[138]

The Office of Financial Sanctions Implementation 25.17

In the past year the Office of Financial Sanctions Implementation (OFSI) issued its first-ever financial penalties for breaches relating to financial sanctions, following the introduction of powers in the Policing and Crime Act 2017 (PCA17) aiming to strengthen the government's ability to punish financial sanctions breaches. The 130 s.382(2), FSMA.

131 Ibid.

132 s.382(3), FSMA.

133 s.382(7), FSMA.

134 s.384, FSMA.

135 s.382(1) and (6), FSMA. The meaning of 'relevant requirement' is somewhat narrower than under the injunction provisions, but is substantially the same; see s.382(9).

136 Ibid.

137 s.384, FSMA.

138 https://www.fca.org.uk/news/press-releases/tesco-pay-redress-market-abuse.

penalties, imposed against Raphael & Sons plc for £5,000[139] and Travelex UK Ltd for £10,000,[140] both relate to violations of the EU–Egypt financial sanctions regime.

The maximum penalty that OFSI can impose for a financial sanctions is £1 million or, where the breach relates to particular funds or resources with an estimable value, 50 per cent of the estimated value of the funds or resources – whichever is greater.[141] The PCA17 also raised the maximum term of imprisonment for financial sanctions offences to seven years[142] and amended the DPA regime such that financial sanctions breaches are now included in the list of offences for which a DPA may be entered into.[143]

25.18 The Information Commissioner's Office

The Information Commissioner's Office (ICO) may issue fines and prosecute individuals and corporates it considers have engaged in criminal activity in respect of their data protection obligations. At the time of writing, the ICO has engaged in 12 prosecutions where monetary penalties were sought, and one prosecution where the individual in question was sentenced to six months in prison.[144]

The ICO has, however, been more active in issuing civil monetary penalties, with 54 monetary penalties since 24 November 2017.[145] Following the implementation of the General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) in the United Kingdom via the Data Protection Act 2018 (DPA 2018), the ICO has issued two intention-to-fine notices under that legislation, which significantly increases the maximum penalties for breaches of data protection law from £500,000[146] to €10 million or 2 per cent of worldwide turnover (whichever is greater)[147] or €20 million or 4 per cent of worldwide turnover (whichever is greater)[148] depending on the nature of the breach.

The notices were issued against British Airways[149] and Marriott International[150] for personal data breaches affecting data subjects within the European Union.

139 https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/804117/190502_Raphaels_revised_notice.pdf.

140 https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/804021/Travelex_monetary_penalty.pdf.

141 s.146, PCA17.

142 Ibid., at s.144.

143 Ibid., at s.150, inserting para. 26A into Part 2 of Schedule 17 to the Crime and Courts Act 2013.

144 https://ico.org.uk/action-weve-taken/enforcement/?facet_type=Prosecutions&facet_sector=&facet_date=&date_from=&date_to=.

145 https://ico.org.uk/action-weve-taken/enforcement/?facet_type=Monetary+penalties&facet_sector=&facet_date=&date_from=&date_to=.

146 Data Protection Act 1998 s.55A as prescribed by section 2 of The Data Protection (Monetary Penalties) (Maximum Penalty and Notices) Regulations 2010.

147 GDPR, Article 83(4), as implemented by s.157, DPA 2018.

148 GDPR, Article 83(5), as implemented by s.157, DPA 2018.

149 https://ico.org.uk/about-the-ico/news-and-events/news-and-blogs/2019/07/ico-announces-intention-to-fine-british-airways/.

150 https://ico.org.uk/about-the-ico/news-and-events/news-and-blogs/2019/07/statement-intention-to-fine-marriott-international-inc-more-than-99-million-under-gdpr-for-data-breach/.

These proposed fines, of approximately £183 million and £99 million respectively, if issued without reduction following the written representation and appeal processes, indicate that the risks associated with compliance with data protection law have become significantly higher following the implementation of the GDPR. Given that the United Kingdom has incorporated the GDPR into its national law via the DPA 2018, this position is unlikely to change following its departure from the European Union.

Disclosure to other authorities 25.19

A look at recent enforcement action shows that UK enforcement authorities co-operate with a number of other enforcement authorities around the world, particularly in the United States. Such co-operation may be governed by legislation, a memorandum of understanding, or less formally through information sharing gateways.

It is therefore possible that, if a company or individual is found criminally liable or in breach of its regulatory obligations in the United Kingdom, the details of the offence or regulatory breach will be made known to interested enforcement authorities in other jurisdictions. If the company or individual faces liability in those jurisdictions, disclosure by the United Kingdom authorities may lead to further enforcement action. This issue naturally should be considered prior to a company or individual accepting any criminal or regulatory liability or entering into an agreement with enforcement authorities. Further, the SFO has made it clear in its Corporate Co-operation Guidance[151] that where a company seeks to co-operate with the SFO, the SFO expects to be notified in the event that any other government agencies contact the company, or if the company reports to any other government agencies.[152]

See Chapter 3 on self-reporting and Chapter 11 on production to authorities

Even if a company is not facing criminal or regulatory liability in other jurisdictions, it will still need to establish whether the local legal requirements would require a disclosure of a finding of criminal liability and subsequent financial penalty. Whether a disclosure is required will depend on the jurisdiction in which the company operates. If there is no local legal requirement to make a disclosure, foreign enforcement authorities may still expect to be notified of any finding of liability and subsequent financial penalty. Whether a voluntary disclosure is made will turn on what is expected by the local regulator and the implications of disclosure or non-disclosure. Such decisions are complicated by issues regarding personal data, which should be considered whenever it is transferring across jurisdictions to disclose misconduct to other enforcement agencies.

See Chapter 40 on data protection

151 SFO Operational Handbook, Corporate Co-operation Guidance, available at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/publications/guidance-policy-and-protocols/sfo-operational-handbook/.

152 Ibid.

26

Fines, Disgorgement, Injunctions, Debarment: The US Perspective

Gayle E Littleton, Charles D Riely, Amanda L Azarian and Grace C Signorelli-Cassady[1]

26.1 Introduction

This chapter considers the potential fines, penalties and other collateral consequences that corporates may face in the United States when defending against, or settling an enforcement action with, US regulators.

The US enforcement authorities have a variety of means to seek redress from corporates and individuals, including financial penalties and equitable remedies. The general purpose and policy objectives behind the sanctions are (1) to deter the defendant and others from committing such offences in the future, (2) to protect the public, (3) to punish the defendant and (4) to promote rehabilitation of the defendant.[2] In considering fines and penalties, the US enforcement authorities and courts will consider the facts and circumstances of the matter, including whether the defendant accepts responsibility for the conduct, any remediation that has been effected and co-operation by the defendant with the relevant enforcement authorities.[3]

See Chapter 10 on co-operating with authorities

In recent years, both the Department of Justice (DOJ) and Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) have been successful in extracting significant financial penalties as part of their enforcement actions and settlements.[4] In the fiscal

1 Gayle E Littleton and Charles D Riely are partners, and Amanda L Azarian and Grace C Signorelli-Cassady are associates, at Jenner & Block LLP. The authors also wish to acknowledge the contribution of Rita D Mitchell of Wilkie Farr & Gallagher, the original author of the chapter in previous editions on which this chapter is partly based.

2 See, e.g., Department of Justice, Justice Manual § 9-27.110.

3 See, e.g., Department of Justice, Justice Manual § 9-27.420.

4 For example, in 2014, BNP Paribas agreed to plead guilty and pay US$8.9 billion for alleged violations of US economic sanctions in Iran, Sudan and Cuba, of which US$140 million was a fine and US$8.8336 billion was forfeiture. (Department of Justice press release, 'BNP Paribas year ending 30 September 2015, DOJ collected a total of US$23.1 billion in civil and criminal penalties; in 2016, the combined figure was approximately US$15.3 billion.[5] The SEC obtained orders totalling approximately US$16 billion in disgorgement and penalties for fiscal years 2015 to 2018.[6]

While DOJ has recently emphasised the importance of prosecuting individuals rather than corporates and announced a new policy seeking to 'discourage disproportionate enforcement of laws by multiple authorities', it is too soon to tell whether these policy shifts will lead to a decrease in the total monetary fines and penalties collected.[7] In May 2018, it rolled out a policy to 'avoid the unnecessary

---

Agrees to Plead Guilty and to Pay $8.9 Billion for Illegally Processing Financial Transactions for Countries Subject to U.S. Economic Sanctions' (30 June 2014), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/bnp-paribas-agrees-plead-guilty-and-pay-89-billion-illegally-processing-financial.) In 2016, VimpelCom reached an approximately US$800 million resolution with the US and Dutch authorities over allegations of bribery of an Uzbek government official, of which US$230 million was a criminal penalty to the Department of Justice (DOJ), US$167.5 million was disgorgement and prejudgment interest to the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), and US$397.5 million was paid to Dutch prosecutors as a criminal penalty. (Department of Justice press release, 'VimpelCom Limited and Unitel LLC Enter into Global Foreign Bribery Resolution of More Than $795 Million; United States Seeks $850 Million Forfeiture in Corrupt Proceeds of Bribery Scheme' (18 February 2016), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/vimpelcom-limited-and-unitel-llc-enter-global-foreign-bribery-resolution-more-795-million.) In a related action, which has been stayed until 31 January 2020, DOJ is also seeking US$850 million in forfeiture of the corrupt proceeds of the alleged scheme (United States of America v. All Funds Held in Account Number CH1408760000050335300, 1:16-cv-01257, (S.D.N.Y.) Docket No. 34). In 2018, Société Générale agreed to pay over US$1 billion to US and French authorities to resolve charges relating to bribery of officials in Libya and manipulation of the London Inter-Bank Offered Rate, of which US$860 million was in criminal penalties and US$475 million was in regulatory penalties and disgorgement. (Department of Justice press release, 'Société Générale S.A. Agrees to Pay $860 Million in Criminal Penalties for Bribing Gaddafi-Era Libyan Officials and Manipulating LIBOR Rate' (4 June 2018), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/soci-t-g-n-rale-sa-agrees-pay-860-million-criminal-penalties-bribing-gaddafi-era-libyan.) In March 2019, a Russian telecommunications company, Mobile TeleSystems PJSC (MTS), settled Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA) violations with the SEC and DOJ for a total of US$850 million, none of which will be paid to non-US enforcement authorities. (Department of Justice press release, 'Mobile Telesystems Pjsc and Its Uzbek Subsidiary Enter Into Resolutions of $850 Million with the Department of Justice for Paying Bribes In Uzbekistan' (7 March 2019), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/mobile-telesystems-pjsc-and-its-uzbek-subsidiary-enter-resolutions-850-million-department.)

5 Department of Justice press release, 'Justice Department Collects More Than $23 Billion in Civil and Criminal Cases in Fiscal Year 2015' (3 December 2015), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/justice-department-collects-more-23-billion-civil-and-criminal-cases-fiscal-year-2015; Department of Justice press release, 'Justice Department Collects More Than $15.3 Billion in Civil and Criminal Cases in Fiscal Year 2016' (14 December 2016), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/justice-department-collects-more-153-billion-civil-and-criminal-cases-fiscal-year-2016.

6 Securities and Exchange Commission, Division of Enforcement Annual Report (2 November 2018), available at https://www.sec.gov/files/enforcement-annual-report-2018.pdf.

7 Department of Justice News, 'Deputy Attorney General Rod Rosenstein Delivers Remarks to the New York City Bar White Collar Crime Institute' (9 May 2018), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/deputy-attorney-general-rod-rosenstein-delivers-remarks-new-york-city-bar-white-collar.

imposition of duplicative fines, penalties, and/or forfeiture' against a corporate being investigated by multiple enforcement authorities.[8] The policy requires DOJ lawyers from all departments to coordinate internally and, when possible, with 'other federal, state, local, or foreign enforcement authorities' to curb the practice of 'piling on' fines and penalties, 'with the goal of achieving an equitable result'.[9] Regardless, in an active enforcement environment, corporates and individuals who are facing enforcement action should be mindful of the potential consequences and the opportunities to manage and reduce the ultimate fines and penalties.

See Chapter 24 on negotiating global settlements

26.2 Standard criminal fines and penalties available under federal law

26.2.1 Maximum financial penalties

Many federal statutes contain their own fining provisions, which typically include a maximum fine amount. Additionally, for some crimes, the Alternative Fines Act provides for an alternative maximum fine of double the gross gain (or gross loss caused to another) from the unlawful activity.[10] Where a fine is imposed against an officer, director, employee, agent or shareholder of an issuer, the fine may not be paid, directly or indirectly, by the issuer.[11]

In addition, for certain offences, DOJ may seek criminal or civil forfeiture, or both, of property that constitutes, or is derived from proceeds traceable to, the offence.[12] Recent examples of forfeiture include (1) DOJ complaints against 8 Department of Justice, Justice Manual § 1-12.100 – Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties in parallel and/or Joint Investigations and Proceedings Arising from the Same Misconduct (May 2018).

9 The policy sets out various factors that should be considered when coordinating between multiple DOJ units or enforcement authorities, including 'the egregiousness of a company's misconduct; statutory mandates regarding penalties, fines, and/or forfeitures; the risk of unwarranted delay in achieving a final resolution; and the adequacy and timeliness of a company's disclosures and its cooperation with the Department, separate from any such disclosures and cooperation with other relevant enforcement authorities'. (Department of Justice, Justice Manual § 1-12.100 – Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties in parallel and/or Joint Investigations and Proceedings Arising from the Same Misconduct (May 2018).) A recent example of this policy in action can be found in the Department's March 2019 US$850 million settlement with MTS and related SEC settlement carrying a civil penalty of US$100 million. According to a press release: 'Consistent with Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties in Parallel and/or Joint Investigations and Proceedings Arising from the Same Misconduct (Justice Manual 1-12.100), the Department of Justice agreed to credit the civil penalty paid to the SEC as part of its agreement with MTS. Thus, the combined total amount of criminal and regulatory penalties paid by MTS and [its subsidiary] to U.S. authorities will be $850 million.' (Department of Justice press release, 'Mobile Telesystems Pjsc and Its Uzbek Subsidiary Enter Into Resolutions of $850 Million with the Department of Justice for Paying Bribes In Uzbekistan' (7 March 2019), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/mobile-telesystems-pjsc-and-its-uzbek-subsidiary-enter-resolutions-850-million-department.)

10 See 18 U.S.C. § 3571; Southern Union Co. v. United States, 132 S.Ct. 2344, 2350-52 (2012).

11 15 U.S.C. § 78ff(c)(3).

12 See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 982(a) (in connection with sentencing persons convicted of certain federal offences, including money laundering and other financial crimes, courts shall order criminal forfeiture of property 'involved in such offense, or any property traceable to such property');

various officials and associates of the sovereign wealth fund, 1MDB, in connection with allegations of an international conspiracy to launder misappropriated funds, seeking civil forfeiture totalling approximately US$1.7 billion[13] and (2) the US Attorney's Office for the District of Nevada obtaining a forfeiture order from the District Court requiring the former president and chief executive officer of MRI International, found guilty on multiple counts of mail and wire fraud and money laundering in connection with a Ponzi scheme, to pay US$813 million.[14]

Defendants may also be required to pay restitution, taking into consideration the amount of loss sustained by each victim, the financial resources of the defendant and any other factors the court deems appropriate.[15]

On 8 October 2019, DOJ issued a non-binding policy memorandum to Criminal Division attorneys that provides 'guidance and an analytical framework' on evaluating a company's ability to pay a criminal fine or criminal monetary 18 U.S.C. § 981(a) (property involved in certain federal offences, including money laundering and other financial crimes, 'or any property traceable to such property', is subject to civil forfeiture). Under civil forfeiture statute 18 U.S.C. § 981(a)(1)(C), property relating to a 'specified unlawful activity' as defined in 18 U.S.C. § 1956(c)(7) is subject to civil forfeiture. Among the 'specified unlawful activities' listed in 18 U.S.C. § 1956(c)(7) are racketeering, bribery of a public official, fraud by or against a foreign bank, export control violations and violations of the FCPA. Further, 28 U.S.C. § 2461(c) 'permits the government to seek criminal forfeiture whenever civil forfeiture is available and the defendant is found guilty of the offense'. United States v. Newman, 659 F.3d 1235, 1239 (9th Cir. 2011) (original emphasis).

13 Department of Justice press release, 'U.S. Seeks to Recover Approximately $38 Million Allegedly Obtained from Corruption Involving Malaysian Sovereign Wealth Fund' (22 February 2019), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/us-seeks-recover-approximately-38-million-allegedly-obtained-corruption-involving-malaysian.

14 Department of Justice press release, 'President And CEO Of Las Vegas Investment Company Sentenced to 50 Years in Prison for Running $1.5 Billion Ponzi Scheme' (23 May 2019), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/president-and-ceo-las-vegas-investment-company-sentenced-50-years-prison-running-15-billion.

15 18 U.S.C. § 3663(a)(1)(B)(i). See, e.g., United States v. Savoie, 985 F.2d 612, 619 (1st Cir. 1993) (holding civil settlement did not bar defendant, convicted of racketeering violations, of having to pay restitution of US$93,476.67, as restitution 'is not a civil affair; it is a criminal penalty meant to have deterrent and rehabilitative effects'). In Kelly v. Robinson, the Supreme Court commented on restitution as follows: 'The criminal justice system is not operated primarily for the benefit of victims, but for the benefit of society as a whole. Thus, it is concerned not only with punishing the offender, but also with rehabilitating him. Although restitution does resemble a judgment "for the benefit of" the victim, the context in which it is imposed undermines that conclusion. The victim has no control over the amount of restitution awarded or over the decision to award restitution. Moreover, the decision to impose restitution generally does not turn on the victim's injury, but on the penal goals of the State and the situation of the defendant. As the Bankruptcy Judge who decided this case noted in Pellegrino: "Unlike an obligation which arises out of a contractual, statutory or common law duty, here the obligation is rooted in the traditional responsibility of a state to protect its citizens by enforcing its criminal statutes and to rehabilitate an offender by imposing a criminal sanction intended for that purpose".' 479 U.S. 36, 52, 107 S. Ct. 353, 362, 93 L. Ed. 2d 216 (1986).

penalty when inability to pay is claimed.[16] The memo sets forth various legal considerations and relevant factors that should be taken into account if legitimate questions remain after an analysis of an inability-to-pay questionnaire. These factors include background on current financial position, alternative sources of capital, collateral consequences and victim restitution considerations.

26.2.2 United States Sentencing Guidelines

Federal courts in the United States use the United States Sentencing Guidelines (the Sentencing Guidelines) as guidance in considering the aggravating and mitigating circumstances of a crime and imposing a sentence. These apply to both corporates and individuals. Although district courts must consult the Sentencing Guidelines and take them into account, they are not required to apply them.[17] A recent study, in fact, suggests that federal trial judges 'now follow the advisory fraud guideline range in less than half of all cases', providing for sentences 'well below the fraud guideline'.[18]

For corporates, the calculation of the applicable fine is made by (1) identifying a 'base fine',[19] (2) identifying the minimum and maximum multipliers that combined with the base fine create a 'fine range'[20] and (3) considering potential 'departures', upwards or downwards, from the fine range.[21]

In calculating the base fine under the Sentencing Guidelines, the first step is to identify the 'offence level', which depends on the characteristics of the crime. The 'base offence level' is set according to the nature of the conduct or the statute violated, and then the overall offence level will increase or decrease depending on certain factors.[22] For example, for an anti-bribery violation under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA), the base offence level is 12.[23] Factors that may affect the overall offence level include the number of bribes, the dollar amount involved and the position of the foreign official receiving the payment or benefit.[24] The total offence level helps to determine the base fine, which is the greatest of the amount specified in a table that translates the offence level into a base fine, the 16 Department of Justice, Criminal Division, Memorandum on Evaluating a Business Organization's Inability to Pay a Criminal Fine or Criminal Monetary Penalty (8 October 2019), https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/file/1207576/download.

17 The Sentencing Guidelines were mandatory until the Supreme Court's decision in United States v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220, 125 S.Ct. 738, 160 L.Ed.2d 621 (2005).

18 Mark Bennett, Justin Levinson and Koichi Hioki, 'Judging Federal White-Collar Fraud Sentencing: An Empirical Study Revealing the Need for Further Reform', Iowa Law Review, 989, Vol. 102:939 (2017); George Pierpoint, 'Is white-collar crime treated more leniently In the US?', BBC News (11 March 2019), available at https://www.bbc.co.uk/news/world-us-canada-47477754.

19 United States Sentencing Commission, Guidelines Manual, § 8C2.4.

20 United States Sentencing Commission, Guidelines Manual, §§ 8C2.6, 8C2.7.

21 United States Sentencing Commission, Guidelines Manual §§ 8C4.1-8C4.11.

22 Base offence levels are set out in Chapter Two of the Guidelines Manual.

23 United States Sentencing Commission, Guidelines Manual § 2C1.1.

24 United States Sentencing Commission, Guidelines Manual §§ 2C1.1(b)(1)-(3).

pecuniary gain to the organisation from the offence, or the pecuniary loss from the offence caused by the organisation, 'to the extent the loss was caused intentionally, knowingly, or recklessly'.[25]

The second step is to calculate the 'culpability score', which yields the minimum and maximum multipliers to be applied to the base fine. The culpability score is based on the characteristics of the defendant. Relevant factors may include the size of the organisation and the degree of participation in, or tolerance of, the wrongdoing; the defendant's prior criminal history; whether the defendant has violated an order or injunction, or violated a condition of probation by committing similar misconduct to that for which probation was ordered; obstruction of justice; the existence of an effective compliance programme; and self-reporting, co-operation and acceptance of responsibility.[26] The potential multipliers can range from 0.05 (a reduction of 20 times the base fine) to 4.0 (four times the base fine), depending on the culpability score. The fine range reflects the minimum and maximum multipliers as applied to the base fine. In addition to the fine, any gain to the corporate from an offence that is not otherwise part of the corporate's restitution or remediation is subject to disgorgement.[27]

Finally, the Sentencing Guidelines allow for upward or downward departures from the fine range. This may include a downward departure for substantial assistance to the government in its investigation of others[28] or remedial costs that exceed the gain to the corporate.[29] Unlike the factors that are considered for calculating the offence level and culpability score, the detriments or benefits that result from departures are not quantified. The court in its discretion imposes a fine within the fine range, or above or below the range by taking into account any departures. For negotiated resolutions, a corporate through its counsel will often negotiate and agree to a downward departure recommendation beyond the low end of the fine range.

Civil penalties 26.3

Civil monetary sanctions can include penalties, disgorgement and prejudgment interest. Each of these has a different purpose and method of calculation.

The SEC may impose civil monetary penalties on any person who violates or causes a violation of the securities laws. The Securities Act of 1933 and the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 authorise three tiers of civil penalties. Less serious civil violations fall into the first tier, where the penalty is no more than US$9,472 for an individual or US$94,713 for a corporate for 'each act or omission' violating the federal securities laws. The second tier applies to violations involving fraud, deceit, manipulation, or deliberate or reckless disregard of a regulatory requirement, for which the maximum penalty is US$94,713 for individuals

25 United States Sentencing Commission, Guidelines Manual § 8C2.4.
26 United States Sentencing Commission, Guidelines Manual § 8C2.5.
27 United States Sentencing Commission, Guidelines Manual § 8C2.9.
28 United States Sentencing Commission, Guidelines Manual § 8C4.1.
29 United States Sentencing Commission, Guidelines Manual § 8C4.9.

and US$473,566 for corporates, again for each act or omission. Finally, the third tier applies to violations involving fraud, deceit, manipulation, or deliberate or reckless disregard of a regulatory requirement that also directly or indirectly resulted in 'substantial losses . . . to other persons' or 'substantial pecuniary gain to the person who committed the act or omission'.[30] Third-tier penalties have a limit of US$189,427 for individuals and US$947,130 for corporates, for each act or omission.[31] Civil penalties for insider trading depend on the amount of the profits generated by the illicit trading. A district court can order civil penalties up to three times the profit gained or loss avoided by the violative trade.[32]

DOJ likewise may seek civil penalties in certain types of matters, such as violations of federal financial, health, safety, civil rights and environmental laws.[33] For example, the Royal Bank of Scotland agreed to pay a US$4.9 billion civil penalty under the Financial Institutions Reform, Recovery, and Enforcement Act of 1989 for its involvement in a scheme that misled investors and failed to disclose significant risks about its residential mortgage-backed securities ultimately contributing to the 2008 financial crisis.[34]

26.4 Disgorgement and prejudgment interest

The SEC may also seek disgorgement to prevent an entity or individual from profiting from illegal conduct and to deter subsequent misconduct.[35] Disgorgement has often accounted for a significant portion of the overall enforcement sanction. For example, in March 2019, Fresenius Medical Care agreed to pay the SEC and DOJ more than US$231 million to settle allegations that it had violated the FCPA, of which US$147 million (the full amount imposed by the SEC and 63 per cent of the total) was disgorgement.[36] Disgorgement can also be sought 30 15 U.S.C. § 78u-2(b); 17 C.F.R. § 201.1001 and Securities and Exchange Commission, 'Inflation Adjustments to the Civil Monetary Penalties Administered by the Securities and Exchange Commission (as of 15 January 2019)', available at https://www.sec.gov/enforce/civil-penalties-inflation-adjustments.htm (effective 15 January 2019). The maximum civil penalty amounts noted above are for violations after 2 November 2015. Maximum civil penalty amounts will be adjusted annually for inflation, as described in 17 C.F.R. § 201.1001.

31 Id.

32 15 U.S.C. § 78u-1(a).

33 See, e.g., 12 U.S.C. § 1833a (providing a civil money penalty provision to the Financial Institutions Reform, Recovery, and Enforcement Act of 1989 which allows DOJ to seek civil penalties against persons who violate one of 14 enumerated statutes); 42 U.S.C. § 3614(d)(1)(C) (allowing it to seek civil penalties for violations of the Fair Housing Act of 1968).

34 Department of Justice press release, 'Royal Bank of Scotland Agrees to Pay $4.9 Billion for Financial Crisis-Era Misconduct: Settlement Is Largest Penalty Imposed On A Single Entity By The Justice Department For Financial Crisis-Era Misconduct' (14 August 2018), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/royal-bank-scotland-agrees-pay-49-billion-financial-crisis-era-misconduct.

35 See SEC v. Huffman, 996 F.2d 800, 802 (5th Cir. 1993); SEC v. Cavanaugh, 445 F.3d 105, 117 (2d Cir. 2006) (noting that disgorgement 'has the effect of deterring subsequent fraud').

36 Department of Justice press release, 'Fresenius Medical Care Agrees to Pay $231 Million in Criminal Penalties and Disgorgement to Resolve Foreign Corrupt Practices Act Charges' (29 March 2019), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/fresenius-medical-care-agrees-pay-231-million-criminal-penalties-and-disgorgement-resolve; Securities and Exchange Commission in certain circumstances even when DOJ declines to prosecute the corporate under its Corporate Enforcement Policy. For example, it declined to prosecute Cognizant Technology Solutions for violations of the FCPA, yet the company agreed to pay nearly US$20 million in disgorgement, which represented 'all profits fairly attributable to the bribery conduct'.[37]

The SEC's ability to extract large disgorgement payments has been recently limited by a decision issued by the United States Supreme Court that held that the typical five-year limitation period applying to any 'action, suit or proceeding for the enforcement of any civil fine, penalty, or forfeiture, pecuniary or otherwise' applies to disgorgement.[38] The SEC had previously taken the position, and some Circuit Courts had held, that disgorgement was an equitable remedy[39] and that the SEC was therefore not constrained by any limitation period when seeking disgorgement. On 5 June 2017, however, the US Supreme Court unanimously rejected the SEC's position in Kokesh v. SEC, holding that '[d]isgorgement in the securities-enforcement context is a "penalty" . . . and so disgorgement actions must be commenced within five years of the date the claim accrues'.[40] In so doing, the Supreme Court resolved a Circuit split.[41]

There will be a substantial impact on the amount the SEC is able to recover in certain cases. In Kokesh v. SEC, for example, the District Court had ordered the defendant to pay US$34.9 million in disgorgement, of which US$29.9 million press release, 'SEC Charges Medical Device Company With FCPA Violations' (29 March 2019), available at https://www.sec.gov/news/press-release/2019-48.

37 Department of Justice Declination Letter, 'Re: Cognizant Technology Solutions Corporation' (13 February 2019), available at https://www.justice.gov/criminal-fraud/file/1132666/download.

38 28 U.S.C. § 2462; Kokesh v. SEC, 137 S. Ct. 1635 (2017).

39 Kokesh v. SEC, 137 S.Ct. 1635, 1640-41 (2017); SEC v. Contorinis, 743 F.3d 296, 306-07 (2d Cir. 2014) ('[W]hile both criminal forfeiture and disgorgement serve to deprive wrongdoers of their illicit gain, the two remedies reflect different characteristics and purposes – disgorgement is an equitable remedy that prevents unjust enrichment, and criminal forfeiture a statutory legal penalty imposed as punishment. . . . Moreover, unlike disgorgement, which is a discretionary, equitable remedy, criminal forfeiture is mandatory and a creature of statute. Thus, unlike the criminal forfeiture case, the district court's discretion in determining disgorgement is not confined by precise contours of statutory language, but rather serves the broader purposes of equity.').

40 Kokesh v. SEC, 137 S.Ct. 1635, 1639 (2017).

41 Compare SEC v. Graham, 823 F.3d 1357, 1363-64 (11th Cir. 2016) (holding that § 2462's statute of limitations applies to disgorgement) with SEC v. Kokesh, 834 F.3d 1158, 1164-67 (10th Cir. 2016) (holding that the disgorgement sought was neither a penalty nor a forfeiture under § 2462) and Riordan v. SEC, 627 F.3d 1230, 1234 (D.C. Cir. 2011) (holding that disgorgement is not a 'civil penalty' and therefore not subject to the five-year statute of limitations); SEC v. Tambone, 550 F.3d 106, 148 (1st Cir. 2008) ('[T]he applicable five-year statute of limitations period [the defendant] invokes applies only to penalties sought by the SEC, not its request for injunctive relief or the disgorgement of ill-gotten gains.'), reinstated in relevant part, 597 F.3d 436, 450 (1st Cir. 2010).

related to conduct outside the limitation period and is therefore now time-barred.[42] As of the 2018 fiscal year end, the SEC estimated that it could 'forgo up to approximately $900 million' in pending cases due to the ruling.[43]

Since Kokesh v. SEC was decided, defendants have further sought to rely on the decision to challenge the SEC's statutory authority for seeking disgorgement at all, arguing that, as a penalty, disgorgement is not within the court's equitable powers. Although some courts have been receptive to such challenges,[44] many have construed Kokesh narrowly.[45] On 1 November 2019, the Supreme Court granted certiorari in Liu v. SEC, No. 18-501, to consider whether the SEC can seek disgorgement in actions filed in federal courts.[46] If the Supreme Court determines that the SEC lacks the power to seek disgorgement in such cases, this could curtail the agency's ability to demand significant monetary sanctions in future actions.

The calculation of disgorgement involves quantifying the amount of profits obtained as a result of the illegal conduct and can be complex. Given the challenges in distinguishing between legally and illegally derived profits, in considering the amount to be disgorged, courts have broad discretion and need only consider a 'reasonable approximation of profits causally connected to the violation'.[47] Disgorgement amounts may include both 'direct pecuniary benefit[s]' and 'illicit benefits . . . that are indirect or intangible'.[48] Once the SEC meets its burden of 42 Kokesh v. SEC, 137 S.Ct. 1635, 1641 (2017).

43 Securities and Exchange Commission, Division of Enforcement Annual Report (2 November 2018), available at https://www.sec.gov/files/enforcement-annual-report-2018.pdf.

44 United States v. Latorella, 2017 WL 2785413, at *4, n. 4 (D. Mass. 27 June 2017), appeal dismissed sub nom., United States v. Fields, 2017 WL 6945887 (1st Cir. 19 December 2017). ('It bears noting that [in Kokesh v. SEC,] the Supreme Court earlier this month expressly reserved the question "whether courts possess authority to order disgorgement in SEC enforcement proceedings".'); Osborn v. Griffin, 865 F.3d 417, 470 n. 1 (6th Cir. 2017) (Merritt, J dissenting) (stating that the theory of 'equitable disgorgement' 'may not even be applicable in SEC contexts for much longer in light of the Supreme Court's' Kokesh decision); SEC v. Arcturus Corp., No. 3:13-CV-4861-K, 2018 WL 1701998, at *2 (N.D. Tex. 10 January 2018) ('The Fifth Circuit has repeatedly stated that district courts enjoy "broad discretion" in ordering disgorgement. Unless, and until, current binding authority changes, this Court understands its authority to order disgorgement in SEC proceedings such as this.') (citation omitted).

45 See, e.g., SEC v. Jammin Java Corp., 2017 WL 4286180, at *3 (C.D. Cal. 14 September 2017) (rejecting defendant's contention that 'because the imposition of a penalty is not within the Courts' traditional equity powers, Kokesh should be construed so as to eliminate the disgorgement remedy altogether').

46 See, Liu v. Securities and Exchange Commission, SCOTUSblog, https://www.scotusblog.com/case-files/cases/liu-v-securities-and-exchange-commission/.

47 See, e.g., SEC v. Contorinis, 743 F.3d 296, 304-5 (2d Cir. 2014) (noting that disgorgement must be a 'reasonable approximation of profits causally connected to the violation') (quoting SEC v. Patel, 61 F.3d 137, 139-40 (2d Cir. 1995); Allstate Insurance Co. v. Receivable Finance Co., LLC, 501 F.3d 398, 413 (5th Cir. 2007) (citing SEC v. First City, 890 F.2d 1215, 1231 (D.C. Cir. 1989)); SEC v. Global Express Capital Real Estate Investment Fund, I, LLC, 289 Fed. Appx. 183, 190 (9th Cir. 2008); SEC v. Warren, 534 F.3d 1368, 1370 (11th Cir. 2008).

48 SEC v. Contorinis, 743 F.3d 296, 306 (2d Cir. 2014).

establishing a reasonable approximation of profits causally connected to the fraud, the burden shifts to the defendant to demonstrate that the gains were not affected by the offence.[49] The final decision rests with the court.

Defendants face significant challenges in trying to reduce disgorgement amounts or carve out certain categories of costs and expenses. Although revenue received from improper conduct may be disgorged, it is less clear whether and how the costs associated with that revenue would be used to reduce the disgorgement amount. Several courts have permitted defendants to deduct expenses that are directly associated with the revenue to be disgorged.[50] On the other hand, courts have generally refused to allow defendants to deduct overhead costs or general business expenses from disgorgement amounts on the basis that they were not directly related to the illegal conduct at issue and would have been incurred irrespective of the conduct.[51] By way of example, courts have denied requests to deduct from revenue expenses related to employees' salaries,[52] capital gains taxes paid in connection with illicit profits[53] and fees paid to clearing agents that could not be directly tied to the illegal sales.[54] As a consequence, 'SEC disgorgement sometimes exceeds the profits gained as a result of the violation'.[55]

Because disgorgement was not generally viewed as a 'fine' or 'penalty' until the Supreme Court's Kokesh decision, practitioners had also considered the possibility that an FCPA disgorgement payment might be tax-deductible. As a general matter, Internal Revenue Service (IRS) regulations preclude a tax deduction for penalties and fines paid to government authorities, on the basis that taxpayers should not be permitted to enjoy a tax benefit based on a payment designed to be punitive.[56] However, the Tax Code does not specifically address disgorgement. On 6 May 2016, the Office of the Chief Counsel of the Internal Revenue Service released an advice memorandum stating that the disgorgement payment to the SEC in a corporate FCPA action was not tax-deductible, on the basis that a disgorgement amount would, in its view, fall within Section 162(f) of the Tax Code stating that deductions are not allowed 'for any fine or similar penalty paid

49 SEC v. Razmilovic, 738 F.3d 14, 32-33 (2d Cir. 2013).

50 SEC v. McCaskey, 2002 WL 850001 at *4 (S.D.N.Y. 26 March 2002) (noting that a court may deduct any 'direct transaction costs' such as brokerage commissions from the disgorgement amount); SEC v. Shah, 1993 WL 288285 at *5 (S.D.N.Y. 28 July 1993) (allowing defendant to deduct the commissions paid to his broker to effectuate trades based on inside information). But see F.T.C. v. Bronson Partners, LLC, 654 F.3d 359, 375 (2d Cir. 2011) ('it is well established that defendants in a disgorgement action are "not entitled to deduct costs associated with committing their illegal acts"') (quoting SEC v. Cavanagh, 2004 WL 1594818 at *30 (S.D.N.Y. 16 July 2004), aff'd, 445 F.3d 105 (2d Cir. 2006).

51 SEC v. Svoboda, 409 F. Supp. 2d 331, 345 (S.D.N.Y. 2006); SEC v. Great Lakes Equities Co., 775 F. Supp. 211, 215 (E.D. Mich. 1991). ('[T]here is no basis for deducting the costs of fixed expenses since those expenses would be incurred whether or not the fraud took place.')

52 SEC v. Benson, 657 F. Supp. 1122, 1134 (S.D.N.Y. 1987).

53 SEC v. Svoboda, 409 F. Supp. 2d 331, 345 (S.D.N.Y. 2006).

54 SEC v. Zwick, 2007 WL 831812 at *23 (S.D.N.Y. 16 March 2007).

55 Kokesh v. SEC, 137 S. Ct. 1635, 1644 (2017).

56 26 C.F.R. § 1.162-21.

to a government for the violation of any law'.[57] Following Kokesh, the Office of the Chief Counsel of the Internal Revenue Service reaffirmed this position in an advice memorandum of 1 December 2017, noting that because 'as the Supreme Court held, disgorgement payments are penalties and are not compensatory, section 162(f) prohibits a deduction . . . for an amount paid as disgorgement for violating a federal securities law'.[58] Although these internal memoranda are not binding, they reflect the position of the IRS on this matter.

The SEC also generally obtains prejudgment interest on any disgorgement amount. The rules that apply to administrative proceedings cases brought by the SEC require that such amounts be included in any disgorgement.[59] District courts presiding over actions generally may determine whether prejudgment interest is appropriate.[60] The interest rate applied is typically the 'underpayment' rate set by the IRS.[61] There is no single approach for measuring when the clock begins to run on interest calculations. In some cases, it has been measured from the date the ill-gotten funds were received, up to the date of judgment.[62] In others, it may run from multiple dates where the matter involves multiple transactions,[63] or, where the applicable dates are difficult to identify, from the date of the complaint.[64]

---

57 See https://www.irs.gov/pub/irs-wd/201619008.pdf.

58 See https://www.irs.gov/pub/irs-wd/201748008.pdf.

59 17 C.F.R. § 201.600(a). In recent years, the SEC has increasingly sought to use administrative proceedings rather than federal court proceedings to enforce the federal securities laws. In 2012, for example, there were nearly twice as many administrative proceedings as civil actions brought by the Commission. See Sonia Steinway, 'SEC "Monetary Penalties Speak Very Loudly," But What Do They Say? A Critical Analysis of the SEC's New Enforcement Approach', Yale Law Journal, 124:209 (2014). The increased use of administrative proceedings has led to widespread criticism of the Commission around unfairness as well as constitutional challenges around due process. In September 2015, the SEC proposed amendments to the Rules of Practice governing its internal administrative proceedings, which were adopted in July 2016. These amendments, however, do not fully address the concerns that have been raised and challenges to the use of administrative proceedings continue.

60 SEC v. First Jersey Sec., Inc., 101 F.3d 1450, 1476 (2d Cir. 1996).

61 Id., 101 F.3d at 1476 (citing SEC Rules and Regulations, 60 Fed. Reg. 32738, 32788 (23 June 1995)). See also 17 C.F.R. § 201.600(b). The underpayment rate charged by the IRS is three percentage points above the federal short-term rate and for purposes of calculating interest on sums disgorged is compounded quarterly. 26 U.S.C. § 6621(a)(2); 17 C.F.R. § 201.600(b).

62 SEC v. DiBella, 2008 WL 6965807 at *3 (D. Conn. 18 July 2008); SEC v. GMC Holding Corp., 2009 WL 506872 at *6 (M.D. Fla. 27 February 2009) ('The time frame for the imposition of prejudgment interest usually begins with the date of the unlawful gain and ends at the entry of judgment.') (quoting SEC v. Yun, 148 F. Supp. 2d 1287, 1293 (M.D. Fla. 2001).

63 S*EC v. Savino*, 2006 WL 375074 at *18 & n.10 (S.D.N.Y. 16 February 2006) (calculating interest from the first day of the month following each improper trade).

64 SEC v. United Energy Partners, Inc., 2003 WL 223392 at *2 n.12 (N.D. Tex. 28 January 2003), aff'd, 88 F. App'x 744 (5th Cir. 2004) (using date of complaint for accrual of prejudgment interest award where dates on which defendant acquired disgorged funds were not clear); SEC v. GMC Holding Corp., 2009 WL 506872 at *6 (M.D. Fla. 27 February 2009) (same).

Injunctions 26.5

DOJ may also seek affirmative relief through an injunction where it is deemed necessary to advance public interests or enforce government functions. Such injunction actions may be specifically provided for by statute, may be used to enforce statutes that do not specifically provide for injunctive relief or may be sought from an appellate court pursuant to the All Writs Act.[65]

Likewise, the SEC may seek either a preliminary or permanent injunction when it appears that a person is engaged in, or is about to engage in, acts or practices constituting a violation of the securities laws.[66]

Other consequences 26.6

In addition to the criminal and civil penalties noted above, defendants may face other consequences as a result of a US criminal or civil action. For one, defendants may also face civil and criminal forfeiture of assets, including real and personal property constituting, or derived from proceeds traceable to, a violation, or to a conspiracy to commit a violation.[67] For certain offences, courts are required to order that property traceable to an offence be forfeited.[68]

See Chapter 18 on individuals in cross-border proceedings and Chapter 31 on individual penalties

Further, investigation or prosecution by authorities in one jurisdiction may also lead to investigations, prosecutions or resolution short of prosecution by authorities in other jurisdictions. For example, in recent years two international telecommunications companies, Stockholm-based Telia Company and Amsterdam-based VimpelCom Limited, entered into global resolutions to resolve investigations by the SEC, DOJ and Dutch authorities, agreeing to pay nearly US$1 billion and US$800 million in criminal and regulatory penalties, respectively.[69] It is expected that this trend of multinational investigations and co-operation across jurisdictions will continue in the coming years.

See Chapter 24 on negotiating global settlements

Defendants may also face a variety of actions from other US government agencies, international organisations, other corporates or even shareholders and employees, actions which may involve additional litigation and other monetary penalties.

65 28 U.S.C. § 1651(a). See US Department of Justice Civil Resource Manual, 'Injunctions', available at https://www.justice.gov/jm/civil-resource-manual-214-injunctions.

66 15 U.S.C. § 77t(b); 15 U.S.C. § 78u(d).

67 See 18 U.S.C. §§ 981, 982; 28 U.S.C. § 2461.

68 See 18 U.S.C. § 982.

69 See Department of Justice press release, 'Telia Company AB and Its Uzbek Subsidiary Enter Into a Global Foreign Bribery Resolution of More Than $965 Million for Corrupt Payments in Uzbekistan' (21 September 2017), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/telia-company-ab-and-its-uzbek-subsidiary-enter-global-foreign-bribery-resolution-more-965; Department of Justice press release, 'VimpelCom Limited and Unitel LLC Enter into Global Foreign Bribery Resolution of More Than $795 Million; United States Seeks $850 Million Forfeiture in Corrupt Proceeds of Bribery Scheme' (18 February 2016), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/vimpelcom-limited-and-unitel-llc-enter-global-foreign-bribery-resolution-more-795-million.

See Chapter 32 on monitorships

In addition, in connection with certain types of enforcement actions, such as FCPA enforcement, money laundering and sanctions violations, corporates may also be required to retain corporate compliance monitors. For example, in June 2019, Walmart entered into a three-year non-prosecution agreement pursuant to which it agreed not only to pay a combined penalty of US$137 million but also to retain an independent corporate compliance monitor for two years to resolve the government's FCPA investigation.[70]

Finally, in some circumstances, individuals or entities may be barred or suspended from doing business with the executive branch of the United States government.[71] Debarment may be triggered by a criminal conviction or, in some circumstances, even an adverse civil judgment, and applies to all subdivisions of a corporation unless the decision is limited by its terms to specific divisions or organisational units.[72] Suspension may occur upon adequate evidence that certain wrongdoing was committed and when it is in the public's interest.[73] Like debarment, suspension affects all organisational divisions of a corporation, unless otherwise specified.[74]

26.7 Financial penalties (and prison terms) under specific statutes

By way of example, the fines, penalties and other sanctions associated with particular federal criminal statutes of potential interest are outlined below.

26.7.1 Foreign Corrupt Practices Act

The FCPA criminalises bribery of foreign officials, either directly or through an intermediary, to obtain business or some other benefit. Its anti-bribery provisions apply not only to all US corporates and persons, but also can apply to foreign corporates that issue securities within the United States or file certain reports with the SEC (issuers) and to these issuers' officers and employees, among others. The FCPA also criminalises actions taken in the United States by foreign corporates or their agents that are in furtherance of an improper payment or offer. Further, the FCPA's books and records and internal controls provisions also require corporates whose securities are listed in the United States or who file reports with the SEC to keep accounting records that accurately reflect the corporate's transactions and to maintain a system of internal controls.[75]

70 See Department of Justice press release, 'Walmart Inc. and Brazil-Based Subsidiary Agree to Pay $137 Million to Resolve Foreign Corrupt Practices Act Case' (20 June 2019), available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/walmart-inc-and-brazil-based-subsidiary-agree-pay-137-million-resolve-foreign-corrupt.

71 48 C.F.R. §§ 9.406-1(c), 9.407-1(d).

72 48 C.F.R. §§ 9.406-1(b), 9.406-2(a).

73 48 C.F.R. §§ 9.407-1(a), 9.407-2(a).

74 48 C.F.R. § 9.407-1(c).

75 15 U.S.C. §§ 78dd-1(a), 78dd-2(a), 78dd-3(a), 78(m).

Violations of the FCPA can result in heavy penalties. For one, corporate entities may be subject to financial penalties of up to US$2 million per violation of the FCPA's anti-bribery provisions,[76] US$25 million per violation of the FCPA's accounting provisions,[77] or up to twice the gross pecuniary gain or loss from the violation pursuant to the Alternative Fines Act.[78] In addition, civil penalties for FCPA anti-bribery and accounting provisions violations may apply.[79]

Further, certain individuals may be either fined up to US$100,000 (US$250,000 under the Alternative Fines Act or twice the gain or loss from the violation) or imprisoned for up to five years, or both, for a criminal violation of the FCPA's anti-bribery provisions.[80] For criminal violations of the FCPA's accounting provisions, certain individuals can be subject to a fine of up to US$5 million or imprisonment for up to 20 years, or both.[81] Individuals may also face civil penalties for FCPA anti-bribery and accounting provisions violations.[82] Issuers, as defined under the FCPA, are prohibited from paying these individuals' criminal and civil fines.[83]

Moreover, DOJ may also bring a civil action to seek an injunction against domestic concerns and persons other than issuers to prevent a current or imminent FCPA violation.[84] Likewise, the SEC may also seek injunctions to prevent FCPA violations from occurring.[85]

In addition, disgorgement is often a key component of a civil resolution of the FCPA. By way of example, in April 2018, Dun & Bradstreet agreed to pay more than US$9 million to resolve FCPA charges alleging that two Chinese subsidiaries made improper payments to Chinese government officials and third parties to benefit the business, and then falsely recorded these payments as legitimate business expenses. Of the total amount paid by Dun & Bradstreet (more than US$9 million), more than US$6 million was disgorgement.[86]

76 15 U.S.C. §§ 78dd-2(g)(1)(A), 78 dd-3(e)(1)(A), 78ff(c)(1)(A).

77 15 U.S.C. § 78ff(a).

78 18 U.S.C. § 3571 (c)(2), (d).

79 15 U.S.C. §§ 78ff(c)(1)(B), 78u(d)(3); 17 C.F.R. § 201.1001; Securities and Exchange Commission, 'Inflation Adjustments to the Civil Monetary Penalties Administered by the Securities and Exchange Commission (as of January 15, 2019)', available at https://www.sec.gov/enforce/civil-penalties-inflation-adjustments.htm.

80 15 U.S.C. §§ 78dd-2(g)(2), 78dd-3(e)(2); 18 U.S.C. § 3571 (b)(2), (b)(3), (d).

81 15 U.S.C. § 78ff(a).

82 15 U.S.C. §§ 78ff(c)(2)(B), 78u(d)(3); 17 C.F.R. § 201.1001; Securities and Exchange Commission, 'Inflation Adjustments to the Civil Monetary Penalties Administered by the Securities and Exchange Commission (as of January 15, 2019)', available at https://www.sec.gov/enforce/civil-penalties-inflation-adjustments.htm.

83 15 U.S.C. § 78ff(c)(3).

84 15 U.S.C. §§ 78dd-2(d), 78dd-3(d).

85 15 U.S.C. § 78u(d)(1).

86 Securities and Exchange Commission press release, 'SEC Charges Dun & Bradstreet With FCPA Violations' (23 April 2018), available at https://www.sec.gov/enforce/34-83088-s.

However, for corporates seeking to avoid the heaviest penalties, the FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy establishes a presumption that, 'absent aggravating circumstances' such as involvement by executive management in the misconduct or significant profit to the corporate from the misconduct, a corporate will receive a declination if it 'has voluntarily self-disclosed misconduct in an FCPA matter, fully cooperated, and timely and appropriately remediated'. Moreover, even if aggravating circumstances are present, for a corporate that voluntarily self-discloses, fully co-operates and timely and appropriately remediates, DOJ will still recommend a 50 per cent reduction off the low end of the US Sentencing Guidelines fine range, except in the case of a recidivist.[87]

Recently, on 20 November 2019, the FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy was amended to clarify that a corporate that voluntarily discloses misconduct need not disclose 'all relevant facts known to it', but simply 'all relevant facts known to it at the time of the disclosure'. In addition, the new policy explains that, for a corporate to fully co-operate, it must identify 'relevant evidence not in the company's possession' that the corporate is aware of.[88] However, the corporate is no longer required to identify opportunities 'to obtain relevant evidence not in the company's possession and not otherwise known to the Department' that the corporate 'is or should be aware of'.[89]

26.7.2 Federal criminal money laundering

The principal federal criminal money laundering statues are 18 USC Sections 1956 and 1957. Section 1956 generally prohibits a person who knows that property represents the proceeds of certain unlawful activities from engaging in financial transactions that either promote further unlawful activity, conceal the proceeds, evade taxes or avoid reporting requirements. Section 1957 also prohibits a person from knowingly engaging in a monetary transaction involving property valued at more than US$10,000 that derives from specified unlawful activities. In regards to both sections, the specified unlawful activities include proceeds resulting from offences involving bribery of a foreign official.[90]

See Chapter 18 on individuals in cross-border proceedings and Chapter 31 on individual penalties

Any violation of Section 1956 is punishable by imprisonment for not more than 20 years, a fine of up to US$500,000 or twice the value of the property involved, or both. In addition, such violations can incur a civil penalty up to the greater of US$10,000 or the value of the property involved in the offence, plus asset forfeiture. For Section 1957, the maximum penalty is 10 years' imprisonment or a fine of up to twice the value of the property involved, or both.[91]

87 Department of Justice, FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy, available at https://www.justice.gov/jm/jm-9-47000-foreign-corrupt-practices-act-1977#9-47.120.

88 Id.

89 Department of Justice, FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy (updated March 2019), available at https://www.justice.gov/criminal-fraud/file/838416/download.

90 18 U.S.C. §§ 1956, 1957.

91 Id.

Export controls and trade sanctions 26.7.3

The US Department of the Treasury's Office of Foreign Assets Control (OFAC) administers and enforces most US economic sanctions. However, the US Commerce Department's Bureau of Industry and Security and DOJ National Security Division also enforce some aspects of US sanctions. Generally, these sanctions, such as the blocking of assets and trade restrictions, are used to accomplish national security and foreign policy objectives.

The sanctions can be either comprehensive for a jurisdiction, such as Cuba,[92] or targeted to particular individuals and entities, such as the sanctions imposed on specific Hezbollah officials in July 2019.[93] Typically, US sanctions either restrict activities that take place in the US or restrict activities that involve a 'US person', generally defined widely to include US citizens, permanent residents, persons present in the United States, and corporates organised under the laws of the United States or any jurisdiction therein, as well as those corporates' foreign branches.[94] However, non-US persons and corporates can face penalties under US sanctions as well, including for 'causing' a violation by a US person.[95] For example, in 2017, OFAC entered into a settlement with CSE TransTel, a subsidiary of a Singapore-based corporate, in part for causing US financial institutions to engage in prohibited conduct involving Iran.[96]

Fines for violations of the sanctions regulations can be significant. As of 10 July 2019, OFAC had settled 18 enforcement actions, with civil penalties totalling more than US$1.2 billion.[97] Criminal penalties for wilful violations of OFAC sanctions can include fines ranging up to US$1 million per violation or imprisonment of up to 20 years, or both.[98] Under Title 18, Section 3571, the government can also pursue fines and penalties against an organisation of up to US$500,000 or twice the pecuniary gain or loss derived from the offence, as well as forfeiture under 18 USC Section 981. Further, penalties for violations of the Trading with the Enemy Act, which provides the statutory authority for the Cuba sanctions, can be up to US$89,170 per violation (which may be adjusted for inflation), and criminal penalties can reach US$1 million.[99] Financial penal-92 Continuation of the Exercise of Certain Authorities Under the Trading With the Enemy Act, 83 Fed. Reg. 46347 (10 September 2018).

93 Department of the Treasury, 'Treasury Targets Iranian-Backed Hizballah Officials for Exploiting Lebanon's Political and Financial System' (9 July 2019), available at https://home.treasury.gov/news/press-releases/sm724.

94 See, e.g., 31 C.F.R. §§ 560.312, 560.314.

95 See, e.g., 50 U.S.C. § 1705(a).

96 Department of the Treasury, 'Settlement Agreement' (July 2017), available at https://www.treasury.gov/resource-center/sanctions/CivPen/Documents/transtel_settlement.pdf.

97 Department of the Treasury, '2019 Enforcement Information', available at https://www.treasury.gov/resource-center/sanctions/CivPen/Pages/civpen-index2.aspx.

98 See, e.g., 50 U.S.C. § 1705(c).

99 31 C.F.R. § 501.701; Continuation of the Exercise of Certain Authorities Under the Trading With the Enemy Act, 83 Fed. Reg. 46347 (10 September 2018) (extending the expiration of Cuba sanctions pursuant to the Trading with the Enemy Act until September 2019).

ties for violations of the International Emergency Economic Powers Act, which underlies other sanctions programmes, are also possible; associated civil penalties can be up to US$250,000 or twice the amount of the unlawful transaction, and criminal penalties permit a fine of up to US$1 million and imprisonment of up to 20 years.[100]

26.7.4 Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act

The Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) provides criminal penalties as well as a civil, private cause of action for acts performed as part of a criminal organisation or enterprise.[101] The statute contains variations on the proscribed conduct, but generally criminalises participation in an 'enterprise' in interstate or foreign commerce using ill-gotten gains that result from a 'pattern of racketeering activity'.[102] Such racketeering activity includes mail and wire fraud and money laundering violations under Sections 1956 and 1957, as outlined above.[103]

RICO violations are punishable by fines and imprisonment for up to 20 years, plus forfeiture of any interest acquired or maintained through the violation, any interest in any enterprise that was established, operated, controlled, conducted or participated in as part of the RICO violation (or the property of such an enterprise) and any property constituting or derived from any proceeds that the person obtained, directly or indirectly, from racketeering activity.[104]

Additionally, the government may seek pre-indictment restraining orders for the purpose of preventing defendants from transferring assets the government may potentially seek to have forfeited. To obtain such an order, the government must establish that (1) there is a substantial probability that it will prevail on the forfeiture issue, (2) property will be destroyed or placed beyond the court's reach without the order and (3) the need to maintain the property's availability outweighs the hardship of a restraining order. Pre-indictment restraining orders are effective for 90 days, but can be extended for good cause or as a result of the filing of an information or indictment.[105]

---

100 50 U.S.C. § 1705; 31 C.F.R. § 501; Congressional Research Service, 'The International Emergency Economic Powers Act: Origins, Evolution, and Use' (20 March 2019), available at https://fas.org/sgp/crs/natsec/R45618.pdf.

101 18 U.S.C. §§ 1961, et seq.

102 18 U.S.C. § 1962. The first variation makes it unlawful for any person who has received any income derived from a pattern of racketeering activity to use any part of such income or its proceeds to acquire, establish or operate any enterprise involved in interstate or foreign commerce. 18 U.S.C. § 1962(a). The second variation makes it unlawful for any person to engage in a pattern of racketeering activity to acquire or maintain any interest in any enterprise involved in interstate or foreign commerce. 18 U.S.C. § 1962(b). The third variation makes it unlawful for any person employed by or associated with any enterprise involved in interstate or foreign commerce to conduct the enterprise's affairs through a pattern of racketeering activity. 18 U.S.C. § 1962(c). The statute also makes it unlawful for a person to conspire to participate in the conduct outlined in (a), (b) or (c). 18 U.S.C. § 1962(d).

103 18 U.S.C. § 1961(1).

104 18 U.S.C. § 1963(a).

105 18 U.S.C. § 1963(d).

There are also civil remedies under RICO available to any person injured by a RICO defendant, which include treble damages sustained by the injured party and the cost of the lawsuit, including reasonable attorneys' fees.[106]

Conclusion 26.8

Corporates and individual may face a variety of fines, penalities and other collateral consequences when defending against or settling an enforcement action with US regulators. As has been explained, these risks can be substantial. That said, these risks can be managed, mitigated or avoided by engaging knowledgeable external counsel, who can evaluate the situation, provide advice and thereby enable the corporate or individual to make an informed decision about how to proceed.

106 18 U.S.C. § 1964(c).

27

Global Settlements: The In-house Perspective

Claire McLeod[1]

27.1 Introduction

Reaching a global settlement will involve engagement with multiple enforcement agencies across multiple jurisdictions and co-ordination of a significant number of external and internal stakeholders. Settlements are multifaceted and require consideration of many factors, including the commercial aspects, not just the penalty but also potentially redress or compensatory payments; the collateral consequences for the company; the impact on employees; continuing regulatory requirements; and potential follow-on litigation. The timing and sequencing of a global settlement with multiple agencies and regulators can also be key. One of the principle advantages for a corporate in reaching a global settlement is to achieve a resolution guaranteeing finality and certainty. If this cannot be achieved, or achieved with a high degree of certainty, a company has to consider whether the benefits of a more limited settlement outweigh a further period of uncertainty. This can be a complex and difficult decision, especially when some of the uncertainty may not be fully quantifiable. This chapter will look at these key considerations from the perspective of the different stakeholders in a global settlement.

27.2 Senior management

When considering global settlements, key considerations for senior management will be (1) the size of the financial penalty and any other financial components to the settlement; (2) the extent to which the settlement will bring finality of resolution to the company; (3) potential collateral consequences to the company's business; and (4) reputational damage.

1 Claire McLeod is the head of investigations and enforcement for Europe and the Middle East at Barclays Bank PLC. The views expressed are the author's own and do not represent the views of Barclays Bank PLC.

In recent years the size of financial penalties levied against corporates has grown exponentially. Since the 2008 financial crisis, a 2017 study shows the 50 largest banks in the United States and Europe have paid over US$300 billion in penalties for regulatory breaches.[2] Negotiating the financial penalty of any global resolution will be a key consideration for senior management. For regulators and law enforcement agencies working within a fairly rigid penalty framework, the scope for negotiating the proposed penalty may be more limited. For others there may be greater scope to seek a more proportionate penalty by putting forward arguments about the calculation method or the applicability of different components, for example whether disgorgement is appropriate. Ultimately, senior management will need to understand and take into account the proportionality of the penalty and the impact it will have on the company's overall financial health.

In the United Kingdom, focused resolution agreements (FRAs) allow financial services firms to challenge a penalty proposed by the Financial Conduct Authority (FCA).[3] In April 2019, the FCA fined Standard Chartered Bank just under £102.2 million for anti-money laundering breaches.[4] This case was one of the first to involve a FRA. Standard Chartered agreed the FCA's findings of fact and liability, but argued that the proposed penalty was too high. Standard Chartered challenged the size of the penalty at a hearing before the FCA's Regulatory Decisions Committee (RDC), arguing that the proposed penalty was not proportionate based on the seriousness of the relevant breaches and certain mitigating factors. The RDC found in the bank's favour, reducing the penalty from £155 million to £102 million, which included maintaining a 30 per cent settlement discount – a term of the FRA.

In addition to financial penalties, there may be a further financial component of the resolution involving significant redress, compensatory payments or consumer relief. Indeed, a regulator may require this as part of any settlement.[5] The potential for financial impacts beyond the original penalties as a result of follow-on civil litigation must also be taken into account. Management will need to understand the total financial impact across all aspects of the settlement and any consequential financial impacts before deciding whether it is in the best interests of the company and its shareholders to proceed.

A key consideration for senior management will be the extent to which the settlement will bring finality of resolution for the company. The uncertainty created by a significant enforcement investigation, and what the outcome, business

2 See BCG Global Risk 2017: Staying the Course in Banking, http://image-src.bcg.com/BCG_COM/BCG-Staying-the-Course-in-Banking-Mar-2017_tcm9-146794.pdf.

3 The FCA introduced Focussed Resolution Agreements in March 2017.

4 https://www.fca.org.uk/news/press-releases/fca-fines-standard-chartered-bank-102-2-million-poor-aml-controls.

5 In 2017, the FCA used its powers under section 348 of the Financial Services and Markets Act to require Tesco plc and Tesco Stores Limited to pay compensation to investors for market abuse, https://www.fca.org.uk/news/press-releases/tesco-pay-redress-market-abuse.

impact and reputational damage will be, can often mean that settling with only one agency or on one aspect of the action is unlikely to be attractive. One of the main advantages to reaching a global settlement is being able to draw a line under the matter so that management can refocus their attention on their business and customers. However, this is not always easy to achieve. Co-ordinating a global settlement across multiple jurisdictions and agencies can be challenging, requiring the agencies synchronising the completion of their investigations and the corporate negotiating settlements simultaneously with each agency. Settling with one agency could also risk triggering an investigation by another with further (and in some cases heightened) risk to the company and additional uncertainty. In these circumstances, the company may consider it is not in its interests to seek an earlier settlement because the potential exposure and uncertainty remaining is too significant.

The likely collateral consequences of any resolution, in particular the potential impact on the company's business and customers will also be paramount. The risk of collateral consequences in recent years has become more acute as the number of corporate criminal actions has increased. These could include debarment from tendering for public procurement contracts, disqualification from – or restrictions on – specific business practices, and having to seek waivers from regulators to continue other business activities. These collateral consequences may dictate the terms on which a company is willing to enter a settlement. For example, deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs), rather than a guilty plea or conviction, could be beneficial to a company in avoiding certain collateral consequences. The DPA entered into by Rolls-Royce in 2017 allowed the company to avoid being debarred from tendering for public contracts.[6]

The potential (and often unquantifiable) reputational impact of a settlement should also not be underestimated. The company will want to plan a comprehensive strategy to minimise reputational damage. One aspect of this will be the proposed terms of the settlement, including the nature and extent of the factual and legal admissions required. Senior management will want to ensure that any admissions are supported by the evidentiary record and will want to understand if any of these admissions give rise to the risk of further regulatory or enforcement action or follow-on litigation. They will also want to take into account the reputational impact. These are key considerations for a company when negotiating the terms of any final statement of facts or agreement.

Other considerations will include any longer term impact on the company of any other settlement terms, for example the installing of a monitor or imposition of probationary terms. Monitors can be extremely costly, both in terms of financial costs and management time.

6 Serious Fraud Office v. Rolls–Royce Plc (Case No. U20170036) [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249, 'Debarment and exclusion would clearly have significant, and potentially business critical, effects on the financial position of Rolls-Royce. This could lead to the worst case scenario of a very negative share price impact, and, potentially, more serious impacts on shareholder confidence future strategy, and therefore viability.' per Leveson P at para. 55.

Taking all these commercial aspects into account, senior management will be looking for a settlement that achieves the highest degree of finality and the least impact on the business and its customers. The extent to which the company considers it has already addressed the root causes of the issues, and will be able to reassure its customers and employees that this is the case, will be critical.

Shareholders 27.3

A global settlement has to be in the interests of, and justifiable to, a company's shareholders. Many of the considerations cited above for senior management will also be key issues for the shareholders.

Aside from the level of the penalty and the impact it will have on the company's financial position, the single biggest concern for shareholders is likely to be achieving a final resolution. Shareholders will want to see the company move on and management be able to focus their attention on the business without the distraction of an ongoing enforcement action. A partial settlement or one that may trigger other litigation or enforcement action is unlikely to be considered a good outcome.

Shareholders will also expect the company to take appropriate action against any employees involved in the misconduct and will want to see that the company has taken steps to remediate any underlying issues. They will want assurance that the misconduct will not occur again, and they will want to have confidence that the current senior management of the company have set the right culture to ensure this. They will want to know that the company can properly move forward and draw a line under the matter.

Employees 27.4

An enforcement investigation and global resolution can have a significant and long-lasting impact on employees. In most enforcement matters involving a global organisation, the misconduct itself centres on a small part of the company, and a small number of employees. For those employees directly involved there will likely be a need to consider disciplinary proceedings and other issues such as the question of continuing to fund their legal representation and applicability of D&O insurance.

The majority of the company's employees, however, will know very little about the underlying issues until the settlement is announced. They will be most concerned about whether there will be any impact on them, including their ability to service their customers, and whether it will result in any changes to the structure or management of the company. Employees will also want to have confidence in senior management's handling of the matter, and the steps taken to remediate the underlying issues and prevent similar occurrences. It may also be important for employees to be able to communicate the measures taken to customers.

When a global settlement is announced, a company's management should provide sufficient information to employees to allow them to understand the rationale for the settlement, what it means in terms of reaching a final resolution, if there is going to be any impact on the company's business or customers, and, if so, how this impact will be mitigated. It is also important for employees to know what they can communicate to customers, who may have many questions of their own about the potential impact of the settlement.

Despite not being involved in the underlying misconduct, the resultant negative reputational impact can still have an effect on employees, in terms of morale and motivation. It is therefore important for senior management to reassure employees that the matter has concluded, the company has taken appropriate action to address and remediate the issues, and to recognise the ongoing support and efforts of the wider employee workforce.

27.5 Customers

The single most important aspect of a global settlement for a company's customers is likely to be whether it will have any impact on the company's ability to continue servicing them. On announcement of a global settlement, customers will be looking for assurance, to the extent possible, that there will be no impact on the company's ability to continue doing business in the same way. To the extent there are restrictions or constraints placed on the company's business activities by the settlement, they will want to understand how the company will minimise the impact of these. Customers will also be looking for assurance that there will be continuity of service and the least disruption possible. This may involve structuring things differently or making changes to personnel. It will be important to identify all these issues and any contingencies planned well in advance of the settlement announcement.

Some customers may also want to know what changes the company has made to address the issues. This may be particularly important to customers or counterparties who conduct business on behalf of investors or shareholders to whom they owe fiduciary duties. This may also be more significant for customers where they consider there is a risk of an impact on their own compliance and regulatory obligations, for example if the misconduct involves anti-money laundering or sanctions breaches.

In recent years, some companies have considered that the risks of doing business in certain areas or jurisdictions are too high and have withdrawn from them. This 'de-risking' has been most prevalent in the banking industry and in respect of concerns about anti-money laundering (AML) and countering financing of terrorism (CFT), for example banks' withdrawal from business in areas such as the money transfer business sector. While this is unsurprising, there are broader socio-economic consequences, and concerns have been raised that this de-risking can in fact frustrate AML/CFT objectives by pushing higher risk transactions into more informal, unregulated channels that are harder to monitor.[7] More still needs to be done by governments, regulators and enforcement agencies to help banks mitigate the unintended consequences of de-risking.

7 De-risking in the Financial Sector, 7 October 2016, https://www.worldbank.org/en/topic/financialsector/brief/de-risking-in-the-financial-sector.

Regulators and enforcement agencies 27.6

The size of the monetary penalty is still considered one of the key aspects of a settlement by most regulators and enforcers. Credible deterrence is seen by many to require imposing a financial penalty so severe it affects the company's cost of doing business, to deter others at the company or in the industry from committing the same misconduct. Where multiple agencies are involved, there may also be political pressure to match equivalent penalties in other jurisdictions, increasing the overall settlement figure.

Another important aspect for the agencies in reaching a global settlement is often how the company will give redress to those who have been harmed by the misconduct.[8] If a company can demonstrate that it has voluntarily given redress for or remedied the misconduct in a timely and effective manner it is likely to receive credit for this in any final settlement.

The terms of any published statement of facts or final notice will also be important to make the severity and scale of the misconduct clear to the industry and wider public. The importance of this to the enforcement agency or regulator is often matched with the importance to the company of minimising the negative effects, which can make the negotiation of the terms hard-fought and the subject of contention.

In recent years, regulators and enforcement agencies have also placed a strong emphasis on holding individuals to account for the misconduct, both in terms of enforcement and disciplinary action. In 2018, the Department of Justice announced changes to its policy reflected in the Yates Memorandum[9] requiring companies to provide relevant information about 'all individuals substantially involved in or responsible for the misconduct'. It also reinforced its commitment to prosecuting the individuals responsible for the misconduct. In November 2018, Deputy Attorney General Rod J Rosenstein clarified that the Yates Memo's position on pursuing individuals remained a 'top priority', although he also announced a revised policy that gives prosecutors more discretion in deciding whether to pursue individuals.[10]

The introduction of the Senior Managers Regime by the FCA in the United Kingdom is also aimed at driving greater accountability within financial services firms. In 2015, the FCA and the UK Prudential Regulatory Authority (PRA)

8 See, for example, the FCA Mission: Our Approach to Enforcement, March 2018 (https://www.fca.org.uk/publication/corporate/our-approach-enforcement.pdf), in which the FCA places emphasis on the importance of taking action to address harm caused by serious misconduct.

9 Memorandum from Sally Quillian Yates, Deputy Attorney General, US Department of Justice to all US Attorneys, Individual Accountability for Corporate Wrongdoing (9 September 2015) https://www.justice.gov/archives/dag/file/769036/download.

10 Deputy Attorney General Rod J Rosenstein remarks at the American Conference Institute's 35th International Conference on the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, Office of Public Affairs, US Department of Justice, 29 November 2018, https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/deputy-attorney-general-rod-j-rosenstein-delivers-remarks-american-conference-institute-0.

issued a joint policy statement[11] on the deferral of remuneration and clawback of variable compensation, and the FCA issued guidance setting out its expectations on how firms should comply with requirements on ex-post risk adjustment, to adjust variable remuneration to take into account a specific crystallised risk or adverse performance outcome including relating to misconduct.[12] In its guidance the FCA makes it clear that it expects firms to consider applying adjustments not just to those directly involved in the misconduct, but also to those employees whose roles and responsibilities include areas where failures or poor performance contributed to or failed to prevent the risk or misconduct.

Regulators and enforcement agencies will also want to see that the company has identified and remediated any root causes of the misconduct, including any systems and controls and cultural issues at the company. Credit is often given to those companies who take these steps proactively and at an early stage.

Finally, the extent to which a company is seen to have co-operated in the investigation is often a key determiner of the basis and terms of the settlement. In recent years, there has been much debate about the steps a company needs to take to be considered to have 'co-operated'. Some regulators and enforcement agencies have provided greater clarity and guidance in respect of what they consider constitutes co-operation.[13] However, there are differences in expectations across jurisdictions among agencies, making it important for companies to balance these expectations when co-ordinating a global investigation and settlement.

27.7 Conclusion

The increase and complexity of global settlements and the resultant collateral consequences in recent years means that early detection of a potential issue, through a robust compliance programme, has become all the more important. Effective and timely co-ordination of all aspects of the investigation, engagement with the different regulators involved, and consideration of the potential consequences and how to mitigate these, will be key factors in shaping the company's strategy for dealing with the matter. Identifying these issues and setting the strategy early on in the investigation is often key to ensuring that the sequencing and timing of a global settlement is ultimately achievable.

11 Strengthening the alignment of risk and reward: new remuneration rules, June 2015, https://www.bankofengland.co.uk/-/media/boe/files/prudential-regulation/policy-statement/2015/ps1215.

12 Financial Conduct Authority, General guidance on the application of ex-post risk adjustment to variable compensation, 1 July 2015, https://www.fca.org.uk/publication/finalised-guidance/guidance-on-ex-post-risk-adjustment-variable-remuneration.pdf.

13 See, for example the Department of Justice's FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy, https://www.justice.gov/criminal-fraud/file/838416/download and the SFO's Corporate Cooperation Guidance, https://www.sfo.gov.uk/publications/guidance-policy-and-protocols/sfo-operational-handbook.

28

Extraterritoriality: The UK Perspective

Anupreet Amole[1]

Overview 28.1

English criminal law applies to all persons who come within the territory of England and Wales. In addition, there are now a number of mechanisms that enable UK authorities to investigate and prosecute offences committed overseas.

In the context of economic crime, the past three decades have seen a sustained legislative policy of extending the jurisdiction of the UK authorities. For certain economic crimes, authorities may bring prosecutions in the United Kingdom notwithstanding that all the relevant criminal conduct occurred overseas. The most obvious example is the Bribery Act 2010 (the Act), which we discuss further below. In line with the United Kingdom's extension of its jurisdictional reach, the authorities have increased their coordination and co-operation with other countries' prosecutors. The trend towards greater cross-border information sharing and coordinated investigations is likely to continue in accordance with ongoing domestic and international obligations.[2] The courts have also shown a willingness to endorse that trend. In the KBR case,[3] the High Court held that information

1 Anupreet Amole is a partner at Brown Rudnick LLP. The author thanks Aisling O'Sullivan and Charlotte Glaser and Francesca Cassidy-Taylor of the firm for their assistance with this chapter.

2 For example, the Common Reporting Standard (formally the Standard for Automatic Exchange of Financial Account Information) is an OECD initiative aimed at hindering tax evasion and money laundering. As of August 2019, there are over 100 signatories to the CRS (https://www.oecd.org/tax/automatic-exchange/international-framework-for-the-crs/). Similarly, the trend towards transparency is evident in recent statutory provision for implementing a register of beneficial owners of overseas corporate entities – see s.9 of the Criminal Finances Act 2017 and s.51 of the Sanctions and Anti-Money Laundering Act 2018.

3 R (on the application of KBR, Inc) v. The Director of the Serious Fraud Office [2018] EWHC 2368 (Admin).

notices issued by the Serious Fraud Office (SFO) under section 2 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 can have extraterritorial effect where a 'sufficient connection' exists between an overseas company and England and Wales. In particular, the court observed that SFO investigations should not be 'frustrated or stymied' on the basis that evidence may be held on computer systems located outside the jurisdiction. In April 2019, the Supreme Court granted KBR permission to challenge that decision, and the appeal is yet to be heard. This chapter provides an overview of the extraterritorial aspects of UK law regarding economic crime.

28.2 The Bribery Act 2010

In overview, the Act came into force on 1 July 2011 and created offences of (1) offering, promising or giving a bribe and (2) requesting, agreeing to receive or accepting a bribe either in the United Kingdom or abroad, in the public or private sectors, more specifically:

- sections 1 and 2 – bribing another person (active bribery) and being bribed (passive bribery);
- section 6 – bribery of a foreign public official; and
- section 7 – failure of commercial organisations to prevent bribery.

Each of the above offences has extraterritorial application, as outlined below.

28.2.1 Offences under sections 1, 2 and 6

UK prosecutors may pursue an offence under sections 1, 2 or 6, even where no act or omission forming part of that offence took place in the United Kingdom. This is the position provided that:

- a person's acts or omissions outside the United Kingdom would form part of such an offence if they had occurred in the United Kingdom;[4] and
- the person has a 'close connection with the United Kingdom'.[5]

A 'close connection with the United Kingdom' is defined in the Act and includes British citizens and UK companies.[6]

Considering a hypothetical example helps to demonstrate this broad jurisdictional scope of the Act. Assume that one Mr John Smith was born and raised in the United Kingdom, and, following university, he moved to live and work in Latin America. While Mr Smith has lived overseas for, say, 10 years, he has retained British citizenship. Mr Smith is a business consultant in the oil and gas 4 s.12(2)(b).

5 s.12(2)(c).

6 s.12(4). A person has a close connection with the United Kingdom if, and only if, the person was one of the following at the time the acts or omissions concerned were done or made: a body incorporated under the law of any part of the United Kingdom, a British overseas territories citizen, a British national overseas, a British overseas citizen, a person who under the British Nationality Act 1981 is a British subject, a British protected person under the British Nationality Act 1981, an individual ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom, or a Scottish partnership.

sector, and one of his key clients is an energy company based in India. Assume also that Mr Smith bribed a person in, say, Mexico, and did so in the course of his services to the Indian company, and in so doing he intended that he would obtain or retain business (in Mexico) for the Indian company. Even where none of Mr Smith's conduct made any contact with the United Kingdom, he would be at risk of criminal prosecution in the United Kingdom because he was a British citizen at the time of the offence, and therefore had a 'close connection' to the United Kingdom as defined by section 12(3) of the Act. In practice, of course, a prosecutor would need to consider carefully whether proceedings against Mr Smith would ultimately be in the public interest both in itself and as part of a wider prosecution strategy against others; in this case, for example, the Indian company if it had been carrying on business in the United Kingdom.[7]

Corporate offence under section 7 28.2.2

This offence is committed by a 'relevant commercial organisation' if a person associated with the organisation (an associated person)[8] bribes another person intending to obtain or retain business, or an advantage in the conduct of business, for the organisation. In those circumstances, the organisation's only defence to the strict liability offence is to show that it had 'adequate procedures' in place designed to prevent bribery on its behalf.[9]

A 'relevant commercial organisation' includes a company or partnership (wherever incorporated) that carries on any part of its business in the United Kingdom. On the basis of information in the public domain currently, the courts are yet to consider a case where it is disputed that a commercial organisation indicted under section 7 was carrying on business within the United Kingdom.[10] Until the courts hear argument on that specific point, practitioners continue to refer to the Ministry of Justice guidance regarding the corporate offence. That guidance recommends a 'common sense approach' and notes that a 'demonstrable business presence' is required. Neither having the company's shares listed on 7 Note that pursuant to s.14 of the Act, if a section 1, 2 or 6 offence was committed with the 'consent or connivance' of a 'senior officer' of a body corporate, or a person purporting to act in such a capacity, the senior officer (and the body corporate) is guilty of an offence.

8 An 'associated person' is defined in the Act as a person who performs services for or on behalf of the company in any capacity (i.e., an employee, agent or subsidiary), which is to be determined by reference to all the relevant circumstances and not merely the nature of his or her relationship with the company. It is worth bearing in mind that a section 7 offence will be committed only if the associated person intended to obtain or retain business or an advantage in the conduct of business for the relevant organisation.

9 s.7 of the Act. Although 'adequate procedures' is not defined in the Act, the Ministry of Justice's guidance (March 2011) broadly outlines what businesses need to demonstrate to mount a successful 'adequate procedures' defence, for example proper risk-assessment procedures, due-diligence protocols and top-level commitment.

10 The section 7 offence is in addition to, and does not displace, liability that might arise under the Act where the commercial organisation itself commits an offence by virtue of the common law 'identification' principle. For more information on the common law 'identification principle' see the Introduction of this book.

the London Stock Exchange nor having a UK subsidiary would necessarily mean that a foreign company is carrying on business for the purposes of section 7 of the Act.[11]

For a high-profile application of the concept of an associated person, the case of Sweett Group PLC[12] (2015), the SFO's first corporate conviction under section 7, is instructive. The defendant, a UK company, pleaded guilty to failing to take reasonable steps to prevent the bribery of a non-UK national in the United Arab Emirates by a Sweett Group subsidiary in Cyprus (Cyril Sweet International Limited); the bribe being paid to secure a contract relating to construction of a £63 million hotel in Dubai. Sweett agreed with the SFO's contention, via plea, that its subsidiary was an 'associated person' under the Act, and the court was satisfied that the bribes were intended to obtain an advantage in the conduct of business for Sweett. A financial penalty, taking into account the guilty plea, of £2.25 million was levied against Sweett.[13]

It is irrelevant whether the acts or omissions forming part of the section 7 offence took place in the United Kingdom or elsewhere.[14] Therefore, it is possible for either of the following scenarios to form the factual basis for a section 7 offence:

- any business formed or incorporated in the United Kingdom, where the bribery is conducted entirely outside the United Kingdom by an associated person who has no connection with the United Kingdom and who is performing services outside the United Kingdom; and
- any business formed or incorporated outside the United Kingdom, but that carries on part of its business in the United Kingdom, where the bribery is conducted entirely outside the United Kingdom by an associated person who has no connection with the United Kingdom and who is performing services outside the United Kingdom.

In August 2019, the SFO published its long-awaited Corporate Co-operation Guidance (the Guidance),[15] aimed at providing organisations and their legal advisers with transparency about what to expect if they self-report bribery to the SFO.

The Guidance sets out a non-exhaustive list of good practices for co-operation, including providing 'relevant material that is held abroad, where it is in the possession or under the control of the organisation'.[16] This codifies the approach 11 Ministry of Justice Guidance to the Bribery Act 2010 (March 2011), paras. 34-36.

12 See https://www.sfo.gov.uk/cases/sweett-group/.

13 This figure comprised a £1.4 million fine, a confiscation order of £850,000 and an order for costs to the SFO of £95,000.

14 s.12(5) Bribery Act 2010.

15 SFO Operational Handbook, Corporate Co-operation Guidance (https://www.sfo.gov.uk/publications/guidance-policy-and-protocols/sfo-operational-handbook/), accessed 14 November 2019.

16 Ibid. Preserving and providing material, para. 1(ix).

adopted in KBR,[17] whereby the SFO was able to compel a foreign company to produce documents outside the jurisdiction.

Bringing material located abroad into the jurisdiction of England and Wales may lead to legal arguments relating to its collateral use in subsequent civil or regulatory proceedings, as in Omers Administration Corporation and others v Tesco Plc.[18] While that case related to documents held in England and Wales, the High Court ordered that documents provided to Tesco by the SFO during negotiations for a deferred prosecution agreement should be disclosed by Tesco in a separate and subsequent civil action, brought by its shareholders. Companies and their advisers should note the implications of this in relation to bringing documents into the jurisdiction or providing documents, at least voluntarily, to the SFO, or other authority, in circumstances where that information may then be disclosed (1) by the SFO to the subjects of its relevant investigations, and (2) subsequently, to third parties through any relevant, separate civil proceedings brought against the subjects under SFO scrutiny.

Money laundering offences under Part 7 of POCA 2002 28.3

Money laundering has a broad meaning under UK law. The money laundering regime is designed to tackle the routes through which the proceeds of criminal activity are handled. The principal offences are found in sections 327 to 329 of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (POCA), being:

- concealing, disguising, converting, transferring or removing from the United Kingdom, any criminal property (section 327);
- entering or becoming concerned in arrangements that one knows or suspects facilitate the acquisition, use, etc., of criminal property (section 328); and
- acquiring, using or possessing criminal property (section 329).

Property is 'criminal property' if it represents a person's benefit from criminal conduct; in turn, 'criminal conduct' is conduct that either is an offence in the United Kingdom or would be an offence if it had taken place within the United Kingdom.[19] Although the prosecution must adduce evidence of a predicate offence from which the proceeds of crime emanate, a prosecutor need not prove the type of predicate offence in every instance. Instead, the prosecutor will need to provide the court with detailed particulars explaining why the property that is the subject of the money laundering offence should be regarded as criminal in origin, and that evidence should be sufficiently potent to demonstrate that the only reasonable inference is that the property arose from criminality.

In the case of R v. Anwoir,[20] the appellants had been convicted of a number of money laundering offences under section 328 of POCA. They appealed on the 17 R (on the application of KBR, Inc) v. The Director of the Serious Fraud Office [2018] EWHC 2368 (Admin).

18 Omers Administration Corporation and others v. Tesco Plc [2019] EWHC 109 (Ch).

19 s.340(2) and (3) POCA 2002.

20 R v. Anwoir [2008] EWCA Crim 1354.

basis that the prosecution should have been required to prove at least the class or type of criminal conduct involved in generating the criminal property. Allowing the appeal in part, the court held that there were two ways it could be proved that property had derived from crime. One was by showing that it derived from conduct of a specific and unlawful nature. The second method was by evidence of the circumstances in which the property was handled that gave rise to the irresistible inference that it could only have been derived from crime.[21]

The location of the underlying criminal conduct is immaterial. Instead, the pertinent issue is whether the conduct would constitute a criminal offence in the United Kingdom had it occurred here. This principle was confirmed by the Court of Appeal in 2014 in the case of R v. Rogers,[22] which served to emphasise the wide scope of the money laundering regime. Mr Rogers, a UK citizen resident in Spain, permitted money generated by a fraudulent scheme in the United Kingdom to be paid into a Spanish bank account that he controlled, and allowed another person, the scheme's principal, to withdraw money from that account. Mr Rogers was convicted under section 327(1)(c) of POCA of converting criminal property. He subsequently appealed against that conviction, arguing that the court did not have jurisdiction to hear Part 7 offences against a non-UK resident where the relevant conduct occurred entirely outside the United Kingdom.

In dismissing the appeal, the court expressly considered the wording of section 340(11)(d) of POCA, that money laundering is an act that would constitute an offence under sections 327, 328 or 329 if done in the United Kingdom, and concluded that the language clearly indicated that Parliament had intended for the Part 7 offences to be extraterritorial in effect. (It is arguable that this amounts to a misreading of the statutory provisions because section 340(11) defines 'money laundering' for the purposes of the reporting obligations set out in sections 330 to 332 and, for that obligation, it does not matter whether the money laundering takes place in the United Kingdom or abroad. In contrast, the term 'money laundering' does not appear as a constituent element of the offences in sections 327 to 329 of POCA.) The court went on to state that, even if they were wrong on that interpretation of the statute, the modern approach to jurisdiction required 'an adjustment to the circumstances of international criminality', and noted: 'The offence of money laundering is par excellence an offence that is no respecter of national boundaries. It would be surprising indeed if Parliament had not intended the Act to have extra-territorial effect (as we have found it did).'[23]

In light of this extraterritorial effect, the court was able to establish a sufficient jurisdictional nexus to try Mr Rogers on the basis that the acts that led to the property becoming criminal property for the purposes of POCA plainly took place, and had an impact on victims, in the United Kingdom, and that the laundering of the proceeds by Mr Rogers in Spain was directly linked to those acts in the United Kingdom. The court added that this was:

21 This case has since been applied by the Court of Appeal in R. v. Anwar (Nasar) [2013] EWCA Crim 1865.

22 [2014] EWCA Crim 1680. This case was applied in Jedinak v. Czech Republic [2016] EWHC 3525 (Admin) and followed in Sulaiman v. France [2016] EWHC 2868 (Admin).

23 R v. Rogers (Bradley) and others [2014] EWCA Crim 1680 (per Treacy LJ) at p. 1026, paras. 52 and 54.

> not a case where the conversion of criminal property relates to the mechanics of a fraud which took place in Spain and which impacted upon Spanish victims. In those circumstances our courts would not claim jurisdiction. But in this case when the significant part of the criminality underlying the case took place in England, including the continued deprivation of the victims of their monies, there is no reasonable basis for withholding jurisdiction . . . .[24]

The court's decision in Rogers makes plain that UK persons based overseas, including, for example, professional legal or tax advisers, face the risk of criminal liability in the United Kingdom for money laundering offences committed wholly overseas. Rogers and subsequent cases indicate that a person may be guilty of a money laundering offence under sections 327 to 329 of POCA in circumstances where both the predicate offending (ie, the criminality that gives rise to the existence of proceeds of crime) and the laundering of the criminal property take place outside the territory of the United Kingdom.[25]

There exists a limited exception described as the 'overseas conduct defence'. A person will not be liable under sections 327 to 329 if:

- he or she knew or reasonably believed that the relevant criminal conduct occurred abroad; and
- that relevant criminal conduct was not, when it took place, unlawful under the criminal law of that other country.[26]

The 'overseas conduct defence', however, does not apply to conduct that (despite being legal under local law) would constitute an offence punishable by a maximum sentence of imprisonment over 12 months in the United Kingdom if it had occurred in the United Kingdom.[27] In practice, therefore, most cases (e.g., bribery, 24 Ibid. (per Treacy LJ) at pp. 1026–1027 at para. 55.

25 Sulaiman v. Tribunal de Grande Instance [2016] EWHC 2868 (Admin) in which Dingemans J confirmed that Rogers is 'binding' authority 'for the proposition that offences of money laundering extend to extraterritorial actions' (at [18]) and Jedinak v. District Court in Pardubice [2016] EWHC 3525. The implication of these decisions is that, while Rogers suggests that cases where both the predicate offence and the money laundering offence take place overseas might be decided differently, in fact in cases decided subsequent to Rogers this has not been the case. In Jedinak despite the arguments by the defence that 'the court was clearly to an extent motivated by the recognition that some part of the offending [in Rogers] (and indeed the damage cause by the offending) impacted on this country and nationals of this country', the court held that 'it is clear in my judgment that the decision relating to the possible extra-territorial effect of the money laundering offences was independent of that'.

26 ss.327(2A), 328(3) and 329(2A) POCA 2002.

27 The Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (Money Laundering: Exceptions to Overseas Conduct Defence) Order 2006.

corporate fraud, tax evasion) relevant to readers will remain squarely within the wide extraterritorial scope of POCA.

28.3.1 The Fourth Money Laundering Directive (4MLD)

The POCA 2002 regime has been further supplemented by the Money Laundering, Terrorist Financing and Transfer of Funds (Information on the Payer) Regulations 2017, which gave effect to the European Union's Fourth Money Laundering Directive.[28] The 2017 regulations apply to both financial institutions and to over 100,000 businesses that may be considered the 'gatekeepers' of the financial system.[29] Those 'gatekeepers' include, for example, legal advisers, insolvency practitioners, casinos and dealers in high-value goods. The 2017 regulations provide for a 'risk-based' approach to money laundering and provide inter alia for reforms to risk assessments, customer due diligence and employee screening. The 2017 regulations also provide for a number of criminal offences, which are given extraterritorial effect through Regulation 90, which enables courts to treat offences 'committed wholly or partly outside the United Kingdom' as 'having been committed within the jurisdiction of the court'.

The scope of the 2017 regulations has been extended to cover the operations of subsidiaries and branches operated by a 'relevant person'[30] outside the United Kingdom.[31] Where the relevant person is operating in a European Economic Area state that has implemented the 4MLD, it must follow the law of that state. Significantly, if the subsidiary or branch is operating in a country that has not implemented the 4MLD, it must comply with the regime as implemented in England and Wales.

28.3.2 Civil recovery orders

Separately, the civil recovery regime set out in POCA[32] enables UK prosecutors to seek orders from the High Court to recover property that either is or represents property obtained through unlawful conduct. As applications for civil recovery orders and property freezing orders are determined through civil, not criminal, proceedings before the High Court, the standard of proof is the balance of probabilities. The High Court may issue such an order against any person or property wherever domiciled or situated, if there is or has been a connection between the 28 The regulations came into force on 26 June 2017, giving effect to Directive 2015/849. The previous regime, governed by the Money Laundering Regulations 2007 and the Transfer of Funds (Information on the Payer) Regulations 2007 was revoked.

29 Explanatory Memorandum to the regulations, p. 2.

30 Namely a person to whom the regulations apply, as defined by Regulation 8, Money Laundering, Terrorist Financing and Transfer of Funds (Information on the Payer) Regulations 2017.

31 Regulation 20, Money Laundering, Terrorist Financing and Transfer of Funds (Information on the Payer) Regulations 2017.

32 Part 5 of POCA 2002.

facts of the case and any part of the United Kingdom.[33] Combined with the wide jurisdictional scope of the definition of 'unlawful conduct',[34] civil recovery orders are a powerful and attractive tool in the hands of UK prosecutors. While foreign courts did not traditionally recognise the enforceability of these orders against assets in their jurisdictions, a relatively recent case saw the United Kingdom's National Crime Agency (NCA) succeed in persuading the Luxembourg court to enforce an order against a UK person's bank accounts in that jurisdiction.[35] This was the first time that a foreign court had enforced a civil recovery order, permitting the NCA to recover unlawful property held entirely outside the United Kingdom. It remains to be seen whether other jurisdictions will take a similarly collaborative approach to UK civil recovery efforts overseas.

See Chapter 25 on fines, digorgement, etc.

An additional civil recovery power became available to the NCA and other UK prosecutors in late January 2018.[36] On application to the High Court, prosecutors can seek an unexplained wealth order (UWO) against any persons (whether or not UK domiciled) regarding their property, irrespective of that property's location. In summary, a UWO is available where:

- there is reasonable cause to believe the respondent holds specific property valued at or above £50,000;
- there are reasonable grounds to suspect that the respondent's known income is insufficient to acquire that property; and
- either the respondent is a 'politically exposed person' or there is reasonable suspicion that the respondent (or a person connected to him or her) is or has been involved in serious crime in the United Kingdom or abroad.

Where granted, the UWO compels the respondent to explain the nature of their interest in the property, and to explain how they obtained it. Failure to do so creates a presumption that the property was obtained unlawfully, and it is therefore a valid target for civil recovery proceedings under Part 5 of POCA.

The respondent, namely the person who holds or obtains the relevant property, 'includes any body corporate, whether incorporated or formed under the law of a part of the United Kingdom or in a country or territory outside the United 33 s.282A POCA 2002, inserted by s.48 of the Crime and Courts Act 2013 following the UK Supreme Court decision in Perry v. SOCA [2012] UKSC 35. s.282A and Schedule 7A POCA have retrospective effect – see para. 7(7) of Schedule 7A POCA.

34 Defined as (1) conduct within the United Kingdom that is unlawful under UK criminal law or (2) conduct outside the United Kingdom that is unlawful in that other country and would have been unlawful in the United Kingdom, had it occurred here. This is, therefore, a dual criminality test. The recent insertion of a new s.241A POCA 2002 (by s.13 of the Criminal Finances Act 2017) adds 'gross human rights abuse or violation' to the definition of unlawful conduct for the purposes of Part 5 POCA (civil recovery). This is the United Kingdom's introduction of the concept of targeting assets owned by those involved in repressive regimes anywhere in the world; this follows the approach in the United States to a statute known as the Magnitsky Act of 2012.

35 National Crime Agency v. Azam [May 2015], District Court of Luxembourg.

36 See Part 1 of the Criminal Finances Act 2017, which amends POCA.

Kingdom.'[37] By express cross-reference to section 414 of POCA,[38] it is clear that 'property is all property wherever situated'.

Where a UWO is granted against property outside the United Kingdom, and the UK prosecutor believes there is a risk of dissipation or frustration by concealing the relevant assets, that prosecutor may make a formal request for assistance from the other country's government.[39] The use of UWOs remains a developing area of practice, and one to watch closely in light of the authorities' recent success in the case of National Crime Agency v. Mrs A.[40] As of July 2019, the National Crime Agency had obtained four UWOs, the most recent cases being against (1) a person in Northern Ireland with suspected links to paramilitary and organised crime activities, and (2) an individual in northern England suspected of using funds from associates involved in drug and firearms trafficking to finance his acquisition of real property.

See Chapter 30 on individual penalties, etc.

28.4 Tax evasion and the Criminal Finances Act 2017

The Criminal Finances Act 2017 also introduced a new corporate offence focused on tax evasion. As with the Bribery Act's corporate offence, this represents another significant departure from the traditional 'directing mind' identification doctrine for corporate criminal liability under English law.

See Chapter 1

Part 3 of the Criminal Finances Act 2017 creates two new corporate offences of failure to prevent the facilitation of tax evasion. The offences are modelled on section 7 of the Bribery Act 2010 and apply to both domestic and overseas tax evasion. The new offences are:

See Section 28.2.2

- failure to prevent the facilitation of UK tax evasion offences (section 45): a company or partnership is guilty of an offence if a person commits a UK tax evasion facilitation offence when acting in the capacity of a person associated with that company or partnership;[41] and
- failure to prevent the facilitation of foreign tax evasion offences (section 46): a company or partnership is guilty of an offence if at any time a person commits a foreign tax evasion facilitation offence when acting in the capacity of a person associated with that company or partnership, and any of the following conditions is satisfied:
  - the relevant body is incorporated or formed in the United Kingdom;
  - the relevant body carries on business or part of a business in the United Kingdom; or
  - any conduct constituting part of the foreign tax evasion facilitation offence took place in the United Kingdom.[42]

37 s.362H(5) POCA, inserted by s.1 CFA 2017.

38 s.362H(6) POCA, inserted by s.1 CFA 2017.

39 s.362S POCA, inserted by s.3 CFA 2017.

40 [2018] EWHC 2534 (Admin).

41 The UK tax offence will be investigated by Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs (HMRC), with prosecutions brought by the Crown Prosecution Service.

42 s.46(2).

If the offence took place outside the jurisdiction, however, UK prosecutors must still prove to the criminal standard that both the taxpayer and the associated person committed an offence. The prosecutor will also need to prove dual criminality of the conduct. The offences consist of three component parts. First, the prosecution must prove criminal evasion by a taxpayer; and there must have been dishonest[43] facilitation of tax evasion by an associated person. Where these two components are satisfied, the relevant body is criminally liable (unless it can show that it had 'reasonable preventative procedures' in place, or that it was unreasonable to expect the company to have had such procedures in place).

A 'relevant body' is a company or a partnership, wherever it may be incorporated or formed.[44] A 'person associated' with the relevant body is an employee, an agent or any other person performing services for or on behalf of that relevant body.[45] Again, this is broadly comparable to the concepts in the Bribery Act. Section 46 of the Criminal Finances Act 2017 provides that a company or partnership that carries on business in the United Kingdom will commit an offence if a 'person associated' with it commits a 'foreign tax evasion facilitation offence', unless the company or partnership had reasonable procedures in place to prevent the facilitation offence. A foreign tax evasion facilitation offence means conduct that amounts to:

> an offence under the law of a foreign country . . . relates to the commission by another person of a foreign tax evasion offence under the law of that country, and . . . would, if the foreign tax evasion offence were a UK tax evasion offence, amount to a UK tax evasion facilitation offence . . . .[46]

The UK government recently published guidance on the meaning of reasonable preventative procedures.[47] The guidance states that those procedures should be informed by the same six guiding principles as those expected by the Bribery Act model. The six principles are proportionality, top level/board level commitment, risk assessment, due diligence, training and communication, and monitoring/review. Companies doing business in the United Kingdom should consider carefully how to prepare their own reasonable preventative procedures to address the risk of associated persons facilitating tax evasion.

---

43 The test for dishonesty must now be viewed in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Ivey v. Genting Casinos (UK) Ltd t/a Crockfords [2017] UKSC 67 which disapproved the second limb of the well-known test in R v. Ghosh [1982] EWCA Crim 2. Although the observations of the court were technically obiter, the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) has indicated that Ivey correctly reflects the law – see R v. Pabon [2018] EWCA (Crim) 420.

44 s.44(2) and (3)

45 s.44(4).

46 s.44(6).

47 Tackling tax evasion: Government guidance for the corporate offences of failure to prevent the criminal facilitation of tax evasion, HM Revenue and Customs, 1 September 2017, available at https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/corporate-offences-for-failing-to-prevent-criminal-facilitation-of-tax-evasion.

28.5 Financial sanctions

While they are driven by geopolitical issues, international sanctions have direct practical and legal consequences for businesses of all shapes and sizes. The use of international sanctions has grown over recent years, particularly in relation to the military conflicts in Ukraine and Syria. In fact, this continues a trend that began in modern times with the United Nations' Oil-For-Food Programme regarding Iraq after the Gulf War of 1991. At the time of writing, the United Kingdom applies financial sanctions in 27 separate programmes, targeting governments and terrorist groups such as the governments of Burundi, North Korea and Syria, and the Taliban, ISIL and Al-Qaida.

Financial sanctions restrict the provision of financial services, or access to global capital markets, or both. More specifically, those restrictions can include bans on investments in a particular country, or the denial of banking relationships. Trade sanctions restrict the trading of certain products or commodities (e.g., arms, oil and diamonds) from targeted countries (e.g., Iran, Russia and Syria) and control the export of certain products (e.g., military or dual-use items) to targeted countries. A recent decision by the European Court of Justice, which upheld the EU sanctions against Russia regarding its annexation of Crimea in 2014, demonstrates the rationale in practice:

> Contrary to what is claimed by Rosneft, there is a reasonable relationship between the content of the contested acts and the objective pursued by them. In so far as that objective is, inter alia, to increase the costs to be borne by the Russian Federation for its actions to undermine Ukraine's territorial integrity, sovereignty and independence, the approach of targeting a major player in the oil sector, which is moreover predominantly owned by the Russian State, is consistent with that objective and cannot, in any event, be considered to be manifestly inappropriate with respect to the objective pursued.[48]

For the purposes of this chapter, we focus on financial sanctions.[49] The UK legal framework regarding financial sanctions is not contained in any one particular statute. Instead, the United Kingdom uses secondary legislation to implement various sanctions programmes made by each of the United Nations Security

48 PJSC Rosneft Oil Company v. Her Majesty's Treasury and Others, Case C-72/15, 28 March 2017 at 147.

49 For trade sanctions, see the Export Control Act 2002 (and the related Export Control Order 2008) and the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979. The Customs and Excise Management Act 1979 imposes criminal liability where a person exports goods from the United Kingdom 'when the exportation or shipment is or would be contrary to any prohibition or restriction for the time being in force'. The Export Control Order 2008 imposes those restrictions. The ECO 2008 specifies a three-tier categorisation of goods, with Category A products including items designed for torture; Category B includes arms and ammunition; Category C being items that have a dual civil/military use. See Part 4 and Schedule 1 of the ECO 2008. Trade sanctions apply to (1) anybody present in the UK, i.e., all persons (natural and legal); (2) all UK subjects anywhere in the world; and (3) any legal entity incorporated under UK law.

Council and the European Union. At the same time, the United Kingdom may also issue domestic financial sanctions under certain specific statutes, such as the Terrorist Asset-Freezing Act 2010.[50] The specific restrictions imposed by any one set of financial sanctions (e.g., those relating to Russia's involvement in Ukraine) will vary in each case. Those advising businesses concerned about liability should carefully review the text of the specific statutory instrument, and the underlying EU regulation, in each case. Broadly, however, UK financial sanctions impose criminal liability for a person who:

- makes funds or economic resources available, whether directly or indirectly, to a designated person;
- deals with funds or economic resources belonging to or controlled by a designated person; or
- acts in a way, whether directly or indirectly, to circumvent the relevant financial sanction prohibitions.[51]

Financial sanctions also carry positive reporting obligations for financial services firms. Where a firm detects relevant information, for example that a customer or counterparty is a designated person, the firm must notify the Office of Financial Sanctions Implementation (OFSI), which is part of HM Treasury.[52]

While the jurisdictional scope of UK financial sanctions is broad, they do require some element of UK nexus. The sanctions apply to:

- anybody present in the United Kingdom, namely all persons (natural and legal) 'who are within or undertake activities within the UK's territory'; and
- all UK nationals and all UK legal entities (including branches, and the UK subsidiaries of foreign companies), wherever they may be in the world and irrespective of where their activities occur.[53]

In recent guidance, the OFSI emphasised that establishing a UK nexus would be determined by the facts in each case, and that it would not seek to 'artificially bring something within UK authority that does not clearly and naturally come under it'.[54] This may provide some degree of comfort to foreign businesses with no UK footprint. Most recently, the new Sanctions and Anti-Money Laundering Act 2018, which is not yet fully in force, provides for sanctions being imposed regarding (1) conduct within UK jurisdiction by any person and (2) conduct anywhere in the world but only if the conduct is by a 'United Kingdom person'.[55]

---

50 The other relevant UK statutes, which also take a broad jurisdictional approach, are the Counter-Terrorism Act 2008 and the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001.

51 Office of Financial Sanctions Implementation, Financial Sanctions: Guidance, March 2018, p. 12. The maximum term of imprisonment was recently increased from two to seven years – see ss.144 and 145 of the Policing and Crime Act 2017 (PCA 2017).

52 Office of Financial Sanctions Implementation, Financial Sanctions: Guidance, March 2018, p. 18.

53 Office of Financial Sanctions Implementation, Financial Sanctions: Guidance, March 2018, p. 7.

54 Office of Financial Sanctions Implementation, Monetary penalties for breaches of financial sanctions: Guidance, May 2018, p. 12.

55 s.21 Sanctions and Anti-Money Laundering Act 2018.

Until recently, enforcement options were limited, taking the form of either an official warning letter from HM Treasury or full criminal proceedings by a prosecutor. The Policing and Crime Act 2017, effective from 3 April 2017, introduced a wider range of enforcement options, specifically (1) making sanctions offences eligible for consideration for a deferred prosecution agreement,[56] (2) making sanctions offences eligible for (civil) Serious Crime Prevention Orders under the Serious Crime Act 2007[57] and (3) empowering the OFSI to impose (civil) financial penalties.[58] These developments are all consistent with the general trend in UK law since the Bribery Act 2010 came into effect towards increased enforcement against companies, including for misconduct overseas.

28.6 Information sharing powers under the Criminal Finances Act

As demonstrated by several recent enforcement actions, the UK authorities have increased their sharing of information with counterparts around the world. That coordination is developing further. The Criminal Finances Act 2017 includes certain amendments to POCA, the effect of which will be to enhance the information flow to the UK authorities (specifically, the NCA in the first instance),[59] and most importantly for the purpose of this chapter, to facilitate the NCA's assistance of law enforcement bodies overseas.

28.7 Conspiracy

Readers will be familiar with cases involving suspected or alleged conspiracies to commit substantive offences. When considering conspiracy in the economic crime context, practitioners should be aware of the interplay between (1) common law conspiracy to defraud, (2) the conspiracy offence in section 1A Criminal Law Act 1977, and (3) the Fraud Act 2006, whose extraterritorial reach is specified by the Criminal Justice Act 1993 (as amended).

56 s.150 of PCA 2017.

57 s.151 of PCA 2017.

58 s.146 of PCA 2017.

59 Section 10 of the Act serves to extend the moratorium period for investigations into suspicious activity reports (SARs) and provides the NCA with new powers to request information from regulated companies. Under this section, a 'senior officer' of a relevant authority can apply to the Crown Court for an extension of the current seven-working-day moratorium period for SARs. If the application is granted, the court can extend the moratorium period for no more than a further 186 days. The court will only be in a position to grant an extension of 31 days at a time, with the relevant authority being required to continue to make further applications for additional extensions should it be deemed necessary. This will enable the court to exercise judicial scrutiny over the relevant authorities. If an application is refused by the court, the relevant authority has a further 31 calendar days in which it can investigate and either take action to freeze the funds or give its consent to proceed with the transaction.

Common law conspiracy to defraud 28.7.1

The leading case defines a conspiracy to defraud as an agreement 'to deprive a person dishonestly of something which is his or to which he is or would be or might be entitled' or 'by dishonesty to injure some proprietary right'.[60]

Common law conspiracy to defraud is one of the very few remaining common law conspiracy offences, section 5 of the Criminal Law Act 1977 having replaced all others with a general statutory offence. The rationale for its retention despite the statutory offences introduced by the Fraud Act 2006 was that the common law offence was broad (as indicated by the definition above), and therefore allowed prosecutors to roll several offences into a smaller number of indictments than would otherwise be required to prosecute multiple examples of fraudulent conduct, and present a single cogent narrative to the court, without needing to charge, and evidence, several separate statutory offences.[61] Statute has made clear that a person charged with conspiracy to defraud may be liable irrespective of whether he or she became a co-conspirator in England or whether any act in relation to the conspiracy occurred in England.[62]

Statutory conspiracy to commit offences abroad 28.7.2

The Criminal Justice Act 1987 provides that a prosecutor may pursue common law conspiracy to defraud even in circumstances where the substantive offence would be covered by a specific statute.[63] However, in many cases, ranging from Innospec Limited[64] in 2010 to the recent attempted prosecution of Barclays Bank regarding Qatar, the SFO has relied on section 1(1) of the Criminal Law Act 1977 to bring charges of conspiracy to commit offences.[65]

In 1998, the Criminal Law Act 1977 was amended to provide expressly for a discrete offence of conspiracy to commit criminal offences outside the 60 Scott v. Metropolitan Police Commissioner [1975] AC 819 at 840F.

61 See the Attorney General's Guidance on use of the common law offence of conspiracy to defraud, (2007), and the Ministry of Justice Post-Legislative assessment of the Fraud Act 2006 (June 2012).

62 s.3(2) Criminal Justice Act 1993.

63 s.12 Criminal Justice 1987, which retained the offence at common law of conspiracy to defraud – see s.5(2) Criminal Law Act 1977.

64 The charge against Innospec Ltd was that between February 2002 and December 2006, the company, through various agents, engaged in systematic and large-scale corruption of senior government officials of Indonesia to secure contracts for the supply of a fuel additive, tetraethyl lead (TEL). The corrupt behaviour took the form of bribes, totalling approximately US$8 million. The seriousness of the corruption was aggravated by the fact that Innospec Ltd's behaviour was aimed at blocking legislative moves to ban TEL, owing to environmental and public health concerns. The company pleaded guilty to conspiracy contrary to s.1 of the Criminal Law Act 1977 and was fined US$12.7 million.

65 In R v. Turner, Kerrison, Papachristos and Jennings in 2014 (and the subsequent appeal SFO v. Papachristos and Kerrison [2014] EWCA Crim 1863), four former executives of Innospec were convicted and imprisoned for conspiracy offences in relation to their roles in bribing state officials in Indonesia and Iraq in order to secure contracts from the governments of those countries for the supply of products produced by Innospec Ltd.

jurisdiction.[66] By section 1A of the Act, a conspiracy may involve the doing of an act in a place outside England and Wales that constitutes an offence in that other jurisdiction. The purpose of section 1A was to extend existing UK law, and to give the English courts extraterritorial jurisdiction in relation to a conspiracy (1) partly formed or carried out in England and Wales, and (2) where the object was the commission of a foreign offence (where there is an equivalent offence in England and Wales). This section only applies, however, where four nexus conditions are satisfied:

- pursuit of the agreed conduct would involve an act by one or more of the parties outside the United Kingdom;
- that act is an offence under local law in that other country;
- that the agreement would be a conspiracy (within section 1(1) CLA 1977) but for the fact that the offence would not be an offence triable in England and Wales if committed in accordance with the parties' intentions; and
- a party to the agreement, whether directly or via an agent, did anything in England and Wales regarding formation of the agreement before its formation, became a party to it in England and Wales, or did or omitted anything in England and Wales pursuant to the agreement.[67]

Where those conditions are satisfied, the prosecutor may pursue conspiracy charges under section 1A, referring to the offence as being a conspiracy to commit the underlying substantive offence (e.g., drug trafficking or people smuggling)[68] but for the fact that it was not triable in England and Wales.[69]

Similarly, the Fraud Act 2006 has expressly broad extraterritorial application.[70] Put simply, where any element of a statutory fraud offence[71] occurs within England and Wales, the court will have jurisdiction to try a defendant whether or not he or she was in the jurisdiction at any material time, and whether or not he or she was a British citizen at the time.

28.7.3 Inchoate offences

Separately, practitioners should not overlook the inchoate offences of encouraging or assisting others in the commission of offences. The Serious Crime Act 2007 includes statutory inchoate offences (under sections 44 to 46) of encouraging or assisting the commission of offences; these have extraterritorial application in certain circumstances.[72]

66 Inserted by the Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998, s.5.

67 s.1A(1) to (5), Criminal Law Act 1977.

68 Respectively, R v. Welsh (Christopher Mark) [2015] EWCA Crim 1516, and R v. Sophia Patel [2009] EWCA Crim 67.

69 s.1A(6), Criminal Law Act 1977.

70 Part 1 of the Criminal Justice Act 1993 as amended by the Fraud Act 2006 (Schedule 1).

71 Being fraud by false representation (s.2), fraud by failing to disclose information (s.3), or fraud by abuse of position (s.4 Fraud Act 2006).

72 Through operation of s.52 of, and the conditions specified in Schedule 4 to, the Serious Crime Act 2007.

Where a person within England and Wales knows or believes that what is anticipated might occur wholly or partly in a place outside the jurisdiction, he or she will be liable under the Serious Crime Act 2007 if the anticipated offence would be triable in England if it were committed abroad or the anticipated conduct would amount to an offence under the local law of that other state.[73] Where that person is also outside the jurisdiction at the time of encouraging or assisting the anticipated offence, he or she will be liable under sections 44 to 46 if the person would otherwise be triable within England and Wales, for example on the basis of his or her British citizenship.[74]

Mutual legal assistance, cross-border production and the extraterritorial authority of UK enforcement agencies 28.8

Mutual legal assistance (MLA) allows a state to seek co-operation from another state in the investigation or prosecution of criminal offences via a formal letter of request. MLA is generally used when the enquiries require coercive means.[75] MLA is generally not appropriate if the material can be obtained directly via law enforcement co-operation for intelligence purposes or if the material otherwise is admissible in that form.

The framework governing the United Kingdom's approach to MLA is contained in a number of instruments, primarily the Crime (International Co-operation) Act 2003 (CICA), the European Convention on Mutual Legal Assistance in Criminal Matters 2000, and various bilateral and multilateral treaties (for example, with the United States in 1994, with Brazil in 2005 and with India in 1995). The UK Home Office Central Authority[76] is primarily tasked with receiving, and acceding to, MLA requests.[77]

Outgoing MLA requests (i.e., those from the United Kingdom to a foreign state) seeking evidence must be issued by a court or a designated prosecuting authority.[78] The MLA request can only be issued if it appears to the court or 73 Paras. 1 and 2 of Schedule 4, Serious Crime Act 2007.

74 For a discussion of this extraterritorial application, see the judgments in R (Khan) v. Foreign Secretary, regarding allegations that British intelligence officers committed offences under ss.44 to 46 of the SCA when they passed location information to agents of the United States Government for use in missile strikes by drone aircraft targeting individuals in Pakistan. R (Khan) v. Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs [2014] EWCA Civ 24; and at first instance at [2012] EWHC 3728 (Admin). Ultimately, however, the claim did not continue because the court refused permission to proceed as the case would inevitably risk judicial condemnation of the actions of a foreign sovereign state.

75 While MLA is used for gathering and exchanging information, and requesting and providing assistance in obtaining evidence located abroad, extradition is the legal process by which an individual is transferred from one state to another for the purposes of being tried or serving a sentence already imposed. The Extradition Act 2003 sets out the UK extradition legal framework

76 If the request relates to tax and fiscal customs matters, the competent authority is HMRC.

77 There are exceptions such as EU freezing orders for property, which need to be sent directly to the relevant UK prosecuting authority.

78 The Director and any designated member of the Serious Fraud Office, the Financial Conduct Authority and the Bank of England are examples of designated prosecuting authorities.

designated prosecuting authority that an offence has been committed or there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that an offence has been committed or proceedings in respect of the offence have been instituted by the designated prosecuting authority, or the offence is being investigated.[79] The request must relate to the obtaining of evidence for use in the proceedings or investigation.[80] The defence can also apply for an MLA request once criminal proceedings have begun.[81] The usual policy for central or executing authorities is to keep the MLA request confidential and not to share its content beyond government departments, agencies, the courts or enforcement agencies.[82]

Evidence obtained from or by the United Kingdom pursuant to an MLA request cannot be used for any purpose other than that specified in the request without consent of the foreign authority.

In practice, persons subject to a request from a foreign authority, whether formal or informal, should ensure that they do not disclose material that is legally privileged, and ensure they take all appropriate steps to protect their rights under UK law, including as to the privilege against self-incrimination. For example, one method of MLA to foreign states is to compel witnesses to attend court.[83] Importantly, however, a witness cannot be compelled to give evidence where he or she could not otherwise be compelled to testify under either UK law or that of the requesting state.[84]

Furthermore, in the appropriate case, there is scope for judicial review of the UK authorities' response to a letter of request (LOR) from a foreign authority. In R (on the application of Soma Oil and Gas Ltd) v. Director of the SFO,[85] the High Court made clear that judicial review challenges to investigation decisions by authorities should be very rare, and only pursued in exceptional circumstances.[86] However, it does remain open to individuals subjected to a LOR to seek protection; the court noted: 'A balance must be struck between the public interest in international cooperation in investigating and prosecuting serious crime and the rights of the individual . . . . Though such challenges are not at all to be encouraged . . . they would dovetail well with the statutory and treaty regime provided their focus was upon compliance with the CICA and treaty conditions for the making of a LOR.'[87]

79 s.7(5), CICA 2003.

80 s.7(2)), CICA 2003.

81 s.7(1)(b) and (3)(c), CICA 2003.

82 In Blue Holdings (1) Pte Ltd and another v. National Crime Agency [2016] EWCA Civ 760, the appellant succeeded in inspecting an MLA request from the US Department of Justice to the National Crime Agency following the court's balancing exercise between the right to inspect a document in proceedings and an enforcement authority's claim to confidentiality.

83 s.15 CICA 2003.

84 Schedule 1 CICA 2003.

85 [2016] EWHC 2471.

86 R (on the application of Unaenergy Group Holdings Pte Ltd and others) v. Director of the SFO [2017] EWHC 600 (Admin) at para. 34 (iii) (per Gross LJ).

87 Ibid. at para. 35 (original emphasis).

In cases of concurrent or overlapping jurisdiction, prosecutors are encouraged to meet with their counterparts from overseas to discuss the relevant factors, such as the location and interests of witnesses and whether the prosecution can be appropriately split into separate cases. Where a case touches on issues of US jurisdiction, which has wide extraterritorial application, the UK prosecutor will need to consider the Attorney General's long-standing agreement with the US Department of Justice, and the related guidance (January 2007), which requires consultation and regular liaison from the outset of a relevant investigation.

Mutual legal assistance is not, of course, the only avenue for UK authorities to extend their information-gathering overseas. In February 2019, the Court of Appeal decided the case of Jimenez.[88] The Court held that Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs (HMRC) was entitled to serve an 'information notice'[89] on a British individual resident overseas to obtain information about his tax position. Mr Jimenez, a UK national resident in the United Arab Emirates, challenged service of that notice at his address in Dubai. HMRC had served the notice as part of its investigation into Mr Jimenez's tax affairs. In 2017, the High Court quashed the notice on the basis that Schedule 36 of the Finance Act 2008 was silent as to its extraterritorial effect. The Court of Appeal subsequently overturned that decision.

In the leading judgment for the Court of Appeal, Lord Justice Patten noted that the purpose of Schedule 36 was to prevent tax evasion, which is often cross-border in nature, and that the subject matter of the legislation identifies a sufficient jurisdictional nexus to the recipient of the notice (a UK taxpayer). Set against that context, Patten LJ noted the strong public policy reasons for conferring effective investigatory powers on HMRC, and also noted the absence of any express restriction on the geographical effect of the statute. Accordingly, the Court held that Parliament intended that specific information-gathering power should be available for investigating the UK tax position of relevant persons resident overseas. The Court also dismissed Mr Jimenez's argument that HMRC's conduct amounted to an exercise of UK official acts in the territory of another sovereign state. The Court held that service of the information notice did not seek to impose any criminal liability on a foreign national, and did not offend against the territorial sovereignty of the United Arab Emirates. Interestingly, Patten LJ noted that:

> [A]nd the more recent decision[s] of the Supreme Court in Bilta and the Divisional Court in KBR confirm that the jurisdiction to serve a notice requiring the provision of information from a person resident abroad or even to impose liability on the recipient will not raise eyebrows where they serve to protect a sufficient national interest. In my view, the present case falls squarely within that category of case.[90]

88 R (on the application of Tony Michael Jimenez) v. First Tier Tax Tribunal (Tax Chamber) and HMRC [2019] EWCA Civ 51.

89 Pursuant to para. 1 of Schedule 36 to the Finance Act 2008.

90 R (on the application of Tony Michael Jimenez) v. First Tier Tax Tribunal (Tax Chamber) and HMRC [2019] EWCA Civ 51 at para. 49.

28.8.1 Requests from within the European Union

Customarily much of the cross-border co-operation between authorities is informal, relying on established relationships whether directly between states or through organisations such as Interpol and Europol.[91] More recently, however, the European Union has embarked on a programme of reform, resulting in the European investigation order (EIO)[92] and in the proposed European production and preservation orders (EPOs). Although the United Kingdom has chosen to opt out of the proposals on EPOs, it has recently passed the Crime (Overseas Production Orders) Act 2019, which allows the courts to make orders similar to EPOs and enables law enforcement to obtain electronic data directly from an overseas communications service provider.

See Section 28.8.2

The purpose of the EIO is to make it easier for authorities in one Member State to obtain evidence from others through the mutual recognition principle. In contrast to MLA, following a validly issued EIO, a Member State must conduct the investigative measures specified by the order (subject to certain exceptions). Those measures may include the transfer of prisoners for the purposes of investigations, the hearing of witnesses by video link and covert investigation. An EIO may only be issued where there is 'dual criminality' in the receiving and executing countries. Broad exceptions to this principle (including offence categories such as terrorism, and human trafficking) that mirror the exceptions in the current scheme, exist however.

See Chapter 17 on individuals in cross-border proceedings

On receipt of an EIO, a participating Member State will have 30 days to decide whether to recognise and execute it. If the EIO is recognised, the request should be completed within 90 days, although extensions are permissible.

To apply for an EIO, an investigator in England and Wales must do so either to a 'designated public prosecutor', or by applying to a magistrates' court or the Crown Court, depending on the type of investigative measure sought. Defendants in criminal proceedings may also apply for an EIO from a judicial authority (any justice of the peace or judge). Irrespective of who is making the application, the public prosecutor or judicial authority must be satisfied that an offence has been committed, or there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that an offence has been committed, and proceedings have begun in respect of the offence, or it is being investigated.

At the time of writing, it is unclear how the EIO regime will work in the United Kingdom after Brexit, if at all. On 15 January 2019, the UK government published the draft Law Enforcement and Security (Amendment) (EU Exit) Regulations 2019 (Exit Regulations), which address the relevant consequences of the United Kingdom leaving the European Union without a deal. The Exit Regulations seek to revoke the European Investigative Order Directive, including consequential amendments to British legislation, meaning that the United Kingdom would lose 91 For example, see the NCA website regarding its international co-operation. For a discussion of the European arrest warrant, see chapter 17 on individuals in cross-border investigations.

92 Directive 2014/41/EU was implemented in England and Wales by the Criminal Justice (European Investigation Order) Regulations 2017, which came into force on 31 July 2017.

European co-operation measures with regards to EIOs. Recently, one of the country's most senior police officers, the Assistant Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police, has acknowledged that safety and security will suffer from a no-deal Brexit, stating that certain systems and tools available through the EU were developed for a good reason. According to that officer, the loss of those tools would create 'an immediate risk that people could come to this country [the UK] who were serious offenders, either wanted or still serial and serious offenders committing crimes in this country, and we would not know about it.'[93]

Brexit 28.8.2

On 17 April 2018, the European Commission published its proposals for EPOs.[94] Unlike EIOs, EPOs will specifically target electronic evidence and would enable judicial authorities to receive electronic data from service providers within 10 days, and within six hours in an emergency. A preservation order would enable a judicial authority to require a service provider to preserve data, which could subsequently be obtained via MLA and an EIO or an EPO. The government has decided as of October 2018 against opting into the EU proposal for a legislation on the use of EPOs for cross-border access to electronic evidence in criminal matters.[95] The Crime (Overseas Production Orders) Act 2019 gives law enforcement agencies and prosecutors the power to obtain electronic data directly from an overseas communications service provider. The government has stated that this will be subject to robust judicial oversight, and that there exist statutory protections for legally privileged or journalistic material. The United Kingdom is also currently negotiating a data access agreement with the United States. Given broader uncertainties, at the time of writing, regarding Brexit and the new UK government, this remains an area for practitioners to watch.

Extradition and the European arrest warrant 28.8.3

Currently, the Extradition Act 2003 sets out the relevant UK legal framework. Extradition between EU Member States is governed by the European arrest warrant (EAW), which is based on principles of mutual trust and aims for speedy extradition proceedings.

After Brexit, however, the United Kingdom will need new arrangements with EU Member States to maintain appropriate degrees of co-operation. A return to the previous regime, under the 1957 Council of Europe Convention on Extradition, appears to be the default position and will inevitably lead to delays.

93 Vikram Dodd, 'Brexit: no deal would harm UK security, senior officer warns', The Guardian, 7 August 2019 (https://www.theguardian.com/uk-news/2019/aug/07/no-deal-brexit-would-harm-uk-security-senior-officer-warns), accessed 19 September 2019.

94 http://europa.eu/rapid/press-release_IP-18-3343_en.htm, accessed 19 September 2018.

95 Opt-in Decision on the Proposal of the European Parliament and the Council on European Production Orders and European Preservation Orders for cross-border access to electronic evidence in criminal matters: Written statement – HCWS1024, 22 October 2018.

Indeed, the House of Lords concluded in a report[96] that '[f]alling back on the 1957 Council of Europe Convention on Extradition would significantly slow down extradition proceedings, since it would mean going back to making routine extradition requests – as well as resolving disputes about extradition requests – through diplomatic channels.'[97]

Brexit is unlikely to affect extradition arrangements with category 2 territories as designated by the Extradition Act 2003 (countries with international extradition arrangements other than the EAW, such as the United States).

28.8.4 Economic Crime Plan, 2019–2022

In July 2019, the government published its Economic Crime Plan, 2019–2022 (the Plan).[98] Continuing a theme from recent years, the Plan emphasises the need for the public and private sectors to work together to help the United Kingdom counter all forms of economic crime. This is underpinned by seven strategic objectives, which include improving systems for transparency of ownership of legal entities and legal arrangements, and delivering an ambitious international strategy to enhance security, prosperity and global influence.

Aimed at countering money laundering through the UK real estate market, the Plan seeks, among other things, to improve transparency of overseas ownership of British property by finalising legislation that will establish a public register of the beneficial owners of overseas foreign companies that hold UK property.[99] The register is described as being the first of its type in the world and is proposed to be operational in 2021.

The Plan also describes an intention to strengthen UK law enforcement agencies' capability to prosecute bribery and corruption. Increased funding is proposed for the International Corruption Unit at the NCA and for the Crown Prosecution Service, to enable them to recover and return assets stolen from developing countries by corrupt individuals and pursue UK companies and nationals who engage in bribery and corruption in developing countries.

The Plan recognises that domestic and international action are mutually supporting. To enhance overseas capabilities, the Plan aims to:

- coordinate networks of policy expertise, including the development of a new hybrid platform (the International Centre of Excellence), which combines public, private and academic expertise to tackle illicit financing in existing and emerging regional and global financial centres;

96 European Union Committee, 'Brexit: judicial oversight of the European Arrest Warrant', (6th Report of Session 17–19, HL Paper 16).

97 Ibid., at para. 73.

98 Economic Crime Plan, 2019-22, July 2019 (https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/816215/2019-22_Economic_Crime_Plan.pdf), accessed 19 September 2019.

99 Draft Registration of Overseas Entities Bill 2019.

- embed staff in high priority jurisdictions to facilitate joint responses to shared threats; and
- improve co-operation between UK law enforcement agencies and their international counterparts.

The Plan acknowledges that the United Kingdom has made significant progress in recognising and responding to the threat from economic crime through world-leading reforms, including through the creation of the National Economic Crime Centre, which was established in October 2018 to substantially improve the response to tackling serious and organised crime. It brings together law enforcement and justice agencies, government departments, regulatory bodies and the private sector to 'protecting the public and safeguarding the prosperity and reputation of the UK as a financial centre'.[100]

100 https://nationalcrimeagency.gov.uk/what-we-do/national-economic-crime-centre, accessed 19 September 2019.

29

Extraterritoriality: The US Perspective

James P Loonam and Conor Reardon[1]

29.1 Extraterritorial reach of US laws

Investigations conducted by US prosecutors and regulators often concern conduct outside the United States and involve evidence located abroad. The two questions of whether US law applies to the conduct under investigation and whether US authorities can compel the production of evidence located abroad are of significant importance to practitioners. As to the first question, in a series of civil cases, the United States Supreme Court has reasserted a presumption against the extraterritorial application of US statutes.[2] What this means is that lower US courts have been instructed to assume that US law applies only to conduct that takes place within the borders of the United States unless the particular law explicitly states it has exterritorial application. In practice, this presumption is an important but limited check on US prosecutors' and regulators' powers to investigate and bring cases involving foreign conduct. Even limited contacts with the United States, such as the use of the US wires or financial system, may bring related conduct that takes place outside the United States within the domestic purview of certain US laws. Courts look to the statute's 'focus'[3] to determine whether a case involves a domestic application of a statute:

1 James P Loonam is a partner, and Conor Reardon is an associate, at Jones Day.

2 Morrison v. Nat'l Australia Bank, Ltd., 561 U.S. 247 (2010); Kiobel v. Royal Dutch Petroleum Co., 569 U.S. 108 (2013); RJR Nabisco, Inc. v. European Community, 136 S. Ct. 2090 (2016).

3 Morrison v. Nat'l Australia Bank, Ltd., 561 U.S. 247 (2010); RJR Nabisco, Inc. v. European Community, 136 S. Ct. 2090 (2016).

> If the conduct relevant to the statute's focus occurred in the United States, then the case involves a permissible domestic application even if other conduct occurred abroad; but if the conduct relevant to the focus occurred in a foreign country, then the case involves an impermissible extraterritorial application regardless of any other conduct that occurred in US territory.[4]

In recent years, lower courts have grappled with this issue of determining the focus of various statutes case by case and have not always reached consistent results. This chapter will address the recent jurisprudence in this area, focusing on statutes that are most commonly invoked to reach overseas conduct. As to the second question, US prosecutors often seek to obtain evidence located overseas during the course of investigations. This chapter will address the muscular stance recently taken by prosecutors to obtain evidence located overseas from non-US entities and the support this approach has found in the courts to date.[5]

Securities laws 29.2

The Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (the Exchange Act) regulates domestic securities markets and transactions. Its general anti-fraud provision, Section 10(b), along with accompanying SEC Rule 10b-5, prohibits fraud in connection with the purchase or sale of securities. The Exchange Act and its associated rules are enforced civilly by the SEC (as well as through private actions) and criminally by the US Department of Justice (DOJ). Much recent extraterritoriality litigation – including the Supreme Court's landmark decision in Morrison v. Nat'l Australia Bank Ltd[6] – has involved the securities laws.

The Morrison decision 29.2.1

Some forty years before Morrison, the Second Circuit developed an approach to extraterritoriality in the securities fraud context that would be adopted (albeit with variation) by many other courts of appeals.[7] Under this 'conduct and effects' test, the court determined the extraterritorial reach of the securities laws in a given case by asking (1) 'whether the wrongful conduct had a substantial effect in the United States or upon United States citizens', and (2) 'whether the wrongful conduct occurred in the United States'.[8] Other circuits adopted related (though not identical) tests.[9] Whatever the precise formulation, the conduct-and-effects

4 RJR Nabisco, 136 S. Ct. at 2101.

5 See, e.g., In re: Sealed Case, No. 19-5068 (D.C. Cir. 6 August 2019).

6 561 U.S. 247 (2010).

7 See Leasco Data Processing Equip. Corp. v. Maxwell, 468 F.2d 1326 (2d Cir. 1972); Schoenbaum v. Firstbrook, 405 F.2d 200 (2d Cir. 1968).

8 Morrison, 561 U.S. at 257 (quoting SEC v. Berger, 322 F.3d 187, 192–93 (2d Cir. 2003)).

9 See id. at 259 (collecting cases).

approach required a fact-intensive, case-specific inquiry calculated to reveal whether Congress would have wanted United States law to apply had it considered the matter.[10]

In Morrison, the Supreme Court rejected this long-standing test. The Court criticised the notion that congressional silence on the extraterritorial scope of Section 10(b) gave judges licence to 'determine what Congress would have wanted'.[11] It added that the imprecise conduct-and-effects approach was inconsistent in application and yielded unpredictable results.[12] The proper approach, the majority held, was to apply the presumption against extraterritoriality in all cases.[13] Because Section 10(b) lacked 'a clear statement of extraterritorial effect', it applied only domestically.[14]

The Court went on to describe the domestic scope of Section 10(b). The statute's focus is not merely deceptive conduct, but deceptive conduct 'in connection with the purchase or sale of any security registered on a national securities exchange or any security not so registered'.[15] Therefore, Section 10(b) applies only to 'transactions in securities listed on domestic exchanges, and domestic transactions in other securities'.[16]

In explaining the territorial reach of Section 10(b), the Court upset existing case law in another respect. Many courts had considered a statute's extraterritorial scope to raise a question of subject-matter jurisdiction.[17] Not so, wrote the majority: to 'ask what conduct Section 10(b) reaches is to ask what conduct Section 10(b) prohibits', which is not a question of adjudicative authority but 'a merits question'.[18]

29.2.2 Post-Morrison developments

In Morrison, the Court announced that its new approach was (unlike the conduct-and-effects standard) a 'clear test' that could be predictably applied.[19] Nonetheless, lower courts have wrestled with a number of questions that Morrison did not answer.

One fundamental issue arises not from any lack of clarity in Morrison, but from Congress's apparent response to the decision. Days after Morrison came down, a joint congressional committee finalising the proposed Dodd-Frank Act published a final version of the bill, which would be enacted less than a month later.[20] That version (and the enacted law) included a provision, Section 929P,

10 Id. at 259–60.
11 Id. at 260.
12 Id.
13 Id.
14 Id. at 265.
15 Id. at 266–67 (quoting 15 U.S.C. § 78j(b)).
16 Id.
17 Id. at 253–54.
18 Id. at 254.
19 Id. at 269.
20 Pub. L. No. 111-203, 124 Stat. 1376 (2010).

that appears calculated to abrogate Morrison in the context of SEC and criminal actions. It amends the jurisdictional section of the Exchange Act by providing that district courts 'shall have jurisdiction' over such actions involving 'conduct within the United States that constitutes significant steps in furtherance of the violation' or 'conduct occurring outside the United States that has a foreseeable substantial effect within the United States'.[21] The legislator who had drafted the provision, Representative Paul Kanjorski, stated that its purpose 'was to make clear that the antifraud provisions apply extraterritorially in enforcement actions'.[22]

The intent behind Section 929P seems clear enough, but Morrison explicitly held that the question of a statute's extraterritorial application is a merits question, not a jurisdictional question. Section 929P speaks only to jurisdiction and leaves untouched the substantive anti-fraud provisions of the Exchange Act. Faced with this conflict between contextual evidence of congressional intent and plain text, several courts have sidestepped the issue.[23] But in 2019, the Tenth Circuit became the first court of appeals to directly confront the question. The court prioritised 'context and historical background' – particularly Congress's inability to respond to Morrison's jurisdiction/merits holding in the days between the decision and reporting of the final bill – to hold that Section 929P abrogated Morrison and that 'the substantive antifraud provisions should apply extraterritorially when the statutory conduct-and-effects test is satisfied.'[24] Whether other courts of appeals will embrace the Tenth Circuit's conclusion remains to be seen.

In addition to this basic question of Morrison's vitality outside the context of private actions, courts have addressed a number of issues regarding its application. The first prong of Morrison's transactional test permits actions based on 'transactions in securities listed on domestic exchanges'.[25] In 2014, the Second Circuit considered whether this formulation permitted a 'foreign-cubed' claim – foreign institutional investors suing foreign banking defendants over shares purchased on a foreign exchange – because those shares were cross-listed on the New York Stock Exchange.[26] The court acknowledged that the plaintiffs' 'listing theory' comported with Morrison's language 'taken in isolation', but concluded that, 'read as a whole', Morrison made clear that domestic application of the Exchange Act requires that the shares in question be purchased, not just listed, on a domestic exchange.[27]

21 15 U.S.C. § 78aa(b).

22 SEC v. Scoville, 913 F.3d 1204, 1218 (10th Cir.2019), cert. denied, 18-1566 (4 November 2019).

23 See, e.g., SEC v. Chicago Convention Ctr., LLC, 961 F. Supp. 2d 905, 911–17 (N.D. Ill. 2013) ('The plain language of Section 929P(b) and its placement in the jurisdictional section of the Exchange Act indicate that it may be jurisdictional. It is unclear, however, whether the Court's analysis should stop there because it is possible that this interpretation would create superfluity or contradict the legislative intent. The Court need not resolve this complex interpretation issue, however, because . . . under either the Morrison "transactional" inquiry or the allegedly revived "conduct and effects test," the SEC's Complaint survives the present motion to dismiss.').

24 Scoville, 913 F.3d at 1218.

25 Morrison, 561 U.S. at 267 (emphasis added).

26 City of Pontiac Policemen's & Firemen's Ret. Sys. v. UBS AG, 752 F.3d 173, 179–80 (2d Cir. 2014).

27 Id. at 180–81.

Courts have also addressed just what qualifies as a domestic exchange. One district court held in 2011 that Morrison's first prong reaches securities traded on domestic over-the-counter markets, reasoning that 'transactions on the domestic over-the-counter market are as imbued with our national interest as trades on national exchanges.'[28] But that decision appears to be an outlier. Other courts have concluded that over-the-counter transactions may qualify under Morrison's second prong (as domestic transactions in other securities), but do not occur on exchanges.[29]

Morrison's second prong has likewise received attention from litigants and courts. In 2012, the Second Circuit held that a securities transaction is domestic under Morrison if (1) 'the purchaser incurred irrevocable liability within the United States to take and pay for a security;' (2) 'the seller incurred irrevocable liability within the United States to deliver a security;' or (3) 'title to the shares was passed within the United States.'[30] Under the 'irrevocable liability' test, the court must identify 'the point at which the parties obligated themselves to perform what they had agreed to perform even if the formal performance of their agreement is to be after a lapse of time'.[31] What matters is not where the 'contract is said to have been executed' as a matter of contract law, but 'where, physically, the purchaser or seller committed him or herself'.[32] The Second Circuit's approach has met generally with approval and has been expressly adopted by the Third and Ninth 28 SEC v. Ficeto, 839 F. Supp. 2d 1101, 1108 (C.D. Cal. 2011); see id. at 1108–14.

29 See, e.g., Stoyas v. Toshiba Corp., 896 F.3d 933, 945–47 (9th Cir. 2018); United States v. Georgiou, 777 F.3d 125, 134–35 (3d Cir. 2015); In re Volkswagen 'Clean Diesel' Marketing, Sales Practices, and Prods. Liab. Litig., Nos. 15-cv-6167, 15-cv-6168, 16-cv-190, 16-cv-184, 2017 WL 66281, at *3–4 (N.D. Cal. 4 January 2017).

30 Absolute Activist Value Master Fund Ltd. v. Ficeto, 677 F.3d 60, 68–69 (2d Cir. 2012).

31 Id. at 68.

32 United States v. Vilar, 729 F.3d 62, 77 n.11 (2d Cir. 2013). Notwithstanding this focus on where, 'physically', the parties committed themselves, the Second Circuit has also stated that '[t]he location . . . of the buyer, seller, or broker will not necessarily establish the situs of the transaction.' In re Petrobas Sec., 862 F.3d 250, 262 (2d Cir. 2017). The recent case of United States v. Boustani implicated this tension. The DOJ initially contended that its indictment alleged domestic transactions because 'United States investors purchased [the relevant securities] while physically present in the United States.' Memorandum in Opposition 15–17, United States v. Boustani, No. 18-cr-681-WFK (E.D.N.Y. 22 July 2019), ECF No. 113. The defendant argued that this fact alone did not establish domesticity, and that the relevant transactions occurred abroad because they were settled and cleared in Europe. Memorandum of Law in Support of Motion to Dismiss 19–24, United States v. Boustani, No. 18-cr-681-WFK (E.D.N.Y. 21 June 2019), ECF No. 98. Before the Court decided the issue, the government obtained a superseding indictment, which alleged that 'investors in the United States incurred irrevocable liability in the United States by purchasing the [securities] while physically present in the United States.' Supplemental Memorandum in Opposition 14-15, United States v. Boustani, No. 18-cr-681-WFK (E.D.N.Y. 13 Sept 2019), ECF No. 166. The defendant's motion to dismiss the indictment was denied. Decision & Order, United States v. Boustani, No. 18-cr-681-WFK (E.D.N.Y. 3 Oct 2019), ECF No. 231. On 2 December the jury acquitted the defendant on all counts. The defence had argued that 'the US is not the world's policeman'. Three jurors later told press that they could not see 'how federal prosecutors in Brooklyn had the authority to prosecute crimes that hadn't occurred in their jurisdiction'. Patricia Hurtado, 'Salesman Cleared in US$2 Billion African Scam in Blow to US' Bloomberg (2 December 2019),

Circuits.[33] Determining whether irrevocable liability was incurred, or title passed, in the United States requires analysis of 'factual allegations concerning contract formation, placement of purchase orders, passing of title, and the exchange of money'.[34] Given the varied and complex nature of modern transactions in securities, the moment of irrevocable commitment (or passing of title) will not always be obvious.[35]

Finally, two courts of appeals disagree about a fundamental aspect of Morrison's holding: is a domestic transaction in a security (or a transaction in a security listed domestically) merely necessary for application of the Exchange Act, or is it both necessary and sufficient? In Parkcentral Global Hub Ltd v. Porsche Auto Holdings SE,[36] the Second Circuit concluded that some domestic transactions are beyond the territorial reach of Section 10(b). The plaintiffs in Parkcentral were international hedge funds that entered securities-based swap agreements in the United States.[37] These instruments were pegged to the price of Volkswagen shares, but the shares themselves were traded only on foreign exchanges, and the foreign defendant (which had allegedly engaged in fraud, primarily in Germany, affecting the price of shares) was not a counterparty to any of the agreements.[38] The court acknowledged that the relevant transactions had occurred in the United States, but nonetheless concluded that the case was extraterritorial. If the suit proceeded, 'it would permit the plaintiffs, by virtue of an agreement independent from the reference securities, to hale the European participants in the market for German stocks into US courts and subject them to US securities laws.'[39] This would incompatible with Morrison.

In Stoyas v. Toshiba Corp, the Ninth Circuit disagreed. Toshiba, like Parkcentral, involved American depository receipts (ADRs), issued by United States depositary institutions without defendant Toshiba's formal participation and representing a beneficial interest in, not legal ownership of, Toshiba shares.[40] The plaintiffs alleged that Toshiba had engaged in fraud overseas, causing the value of its shares (and the value of plaintiffs' ADRs) to decrease. It appeared that plaintiffs had available at https://www.bloomberg.com/news/articles/2019-12-02/privinvest-salesman-is-acquitted-of-defrauding-u-s-investors.

33 See Stoyas, 896 F.3d at 947–49; Georgiou, 777 F.3d at 137.

34 Stoyas, 896 F.3d at 949.

35 See SEC v. Ahmed, 308 F. Supp. 3d 628, 660–64 (D. Conn. 2018) (summarising cases applying the Second Circuit's standard in a variety of factual circumstances).

36 763 F.3d 198 (2d Cir. 2014).

37 Id. at 207.

38 Id. at 206–08.

39 Id. at 214–17. After Parkcentral, some Second Circuit decisions distinguished or ignored the case, casting doubt on its continued relevance. See, e.g., Giunta v. Dingman, 893 F.3d 73, 82 (2d Cir. 2018); Myun-Uk Choi v. Tower Research Capital LLC, 890 F.3d 60, 66 (2d Cir. 2018). But in 2019, in a case arising under the Commodity Exchange Act, the court both reaffirmed Parkcentral and extended it to that new statutory context. See Prime Int'l Trading, Ltd. v. BP P.L.C., --- F.3d ----, 2019 WL 4062219, at *6–8 (2d Cir. 29 August 2019).

40 Stoyas, 896 F.3d at 940–41.

purchased the ADRs in the United States.[41] But Toshiba argued that the case was nonetheless extraterritorial. As in Parkcentral, there was 'no connection between Toshiba and the Toshiba ADR transactions', making the dispute so overwhelmingly foreign as to require dismissal.[42] The Ninth Circuit disagreed. The court wrote that Parkcentral was distinguishable on several grounds, but that, in any event, it was wrongly decided: the Second Circuit's approach replaced Morrison's bright-line transactional test with an undefined standard asking whether (notwithstanding a domestic transaction) a case was 'too foreign' for US adjudication.[43]

The Supreme Court declined to review the Ninth Circuit's Stoyas decision, leaving the circuit conflict unresolved. As it stands, the practical importance of the disagreement is unclear. The Ninth Circuit indicated that in the unusual circumstances present in Parkcentral and Stoyas – namely a foreign defendant drawn into a US lawsuit based solely on domestically traded derivative instruments – other elements of Section 10(b), such as the requirement that fraud be 'in connection with' the purchase or sale of a security, might preclude liability.[44]

29.3 Criminal versus civil cases

In Morrison, the Supreme Court described the applicability of the presumption against extraterritoriality in unequivocal terms: 'Rather than guess anew in each case, we apply the presumption in all cases.'[45] That blanket pronouncement sits uneasily with United States v. Bowman,[46] a 1922 decision holding that the presumption is inapplicable in certain classes of criminal cases. Neither Morrison nor any of the Court's other recent extraterritoriality decisions arose in the criminal context, creating uncertainty about how the Court's aggressive application of the presumption translates to criminal prosecutions.

The defendants in Bowman schemed to defraud a government-owned company, acting on the high seas and in Brazil.[47] The Court acknowledged the presumption against extraterritoriality and stated that it applied to '[c]rimes against private individuals or their property, like assaults, murder, burglary, larceny, robbery, arson, embezzlement, and frauds of all kinds'.[48] But, the Court reasoned, 'the same rule of interpretation should not be applied to criminal statutes which are, as a class, not logically dependent on their locality for the government's jurisdiction, but are enacted because of the right of the government to defend itself against

41 Id. at 949.
42 Id. at 949.
43 Id. at 950.
44 Id. at 950–52.
45 Morrison, 561 U.S. at 261.
46 260 U.S. 94 (1922).
47 Id. at 95–97.
48 Id. at 98.

obstruction, or fraud wherever perpetrated.'[49] In such cases, Congress need not speak clearly for its statute to apply extraterritorially, for it has allowed it 'to be inferred' from the 'nature' of the offence.[50]

By its terms, the Bowman exception was drawn narrowly.[51] But in the decades that followed, the courts of appeals 'applied Bowman . . . with varying degrees of liberality',[52] and many courts held Bowman applicable (and the presumption against extraterritoriality inoperative) in circumstances well removed from 'criminal statutes . . . enacted because of the right of the government to defend itself against obstruction, or fraud wherever perpetrated'.[53] For example, some courts drew on Bowman's reference to the nature of the crime to exempt whole classes of criminal statutes that frequently involve transnational conduct or effects, such as 'immigration . . . , sex tourism and human trafficking, and drug trafficking'.[54]

The Court's reinvigorated commitment to the presumption against extraterritoriality suggests that, in an appropriate case, it might be willing to revisit Bowman. In the meantime, lower courts have not been willing to conclude that Bowman has been impliedly overruled.[55] The government has read Bowman broadly to argue that cases like Morrison and RJR Nabisco simply do not apply in criminal matters. Lower courts have not been receptive to that argument either.[56] Instead, the question in lower courts has been the extent of the Bowman exception in light of the Court's recent extraterritoriality decisions. Many have applied the presumption in criminal cases while acknowledging that there is tension between Morrison and Bowman or, at a minimum, explaining that Morrison highlights the need to confine Bowman's exception to narrow limits.[57]

---

49 Id.

50 Id.

51 Id. at 98–99.

52 United States v. McVicker, 979 F. Supp. 2d 1154, 1171 (D. Or. 2013).

53 Bowman, 260 U.S. at 98.

54 Zachary D Clopton, Bowman Lives: The Extraterritorial Application of U.S. Criminal Law After Morrison v. National Australia Bank, 67 N.Y.U. Ann. Surv. Am. L. 137, 169–70 (2011); see id. at 170 nn. 135–37 (collecting cases).

55 E.g., United States v. All Assets Held at Bank Julius, 251 F. Supp. 3d 82, 91 n.5 (D.D.C. 2017), reconsideration granted in part on other grounds sub nom. United States v. All Assets Held at Bank Julius, Baer & Co., Ltd., 315 F. Supp. 3d 90 (D.D.C. 2018).

56 See, e.g., United States v. Vasquez, 899 F.3d 363, 374 (5th Cir. 2018) (rejecting the 'puzzling position' that 'RJR Nabisco does not apply to criminal cases'); United States v. Vilar, 729 F.3d 62, 72 (2d Cir. 2013) ('no plausible interpretation of Bowman' supported the government's argument that 'the presumption against extraterritoriality has no place in our reading of criminal statutes').

57 See, e.g., Vasquez, 899 F.3d at 373–74 & n.6; Vilar, 729 F.3d at 72–74; All Assets, 251 F. Supp. 3d at 91 n.5; United States v. Abu Khatallah, 151 F. Supp. 3d 116, 124–26 (D.D.C. 2015) (explaining that Bowman 'sits uneasily with Aramco, Morrison, and Kiobel'). But not all courts have embraced the idea that the Court's recent extraterritoriality cases bear on the Bowman exception. See, e.g., United States v. Leija-Sanchez, 820 F.3d 899, 901 (7th Cir. 2016) ('A decision such as Bowman, holding that criminal and civil laws differ with respect to extraterritorial application, is not affected by yet another decision showing how things work on the civil side [i.e., Morrison].').

However lower courts navigate the Bowman–Morrison tension as a general matter, Morrison appears to bear directly on the interpretation of 'hybrid' statutes, namely statutes that apply both criminally and civilly. As a rule, federal courts construe hybrid statutes consistently across applications, rather than interpret the same statute one way in criminal cases and another in civil cases.[58] Morrison makes clear that the presumption against extraterritoriality (1) applies universally in (at least) the civil context, and (2) is a rule of statutory construction.[59] Therefore, under Morrison, statutes capable of civil application should be construed using the presumption against extraterritoriality, generating an interpretation that applies perforce if the statute is also capable of criminal application. Indeed, as the Second Circuit held in Vilar, the statute construed in Morrison – Section 10(b) – is itself a hybrid statute and after Morrison lacks extraterritorial effect in both its civil and criminal dimensions.[60]

29.4 RICO

The Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) prohibits engaging in 'a pattern of racketeering activity' in relation to an enterprise.[61] 'The statute defines "racketeering activity" to encompass dozens of state and federal offenses, known in RICO parlance as predicates.'[62] Violations of RICO's substantive prohibitions are subject to criminal prosecution and civil enforcement proceedings.[63] In addition, RICO creates an express private right of action for '[a]ny person injured in his business or property by reason of a violation of Section 1962'.[64]

See Chapter 26 on fines, disgorgement, etc.

58 See, e.g., Leocal v. Ashcroft, 543 U.S. 1, 12 n.8 (2004) ('[W]e must interpret the statute consistently, whether we encounter its application in a criminal or noncriminal context.'); FCC v. Am. Broadcast Co., 347 U.S. 284, 296 (1954) ('There cannot be one construction for the Federal Communications Commission and another for the Department of Justice.'); Carter v. Welles-Bowen Realty, Inc., 736 F.3d 722, 727 (6th Cir. 2013) ('A single statute with civil and criminal applications receives a single interpretation.'). Notwithstanding the Supreme Court's apparently clear statements on this matter, some cases contravene or call into question the rule of consistent interpretation. See, e.g., United States v. Plaza Health Labs, Inc., 3 F.3d 643, 648 (2d Cir. 1993); see also Babbitt v. Sweet Home Chapter of Communities for a Greater Oregon, 515 U.S. 687, 704 n.18 (1995) (deferring to an agency interpretation of a law carrying criminal penalties, and suggesting that the rule of lenity had no application because the case arose in a civil context).

59 See Vilar, 729 F.3d at 74.

60 Id. ('[E]ven if it were the case that we do not generally apply the presumption against extraterritoriality to criminal statutes, Section 10(b) would still not apply extraterritorially in criminal cases. The reason is simple: The presumption against extraterritoriality is a method of interpreting a statute, which has the same meaning in every case.'); see Vasquez, 899 F.3d at 373 n.6 (applying RJR Nabisco to a criminal RICO case, and explaining that RICO 'is a hybrid statute authorizing criminal prosecution, civil enforcement, and private civil actions' (internal citations omitted)); see id. (collecting criminal RICO cases that apply RJR Nabisco).

61 RJR Nabisco, Inc. v. European Cmty., 136 S. Ct. 2090, 2096–97 (2016); see 18 U.S.C. § 1962.

62 RJR Nabisco, 136 S. Ct. at 2096.

63 18 U.S.C. §§ 1963(a), 1964(a)–(b).

64 RJR Nabisco, 136 S. Ct. at 2097 (quoting 18 U.S.C. § 1964(c)).

The Supreme Court considered RICO's extraterritorial scope in RJR Nabisco, a civil action brought by the European Community and 26 of its Member States against defendants alleged to have 'participated in a global money-laundering conspiracy in association with various organized crime groups'.[65] The Court reached three significant conclusions. First, it held that RICO overcomes the presumption against extraterritoriality because certain predicates apply extraterritorially, 'a clear, affirmative indication that Section 1962 applies to foreign racketeering activity'.[66] But 'when a statute provides for some extraterritorial application, the presumption against extraterritoriality operates to limit that provision to its terms.'[67] Therefore, RICO applies extraterritorially 'only to the extent that the predicates alleged in a particular case themselves apply extraterritorially'.[68] Second, the Court held that – even where an alleged predicate offence applies extraterritorially – RICO's substantive prohibitions require 'proof of an enterprise that is "engaged in, or the activities of which affect, interstate or foreign commerce"' .[69] This necessary link to US commerce provides a further limit on RICO's extraterritorial scope. Third, the Court held that RICO's private right of action has no extraterritorial application, even in cases involving extraterritorial predicates.[70] 'A private RICO plaintiff therefore must allege and prove a domestic injury to its business or property.'[71]

A number of courts have applied RJR Nabisco in the context of criminal prosecutions.[72] In a criminal case, where the domestic-injury requirement applicable to private plaintiffs has no operation, extraterritorial application will turn on the reach of the alleged predicates and the nexus between the enterprise and US commerce.[73]

Wire fraud 29.5

The wire fraud statute, 18 USC Section 1343, prohibits wire transmissions 'in interstate or foreign commerce . . . for the purpose of executing' a scheme to defraud. Federal prosecutors have broadly applied this statute to reach a variety of fraudulent conduct. Questions of the extraterritoriality of the wire fraud statute arise not only in criminal prosecutions, but also in civil cases, particularly RICO suits in which wire fraud is alleged as a predicate act.

65 Id. at 2098.

66 Id. at 2102.

67 Id. (quoting Morrison, 561 U.S. at 265).

68 Id.

69 Id. at 2105 (quoting 18 U.S.C. § 1962(a)–(c)).

70 Id. at 2106.

71 Id.

72 See, e.g., United States v. Vasquez, 899 F.3d 363, 373 n.6 (5th Cir. 2018) (citing United States v. Sitzmann, 893 F.3d 811, 822 (D.C. Cir. 2018) (per curiam); United States v. Ubaldo, 859 F.3d 690, 700–01 (9th Cir. 2017); United States v. Valenzuela, 849 F.3d 477, 484–85 & n.3 (1st Cir. 2017); United States v. Gasperini, 729 F. App'x 112, 113–14 (2d Cir. 2018)).

73 See, e.g., United States v. Hawit, No. 15-cr-252-PKC, 2017 WL 663542, at *9–10 (E.D.N.Y. 17 February 2017).

Courts disagree about whether Section 1343 applies extraterritorially. In United States v. Georgiou,[74] the Third Circuit held that it does. The court relied on dicta from Pasquantino v. United States,[75] in which the Supreme Court stated that 'the wire fraud statute punishes frauds executed in "interstate or foreign commerce", so this is surely not a statute in which Congress had only "domestic concerns in mind".'[76] But the Second Circuit rejected that view in European Community v. RJR Nabisco, Inc.[77] The court acknowledged the dicta in Pasquantino but reasoned that it had been abrogated by Morrison, which held that 'a general reference to foreign commerce . . . does not defeat the presumption against extraterritoriality.'[78] After concluding that the statute had no extraterritorial application, however, the Second Circuit left unsettled the second step of the inquiry (i.e. the focus, and therefore the domestic reach, of Section 1343) by disclaiming any need to decide 'precisely how to draw the line between domestic and extraterritorial applications of the wire fraud statute'.[79] The court reasoned that the defendants were alleged to have satisfied each element of the statute through conduct in the United States; accordingly, 'wherever [the] line should be drawn', the case fell on the domestic side of it.[80]

After European Community, district courts – particularly district courts within the Second Circuit – struggled to define the kind and degree of domestic conduct necessary for application of the wire fraud statute. In Laydon v. Mizuho Bank, Ltd,[81] defendants acting abroad were alleged to have manipulated benchmark interest rates through fraudulent submissions to entities in London and Tokyo.[82] The court rejected the idea that mere use of the domestic wires in connection with the fraud was sufficient without proof that the scheme was managed from or directed to the United States.[83] Yet in United States v. Hayes,[84] another benchmark manipulation case, the court stated without qualification that using 'domestic wires to carry out [a] fraudulent scheme' is 'clearly sufficient' for domestic application. Some courts tried to explain this apparent divergence on the ground that Laydon was civil and Hayes criminal.[85] But the court in United States v. Gasperini,[86]

74 777 F.3d 125 (3d Cir. 2015).

75 544 U.S. 349 (2005).

76 Id. at 371–72 (internal citation omitted).This statement was made obiter in that the Court held that the case involved a domestic application of the statute. Id.

77 764 F.3d 129 (2d Cir. 2014), rev'd on other grounds sub nom. RJR Nabisco, Inc. v. European Community, 136 S. Ct. 2090 (2016).

78 Id. at 141 (quoting Morrison, 561 U.S. at 263).

79 Id. at 142.

80 Id.

81 No. 12-cv-3419-GBD, 2015 WL 1515487 (S.D.N.Y. 31 March 2015).

82 Id. at *1, *9.

83 Id. at *8–9.

84 99 F. Supp. 3d 409 (S.D.N.Y. 2015).

85 See Sonterra Cap. Master Fund v. Credit Suisse Grp., 277 F. Supp. 3d 521, 581 (S.D.N.Y. 2017); see also FrontPoint Asian Event Driven Fund, L.P. v. Citibank, N.A., No. 16-cv-5263-AKH, 2017 WL 3600425, at *15 (S.D.N.Y. 18 August 2017).

86 No. 16-cr-441-NGG, 2017 WL 2399693 (E.D.N.Y. 1 June 2017).

a criminal case, applied a Laydon-like analysis to hold that the focus of the wire fraud statute is 'the scheme to defraud', and that domestic application of Section 1343 requires 'a substantial amount of conduct in the United States' that is 'integral to the commission of the scheme'.[87]

After several years of confusion, the Second Circuit imposed a measure of order in Bascuñán v. Elsaca.[88] Bascuñán was a civil RICO case (with a wire fraud predicate) in which the plaintiff alleged that the defendant, acting abroad, had fraudulently used domestic wires to obtain funds from New York bank accounts.[89] The Second Circuit noted that the critical issue, the focus of the wire fraud statute 'for the purpose of the presumption against extraterritoriality [was] a question of first impression in [the] circuit'.[90] The court rejected the view that the wire fraud statute gives way unless the scheme to defraud is 'planned, managed, and directed' from the United States.[91] It reasoned that the focus of Section 1343 'is not merely a scheme to defraud, but more precisely the use of the . . . wires in furtherance of a scheme to defraud'.[92] The court went on to observe that the Supreme Court, and other courts of appeals, 'though not in the context of applying the presumption against extraterritoriality [had] described the focus' of the wire fraud statute in precisely those terms.[93] But not just any wire furthering a scheme would do. Because 'incidental' domestic conduct is not enough to trigger United States law, use of the wires 'must be essential' to, or 'a core component of', the scheme to defraud.[94] Applying this standard to the facts was straightforward, in that the defendant allegedly had used domestic wires to fraudulently 'transfer millions of dollars' out of domestic bank accounts – clearly a core component of the scheme.[95]

Bascuñán therefore goes some distance toward resolving the confusion that persisted after European Community. Still, open questions remain. In November 2019, the Second Circuit heard arguments regarding the application of Bascuñán to honest services fraud.[96] In addition, it remains to be seen whether other courts of appeals will follow Bascuñán. The Sixth and Ninth Circuits have reached the same basic conclusion, albeit in non-precedential opinions.[97] And (as the Second 87 Id. at *7–8; see also United States v. All Assets Held at Bank Julius, 251 F. Supp. 3d 82, 103 (D.D.C. 27 April 2017) (applying the same test).

88 927 F.3d 108 (2d Cir. 2019).

89 Id. at 112–15, 123.

90 Id. at 121.

91 Id. at 121, 123.

92 Id. (internal quotation marks and original emphasis omitted).

93 Id. at 122 (citing Skilling v. United States, 561 U.S. 358, 369 n.1 (2010); United States v. Garlick, 240 F.3d 789, 792 (9th Cir. 2001); United States v. Alston, 609 F.2d 531, 536 (D.C. Cir. 1979); United States v. Jefferson, 674 F.3d 33, 336 (4th Cir. 2012)).

94 Id. at 122–23.

95 Id. at 123.

96 See United States v. Napout et al., 18-2750-cr, 18-2820-cr (CON) (2d. Cir. argued 7 November 2019).

97 See United States v. Driver, 692 F. App'x 448, 449 (9th Cir. 2017) ('The focus of the mail and wire fraud statutes is upon the misuse of the instrumentality of communication.' (internal alterations Circuit observed in Bascuñán) other courts, including the Supreme Court, have concluded outside the extraterritoriality context that the focus of the wire fraud statute is the use of domestic wires in furtherance of a scheme to defraud.[98]

29.6 Commodity Exchange Act

The Commodity Exchange Act (CEA), enforced by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC), regulates markets in commodities. This broad category embraces 'all services, rights and interests . . . in which contracts for future delivery are presently or in the future dealt in', covering not only traditional commodities like agricultural products,[99] but 'currency and other financial instruments'.[100]

The CEA is aimed at protecting the 'individual investor – who may know little about the intricacies and complexities of the commodities market – from being deceived or misled'.[101] To that end, the statute contains several antifraud provisions.[102] Section 22(a) of the CEA 'establishes a private right of action for individual litigants in four, limited circumstances';[103] in addition, the CFTC may pursue violations through enforcement actions, and the DOJ may bring criminal charges for certain violations.

'Prior to Morrison, courts deciding commodities cases applied the same conduct or effects test as was used in the securities context.'[104] But Morrison prompted courts to revisit those precedents. In Loginovskaya v. Batratchenko,[105] the Second Circuit held that the CEA's private right of action provision, Section 22, 'is silent as to extraterritorial reach' and therefore lacks extraterritorial application.[106] The court then considered the provision's domestic reach. It concluded that the focus of Section 22 is on transactions in commodities, just as the focus of Section 10(b) was found in Morrison to be transactions in securities. Accordingly, the court concluded, private suits under the CEA 'must be based on transactions occurring in the territory of the United States'.[107] The court further held that in determining whether a given transaction is domestic, the irrevocable liability test developed omitted)); United States v. Coffman, 574 F. App'x 541, 558 (6th Cir. 2014) ('[W]ire fraud occurs in the United States when defendants use interstate wires as part of their scheme.').

98 See case cited supra note 93.

99 7 U.S.C. § 1a(9).

100 Salomon Forex Inc. v. Tauber, 795 F. Supp. 768, 771 (E.D. Va. 1992).

101 Loginovskaya v. Batratchenko, 936 F. Supp. 2d 357, 363 (S.D.N.Y. 2013), aff'd, 764 F.3d 266 (2d Cir. 2014).

102 Id.

103 Id. at 364.

104 Id. at 367.

105 764 F.3d 266 (2d Cir. 2014).

106 Id. at 271.

107 Id. at 272. The Second Circuit observed in a later case that the relevant portion of the CEA 'does not contain language similar to the language in § 10(b) that led Morrison to craft the "domestic exchange" prong' of its two-pronged test for domestic application (i.e., transactions in securities registered on domestic exchanges, or domestic transactions in other securities). Myun-Uk Choi v. Tower Research Capital LLC, 890 F.3d 60, 67 (2d Cir. 2018). The court 'le[ft] aside whether in the securities context should govern.[108] Therefore, in the Second Circuit, a transaction in a commodity will be regarded as domestic if 'the transfer of title or the point of irrevocable liability . . . occurred in the United States'.[109] Courts applying this standard have stressed the need for plaintiffs to plead and prove facts demonstrating 'the location of the transactions' at issue, including 'the formation of . . . contracts, the placement of orders, the passing of title and the exchange of money'.[110] It is insufficient for the plaintiff to show that he or she is a 'US resident who engaged in . . . futures transactions' from the United States, without proof of 'the location of the transactions themselves'.[111] In addition, the Second Circuit has extended the rule of Parkcentral,[112] originally developed in the securities context, to CEA cases. A domestic transaction is therefore necessary but not sufficient for an action under Section 22.[113]

Loginovskaya's statement that Section 22 is 'silent as to extraterritorial reach' is subject to a potential qualification.[114] As the court observed, Dodd-Frank amendments to the CEA altered the statute's reach in a limited set of cases:

> [Dodd-Frank] amended CEA Section 22 to cover swaps, and provided that its 'provisions . . . relating to swaps' may, under certain circumstances, 'apply to activities outside the United States'.[115]

Specifically, the CEA provisions regulating swaps apply to activities outside the United States that (1) 'have a direct and significant connection with activities in, or effect on, commerce of the United States', or (2) contravene CFTC rules or regulations aimed at preventing 'the evasion of any provision' added to the CEA

Morrison's discussion of exchanges is applicable to the CEA', concluding that the 'domestic transaction' test was satisfied on the facts before it. Id.

108 See Loginovskaya, 764 F.3d at 274; supra Section 29.2.2.

109 Id.

110 Sullivan v. Barclays PLC, No. 13-cv-2811-PKC, 2017 WL 685570, at *29 (S.D.N.Y. 21 February 2017).

111 Id.

112 See case cited supra notes 36–39 and related text.

113 See Prime Int'l, 2019 WL 4062219, at *6–8. Prime Int'l was similar to Parkcentral in that the plaintiffs, acting in the United States, traded derivatives pegged to a foreign asset, whose price was allegedly affected by purely foreign conduct (producing losses on the domestic derivatives trades). Id. at *2–3, *8. The court held that plaintiffs were required to show not only a domestic transaction that would satisfy § 22, but domestic conduct that violated a substantive, conduct-regulating provision of the CEA. Id. at *7.

114 764 F.3d at 271.

115 Id. at 271 n.4.

through Dodd-Frank.[116] Because Loginovskaya did not involve swaps, the court took 'no view of the effect that the Dodd-Frank amendments may have on the extraterritorial reach of the CEA'.[117]

Some questions of extraterritoriality play out differently in the context of enforcement actions, as opposed to private actions.[118] To begin, several provisions in the CEA expressly grant the CFTC regulatory and enforcement authority over certain conduct involving foreign elements. The statute permits the CFTC to adopt rules proscribing fraud concerning transactions or instruments made on or subject to the rules of foreign exchanges or markets, so long as the regulated behavior is committed by 'any person located in the United States'; it also grants the Commission authority to enforce those rules through lawsuits.[119]

In addition, because enforcement actions do not rely on the transaction-focused private right of action in Section 22, it is likely that some such actions will be permitted to proceed as domestic applications of the CEA based on territorial connections other than US transactions. For example, the Second Circuit has held that the anti-fraud provisions Sections 6(c)(1)[120] and 9(a)(2)[121] centre on manipulation of commodities markets and prices, not on transactions.[122] Similarly, Section 4o, another anti-fraud provision, prohibits commodity trading advisors, and associated individuals or entities, from defrauding clients – without any requirement that the fraud occur in connection with a transaction in a commodity.[123] Given that the provision is not transaction-based, there appears to be no warrant for applying Morrison's 'domestic transaction' test in this context.[124]

---

116 7 U.S.C. § 2(i). Dodd-Frank's limited revision of the extraterritorial reach of the CEA stands in contrast to its (attempted) wholesale revision of the extraterritorial reach of the Exchange Act: While § 929P of Dodd-Frank appears aimed at restoring the conduct-and-effects test in all SEC and criminal actions under the anti-fraud provisions of the Exchange Act, see supra Section 29.2.2, no such sweeping provision was made for CEA cases.

117 764 F.3d at 271 n.4. The Second Circuit again declined to consider the effect of Dodd-Frank's swaps provisions in Prime Int'l Trading, Ltd. v. BP P.L.C., --- F.3d ----, 2019 WL 4062219 (2d Cir. 29 August 2019), concluding that the plaintiffs had forfeited the argument that the CEA applied extraterritorially on that basis. See id. at *5.

118 See id. ('[T]he CEA draws a distinction between the extraterritoriality limits on a private action and enforcement actions brought by the CFTC itself.'); CFTC v. Vision Fin. Partners, LLC, 19 F. Supp. 3d 1126, 1131 (S.D. Fla. 2016) (distinguishing, for purposes of extraterritoriality, between private actions and 'suits brought by the Commission itself').

119 Vision Fin. Partners, LLC, 190 F. Supp. 3d at *1131 (quoting 7 U.S.C. § 6(b)(2)).

120 'It shall be unlawful for any person, directly or indirectly, to use or employ, or attempt to use or employ, in connection with any swap, or a contract of sale of any commodity in interstate commerce, or for future delivery on or subject to the rules of any registered entity, any manipulative or deceptive device or contrivance . . . .' 7 U.S.C. § 9(a)(1).

121 'It shall be a felony . . . for . . . [a]ny person to manipulate or attempt to manipulate the price of any commodity in interstate commerce . . . .' 7 U.S.C. § 13(a)(2).

122 Prime Int'l, 2019 WL 4062219, at *8–9.

123 Loginovskaya, 936 F. Supp. 2d at 368.

124 Id. at 369 ('Morrison's transaction test is not immediately applicable to § 4o.').

Antitrust 29.7

On its face, the Sherman Act proscribes 'every contract, combination . . . or conspiracy in restraint of trade', but the Supreme Court has held that the Act 'outlaw[s] only unreasonable restraints'.[125] Most trade practices are evaluated under the rule of reason, which requires a determination whether, in all the circumstances, 'a restrictive practice should be prohibited as imposing an unreasonable restraint on competition.'[126] But horizontal cartel activity – outright collusion among competitors – is a per se violation of the Sherman Act.[127] The antitrust laws are enforced both civilly and criminally, with criminal enforcement generally limited to per se violations.[128]

In Hartford Fire Insurance Co v. California, decided in 1993, the Supreme Court declared it 'well established by now that the Sherman Act applies to foreign conduct that was meant to produce and did in fact produce some substantial effect in the United States'.[129] That formulation tracked the 'effects' test that Morrison would reject in 2010.[130] Arguably, then, Morrison may be read to have called into question the continued vitality of Hartford Fire.[131]

But Morrison has not prompted broad reconsideration of the extraterritorial reach of the Sherman Act, likely for two reasons. First, it may be possible to harmonise Morrison and Hartford Fire. In Morrison, it was held that lower courts had been wrong not to apply the presumption against extraterritoriality in cases where the effects test was satisfied, and should in the future apply the presumption in all cases.[132] One reading of Hartford Fire is that the presumption against extraterritoriality is rebutted in Sherman Act cases; that is, the Court's 'effects' language was offered not as a reason to avoid applying the presumption (which would contravene Morrison), but as a description of the extraterritorial reach of a statute that overcomes the presumption. Although the majority did not say as much (or mention the presumption at all), the author of the judgment, Justice Scalia, took that view in dissent: 'We have . . . found the presumption to be overcome with respect to our antitrust laws.'[133]

125 Leegin Creative Leather Prods., Inc. v. PSKS, Inc., 551 U.S. 877, 885 (2007) quoting 15 U.S.C. § 1) (emphasis added).

126 Id. (internal quotation marks omitted).

127 Id. at 893.

128 See D. Daniel Sokol, Reinvigorating Criminal Antitrust?, 60 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 1545, 1572–73 (2019).

129 509 U.S. 764, 795–96 (1993).

130 See Schoenbaum v. Firstbrook, 405 F.2d 200, 208 (2d Cir. 1968) (citing United States v. Aluminum Co. of Am., 148 F.2d 416, 443–44 (2d Cir. 1945)).

131 See Julie Rose O'Sullivan, The Extraterritorial Application of Federal Criminal Statutes: Analytical Roadmap, Normative Conclusion, and a Plea to Congress for Direction, 106 Geo. L.J. 1021, 1049–52 (2018) (noting apparent tension between the Court's antitrust cases and Morrison).

132 See Morrison, 561 U.S. at 256–61.

133 Hartford Fire, 509 U.S. at 813.

Second, when Congress adopted the Foreign Trade Antitrust Improvements Act (FTAIA), it 'expressly endorsed an extraterritorial application of the Sherman Act'.[134] The FTAIA first provides that all foreign commercial activity (except import commerce, namely commerce between foreign sellers and domestic buyers) is 'outside the Sherman Act's reach', but then 'brings such conduct back within' the Act if:[135]

> (1) the foreign conduct has a 'direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable effect' on US domestic, import or certain export commerce; and (2) that effect 'gives rise to a claim under' the Sherman Act.[136]

This standard is similar (but not identical) to Hartford Fire's rule.[137] Therefore, in antitrust cases involving foreign conduct, there are two related but conceptually distinct paths to extraterritorial application. Foreign activity not subject to the FTAIA (i.e., import commerce) is tested under Hartford Fire.[138] Other foreign activity is tested under the similar formulation set out in the FTAIA.[139]

It is therefore clear that the Sherman Act may reach extraterritorial conduct based on domestic effects. For example, in civil cases arising from the manipulation of benchmark interest rates by non-US traders working for defendant banks, courts applied the FTAIA to conclude that conduct occurring abroad was reachable where it affected the price of financial products sold domestically: '[M]

134 Sonterra Cap. Master Fund v. Credit Suisse Grp., 277 F. Supp. 3d 521, 569 (S.D.N.Y. 2017) (internal quotation marks omitted). The FTAIA provides an independent basis for extraterritorial application of the antitrust laws – separate from Hartford Fire – because Hartford Fire expressly disclaimed any reliance on the FTAIA. 509 U.S. at 796 n.23.

135 F. Hoffman-La Roche Ltd. v. Empagran S.A., 542 U.S. 155, 162 (2004).

136 Lotes Co., Ltd. v. Hon Hai Precision Indus. Co., 753 F.3d 395, 413–14 (2d Cir. 2014) (citations omitted) (quoting 15 U.S.C. § 6a).

137 In addition to requiring that the effect on commerce be 'direct', see United States v. LSL Biotechnologies, 379 F.3d 672, 679–80 (9th Cir. 2004), the FTAIA eliminated the requirement that the foreign actor intend to affect US commerce – a product of Congress's determination that a subjective intent-based standard was undesirable and should be replaced with a 'single, objective test'. H.R. Rep. No. 97-686, at 2–3, 9 (1982); see United States v. Hui Hsiung, 778 F.3d 738, 748 (9th Cir. 2015) ('[T]he FTAIA's requirement that the defendants' conduct had a 'direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable' effect on domestic commerce displaced the intentionality requirement of Hartford Fire where the FTAIA applies.').

138 See Minn-Chem, Inc. v. Agrium, Inc., 683 F.3d 845, 855 (7th Cir. 2012) ('[T]he Sherman Act covers imports when actual and intended effects on US commerce have been shown. In Hartford Fire, the Supreme Court confirmed this rule, stating that "the Sherman Act covers foreign conduct producing a substantial intended effect in the United States."' (quoting Hartford Fire, 509 U.S. at 797)). Of course, for entities that direct goods into domestic commerce through importing activity, the requisite effects will generally be easily proved.

139 Id. at 855–56.

anipulation of a benchmark that is globally disseminated and serves as a pricing component of derivatives sold widely in the United States . . . would have a foreseeable effect within the United States.'[140]

The case law is less clear about what domestic effects count. The Ninth Circuit has interpreted 'direct' in the first prong of the FTAIA – 'direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable effect' – to require that the domestic effect follow 'as an immediate consequence of the defendant's activity'.[141] Other courts, including the Second and Seventh Circuits, have embraced what appears to be a weaker conception of directness, expressly rejecting the Ninth Circuit's position and holding that 'the term "direct" means only a reasonably proximate causal nexus.'[142] Despite this overt disagreement, however, there may be little daylight between the competing approaches. The Ninth Circuit has upheld convictions arising from a foreign price-fixing conspiracy where the conspirators fixed the prices of components that were sold abroad and then incorporated into products sold domestically, reasoning that 'the practical upshot of the conspiracy would be and was increased prices to customers in the United States.'[143] In so doing, the court approvingly quoted Seventh Circuit case law contrasting sufficiently direct effects with 'action in a foreign country [that] filters through many layers and finally causes a few ripples in the United States'.[144] In practice – although the precise contours of the rule are unclear – it appears that any of these courts would apply the FTAIA to some foreign anticompetitive conduct that is a step removed from any domestic effects.[145]

Finally, some territorial constraints on private antitrust actions may not apply, or apply differently, in enforcement or criminal actions. For example, in Motorola Mobility LLC v. AU Optronics Corp,[146] the Seventh Circuit held that the plaintiff's private action failed under the FTAIA requirement that domestic effects on commerce 'give rise to' the claim, as well as the indirect-purchaser doctrine.[147] But the court cautioned that '[i]f price fixing by the component manufacturers had 140 Sonterra, 277 F. Supp. 3d at 569; Sullivan v. Barclays PLC, No. 13-cv-2811-PKC, 2017 WL 685570, at *22 (S.D.N.Y. 21 February 2017) ('Defendants also point to the Europe-based conduct of defendants, even though the FTAIA's express language and the decisions applying it focus on the anti-competitive effects within the United States.').

141 LSL Biotechnologies, 379 F.3d at 680.

142 Lotes Co., 753 F.3d at 410 (internal quotation marks omitted); see Minn-Chem, 683 F.3d at 856–57 (rejecting the Ninth Circuit's test in favour of the 'reasonably proximate causal nexus' formulation).

143 Hsiung, 778 F.3d at 759.

144 Id. (quoting Minn-Chem, 683 F.3d at 860).

145 Underscoring the lack of practical difference between the two standards, the defendants in Hsiung filed a petition for certiorari arguing that the Ninth Circuit's conception of directness was weaker than the Seventh Circuit's. See Pet. for Certiorari 15–16, Hsiung v. United States, No. 14-1121 (16 March 2015), cert. denied, 135 S. Ct. 2837 (15 June 2015).

146 775 F.3d 816 (7th Cir. 2015).

147 Id. at 819–23.

the requisite statutory effect on cell phone prices in the United States, the Act would not block the Department of Justice from seeking criminal or injunctive remedies.'[148]

29.8 Foreign Corrupt Practices Act

The Foreign Corrupt Practices Act regulates certain persons and entities by proscribing bribery of foreign officials. The FCPA also prohibits issuers of US securities from falsifying its books and records.[149] As its name suggests, the FCPA applies extraterritorially.[150] But even 'when a statute provides for some extraterritorial application, the presumption against extraterritoriality operates to limit that provision to its terms.'[151] The FCPA sets out with 'surgical precision' the circumstances in which its anti-bribery provisions apply.[152] Specifically, these provisions reach (1) issuers of securities registered on US exchanges or that file periodic reports with the SEC that use interstate commerce in furtherance of a bribery scheme (issuers), (2) United States companies or persons that use interstate commerce in furtherance of a bribery scheme (domestic concerns) and (3) 'foreign persons or businesses taking acts to further certain corrupt schemes, including ones causing the payment of bribes, while present in the United States'.[153] In addition, the statute reaches 'any officer, director, employee, or agent' acting on behalf of a covered entity.[154]

In published guidance and enforcement actions, the government has taken a broad view of the kind of conduct that will render a largely foreign scheme subject to US jurisdiction. Jointly published guidance from the SEC and DOJ states that the use-of-commerce requirement would be satisfied by any telephone call, email, text message or fax to the United States, or by 'sending a wire transfer . . . to a US bank or otherwise using the US banking system'.[155] The government has asserted this view in enforcement actions. For example, in United States v. JGC Corp, a Japanese defendant was charged with FCPA violations arising from a scheme to bribe Nigerian officials. The jurisdictional theory was that 'certain alleged bribe payments . . . flowed through US bank accounts and that co-conspirators 148 Id. at 825. Indeed, the same cartel activity was successfully prosecuted in Hsiung. See also Empagran, 542 U.S. at 170–71 (concluding that plaintiffs' private action failed under the 'give rise to' requirement because their injury flowed purely from foreign effects, and distinguishing earlier cases permitting the government to seek 'relief that might have helped to protect those injured abroad' on the ground that the government enjoys 'broad' authority to 'seek to obtain the relief necessary to protect the public from further anticompetitive harm').

149 15 U.S.C. §§ 78dd-1–3, 78m.

150 See United States v. Hoskins, 902 F.3d 69, 96 (2d Cir. 2018).

151 Morrison, 561 U.S. at 265.

152 Hoskins, 902 F.3d at 84.

153 Id. at 71; see 15 U.S.C. § 78dd-1–3.

154 Id. An agent of a foreign person or business is covered only for acts that occur 'while in the territory of the United States'. 15 U.S.C. § 78dd-3.

155 Criminal Division of the US Department of Justice and Enforcement Division of the US Securities and Exchange Commission, A Resource Guide to the US Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (2012) (FCPA Resource Guide), at 11.

faxed or e-mailed information into the United States in furtherance of the bribery scheme.'[156] The case was resolved through a deferred prosecution agreement (DPA) so the issue was not litigated.[157]

FCPA actions are frequently resolved without adversarial litigation, through plea agreements, DPAs, non-prosecution agreements (NPAs), or SEC 'neither admit nor deny' settlements, so aggressive theories of jurisdiction have rarely been subjected to judicial scrutiny.[158] When they have been, results have been mixed. In United States v. Patel, the defendant was not an issuer or a domestic concern (or acting on behalf of such an entity), meaning that he was subject to the FCPA only for acts taken 'while in the territory of the United States'.[159] The government charged an FCPA count based on the defendant's mailing a DHL package from London to the United States.[160] The government acknowledged the requirement of territorial conduct, but argued that this element was satisfied based on separate conduct that formed the basis for a different count; that is, the government theorised that once any domestic conduct was proved, further FCPA counts could be charged based on purely foreign acts.[161] The court disagreed, reasoning that each charged violation had to have occurred while in US territory.[162] In SEC v. Straub,[163] the defendants were officers of an issuer – making the requirement of territorial conduct inapplicable – but the government still had to prove that they had used interstate commerce to further their bribery scheme.[164] The government alleged that the defendants had sent e-mails that were 'routed through and/or stored' on US servers.[165] The defendants argued that this element contained a mens rea requirement, so that conviction was improper without proof that they knew the emails would be routed through or stored in the United States.[166] The court, addressing 'a matter of first impression in the FCPA context', sided with the government, concluding that the defendants were subject to the FCPA even if they lacked knowledge that their conduct involved interstate commerce.[167]

In addition to pressing aggressive interpretations of the FCPA's textual coverage, the government has also sought to expand the statute's reach through conspiracy and complicity theories. Two recent decisions diverge on whether the government may so employ principles of secondary liability to reach individuals

156 Mike Koehler, The Foreign Corrupt Practices Act in a New Era 110 (2014); see Information 10–17, United States v. JGC Corp., No. 11-cr-260 (S.D. Tex. 6 April 2011).

157 See Deferred Prosecution Agreement, United States v. JGC Corp., No. 11-cr-260 (S.D. Tex. 6 April 2011).

158 See Koehler, supra note 156, at 60–63.

159 15 U.S.C. § 78dd-3(a).

160 Tr. 7–10, United States v. Patel, No. 09-cr-335 (D.D.C. 12 August 2011), ECF No. 434.

161 Id.

162 Id. at 11, 29.

163 921 F. Supp. 2d 244 (S.D.N.Y. 2013).

164 Id. at 260, 262.

165 Id. at 262.

166 Id.

167 Id. at 263–64.

who would not otherwise be subject to the FCPA. In United States v. Hoskins,[168] prosecutors argued that the defendant, a foreign national employed by a French company who never entered the United States during the alleged scheme, was criminally liable for conspiring with and aiding and abetting employees of his company's US subsidiary in a scheme to bribe Indonesian officials.[169] The Second Circuit rejected that view. The court reasoned that the statute's text and legislative history evinced an affirmative legislative policy to limit liability to the categories of individuals and entities described therein; the government could not override that choice by charging individuals outside those categories under conspiracy or complicity theories.[170] In any event, wrote the court, the presumption against extraterritoriality limits the FCPA's extraterritoriality provisions to their terms, and '[t]he government may not expand the extraterritorial reach of the FCPA by recourse to the conspiracy and complicity statutes.'[171] But a judge in the Northern District of Illinois expressly broke with Hoskins in United States v. Firtash,[172] concluding that Seventh Circuit precedent on conspiracy and accomplice liability commanded the opposite result.[173] The court permitted the government to proceed against two defendants, neither of whom belonged to 'the class of individuals capable of committing a substantive FCPA violation', on theories of secondary liability.[174] At trial, the district court instructed the jury that an agency relationship requires the following: 'one, a manifestation by the principal that the agent will act for it; two, acceptance by the agent of the undertaking; and, three, an understanding between the agent and the principal that the principal will be in control of the undertaking'. [175] The jury convicted.[176]

Even if Hoskins gains wide acceptance among federal courts, the SEC and DOJ are not without tools to reach overseas conduct by foreign nationals. The statute reaches not only issuers and domestic concerns, but their officers, directors, employees and agents.[177] Therefore, in Hoskins, the Second Circuit sustained the indictment to the extent it was based on the theory that the defendant acted as an agent of a domestic concern (i.e., the defendant's company's US subsidiary).[178]

The statute does not by its terms extend to foreign subsidiaries of US issuers or domestic concerns. But the government's published guidance states its position that US parents may be held liable for the conduct of their foreign subsidiaries 'under traditional agency principles'.[179] If the government determines that there

168 902 F.3d 69 (2d Cir. 2018).
169 Id. at 72–76.
170 Id. at 76–95.
171 Id. at 95–97.
172 392 F. Supp. 3d 872 (N.D. Ill. 2019).
173 Id. at *11–13.
174 Id. at *11; see id. at *11–13.
175 Trial Tr. 1246–47, United States v. Hoskins (D. Conn. 6 November 2019).
176 Jury Verdict, United States v. Hoskins (D. Conn. 8 November 2019), ECF No. 583.
177 15 U.S.C. §§ 78dd-1–2.
178 See Hoskins, 902 F.3d at 98.
179 FCPA Resource Guide, supra note 155, at 27.

exists an agency relationship between the parent and its subsidiary – based on such factors as 'the parent's control – including the parent's knowledge and direction of the subsidiary's actions, both generally and in the context of the specific transaction', it will view the parent as 'liable for bribery committed by the subsidiary's employees'.[180]

Sanctions 29.9

Starting in earnest in the aftermath of World War I, the United States has pursued its foreign policy goals through imposition of economic sanctions, namely 'the deliberate withdrawal of normal economic relations between [the US] and a target country, government, entity, or individual in order to coerce the target to modify its behavior in a manner consistent with' US policy goals.[181] The statutory basis for most modern sanctions programmes is the International Emergency Economic Powers Act of 1977,[182] which grants the executive broad economic regulatory authority to respond to threats against 'the national security, foreign policy, or economy of the United States'.[183] US sanctions are administered by the Treasury Department's Office of Foreign Assets Control (OFAC), which may impose civil penalties for non-compliance.[184] In addition, the DOJ may seek criminal penalties for wilful violations, including imprisonment and fines up to US$1 million.[185]

See Chapter 26 on fines, disgorgement, etc.

Sanctions programmes 'vary greatly in scope and objective'.[186] OFAC's 'country-based' programmes are aimed at governments, and its 'list-based programmes' are targeted at specific persons.[187] Under list-based programmes, designated entities and individuals are added to OFAC's Specially Designated Nationals and Blocked Persons List (SDN List), which is regularly updated and

180 Id.

181 Court E. Golumbic & Robert S. Ruff III, Leveraging the Three Core Competencies: How OFAC Licensing Optimizes Holistic Sanctions, 38 N.C. J. Int'l L. & Com. Reg. 729, 731 (2013).

182 Pub. L. No. 95-223, 91 Stat. 1625 (1997), codified as amended at 50 U.S.C. §§ 1701–1707.

183 50 U.S.C. §§ 1701–1702.

184 Id. § 1705(b).

185 Id. § 1705(a), (c).

186 Golumbic & Ruff III, supra note 181, at 732; see id. at 770 (describing the operation of various programs, from the Cuba program's 'near total embargo on all goods and services' to programmes that 'are not tied to a geographic region, but instead target persons deemed to be engaged in' certain illicit activities).

187 Perry S. Bechky, Sanctions and the Blurred Boundaries of Int'l Economic Law, 83 Mo. L. Rev. 1, 4 (2018).

publicly accessible.[188] Once added to the list, '[t]heir assets are blocked and US persons are generally prohibited from dealing with them'[189] unless authorised by OFAC through a licence.[190]

The territorial reach of a given sanctions programme turns on the particular regulations that define its scope. Many prohibitions apply by their terms only to 'US persons',[191] a term that includes 'any United States citizen, permanent resident alien, entity organized under the laws of the United States or any jurisdiction within the United States (including foreign branches), or any person in the United States'.[192] Such prohibitions therefore apply on the basis of both nationality (including the foreign branches of domestic entities) and territoriality (as to foreign nationals). They are broad enough to reach any transactions made using the US financial system – even transactions beginning and terminating abroad that simply pass through domestic correspondent banks (as US dollar-denominated transactions generally do).[193] Moreover, sanctions applicable to Iran and Cuba apply even more broadly, reaching all persons 'subject to the jurisdiction of the United States' – a category embracing (in addition to US citizens or residents, persons in the United States, and US entities) any organisation owned or controlled by a US citizen, resident or entity.[194]

Secondary sanctions, a feature of several US sanctions programmes, are a cousin to extraterritorial primary sanctions.[195] Like primary sanctions (i.e., compliance obligations, the violation of which is civilly or criminally punishable) that 188 See OFAC, Specially Designated Nationals and Blocked Persons List (4 September 2019), available at treasury.gov/ofac/downloads/sdnlist.pdf (last visited 4 September 2019). OFAC also maintains several non-SDN sanctions lists – collected in the Consolidated Sanctions List – including the Foreign Sanctions Evaders List and the Sectoral Sanctions Identifications List. See OFAC, List of Foreign Sanctions Evaders Sanctioned Pursuant to Executive Order 13608 (7 February 2019), available at https://www.treasury.gov/ofac/downloads/fse/fselist.pdf (last visited 12 November 2019) (including entities and individuals determined to have 'engag[ed] in conduct relating to the evasion of US economic and financial sanctions with respect to Iran or Syria'); OFAC, Sectoral Sanctions Identifications List (15 August 2018), available at https://www.treasury.gov/ofac/downloads/ssi/ssilist.pdf (last visited 12 November 2019) (including 'persons determined by OFAC to be operating in' certain sectors of the Russian economy identified by the Secretary of the Treasury).

189 OFAC, Specially Designated Nationals and Blocked Persons List (SDN), available at https://www.treasury.gov/resource-center/sanctions/SDN-List/Pages/default.aspx (last visited 12 November 2019).

190 See Golumbic & Ruff III, supra note 181, at 778 ('OFAC issues two types of licenses: (1) general licenses, which are made public and provide universal exemptions to a given set of sanctions, and (2) specific licenses, which are granted only upon application and authorize only the applicant to engage in a specific transaction or category of transaction.' (footnotes omitted)).

191 See, e.g., 31 C.F.R. § 542.206 (prohibiting new investment in Syria by a United States person).

192 See, e.g., 31 C.F.R. § 542.319 (defining the term for purposes of Syrian sanctions).

193 See United States v. $1,071,251.44 of Funds Associated with Mingzheng Int'l Trading Ltd., 324 F. Supp. 3d 38, 43, 52 (D.D.C. 2018); United States v. All Assets Held at Bank Julius, 251 F. Supp. 3d 82, 95 (D.D.C. 2017), reconsideration granted in part on other grounds sub nom. United States v. All Assets Held at Bank Julius, Baer & Co., Ltd., 315 F. Supp. 3d 90 (D.D.C. 2018).

194 See 31 C.F.R. § 515.329 (Cuba); id. § 535.329 (Iran).

195 Bechky, supra note 187, at 9.

apply extraterritorially, secondary sanctions apply to conduct occurring outside the United States.[196] But unlike primary sanctions, secondary sanctions are not enforced by fines or imprisonment. Instead, secondary sanctions threaten economic restrictions on a third-party country or its citizens for certain conduct, generally transacting with a target of primary sanctions.[197] For example, the Iran Sanctions Act, enacted in 1996 and amended several times since, 'mandated the imposition of specified sanctions against foreign firms that reached threshold levels of involvement with Iran's energy sector'.[198] Such secondary sanctions are not extraterritorial in the sense of extending US regulatory jurisdiction to foreign conduct – they are not backed by coercive measures like fines or imprisonment – but they can carry significant consequences for violators, and have at times been 'condemned as "extraterritorially" illegal' by US trading partners.[199]

Money laundering 29.10

The Money Laundering Control Act (MLCA) prohibits (among other conduct) engaging in a financial transaction involving the proceeds of 'specified unlawful activity', or transporting money into or from the United States, with intent to promote or conceal specified unlawful activity.[200] The term 'specified unlawful activity' embraces more than 250 predicate offences.[201] The government need only prove that the defendant intended to promote or conceal the specified unlawful conduct, not that he or she actually committed the predicate offence (or even had the capacity to do so).[202]

Section 1956 provides that:

> There is extraterritorial jurisdiction over the conduct prohibited by this section if: (1) the conduct is by a United States citizen or, in the case of a non-United States citizen, the conduct occurs in part in the United States; and (2) the transaction or series of related transactions involves funds or monetary instruments of a value exceeding $10,000.[203]

This express provision overcomes the presumption against extraterritoriality.

196 See id.

197 See Jeffrey A. Meyer, Second Thoughts on Secondary Sanctions, 30 U. Pa. J. Int'l L. 905, 926 (2009).

198 See United States v. Amirnazmi, 645 F.3d 564, 579 (3d Cir. 2011) (citing Iran Sanctions Act, Pub. L. No. 104-72, 110 Stat. 1541 (1996) (codified in part at 50 U.S.C. § 1701 (note))).

199 Meyer, supra note 197, at 929.

200 18 U.S.C. § 1956(a)(1), (2).

201 United States v. Santos, 553 U.S. 507, 516 (2008).

202 United States v. Kozeny, 493 F. Supp. 2d 693, 706 (S.D.N.Y. 2007), aff'd, 541 F.3d 166 (2d Cir. 2008) ("The elements of a money laundering offense do not include, or even implicate, the capacity to commit the underlying unlawful activity.').

203 18 U.S.C. § 1956(f).

A number of courts have addressed the requirement (applicable only in cases in which the defendant is not a US citizen) that 'the conduct occurs in part in the United States.'[204] This requirement does not mean that the defendant must have been physically present in the United States.[205] Courts have held that, irrespective of the defendant's physical presence, 'a transfer from a foreign account to an account in a US financial institution and a transfer from a US account to a foreign financial institution occur in part in the United States under 18 USC Section 1956(f).'[206] Fewer cases have addressed whether Section 1956(f) is satisfied by a transfer from one foreign bank to another that passes through a correspondent or intermediate bank in the United States.[207] On this issue, results have been mixed.[208]

Because the MLCA applies extraterritorially and does not require proof that the defendant engaged (or had the capacity to engage) in specified unlawful activity, prosecutors may use the statute to charge individuals otherwise beyond the reach of US criminal law. For example, foreign officials who take bribes are not subject to FCPA liability. But foreign officials have been prosecuted under the money laundering statute for engaging in transactions to promote or conceal FCPA violations they are incapable of committing.[209]

204 18 U.S.C. § 1956(f)(1).

205 United States v. Stein, No. 93-cr-375, 1994 WL 285020, at *4–5 (E.D. La. 23 June 1994).

206 United States v. Firtash, 392 F. Supp. 3d 872 (N.D. Ill. 2019), No. 13-cr-515, 2019 WL 2568569, at *9; see United States v. All Assets Held at Bank Julius, 251 F. Supp. 3d 82, 93 (D.D.C. 2017), reconsideration granted in part on other grounds sub nom. United States v. All Assets Held at Bank Julius, Baer & Co., Ltd., 315 F. Supp. 3d 90 (D.D.C. 23 April 2018) (collecting cases).

207 See United States v. All Assets Held at Bank Julius, 251 F. Supp. 3d at 95 (characterising the issue as 'a question of first impression in this Court' that 'has not been considered widely').

208 Compare id. at 93–96 ('In this case, the United States alleges that Lazarenko and his associates transferred millions of dollars to and from accounts and between foreign bank accounts as [electronic funds transfers] that passed through US financial institutions. In the Court's view, this conduct is precisely what Congress intended to prevent in enacting the money laundering statutes – the use of US financial institutions as clearinghouses for criminal money laundering.'), and United States v. Prevezon Holdings, Ltd., 251 F. Supp. 3d 684, 694 (S.D.N.Y. 10 May 2017) ('[T]he use of US correspondent banks to launder illegal proceeds qualifies as domestic conduct.'), with United States v. Lloyds TSB Bank PLC, 639 F. Supp. 2d 314, 324 n.4 (S.D.N.Y. 2009) (characterising a correspondent bank transfer as 'peripheral and transitory contact with the United States' that does not satisfy § 1956(f)); see also Firtash, 2019 WL 2568569, at *9 (avoiding the question).

209 See, e.g., United States v. Duperval, 777 F.3d 1324, 1328–31 (11th Cir. 2015) (former Haitian official found guilty of laundering the proceeds of 'schemes in which international companies gave him bribes in exchange for favors'); Plea Agreement 11–12, United States v. Mikerin, No. 14-cr-529-TDC (D. Md. 31 August 2015) (former Russian official pleaded guilty to laundering proceeds of a bribery scheme).

Power to obtain evidence located overseas 29.11

Demands by US prosecutors and regulators for individuals and entities to produce evidence located abroad can lead to conflicts with foreign law. As the DOJ has recognised:

> Every nation enacts laws to protect its sovereignty and can react adversely to American law enforcement efforts to gather evidence within its borders without authorization. Such efforts can constitute a violation of that nation's sovereignty or criminal law.[210]

To mitigate against the potential for such conflict, US policy requires prosecutors to attempt to obtain evidence located abroad through mutual legal assistance treaties (MLATs) rather than unilateral compulsory process, such as grand jury and administrative subpoenas. To do otherwise requires prosecutors to obtain written permission from the DOJ's Office of International Affairs.[211] The United States has entered into MLATs with around 70 countries around the world.[212] MLATs enable US prosecutors to deploy foreign law enforcement authorities to gather evidence for US investigations using the power of foreign law to compel production. While MLATs are powerful evidence-gathering tools, the process can be cumbersome and time-consuming, therefore, US law permits prosecutors to obtain orders suspending the running of the limitation period for crimes under investigation for up to three years during the pendency of any MLAT request.[213]

Outside the MLAT process, US prosecutors often utilise Bank of Nova Scotia subpoenas to obtain financial records located overseas by serving subpoenas on US branches of foreign financial institutions.[214] These subpoenas have been upheld by US courts even when compliance would require the subpoena recipient to violate foreign law.[215] Such was the case recently in In Re: Sealed Case, in which the DC Court of Appeals upheld civil contempt findings against three Chinese banks that had been served with subpoenas to produce records located in China, the production of which they maintained would violate Chinese law.[216] Two of the banks had US branches and were served with grand jury subpoenas. The third bank did not have a US branch and was served pursuant to a Patriot Act subpoena that gives prosecutors 'special investigatory tools when it comes to US correspondent bank accounts'.[217] The DOJ did not attempt to first gather the evidence sought pursu-

210 DOJ, Justice Manual § 9-13.510.

211 DOJ, Justice Manual § 9-13.525

212 The United States has also entered into agreements that do not rise to the treaty level, mutual legal assistance agreements (MLAAs) with China and the American Institute in Taiwan and the Taipei Economic and Cultural Representative Office in the United States.

213 18 U.S.C. § 3292.

214 In re Grand Jury Proceeding, 691 F.2d 1384 (11th Cir. 1982).

215 Id.

216 932 F.3d 915 (D.C. Cir. 2019).

217 Id. at 920; 31 U.S.C. § 5318(k)(3)(A).

ant to the mutual legal assistance agreement with China, arguing that any such attempt would be futile.[218] After conducting a comity analysis, the Court agreed and found that US interests outweighed the Chinese interests at issue.[219]

Conclusion

29.12 US authorities continue to investigate and bring cases based on conduct that largely takes place outside the United States. Practitioners should carefully analyse the conduct at issue and the elements of the applicable statutes to determine whether the conduct is outside the reach of US law.

218 932 F.3d at 936.
219 Id.

30

Individual Penalties and Third-Party Rights: The UK Perspective

Elizabeth Robertson[1]

Individuals: criminal liability 30.1

The Serious Fraud Office (SFO) has agreed to a total of five deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs)[2] with corporates since their introduction in February 2014.[3] The introduction of DPAs reflects a long-standing practice in the United States of granting corporates amnesty from prosecution on criminal charges, either through the use of non-prosecution agreements or DPAs, in exchange for the fulfilment of certain requirements. However, it has been argued: 'An increased focus on corporate criminal liability should not result in the culpability of offending individuals within a corporation being overlooked.'[4] Terms of a DPA will likely require the company to co-operate on an ongoing basis, which may include co-operation in the prosecution of individuals. For example, the Rolls-Royce DPA requires Rolls-Royce to 'co-operate . . . in any investigation or prosecution of any of its present or former officers, directors, employees'.[5] However, to date, the SFO has not been successful in prosecuting any individual involved in the conduct related to a DPA.

1 Elizabeth Robertson is a partner at Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom (UK) LLP.

2 DPAs are only available to corporate organisations.

3 See Standard Bank, available at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2015/11/30/sfo-agrees-first-uk-DPA-with-standard-bank/; XYZ, available at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2016/07/08/sfo-secures-second-dpa/; Tesco, available at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2017/04/10/sfo-agrees-deferred-prosecution-agreement-with-tesco/; Rolls-Royce, available at https://www.sfo.gov.uk/cases/rolls-royce-plc/, accessed 18 November 2019.

4 V K Rajah SC, Prosecution of financial crimes and its relationship to a culture of compliance, Company Lawyer, 2016, at p. 5, accessed via Westlaw UK.

5 Rolls-Royce, available at https://sfo.gov.uk/cases/rolls-royce-plc/ at paras. 10, 11.

On 6 August 2019, the SFO published its Corporate Co-operation Guidance, which forms part of the SFO's Operational Handbook. The guidance seeks to formalise the approach adopted during previous DPAs and outlines what the SFO expects corporates seeking to co-operate to provide in respect of individuals. It states that corporates should consult with the SFO before interviewing potential witnesses or suspects to avoid prejudice to the investigation, identify potential witnesses, make employees (and, where possible, agents) available for SFO interviews (including arranging for them to return to the UK if necessary) and provide the last known contact details of ex-employees, agents and consultants if requested. Corporates seeking co-operation credit by providing witness accounts also need to provide any recordings, notes and transcripts of the interview.

The SFO continues to signal that individual penalties will become increasingly important, and the relatively recent changes in the test for 'dishonesty' in criminal law may have the effect of encouraging prosecutors to pursue individuals for offences involving dishonesty, such as fraud or theft.

Under the test for dishonesty in R v. Ghosh,[6] the jury was first asked to consider whether the defendant's acts were dishonest by the ordinary standards of reasonable honest people. If the answer to that question was 'yes', the jury would then consider whether the defendant must have realised that their conduct was dishonest by those standards. In the recent case of Ivey v. Genting Casinos t/a Crockfords,[7] the Supreme Court held that the second limb of the Ghosh test no longer represents the law and that directions based on it should no longer be given to juries. The defendant's conduct, in light of his or her (subjective) knowledge or belief of the facts, must be judged as honest or dishonest by the (objective) standards of ordinary decent people alone. The defendant's (subjective) appreciation of whether his or her conduct would be dishonest according to those standards is not relevant. This change will make it more difficult for defendants to escape liability on the basis of their own moral compass and potentially easier for prosecutors to secure a conviction.

The fact that 'the most serious cases of bribery generally involve companies'[8] renders the maximum custodial sentences for financial crimes somewhat obsolete as individuals escape the maximum sentences for these serious corruption cases, which instead are borne by corporate entities and their shareholders in the form of unlimited fines. As Richard Alexander comments, 'any kind of agreement that penalises the company concerned, but does not deal with the individuals who were actually behind the commercial bribery, whether by paying the bribes or by arranging for others to do so, fails to recognise the essential nature of what took place.'[9]

6 [1982] QB 1053.

7 [2017] UKSC 67; also confirmed in R v. Alex Julian Pabon [2018] EWCA Crim 420.

8 Richard Alexander, The Bribery Act 2010 in force: an opportunity to be taken, Company Lawyer, 2011, at p. 2, accessed via Westlaw UK.

9 Ibid. at p. 2.

Individual penalties are important because they deter offending in the first place. Further, in instances where the individuals alone are punished, it ensures that innocent parties, such as the shareholders, pension funds and other stakeholders in the company, are not punished indirectly; and where the corporate also faces a penalty, the stakeholders can rest assured that the wrongdoing within the company has almost certainly been dealt with.

While DPAs in the United Kingdom are not available for individuals – and there is no indication that they will be any time soon – there is an increasing emphasis on incentivising individuals to enter an early plea. Enshrined in section 144 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003 (CJA 2003) is the statutory authority that compels the courts to consider a reduction in the sentence of an offender who has pleaded guilty to an offence. Subsection 1 obliges the court to take into account the stage in the proceedings that the offender indicated an intention to plead guilty; and the circumstances in which this indication was given. The Reduction in Sentence for a Guilty Plea: Definitive Guideline (Definitive Guideline) guides the courts in establishing an appropriate level of reduction for the offender in question.[10] Unless, on the facts, there is a sufficiently good reason for a lower amount, there is a presumption that for each of the following categories, the recommended reduction will be given. If the offender pleads guilty (1) at the first stage of proceedings, he or she can expect the sentence to be reduced by a maximum of one-third; (2) after the first stage of the proceedings, the offender may receive a maximum of a one-quarter reduction in the sentence; or (3) after the trial has begun, the reduction should be decreased from one-quarter to a maximum of one-tenth. Where the guilty plea is entered during the course of the trial, the reduction should normally be decreased further, even to zero. The Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005[11] contains several provisions that can benefit an offender who assists in the investigation or prosecution of a crime. For example, if an offender provides or offers assistance in the investigation or prosecution of others, the court in return may reduce the offender's sentence.[12] A defendant, already serving a prison sentence, who provides or offers assistance in this regard could also benefit by having a sentence reviewed.[13]

Imprisonment 30.1.1

Pursuant to section 11 of the Bribery Act 2010 (Bribery Act), the maximum sentence for an individual convicted on indictment of an offence by virtue of sections 1, 2 or 6 of the Bribery Act is 10 years' imprisonment.[14] Furthermore, under section 14 of the Bribery Act, if a corporate commits an offence under section 1, 2 or 6, if the offence is proved to have been committed with the consent

10 The Definitive Guideline was updated on 1 June 2017.

11 Chapter 2 (ss. 71–75).

12 s.73 Serious Organised Crime and Police Act (SOCPA).

13 s.74 SOCPA.

14 An individual cannot be convicted of an offence under s.7 of the Bribery Act because the offence refers only to a 'commercial organisation' for which the only sentence available is an unlimited fine.

or connivance of a senior officer (or person purporting to act in such a capacity), that officer or person can also be punished. An individual tried and convicted summarily of any of the aforementioned offences is liable to a maximum prison sentence of 12 months. An individual convicted following summary trial will (if the offence merits more severe sanction) be committed to the Crown Court for sentence. The maximum sentence for individuals under the Bribery Act is identical for any of the fraud offences both at common law and under the Fraud Act 2006 but is far greater (up to a maximum of 14 years' imprisonment) for any of the substantive money laundering offences pursuant to sections 327 to 329 of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (POCA). Furthermore, an individual convicted of the tipping- off offence under section 333A of POCA is liable to a maximum of two years' imprisonment or to a fine, or both.

Historically, under the corruption regime that persisted until the later part of the 20th century, individuals were liable to three years' imprisonment on conviction of corruption charges. This was subsequently increased to seven years under the Criminal Justice Act 1988[15] and increased again under the current regime. The shift in policy in relation to the penalties imposed on individuals who commit financial crime can largely be attributed to the distrust and anger felt by the public towards misconduct in big business; particularly following the 2008 financial crisis. Nowhere is this so apparent than in the case of Tom Hayes. Mr Hayes is currently serving an 11-year prison sentence (which was reduced on appeal from an original sentence of 14 years), one of the longest prison terms on record for UK white-collar crime,[16] for his role in the manipulation of the London Interbank Offered Rate while he worked as a derivatives trader at two different investment banks. It is widely accepted that the hefty sentence was handed down to serve as a warning to other individuals who may be tempted by the allure of profit to participate in such practices. In passing sentence, the court said that it 'must make clear to all in the financial and other markets in the City of London that conduct of this type, involving fraudulent manipulation of the markets, will result in severe sentences of considerable length which, depending on the circumstances, may be significantly greater than the present total sentence.'[17] The case was accepted for review by the Criminal Cases Review Commission in June 2017, and an outcome is still pending.

Additionally, on 19 July 2018, Christian Bittar (Deutsche Bank) and Philippe Moryoussef (Barclays Bank) were sentenced to a total of 13 years and 4 months' imprisonment for manipulating the Euro Interbank Offered Rate.[18] In the same trial, the jury was unable to reach verdicts on Carlo Palombo, Colin Bermingham and Sisse Bohart, formerly of Barclays Bank, but the SFO proceeded with a retrial, 15 See s.47 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988.

16 https://www.theguardian.com/business/2015/dec/21/libor-trader-tom-hayes-loses-appeal-but-has-jail-sentence-cut-to-11-years, accessed 18 November 2019.

17 R v. Hayes [2015] EWCA Crim 1944, at para. 109.

18 https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2018/07/19/senior-bankers-sentenced-to-more-than-13-years-for-rigging-euribor-rate/, accessed 18 November 2019.

and in March 2019, Mr Palombo and Mr Bermingham were convicted (and Ms Bohart acquitted). In April 2019, Mr Palombo and Mr Bermingham were sentenced to a total of nine years' imprisonment.[19]

In cases of financial crime, it is rare for defendants to be charged with only one count, and in the most serious cases – and as was the case for Mr Hayes – a judge can order the sentences for each individual count of which a defendant has been convicted to run consecutively. According to a Reuters news report: 'Hayes was sentenced consecutively for the conspiracies he was found guilty of while at two investment banks between 2006 and 2010. Had the market rigging been seen as one offence, Hayes would have faced a maximum 10-year sentence.'[20] Whether a judge perceives a concurrent or consecutive sentence as appropriate on the facts will be decided by reference to the same factors that judges tend to consider when deciding on the severity of a sentence, such as whether the defendant has any previous convictions, the magnitude of the offence[21] or where it can be established that the defendant failed to respond to warnings about his or her behaviour. Magnus Peterson was sentenced on eight counts of fraud, forgery, false accounting and fraudulent trading to 13 years in prison on 23 January 2015.[22]

Despite the continued prominence of financial crime cases in the media and the apparent fervour of prosecutors and courts to ensure that convicted individuals receive long custodial sentences, suspended sentences may well be considered appropriate in some cases. In R v. Dougall,[23] an employee heading a company's corrupt Greek practice who pleaded guilty to conspiracy to corrupt, and who was a co-operating defendant under section 73 SOCPA, had his 12-month custodial sentence suspended on appeal. The Court of Appeal held that 'where the appropriate sentence for a defendant whose level of criminality,[24] and features of mitigation, combined with a guilty plea, and full co-operation with the authorities investigating a major crime involving fraud or corruption, with all the consequent burdens of complying with his part of the SOCPA agreement, would be 12 months' imprisonment or less, the argument that the sentence should be suspended is very powerful.'[25] This case also demonstrates the risks individuals face when conduct spans multiple jurisdictions and no settlement or amount of 19 https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2019/04/01/senior-bankers-sentenced-to-9-years-for-rigging-euribor-rate, accessed 18 November 2019.

See Chapter 17 on individuals in cross-border proceedings

20 http://www.reuters.com/article/us-libor-hayes-appeal-idUSKBN0TJ1V820151130, 30 November 2015, accessed 18 November 2019.

21 In the Fraud, Bribery and Money Laundering Offences Definitive Guideline, it expressly states that: 'Consecutive sentences for multiple offences may be appropriate where large sums are involved.' https://www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/Fraud-Bribery-and-Money-Laundering-offences-definitive-guideline-Web.pdf, at p. 10, accessed 18 November 2019.

22 https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2015/01/23/magnus-peterson-sentenced-13-years-prison/, accessed 18 November 2019.

23 [2010] EWCA Crim 1048.

24 Mr Dougall had failed to convince other employees to end the practice of making corrupt payments to medical professionals to persuade them to buy the company's goods.

25 R v. Dougall [2010] EWCA Crim 1048, at para. 36.

See Chapter 23 on negotiating global settlements co-operation provides an absolute guarantee against further proceedings being pursued in any jurisdiction.

The Attorney General's Guidelines on Plea Discussions in Cases of Serious or Complex Fraud (Attorney General's Guidelines) set out a process by which a prosecutor may discuss an allegation of serious or complex fraud with a suspect.[26] The implementation of the Attorney General's Guidelines, with the support of the judiciary and prosecuting authorities, has garnered a quasi-plea discussion system that can be advantageous to defendants. Although the Attorney General's Guidelines do not make any provision for a defendant to receive a greater discount on the sentence than is available for simply entering a guilty plea (as set out above), in a case brought by the Financial Services Authority (FSA)[27] against Paul Milsom, a senior equities trader, for disclosing inside information between October 2008 and March 2010, Judge Pegden QC indicated, in passing sentence on 18 March 2013 at Southwark Crown Court, that he had given Mr Milsom full credit for pleading guilty at the earliest opportunity (i.e., a discount of one-third) and extra credit for entering into a plea agreement with the FSA.[28] The sentencing remarks of Judge Pegden QC convey the 'clearest articulation to date that an individual can reasonably expect to receive in excess of one third discount on sentence in circumstances where he enters into early plea discussions with a prosecutor.'[29]

In Bittar, when sentencing, the judge also took into consideration Mr Bittar's early guilty plea, along with other mitigating factors such as the delay between the period of offending and the resulting trial, the low likelihood of further future offending and Mr Bittar's previous good character.[30]

Another case worthy of note, and one that again highlights how co-operation with the authorities can really pay dividends when it comes to sentencing after conviction, was that of Bruce Hall. On 22 July 2014, Mr Hall, CEO of Aluminium Bahrain BSC from September 2001 to June 2005, received a 16-month custodial sentence[31] for conspiracy to corrupt (having allegedly received £2.9 million in bribes[32]). However, were it not for Mr Hall's co-operation and early plea, Judge Loraine-Smith stated that his prison sentence would have been far longer. According to the SFO website, 'Mr Hall had co-operated with numerous 26 The Attorney General's Guidelines came into force on 5 May 2009.

27 As of 3 April 2013, the FSA became two separate regulatory bodies; the Financial Conduct Authority (FCA) and the Prudential Regulation Authority (PRA).

28 https://webarchive.nationalarchives.gov.uk/20130402175500/http://www.fsa.gov.uk/library/communication/pr/2013/022.shtml, accessed 18 November 2019.

29 Chris Dyke, The Benefits of Early Plea Discussions, https://www.corkerbinning.com/corker-binning-solicitor-writes-about-the-benefits-of-early-plea-discussions-in-crimeline/, accessed 18 November 2019.

30 https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2018/07/19/senior-bankers-sentenced-to-more-than-13-years-for-rigging-euribor-rate/, accessed 18 November 2019.

31 Mr Hall was also ordered to pay a confiscation order of £3,070,106.03 within seven days or face serving an additional term of imprisonment of 10 years; a compensation order of £500,010; and to pay £100,000 as a contribution to the prosecution's costs.

32 https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2014/07/22/bruce-hall-sentenced-16-months-prison/, accessed 18 November 2019.

authorities throughout the investigation. If he had not been so co-operative, Mr Hall could have faced around six years in prison, close to the maximum sentence for conspiracy to corrupt, the judge said. Due to his co-operation, Mr Hall was entitled to a 66 per cent reduction in his sentence. He was also entitled to a further reduction of one-third due to entering a guilty plea.'[33] The case demonstrated that civil recovery proceedings and criminal proceedings are not mutually excluded provided that the conduct can be divided.

See Chapter 23 on negotiating global settlements

Fines 30.1.2

Fines for individual perpetrators of financial crime can be unlimited and are handed down either separately or in conjunction with a custodial sentence. Section 164 of the CJA 2003 regulates the fixing of fines in criminal cases. The Sentencing Council's Fraud, Bribery and Money Laundering Offences Definitive Guideline states that as a general principle in the setting of a fine for fraud, bribery or money laundering: 'The court should determine the appropriate level of fine in accordance with section 164 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003, which requires that the fine must reflect the seriousness of the offence and requires the court to take into account the financial circumstances of the offender.'[34]

Unexplained wealth orders 30.1.3

The Criminal Finances Act 2017 (CFA 2017) came into force on 30 September 2017 and created a new High Court power to make an unexplained wealth order (UWO), which can require a person who is suspected of involvement in, or association with, serious criminality or who is a politically exposed person (PEP) to explain the origin of assets that appear to be disproportionate to their known income.[35] A failure to provide a response will give rise to a presumption that the property is recoverable, in order to assist any subsequent civil recovery action. UWOs are intended to alleviate the burden on enforcement authorities and come with wide-ranging powers to gather evidence in other jurisdictions and potentially support parallel enforcement actions. The powers to make UWOs under the CFA 2017 commenced on 31 January 2018, with the National Crime Agency (NCA) obtaining four UWOs in the first 18 months of commencement.[36]

The CFA 2017 enables a number of UK regulators and enforcement agencies, namely the SFO, the NCA, HM Revenue and Customs, the FCA and the Director of Public Prosecutions, to apply to the High Court for a UWO, regardless of whether civil or criminal proceedings have been initiated against the respondent to the order or whether the respondent is located in the United Kingdom or another jurisdiction.

33 Ibid., accessed 29 July 2016.

34 https://www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/Fraud-Bribery-and-Money-Laundering-offences-definitive-guideline-Web.pdf, at p. 51, accessed 18 November 2019.

35 Under Part 1 ss.1-9 of the Criminal Finances Act 2017, which amends POCA s.362.

36 Barney Thompson, 'Mystery banker's wife challenges UK unexplained wealth order', Financial Times, accessed 18 November 2019.

There must be reasonable cause to believe that the respondent holds the property and that the value of the property is greater than £50,000. There must also be reasonable grounds for suspecting that the known sources of the respondent's lawfully obtained income would have been insufficient for the purposes of enabling the respondent to obtain the property. Respondents must also either be (1) a PEP or (2) someone for whom there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that they have been involved in serious crime. Under the CFA 2017, a person is considered to be involved in serious crime in the United Kingdom or another jurisdiction if the person would be so involved for the purposes of Part 1 of the Serious Crime Act 2007. This widens the category of potential respondents significantly to include persons who: (1) have committed a serious offence; (2) have facilitated the commission of an offence; or (3) conducted themselves in a way that was likely to facilitate the commission by themselves – or another person – of a serious offence, whether or not the offence was committed. The CFA 2017 widens the category of respondents even further to include anyone who is connected with a person who is or has been involved in serious crime, whether in the United Kingdom or in another jurisdiction.

The first UWO, obtained in February 2018, was made against two properties valued at approximately £22 million, connected to Mrs Zamira Hajiyeva, the wife of Mr Jahangir Hajiyev, a former banker imprisoned for fraud and embezzlement in Azerbaijan. Mrs Hajiyvera challenged the orders in the High Court on a number of grounds, including that her husband had been incorrectly classified as a PEP. However, the court dismissed these challenges, finding that Mr Hajiyev was a PEP from a non-EEA country against whom an UWO could be granted, and that as his wife, Mrs Hajiyvera was herself also a PEP.[37] The second UWO was also made against property belonging to a PEP. In this instance, the three properties subject to the UWO were worth in excess of £80 million, owned by an unnamed foreign official. Only on 12 July 2019 did the NCA obtain its first UWO against a respondent considered to be involved in serious crime.[38] The NCA press release stated, 'Officers believe the businessman's property purchases valued at £10 million were funded by a number of criminal associates involved in drug trafficking, armed robberies and supplying firearms.' A second UWO against a respondent considered to be involved in serious crime followed shortly thereafter on 24 July 2019. On this occasion, the UWO was obtained against six properties worth around £3.2 million in total belonging to a woman believed to be associated with criminals involved in paramilitary activity and cigarette smuggling.[39]

Interim freezing orders can also be granted by the High Court with each UWO, under section 362J POCA, meaning that the assets subject to the UWOs cannot be sold, transferred or dissipated for the duration of the order.

37 National Crime Agency v. Mrs A [2018] EWHC 2534 (Admin).

38 https://www.nationalcrimeagency.gov.uk/news/nca-secures-first-serious-organised-crime-unexplained-wealth-order-for-property-worth-10-million, accessed 18 November 2019.

39 https://www.nationalcrimeagency.gov.uk/news/nca-secures-unexplained-wealth-order-against-properties-owned-by-a-northern-irish-woman, accessed 18 November 2019.

Respondents are required by a UWO to provide certain information about the specified property, including the nature and extent of the respondent's interest, how it was obtained and any other information specified in the order. Aside from contempt of court proceedings, the failure to respond to a UWO creates a presumption that the property is recoverable in civil proceedings, which reduces the burden imposed on enforcement authorities under the current POCA regime, to prove that property derives from criminal conduct or constitutes the proceeds of crime. Section 362S of POCA provides that when a UWO is issued, where the enforcement authority believes that the property is outside the United Kingdom, it may send a request for assistance in relation to the property to the Secretary of State, who in turn may forward the request to the government of the receiving country. The request for assistance is a request that any person be prohibited from dealing with the property or assisting with dealing with the property.

Where a respondent complies or purports to comply, the enforcement authority must determine, within 60 days starting with the date of compliance, what enforcement or investigatory proceedings, if any, it considers ought to be taken in relation to the property.

POCA also provides that a criminal offence is committed if a respondent gives a false or misleading statement in response to a UWO, with a maximum penalty of two years' imprisonment.[40] The CFA 2017 amends POCA so that the FCA and HMRC have civil recovery powers to recover property in cases where there has not been a conviction but where it can be shown on the balance of probabilities that property has been obtained by unlawful conduct. Such proceedings would be brought in the High Court to recover criminal property without the need for the owner of the property to be convicted of a criminal offence.

Confiscation orders 30.1.4

It is becoming more common for courts to address the confiscation of the assets of a convicted individual, especially when the court satisfies itself that the defendant was said to be living a 'criminal lifestyle'.[41] Furthermore, Step 6 of the Sentencing Council Guidelines on Fraud, Bribery and Money Laundering Offences states that the court must proceed with a view to making a confiscation order if it is asked to do so by the prosecutor or if the court believes it is appropriate to do so.[42] The FCA secured £1.9 million in confiscation orders on 11 May 2018, as part of 40 s.362E CFA 2017.

41 Pursuant to s.75 of the CJA 2003, '(1) a defendant has a criminal lifestyle if (and only if) the following condition is satisfied. (2) The condition is that the offence (or any of the offences) concerned satisfies any of these tests – (a) it is specified in Schedule 2; (b) it constitutes conduct forming part of a course of criminal activity; or (c) it is an offence committed over a period of at least six months and the defendant has benefited from the conduct which constitutes the offence'.

42 https://www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/Fraud-Bribery-and-Money-Laundering-offences-definitive-guideline-Web.pdf, accessed 18 November 2019.

Operation Tabernula, and £2.2 million in confiscation orders in May 2017, as part of Operation Cotton.[43]

Confiscation orders, which are debts to the Crown, are available only after a defendant has been convicted. Where a confiscation order is not paid, the defendant will serve a period of imprisonment in default. This mechanism is highlighted in the cases of (1) Phillip Boakes, who, after failing to satisfy the full value of a confiscation order determined by the courts, was ordered to serve 730 days' imprisonment in addition to the 10 years he was already serving after pleading guilty, inter alia, to two counts of fraudulent trading;[44] (2) Alex Hope, who was sentenced to 603 days' imprisonment for failing to pay the full value of a confiscation order made against him, in addition to the seven years he was serving for defrauding investors;[45] and (3) Peter Chapman, who in September 2019 was ordered to pay a confiscation order of £441,944.38 and failure to pay within three months will result in him returning to prison for a default sentence of four years.[46]

The Supreme Court also recently clarified the position regarding the reduction of default sentences for partial repayment of sums ordered under a confiscation order. In R (on the application of Gibson) v. Secretary of State for Justice,[47] the Supreme Court held that the calculation of reductions in default terms should not take into consideration accrued interest. The appellant had been convicted of a drug trafficking offence in 1999 and sentenced to 25 years' imprisonment. At a confiscation hearing in 2000, he was ordered to pay £5.4 million within 12 months or serve a six-year default sentence and accrue 8 per cent interest per annum. The appellant did not pay the amount ordered, triggering the accrual of interest on the outstanding amount. By the time the appellant was committed to prison under the default sentence, the outstanding amount was £8.1 million. However, £90,370 had been paid off the order, entitling the appellant to a reduction in his default sentence. The issue for the courts was therefore to determine whether the reduction should be calculated as a percentage of the initial £5.4 million order or of £8.1 million. The appellant argued that the calculation should be based on the original £5.4 million order, entitling him to a reduction of 35 days. However, in the Administrative Court and Court of Appeal it was held that a reduction of only 24 days should be applied, calculated on the basis of the £8.1 million outstanding. In January 2018, the Supreme Court held in the appellant's favour, entitling him to the additional 11-day reduction in his default 43 https://www.fca.org.uk/news/press-releases/fca-secures-confiscation-orders-totalling-1-69-million-against-convicted-insider-dealers; https://www.fca.org.uk/news/press-releases/fca-secures-eight-confiscation-orders-totalling-almost-22-million, accessed 18 November 2018.

44 https://www.fca.org.uk/news/phillip-boakes-sentenced-for-failing-to-pay-confiscation-order, accessed 18 November 2019.

45 https://www.fca.org.uk/news/press-releases/alex-hope-sentenced-failing-pay-confiscation-order, accessed 18 November 2019.

46 https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2019/09/05/currency-fraudster-peter-chapman-ordered-to-pay-441944-38/, accessed 18 November 2019.

47 [2018] UKSC 2.

sentence. The ruling confirms that there is a continued incentive for individuals subject to confiscation orders to continue making contributions even after a default sentence has been triggered.

Confiscation orders derive from section 6 of POCA and are intended to deprive the defendant of the benefit of any proceeds of his or her crimes; they are not, however, intended to act as a fine or further punishment. They do not always involve the sequestration of the defendant's personal property. Instead, they usually entail the payment of a sum of money: 'Where, however, a criminal has benefited financially from crime but no longer possesses the specific fruits of his crime, he will be deprived of assets of equivalent value, if he has them.'[48] In accordance with the decision in R v. Waya,[49] prosecutors should ensure that the confiscation is proportionate, which entails an assessment of the ability of the defendant to pay the order in full.

In determining the amount of £165,731 that Mr Boakes was required to pay under his confiscation order, the court was able to take into account how the money that he had acquired was spent. The court determined that much of the proceeds that Mr Boakes had benefited from was spent on a lavish lifestyle and unsuccessful financial trading that was indicative of a criminal lifestyle, which the courts will take into account when determining the recoverable amount.

The Attorney General's Guidelines are silent as to confiscation orders – they provide no framework to regulate the discussions and agreement of confiscation orders as part of plea discussions. Should the prosecution and the defendant reach any form of agreement in relation to a confiscation order, that agreement would not bind a court. In Mr Milsom's case, however, the judge agreed to make a confiscation order at the sentencing hearing in the value of his personal benefit from his offending, which had been agreed between the prosecution and the defence within the basis of the plea and joint sentencing submission. This suggests that prosecutors could be willing to negotiate the terms of a confiscation order as part of a plea negotiation, and that the courts may be willing to accept the joint submission that 'provid[es] a defendant with greater certainty and control over his financial liabilities'.[50]

The burden of proof in criminal confiscation orders rests with the defendant, who must show, on the balance of probabilities, that his or her assets are not derived from criminal conduct.

Where it is reasonably foreseeable that a court will make a confiscation order, the prosecution may take steps in the High Court to ensure that the defendant's assets will remain available to meet the terms of the order. Such steps include, inter

48 R v. May [2008] UKHL 28, at para. 9.

49 [2012] UKSC 51.

50 Chris Dyke, The Benefits of Early Plea Discussions, https://www.corkerbinning.com/corker-binning-solicitor-writes-about-the-benefits-of-early-plea-discussions-in-crimeline/, accessed 18 November 2019 alia, an order requiring the defendant to disclose where assets are kept, an order appointing a receiver and an order restraining assets.[51]

30.1.5 Compensation orders

Like a confiscation order, a compensation order is an ancillary court order and is designed to compensate a victim for personal injury or any loss or damage that may have resulted from the offence committed by the defendant and is made in addition, or instead of, other sentencing options under section 130 of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000. The Sentencing Council Guidelines on Fraud, Bribery and Money Laundering Offences also provide that, under Step 6, the court must proceed with a view to making a confiscation order, if it is asked to do so by the prosecutor, or if the court believes it is appropriate to do so.[52]

In both a magistrates' court[53] and the Crown Court, the amount that can be awarded as compensation is now unlimited but is restricted to an amount that can feasibly be paid by the defendant. The court must have regard to the evidence of the defendant's financial means when deciding the level of compensation to award the victim and must prioritise the payment of compensation over any other financial penalty.

30.1.6 Disqualification orders

Directors of companies are fiduciaries and there is consequently a high level of probity expected of them by the law. It is therefore expected that '[t]hose who are involved in bribery, whether as individuals or as part of their role as directors, are very likely to be disqualified from acting as a director for a lengthy period of time.'[54]

See Chapter 25 on fines, disgorgement, etc. and Chapter 41 on directors' duties

Directors disqualification orders (DDOs) are designed to help protect creditors and the public from those individuals who may act dishonestly and can bar a person from acting as a director of any UK company for up to 15 years. DDOs can be made where the defendant director of a company has been convicted of an indictable offence which, by virtue of the decision in R v. Creggy,[55] must have some relevant factual connection with the management of the company.

30.1.7 Costs

As in all criminal cases, cost orders are usually made against a convicted defendant, who will be required to pay the prosecution's costs as well as any court fees that materialise during the criminal proceedings.

---

51 See s.37(1) Supreme Court Act 1981.

52 https://www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/Fraud-Bribery-and-Money-Laundering-offences-definitive-guideline-Web.pdf, accessed 18 November 2019.

53 Before 11 December 2013, the amount that a magistrate could award as part of a compensation order was £5,000, but, by virtue of s.131 Powers of Criminal Courts Sentencing Act 2000, this limit has been removed.

54 Eoin O'Shea, The Bribery Act 2010, A Practical Guide, Jordans, at p. 238.

55 [2008] EWCA Crim 394.

The legislative authority enabling a court to award costs in criminal proceedings is primarily contained in Part II of the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985 (sections 16 to 19B), the Access to Justice Act 1999 (in relation to funded clients) and in regulations that have since been made pursuant to these statutes, including the Costs in Criminal Cases (General) Regulations 1986, as amended.

Individuals: regulatory liability 30.2

The FCA has continued the FSA's legacy of adopting a robust enforcement stance, underpinned by its 'credible deterrence' strategy. In furtherance of its policy of 'credible deterrence', the FSA had signalled a willingness to pursue criminal actions through the courts and to seek custodial sentences. For the FCA, the pursuit of criminal prosecutions, where appropriate, remains high on its agenda, particularly for market misconduct offences. This is supported by the FCA's Annual Business Plan for 2019/20, which states that tackling financial crime and money laundering remains a priority. The UK government's Economic Crime Plan 2019-22 also lists strengthening the capabilities of law enforcement as one of its strategic priorities, 'to detect, deter and disrupt economic crime'.[56] The FCA has introduced further changes to the Senior Managers and Certification Regime, due at the time of writing to come into force on 9 December 2019, extending the regime to FCA solo-regulated firms[57] to make senior managers more responsible and accountable for their actions.[58]

See Chapter 25 on fines, disgorgement, etc. and Chapter 41 on directors' duties

Under the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 (FSMA) as amended by the Financial Services Act 2012, the FCA has many tools at its disposal to punish non-criminal offences and breaches. This includes the issuing of public censures or statements, and imposing unlimited financial penalties.

Other sanctions available to the FCA include varying or cancelling a firm's permission under Part 4A of FSMA; intervening against an incoming EEA or EU Treaty firm; suspending or restricting a firm's Part 4A permissions; suspending or restricting the approval given to an approved person; prohibiting an individual from performing regulated functions; withdrawing the approval of an approved person; and imposing a penalty on a person who has performed a controlled function without approval.

There will always be an element of publicity along with the imposition of such sanctions; however, public sanctions are certainly not the only way of dealing with cases of regulatory non-compliance. Taking into consideration the severity of an offence, it may be satisfactorily addressed by using other remedial measures (for example, through the use of private warnings).

56 https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/816215/2019-22_Economic_Crime_Plan.pdf.

57 'Solo-regulated firms' are firms that are regulated exclusively by the FCA rather than dually regulated by the FCA and Prudential Regulatory Authority. The regime will commence for benchmark administrators on 7 December 2020 to allow the FCA to carry out a dedicated consultation for benchmark administrators before making final rules for the sector.

58 https://www.fca.org.uk/firms/senior-managers-certification-regime/banking; https://www.fca.org.uk/publication/policy/ps18-14.pdf, accessed 18 November 2019.

Chapter 6 of the FCA's Decision Procedure and Penalties manual (DEPP 6) contains the FCA's statement of policy in relation to the imposition and amount of penalties under FSMA.[59] DEPP 6A sets out its policy in relation to imposing suspensions or restrictions on firms and on approved persons. Chapter 7 of the FCA's Enforcement Guide sets out specific guidance on the FCA's powers in relation to financial penalties and public censures. Further, in April 2017, the FCA published an Enforcement Information Guide, which should be read in conjunction with DEPP and the Enforcement Guide.

See Chapter 25 on fines, disgorgement, etc.

30.3 Other issues: UK third-party rights

Section 393 FSMA gives third parties certain rights in relation to warning and decision notices given to another person in respect of whom the FCA is taking regulatory action. Where a warning notice has been given, section 393(1) provides that a third party prejudicially identified in the notice must be given a copy and a reasonable period to make representations on it.[60] No equivalent regime exists in the criminal sphere, where the DPA process (which involves the agreed statement of facts detailing the conduct of individuals) enables individuals to respond prior to the DPA being entered into.

Section 393(4) gives third-party rights in relation to a decision notice. It provides that a third party prejudicially identified in the notice must be given a copy of it and a reasonable period to make representations on it. Section 393(11) provides that a person who alleges that a copy of the notice should have been given to him or her may refer that alleged failure to the Upper Tribunal.[61]

The scope of the rights conferred by section 393(4) was reconsidered in Macris v. FCA.[62] On 19 May 2015, the Court of Appeal held that Mr Macris had been prejudicially identified in the FCA's settlement notices issued to a financial institution. Though he was not identified by name, the notices referred to him as 'CIO London management' and stated that 'CIO London management' had deliberately misled the FCA in a telephone call with the regulator in April 2012.

On 22 March 2017, the majority of the Supreme Court overturned the Court of Appeal's decision. Lord Sumption, writing for the majority, stated that someone is identified in a notice if 'he is identified by name or by a synonym for him, such as his office or job title'. Such a synonym would, in the view of Lord Sumption, need to be 'apparent from the notice itself that it could apply to only one person and that person must be identifiable from information which is either in the notice or publicly available elsewhere'. Information from other sources can 59 In August 2018, the FCA issued a new version of the DEPP.

60 Unless he or she has been given a separate warning notice in relation to the same matter.

61 In April 2010 the Financial Services and Market Tribunal, established by s.132 of FSMA as an independent judicial body to hear decision notices issued by the FSA, was abolished and its functions transferred to the Upper Tribunal.

62 [2015] EWCA Civ 490; [2017] UKSC 19.

only be used to interpret the language of the FCA's notice, rather than to supplement it, and must be easily ascertainable.

In concluding that it was not permissible to rely on information publicly available elsewhere, Lord Sumption stated that he was influenced by the deliberate drafting of section 393 FSMA with regard to fairness and the requirement for the material identifying the individual to come from the notice itself, as well as concern over the impact on the FCA's effectiveness if section 393 were to be interpreted differently. Lord Sumption also stated that the envisaged constituency, namely the audience of notices, was the public at large and not just those familiar with a particular industry.

While agreeing with Lord Sumption, Lord Neuberger stated that an individual is identified in a document if '(1) his position or office is mentioned, (2) he is the sole holder of that position or office, and (3) reference by members of the public to freely and publicly available sources of information would easily reveal the name of that individual by reference to his position or office.'

In dissenting, Lord Wilson stated that the majority unfairly prioritised protecting regulatory efficiency over individual reputation. Lord Wilson expressed concern about the majority's analysis that the general public is the constituency for FCA notices and stated that it failed to reflect how the most serious damage of wrongly being identified for a third party would be within the market in which they operate, as being so identified would damage their employment prospects. Lord Wilson considered that the decision failed to strike a balance between protecting the rights of individuals and regulatory efficiency. However, the restrictive approach to third-party rights has now been confirmed by the Court of Appeal in R v. Grout.[63]

63 [2018] EWCA Civ 71.

31

Individual Penalties and Third-Party Rights: The US Perspective

Joseph Moreno and Todd Blanche[1]

31.1 Prosecutorial discretion

31.1.1 Generally

In the United States, prosecutors generally have discretion in deciding whether to investigate and charge an individual with an offence.[2] As a threshold matter, a prosecutor may bring charges if there is probable cause to believe that the accused has committed a crime.[3] Prosecutors also have discretion as to how to charge a specific offence,[4] when to bring charges[5] and whether to negotiate a plea agree-

1 Joseph Moreno and Todd Blanche are partners at Cadwalader, Wickersham & Taft LLP.

2 See United States v. Armstrong, 517 U.S. 456, 464 (1996) (holding that the constitutional separation of powers requires broad prosecutorial discretion); Young v. United States ex. Rel. Vuitton et Fils S.A., 481 U.S. 787, 807 (1987) (holding that prosecutors have discretion to decide which persons should be the target of an investigation); Wayte v. United States, 470 U.S. 598, 607 (1985) (finding that courts are ill equipped to evaluate the strength of a prosecutor's case, a case's deterrent value, and the government's enforcement priorities). See also American Bar Association, Criminal Justice Standards for the Prosecution Function (4th ed. 2018), Standard 3-4.2 (Decisions to Charge Are the Prosecutor's), www.americanbar.org/groups/criminal_justice/standards/ProsecutionFunctionFourthEdition-TableofContents.html.

3 See Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357, 364 (1978) (holding that, if a prosecutor has probable cause to believe that the accused committed an offence, the decisions whether to prosecute and what charges to file rest entirely within his discretion). See also Rinaldi v. United States, 434 U.S. 22, 29-30 (1977) (per curiam) (holding that the prosecutor has discretion to dismiss charges unless dismissal would be contrary to the public interest).

4 See United States v. Batchelder, 442 U.S. 114, 123-25 (1979) (holding that it is proper for prosecutors to bring charges under any statute unless brought for a discriminatory purpose).

5 See United States v. Lovasco, 431 U.S. 783, 795-96 (1977) (holding that an 18-month delay in bringing charges did not violate the defendant's due process rights).

ment.[6] Courts will typically not interfere with charging decisions absent a showing of selective prosecution[7] or vindictive prosecution.[8]

Principles of Federal Prosecution 31.1.2

Within the discretion provided to federal prosecutors, there is guidance issued by the Department of Justice (DOJ) to help with investigation and charging decisions.

The DOJ's Principles of Federal Prosecution – issued as part of the Justice Manual (JM) (formerly known as the US Attorneys' Manual, or USAM) – provide federal prosecutors with a framework for applying their prosecutorial discretion to 'promote the reasoned exercise of prosecutorial authority and contribute to the fair, evenhanded administration of the Federal criminal laws'.[9] They provide that if a prosecutor concludes that there is probable cause to believe that a person has committed a federal offence within the prosecutor's jurisdiction, the prosecutor should consider whether to (1) request or conduct further investigation, (2) commence or recommend prosecution, (3) decline prosecution and refer the matter for prosecutorial consideration in another jurisdiction, (4) decline prosecution and commence or recommend pretrial diversion or other non-criminal disposition, or (5) decline prosecution without taking other action.[10] A prosecutor should commence or recommend federal prosecution if he or she believes that the person's conduct constitutes a federal offence, and that the admissible evidence will probably be sufficient to obtain and sustain a conviction, unless (1) the prosecution would serve no substantial federal interest, (2) the person is subject to effective prosecution in another jurisdiction or (3) there exists an adequate non-criminal alternative to prosecution.[11]

In determining whether a prosecution 'would serve a substantial federal interest', the Principles of Federal Prosecution advise prosecutors to weigh all relevant considerations, including (1) federal law enforcement priorities, including any federal law enforcement initiatives or operations aimed at accomplishing those priorities, (2) the nature and seriousness of the offence, (3) the deterrent effect of prosecution, (4) the person's culpability in connection with the offence, (5) the person's history with respect to criminal activity, (6) the person's willingness to co-operate in the investigation or prosecution of others, (7) the person's 6 See Weatherford v. Bursey, 429 U.S. 545, 561 (1977) (holding there is no constitutional right to plea bargain).

7 See Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356, 373-74 (1886) (selective prosecution of Chinese laundry owners but not similarly situated non-Chinese laundry owners).

8 See Blackledge v. Perry, 417 U.S. 21, 28-29 (1974) (prosecution of a defendant for a more serious charge in a new trial following a successful appeal of his original conviction).

9 Justice Manual (JM), Principles of Federal Prosecution, § 9-27.000 et seq., https://www.justice.gov/jm/jm-9-27000-principles-federal-prosecution.

10 Id., at § 9-27.200 (Initiating and Declining Prosecution – Probable Cause Requirement).

11 Id., at § 9-27.220 (Grounds for Commencing or Declining Prosecution).

circumstances, (8) the interests of any victims, and (9) the probable sentence or other consequences if the person is convicted.[12]

The Principles of Federal Prosecution also establish important boundaries as to what a prosecutor should not consider when determining whether to bring charges against an individual, including (1) the person's race, religion, gender, ethnicity, national origin, sexual orientation, or political association, activities or beliefs, (2) the prosecutor's own personal feelings concerning the person, the person's associates or the victim, or (3) the possible effect of the decision on the prosecutor's own professional or personal circumstances.[13]

31.1.3 DOJ enforcement priorities and policies

The first factor within the Principles of Federal Prosecution for prosecutors to consider – federal law enforcement priorities – are developed annually by the DOJ to focus efforts on those matters that are most deserving of federal attention. Every year, the Attorney General communicates the DOJ's national enforcement priorities, which have ranged from a focus on drug prosecutions during the influx of crack cocaine in the 1980s, to national security and counterterrorism following the attacks of 11 September 2001, and to prosecuting mortgage and financial fraud in the wake of the Wall Street credit crisis of 2008.[14]

In addition, the DOJ periodically issues policy guidance that has an impact on prosecutorial discretion, frequently corresponding to changes in DOJ leadership. For example, on 10 May 2017, then-Attorney General Jeff Sessions issued a memorandum to all federal prosecutors entitled 'Department Charging and Sentencing Policy', which directed that 'prosecutors should charge and pursue the most serious, readily provable offence.'[15] In addition, the memorandum directed prosecutors to disclose to the court 'all facts that impact the sentencing guidelines or mandatory minimum sentences'.[16] By this memorandum, the Attorney General modified charging policies then in effect, limiting prosecutors' discretion in making charging decisions and sentencing recommendations and requiring any exceptions to be approved by the respective US Attorney.[17] The use of these memoranda by the DOJ leadership is another mechanism by which policy changes are put into effect.

12 Id., at § 9-27.230 (Initiating and Declining Charges – Substantial Federal Interest).

13 Id., at § 9-27.260 (Initiating and Declining Charges – Impermissible Considerations).

14 See, e.g., US Department of Justice, press release, 'Department of Justice FY 2020 Budget Request' (11 March 2019), https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/department-justice-fy-2020-budget-request (listing drug enforcement and the opioid crisis, combating violent crime, immigration law enforcement, and national security and cyber as among the DOJ's federal law enforcement priorities for Fiscal Year 2020).

15 Office of the Attorney General, US Department of Justice, Department Charging and Sentencing Policy (10 May 2017), https://www.justice.gov/opa/press-release/file/965896/download.

16 Id.

17 In February 2018, the DOJ amended JM § 9-27.300 (Selecting Charges– Charging Most Serious Offences) to incorporate the May 2017 Sessions Memo stating that federal prosecutors must pursue the most serious offences that carry the most substantial Guidelines sentence.

Individual accountability for wrongdoing 31.1.4

Under US law, criminal prosecution and civil actions may be brought against business organisations including corporations, partnerships, sole proprietorships, government entities and other unincorporated associations, notwithstanding their artificial nature as a legal entity.[18] The prosecution of corporate crime has long been a high priority for the DOJ, with a focus on (1) protecting the integrity of the economic and capital markets by enforcing the rule of law, (2) protecting consumers, investors and business entities against competitors who gain unfair advantage by violating the law, (3) preventing violations of environmental laws and (4) discouraging business practices that would permit or promote unlawful conduct at the expense of the public interest.[19] Under this concept of corporate liability, corporations and other business organisations can be indicted, plead guilty, be convicted of offences, be fined and be required to institute remedial measures to prevent future wrongdoing.[20] Just as prosecutors have discretion in deciding when, how, and whether to prosecute individuals, they have similar latitude in prosecuting and negotiating settlements with corporate defendants.[21]

Historically, the DOJ's focus on corporate wrongdoing often led to significant settlements with companies, but without any individuals being held accountable for the crimes charged. Following increasing public and judicial criticism about the lack of individual accountability, in September 2015, the DOJ issued a memorandum titled 'Individual Accountability for Corporate Wrongdoing', authored by then-Deputy Attorney General Sally Quillian Yates (commonly referred to as the Yates Memorandum).[22] The Yates Memorandum set forth new policy guidance focusing on prosecuting individuals with responsibility for the crimes for which corporations could be held responsible, and its core principles were incorporated into the USAM several months later. In acknowledging the historical challenge of identifying and prosecuting individuals who were aware of or complicit in corporate misconduct, the Yates Memorandum listed six key steps to strengthen the DOJ's pursuit of individual wrongdoers.

- Provision of evidence against individual wrongdoers: For a company to receive any consideration for co-operation with the government under the Principles of Federal Prosecution of Business Organizations, the company must completely disclose to the DOJ all relevant facts about any individual misconduct. This includes identifying all individuals responsible for the misconduct at issue, regardless of their position, status or seniority at the company.

18 JM, Principles of Federal Prosecution of Business Organizations, § 9-28.000 et seq., https://www.justice.gov/jm/jm-9-28000-principles-federal-prosecution-business-organizations.

19 Id., at § 9-28.010 (Foundational Principles of Corporate Prosecution).

20 Id., at § 9-28.200 (General Considerations of Corporate Liability).

21 Id.

22 Office of the Deputy Attorney General, US Department of Justice, Individual Accountability for Corporate Wrongdoing (9 September 2015), https://www.justice.gov/dag/file/769036/download. The Yates Memorandum has since been largely incorporated into JM § 9-28.700 (The Value of Cooperation).

- Investigative focus on individual wrongdoers: Both civil attorneys and criminal prosecutors at the DOJ will now focus on individual wrongdoing from the beginning of any investigation of corporate misconduct.
- Coordination between civil attorneys and criminal prosecutors: Civil attorneys and criminal prosecutors at the DOJ will more regularly consult throughout all phases of an investigation of corporate misconduct and will consider bringing parallel civil and criminal proceedings to take advantage of the full range of the government's potential remedies, including fines, imprisonment, forfeitures, restitution, and suspension and debarment.
- No shielding of individuals from liability: Absent extraordinary circumstances, no resolution of a case of corporate misconduct will provide protection from criminal or civil liability for individuals. Any release of criminal or civil liability due to extraordinary circumstances must be personally approved in writing by the relevant Assistant Attorney General or United States Attorney.
- No corporate resolution without individual resolution: If the investigation of individual misconduct has not concluded by the time authorisation is sought to resolve the case against the corporation, a plan must be implemented by the DOJ prosecutor on how to resolve the matter prior to the end of any statute of limitations period.
- Increased focus on civil settlements: Civil attorneys at the DOJ will focus on recovering as much money as possible for the public, regardless of an individual's ability to pay. Instead, the decision as to whether to file a civil action against an individual should focus on the seriousness of the person's misconduct, whether it is actionable, whether the admissible evidence will be sufficient to obtain a judgment and whether pursuing the action reflects an important federal interest.

To some practitioners, the Yates Memorandum merely memorialised the DOJ's existing practice of prosecuting culpable individuals in white-collar cases. However, the requirement that the government prove that defendants intentionally and knowingly violated the law remains a significant hurdle, especially in the context of corporate wrongdoing. Indeed, the Yates Memorandum notes that in cases of misconduct in a large corporate setting 'where responsibility can be diffuse . . . it can be difficult to determine if someone possessed the knowledge and criminal intent necessary to establish their guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.'[23]

In November 2018, then-Deputy Attorney General Rod Rosenstein announced revisions to the Yates Memorandum to restore some of the prosecutorial discretion that had traditionally been afforded to cases involving corporate wrongdoing.[24] Rosenstein's speech, while emphasising that the aggressive targeting of white-collar crime in general and individuals in particular remained a 'top priority', also effectively conceded that the Yates Memorandum's 'all or nothing' approach was somewhat unrealistic. In deviating from a position whereby corporations must identify every individual wrongdoer to obtain co-operation credit, Rosenstein stated that the new policy permits prosecutors to recognise credit when a corporation identifies the individuals who play 'significant roles' in corporate misconduct. The revised policy allowed prosecutors more discretion to agree to credit based on the extent of a corporation's co-operation, while maintaining the position that corporations that failed to co-operate in good faith would remain ineligible for credit.[25] The effective components of the Yates Memorandum, as revised by the Rosenstein comments, have been incorporated into the Justice Manual.[26]

23 Ibid.

24 Deputy Attorney General Rod J Rosenstein Delivers Remarks at the American Conference Institute's 35th International Conference on the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (29 November 2018), https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/deputy-attorney-general-rod-j-rosenstein-delivers-remarks-american-conference-institute-0.

Sentencing 31.2

Generally 31.2.1

Individuals who are convicted of violating a federal criminal law, including white-collar laws, face a range of possible punishments including fines, probation and imprisonment. In determining the nature and range of a potential sentence following a conviction, there are currently two sources of guidance for judges, prosecutors and defence counsel to refer to: criminal statutes in the United States Code[27] and the United States Sentencing Guidelines (the Guidelines).[28]

Prior to 1984, federal judges had broad discretion in sentencing criminal defendants up to and including imprisonment, subject only to mandatory minimum or maximum sentences set forth in individual criminal statutes. Certain criminal statutes contain mandatory minimum sentences – for example, aggravated identity theft is punishable by a mandatory minimum sentence of imprisonment for two years, or by a mandatory term of imprisonment for five years if it relates to a terrorism offence.[29] Drug trafficking offences typically involve mandatory minimum sentences depending on the nature and quantity of the controlled substance involved and the defendant's criminal history.[30] Other statutes establish maximum terms of imprisonment, or a combination of a fine and imprisonment, such as bank fraud, which is punishable by a fine or a term of imprisonment of not more than 30 years.[31] Not surprisingly, these broad sentencing parameters often resulted in wide sentencing disparities across jurisdictions for similar conduct.[32]

25 Ibid.

26 JM § 9-28.700 (The Value of Cooperation).

27 United States Code (U.S.C.), US Government Publishing Office, https://www.govinfo.gov/app/collection/uscode/.

28 US Sentencing Guidelines Manual (effective 1 November 2018), United States Sentencing Commission, https://www.ussc.gov/sites/default/files/pdf/guidelines-manual/2018/GLMFull.pdf.

29 18 U.S.C. § 1028A.

30 See, e.g., 21 U.S.C. § 841(b).

31 18 U.S.C. § 1344.

32 See US Sentencing Commission, Supplementary Report on the Initial Sentencing Guidelines and Policy Statements 35-39 (18 June 1987), https://www.ussc.gov/sites/default/files/pdf/

In response, Congress passed the Sentencing Reform Act of 1984 (SRA), which led to the creation of the Guidelines.[33] The Guidelines require a score-based analysis focused on a myriad of factors relating to the circumstances of the offence. This analysis leads to one of 43 different offence levels[34] and six criminal history categories.[35] As originally designed, the Guidelines were mandatory. A sentencing judge was required to apply a sentence from within the Guideline range dictated by the score-based analysis. However, in 2006, the US Supreme Court in United States v. Booker determined that mandatory application of the Guidelines was unconstitutional and that they are advisory recommendations only.[36] As a result of Booker, the Guidelines now act as a starting point for a federal judge to determine what sentence should be imposed, consistent with minimum and maximum sentences set forth in the offence of conviction, as well as the factors set forth in the federal sentencing statute.[37] Notably, while a judge is required to consider the Guidelines when determining an appropriate sentence, it is but one of many factors that the judge must consider when determining an appropriate sentence.

guidelines-manual/1987/manual-pdf/1987_Supplementary_Report_Initial_Sentencing_Guidelines.pdf.

33 18 U.S.C. §§ 3551-3586, 3601-3742; 28 U.S.C. §§ 991-998. The Sentencing Reform Act of 1984 (SRA) required a federal district court judge to consider each of the factors in the federal sentencing statute, 18 U.S.C. § 3553(a), when crafting a sentence, which included: (1) the 'nature and circumstances of the offence' and the defendant's 'history and characteristics'; (2) the general purposes of the SRA; (3) the 'kinds of sentences available'; (4) the 'pertinent policy statements issued by the U.S. Sentencing Commission'; (5) the 'need to avoid unwarranted sentence disparities' between defendants convicted of similar conduct; (6) the 'need to provide restitution to any victims'; and (7) the applicable sentence range recommended by the Guidelines.

34 Guidelines § 5A.

35 Guidelines § 4A1.1.

36 543 U.S. 220, 245-246 (2005) (holding that the Guidelines must be considered as an advisory, not a mandatory, calculation of sentence to be consistent with the Sixth Amendment right to a trial by jury). The Booker court held that the federal sentencing statute requires judges to consider the Guidelines sentencing range, and to 'impose sentences that reflect the seriousness of the offense, promote respect for the law, provide just punishment, afford adequate deterrence, protect the public, and effectively provide the defendant with needed educational or vocational training and medical care.' Ibid., at 259, 260 (citing 18 U.S.C. § 3553(a)).

37 18 U.S.C. § 3553(a). The federal sentencing statute defines the factors to be considered by the judge in imposing a sentence on a defendant and mandates that it should be 'sufficient, but not greater than necessary'. 18 U.S.C. § 3553(a)(2). As a result of the Supreme Court's ruling in Booker, courts should consider the Guidelines as one factor in imposing a sentence, but a judge may impose a different sentence if other § 3553(a) factors suggest that the Guidelines' range is inappropriate. See Kimbrough v. United States, 552 U.S. 85, 91 (2007). ('A district judge must include the Guidelines range in the array of factors warranting consideration.')

Imprisonment 31.2.2

The federal prison system is operated by the Bureau of Prisons, and currently contains over 177,000 inmates in over 140 facilities located throughout the United States.[38]

When calculating a potential sentence of imprisonment under the Guidelines, the judge first looks to the 'base offence level' applicable to the defendant's conviction,[39] and adjusts that upward or downward for specific applicable offence characteristics, special instructions and other factors to calculate the 'total offence level'.[40] Next, the judge determines the defendant's criminal history category (categories I to VI), which is increased by prior criminal convictions.[41] Once the total offence level and criminal history category are determined, the judge arrives at the recommended sentence by identifying the applicable range in the Guidelines' sentencing table.[42] Judges have discretion to depart upward or downward from the recommended range upon finding that the case includes one or more aggravating or mitigating circumstance 'of a kind not adequately taken into consideration' by the Guidelines.[43] They also allow judges to depart from the Guidelines if the government moves for a downward departure based on the defendant's substantial assistance in another case.[44] In any case, the judge must state in writing the specific reasons for imposing a sentence outside the applicable Guidelines sentencing range.[45]

Fines 31.2.3

An individual convicted of a federal crime may also be sentenced to pay a monetary fine.[46] The process a judge uses to calculate an applicable fine is similar to that of determining a sentence of imprisonment. Many criminal statutes set forth the range of fines that may be assessed upon conviction; for those felonies whose statute does not so specify, the fine is set at not more than US$250,000.[47] As with terms of imprisonment, the Guidelines contain a fine table that provides the court with an advisory minimum and maximum fine range for defendants, based on the offence level at which the defendant is sentenced.[48]

Judges may depart upwards or downwards from the Guidelines' fine range based on factors such as a defendant's ability to pay, any restitution the defendant

38 Federal Bureau of Prisons Statistics (updated 25 July 2019), https://www.bop.gov/about/statistics/population_statistics.jsp.

39 Guidelines §§ 1B1.1(a)(1), 1B1.2(a).

40 Guidelines §§ 1B1.1(a)(2), 1B1.1(c).

41 Guidelines § 1B1.1(a)(6).

42 Guidelines § 1B1.1(a)(7).

43 Guidelines § 5K2.0 (quoting 18 U.S.C. § 3553(b)).

44 Guidelines § 5K1.1.

45 18 U.S.C. § 3553(c)(2).

46 18 U.S.C § 3571(a).

47 18 U.S.C § 3571(b)(3).

48 Guidelines § 5E1.2. For example, if a defendant is convicted of bank fraud and is sentenced at offence level 18, the fine table sets a guideline range of US$6,000 to US$60,000. Ibid.

must make, the potential for collateral consequences the defendant may face (such as civil litigation) and other equitable considerations.[49] Judges looking to assess a fine should also consider the factors in the federal sentencing statute in calculating the amount, including the seriousness of the offence, promotion of respect for the law, provision of just punishment for the defendant and its deterrent factor.[50]

31.2.4 Probation

The US Probation and Pretrial Services System supervises individuals sentenced to a term of probation to ensure compliance with conditions imposed by the sentencing judge. Probation is a sentence in and of itself, and may be used as an alternative to imprisonment.[51] When imposing probation, the sentencing judge must consider the Guidelines[52] as well as the factors set forth in the SRA.[53]

The Guidelines contain a list of standard conditions that are recommended in all cases of probation,[54] along with a list of special conditions to be considered under certain circumstances.[55] In addition, a judge may impose additional conditions on a defendant's probation term that are reasonably related to the nature and circumstances of the offence, the history and characteristics of the defendant, and the goals of sentencing.[56] In all cases, the court must provide the defendant with written notice of the conditions.[57] The court may revoke a defendant's probation at any time before the end of its term for any violation of a probation condition that occurs during that time.[58]

31.2.5 Confiscation of assets

31.2.5.1 Pretrial asset freeze orders

Under US law, the government can seek a temporary order freezing an individual's assets, in both the civil and criminal contexts, before a case is proven at trial. In civil enforcement matters, regulators can seek asset freezes from an administrative 49 Guidelines § 5E1.2(d).

50 See 18 U.S.C. § 3553(a).

51 18 U.S.C. § 3561; Guidelines § 5B1.1.

52 See, e.g., United States v. Toohey, 448 F.3d 542, 546-47 (2d Cir. 2006) (holding that a departure from the Guidelines' prison recommendation to probation may be warranted, but the district court should nonetheless 'consider the Guidelines and all of the other factors listed in § 3553(a)').

53 The SRA directs the sentencing judge, when imposing probation, to consider several factors, including: (1) the nature of the offence and history and characteristics of the defendants; (2) the need for just punishment, deterrence, or public protection; (3) the need to provide the defendant with educational or vocational training, medical care, or other correctional treatment; (4) the types of sentences available; (5) the Guidelines; (6) the need to avoid unwarranted sentencing disparities between defendants with similar records for similar conduct; and (7) the need to provide restitution to victims. See 18 U.S.C. § 3553(a).

54 Guidelines § 5B1.3(c).

55 Guidelines §§ 5B1.3(d), (e).

56 Guidelines § 5B1.3(b).

57 18 U.S.C. § 3563(d).

58 18 U.S.C. § 3564(e), 3565(a).

law judge once an action is initiated, often in ex parte proceedings at which the respondent is not present. In criminal matters, prosecutors can seek asset freeze orders from a district court based on a showing of probable cause that the assets are subject to permanent forfeiture.

In the past, courts were unconvinced by the constitutional argument that pretrial asset freeze orders were a violation of a defendant's Sixth Amendment right to counsel, even if those assets would otherwise be used to pay lawyers' fees.[59] However, more recently, the Supreme Court in Luis v. United States held that the pretrial restraint of a criminal defendant's assets – which assets were not 'tainted' by the alleged criminal conduct – violates the Sixth Amendment right to counsel.[60] As a result, while the government can freeze and seize assets pretrial that are believed to derive from criminal activity, its ability do so for 'untainted' assets are trumped by the defendant's Sixth Amendment right to counsel of choice.

Civil and criminal asset forfeitures 31.2.5.2

Permanent government confiscation of property is called a 'forfeiture'. There are generally three types of forfeiture proceedings available to US law enforcement and prosecutors: administrative, civil and criminal.[61]

Administrative forfeiture permits a federal agency to seize personal (non-real) property without initiating a judicial proceeding. The authority derives from the Tariff Act of 1930, which states that the following types of property are eligible for administrative forfeiture: (1) property whose value does not exceed US$500,000; (2) merchandise whose importation is prohibited; (3) a conveyance used to import, transport or store a controlled substance; or (4) a monetary instrument.[62]

The deadlines and notice requirements for the various types of administrative forfeiture proceedings are set forth in the Civil Asset Forfeiture Reform Act of 2000.[63] Once property is administratively seized, the federal agency involved must give written notice of the seizure to each party who appears to have an interest in the seized article.[64] The notice must contain a description of the property seized; the time, cause and place of the seizure; how a person seeking to claim the property should proceed; and, if known, the name and residence of the owner of the seized property.[65] If no one contests the administrative forfeiture within the dead-

59 See Caplin & Drysdale v. United States, 491 U.S. 617, 626 (1989) (holding that '[a] defendant has no Sixth Amendment right to spend another person's money for services rendered by an attorney'); United States v. Monsanto, 491 U.S. 600, 615 (1989) (holding that the right to counsel was not violated when a defendant's assets were frozen pre-conviction).

60 136 S. Ct. 1083 (2016).

61 The DOJ's Asset Forfeiture and Money Laundering Section publishes an Asset Forfeiture Policy Manual, most recently updated in 2019, to set forth DOJ policy and provide guidance to US Attorneys' Offices on the DOJ's Asset Forfeiture Program. See Asset Forfeiture Policy Manual, available at https://www.justice.gov/criminal-afmls/file/839521/download.

62 19 U.S.C. § 1607.

63 Pub. L. No. 106-185, 114 Stat. 202 (2000).

64 19 U.S.C. § 1607(a).

65 19 C.F.R. § 162.45.

line specified, claimants lose their ability to contest the forfeiture. If a timely claim of the property is received, the matter is referred to the United States Attorney's Office for a judicial proceeding.

Civil forfeiture is an in rem proceeding that is brought directly against a piece of real or personal property that is involved, derived from or traceable to one or more enumerated federal crimes.[66] The property itself is the defendant and no charge against an individual is necessary. In a civil forfeiture proceeding, the government must prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the property is subject to forfeiture.[67] If a claimant raises an innocent owner defence, he or she has the burden of proving that the claimant is an innocent owner of the property by a preponderance of evidence.[68]

Criminal forfeiture is an action brought as part of a criminal case against a defendant, not against a specific asset. It is an in personam action and requires the government to include a forfeiture charge against the defendant in the indictment, and prove that the property was used or derived from one or more enumerated federal crimes.[69] The indictment or criminal information must contain notice to the defendant that the government is seeking forfeiture of property as part of any sentence.[70] If a defendant disposes of the original asset subject to forfeiture, the government may obtain substitute assets[71] or may obtain a money judgment in an amount equal to the criminal proceeds.

When a criminal defendant is found guilty on charges that include the potential criminal forfeiture of property, in most cases the jury then determines whether the government has established 'the requisite nexus between the property and the offense committed by the defendant'.[72] If so, a preliminary order of forfeiture is entered against the defendants. If there are any third parties with an interest in the property, they may seek an ancillary proceeding to prevent the seizure by the government.[73] After the trial judge has disposed of any third-party claims, a final order of forfeiture is entered and the defendant's interest in the property is divested.[74]

A defendant can challenge the dollar amount of a criminal or civil forfeiture as a violation of the Eighth Amendment to the US Constitution, which restricts 66 18 U.S.C. §§ 981 and 983-5.

67 18 U.S.C. § 982(c)(91).

68 18 U.S.C. § 982(d)(1).

69 18 U.S.C. § 982.

70 Fed. R. Crim. P. 32.2(a).

71 Prosecutors may seek the forfeiture of 'substitute assets' in place of tainted property when certain conditions are met. See 21 U.S.C. § 853(p) (incorporated by reference in various criminal forfeiture statutes).

72 Fed. R. Crim. P. 32.2(b)(4). See Honeycutt v. United States, 137 S. Ct. 1626 (2017) (rejecting lower court findings allowing joint and several liability for forfeiture among members of a criminal conspiracy, and holding that criminal asset forfeiture statutes are 'limited to property the defendant himself actually acquired as the result of the crime').

73 Fed. R. Crim. P. 32.2(c).

74 Fed. R. Crim. P. 32.2(c)(2).

the government's ability to impose 'excessive fines' as punishment.[75] Among other factors, courts conducting such a review will look to whether the forfeiture is disproportionate to the defendant's conduct and, therefore, excessive.[76]

Compensation orders 31.2.6

Under the Mandatory Victims Restitution Act of 1996,[77] defendants convicted of certain federal crimes, as well as defendants sentenced to probation, must in most circumstances make restitution to each of their victims in the full amount of the victim's financial losses that resulted from the defendant's crimes.[78] Restitution by the defendant must be ordered regardless of the defendant's economic circumstances, or any third-party compensation received by the victim.[79] Judges must, however, consider a defendant's economic circumstances when deciding on a payment schedule and form of restitution.[80]

Judges must reduce a restitution amount to be paid to a victim if the victim recovers compensatory damages from the defendant for the same loss in a civil proceeding.[81] In addition, if a victim has received insurance proceeds as compensation for a loss suffered due to the defendant's crimes, the defendant's restitution must be paid to the insurance company.[82]

Disqualification and other consequential orders 31.2.7

In addition to imprisonment, fines, probation, forfeitures and other direct sanctions that may be imposed by a criminal court, there are a number of other federal, state and local legal and regulatory restrictions that may result as 'collateral

75 See Alexander v. United States, 509 U.S. 544, 558-59 (1993) (holding that the excessive fines clause of the Eighth Amendment applies to in personam criminal forfeiture for purposes of determining whether a penalty is 'excessive'); Austin v. United States, 509 U.S. 602, 609, 610 (1993) (holding that the excessive fines clause applies to civil forfeitures of conveyances and real property used to facilitate the transport, sale, or possession of controlled substances under 21 U.S.C. §§ 881(a)(4) and (7)).

76 See Alexander, 509 U.S. at 558, 559.

77 Pub. L. No. 104-132, § 204, 110 Stat. 1214, 1227 (codified at 18 U.S.C. §§ 3556, 3663 and 3664).

78 See Hughey v. United States, 495 U.S. 411, 413 (1990) (holding that restitution may only be awarded for losses resulting from the specific conduct for which the defendant was convicted). The Hughey decision was subsequently modified by Congress pursuant to the Crime Control Act of 1990, which authorised courts to order any restitution amount agreed to in a plea agreement, and broadened restitution payable to any person directly harmed by the defendant's conduct in the course of a scheme or conspiracy. See Pub. L. No. 101-647 § 2509, codified at 18 U.S.C. § 3663. See also Lagos v. United States, 138 S. Ct. 1684 (2018) (limiting the ability of corporate victims to obtain restitution orders for legal fees and other costs incurred in conducting internal investigations into a defendant's misconduct).

79 18 U.S.C. § 3664(f)(1)(A)-(B).

80 18 U.S.C. § 3664(f)(2).

81 18 U.S.C. § 3664(j)(2).

82 18 U.S.C. § 3664(j)(1).

consequences' of a criminal conviction.[83] These are opportunities and benefits that are no longer fully available to a person, or legal restrictions a person may operate under, because of their criminal conviction. They are imposed automatically upon conviction, even if not expressly included in the criminal court's judgment, or by action of a civil court or administrative agency. Examples of collateral consequences of a criminal conviction include (1) disqualification from jury service and loss of voting rights, (2) ineligibility for federal employment or military service, (3) inability to obtain a passport or possess a firearm, (4) being banned from serving as an officer or director of a public company, and (5) (for individuals with professional licences, such as attorneys, certified public accountants and securities brokers) suspension or loss of licence.

An individual's suspension or debarment from government contracting is another potential consequence of a criminal proceeding. Allegations of fraud, theft, bribery, falsification of records, violating federal law or other misconduct can all lead to limiting a contractor's ability to do business with federal government agencies. This could begin as a suspension, which is a temporary measure limited to 12 months' duration, that may be imposed at the beginning of an investigation or at the time of criminal indictment. Upon conviction, a contractor may face debarment, which typically means a three-year ban as well as public notification that the contractor is ineligible for government procurement and non-procurement programmes during that time. The relevant agency has a process for considering suspensions and debarments, and while contractors have certain rights to respond and meet the federal personnel considering the matter, the ultimate decision is made at the agency level. Either situation could lead to significant economic consequences for a business that depends on government contracts to survive.

83 See ABA Standards for Criminal Justice, Collateral Sanctions and Discretionary Disqualification of Convicted Persons, Standards 19-2.1 and 19-3.1 (3d ed. 2003), https://www.americanbar.org/groups/criminal_justice/publications/criminal_justice_section_archive/crimjust_standards_collateral_blk/#2.1.

32

Monitorships

Richard Lissack QC, Nico Leslie, Christopher J Morvillo, Tara McGrath and Kaitlyn Ferguson[1]

Introduction 32.1

In the United States, the past decade has seen a notable increase in the use of independent corporate monitors in connection with the resolution of corporate criminal and regulatory investigations. This trend has also recently found a statutory foothold in the United Kingdom, after a period of sporadic sampling of use of corporate monitorships as a tool in the sentencing armoury. Now, in the wake of the United Kingdom's deferred prosecution agreement regime, it is safe to assume that the appointment of a monitor will increasingly feature in the settlement and disposal of corporate investigations. Although monitors come in many shapes and sizes, they typically help to create and supervise the implementation of compliance and remediation programmes to address the perceived deficiencies that gave rise to the wrongdoing. It is expected that monitors will reduce recidivism for corporate misconduct, benefiting the corporation, its shareholders and the public.

In the United States, monitors have been used in both the civil and criminal contexts, typically in conjunction with a settlement agreement negotiated between the parties to a dispute, and often with the approval and supervision of the courts.[2] Outside the criminal context, monitors have been used as conditions

1 Richard Lissack QC and Nico Leslie are members of Fountain Court Chambers. Christopher J Morvillo is a partner, and Tara McGrath and Kaitlyn Ferguson are associates, at Clifford Chance US LLP.

2 In 2014, for instance, the Department of Justice entered into a civil settlement with Citigroup that included a monitorship provision to address Citigroup's false representations to investors regarding its residential mortgage-backed securities. See Department of Justice (DOJ) press release, 'Federal and State Partners Secure Record $7 Billion Global Settlement with Citigroup for Misleading Investors About Securities Containing Toxic Mortgages' (14 July 2014). Monitors may also be used in private cases, especially where there are concerns that misconduct may reoccur of settlements between business entities and a wide range of federal and state agencies,[3] as well as international bodies such as the World Bank.[4] Even private litigants have included monitors in their settlement agreements.[5]

Yet the prevalence of monitors as a condition of high-profile corporate criminal resolutions sets the stage for close scrutiny of the practice in the United States and has given rise to congressional hearings, several United States Department of Justice (DOJ) policy enactments, legal challenges and the promulgation of bar association standards. Therefore, this chapter will focus on monitors used in conjunction with the resolution of federal criminal investigations conducted by the DOJ (including, of course, the various United States Attorney's Offices).[6] Because the practice of using monitors is relatively new in the United Kingdom, this chapter will draw parallels and contrasts in UK law and practice where appropriate from the more developed US practice. After briefly discussing the history of corporate monitors in both countries, this chapter will analyse certain key issues surrounding the use of monitors in both jurisdictions, including the appointment, roles, supervision and funding of monitors.

---

or an institution's culture needs to be remodelled to ensure future compliance. See, e.g., Athletics Integrity Agreement between the National Collegiate Athletic Association and The Big Ten Conference, and the Pennsylvania State University (29 August 2012), available at www.psu.edu/ur/2012/Athletics_Integrity_Agreement.pdf; NCAA, Former Sen. Mitchell Selected as Penn State Athletics Integrity Monitor (1 August 2012), www.ncaa.org/about/resources/media-center/news/former-sen-mitchell-selected-penn-state-athletics-integrity.

3 The Environmental Protection Agency and Securities and Exchange Commission, among many others, also use monitors as part of settlements. See, e.g., Environmental Protection Agency News Release, Duke Energy Subsidiaries Plead Guilty and Sentenced for Clean Water Act Crimes (14 May 2015) (noting that various Duke Energy subsidiaries would be 'monitored by an independent court[-]appointed monitor'); DOJ press release, 'Taiwan-Based AU Optronics Corporation Sentenced to Pay $500 Million Criminal Fine for Role in LCD Price-Fixing Conspiracy' (20 September 2012) (discussing a court-appointed monitor in the antitrust matter against AU Optronics Corporation); Seth Schiesel and Simon Romero, 'WorldCom Strikes a Deal with SEC', *N.Y. Time*s (27 November 2002), www.nytimes.com/2002/11/27/business/worldcom-strikes-a-deal-with-sec.html (discussing WorldCom's settlement with the SEC, which included a monitorship).

4 As part of the World Bank Sanctions Procedures, an independent monitor may be required for parties seeking to remain active with the Bank. World Bank Sanctions Procedures § 9.03 (15 April 2012), available at http://siteresources.worldbank.org/EXTOFFEVASUS/Resources/WBGSanctions_Procedures_April2012_Final.pdf.

5 See, e.g., NCAA Appointed Integrity Monitor, supra note 2, at 1. Additionally, monitors are frequently appointed in lawsuits between private plaintiffs and the government. For example, a monitor was appointed as part of the City of New York's settlement with private plaintiffs regarding the police department's discriminatory enforcement of anti-trespassing rules. Memorandum Opinion and Order at 3 n.8, Davis v. City of New York, No. 10 Civ. 0699 (S.D.N.Y. 28 April 2015).

6 Unless otherwise specified, references herein to 'monitors' or 'monitorships' concern DOJ/United States Attorney's Offices (USAO) corporate monitorships.

Evolution of the modern monitor 32.2

United States 32.2.1

Most monitorships arise as a result of a corporate guilty plea, deferred prosecution agreement (DPA) or non-prosecution agreement (NPA).[7] The DOJ first used DPAs and NPAs in 1993,[8] with the first recognised monitorship following in 1995, in connection with Consolidated Edison's sentencing for disclosure failures following a deadly steam pipe explosion.[9] Spurred on by the collapse of Enron in 2001 and other high-profile instances of corporate misconduct, the US federal government prioritised and increased the investigation and prosecution of corporations. This increase naturally led to a growth in the number of corporate guilty pleas, DPAs and NPAs, and, concomitantly, the rise of monitorships as a condition of settlement.

See Chapters 9 and 10 on co-operating with authorities and Chapters 23 and 24 on negotiating global settlements

As the frequency of monitorships has increased, so too has their level of scrutiny. One of the most controversial aspects of monitorships has been monitor selection. The issue received considerable attention in 2007 when Chris Christie – then the US Attorney for the District of New Jersey – approved, without a bidding process, a contract for a consulting firm founded by his former boss, Attorney General John Ashcroft, to serve as the monitor for medical device company Zimmer Holdings (a contract reportedly worth between US$28 million and US$52 million in monitor fees).[10] Concerns of cronyism, transparency and conflicts of interest led the US Congress to hold an investigative hearing to better understand the appointment.

---

7 DPAs and NPAs, while similar in that they are both pretrial settlement options available to the DOJ/USAO, have different collateral consequences for corporate defendants. With a DPA, the DOJ files a criminal information, which under the DPA the DOJ agrees to dismiss after a term of months or years if the corporate defendant complies with all other terms of the settlement. DPAs are, by virtue of being filed with a court, publicly available and therefore subject corporate defendants to adverse public relations and scrutiny. By contrast, with a NPA, the government agrees not to bring charges against the corporate defendant if it complies with the terms of the settlement; NPAs are not required to be disclosed, though they frequently are by the corporate defendant and/or the DOJ. Because NPAs do not involve the courts, they tend to be far more flexible and desirable for corporate defendants than DPAs.

8 See US Gov't Accountability Off., GAO-10-260T, Prosecutors Adhered to Guidance in Selecting Monitors for Deferred Prosecution and Non-Prosecution Agreements, But DOJ Could Better Communicate Its Role in Resolving Conflicts (2009).

9 See James C McKinley, 'Con Ed Fined and Sentenced to Monitoring for Asbestos Cover-Up', N.Y. Times (22 April 1995), www.nytimes.com/1995/04/22/nyregion/con-ed-fined-and-sentenced-to-monitoring-for-asbestos-cover-up.html. Note, the DOJ was not the first government agency to use monitors. Monitors were used as early as 1978 by the SEC. SEC News Digest, Issue 80-71 at 3 (10 April 1980), available at https://www.sec.gov/news/digest/1980/dig041080.pdf (noting that in S*EC v. Page Airways, Inc*., the defendant agreed to 'retain a Review Person to evaluate the methods and procedures followed in this investigation').

10 Amy Walsh, 'Is the Opaque World of Corporate Monitorships Becoming More Transparent?', Bus. L. Today (December 2015), https://www.americanbar.org/groups/business_law/publications/blt/2015/12/08_walsh/.

In the wake of – and likely to quell criticism over – that controversy, the DOJ first issued guidance on the retention and selection of monitors and has since updated its policies three times. The primary materials issued by the DOJ are as follows:

- Morford Memorandum: In March 2008, then acting Deputy Attorney General Craig Morford issued a memorandum establishing guidelines and decision-making procedures for the appointment of monitors titled 'Selection and Use of Monitors in Deferred Prosecution Agreements and Non-Prosecution Agreements with Corporations' (the Morford Memorandum).[11]
- Breuer Memorandum: In June 2009, Assistant Attorney General Lanny A Breuer issued a memorandum titled 'Selection of Monitors in Criminal Division Matters', in which he built on the Morford Memorandum, outlined the terms required in all monitorship agreements and refined the selection and documentation process for monitors.[12]
- Grindler Memorandum: Gary Grindler, then acting Deputy Attorney General, issued a memorandum in March 2010 titled 'Additional Guidance on the Use of Monitors in Deferred Prosecution Agreements and Non-Prosecution Agreements with Corporations' (the Grindler Memorandum), outlining the means by which corporations can reject a monitor's recommendation for being too costly. This guidance was the result of the increasing costs of monitorships and heavy public scepticism about their benefits.[13]
- Benczkowski Memorandum: In October 2018, Assistant Attorney General Brian A Benczkowski issued a memorandum titled 'Selection of Monitors in Criminal Division Matters' (the Benczkowski Memorandum) that supplemented the guidance provided by the Morford Memorandum. The Benczkowski Memorandum specifies, in greater detail, the principles for determining whether a monitor is needed and formalises in many ways the procedures for monitor nomination, selection and approval.[14]

As a result of these policies, the DOJ's selection process is arguably the most formalised and transparent of any agency. Nevertheless, concern over the selection and use of monitors abounds and the DOJ continues to internally assess the practice.[15] As a consequence of this escalating debate, the American Bar

11 Memorandum from Craig S Morford, Deputy Att'y Gen., to All Component Heads and US Att'ys, Selection and Use of Monitors in Deferred Prosecution Agreements (7 March 2008) (the Morford Memorandum).

12 Memorandum from Lanny A Breuer, Assistant Att'y Gen., to All Criminal Div. Personnel, Selection of Monitors in Criminal Division Matters (24 June 2009).

13 Memorandum from Gary G Grindler, Deputy Att'y Gen., Additional Guidance on the Use of Monitors in Deferred Prosecution Agreements and Non-Prosecution Agreements with Corporations (25 May 2010) (the Grindler Memorandum).

14 Memorandum From Brian A Benczkowski, Assistant Att'y Gen., Selection of Monitors in Criminal Division Matters (11 October 2018) (the Benczkowski Memorandum).

15 Rod Rosenstein, Deputy Att'y Gen., Keynote Address on Corporate Enforcement Policy (6 October 2017) ('We also will review the Department's practices concerning corporate monitors,

Association promulgated black-letter standards for monitors in August 2015 (ABA Standards).[16] The ABA Standards address a variety of issues, ranging from the selection and evaluation of monitors to the establishment of monitor work plans, and are 'the culmination of three years of work by an ABA task force in consultation with judges, prosecutors, defence counsel, court personnel, and academics'.[17]

Controversy over monitors has extended to the courtroom, as companies and monitors battle over, inter alia, the legality of court-appointed monitors and the scope of the monitor's powers,[18] the monitor selection process and the confidentiality of monitor reports.[19]

See Sections 32.4 and 32.5.5

United Kingdom 32.2.2

As the use of corporate monitors grew in the United States after the collapse of Enron, so UK authorities increasingly recognised the possibility of deploying similar monitorships as part of the resolution of their own corporate criminal investigations.[20] At the outset, this was done ad hoc and at the instigation of the relevant investigating authority. By way of example, in 2008 the Serious Fraud Office (SFO) settled civil proceedings against Balfour Beatty arising out of a construction project in Alexandria, Egypt. As part of that settlement, the SFO the FCPA Pilot Program, corporate investigation training programs, and the mandate of the Financial Fraud Enforcement Task Force.'). See infra Section 32.3.

---

16 ABA Standards for Monitors (standards adopted August 2015).

17 Amy Walsh, 'Is the Opaque World of Corporate Monitorships Becoming More Transparent?', Bus. L. Today (December 2015), https://www.americanbar.org/groups/business_law/publications/blt/2015/12/08_walsh/. The ABA Standards provide a much more detailed discussion of best practices and considerations for the principles articulated in the DOJ guidance.

18 For example, after a district court in the Southern District of New York found that Apple violated the Sherman Antitrust Act, the court ordered that Apple be subject to a compliance monitor. Apple challenged the appointment both before the district court and, thereafter, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, alleging, inter alia, that the appointment violated the constitutional separation of powers. See United States v. Apple Inc., 787 F.3d 131, 136 (2d Cir. 2015). As but one example of the alleged constitutional violation, Apple highlighted that after it had moved the district court for a stay of the injunction appointing the monitor, the monitor 'coordinated with the plaintiffs . . . and submitted an affidavit as an integral part of the opposition papers.' Id. at 134, 138. The district court found that the monitor's actions did not evidence the monitor's prejudice against Apple, and though the Second Circuit concurred, it was far more critical of the monitor's conduct: 'It is certainly remarkable that an arm of the court would litigate on the side of a party in connection with an application to the court he serves.' The Second Circuit also noted that the monitor's submission on behalf of the plaintiffs 'was the opposite of best practice for a court-appointed monitor'. Id. at 138.

19 Marieke Breijer, 'ABA London: Keep monitor reports private', Global Investigations Review (13 October 2015), http://globalinvestigationsreview.com/article/1024106/aba-london-monitor-reports-private.

20 See further Jo Rickards and Johanna Walsh, 'DPA corporate monitorships in the UK', Global Investigations Review (21 September 2015), http://globalinvestigationsreview.com/article/1018143/dpa-corporate-monitorships-uk.

required the company to accede to 'a form of external monitoring for an agreed period'. This was an early example of the SFO fashioning new tools to remedy perceived corporate governance failings.

Another example was the SFO's successful prosecution of a construction firm, Mabey & Johnson Ltd, in 2009. This was the first-ever successful prosecution of a British company on charges of overseas corruption and breaching United Nations sanctions, and as part of its guilty plea Mabey & Johnson agreed to the appointment of an independent monitor for three years to oversee future conduct. Although this monitorship was approved by the court, Judge Geoffrey Rivlin QC[21] noted that it was likely to prove an expensive exercise and ordered that the costs of the monitor for the first year be capped at £250,000.

Nonetheless, the use of monitorships remained a novelty in the United Kingdom in the absence of a formal statutory footing. Indeed, it even drew notable judicial criticism on occasion. In the case of Innospec Ltd,[22] a manufacturer found to have paid substantial bribes to Indonesian officials, the English courts expressly criticised the three-year monitorship regime that had been jointly agreed by the SFO and DOJ as part of a 'global settlement' with the company. This was to be the first-ever US–UK joint monitorship, and illustrated the extent to which the UK investigating authorities were attracted by the US regime in adopting monitorships in the determination of corporate criminal investigations.

However, although the English court was prepared to approve this aspect of the settlement, the case – and in particular the terms of the cross-border determination reached between the parties – was controversial. Most unusually, a senior appellate judge, namely Lord Justice Thomas,[23] was brought in to sit on the case at first instance. He made clear that the court's approval for the appointment of a joint monitorship 'should be no precedent for the future'. In particular, he stated that the dual monitorship risked incurring unnecessary costs, and noted that 'imposing an expensive form of "probation order" seems to me unnecessary for a company which will also be audited by auditors well aware of the past conduct and whose directors will be well aware of the penal consequences of any similar criminal conduct.' In his view, the sums used on such monitoring might have been better allocated to paying fines or compensation. Either way, he made clear that in future 'the request for such an order will have to be fully explained in terms of its cost effectiveness.'[24]

Innospec was widely seen as a setback for bilateral appointment of monitorships and signalled some judicial resistance to the US approach to presenting the court with a sentencing or settlement package to be approved. But, in spite of Lord Justice Thomas's reservations, UK investigating authorities continued to seek and obtain orders for corporate monitorships, and these were included in 21 Later and on his retirement as a judge, he became s senior adviser to the Director of the Serious Fraud Office.

22 See R v. Innospec Limited [2010] Crim LR 665.

23 Lord Chief Justice of England and Wales 2013-2017.

24 R v. Innospec Limited [2010] Crim LR 665 at ss.48-49.

civil recovery orders agreed between the SFO and both Macmillan Publishers (in 2011) and Oxford Publishing[25] (in 2012). However, the actual and prospective role of monitorships as a tool of corporate compliance has increased substantially since the creation of the DPA regime in the United Kingdom, introduced by the Crime and Courts Act 2013. In light of that legislation, it is now clear that corporate monitorships have an express and permanent statutory place in the UK criminal law calendar of powers and remedies for holding a corporation to account.[26]

Following the passing of that Act, the SFO launched a consultation process in June 2013 to finalise a Code of Practice for the new DPA regime (the Code). The Code was issued on 14 February 2014, and gives close attention to the role and duties of corporate monitors. Although such monitorships are not a mandatory feature of the new regime, the focus on monitoring in the Code is a powerful indication of the role that UK authorities expect them to play in the future. The Code also sets out a detailed framework for the appointment of monitors, the costs and terms of the monitorship, and the areas that the monitor may be expected to supervise or restructure.[27]

The SFO's first application for a DPA was approved by a senior appellate judge, Sir Brian Leveson, then President of the Queen's Bench Division, on 30 November 2015.[28] The DPA involved Standard Bank Plc, which was the subject of bribery charges relating to multimillion-dollar payments made by a former sister company in Tanzania. As part of the agreed DPA, Standard Bank agreed to submit, at its own expense, to an 'independent review of its existing internal anti-bribery and corruption controls, policies and procedures regarding compliance with the Bribery Act 2010 and other applicable anti-corruption laws'.[29] The independent reviewer appointed was PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP. In his judgment approving the DPA, Leveson P made a number of observations about the difference between the DPA regimes in the United Kingdom and the United States, noting that '[i]n contra-distinction to the United States, a critical feature of the statutory scheme in the UK is the requirement that the court examine the proposed agreement in detail, decide whether the statutory conditions are satisfied and, if appropriate, approve the DPA.' In particular, he observed that the court will only approve a DPA if it is fair, reasonable and proportionate in all the circumstances, but that it will typically consider this question in private so as not 25 See the SFO's press release describing the circumstances of this settlement, which arose because of the publisher's unlawful practices in Kenya and Tanzania: https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2012/07/03/oxford-publishing-ltd-pay-almost-1-9-million-settlement-admitting-unlawful-conduct-east-african-operations/.

26 See Crime and Courts Act 2013, Schedule 17, Part I, s.5(3)(e).

27 See in particular s.7 of the DPA Code of Practice, headed 'Terms'.

28 See the SFO's press release: https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2015/11/30/sfo-agrees-first-uk-dpa-with-standard-bank/.

29 Id.

to prejudice any potential prosecution in the event of an adverse decision.[30] In the case of Standard Bank, he declared himself fully satisfied that the DPA was in the interests of justice.[31]

Following the high-profile Standard Bank case, the SFO soon made a second successful application for a DPA, approved by Leveson P on 6 July 2016.[32] The company, Sarclad Limited, which originally could not be named because of parallel legal proceedings, pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy to corrupt. The DPA provided that Sarclad would undertake a review of its internal compliance controls, and that its chief compliance officer would prepare a report for submission to the SFO on its anti-corruption policies and their implementation, to be submitted within 12 months of the DPA and then annually for the DPA's duration.[33] Although it is not known why this approach was taken by the SFO, it seems likely that it was because the company in question was relatively small and the appointment of a full-time monitor would have been unduly financially onerous. Again, this would appear to demonstrate the flexibility with which UK authorities are now prepared to apply monitoring tools to fashion bespoke remedies for corporate wrongdoing.

Another example is the DPA agreed between the SFO and Tesco Stores Ltd, the supermarket conglomerate, on 28 March 2017 in respect of alleged accounting irregularities. Deloitte was appointed to a monitoring role to review and report on Tesco's controls and governance in respect of the recognition of commercial income.[34] This suggests an ever wider role for corporate monitorships in the United Kingdom, which may be imposed in contexts beyond international bribery and corruption. However, the touchstone for the appropriateness of a monitorship is always likely to be how the corporate has responded to allegations of wrongdoing: in the recent DPA agreed between the SFO and Serco Geografix Ltd,[35] dated 2 July and judicially approved on 4 July 2019, the SFO was satisfied that an undertaking of ongoing co-operation by its parent and a far-reaching corporate renewal programme were sufficient to make a monitorship unnecessary.

Nonetheless, the use of corporate monitorships looks set to increase in the United Kingdom, and a greater convergence with US practice can be expected. This is all the more so given the appointment of Lisa Osofsky, a former deputy general counsel of the FBI, as Director of the SFO in 2018. In a keynote speech on 17 October 2018, Ms Osofsky highlighted the differences between the UK

30 See SFO v. Standard Bank Plc [2016] Lloyd's Rep FC 102 at para. 2.

31 Id. at para. 22.

32 See the SFO's press release: https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2016/07/08/sfo-secures-second-dpa/.

33 See SFO v. XYZ Ltd, unreported, 24 June 2016 at para. 64.

34 See FCA Final Notice to Tesco Stores Ltd dated 28 March 2017, at s.4.10. The DPA was later approved by Leveson P at a hearing on 10 April 2017 and reporting restrictions were lifted in January 2019 following the acquittal of three individuals, https://www.sfo.gov.uk/2019/01/23/deferred-prosecution-agreement-between-the-sfo-and-tesco-published/.

35 See the DPA between Serco Geografix Ltd and the Serious Fraud Office, 2 July 2019, https://www.sfo.gov.uk/download/deferred-prosecution-agreement-serco-geografix-ltd-sfo/ at para. 5(ii)(b)(i) and (iii) and Serious Fraud Office v. Serco Geografix Ltd [2019] Lloyd's Rep FC 518.

and US regimes in respect of corporate prosecutions and DPAs but indicated that the SFO may take a more interventionist approach in future. Above all, she stressed that the SFO 'will want assurance that companies are doing everything they can to ensure the crimes of the past won't be repeated'.[36] In that context, and subject to the terms of the Code, the UK authorities' approach to the appointment and conduct of corporate monitors is ever more likely to follow the lead of the United States in the coming years.

See chapter 23 on negotiating global settlements

Circumstances requiring a monitor 32.3

In general, the DOJ assesses the need for the appointment of a monitor based on whether the corporation is capable of remediating, or has already remediated, its past wrongdoings without the assistance of a monitor. That, in turn, often translates into an enquiry of 'tone at the top' – whether, inter alia, management was involved in the criminal conduct, was negligent in failing to implement a proper compliance programme, fostered a culture that bred non-compliance with ethical and legal duties, and, critically, self-reported the misconduct to the DOJ.[37] The DOJ places significant weight on a company's decision to self-report, as evidenced by its treatment of monitors in the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA) Corporate Enforcement Policy, announced on 29 November 2017,[38] and most recently updated in November 2019.[39] The Corporate Enforcement Policy states: 'When a company has voluntarily self-disclosed misconduct in an FCPA matter, fully cooperated, and timely and appropriately remediated . . . there will be a presumption that the company will receive a declination absent aggravating circumstances involving the seriousness of the offense or the nature of the offender.'[40] Further, '[i]f a criminal resolution is warranted', the DOJ 'generally will not require appointment of a monitor if a company has, at the time of resolution, implemented an effective compliance program.'[41] Significantly, the DOJ has recently signalled its intent to apply the Corporate Enforcement Policy's

See Chapters 3 and 4 on self-reporting to authorities

36 Keynote speech on Future SFO Enforcement at New York University School of Law (17 October 2018), https://wp.nyu.edu/compliance_enforcement/2018/10/16/director-of-the-serious-fraud-office-lisa-osofsky-keynote-on-future-sfo-enforcement/.

37 See 'Is a Corporate Monitor Necessary?', Corp. Crime Rep. (8 May 2013), www.corporatecrimereporter.com/news/200/isamonitornecessary05082013/.

38 Rod Rosenstein, Deputy Attorney General, Remarks at the 34th International Conference on the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (29 November 2017).

39 Justice Manual, US Dep't of Justice, § 9-47.120 (last updated November 2019).

40 Id.

41 Id.

See Chapters 3 and 4 on self-reporting to authorities principles to other white-collar matters,[42] further emphasising the value it places on self-disclosure. Therefore, with increased self-reporting, it is reasonable to expect that monitorships will decline.[43]

In addition to self-reporting, the Morford Memorandum sets forth two broad considerations to guide prosecutors when deciding when a monitor is appropriate: '(1) the potential benefits that employing a monitor may have for the corporation and the public, and (2) the cost of a monitor and its impact on the operations of a corporation.'[44] Because of the breadth of these considerations, the DOJ, through the Benczkowski Memorandum, offered further guidance, and in particular clarified that when assessing 'potential benefits' of the monitorship, one must consider, among other factors: (1) if the misconduct involved the manipulation of books and records or the exploitation of an inadequate compliance programme, (2) the pervasiveness of the misconduct across the business organisation and the degree of its facilitation by senior management, (3) investments by the corporation to improve its compliance programme and internal controls, and (4) whether these remedial improvements had been tested to detect or prevent future similar misconduct.[45] These considerations must be weighed in light of case-specific factors, including the particular regions and industries involved.[46]

Notably, the Benczkowski Memorandum also states that the Criminal Division of the DOJ should only favour the imposition of a monitor when there is a 'demonstrated need for, and a clear benefit' from the monitorship relative to the 'projected costs and burdens' it will create.[47] The defence bar read this as a marked shift away from monitorships. Benczkowski corrected this misimpression

42 Kelly Swanson, 'DOJ expanding use of FCPA declination policy principles', Global Investigations Review (2 March 2018), https://globalinvestigationsreview.com/article/1166274/doj-expanding-use-of-fcpa-declination-policy-principles.

43 Deputy Attorney General Sally Quillian Yates's September 2015 memorandum, 'Individual Accountability for Corporate Wrongdoing' (the Yates Memorandum), reinforces the importance of internal risk assessment and compliance monitoring. As promulgated, the Yates Memorandum requires early and complete self-reporting if a corporation wishes to obtain co-operation credit. Corporations are thus highly incentivised to self-report.

44 Morford Memorandum, supra note 11, at 2.

45 Benczkowski Memorandum, supra note 14, at 2.

46 Commentators have noted that monitorships may be appropriate where companies have faced significant cybersecurity breaches, such as Yahoo!, where a recent breach resulted in the theft of data from more than one billion accounts. See Jacob S Frenkel and Justin L Root, 'Analysis: Cyber-Monitoring: The Next Frontier' (7 March 2017), http://www.dickinson-wright.com/-/media/files/news/2017/03/analysis-cyber-monitoring-the-next-frontier.pdf?la=en. In such cases, the severity of the breach and the complexity of the problem are two factors that may well have a bearing on a decision to impose a monitor.

47 Benczkowski Memorandum, supra note 14, at 2. See also Deputy Assistant Att'y Gen. Matthew S Miner Remarks at the 29th Annual National Institute on Health Care Fraud, New Orleans, 9 May 2019, available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/deputy-assistant-attorney-general-matthew-s-miner-gives-remarks-29th-annual-national (noting the 'bottom line' is that the 'Criminal Division should favor the imposition of a monitor only where there is a demonstrated need for, and clear benefit to be derived from, a monitorship relative to the projected costs and burdens').

in a keynote address in April 2019: 'Put simply, this guidance was not meant to do away with monitors – it was meant to focus our prosecutors' determination on the appropriate factors so that monitors are imposed only where necessary and under the terms and scope that is appropriate for that given case.'[48] In the wake of this guidance, the DOJ has seemingly tailored monitorships more narrowly to the issues at hand, as demonstrated by Walmart's recent settlement, discussed further below. The DOJ also seems willing to adopt quasi-monitorship structures, where a full-blown monitorship is ill-suited.[49]

Note that even corporations registered under the laws of a foreign country are subject to DOJ monitorships, provided the United States has jurisdiction over the corporation's misconduct. Indeed, in recent years in the United States, monitors have been imposed on foreign offenders with increased frequency.[50]

48 Assistant Att'y Gen. Brian A Benczkowski Keynote Address at the Ethics and Compliance Initiative 2019 Annual Impact Conference, Dallas, Texas, 30 April 2019, https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/assistant-attorney-general-brian-benczkowski-delivers-keynote-address-ethics-and; see also Adam Dobrik, 'Criminal division chief plays down talk of monitorship demise', Global Investigations Review (8 March 2019), available at https://globalinvestigationsreview.com/article/jac/1181316/criminal-division-chief-plays-down-talk-of-monitorship-demise (quoting Benczkowski, 'There were many who thought [the Benczkowski Memorandum] reflected a sort of Shakespearean policy of first, let's kill all the monitors. But that's not what it was meant to do . . . . In fact, it was meant to provide greater clarity both to companies but also to our prosecutors to ensure that when they do recommend the appointment of a monitor that they are doing so for the right reasons and with the right scope.').

49 In July 2019, Facebook entered into a record-breaking $5 billion settlement with the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) and DOJ over data privacy claims. The consent order requires Facebook to appoint an 'independent assessor', chosen by Facebook but approved by the FTC and DOJ, to monitor its compliance with the terms of the order for a 20-year term. Plaintiff's Consent Motion for Entry of Stipulated Order for Civil Penalty, Monetary Judgment, and Injunctive Relief and Memorandum in Support at 5, United States v. Facebook, Inc., No. 19-cv-02184 (D.D.C. 24 July 2019); Stipulated Order for Civil Penalty, Monetary Judgment, and Injunctive Relief at 4, United States v. Facebook, Inc., No. 19-cv-02184 (D.D.C. 24 July 2019). The independent assessor must, inter alia, conduct an initial and biennial assessment of Facebook's privacy programme, to be shared with the FTC and DOJ, and attend quarterly meetings with a newly established independent privacy committee of the board of directors, both with and without management present, to discuss privacy risks. Decision and Order at VIII.F, X.A.5, In re Facebook, Inc., Docket No. C-4365 (F.T.C. 24 July 2019).

50 See SEC press release, 'VimpelCom to Pay $795 Million in Global Settlement for FCPA Violations' (18 February 2016), https://www.sec.gov/news/pressrelease/2016-34.html (noting that the SEC imposed a monitor on Dutch company VimpelCom as part of the parties' settlement to resolve VimpelCom's FCPA violations); Independent Monitor of Takata and the Coordinated Remedy Program, Takata Monitor, www.takatamonitor.org/ (Japanese company Takata agreeing to a monitor in connection with its settlement with the US National Highway Traffic Safety Administration for Takata's manufacture and sale of ammonium nitrate airbags).

Similar tests are applied in the United Kingdom. The Code sets out some important considerations for the appointment of a monitor, including whether the company already has a 'genuinely proactive and effective corporate compliance programme', and whether the appointment would be fair, reasonable and proportionate in all the circumstances.[51]

As in the United States, there is likely to be a particular focus on the degree of culpability of the management, especially if that management is still in place. Where the management has been entirely replaced, or where misconduct has been self-reported, there may be less need for an extended monitorship (see, for example, the observations made by the court in Innospec).[52] Moreover, and again in light of the comments in Innospec, the United Kingdom is likely to apply a special focus to matters of cost-effectiveness. Much is likely to turn on an analysis of what is fair, reasonable and proportionate in the circumstances of the specific proposed monitorship.

32.4 Selecting a monitor

The selection of the monitor is often the most controversial aspect of monitorships, as claims of cronyism abound. As outlined by the Morford Memorandum, the government should ensure that the monitor is highly qualified, does not have any conflict of interests (either with the government or the corporation), and will instil public confidence in the monitorship process.[53] The Benczkowski Memorandum attempts to standardise the selection process by creating a Standing Committee on the Selection of Monitors (the Standing Committee).[54] The Standing Committee comprises (1) the Deputy Assistant Attorney General with supervisory responsibility for the Fraud Section, who also serves as the chair of the Standing Committee, (2) the Chief of the Fraud Section (or other relevant Section), and (3) the Deputy Designated Agency Ethics Official for the Criminal Division.[55] To the extent any of these individuals are unable to serve, they may designate a replacement. To the extent further replacements are necessary for any given case, the chair of the Standing Committee may appoint them.[56]

The ABA Standards suggest that both parties 'have a significant role in the selection process', enumerate multiple selection criteria, and outline mandatory and potential exclusions.[57] To this end, the Benczkowski Memorandum provides for the corporation to recommend three qualified candidates through a written proposal. The proposal should provide a description of the candidates' qualifications and credentials; certification that the candidates have no current or future affiliation with the corporation and no conflict of interest in serving as the monitor;

51 See in particular s.7.11 of the DPA Code of Practice.

52 R v. Innospec Limited [2010] Crim LR 665 at ss.48-49.

53 Morford Memorandum, supra note 11, at 3.

54 Benczkowski Memorandum, supra note 14, at 5.

55 Id. at 3-4.

56 Id. at 3.

57 ABA Standards for Monitors §§ 24–2.1; 24–2.4.; 24–2.4(3)–(4).

and a statement identifying the corporation's first choice to serve as monitor.[58] The Criminal Division attorneys handling the matter and their supervisors assess the candidates according to the factors detailed in the Benczkowski Memorandum, and recommend one of the candidates to the Standing Committee.[59] The Standing Committee votes on the recommended candidate and forwards their acceptance or rejection to the Assistant Attorney General of the Criminal Division, who must review and consider the recommendation (and cannot unilaterally accept or veto it).[60] As a further layer of review, all monitor candidates selected pursuant to DPAs, NPAs and plea agreements must be approved by the Office of the Deputy Attorney General.[61]

One issue with past selection methods is that they have not resulted in a diverse monitor pool.[62] For example, between 2004 and 2018, only three women and three non-white attorneys (all male) have been chosen by the DOJ to serve as FCPA monitors, even though there have been more than 45 settlements involving FCPA monitors during the same period.[63] The DOJ appears to be alive to this issue. On 30 April 2018, the DOJ and a US-based subsidiary of Panasonic entered into a DPA to resolve FCPA violations, under which the company agreed to a two-year monitorship.[64] The DOJ included a provision in the DPA that stated: 'Monitor selections shall be made in keeping with the Department's commitment to diversity and inclusion.'[65] The DPA also includes various provisions that enable the DOJ to broaden the group of candidates from which it will select the monitor.[66] While the DOJ cannot consider non-merit-based factors such as race and gender when choosing the most-qualified candidate, these provisions help

58 Benczkowski Memorandum, supra note 14, at 5.

59 Id. at 5-7. Factors for consideration include the candidates' credentials, experience and expertise, degree of objectivity and independence from the corporation, adequacy of resources to discharge responsibilities and any other relevant factors, as determined by the reviewing attorneys.

60 Id. at 7-8.

61 Id. at 8.

62 Dylan Tokar, 'Women and minorities lose out in FCPA monitor selection process', Global Investigations Review (1 February 2018), https://globalinvestigationsreview.com/article/jac/1153265/women-and-minorities-lose-out-in-fcpa-monitor-selection-process.

63 Id. These statistics were made available after a court battle fought by a Global Investigations Review reporter. The reporter filed a lawsuit in December 2016, seeking the names of monitor candidates considered for 15 companies involved in compliance investigations, and the names of the DOJ attorneys involved in the selection process. In March 2018 he prevailed, when the District Court for the District of Columbia ruled that the public's interest in learning the candidates' identities outweighed the government's privacy interest. See Tokar v. U.S. Dep't of Justice, No. 16-2410, 2018 WL 1542320 (D.D.C. 29 March 2018); Jody Godoy, 'DOJ Sued by Reporter Seeking FCPA Monitor Records', Law 360 (9 December 2016), https://www.law360.com/articles/871052/doj-sued-by-reporter-seeking-fcpa-monitor-records.

64 Dep't of Justice Deferred Prosecution Agreement with Panasonic Avionics Corp., 30 April 2018, available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/press-release/file/1058466/download.

65 Id. at 12.

66 Id. ('If the Fraud Section determines, in its sole discretion, that any of the candidates are not, in fact, qualified to serve as the Monitor, or if the Fraud Section, in its sole discretion, is not satisfied with the candidates proposed, the Fraud Section reserves the right to request that the company ensure that the pool from which the DOJ makes its selection is more diverse. A DOJ spokesperson indicated that the above quoted language was added to the Criminal Division's standard agreements last year,[67] and therefore it will likely be a recurring feature in the department's DPAs. It also remains to be seen whether the protocols established by the Benczkowski Memorandum will help create a more diverse monitor pool.

There is also an open question as to judicial oversight of the selection process. In March 2017, the DOJ reached a plea agreement with ZTE for conspiring to violate export control laws, under which ZTE would be subject to a three-year monitorship, with the monitor selected by the DOJ 'in its sole discretion' out of a pool of candidates proposed by ZTE.[68] In an unprecedented move, the court overseeing the matter – the District Court for the Northern District of Texas – amended the terms of the plea agreement to impose a monitor of its own selection and to increase judicial oversight over the monitorship.[69] Specifically, the plea agreement was amended to state that James M Stanton would be appointed as ZTE's monitor,[70] that 'the Monitor is a judicial adjunct pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 53'[71] and that '[a]ll reports, submissions, or other materials encompassed by this agreement will be filed [with the Court].'[72] The appointment of Mr Stanton, a lawyer in private practice and a former Texas state judge, is seen by some as particularly unusual given his lack of monitorship experience.[73] nominate additional candidates. In the event the Fraud Section rejects any proposed monitors, the Company shall propose additional candidates . . . so that three qualified candidates are proposed.').

---

67 Clara Hudson, 'Lawyers laud criminal division's diversity provision for monitors', Global Investigations Review (3 May 2018), https://globalinvestigationsreview.com/article/jac/1168991/lawyers-laud-criminal-divisions-diversity-provision-for-monitors.

68 Plea Agreement at Attachment A ¶¶ 1–2, United States v. ZTE Corp., No. 17-0120-K (N.D. Tex. 7 March 2017) ('[T]he Company will propose to the Department three candidates to serve as the Monitor. . . . The Department retains the right, in its sole discretion, to accept or reject the Monitor candidates proposed by the Company.').

69 The process for selecting the monitor and the terms of the monitorship were outlined in Attachment A to the Plea Agreement. The court subsequently amended Attachment A but left the remainder of the Plea Agreement intact. See Attachment A (Modified) Independent Corporate Compliance Monitor, United States v. ZTE Corp., No. 17-0120-K (N.D. Tex. 22 March 2017). See also Rearraignment Hearing, United States v. ZTE Corp., No. 17-0120-K (N.D. Tex. 22 March 2017) ('Here's what the agreement is as I understand it: It would be a sentence of three years probation on each count, to run concurrently, with an independent corporate compliance monitor appointed by me, by the Court, which is – I have chosen Mr. James Stanton; or if something happens to him or if I choose to change, that would be who it would be, as set out in Attachment A as modified today.').

70 Attachment A (Modified) Independent Corporate Compliance Monitor ¶ 1, United States v. ZTE Corp., No. 17-0120-K (N.D. Tex. 22 March 2017) ('ZTE Corporation . . . agrees to engage James M. Stanton as an independent corporate monitor . . . .').

71 Id. ¶ 6 (emphasis added).

72 Id. ¶ 13.

73 See Sue Reisinger, 'In Rare Move, Judge Imposes Own Monitor in ZTE Plea Deal', The American Lawyer (29 March 2017), http://www.americanlawyer.com/id=1202782436926/In-Rare-Move-Judge-Imposes-Own-Monitor-in-ZTE-Plea-Deal?mcode=0&curindex=0&curpage=ALL (noting that James Stanton is a civil and personal injury lawyer with no prior experience of acting as a

Notably, ZTE's monitorship was imposed as part of a plea agreement, which the court must review and approve. Accordingly, the court had the opportunity to amend the terms of the agreement before approving the plea. It remains to be seen whether courts will take as active a role in crafting the terms of monitorships imposed as part of DPAs and NPAs, which do not require the court's approval.[74]

In the United Kingdom, a slightly different appointment procedure has been laid down by the Code. As part of the negotiations surrounding a DPA in the United Kingdom, the company must provide the prosecuting authority and the court with details of three potential monitors, including their qualifications, their estimated costs and any links with the relevant company. The company should then indicate their preferred monitor of the three, stating the reasons for their preference. This choice will ordinarily be accepted by the prosecuting authority and court, except where a conflict of interest or a lack of relevant experience has been identified.[75]

In terms of eligibility, the monitor must be independent from the company, and thus former employees, clients and close acquaintances are likely ineligible. Additionally, as the requirements of the monitorship will differ case by case, the monitor should be selected based on how well his or her qualifications pair with the requirements of the relevant monitorship.[76] For example, the DPA between the DOJ and Panasonic lists the minimum contemplated qualifications of a monitor as (1) 'sufficient independence' from Panasonic, (2) 'demonstrated expertise with respect to the FCPA and other applicable anti-corruption laws, including experience counseling on FCPA issues', (3) 'experience designing and/or reviewing corporate compliance policies, procedures and internal controls, including FCPA and anti-corruption policies, procedures, and internal controls', and (4) 'ability to access and deploy resources necessary to discharge the Monitor's duties' under the agreement.[77]

In global settlements, both US and UK authorities increasingly see the value of appointing a monitor experienced in the laws of the relevant jurisdiction.[78] Although the Morford Memorandum suggests that non-attorney experts 'such as accountants, technical or scientific experts, and compliance experts' may be better qualified for certain monitorships, in practice, in both the US and UK monitors are predominantly lawyers, and often have prosecutorial experience.[79] monitor and no significant criminal experience, albeit per his resume he has served as a special master and arbitrator in six civil cases).

---

74 See United States v. Fokker Services BV, 818 F.3d 733, 741 (D.C. Cir. 2016).

75 See in particular ss.7.15-7.17 of the DPA Code of Practice.

76 See Benczkowski Memorandum, supra note 14, at 2.

77 Dep't of Justice Deferred Prosecution Agreement with Panasonic Avionics Corp. at 11-12, 30 April 2018, available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/press-release/file/1058466/download.

78 See infra notes 102-104 and accompanying text discussing Rolls-Royce's monitor, British lawyer Lord Gold.

79 One study found that half of all monitors appointed in connection with DPAs and NPAs since 2001 have been former prosecutors, leading some critics to describe the monitoring industry as a 'full employment act for former federal prosecutors'. See Alison Frankel, 'DOJ should end secret

Note, however, as the requirements of the monitorship can evolve over the duration of the monitorship, and the appointed monitor may prove to be incompatible with the corporation, the government may replace the monitor and the monitor is free to resign. As one example of a rather tumultuous monitorship, Western Union went through four monitors as part of a 2010 settlement for failing to comply with anti-money laundering laws.[80]

To avoid such situations, third-party organisations have devoted themselves to promoting the use, quality and efficiency of monitors.[81] For example, the International Association of Independent Corporate Monitors – whose board is itself composed of many former monitors – offers resources and training to professionals, and has established a Code of Professional Conduct to serve as a template for best standards and practices.[82]

32.5 The role of the monitor

32.5.1 Scope of the monitorship

The scope of the monitorship should be tailored to the circumstances of each case, with the ultimate goal of reducing the risk of recurrence of the corporation's misconduct.[83] Therefore, the monitor's role should normally include a mandate for oversight, review and proposed modification of a company's compliance programme to facilitate rehabilitation of existing misconduct and deterrence of future selection process for corporate watchdogs', Reuters Blog (14 July 2014), http://blogs.reuters.com/alison-frankel/2014/07/14/doj-should-end-secret-selection-process-for-corporate-watchdogs/; Steven Davidoff Solomon, 'In Corporate Monitor, a Well-Paying Job But Unknown Results', The NY Times: Dealbook (15 April 2014), http://dealbook.nytimes.com/2014/04/15/in-corporate-monitor-a-well-paying-job-but-unknown-results/. As but one recent example, the former Deputy Chief in the Fraud Section of the Criminal Division of the DOJ was recently appointed to serve as a monitor for Odebrecht as part of its guilty plea for FCPA violations. See Jody Godoy, 'DOJ Taking $24m Haircut on Odebrecht's $2.6B FCPA Fine', Law 360 (12 April 2017), https://www.law360.com/articles/912549/doj-taking-24m-haircut-on-odebrecht-s-2-6b-fcpa-fine; Biography of Charles E. Duross, Morrison Foerster, https://www.mofo.com/people/charles-duross.html.

80 Rachel Louise Ensign and Max Colchester, 'Meet the Private Watchdogs Who Police Financial Institutions', The Wall Street J. (30 August 2015), www.wsj.com/articles/meet-the-private-watchdogs-who-police-financial-institutions-1440983917. On 9 June 2017, a court accepted the monitor's final report, thereby ending Western Union's monitorship. See The Western Union Company, Form 8-K, filed 9 June 2017.

81 International Association of Independent Corporate Monitors, 'About Us', at http://iaicm.org/about-independent-corporate-monitors/ (describing the mission/purpose of the organisation and discussing the Code of Professional Conduct) (last accessed 5 June 2017).

82 Id. (touting its members as having the 'breadth and depth of relevant skills, knowledge, and experience, together with reputation of character, to effectively serve as [monitors]'). See also Thomas Fox, 'IAICM Shine a Light on Corporate Monitors', JD Supra, 8 March 2017 http://www.jdsupra.com/legalnews/iaicm-shine-a-light-on-corporate-85994/. Membership is comprised of a 'distinguished panel of current and former corporate monitors, retired judges, and one former FBI agent'.

83 Morford Memorandum, supra note 11, at 5.

wrongdoing.[84] Accordingly, the monitor may be required to assist with structural changes, as well as help alter corporate culture and normative expectations.[85] In the United Kingdom, a list of items and procedures that the monitor may wish to consider as part of its monitoring programme is set out in the Code.[86]

Following the Benczkowski Memorandum, appropriate tailoring has become increasingly important and gives parties the opportunity to think carefully about the shape the monitorship should take.[87] In Walmart's June 2019 settlement with the DOJ over FCPA violations, the company agreed to a monitorship whose mandate was narrowed both by geography (to four countries and the company's headquarters) and subject matter (to specified Key Risk Areas).[88] The agreement specifically stated: 'The Monitor shall not conduct a comprehensive review of all business lines, all business activities, or all countries.'[89]

The monitor is an independent third party and does not serve as an employee or agent of either the corporation or the government.[90] Likewise, the monitor does not have an attorney–client relationship with either the corporation or the government. Nonetheless, it is critical for the monitor to have an open dialogue with, and co-operation from, the corporation and the government throughout the duration of the monitorship, which may include 'iterative work plans, planning

84 See for example Dep't of Justice Deferred Prosecution Agreement with Avon Products, Inc., 15 December 2014, available at https://www.sec.gov/Archives/edgar/data/8868/000000886814000073/exhibit992dpa.htm ('[T]he Monitor will evaluate, in the manner set forth below, the effectiveness of the internal accounting controls, record-keeping, and financial reporting policies and procedures of the Company as they relate to the Company's current and ongoing compliance with the FCPA . . . .').

85 Critics complain that '[l]ittle is publicly disclosed about what specifically they are supposed to accomplish [and] what they discover in their examinations.' Rachel Louise Ensign and Max Colchester, 'Meet the Private Watchdogs Who Police Financial Institutions', The Wall Street J. (30 August 2015), www.wsj.com/articles/meet-the-private-watchdogs-who-police-financial-institutions-1440983917.

86 See in particular s.7.21 of the DPA Code of Practice.

87 See, supra notes 46 and 47 and accompanying text.

88 Dep't of Justice Non-Prosecution Agreement with Walmart, Inc., Attachment C at ¶ 2, 20 June 2019, available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/press-release/file/1175791/download. The monitor's mandate was limited to an assessment of the 'Key Risk Areas', defined as 'anti-corruption-related internal auditing controls related to anti-corruption, record-keeping, and financial reporting policies and procedures of the Company as they relate to permits and licensing, real estate development and construction . . . donations . . . and third-party intermediaries', with several explicit carve-outs. The monitor's mandate was further limited to four countries, as well as Walmart's headquarters in Arkansas. Id.

89 Id. at ¶ 8.

90 Notably, some corporations have taken to hiring their own internal monitors following the government's implementation of a monitor. For example, as part of Western Union's 2010 settlement, Western Union received a monitor. Independently, Western Union also hired a consultant, leading to what in effect was a 'dual system of internal monitors – one stipulated by the settlement and the other hired by the money-transfer firm'. Rachel Louise Ensign and Max Colchester, 'Meet the Private Watchdogs Who Police Financial Institutions', The Wall Street J. (30 August 2015), www.wsj.com/articles/meet-the-private-watchdogs-who-police-financial-institutions-1440983917.

meetings prior to any substantive work, and mid-review meetings'.[91] The parties should also stipulate what, if any, role the government or court should play in resolving disputes that may arise between the monitor and the corporation.[92]

Though the monitor does not take on a prosecutorial function, he or she may nonetheless uncover continuing or undisclosed misconduct. The monitorship agreement 'should clearly identify any types of previously undisclosed or new misconduct that the monitor will be required to report directly to the [government]'. And, on the other hand, the agreement should identify any misconduct that the monitor can, in its discretion, report to the government, the corporation or both.[93]

32.5.2 Duration of the monitorship

Monitorships can range from months to several years. The duration of the monitorship will in large part depend on the scope of the monitorship, and in particular the extent of the problems found and the necessary remedial measures.[94] When negotiating duration, the parties should be mindful of, inter alia, the 'nature and seriousness of the underlying misconduct'; the 'pervasiveness and duration of the misconduct'; the complicity of senior management; the 'corporation's history of similar misconduct'; the corporate culture; the 'scale and complexity of any remedial measures contemplated by the agreement, including the size of the entity or business unit at issue'; and the current 'stage of design and implementation of remedial measures'.[95]

In most cases, the monitorship agreement will permit the government to extend the monitorship at its discretion if the corporation has not satisfied its obligations under the settlement, and provide for early termination if the corporation can demonstrate 'a change in circumstances sufficient to eliminate the need for a monitor'.[96] For example, after Credit Suisse admitted to aiding US tax evasion, the New York State Department of Financial Services appointed a monitor for what 91 F Joseph Warin, Michael S Diamant and Veronica S Root, 'Somebody's Watching Me: FCPA Monitorships and How They Can Work Better', 13 U. Pa. J. Bus. L. 321, 364 (2011), available at http://scholarship.law.upenn.edu/jbl/vol13/iss2/1.

92 Grindler Memorandum, supra note 13, § II.

93 Morford Memorandum, supra note 11, at 7. Critically, undisclosed or continuing misconduct may invalidate the terms of the settlement and lead to an extension of the term and scope of the monitorship.

94 Morford Memorandum, supra note 11, at 7-8.

95 Id. at 7. See Assistant Att'y Gen. Brian A Benczkowski Keynote Address at the Ethics and Compliance Initiative 2019 Annual Impact Conference, Dallas, Texas, 30 April 2019, available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/assistant-attorney-general-brian-benczkowski-delivers-keynote-address-ethics-and (noting that a monitorship limited to two years was appropriate as part of Fresenius Medical Care's FCPA settlement, because the company 'had made a number of improvements to its compliance program but had not yet fully tested that program').

96 Morford Memorandum, supra note 11, at 8 ('For example, if a corporation ceased operations in the area that was the subject of the agreement, a monitor may no longer be necessary. Similarly, if a corporation is purchased by or merges with another entity that has an effective ethics and compliance program, it may be prudent to terminate a monitorship.').

was anticipated to be a two-year monitorship. However, shortly after the monitorship began in October 2014, a tolling period was triggered because Credit Suisse could not produce information at the pace and volume required by the monitor.[97] After more than three years of monitorship, the Department of Financial Services entered a consent order requiring Credit Suisse to engage an independent consultant for an additional year.[98] In the United Kingdom, this ability to extend monitorships has been formally recognised in the Code, subject to the extended term of the monitorship not exceeding the length of the DPA itself.[99]

Hybrid monitorships – in which the monitor serves for approximately 18 months and the corporation self-reports for the following 18 months – are also becoming increasingly common, especially in the context of FCPA investigations.[100] As a further nuance, the DOJ has, in some instances, agreed to defer to a pre-existing monitorship in lieu of establishing its own monitorship. As one example, the December 2015 settlement between Alstom and the DOJ, over Alstom's various FCPA violations, required that Alstom be subject to an independent monitor. However, Alstom was already subject to a monitor in connection with a 2012 settlement with the World Bank. Rather than implement a second monitor, the DOJ agreed to defer to the existing World Bank-appointed monitor, provided that, inter alia, Alstom self-report to the DOJ 'at no less than twelve-month intervals during a three-year term'.[101]

Rolls-Royce reached a similar resolution in its January 2017 settlement with US, UK and Brazilian authorities over bribery and corruption charges (and, in the United States, FCPA charges). At the time, Rolls-Royce already had an independent monitor – Lord Gold – who was appointed to review the company's anti-bribery and corruption compliance in connection with a 2013 settlement with the SFO. Though the company's 2017 DPA with the SFO did not impose a second monitor, it did require Rolls-Royce, inter alia, to procure a further report from Lord Gold outlining recommendations for change and produce a 97 John Letzing, 'Credit Suisse's Tardiness Likely to Extend Monitor's Sojourn', The Wall Street J. (6 January 2016), www.wsj.com/articles/credit-suisses-tardiness-likely-to-extend-monitors-sojourn-1452084986.

98 N.Y. Dep't of Fin. Services Consent Order, In the Matter of Credit Suisse AG (13 November 2017), available at https://www.dfs.ny.gov/docs/about/ea/ea171113.pdf.

99 See s.7.19 of the DPA Code of Practice.

100 FCPA Digest, 'Recent Trends and Patterns in the Enforcement of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act' at 2, 6, Shearman & Sterling (6 January 2014), available at www.shearman.com/~/media/Files/Services/FCPA/2014/FCPADigestTPFCPA010614.pdf. For example, the DOJ's DPA with Panasonic requires a two-year monitorship, after which Panasonic is required to undertake follow-up reviews for the remainder of the agreement. Dep't of Justice Deferred Prosecution Agreement with Panasonic Avionics Corp. at 12–13, 30 April 2018, available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/press-release/file/1058466/download.

101 Dylan Tokar, 'With Alstom Monitor Agreement, DOJ Tries Something New', Global Investigations Review (4 February 2015), available at http://globalinvestigationsreview.com/article/1023537/with-alstom -monitor-agreement-doj-tries-something-new.

written plan of how it would implement these recommendations.[102] Likewise, the company's DPA with the DOJ did not implement a further monitor, but did require the company to report to the DOJ at least once a year for the next three years and to produce a series of reports.[103] When the SFO applied to the English Court for approval of the DPA, the senior judge who heard that application, Sir Brian Leveson, President of the Queen's Bench Division, expressly referred to the appointment of Lord Gold and the ongoing monitoring process as important factors indicating that Rolls-Royce had properly addressed issues of corporate compliance; this made the DPA (as opposed to criminal prosecution) an appropriate outcome.[104]

The 2019 Serco Geografix DPA took into consideration the fact that the parent company, Serco Group, had adopted an ongoing corporate renewal programme in 2013, which had been approved by the UK government, to improve assurance mechanisms and working practices within all companies in the group. In the approved judgment, Davis J said that this amounted to a significant remedial measure.[105]

32.5.3 Creating a work plan

Under the ABA Standards, the monitor should draft a detailed work plan at the outset of the monitorship, with input from the corporation and government.[106] This is also a requirement of the UK regime under the Code, which stipulates that a work plan should be prepared even before the monitor's appointment is finally approved.[107] The work plan will ordinarily include an overview of the monitor's role and objectives, a description of the corporation's policies and procedures to be evaluated, a list of documents the monitor seeks to review, and a list of persons the monitor seeks to interview. The work plan should also include a proposed timeline for reaching certain milestones, such as a review of documents concerning the corporation's compliance programme; interviews with senior management, the board of directors and audit committee; and deadlines for reporting of the 102 Deferred Prosecution Agreement between the SFO and Rolls-Royce, paras. 25 to 34, available at http://iaicm.org/wp-content/uploads/formidable/9/Rolls-Royce-SFO-DPA-17Jan2017.pdf.

103 Deferred Prosecution Agreement at 4–5, D-1, United States v. Rolls-Royce PLC, No. 16-0247 (S) (S.D. Ohio 20 December 2016) ('Based on the Company's remediation and the state of its compliance program, and the Company's agreement to report to the Fraud Section and the Office as set forth in Attachment D to this Agreement, the Fraud Section and the Office determined that an independent compliance monitor was unnecessary[.]').

104 Serious Fraud Office v. Rolls-Royce Plc [2017] Lloyd's Rep FC 249 at paras. 43-47 and 61-64.

105 Serious Fraud Office v. Serco Geografix Limited [2019] Lloyd's Rep FC 518 at para. 25.

106 If disclosing the work plan to the company would limit the monitor's effectiveness, however, the parties should consider an alternative arrangement. See ABA Standards for Monitors § 24-3.3(3).

107 See s.7.18 of the DPA Code of Practice.

monitor's findings.[108] In the United Kingdom, the work plan is required to set out provisions for costs and even to state with what frequency the monitor intends to report to the prosecutor.[109]

Not only does a detailed work plan help control costs and increase transparency, but it also helps prepare all parties for the monitorship.[110] Accordingly, the corporation will have a better understanding of what can be expected, and the act of preparing the work plan helps the monitor become familiar with the company's culture and risk tolerance. Further, a detailed work plan helps ensure that the monitor's expectations for the corporation are reasonable and that the government is comfortable with the monitor's approach.[111]

Reviewing documents and interviewing witnesses 32.5.4

To serve as an effective monitor and issue tailored recommendations to the corporation, the monitor must understand the corporation and its business. To develop this understanding, the monitor must have wide access to the documents and information deemed reasonably necessary to carry out the monitorship.[112] A recurring problem, however, is that given the monitor's independence, corporations are hesitant to disclose sensitive information. Under the ABA Standards, the corporation is not required to provide documents covered by the attorney–client or work-product privilege, or documents for which disclosure would be 'inconsistent with applicable law'.[113] A similar approach is adopted under the UK Code, which requires the company to grant the monitor 'complete access to all relevant aspects of its business during the course of the monitoring period', but does not affect the company's right to assert legal professional privilege over relevant documents.[114]

See Chapters 35 and 36 on privilege

108 Jason T Wright, 'The Corporate Compliance Monitor's Role in Regulatory Settlement Agreements', SRR (Spring 2014), www.srr.com/article/corporate-compliance-monitors-role-regulatory-settlement-agreements.

109 See s.7.18 of the DPA Code of Practice.

110 See Warin, supra note 91, at 360 (noting that the work plan also serves as a 'gloss on the settlement agreement to be applied in subsequent years of the monitorship').

111 Jason T Wright, 'The Corporate Compliance Monitor's Role in Regulatory Settlement Agreements', SRR (Spring 2014), www.srr.com/article/corporate-compliance-monitors-role-regulatory-settlement-agreements.

112 See Rachel Louise Ensign and Max Colchester, 'Meet the Private Watchdogs Who Police Financial Institutions', The Wall Street J. (30 August 2015), www.wsj.com/articles/meet-the-private-watchdogs-who-police-financial-institutions-1440983917 (noting that the monitorship involved over 3,500 meetings with HSBC staffers, 11,500 document requests, and over 2 million pages of documents).

113 ABA Standards for Monitors § 24-4.2(1)(a)–(2)(a). Despite the monitor's independence, the monitor still has a duty to the corporation by nature of the appointment. Thus, the monitor cannot use proprietary or confidential information obtained during the monitorship for any purpose other than in furtherance of the monitorship. Where proprietary information is disclosed, the monitor and corporation should work together to ensure this information remains confidential. The parties should also stipulate how the monitor is to return any confidential or proprietary documents upon completion of the monitorship.

114 See s.7.14 of the Code.

See Chapters 5 and 6 on beginning an internal investigation; 7 and 8 on witness interviews; and 13 and 14 on employee rights

It may also be necessary for the monitor to interview personnel, from low-level employees to senior management. The monitorship agreement should ordinarily address issues of employee rights that could arise during the monitorship, including privacy rights and the right to counsel – issues that take on added complexity where the monitor's review is cross-border. Ordinarily, the monitor should inform interviewees of his or her identity and explain why information is being collected. The monitor should also inform interviewees whether they are the target of the monitor's investigation and of their right to have counsel present during the interview. Where an employee chooses to exercise the right to counsel, the monitor must respect that decision.[115]

The monitor may find it advisable to inform interviewees of the degree to which the information being provided will remain confidential and what, if anything, the monitor is required to do with that information. In some circumstances, such as when information would otherwise be hard to extract, it may be appropriate for the monitor to have the authority to collect information confidentiality to protect its sources.[116]

32.5.5 Issuing recommendations and reports

During the course of the monitorship, the corporation and monitor should work together to develop recommendations for improvement of the corporation's compliance programme and to prevent recidivism of corporate misconduct. The recommendations should be mindful of local laws concerning, for example, data privacy and privilege. Depending on the scope and duration of the monitorship, the monitor may summarise his or her findings and recommendations in periodic reports to the government or court, or issue a single report at the end of the monitorship.[117] As negative findings in the report have the potential to significantly harm the corporation, in some circumstances the monitor may provide the corporation with a preliminary draft and invite comments.[118] Ultimately, however, the report is issued by the monitor alone, and must reflect the monitor's honest conclusions and recommendations.

Where the corporation disagrees with one of the monitor's recommendations, the corporation may reject it within a reasonable time, provided the government is informed. The government may consider this rejection when evaluating whether the corporation has fulfilled its obligations under the settlement.[119] Under the 115 Except in limited circumstances, a company is not required to provide counsel or pay for counsel for employees being interviewed.

116 ABA Standards for Monitors § 24-4.2(4)(d).

117 Morford Memorandum, supra note 11, at 6.

118 ABA Standards for Monitors § 24-4.3(1)(d). Giving the corporation the opportunity to review a draft report may improve the quality of the report, as the corporation can correct any errors and, where applicable, provide evidence to rebut the monitor's negative findings.

119 Morford Memorandum, supra note 11, at 6. For example, after Standard Charter settled charges that it disguised transactions that could have violated US sanctions, two monitors were appointed as well as one 'independent consultant'. The monitors' findings that inadequate controls were used led to an additional $300 million fine. Rachel Louise Ensign and Max Colchester, 'Meet

Grindler Memorandum, where a corporation rejects a monitor's recommendation on the basis of cost, it should provide a written proposal of 'an alternative policy, procedure, or system designed to achieve the same objective or purpose'.[120]

In the United Kingdom, the confidentiality of a monitor's reports and correspondence is expressly recognised in the Code, and its disclosure is restricted to the company, the prosecuting authority and the court (except as otherwise permitted by law).[121] Similarly in the United States, the government routinely denies Freedom of Information Act requests filed by news outlets for the production of monitor reports.[122] However, the public's right of access to such reports has been litigated in relation to the deferred prosecution agreement between the DOJ and HSBC.[123]

By way of background, in 2012, HSBC reached a US$1.9 billion settlement with the government and secured a five-year DPA for HSBC's failure to comply with anti-money laundering laws and US sanctions.[124] In an unusual turn of events, the court approved the DPA on the condition that the court could continue to exercise 'supervisory' control over the case.[125] A monitor was appointed as part of the settlement and issued a 1,000-page report in January 2015, a copy of which was filed under seal with the court. Thereafter, an HSBC mortgage customer asked the court to unseal the report so he could determine whether HSBC continued to engage in 'unsafe and unsound business practices'.[126] The lower court held that the report qualified as a 'judicial record' that should be filed publicly, and that 'the public has a First Amendment right to see the Report', though HSBC and the government could suggest redactions and parts to remain under the Private Watchdogs Who Police Financial Institutions', The Wall Street J. (30 August 2015), www.wsj.com/articles/meet-the-private-watchdogs-who-police-financial-institutions-1440983917.

---

120 Grindler Memorandum, supra note 13, § II.

121 See s.7.20 of the DPA Code of Practice.

122 Rachel Louise Ensign and Max Colchester, 'Meet the Private Watchdogs Who Police Financial Institutions', The Wall Street J. (30 August 2015), www.wsj.com/articles/meet-the-private-watchdogs-who-police-financial-institutions-1440983917.

123 The HSBC matter represents the most public instance of a party seeking access to a monitor's report, however, it is not the only such example. See In re Depuy Orthopaedics, Inc. Pinnacle Hip Implant Prod. Liab. Litig., No. 11 MD 2244, 2013 WL 2091715 (N.D. Tex. 15 May 2013) (ordering disclosure of monitor's report in a product liability matter).

124 In December 2017, the DOJ found that HSBC had successfully addressed the issues related to its case and sought to dismiss. Evan Weinberger, 'DOJ Seeks Dismissal of HSBC Money Laundering Case', Law 360 (12 December 2017), https://www.law360.com/articles/993914/doj-seeks-dismissal-of-hsbc-money-laundering-case.

125 See Christie Smythe, 'Judge Lets Sun Shine on Secret HSBC Money Laundering Report', Bloomberg (29 January 2016), www.bloomberg.com/news/articles/2016-01-29/judge-lets-sunshine-on-secret-hsbc-report-on-money-laundering.

126 Nate Raymond, 'HSBC money laundering report's release likely delayed: U.S. judge', Reuters (10 February 2016), www.reuters.com/article/us-hsbc-moneylaundering-idUSKCN0VI28H. See United States v. HSBC Bank USA NA, No. 12 CR 763 (JG), 2016 WL 347670, at *1, *6 (E.D.N.Y. 28 January 2016), motion to certify appeal denied, No. 12-0763, 2016 WL 2593925 (EDNY 4 May 2016) (inviting the parties to suggest further redactions to the report).

seal.[127] HSBC and the government opposed the unsealing, claiming it 'could provide a "road map" for criminals seeking to launder money'.[128] HSBC's lawyer said the court's order also called into question assurances given to foreign regulators who had provided information to the monitor on condition the report be kept secret.[129] On 12 July 2017, the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reversed the lower court's decision noting that 'a district court's role vis-à-vis a DPA is limited to arraigning the defendant, granting a speedy trial waiver if the DPA does not represent an improper attempt to circumvent the speedy trial clock, and adjudicating motions or disputes as they arise.'[130] Given the limited supervisory role of courts in the DPA context, the Second Circuit held that a monitor's report is not a judicial record because it is not 'relevant to the performance of the judicial function'.[131] The holding, which relies upon and is consistent with the DC Circuit Court of Appeals' decision in United States v. Fokker Services BV, limits both a district court's initial judicial review of a DPA and its subsequent oversight of the DPA's execution.[132]

The District Court for the District of Columbia made a similar ruling in 100Reporters LLC v. United States Department of Justice, concerning monitor reports issued in the wake of Siemens' 2008 settlement with the United States and Germany. There, reporters sued to obtain the reports under FOIA. In a March 2017 decision, the court acknowledged that significant portions of the report may be exempt from production under FOIA – for example, because they contain 'classic attorney work-product' and 'information [that] cuts to the core of Siemens' business', on which a competitor could rely to Siemens' detriment – but the court was not prepared to find that all information should be so shielded.[133]

Given the remaining uncertainty over the confidentiality of the monitor's report, it has become best practice – as confirmed by ABA Standard 24-4.3(4) – for the government and the corporation to determine whether reports will be made public when negotiating the settlement agreement:

127 HSBC Bank USA NA, 2016 WL 34760, at *1, *6. ZTE's monitor reports may be particularly susceptible to this type of argument, given that the plea agreement as amended by Judge Kinkeade refers to the monitor as a 'judicial adjunct' and provides that all monitor reports be filed with the court, albeit under seal and subject to in-camera review. See supra notes 68-72 and accompanying text.

128 Nate Raymond, 'HSBC money laundering report's release likely delayed: U.S. judge', Reuters (10 February 2016), www.reuters.com/article/us-hsbc-moneylaundering-idUSKCN0VI28H.

129 Id.

130 United States v. HSBC Bank USA, N.A., 863 F.3d 125, 129 (2d Cir. 2017).

131 Id. at 137.

132 See United States v. Fokker Services B.V., 818 F.3d 733 (D.D.C. 2016).

133 100Reporters LLC v. U.S. Dep't of Justice, No. 14-1264-RC, at 3, 32, 58 (D.D.C. 31 March 2017) (finding that the DOJ had justified withholding portions of the report under certain exemptions to FOIA, but had not justified the withholding of all portions of the report or demonstrated that the report could not be segregated for purposes of partial production).

> To perform its duties, the monitor needs access to unprivileged, confidential and proprietary business information of the corporation and communications among the corporation, the monitor and the government need to be candid and complete over an extended period.
>
> Recognising that corporate information included in monitor reports may be used unfairly by competitors and others to disadvantage the corporation, DPAs and NPAs typically reflect the parties' intentions to maintain the confidentiality of monitor reports.[134]

Where a proposed settlement agreement instituting a monitorship lacks such explicit proviso for confidentiality, counsel should seek to revise and include it.

Costs and other considerations 32.6

Monitorships can be extremely expensive, with monitors collecting multimillion-dollar fees, to be paid for by the corporation (and ultimately its shareholders).[135] Critics note that the rise in monitorships has created 'a lucrative cottage industry made up of former prosecutors and small consulting firms', some of which even offer expertise in assisting corporations monitor their monitors.[136] Others argue that the cost of the monitorship will be offset against the fines levied on the corporation and that the imposition of a monitor may help sway the government in favour of reduced fines.[137]

---

134 Karen F Green and Timothy D Saunders, 'Minding the Monitor: Disclosure of Corporate Monitor Reports to Third Parties', Bloomberg BNA (2014), available at https://www.wilmerhale.com/uploadedFiles/Shared_Content/Editorial/Publications/Documents/green-saunders-minding-the-monitor.pdf.

135 Both the Morford Memorandum and the Grindler Memorandum counsel the need for prosecutors to be mindful of the costs of monitors and their potential impact on the corporation when negotiating settlements. Grindler Memorandum, supra note 13, § II (noting that the government 'should help to instill public confidence in the Department's use of monitors, including the Department's mindfulness of the costs of a monitor and their impact on a corporation's operations'); Morford Memorandum, supra note 11, at 2 (noting that prosecutors must be mindful of 'the cost of a monitor and impact on the operations of a corporation').

136 Rachel Louise Ensign, 'Judge Rules HSBC's Outside Monitor's Secret Report Should be Made Public', The Wall Street J. (29 January 2016), www.wsj.com/articles/judge-rules-hsbcs-outside-monitors-secret-report-should-be-made-public-1454086003; see also Rachel Louise Ensign and Max Colchester, 'Meet the Private Watchdogs Who Police Financial Institutions', The Wall Street J. (30 August 2015), www.wsj.com/articles/meet-the-private-watchdogs-who-police-financial-institutions-1440983917.

137 Whereas fines are usually due in one lump sum, payments for monitors are commonly billed monthly. See Jason T Wright, 'The Corporate Compliance Monitor's Role in Regulatory Settlement Agreements', SRR (Spring 2014), www.srr.com/article/corporate-compliance-monitors-role-regulatory-settlement-agreements ('More often than not, however, this cost is far less than what the company would otherwise pay in fines, possible debarment, or legal fees in defending an enforcement action through trial.'); Patricia M Sulzbach, 'Independent Corporate Monitors: A Company's Friend or Foe?', ABA White Collar Crime Comm. Newsletter (18 April 2013), available at https://www.americanbar.org/content/dam/aba/publications/criminaljustice/sulzbach.authcheckdam.pdf.

The ultimate cost of the monitorship will largely depend on the scope and duration of the monitorship. Cost will also be influenced by the complexity of the settlement agreement, the state of the corporation's existing compliance programme, and the geographic markets and industries in which the corporation operates. The monitor should take these various factors into consideration when providing the corporation with a projected budget. The monitor and the corporation should also consider and agree on an hourly rate or a fixed rate, any applicable rate adjustments and a potential fee cap. Further, to increase transparency and mitigate the risk of conflicts, the monitor should provide regular updates on the costs being incurred and expected to be incurred.[138]

As one example of the issues that can arise because of costs, in 2014, Apple moved to disqualify its antitrust monitor for what it viewed as excessive billing and unprofessional conduct where the monitor, inter alia, had charged a rate of US$1,000 per hour in fees.[139] The motion was denied by the Southern District of New York and affirmed by the Second Circuit, but the Second Circuit noted that the issues raised had 'considerable resonance because the fairness and integrity of the courts can be compromised by inadequate constraint on a monitor's aggressive use of judicial power'.[140]

32.7 Conclusion

Since their first widespread application in the 1990s, the use of monitors has rapidly expanded across industries and offences: banks, energy companies, unions, car manufacturers and fire departments have all been (or currently are) subject to oversight by monitors. Implemented to address a myriad of wrongs ranging from fraud and racketeering to discriminatory hiring practices, monitorships were in many ways viewed as panaceas.

Today, rising costs and increasing concerns about their efficacy have resulted in far greater scrutiny of all proposed monitorships. Where the past two decades represent an expansion in the breadth of cases where monitors were contemplated, the next two are likely to focus on and refine the scope. The ongoing debates over whether monitors' reports should be public, the degree to which monitors are truly independent, and how monitors should be selected will result not only in additional litigation, but will also force an evolution in how monitorships are used as settlement tools. The issues identified throughout this chapter are live controversies, each likely to distil and develop the body of case law governing monitorships, ultimately resulting in a body of jurisprudence that imposes default standards of disclosure, transparency, control and authority on monitors, the government and defendants alike.

138 See also ABA Standards for Monitors § 24-3.4.

139 United States v. Apple, Inc., 992 F. Supp. 2d 263 (S.D.N.Y. 2014).

140 United States v. Apple, Inc., 787 F.3d 131, 133–34 (2d Cir. 2015).

33

Parallel Civil Litigation: The UK Perspective

Nichola Peters and Michelle de Kluyver[1]

Introduction 33.1

The conduct under review in investigations can generate a range of parallel proceedings. These can precede the investigation, follow on from the investigation findings or, frequently, arise in the course of an investigation. It can be a particular challenge to manage parallel proceedings, which engage their own procedural rules and can force the pace of investigations or create other tensions with the investigative process. This chapter deals with the types of issues and parallel proceedings most likely to arise in complex investigations.

Stay of proceedings 33.2

Where a company subject to investigation is also involved in ongoing civil proceedings (before the courts or an arbitral tribunal) that relate to the conduct under investigation, the parties may seek to stay those proceedings pending the outcome of the investigation. This would often be an ideal solution to managing the tensions they introduce but obtaining a stay can be difficult and is not automatic.

Civil litigation 33.2.1

There are many reasons why a court may stay proceedings. For instance, to allow for arbitration, for the dispute to be tried by national courts of another jurisdiction or for other case management purposes (for example, to permit commercial settlement negotiations, or to allow a ruling on a relevant issue to be delivered in a separate case). The court may do so on various legal bases. As well as possessing inherent jurisdiction to manage proceedings,[2] the court is empowered under the Civil Procedure Rules (CPR) to stay proceedings in part or in whole, either indefinitely or until a specified date or event.[3] The court may stay proceedings in specific circumstances pursuant to certain other statutes.[4]

1 Nichola Peters and Michelle de Kluyver are partners at Addleshaw Goddard LLP. Michelle de Kluyver co-authored this chapter for the first edition with Edward McCullagh and would like to thank him for his contribution as co-author and then as author of later editions, as well as Jonathan Hitchin of Allen & Overy LLP for his support on all earlier editions.

In circumstances where there are related criminal proceedings, the following principles (among others) will apply to the exercise of the court's discretion to stay civil proceedings:[5]

- the court will only consider staying the civil proceedings if there is a real risk of serious prejudice which may lead to injustice;[6]
- the court will exercise its discretion by reference to the competing considerations between the parties – the court has to balance justice between the parties;[7]
- the fact that a defendant, by serving a defence in civil proceedings, would be giving advance notice of their defence in criminal proceedings, carries little weight in the context of an application for a stay of civil proceedings;
- it is not enough that both the civil and criminal proceedings arise from the same facts, or that the defence of the civil proceedings may involve a defendant taking procedural steps (such as exchanging witness statements, and providing disclosure of documents) which might not be imposed on them in the criminal proceedings;[8] and
- even if the court is satisfied that there is a real risk of serious prejudice leading to injustice if the civil proceedings continue, the proceedings should nevertheless not be stayed if safeguards can be imposed in respect of the civil proceedings which provide sufficient protection against the risk of injustice.

In the competition law context, the court may stay proceedings to avoid taking decisions that conflict with decisions contemplated by the European Commission.

The court may also impose a stay on the effects of an action, such as a stay of execution of orders of a lower court pending appeal.

A stay of proceedings puts a stop to their further conduct at the stage they have reached, apart from the taking of any steps allowed by the CPR or the terms of the stay. Proceedings can be continued if the stay is lifted.

2 See, e.g., China Export & Credit Insurance Corporation v. Emerald Energy Resources Limited [2018] EWHC 1503 (Comm), [61].

3 CPR, Part 3.1(2)(f).

4 For example, section 9 of the Arbitration Act 1996.

5 See Akcine Bendrove Bankas Snoras (in bankruptcy) v. Antonov [2013] EWHC 131 (Comm), [18].

6 R v. Panel on Takeovers and Mergers, ex parte Fayed [1992] BCC 524, 531.

7 Panton and others v. Financial Institutions Services Ltd [2003] UKPC 95, [11].

8 FSA v. Anderson [2010] EWHC 308 (Ch), [19].

Arbitral proceedings 33.2.2

In England, as in many other jurisdictions, procedural matters in arbitration are governed first and foremost by parties' agreement. Aspects of applicable arbitral procedure may be set out expressly in an arbitration agreement, be contained in the parties' chosen institutional arbitration rules (whether such choice is expressed in the arbitration agreement or otherwise) or subsequently be agreed by the parties to a dispute, whether on an ad hoc basis or, for instance, in the tribunal's agreed terms of appointment. Where parties do not reach agreement, procedural arrangements are otherwise within the discretion of the arbitral tribunal as a matter of English law, subject to the tribunal's general duties to act fairly and impartially as between the parties and to adopt procedures suitable to the circumstances of the particular case.[9]

An arbitral tribunal may, in exercise of its discretion, elect to stay the arbitral proceedings for a variety of reasons. For instance, at the request of one or both of the parties pending settlement negotiations, upon a party failing to comply with an order to provide security for costs or pending the determination of a preliminary point of law by a court.[10] A tribunal might also stay proceedings to avoid the risk of inconsistent decisions where parallel judicial or regulatory proceedings are ongoing, particularly where such proceedings are ongoing in the same jurisdiction as the arbitral seat. In all cases, a tribunal's decision will depend on the propriety of ordering a stay in all the relevant circumstances, which may, in the regulatory context, depend on the identity of the regulator and the extent to which the outcome of the regulatory investigation is likely to impact the matters at stake in the arbitration itself.

Multi-party litigation 33.3

Under English law, class actions do not feature as part of the parallel litigation landscape to the extent that they do in the United States (in particular, securities litigation). Nonetheless, companies may face civil actions brought by multiple parties in a variety of ways and we describe them for completeness. The two main procedural mechanisms for multi-party litigation envisaged by the CPR are representative actions and group litigation orders.[11] Additionally, a form of collective proceeding exists in the competition law context, although this type of action is still very much in its infancy in the United Kingdom.

Representative actions 33.3.1

Representative actions allow persons, in certain circumstances, to represent others in legal proceedings (the represented persons are not joined to the action as parties). The CPR provide that such actions may be brought where more than one person has the same interest in a claim.[12] Judgments or orders given in representative actions are normally binding on all persons represented in the claim, but may only be enforced by or against non-parties with the court's permission.

9 Arbitration Act 1996, sections 33-34.

10 Arbitration Act 1996, section 45.

11 See further Zuckerman on Civil Procedure: Principles of Practice, Adrian Zuckerman, 3rd edn. (2013); Improving Access to Justice through Collective Actions, Civil Justice Council (2008).

Representative actions are not extensively used. The provisions of the CPR relating to such actions are restrictive; in particular, the 'same interest' requirement. A further potential deterrent is that represented persons are not liable for the costs of representative actions, although the court does have jurisdiction to order that costs be paid by a non-party in exceptional circumstances.

33.3.2 Group litigation orders

Where claims give rise to common or related issues of fact or law, the court may make a group litigation order (GLO), which provides for the case management of claims covered by the order.

The GLO will contain directions about the establishment of a group register on which the claims to be managed under the GLO will be entered, and will specify the court that will manage the claims on the register. The GLO procedure is 'opt-in' in nature. Claims must be issued before they can be entered on a group register, and an application for details of a case to be entered on a group register may be made by any party to the case. The management court may set a cut-off date after which no further claims may be added to the group register without the court's permission.

The GLO will also specify the 'GLO issues', which will identify the claims to be managed as a group under the GLO. Judgments or orders given or made in a claim on the group register in relation to the GLO issues are binding on the parties to all other claims on the group register. The court may direct that certain claims on the group register should proceed as test cases.

GLOs have been utilised in a range of different types of dispute, but are not particularly widely used and have been subject to criticism.

33.3.3 Joint claims

Multiple parties can also be joined to the same claim. The CPR give the court a range of powers to add or substitute parties to proceedings.[13] Any number of claimants or defendants may be joined as parties to a claim, and any number of claims may be covered by one claim form (provided those claims can be conveniently disposed of in the same proceedings). However, if a large number of parties are joined, this can lead to practical difficulties.

12 Representative actions may also be brought in more limited circumstances pursuant to CPR, Part 19.7.

13 CPR, Parts 19.1 and 7.3.

Test cases 33.3.4

There is no formal and generally applicable test case procedure before the English courts. However, when faced with large numbers of claims that raise common issues, the courts may use their case management powers to allow certain representative claims (usually selected by the parties) to proceed to determination and stay the remainder. While decisions in test cases have value as precedent, they are not determinative of other cases that raise common issues.

Test case procedures have, however, been introduced in certain specific contexts, for example:

- In appropriate circumstances, claims subject to a GLO may proceed as test cases.
- A pilot scheme was introduced (as part of the implementation of the Financial List), which enables certain claims started in the Financial List to be determined as test cases, without the need for a present cause of action between the parties to the proceedings.[14] The claims must raise issues of general importance in relation to which immediately relevant authoritative English law guidance is needed.

Competition law claims 33.3.5

There are specialised collective proceedings for competition law claims.

Such proceedings may be brought before the Competition Appeal Tribunal (CAT) on a stand-alone basis (in which case, a complainant must prove an infringement of certain competition law rules) or on a follow-on basis (which requires an existing infringement decision from the Competition and Markets Authority (CMA), the CAT on an appeal from a decision of the CMA or the European Commission).

Claims will only be eligible for inclusion in collective proceedings if the CAT considers that they raise the same, similar or related issues of fact and law, and are suitable to be brought in collective proceedings.

Collective proceedings must be commenced by a person who proposes to be the representative in those proceedings, but they can only be continued if the CAT certifies them by making a collective proceedings order. The CAT may only make such an order (1) if it considers that it is just and reasonable for that person to act as a representative in the proceedings and (2) in respect of claims eligible for inclusion in collective proceedings.

The collective proceedings may be:

- 'opt-in' (brought on behalf of those class members who opt in); or
- 'opt-out' (brought on behalf of all class members, except for those who (1) opt out or (2) are not domiciled in the United Kingdom at a specified time, and do not opt in).

Class members can opt in or opt out by notifying the representative.

14 CPR, Practice Direction 51M.

Judgments or orders of the CAT in collective proceedings are binding on all represented persons, except as otherwise specified. The CAT may not award exemplary damages in collective proceedings, and damages-based fee agreements for legal representatives are unenforceable if they relate to such proceedings.

Two proposed sets of opt-out collective proceedings have been brought before the CAT to date. Initially, both were unsuccessful,[15] with the CAT holding in the Pride case that the proposed class was too broad, and originally in the MasterCard case that the proposed methodology for distributing damages did not reflect the loss suffered by individual members of the class. Nonetheless, arguments in both cases that the representatives were unsuitable failed, and the CAT provided guidance on what it expects from applicants in collective proceedings in future.[16] Recently, the MasterCard case was appealed successfully, and the judgment was reversed.[17] The Court of Appeal held that the CAT's position on distributing damages was too narrow. Distribution was a matter for the trial judge to consider once an aggregate award had been made. The CAT was not required to assess individual losses, only whether an aggregate award of damages was suitable for the claims.

As regards costs, the general rule in proceedings before the English courts is that the unsuccessful party will be ordered to pay the costs of the successful party. The CAT, however, has a broader discretion to make any order (at any stage of the proceedings) it thinks fit in relation to the payment of costs, and it may take account of (among other things) the conduct of all parties in relation to the proceedings. Costs will not normally be awarded against represented persons who are not the class representative, except in certain particular circumstances.

Settlement of opt-out (but not opt-in) collective proceedings is regulated by statute and overseen by the CAT (which must approve the terms of any settlement reached). In certain circumstances, collective settlements can also be reached in respect of claims even if a collective proceedings order has not been issued.

33.3.6 Collective redress schemes

The Financial Conduct Authority (FCA) may (under section 404 and sections 404A to 404G of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 (FSMA)) make rules requiring certain firms to establish and operate a consumer redress scheme in relation to a widespread or regular failure by such firms to comply with requirements applicable to the carrying on by them of any activity. The relevant requirements include both FCA rules and the general law. The power can be used if it appears to the FCA that, as a result of the failure, consumers have suffered (or may suffer) loss or damage in respect of which a remedy or relief would be available in 15 Dorothy Gibson v. Pride Mobility Products Ltd [2017] CAT 9 and Walter Hugh Merricks CBE v. MasterCard Incorporated and Others [2017] CAT 16.

16 Collective proceedings in relation to the European Commission's 19 July 2016 decision (Case AT.39824 – Trucks), concerning a cartel in the truck manufacturing industry have commenced. UK Trucks Claim Limited v. Fiat Chrysler Automobiles N.V. and Others is listed for December 2019 following the pre-hearing review in May 2019.

17 Walter Hugh Merricks CBE v. MasterCard Incorporated and Others [2019] EWCA Civ 674.

legal proceedings, and the FCA considers that it is desirable to make rules to secure redress for consumers in respect of the failure. In addition, pursuant to section 404F(7) of FSMA, the FCA may vary the permission or authorisation of a firm to require it to establish and operate a scheme that corresponds to, or is similar to, a consumer redress scheme. The FCA also has administrative powers to require restitution under section 384 of FSMA, which it has previously used to establish a compensatory scheme for investors who suffered loss in connection with an overstatement of expected profits by Tesco plc in 2014.[18]

The FCA has used its power under section 404 of FSMA to introduce rules on consumer redress schemes in the CONRED section of its handbook. In addition to providing general rules on consumer redress schemes, CONRED also sets out in Chapter 2 the rules and key documents of the Arch cru Consumer Redress Scheme.[19] In practice, a great many more redress programmes are conducted by firms under supervision of the FCA or a skilled person appointed by the FCA without use of section 404 of FSMA or CONRED.

Statutory voluntary redress schemes have also been introduced in the competition law context, under which compensation may be offered by businesses as a result of infringement decisions made in respect of them. Such schemes are subject to the approval of the CMA.

Derivative claims and unfair prejudice petitions 33.4

Derivative claims 33.4.1

Members of a company can bring a derivative claim (pursuant to Part 11, Chapter 1 of the Companies Act 2006 (CA 2006)) in respect of a cause of action vested in the company, and seeking relief on its behalf. Such claims may only be brought in respect of a cause of action arising from an actual or proposed act or omission involving negligence, default, breach of duty or breach of trust by a director of the company, and the cause of action may be against the director or another person (or both).

A member who brings such a derivative claim must apply for permission to continue it, and the CPR envisage a two-stage procedure for dealing with applications for permission to continue derivative claims (the company, and any other appropriate parties, are made respondents to the permission application at the second stage).

The court must take into account a number of particular factors when considering whether to grant permission, including the importance that a person acting in accordance with section 172 of the CA 2006 (duty to promote the success of the company) would attach to continuing the claim, and any evidence as to the views of members of the company who have no personal interest (direct or indirect) in the matter. However, permission must be refused in certain circumstances (for example, if the act or omission giving rise to the cause of action has been authorised or ratified).

18 FCA Final Notice to Tesco plc and Tesco Stores Limited dated 28 March 2017.

19 FCA, Consumer Redress Schemes sourcebook, Chapter 2.

Part 11 of the CA 2006 also includes a mechanism for members to apply (in appropriate circumstances) for permission (1) to continue as derivative claims certain claims brought by the company or (2) to continue derivative claims brought by other members of the company.

33.4.2 Unfair prejudice petitions

A member of a company may also apply to the court for an order under Part 30 of CA 2006 on the grounds that the company's affairs are being or have been conducted in a manner that is unfairly prejudicial to the interests of members generally, or of some part of its members (including at least the applicant), or that an actual or proposed act or omission of the company (including an act or omission on its behalf) is or would be so prejudicial.

The courts take a wide view of prejudice suffered by a shareholder, which need not be financial. The courts also have a very wide discretion in respect of what constitutes unfairness, although they do 'not sit under a palm tree'.[20] Typically, a member will not be entitled to complain of unfairness unless there has been some breach of the terms on which the member agreed that the company's affairs should be conducted, although there will be cases in which equitable considerations will make it unfair for those conducting the company's affairs to rely on their strict legal powers.

The court has a wide discretion to make such order as it thinks fit for giving relief in respect of the matters complained of in an unfair prejudice petition. The most common order in practice is for the shares of the petitioner to be bought by the respondent at a price to be fixed by the court.

As unfair prejudice petitions generally raise numerous factual issues entailing examination of events over a considerable period of time, a high degree of case management is required. In circumstances where a buy-out order is sought, the court will normally determine issues necessary to decide whether a buy-out order should be made at a liability hearing, and only proceed to a quantum hearing if it has been determined that a buy-out order should be made.

33.4.3 Practical considerations

Typically derivative claims and unfair prejudice petitions are brought by minority shareholders.[21] There are a number of practical advantages for such shareholders to bringing an unfair prejudice petition instead of a derivative claim. These include the broad grounds for relief, the flexible nature of the relief and the fact that there are fewer procedural hurdles to overcome. There may be significant disadvantages in bringing a derivative claim: the initial procedural phases can be costly, and relief must be sought on behalf of the company. However, in certain circumstances a derivative claim may still be the most appropriate route for shareholders (for example, in the context of public companies, where a finding of unfair prejudice may be less likely).

20 In re J. E. Cade & Son Ltd. [1992] B.C.L.C. 213, 227.

21 See further Minority Shareholders: Law, Practice and Procedure, Victor Joffe QC, David Drake, Giles Richardson, Daniel Lightman and Timothy Collingwood, 6th ed. (2018).

In a derivative action, the court may order the company, for whose benefit the action was brought, to indemnify the claimant against the costs it reasonably incurs. By contrast, in unfair prejudice proceedings, the company is not usually ordered to pay any costs.

The company may be required to give disclosure in the context of derivative claims and unfair prejudice petitions. A shareholder will be entitled to disclosure of documents obtained by the company in the course of the company's administration (where relevant), including advice by solicitors to the company about its affairs, but not where that advice relates to hostile proceedings between the company and its shareholders.

Securities litigation 33.5

As noted above, securities litigation[22] in England and Wales is relatively under-developed in comparison with the position in the United States. However, there are a number of ways in which investors in securities can seek relief before the English courts, and in recent years there has been an increase in the volume of such litigation, due in part to the growing role of third-party litigation funders and specialist claimant law firms.

FSMA sets out the framework for financial services regulation in England and Wales. Section 90 of FSMA imposes liability on issuers and other specified persons (such as the directors of a corporate issuer) where untrue or misleading statements are made in listing particulars or a prospectus relating to certain securities, or where required information is omitted from such documents (or supplementary documents are not published when required), and loss is suffered by investors in respect of those securities as a result. A number of exemptions from such liability are set out in Schedule 10 of FSMA (for instance, where the defendant reasonably believed that the particular statement was true and not misleading, and continued in this belief until the relevant securities were acquired). Section 90A of FSMA applies to broader categories of published information relating to securities, making an issuer liable to pay compensation to investors who suffer loss in respect of those securities as a result of a misleading statement or dishonest omission in that information, or a dishonest delay in publishing information (although liability under section 90A is in some respects more restricted than under section 90 – for instance, the standard of fault under section 90A is higher, and it is necessary to show reliance).[23] In addition, section 138D of FSMA provides a right of action

22 See further The Securities Litigation Review, ed. William Savitt, 5th edn. (2019).

23 The high-profile RBS Rights Issue litigation involved claims under section 90 of FSMA; and, in more recent litigation arising out of an overstatement of expected profits by Tesco plc in 2014, claims have been made under section 90A of FSMA. (See also Section 33.3.6.)

before the courts for private persons who suffer loss as a result of a contravention by an authorised person of certain chapters of the FCA Handbook. Rules made by the Prudential Regulation Authority may also provide that private parties have a similar right of action. Further, a number of other provisions in FSMA (for example, sections 26, 27 and 30) can render agreements or transactions unenforceable, and give rights to recover money (or other property) and to obtain compensation, where the circumstances in which those agreements or transactions were entered into contravene certain rules in FSMA (for instance, if necessary authorisation from the FCA has not been obtained).

Aggrieved investors may also have other options, in addition to reliance on FSMA. Misrepresentation claims pursuant to section 2(1) of the Misrepresentation Act 1967 may be available to investors in circumstances where the investor enters into a contract in reliance on a misrepresentation made to them by another party to the contract, which causes loss, and where the representor did not have a reasonable belief at the time the contract was made that the facts represented were true. Investors may also be able to bring a negligent misstatement claim (in circumstances where a duty of care is owed to the investor, that duty has been breached and that breach causes the investor to suffer recoverable loss), or a claim based on the tort of deceit (which requires, among other things, proof that the defendant knowingly or recklessly made a false representation).[24]

33.6 Other private litigation

33.6.1 'Tainted' contracts

Conduct which is illegal or contrary to public policy (and which may well be the subject of an investigation) may 'taint' contracts entered into by a company.

The common law doctrine of illegality may prevent a party to a contract tainted by illegal conduct from enforcing their contractual rights and remedies in certain circumstances. Historically, the law in this area has been complicated and unclear, but it was recently reconsidered by nine Supreme Court justices in the case of Patel v. Mirza.[25] The majority held that the essential rationale underpinning the illegality doctrine is that it would be contrary to the public interest to enforce a claim if to do so would harm the integrity of the legal system. They identified the following three factors which must be taken into account when considering whether to allow a claim which is in some way tainted by illegality:

- the underlying purpose of the prohibition that has been transgressed, and whether that purpose would be enhanced by denial of the claim;
- any other relevant public policy on which the denial of the claim may have an impact; and 24 In addition to private enforcement, public enforcement proceedings may also be brought against companies (typically by the FCA) for breach of securities rules.

25 [2016] UKSC 42.

- whether denial of the claim would be a proportionate response to the illegality. When considering proportionality, the majority held that (among other things) the seriousness of the conduct, its centrality to the contract, whether it was intentional and whether there was a marked disparity in the parties' respective culpability may potentially be relevant.

This approach was, however, criticised by the minority on the basis that it was too vague and too wide, converting a legal principle into the exercise of judicial discretion. It remains to be seen how the doctrine will develop in light of this important case. For instance, in some more recent decisions, the courts have continued to have reference to case law that pre-dates Patel.[26]

Civil law bribery

If bribery has occurred, then a number of particular civil law consequences may also follow.

Civil law bribery[27] arises in the context of agency relationships, where an agent receives a benefit which puts them in a position where their duty (to their principal) and their (personal) interest conflict. The benefit does not necessarily have to be monetary, or provided directly to the agent, and there is no need to prove motive, inducement or loss up to the amount of the bribe. The bribe need not be linked to a particular transaction (provided the agent is tainted by bribery at the time of the relevant transaction between the briber and the principal), and it may taint subsequent transactions. An arrangement will not constitute a bribe in the absence of secrecy, although it may still amount to a breach of fiduciary duty on the part of the agent if the principal's fully informed consent is not obtained.

A variety of alternative remedies are available to a principal faced with civil law bribery.

As against the bribed agent

- If the bribe has been paid to the agent, the principal is entitled to recover the amount of the bribe (at common law, in an action for money had and received), regardless of whether the principal elects to rescind any 'tainted' contracts. The proceeds of bribe-taking (which comprise money or other property) will also be held on trust for the principal, and the principal will have a proprietary remedy in respect of them.
- In the alternative, the principal can claim damages in tort in respect of loss sustained by the principal in consequence of entering into any 'tainted' contracts.
- There may also be other consequences for the agent (including in connection with their contractual relationship with the principal).

26 See, for example, Henderson v. Dorset Healthcare University NHS Foundation Trust [2018] EWCA Civ 1841 (appeal outstanding).

27 See further Bowstead and Reynolds on Agency, ed. Peter Watts QC, 21st edn. (2017).

As against the briber

- The briber is jointly and severally liable with the bribed agent in respect of the amount of the bribe, which the principal can claim in a common law action for money had and received.
- In the alternative, the briber is also jointly and severally liable with the bribed agent to the principal for damages in tort (see above).
- The principal may have an action for dishonest assistance in a breach of fiduciary duty against the briber.
- Other remedies may be available against the briber (or others) depending on the particular circumstances of the case.

Note that double recovery by the principal from the bribed agent and the briber will not be permitted.

If it can be established that bribery has occurred, then the principal is usually entitled to rescind contracts 'tainted' by the bribery. If the principal elects to rescind a 'tainted' contract, they remain entitled to recover the bribe, and they are not bound to give credit in the rescission for the amount of any bribe recovered. If the agent is bribed during the course of performance of a contract (i.e., after it has been entered into), then the principal may bring it to an end as from the moment of discovery (i.e., for the future); and the same will apply if bribery was effected at the time a 'tainted' contract was entered into, but (for some reason) rescission ab initio is impossible. Where an arrangement would have constituted bribery, but the principal is aware of it (so there is no secrecy) although the principal's fully informed consent has not been obtained, then the court may award rescission of 'tainted' contracts as a discretionary remedy, if it is just and proportionate to do so.

Where bribes have been paid to the detriment of a third-party competitor, it has been suggested that both the briber and the company that awards the contract to the briber could be liable to the unsuccessful competitor. Further, if the contract involves a public authority, the unsuccessful competitor may have an action for misfeasance in public office.

A contract to commit bribery (as opposed to a contract procured by bribery) is 'tainted' by illegality, in the sense that it is illegal in performance, and is unenforceable.

33.6.2 Specific provisions in commercial contracts

Parties often include specific provisions in their commercial contracts (including finance documents) aimed at preventing, or providing contractual protection in relation to, illegal behaviour (in particular, corruption) involving a party to the agreement. Accordingly, the fact of an investigation (or related proceedings), or conduct which is the subject of an investigation, may have adverse contractual consequences for a company. These will naturally depend on the nature of both the investigation itself and the specific conduct under investigation, as well as the provisions of the contractual documentation. However, by way of illustration, many commercial contracts contain:

- obligations:
  - to comply with certain applicable laws and regulations;
  - to have in place and comply with specified policies (such as data protection, cybersecurity, anti-slavery and human trafficking or anti-bribery and corruption policies);
  - to maintain accurate records of payments made in relation to the contract;
  - relating to data protection (for example, to prevent damage, or unauthorised or unlawful access, to relevant data);
  - in relation to subcontractors (for instance, to ensure that subcontractors comply with requirements equivalent to those imposed on the company), and that may impose responsibility on the company for any non-compliance by a subcontractor with such requirements;
  - to report generally on compliance to contractual counterparties on an ongoing basis, which could include requiring the provision of a confirmation signed by an officer of the company. Audit rights may also be granted to contractual counterparties; and
  - to report the occurrence of certain events to contractual counterparties. These could include dealing with a public official in connection with the performance of the contract, receiving a request for a payment (or other advantage) in connection with the performance of the contract, or the commencement (or threat) of an investigation into the activities of the company;
- representations (given by the company, and which may be repeated) that it has not been investigated for or convicted of certain offences (and that no proceedings or investigations are pending or threatened), or which relate to the accuracy and completeness of information provided to contractual counterparties;
- termination rights for contractual counterparties if the company breaches (or, potentially, if the contractual counterparty reasonably suspects a breach of) certain obligations, or if the company makes a false representation or is convicted of certain offences; and
- indemnities (for the benefit of contractual counterparties) in respect of loss suffered as a result of a certain breaches of the contract by the company.[28]

A company may face parallel litigation brought by its contractual counterparties in reliance on such provisions. A company may also be able to invoke such provisions against its contractual counterparties, although where a company is under investigation it may not wish to take the position in civil proceedings that its counterparty has engaged in illegal activity if the company is also exposed for its counterparty's conduct.

28 An indemnity against a criminal liability may, however, be unenforceable for public policy reasons.

33.6.3 Mergers, acquisitions and investments

Mergers, acquisitions and investments[29] can present particular risks for companies. Illegal behaviour in the target (or its subsidiaries, or other related companies and persons) may have various negative consequences for an acquiring entity, which can include (1) financial consequences (for example, the target may have been overvalued), (2) legal consequences (both civil and criminal) for the target, the acquiring entity and relevant individuals (including officers of both entities), along with associated legal costs and (3) other practical consequences (for example, reputational damage, which may have a consequent effect on business).[30]

As a result, acquiring entities will often take precautions to minimise these risks. Typically, these include:

- conducting proportionate pre- and post-acquisition due diligence of the target and its business;
- implementing compliance programmes; and
- including appropriate protections in the relevant contractual documentation.

In relation to the latter, warranties, representations and indemnities[31] designed to provide such protection are frequently included in share purchase agreements. The scope of protection will depend on the particular provisions negotiated, but they can be widely drafted, such that they encompass the conduct of, for example:

- the target and its subsidiaries;
- directors, officers, employees, significant shareholders, affiliates, agents, and distributors of the target and its subsidiaries;
- those associated with or acting on behalf of the target and its subsidiaries; and
- those who perform services for or on behalf of the target and its subsidiaries, and may cover areas such as:

- compliance with laws generally;
- compliance with anti-money laundering laws and standards;
- compliance with anti-bribery and corruption laws and standards;
- debarment from public contracts;
- sanctions (including whether such persons are, have been, or are likely to become, subject to sanctions); and
- whether such persons are (or have been) subject to an investigation or any proceedings, or whether an investigation or any proceedings in respect of such persons are pending, threatened, contemplated, or even likely.

29 See further Anti-Bribery Due Diligence for Transactions: Guidance for Anti-Bribery Due Diligence in Mergers, Acquisitions and Investments, Transparency International UK (2012).

30 Companies should also be aware of the risk that illegal behaviour (for example, bribery) may occur during the merger, acquisition or investment transaction.

31 However, see footnote 28, above, in relation to indemnities against criminal liability.

Accordingly, the existence of an investigation (or related proceedings), or conduct which is the subject of an investigation, may give the acquiring entity contractual rights which it can seek to enforce (including through litigation or arbitration). Again, however, care may need to be taken in doing so, for the reasons given in Section 33.6.2.

Defamation proceedings 33.6.4

A company may face defamation actions[32] brought by individuals arising from internal investigations carried out by the company. In particular, issues may arise if it becomes necessary to negotiate an exit from the organisation for individuals involved or implicated in conduct which was the subject of an investigation.

The law of defamation is concerned with the protection of reputation. It covers the torts of libel (which concerns more permanent forms of publication) and slander (which concerns more transient forms of publication, such as speech, and generally is actionable only if special damage can be shown).

Broadly speaking, a defamatory statement is one whose publication has caused, or is likely to cause, serious harm to the claimant's reputation, although a number of different tests have been utilised by the courts when determining whether a statement is defamatory. The statement must have been published (communicated) to a third party, and each publication will amount to a separate cause of action. Liability for publication extends to those who participate in or authorise publication, and those who re-publish or repeat the relevant statement are liable as if the statement originated from them. However, defences are available in certain circumstances to persons who publish statements and who are not the author, editor or publisher (in the sense of being a commercial publisher) of the relevant statement; as well as to website operators, if they can show that the relevant statement was posted on the website by another.

A number of defences may be available to a company facing a defamation action. For example, it may be able to rely on absolute privilege, which will exist where a statement or conduct can fairly be said to be part of the process of investigating a crime (or a possible crime) with a view to a prosecution (or a possible prosecution) in respect of the matter being investigated. This applies to statements made by persons assisting an inquiry to investigators, and by investigators to those persons or to each other. Absolute privilege will also extend beyond the criminal context, to certain enquiries made in connection with proceedings before a tribunal, the proceedings of which are protected by absolute privilege (i.e., tribunals acting in a manner similar to that in which a court of justice acts). Accordingly, the provision of information by a company to the authorities in connection with an investigation is unlikely to expose that company to the risk of a defamation action. The defence of qualified privilege will also be available in circumstances where the maker of a statement has a legitimate interest or duty in making it to the recipient, and the recipient has a corresponding interest or duty in receiving it, provided the maker is not motivated by malice. This may apply to certain communications between an employer and their employees, or between employees, that relate to the employer's business.

32 See further Gatley on Libel and Slander, eds. Alastair Mullis and Richard Parkes QC, 12th edn. (2013).

A company may also, in theory, be in a position to bring a defamation action against a whistleblower, given that the act of blowing the whistle will typically involve the publication of a statement that causes harm to reputation. Nonetheless, under the Defamation Act 2013, to satisfy the serious harm threshold, a company must show that the publication caused or is likely to cause serious financial loss. Whistleblowers may, however, be able to make out one or more possible defences to such a claim. In particular:

- if the whistleblower can show that the statement was substantially true, this will generally constitute a defence to a defamation action; and
- whistleblowers may also benefit from the defence of absolute privilege (as set out above) or qualified privilege, provided that they are not motivated by malice. It is notable, however, that the Public Interest Disclosure Act 1998 does not provide protection from a defamation action for a whistleblower, although if such an action were brought by an employer this is likely to amount to a 'detriment' for the purposes of section 47B of Part V of the Employment Rights Act 1996.[33]

In addition, a company may be in a position to bring a defamation action in relation to press comment although litigation could have the effect of drawing attention to the allegation, which is seldom beneficial.

The primary remedy in defamation actions is the award of damages, and claimants may also seek an injunction against repetition of the publication complained of. In addition, the court may order the defendant to publish a summary of the court's judgment, and may also order others to stop distributing, selling or exhibiting material containing the relevant statement, or to remove the relevant statement from a website on which it is posted. Particular remedies are available where the claimant is granted summary relief.

Although in the past trial by jury was typical in defamation actions, the right to jury trial has recently been abolished in this context, and trial will now be by judge save in exceptional circumstances.

33.6.5 Arbitration

Allegations of unlawful behaviour can have a significant impact in the context of international arbitration,[34] both before a tribunal itself and before national courts at the stage of recognition or enforcement of an award.

33 See further Whistleblowing: Law and Practice, John Bowers QC, Martin Fodder, Jeremy Lewis and Jack Mitchell, 3rd edn. (2017).

34 See further International Commercial Arbitration, Gary Born, 2nd edn. (2014).

In the context of commercial arbitration, as in the context of civil ligation, allegations of unlawful conduct can impact parties' disputed rights and obligations under the applicable law in myriad ways. Should a regulatory body, for instance, determine a party's conduct to be unlawful, this might be taken into account by a tribunal in its consideration of claims of invalidity of a contract on grounds of illegality. In the context of recognition and enforcement of foreign arbitral awards, unlawful conduct may impact a court's assessment of a party's claims to resist recognition or enforcement on the grounds set out in Article V of the New York Convention, for instance, on public policy grounds.[35]

A party's unlawful conduct can also have a significant impact in the context of determination of investor–state disputes arising under international treaties. In particular, numerous international tribunals have been faced with assessing allegations of investor misconduct, often involving corruption or bribery, in a variety of contexts. The findings of a domestic regulatory body, while compelling evidence of unlawful conduct under the law of the regulator's jurisdiction, are only one factor to be taken into account by an international tribunal. The consequences of unlawful conduct under a domestic law being proven to the satisfaction of an international tribunal will vary, and often depend to a large extent on the provisions of the treaty or other instrument under which the claim has been brought. In general terms, however, there is an emerging consensus in international practice that investment claims tainted by corruption or other unlawful conduct will be dismissed on grounds of inadmissibility (or, according to some tribunals, for lack of jurisdiction). Where investment treaty awards are governed by the New York Convention, the same considerations apply with respect to enforcement and recognition as for commercial awards.

Employment law and whistleblowing 33.6.6

Investigations can have employment law consequences for a company. Employees may seek to bring claims against their employers arising out of the subject matter of an investigation, or how the investigation is handled; conversely, an employer may wish to take action against an employee implicated in the conduct under investigation.

See Chapter 13 on employee rights

In addition, to the extent that allegations have been made by whistleblowers, companies under investigation or conducting investigations should be careful to respect whistleblower rights to avoid claims for breach of the protections afforded to whistleblowers. For a disclosure by an employee to be protected, it must be made where the employee has a reasonable belief that the information tends to show breach of a legal obligation, in the public interest and to a prescribed person.

See Chapter 19 on whistleblowers

35 Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards 1958, Article V(2)(b); Arbitration Act 1996, section 103(3)

33.6.7 Data breaches

The General Data Protection Regulation[36] (GDPR) has applied in the United Kingdom since 25 May 2018, and makes provision for the protection of natural persons with regard to the processing of personal data, and the free movement of such data. In addition to the penalties that may be imposed by supervisory authorities pursuant to the GDPR,[37] which can include an administrative fine of up to €20 million or up to 4 per cent of an undertaking's total worldwide annual turnover of the preceding financial year (whichever is higher) in respect of certain infringements, companies that are data controllers or processors may also face actions brought by data subjects in respect of infringements of their rights under the GDPR (data subjects may mandate representative organisations to bring actions on their behalf), as well as actions for compensation brought by any persons who have suffered damage as a result of an infringement of the GDPR.[38]

Relatedly, the GDPR also requires notification of certain personal data breaches to the competent supervisory authority without undue delay, and in certain circumstances communication to the data subject is also necessary.[39] Even in cases not involving personal data, companies may face significant regulatory consequences following cyberattacks – in 2018, the FCA imposed a fine of £16.4 million on Tesco Bank following a cyberattack in November 2016, which did not involve the loss or theft of personal data.[40]

Companies may also be responsible for data breaches by rogue employees. It was recently held, in the context of a group action brought by more than 5,500 employees of a supermarket company whose personal information was disclosed by the actions of a disgruntled IT auditor employed by the company, that the company was vicariously liable for the actions of that IT auditor, even though the company itself had not breached applicable data protection rules.[41]

36 Regulation (EU) 2016/679.

37 In the United Kingdom, the relevant authority is the Information Commissioner's Office.

38 See GDPR, Articles 79, 80, 82 and 83. The courts recently did not permit a broad representative action against Google to proceed, in which the representative claimant sought compensation which was estimated as being in the range from £1 billion to 3 billion (Lloyd v. Google LLC [2018] EWHC 2599 (QB)). It was argued that Google had acted in breach of a duty imposed by the Data Protection Act 1998 (allegedly by secretly tracking the internet activity of Apple iPhone users, and using and selling the accumulated data), but the court found (among other things) that, on the facts alleged, relevant damage had not been suffered, and that class members did not have the same interest. The appeal by the class members is outstanding.

39 GDPR, Articles 33 and 34.

40 FCA Final Notice to Tesco Personal Finance plc dated 1 October 2018.

41 Wm Morrison Supermarkets Plc v. Various Claimants [2018] EWCA Civ 2339. Application for permission to directly appeal to the Supreme Court was granted and the appeal is outstanding.

Evidentiary issues 33.7

Reliance by the court on findings made by the authorities 33.7.1

Parties may seek to rely on findings made by the authorities in an investigation (such as a final notice from the FCA) in subsequent civil litigation. Objections may be raised to such reliance on the grounds of admissibility – as a matter of evidence, bare findings made in earlier proceedings are ordinarily inadmissible and excluded under what is known as the rule in Hollington v. Hewthorn,[42] although this controversial rule is subject to exceptions, and it has been held that a court can take into account the substance of underlying evidence as set out in prior decisions (giving it such weight as is appropriate).[43] In addition, a court may allow documents containing other relevant evidence, in addition to inadmissible findings, to be put before the court, with the judge taking into account that which is admissible and ignoring that which is inadmissible.[44]

Some investigations may result in criminal prosecutions and, potentially, convictions. In any subsequent civil proceedings, the fact of a UK conviction will be admissible in evidence for the purpose of proving, where relevant, that the convicted person committed the offence, and the information, complaint, indictment or charge sheet on which the person in question was convicted are admissible for the purpose of identifying the facts on which the conviction is based.[45] Where criminal proceedings follow civil proceedings, ordinarily findings of a civil court on the matters in issue in the criminal case will not be admissible in those subsequent criminal proceedings, although in some circumstances civil judgments may be admissible pursuant to the rules concerning evidence of bad character.

In addition, if a company enters into a deferred prosecution agreement (DPA) with a prosecutor, this must contain a statement of facts relating to the alleged offence and the company will be required to admit the contents and meaning of key documents referred to in the statement of facts.[46] Parties which bring civil litigation against the company may seek to rely on the contents of a DPA statement of facts as having the status of admissions by the company and may also seek disclosure of any underlying documents.

Certain specific rules apply in the competition law context. Pursuant to EU law, national courts may not make determinations which conflict with European Commission decisions (or rulings of both the General Court and the European Court of Justice) on certain EU competition law issues. Where no risk of direct conflict arises, but a decision of the European Commission addresses similar subject matter to that before the national court, the European Commission decision may simply be admissible as evidence before the national court (although, given the expertise of the European Commission, it might well be regarded by that 42 Hollington v. F Hewthorn & Co Ltd [1943] KB 587.

43 See e.g. JSC BTA Bank v. Ablyazov & Anor [2018] EWHC 1368 (Comm), [19].

44 Rogers v. Hoyle [2014] EWCA Civ 257, [53]–[55].

45 Civil Evidence Act 1968, section 11.

46 Crime and Courts Act 2013, Schedule 17, paragraph 5(1); Deferred Prosecution Agreements Code of Practice, para. 6.1.

court as highly persuasive). The Damages Directive, which was implemented in the United Kingdom in March 2017, provides that final decisions of national competition authorities (or review courts) in other Member States may be presented before national courts as at least prima facie evidence that an infringement of competition law has occurred. In addition, the Competition Act 1998 (as amended) provides that findings of fact made by the CMA during the course of an investigation (which have not been appealed, or which have been confirmed on appeal) which are relevant to an issue arising in certain competition law proceedings before the High Court (or the CAT) are binding on the parties to those proceedings, unless the court (or the CAT) orders otherwise. Further, where a claim is brought before the High Court (or the CAT) in respect of an infringement decision (from the CMA, the CAT on an appeal from a decision of the CMA or the European Commission), the court (or the CAT) is bound by that infringement decision once it has become final.

33.7.2 Reliance by an authority on court findings

Matters which come to light during the course of civil litigation can have repercussions beyond the immediate context of those proceedings. They may draw the attention of the authorities, and there have been cases where authorities have relied on the findings of civil courts as grounds for taking action. For example, the FCA has previously prohibited individuals from carrying on regulated activities on the basis of findings in High Court judgments (in one instance, without conducting a separate investigation).[47] Accordingly, these risks may be relevant considerations for a company when considering and implementing its litigation strategy in civil proceedings. In addition, conflict and privilege issues may arise if the interests of the company and its employees are not aligned.

33.7.3 Collateral use of disclosed documents

English law can impose onerous disclosure obligations on parties to civil proceedings – typically, parties are required to disclose documents on which they rely, and documents which adversely affect their case, adversely affect another party's case or which support another party's case (although the court may make an alternative order in relation to disclosure, and a pilot scheme involving generally less expansive disclosure obligations to apply in the Business and Property Courts in England and Wales for two years was rolled out in January 2019[48]). In certain circumstances, parties may protect documents from inspection, for instance, on the grounds of privilege or the public interest. However, the confidentiality of a relevant document is not, of itself, a justification for refusing to disclose it, although it may be relevant to the exercise of the court's discretion to order

47 FCA Final Notice to Mr Anthony Verrier, dated 27 January 2014; FCA Final Notice to Mr Stephen Robert Allen, dated 14 April 2015; Stephen Robert Allen v. The Financial Conduct Authority [2014] UKUT 0348 (TCC).

48 See Disclosure Pilot for the Business and Property Courts Press Announcement, dated 31 December 2018, accessible on www.judiciary.co.uk and CPR Practice Direction 51U.

disclosure. Although certain recent decisions of the English courts regarding the law of privilege had pointed towards a more restrictive interpretation of the scope of the protection which it offers,[49] the important judgment of the Court of Appeal in the ENRC case (concerning, in particular, the scope of litigation privilege in the context of a corruption investigation) suggests that this trend is beginning to change.[50]

As a result, a company involved in civil proceedings may be required to disclose sensitive documents to an opponent, including documents relevant to an investigation or even unprivileged investigation material.

The impact of the invasion of a litigant's right to privacy and confidentiality which the obligation to give disclosure constitutes is mitigated to some extent by CPR Part 31.22, which provides that where a document has been disclosed to a party, that party may only use the document for the purpose of the proceedings in which it is disclosed, except where:

- the document has been read to or by the court, or referred to, at a hearing held in public (although the court may make an order restricting or prohibiting the use of such a document);
- the court gives permission; or
- the party who disclosed the document and the person to whom the document belongs agree.[51]

The court will only grant permission if there are special circumstances which constitute a cogent reason for permitting collateral use. Permission decisions are highly fact-sensitive – the proposed collateral use for the document will be relevant, and, depending on the proposed use, the court may carefully consider the particular documents in respect of which permission is sought.

If the court gives permission for collateral use, a party will be able to deploy the material outside the context of the civil proceedings. The court may make an order that they could be used in separate proceedings (including abroad). Once documents are moved outside the jurisdiction of the United Kingdom, there is a risk that they may be seized or that the party in possession of them may be compelled under local laws to produce them to third parties. Similar concerns about losing control over documents may arise where documents have been provided to regulatory or enforcement authorities during the course of an investigation. Even 49 See, for example, The RBS Rights Issue Litigation [2016] EWHC 3161 (Ch), and the first-instance decision in The Director of the Serious Fraud Office v. Eurasian Natural Resources Corp Ltd [2017] EWHC 1017.

50 The Director of the Serious Fraud Office v. Eurasian Natural Resources Corp Ltd [2018] EWCA Civ 2006; see also Bilta (UK) Ltd v. Royal Bank of Scotland [2017] EWHC 3535 (Ch) (concerning litigation privilege) and Property Alliance Group Limited v. The Royal Bank of Scotland Plc [2015] EWHC 3187 (Ch) (in the legal advice privilege context).

51 See Tchenguiz v. Grant Thornton [2017] EWHC 310 (Comm) for the broad interpretation of collateral 'use' in relation to CPR Part 31.22, which includes, for example, reviewing documents for relevance; and see also The ECU Group Plc v. HSBC Bank Plc & Ors [2018] EWHC 3045, in which the judge emphasised the importance of the rule in CPR Part 31.22.

where documents are shared with an authority on a conditional basis, the authority may share the documents with third parties if it believes it has a statutory duty to do so. There is also the risk that the authority will be required to disclose those documents if it becomes involved in civil proceedings.

33.8 Practical considerations

33.8.1 Coordination with internal investigations team

It is important that those within the company responsible for managing parallel civil litigation are in constant communication with the internal team responsible for dealing with investigations, to ensure that:

- a clear, holistic strategy is developed for managing the investigations and parallel civil proceedings, and anticipating areas of potential risk (e.g., possible civil claims which may arise but have not yet been commenced);
- both teams understand, and evaluate the risks of, new developments in both the criminal and civil spheres; and
- any proposed action by the company or associated persons, in the civil or criminal spheres, is carefully analysed to determine the potential repercussions for all other proceedings and investigations.

Issues can arise, for instance, where:

- an authority seeks disclosure of privileged documents from the company in circumstances where the company may wish to assert privilege over those documents in subsequent civil proceedings;
- witnesses, whose testimony may be important for the company's case in civil proceedings, are under investigation, or have been classified as suspects, by the authorities, and have concerns about self-incrimination. Depending on the circumstances, employment proceedings may also be ongoing in respect of such individuals;
- pleading possible defences (such as illegality) in civil proceedings, which may strengthen the company's case in those proceedings but would undermine the position it has taken in relation to an investigation;
- (as part of DPA negotiations) there is a risk that matters which an authority seeks to include in an agreed statement of facts could be relied upon against the company in parallel civil proceedings. Conversely, any settlement agreement relating to civil proceedings may be disclosable to an authority as part of their investigation; or
- suspicious activity is identified in the course of civil proceedings (e.g., during disclosure) which the company is then obliged to disclose to the investigating authority.

See Chapter 7 on witness interviews

See Chapter 23 on negotiating global settlements

In particular, close coordination is necessary between the company's criminal and civil legal advisers to ensure consistency of approach.

Privilege waivers and disclosure obligations 33.8.2

During the course of an investigation, documents which attract privilege may be shown or provided to relevant authorities, often to demonstrate co-operation. These include not only privileged communications between lawyer and client but also documents, such as witness interview notes, generated by external counsel. Doing so will not necessarily constitute a general waiver of any privilege in those documents for the purposes of subsequent civil proceedings (particularly if it is made clear that this is done on a limited basis), although it may lead to adverse consequences, as the company will lose a degree of control over the information in the documents. However, care should be taken in cases involving multiple jurisdictions, as the effect of showing or providing a potentially privileged document to the authorities may vary depending upon which law governs questions of privilege.

Concurrent settlements 33.9

Difficult issues can arise for companies when attempting to negotiate settlement of global investigations, which can involve a variety of regulatory and prosecuting authorities across a range of jurisdictions. Parallel existing (or potential) civil litigation or arbitration adds a further layer of complexity to the analysis.

See Chapter 23 on negotiating global settlements

During settlement negotiations with the authorities, companies should be aware of the risk that the fact of a settlement, as well as any associated press coverage or documents (such as a statement of facts in a DPA), may raise awareness of potential civil claims, and in certain circumstances may even be relied upon to support such claims. This will be of particular concern in the competition law context, given the risk of follow-on actions. (Notably, the European Commission's settlement procedure for cartel cases requires parties to acknowledge liability for an infringement.) Accordingly, and to the extent possible, companies should avoid admitting liability as part of any negotiated settlement with the authorities; and, if an admission of liability is required, they should ensure that it is tightly circumscribed.

See Section 33.7

See Chapter 23 on negotiating global settlements and Chapter 35 on privilege

In addition, there is a risk that communications with the authorities made during the course of settlement negotiations will be disclosable in subsequent civil proceedings, although they may be protected from inspection by a right analogous to the 'without prejudice' rule.

See Chapter 23 on negotiating global settlements

Settlement of civil claims can also carry risks for a company under investigation. There is a risk that settlement agreements entered into by the company may be disclosable in subsequent proceedings, or requested by an authority as part of their investigations. Companies should avoid admitting liability as part of any negotiated civil settlement. In addition, authorities may perceive certain types of civil settlements (particularly those with witnesses for substantial sums) as suspicious.

In appropriate circumstances, it may be possible to settle civil claims on a multi-party basis. For instance, companies may try to reach collective settlements, which are available in respect of certain competition law claims (using the mechanism set out in the Competition Act 1998), or seek to utilise a collective redress scheme.

33.10 Concluding remarks

Cross-border investigations are complex and competing considerations need to be carefully weighed and managed. The prospect of parallel civil proceedings brings further complexity to an already difficult area. Such proceedings can present numerous and diverse challenges for a company subject to investigation – it may face a range of different types of action, on a number of fronts (for instance, involving shareholders, suppliers, customers or employees), which may impact an investigation, or be affected by an investigation, in a variety of ways. Companies will frequently be defendants in parallel proceedings and unable to exercise significant control over the existence or pace of the proceedings. They may at times be claimants out of necessity or to obtain a tactical advantage. It is important to give careful consideration at an early stage to potential parallel proceedings which may arise, and any effect they may have on an investigation (and vice versa), to enable possible tensions between investigations and parallel proceedings to be anticipated and managed effectively. There is no easy solution to the challenges presented by parallel civil proceedings. As noted above, it may be difficult to obtain a stay of them (without the consent of other parties to the proceedings), and settlements can give rise to their own particular complications.

34

Parallel Civil Litigation: The US Perspective

Eugene Ingoglia and Anthony M Mansfield[1]

Introduction 34.1

In the United States, criminal and regulatory investigations often generate parallel civil proceedings. Such proceedings often take the form of class actions, in which a lead plaintiff seeks to prosecute claims on behalf of a large number of similarly situated plaintiffs who allege damage resulting from the conduct under investigation. Plaintiffs may also attempt to bring suits against alleged wrongdoers, such as corporate officers and directors, derivatively on behalf of a company.

Civil proceedings that are generated in connection with an investigation can precede the investigation, follow on from investigative findings or, frequently, arise during the course of the investigation. Public disclosures by a company about the existence or results of a criminal or regulatory investigation and other similar publicly available corporate announcements frequently give rise to civil claims relating to the conduct at issue. Civil proceedings can also bring about investigations in circumstances, for example, where a civil suit challenges conduct that was unknown to the relevant authorities.

It can be challenging to manage parallel civil proceedings that are governed by their own procedural rules and can interfere with the pacing of an investigation or create other tensions with the investigative process. This chapter addresses issues in parallel proceedings that may arise in connection with complex investigations. Similar considerations may apply when dealing with a criminal investigation and parallel civil enforcement proceedings brought by regulatory agencies such as the Securities and Exchange Commission or the Commodity Futures Trading Commission.

1 Eugene Ingoglia and Anthony M Mansfield are partners at Allen & Overy LLP.

34.2 Stay of proceedings

When a company under investigation is also involved in ongoing civil proceedings (before a court or an arbitral tribunal) that relate to the conduct under investigation, a party or the government may seek to stay those proceedings pending the outcome of the investigation. While this is often desirable to avoid tension between a civil litigation and an investigation, it is difficult to achieve. A court's decision to grant a stay is, as a general matter, entirely discretionary.[2]

While courts in the US are sensitive to the potential prejudice to an individual or entity under investigation that is forced to proceed with civil litigation about the same conduct, and in particular the potential that an individual's constitutional right against self-incrimination may be compromised,[3] courts are nevertheless hesitant to stay civil cases simply because an investigation is pending. If a stay is granted, a court may impose conditions and limitations, including limitations on length. A stay of civil proceedings will freeze the proceedings until the stay expires or the court issues a further order. A party can apply to have a stay lifted at any time.

In criminal investigations or proceedings, the government may seek a stay to protect the criminal process, including limiting a company's ability to use civil litigation to obtain broader discovery than is available in a criminal case. For instance, in a parallel civil case, putative or actual defendants in the related criminal proceedings can seek the deposition testimony in the civil case of key witnesses that the government intends to rely on in the criminal case, providing a significant advantage to defendants that would not otherwise exist in the absence of the civil case. Courts have discretion to impose full or partial stays of the civil proceedings.

34.3 Class actions

In the United States, class actions are a centrepiece of complex civil litigation, particularly in securities and antitrust litigation, as the misconduct alleged often impacts large markets and large numbers of entities and individuals. More often than not, a complex criminal or regulatory investigation will generate class action litigation.

34.3.1 Background

In the United States, class actions may be brought on behalf of similarly situated claimants. There are many scenarios in which class actions may be certified, but class actions typically involve cases where there are a significant number of 2 See Twenty First Century Corp. v. LaBianca, 801 F. Supp. 1007, 1010 (E.D.N.Y. 1992) (citing Kashi v. Gratsos, 790 F.2d 1050, 1057 (2d Cir. 1986)). Courts balance a number of factors in determining whether to grant a stay, including '(1) the private interest of the plaintiffs in proceeding expeditiously with the civil litigation as balanced against the prejudice to the plaintiffs if delayed; (2) the private interests of and burden on the defendant; (3) the convenience to the courts; (4) the interest of persons not parties to the civil litigation; and (5) the public interest.' Id. (internal quotations and citation omitted).

3 Corporations do not enjoy the constitutional privilege against self-incrimination.

claimants and common legal issues predominate over any individualised issues, so that the litigation can fairly be prosecuted on a representative basis. A class action is litigated similarly to an individual action, except that the plaintiff must file a motion asking the court to certify the class, and there may be litigation about which plaintiff will be lead plaintiff in the action.[4] The defendant may oppose class certification on many grounds, including that too many individualised issues exist. Motions for class certification are moving to the later stage of cases, and, unless the motion for class certification is denied, the case will proceed on a class basis, with a representative plaintiff leading.

Class actions following release of reports, findings, etc. 34.3.2

In the United States, class actions against a company arise frequently following the release of internal investigation reports, regulatory findings or entry into a deferred prosecution agreement with the government, as these documents can provide a road map for a civil plaintiff's claims and are frequently cited in class action complaints as support for the plaintiff's allegations. When such documents become available publicly, the risk is quite high that one or more civil class actions will follow. If a class action survives a motion to dismiss based on threshold legal infirmities or pleading deficiencies and proceeds to discovery, a class action plaintiff will frequently demand that the company produce all materials that have been provided to the government, in addition to other disclosure requests under broad US discovery requirements.

The release of such internal investigation reports, regulatory findings or a deferred prosecution or plea agreement may also cause potential class action plaintiffs to seek documents a company has provided to the government in connection with an investigation directly from the government through a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request.[5] Indeed, a FOIA claim could be pursued even before internal investigation reports, regulatory findings or a deferred prosecution agreement become public, provided a claimant has a basis to make a request.

As a general matter, FOIA allows members of the public to access records from any federal agency. Most states have equivalent laws.[6] FOIA is subject to a number of exemptions, which should be considered any time a FOIA request is directed to company information in the government's possession. These exemptions, while narrowly construed, include certain exemptions for records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes as well as exemptions for documents relating to reports prepared by, on behalf of or for the use of agencies that regulate financial institutions. It is therefore rare for FOIA requests to be granted during an investigation. Production of documents to government entities typically is accompanied by a request for FOIA exemption.[7] In practice, prosecuting an FOIA claim can be a slow and cumbersome process.[8]

4 Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c).

5 FOIA, which is codified at 5 U.S.C. § 552, is a law that allows members of the public to seek access to information in the possession of the government.

6 'State law' in this chapter refers to New York law unless otherwise noted. This chapter does not purport to address the potential variances in the laws of all 50 US states.

34.3.3 Process

Federal class actions are governed by Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Before a judgment in a class action can issue, a class must be certified. Because of the high standard for class certification and the evidentiary support required, class certification motions are typically filed at the conclusion of the discovery phase. Class certification is often hotly contested. To achieve certification, the proponent of class status must show that the class is so numerous that joinder of all members is impracticable, there are common questions of law or fact, the claims of the proposed representative of the class are typical of the claims of the class as a whole and the proposed representative will adequately represent the interests of the class.[9]

Once these criteria are satisfied, the action must fit into one of three categories: (1) suits where separate actions might cause a risk of inconsistent judgments or where assets available to pay claims are limited; (2) suits seeking injunctive relief where any monetary remedy would be only incidental to the injunctive relief; and (3) suits seeking money damages.[10] Most cases fall within the third category. For these cases, in addition to the criteria set forth above, the proponent of class status must show that the common questions of fact or law predominate, and that class treatment is the superior method for adjudication.[11]

Other than the certification phase, the case proceeds as would an ordinary civil litigation. Typically, this will involve a motion to dismiss at the pleadings stage seeking to end the case based on legal infirmities or at least narrow the claims and issues in dispute. If any claims survive, the parties will proceed to discovery, which involves the exchange of typically voluminous documents and the deposition testimony of witnesses under oath. Witnesses who may be implicated in misconduct may refuse to testify on the grounds that doing so would infringe their constitutional right against self-incrimination.[12]

---

7 See 17 C.F.R. § 200.83 for a description of confidential treatment procedures under FOIA.

8 Designation of information as confidential under FOIA does not necessarily render the information unavailable for purposes of discovery in civil litigation. See, e.g., Friedman v. Bache Halsey Stuart Shields, Inc., 738 F.2d 1336, 1344 (D.C. Cir. 2009) ('[I]nformation unavailable under the FOIA is not necessarily unavailable through discovery.'); see also In re Subpoena Duces Tecum, 439 F.3d 740, 753-54 (D.C. Cir. 2006). ('FOIA's exceptions to disclosure limit only the right to information conveyed pursuant to that statute and other limitations on the Commission's authority to publish information . . . do not alter the Commission's duty to comply with lawful subpoenas after notice to the party whose information is sought.') (Citations omitted.)

9 Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a).

10 Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b).

11 Id.

12 U.S. Const. amend. V.

Discovery is typically followed by motions for summary judgment based on a lack of material facts in dispute.[13] If the motion for summary judgment fails, the case proceeds to trial. Settlement of federal class actions must be approved by the court, and must be on notice to all potential class members, who are given the opportunity to opt out of the settlement. If a class was not certified prior to settlement, a streamlined class certification motion is filed in connection with seeking approval of the settlement. Settlement agreements often provide a settling defendant the right to back out if too many class members opt out of the class.

Class Action Fairness Act of 2005 34.3.4

The Class Action Fairness Act of 2005 (CAFA) greatly expanded the federal courts' jurisdiction over class actions by relaxing the requirements for federal subject matter jurisdiction.[14] This allows defendants to remove class actions from state courts to federal courts, and to consolidate multiple state proceedings into a single federal court class action. As federal courts generally have more experience of administering class actions than state courts, this outcome is often seen as desirable.

CAFA requires courts to scrutinise class action settlements involving corporations more closely. CAFA also requires notice of settlements to be provided to state attorneys general so they may intervene to protect citizens who are class members.

Securities class actions: PSLRA & SLUSA 34.3.5

There are two statutory schemes applicable in securities class actions aimed at curtailing frivolous securities lawsuits: the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act of 1995 (PSLRA)[15] and the Securities Litigation Uniform Standards Act of 1998 (SLUSA).[16]

Among other changes to the securities litigation landscape, the PSLRA makes it more difficult for a plaintiff to plead securities fraud by requiring the plaintiff to plead false statements with particularity, establish a strong inference that each defendant knew the statements alleged were false when made, and allege loss causation. In addition, and importantly from a defendant's perspective, the PSLRA stays discovery until the court has determined, usually following a motion to dismiss, whether a claim for securities fraud has been adequately stated.

SLUSA was enacted to combat efforts by plaintiffs to avoid the strictures of the PSLRA by pursuing state law claims, such as common law fraud, through class actions in state courts. Broadly speaking, SLUSA bars claims, whether filed in state or federal court, that allege fraud under state law in connection with the 13 Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(a). ('The court shall grant summary judgment if the movant shows that there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.')

14 28 U.S.C. §§ 1332(d) et seq.

15 15 U.S.C. §§ 78u-4, 78u-5 et seq.

16 15 U.S.C. §§ 77p, 78bb et seq.

purchase or sale of securities from being pursued in a class action.[17] SLUSA can be a powerful tool in limiting the scope of claims in a securities class action at the outset.

34.3.6 Other considerations: class action waivers in arbitration agreements

In recent years, the United States Supreme Court has held that class action waivers in arbitration agreements are enforceable under the Federal Arbitration Act (FAA).[18] Thus, companies should consider subjecting claims by counterparties, customers or employees to arbitration and should include class action waivers in the arbitration agreement. Arbitration agreements typically provide that proceedings will be confidential, and in the absence of access to the class action device, a claimant with meritless claims or claims with low monetary value may be less inclined to pursue them.

34.4 Derivative actions

34.4.1 Law and procedure

In general, under state law, members or shareholders of a company can bring a derivative claim alleging harm to a company and seeking relief on its behalf.[19] Before bringing a claim, a plaintiff must generally show that it has made a demand on the company to bring the claim in its own name and the company has refused to do so, or that making such a demand would be futile.[20] The plaintiff must name the company as a nominal defendant in the suit, and the company will thereby have the right to participate. Recovery in a derivative action flows to the company.

34.4.2 Practical considerations: indemnification of officers and directors

Typically derivative claims are brought by minority shareholders against majority shareholders or corporate officers and directors. Corporate officers and directors are often entitled to indemnification by the company for such suits pursuant to a company's by-laws, subject to any requirements or restrictions that may 17 There is an important exception to this general rule. The United States Supreme Court recently held that SLUSA does not prohibit state court class actions arising from a company's initial public offering, which is governed by the 1933 Securities Act, as distinct from a company's subsequent offerings, which are governed by the 1934 Securities and Exchange Act, and are covered by SLUSA. See Cyan Inc. v. Beaver Cnty. Employees Retirement Fund, 138 S. Ct. 1061 (2018).

18 See DirecTV v. Imburgia, 136 S. Ct. 463 (2015); see also AT&T Mobility v. Concepcion, 563 U.S. 333 (2011). See also Epic Sys. Corp. v. Lewis, 138 S. Ct. 1612 (2018) (holding that arbitration agreements providing for individualised employee proceedings against employers must be enforced, notwithstanding provisions in statutory schemes to promote collective employment actions by employees). The Federal Arbitration Act is codified at 9 U.S.C. §§ 1 et seq.

19 See, e.g., N.Y. Bus. Corp. L. § 626 (authorising shareholder derivative suits).

20 When such a demand is made, companies sometimes form a 'special litigation committee' or 'demand review committee' consisting of disinterested and independent directors to determine whether pursuing the claim proposed by the shareholder is in the company's best interests. A special litigation committee's determination that such a claim should not be brought can provide a strong defence to defendants in a shareholder derivative action.

be imposed by state law,[21] and this is therefore an important consideration at the outset of any derivative suit. Ordinarily, officers and directors cannot claim indemnification for bad faith conduct, so where a company's board of directors determines that bad faith conduct has occurred – which determination is highly likely if criminal acts or regulatory misconduct are admitted by officers and directors, such as through a guilty plea – the question of indemnification becomes complicated and often requires careful parsing of whether the amounts claimed are subject to indemnification notwithstanding admission of unlawful acts. The outcome will depend both on the statutory scheme in the state whose laws govern the relationship between the director or officer and the company, as well as the breadth of corporate reimbursement provisions of the relevant insurance policy. Where a determination of whether the conduct at issue rose to the level of bad faith has not yet been reached, officers and directors often have the right to have their legal costs advanced by the company, pending such determination.

Other private litigation 34.5

Opt-out claims 34.5.1

Individuals who may be class members in a class action may opt out of participation in the class and pursue claims individually, which can result in a company having to litigate duplicative claims in multiple jurisdictions. To avoid a significant number of opt-outs, a company can attempt to achieve a class action settlement with terms attractive to class members.

Purchaser claims 34.5.2

Purchasers of securities of a company under investigation may, once the investigation comes to light, claim that they were defrauded into purchasing securities by material misstatements made by the company while it knew the investigation was pending. Such claims can be brought on an individual or class basis, subject to the limitations of the PSLRA and SLUSA.

Negative impact on contract enforcement rights 34.5.3

Conduct that is illegal or contrary to public policy (and which may, therefore, also be the subject of an investigation or litigation) may render related contracts entered into by a company void or voidable.

The common law doctrine of illegality prevents a party to a contract from enforcing its contractual rights and remedies in certain circumstances, where the contract is tainted by conduct that is illegal, or contrary to public policy (some contracts may also be rendered unenforceable by statute). The law in this area is highly dependent on facts and circumstances, and courts weigh a variety of factors in determining whether to enforce the provisions of an illegal contract.[22]

21 See, e.g., N.Y. Bus. Corp. L. § 722 (authorising indemnification of corporate officers and directors); 8 Del. C. § 145 (same).

22 See, e.g., Denburg v. Parker Chapin Flattau & Kimpl, 82 N.Y.2d 375, 385 (1993).

34.5.4 Specific provisions in commercial contracts

Parties often include specific provisions in their commercial contracts (including finance documents) aimed at preventing, or providing contractual protection in relation to, illegal behaviour (e.g., corruption) involving a party to the agreement. Accordingly, the fact of an investigation (or related proceedings), or conduct that is the subject of an investigation, may have adverse contractual consequences for a company. Such consequences will depend on both the investigation and the specific conduct under investigation, as well as the contractual provisions. Such provisions may include:

- obligations:
  - to comply with certain applicable laws and regulations;
  - to have in place and comply with specified policies (such as anti-bribery and corruption policies);
  - to maintain accurate records of payments made in relation to the contract;
  - in relation to subcontractors (for instance, to ensure that subcontractors comply with requirements equivalent to those imposed on the company), and that may impose responsibility on the company for any non-compliance by a subcontractor with such requirements;
  - to report generally on compliance to counterparties on an ongoing basis, which could include requiring the provision of a confirmation signed by an officer of the company or audit rights; and
  - to report the occurrence of certain events to counterparties. These could include dealing with a public official in connection with the performance of the contract, receiving a request for a payment (or other advantage) in connection with the performance of the contract, or the commencement (or threat) of an investigation into the activities of the company;
- representations (given by the company, and which may be repeated) that it has not been investigated for or convicted of certain offences (and that no proceedings or investigations are pending or threatened), or which relate to the accuracy and completeness of information provided to contractual counterparties;
- termination rights for counterparties if the company breaches (or, potentially, if the counterparty reasonably suspects a breach of) certain obligations, or if the company makes a false representation or is convicted of certain offences; and
- indemnities (for the benefit of counterparties) in respect of loss suffered as a result of a certain breaches of the contract by the company.[23]

A company may face parallel litigation brought by its contractual counterparties in reliance on such provisions. A company may also be able to invoke such provisions against its counterparties, although where a company is under investigation, it may be barred from taking the position in civil proceedings that its counterparty has engaged in illegal activity if the company is also exposed for its counterparty's

23 An indemnity against a criminal liability may, however, be unenforceable for public policy reasons.

conduct, as the company would be in pari delicto or, in other words, equally guilty such that the court will refuse to intercede in a dispute between them.[24]

Mergers, acquisitions and investments 34.5.5

Mergers, acquisitions and investments can present particular risks for companies. Illegal behaviour in the target company (or its subsidiaries, or other related companies and persons) may have various negative consequences for an acquiring entity, which can include financial consequences (for example, the target may have been overvalued); legal consequences (both civil and criminal) for the target, the acquiring entity and relevant individuals (including officers of both entities),[25] along with associated legal costs; and other practical consequences (for example, reputational damage, which may have a consequent effect on business).[26]

As a result, acquiring entities will often take precautions to minimise these risks. Typically, these include conducting proportionate pre- and post-acquisition due diligence of the target and its business, including without limitation review of all of the target's business dealings and third-party contracts, implementing compliance programmes and including appropriate protections in the relevant contractual documentation.

In relation to the latter, warranties, representations and indemnities[27] designed to provide such protection are frequently included in share purchase agreements. The scope of protection will depend on the particular provisions negotiated, but they can be widely drafted, such that they encompass the conduct of, for example:

- the target and its subsidiaries;
- directors, officers, employees, significant shareholders, affiliates, agents, and distributors of the target and its subsidiaries;
- those associated with or acting on behalf of the target and its subsidiaries; and
- those who perform services for or on behalf of the target and its subsidiaries, 24 See Kirschner v. KPMG LLC, 15 N.Y.3d 446 (2010).

25 The Department of Justice (DOJ) recently issued an opinion addressing factors that may be relevant in determining whether and how the DOJ would seek to impose post-acquisition successor liability on an acquirer for pre-acquisition Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA) violations by its target. See US Department of Justice, Foreign Corrupt Practices Act Review, No. 14-02 (7 November 2014). The DOJ 'encourages companies engaging in mergers and acquisitions to (1) conduct thorough risk-based FCPA and anti-corruption due diligence; (2) implement the acquiring company's code of conduct and anti-corruption policies as quickly as practicable; (3) conduct FCPA and other relevant training for the acquired entity's directors and employees, as well as third-party agents and partners; (4) conduct an FCPA-specific audit of the acquired entity as quickly as practicable; and (5) disclose to the Department any corrupt payments discovered during the due diligence process.' Id. at 3-4.

26 Companies should also be aware of the risk that illegal behaviour (for example, bribery) may occur during the merger, acquisition or investment transaction.

27 However, see footnote 23 above in relation to indemnities against criminal liability.

and may cover areas such as:

- compliance with laws generally;
- compliance with anti-money laundering laws and standards;
- compliance with anti-bribery and corruption laws and standards;
- debarment from public contracts;
- sanctions (including whether such persons are, have been, or are likely to become, subject to sanctions); and
- whether such persons are (or have been) subject to an investigation or any proceedings, or whether an investigation or any proceedings in respect of such persons are pending, threatened, contemplated or even likely.

Accordingly, the fact of an investigation (or related proceedings), or conduct which is the subject of an investigation, may give the acquiring entity contractual rights it can seek to enforce (including through litigation or arbitration). The acquiring entity should, therefore, review all of the target's business dealings and third-party contracts for potential exposure, which may include consideration of the target's in-house and external legal advice relating to such dealings and contracts.[28] Again, however, care may need to be taken in doing so for the reasons given at Section 34.5.4.

34.5.6 Employment law, defamation and whistleblowing

Investigations can have employment law consequences for a company. Employees may seek to bring claims against their employers arising out of the subject matter of an investigation, or how the investigation is handled; conversely, an employer may wish to take action against an employee implicated in the conduct under investigation. Employees may also pursue claims for defamation based on statements a company may make about their conduct either internally or to the government.[29]

See Chapter 14 on employee rights

In addition, to the extent that allegations have been made by whistleblowers, companies under investigation or conducting investigations should be careful to respect whistleblower rights to avoid claims for breach of the protections afforded to whistleblowers.

See Chapter 20 on whistleblowers

28 An acquiring company should be conscious, however, of the potential for a privilege waiver by the target company if such legal advice is shared outside the context of litigation. The law on this subject varies from state to state, but in New York, for example, pre-closing communications between counsel for a target company and its acquirer are not privileged unless they relate to pending or anticipated litigation. See Ambac Assurance Corp. v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc., 27 N.Y.3d 616 (2016).

29 See, e.g., Mott v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 910 F. Supp. 868, 874-78 (N.D.N.Y. 1995) (granting summary judgment in favour of employer on employee defamation claim stemming from employer's investigation and subsequent reporting of employee's illegal conduct, and finding that the investigation was conducted in a 'thorough and responsible manner' because it was initiated immediately following reports of wrongdoing, included interviews with all relevant parties and an extensive review of books and records, and was undertaken by a team including both inside and external counsel).

Evidentiary issues 34.6

Reliance by the court on statements of facts in authority findings 34.6.1

Parties will often seek to rely on findings made by the government as the result of an investigation in subsequent civil litigation. To the extent facts are admitted in, for example, a deferred prosecution agreement or a guilty plea, those facts will generally be admitted into evidence as party admissions under US evidentiary rules.[30] Deferred prosecution agreements may also specifically prohibit a company from denying certain facts. In addition, to the extent a party discloses otherwise privileged information to the government in connection with a deferred prosecution or plea agreement, there may be a privilege waiver by that party in any related civil litigation.

Reliance by the authority on findings of a court 34.6.2

