Conversely, facts discovered during the course of civil litigation may draw the attention of the government, and the government may rely on the findings in a civil case as grounds for opening an investigation or taking some other enforcement action. Accordingly, these risks may be relevant considerations for a company when considering and implementing its litigation strategy in civil proceedings. In addition, conflicted representation and privilege issues may arise if the interests of the company and its employees are not aligned. For example, company counsel may represent a key employee witness at deposition in a civil case, but in the context of a subsequent criminal investigation may be conflicted from continuing the representation should the employee's interests diverge from the company's interests,[31] such as where the company wishes to disclose misconduct to the government but the employee wishes to invoke his or her Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination.

30 A settlement with a civil regulator may be reached without the company (or the individual) admitting or denying the regulator's findings set forth in the settlement order. In this circumstance, the regulator's findings are generally inadmissible in subsequent civil litigation. See, e.g., Wilson v. Parisi, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3970, at *6-7 (M.D. Pa. 21 January 2009) (excluding consent decrees under Federal Rule of Evidence 408); see also Bowers v. NCAA, 563 F. Supp. 2d 508, 536 (D.N.J. 2008) (holding Rule 408 'plainly applicable' to the consent decree at issue and refusing to allow the plaintiff to use a consent decree between the defendant and the Department of Justice as evidence of the defendant's liability for the conduct underlying the plaintiff's claim); Carpenters Health & Welfare Fund v. Coca-Cola Co., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 112503, at *22 (N.D. Ga. 23 April 2008) (granting motion to exclude SEC civil consent order from evidence); In re Blech Sec. Litig., 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4650, at *25-30 (S.D.N.Y. 26 March 2003) (finding SEC consent judgments inadmissible under Rule 408); Safford v. St. Tammany Parish Fire Prot. Dist. No. 1, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6513, at *16 (E.D. La. 11 April 2003) (holding that consent decree cannot be used as evidence of prior liability).

31 See, e.g., N.Y. Unified Court System, Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 1.7(a)(1) (a lawyer cannot concurrently represent two clients with differing interests).

34.6.3 Collateral use of disclosed documents

In the United States, the scope of discovery in civil cases is very broad, and parties in federal civil litigation must typically disclose all potentially relevant non-privileged evidence.[32] Confidentiality of a relevant document is not a justification for refusing to disclose it, though confidential documents are often protected from public disclosure by protective orders.

As a result, a company involved in civil proceedings may be required to disclose sensitive documents to an opponent, including documents relevant to an investigation or even unprivileged investigation material. Where an adversary is aware of an investigation, it will typically demand production of any document that has been given to the government, and in practice, apart from privileged documents, such documents are produced. In making a production to an adversary, a company should seek a protective order that requires the adversary to maintain the information as confidential, refrain from using the information for any purpose other than litigation, seek to have the information filed under seal when reference to the information is made in court filings, and destroy the information at the conclusion of litigation.

34.7 Practical considerations

34.7.1 Coordination with internal investigations team

It is important that those within the company responsible for managing parallel civil litigation are in constant communication with the internal team responsible for dealing with investigations, to ensure that:

- a clear, holistic strategy is developed for managing the investigations and parallel civil proceedings, and anticipating areas of potential risk (e.g., civil claims that may arise, but have not yet been commenced);
- both teams understand, and evaluate the risks of, new developments in both the criminal and civil context; and
- any proposed action by the company or associated persons, in the civil or criminal context, is carefully analysed to determine the potential repercussions for all other proceedings and investigations.

Issues can arise, for instance, where:

- factual admissions are made in civil proceedings (such as in an answer or in interrogatory responses) that may undermine the defence of the criminal case;
- an authority seeks disclosure of privileged documents from the company in circumstances where the company may wish to assert privilege over those documents in subsequent civil proceedings;
- witnesses, whose testimony may be important for the company's case in civil proceedings, are under investigation, or have been classified as suspects, by the authorities, and have concerns about self-incrimination. Depending on the circumstances, employment proceedings may also be ongoing in respect of such individuals;

See Chapter 8 on witness interviews

- pleading possible defences (such as illegality) in civil proceedings, which may strengthen the company's case in those proceedings but would undermine the position it has taken in relation to an investigation; or
- as part of deferred prosecution agreement negotiations, there is a risk that matters an authority seeks to include in an agreed statement of facts could be relied on against the company in parallel civil proceedings.

In particular, close coordination is necessary between the company's criminal and civil legal advisers to ensure consistency of approach.

Privilege waiver and disclosure obligations 34.7.2

During an investigation, documents entitled to privilege or work-product protection may be shown or provided to relevant authorities, often to demonstrate co-operation. These include not only privileged communications between attorney and client but also documents, such as witness interview notes, generated by external counsel. Depending on the applicable privilege law, which can vary widely from state to state and even among the federal circuit courts of appeal, sharing such information will not necessarily constitute a general privilege waiver for the purposes of subsequent civil proceedings (particularly if it is made clear that this is done on a limited basis), although it may lead to adverse consequences, as the company will lose a degree of control over the information in the documents.[33] In cases involving multiple jurisdictions, it is critical for a company to obtain advice on all potentially applicable privilege laws prior to showing potentially privileged documents to the government, as the effect of showing or providing a potentially privileged document to the authorities may vary depending on which law governs questions of privilege.

Concurrent settlements 34.8

Difficult issues can arise for companies when attempting to negotiate settlement of global investigations, which can involve a variety of regulatory and prosecuting authorities across a range of different jurisdictions. Parallel existing (or potential) civil litigation or arbitration adds a further layer of complexity to the analysis.

See Chapter 24 on negotiating global settlements

During settlement negotiations with the authorities, companies should be aware of the risk that a settlement, as well as any associated press coverage or documents (such as a statement of facts in a deferred prosecution agreement), may raise awareness of potential civil claims, and in the class action context will likely be relied on to support claims. Documents pertaining to the negotiation of a settlement, including communications with the relevant authority and drafts of the settlement, may be discoverable by plaintiffs in any such civil action.[34] Accordingly, and to the extent possible, companies should avoid admitting liability as part of any negotiated settlement with the government; and, if an admission of liability is required, they should ensure that it is narrowly circumscribed. Companies should further consider what they convey during the course of settlement discussions and how they communicate such information.

Settlement of civil claims can also carry risks for a company under investigation, in particular class action settlements, which are public. Companies should avoid admitting liability as part of any negotiated civil settlement. In addition, the government may perceive certain types of civil settlements (particularly settlements with potential witnesses for substantial sums) as suspect.

34 Federal Rule of Evidence 408 limits the admissibility of evidence pertaining to settlements and their negotiation. It does not, however, speak to the discoverability of such information. Numerous courts have addressed the availability of a 'settlement privilege' to limit discovery of settlement related documents, reaching different conclusions. Compare Stockman v. Oakcrest Dental Center P.C., 480 F.3d 791 (6th Cir. 2007) (applying settlement privilege), with Morse/Diesel, Inc. v. Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland, 122 F.R.D. 447, 449 (S.D.N.Y. 1988) (declining to recognise settlement privilege).

Privilege: The UK Perspective

Tamara Oppenheimer, Rebecca Loveridge and Samuel Rabinowitz[1]

Introduction 35.1

The law of privilege confers on persons the right to refuse to produce a document or to answer questions – including by a regulator or prosecuting authority. The two subcategories of legal professional privilege are (1) legal advice privilege and (2) litigation privilege. This chapter explains the basic principles applicable to these, having particular regard to the regulatory and investigatory context. It also addresses briefly two other types of privilege that may arise in the regulatory context, namely common interest privilege[2] and without prejudice privilege.

This chapter also discusses certain exceptions to privilege and the circumstances in which privilege can be lost or 'waived', either intentionally or inadvertently. The final section of the chapter addresses some more practical issues of how to maintain privilege in the regulatory and investigatory context.

1 Tamara Oppenheimer, Rebecca Loveridge and Samuel Rabinowitz are members of Fountain Court Chambers. The authors are grateful to Bankim Thanki QC for his contributions to previous editions of this chapter.

2 Common interest privilege (as with joint interest privilege) is traditionally analysed as a distinct category of privilege, although it depends on the existence of material to which either legal advice or litigation privilege applies.

35.2 Legal professional privilege: general principles

The relevant distinction between legal advice privilege and litigation privilege is as follows:[3]

- Legal advice privilege is concerned with communications between lawyer and client for the purpose of giving or receiving legal advice or assistance,[4] in both the litigation and the non-litigious context.
- Litigation privilege is concerned with communications between a client or his or her lawyer and third parties for the purposes of litigation (whether anticipated or commenced).

Notwithstanding frequent misconceptions to the contrary, litigation privilege has no application to communications between lawyer and client, even where litigation is anticipated or has actually commenced: such communications will always fall within the ambit of legal advice privilege.[5]

Before turning to consider these two aspects of legal professional privilege separately, a number of general observations should be made.

35.2.1 The need for confidentiality

Privilege requires and protects the confidentiality of documents and exchanges. Confidentiality is therefore a necessary, but not a sufficient, condition for both limbs of legal professional privilege.[6] The question is whether a document has the necessary quality of confidence, such as to attract privilege. This is rarely problematic, as it can usually be inferred that communications between lawyers and their clients or with third parties in the context of actual or anticipated litigation have been impressed with confidence. Nevertheless, some communications may be regarded as lacking that character. Hence, in the context of legal advice privilege, the client's identity,[7] address[8] or the existence of the retainer[9] will not generally be deemed to be confidential (or, accordingly, privileged). While a lawyer will usually owe his or her client enforceable duties of confidence,[10] for the purposes of litigation privilege, communications between a lawyer or client and a third party do not have to be 'confidential' in the sense that the third party is bound by equitable (or contractual) duties of confidence not to reveal the communication to anyone else.[11] In the context of litigation privilege, the requirement of confidentiality is therefore perhaps best put in terms of the communication or other document being 'not properly available for use'.[12]

Legal professional privilege is not merely an exclusionary rule of evidence, but is also a substantive right, which is afforded overriding importance within English law.[13] The House of Lords and the Supreme Court have repeatedly emphasised its importance and its role in the administration of justice. It has been characterised as both 'a fundamental human right'[14] and 'a fundamental condition on which the administration of justice as a whole rests'.[15]

If it were simply a rule of evidence, a client could only prevent disclosure in legal proceedings. There would be no guarantee that the same material could be kept from the police or some other agency, such as a financial regulator or prosecuting authority, with the power to compel the production of documents or information. Hence, legal professional privilege can now generally be asserted in answer to any demand for documents by a public or other authority; it is not limited to a right that may be asserted only in the context of civil or criminal proceedings.

It is, however, a rule relating to immunity rather than admissibility,[16] since even improperly obtained privileged material may be admissible in evidence.[17]

10 Confidentiality in this context is properly understood in the broader sense of information that the lawyer is not at liberty to disclose and may include information about a client that is in fact in the public domain: see the decision of the House of Lords in Hilton v. BBE [2005] 1 WLR 567, para. 34.

17 Calcraft v. Guest [1898] 1 QB 759, CA; R v. Tompkins (1977) 67 Cr App R 181. The party to whom the privilege belongs might, of course, apply for an injunction to restrain its use: Ashburton v. Pape [1913] 2 Ch 469, CA; Goddard v. Nationwide Building Society [1987] QB 670, CA.

The privilege is absolute and can only be overridden in very exceptional circumstances.[18] Furthermore, in accordance with the aphorism 'once privileged, always privileged',[19] once a client's privilege has attached to a document or other privileged exchange, the privilege will persist, subject only to waiver or other types of loss, for the client's benefit and that of successors in title for all time and in all circumstances.[20]

35.2.3 Rationale

The rationales underlying legal advice and litigation privilege are distinct:

- The interest protected by legal advice privilege is the public concern to ensure the availability of appropriate legal advice and assistance.[21] To this end, English law recognises the need to promote absolute candour between client and lawyer, by providing that exchanges between them will not subsequently be divulged.[22]
- Litigation privilege has often been regarded as an aspect of the right to a fair trial in England and in other common law jurisdictions.[23] The courts have emphasised that fairness requires a private and confidential sphere of preparation for litigation.[24] In a classic statement of this principle James LJ emphasised that 'as you have no right to see your adversary's brief, you have no right to see that which comes into existence merely as materials for that brief.'[25] Litigation privilege has therefore been characterised by Steyn LJ as an auxiliary principle buttressing the constitutional right of access to justice.[26] In recent judgments, this rationale has been doubted, largely on the grounds that changes to English civil procedure (particularly the rules of pretrial disclosure) have introduced a culture of openness, which sits uneasily with any right to 18 As Lord Scott stated in Three Rivers No. 6 (para. 25): 'if a communication or document qualifies for legal professional privilege, the privilege is absolute. It cannot be overridden by some supposedly greater public interest. It can be waived by the person, the client, entitled to it, and it can be overridden by statute . . . but it is otherwise absolute. There is no balancing exercise that has to be carried out: see B v. Auckland District Law Society [2003] 2 AC 736, 756-759.'

'secrecy' in adversarial litigation.[27] However, litigation privilege remains justified by the need for a zone of privacy in the preparation for litigation[28] and remains firmly entrenched in English law as a consequence of decisions at appellate level, including the House of Lords.[29]

No adverse inference can be drawn where privilege is relied on 35.2.4

No adverse inferences may be drawn from the assertion by a person of a claim to legal professional privilege.[30] This is a principle that may sometimes be overlooked when an authority is seeking disclosure of privileged materials. But any responsible regulator or prosecuting authority must accept that it can neither require disclosure of privileged communications, nor rely on the regulated entity's refusal to provide it. As Lord Scott observed in Three Rivers No. 6, the existence of legal professional privilege means that 'cases may sometimes have to be decided in ignorance of relevant probative material.'[31]

There is, however, some uncertainty as to whether UK prosecuting authorities can require privilege to be waived when entering into co-operation agreements with parties.[32] In R v. George,[33] a case against certain British Airways executives concerned with a cartel offence involving alleged collusion with Virgin Atlantic, this issue arose in circumstances where the relevant Virgin Atlantic executives had admitted the offences and were given immunity from prosecution by the Office of Fair Trading (OFT).[34] Under the OFT's leniency and immunity guidelines, these executives were expected to assume an obligation of continuous and complete co-operation with the OFT's investigation and any subsequent proceedings. Owen J considered that it would be reasonable for the OFT to press for disclosure of privileged material in the hands of the Virgin Atlantic executives, as part of the OFT's duty to obtain material held by a third party that might be capable of undermining the prosecution case, on the basis that the Virgin Atlantic executives were under a duty to give continuous and complete co-operation as a condition of leniency or immunity and failing a satisfactory response to have invoked its power to revoke the leniency agreements.[35] By contrast, in R v. Daniels,[36] in which 34 The OFT has now been superseded, along with the Competition Commission, by the Competition and Markets Authority (CMA), though regulation of consumer credit passed to the Financial Conduct Authority (FCA).

35 The case against the BA executives ultimately collapsed following the discovery of thousands of prosecution e-disclosure documents that had not been disclosed to BA or reviewed by the OFT.

a co-defendant to a murder charge had entered into an agreement pursuant to section 73 of the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 (SOCPA) under which he agreed to give assistance to the authorities, the Court of Appeal did not express a view as to whether a requirement to waive privilege could lawfully be included in a SOCPA agreement and indicated (without deciding) that, if so, an express condition would be required. The ability of a prosecuting authority to require waiver of privilege, and the circumstances in which it will be taken to have done so, therefore remains in some doubt and would appear to vary depending on the particular rules and guidelines applicable to the prosecuting authority. Since the decision in R v. George, the OFT guidance 'Applications for leniency and no-action in cartel cases' (the 2013 Leniency Guidance), now adopted by the CMA, has changed and no longer requires waiver of privilege as an element of co-operation. However, the CMA does not rule out enquiring as to whether a leniency applicant may be prepared to waive privilege over certain material during the course of a possible criminal cartel prosecution, although making it clear that any refusal to waive privilege will not have any adverse consequences for the leniency application and that granting such a waiver would not yield any advantage to the leniency applicant. The CMA will, unless the position is uncontroversial, instruct independent counsel to provide an opinion on whether the relevant information is privileged and will require disclosure of information not found to be privileged.[37] It is also clear that a party's willingness to waive privilege is a relevant factor to be taken into account by a court when considering, pursuant to section 45 and Schedule 17 of the Crime and Courts Act 2013, whether to approve a deferred prosecution agreement.[38]

35.2.5 Privilege belongs to the client

Privilege belongs to the client and not to the lawyer or agent.[39] Only the client can invoke the privilege.[40] It is not open to a lawyer or other agent to do so, unless acting on behalf of the client, and the lawyer or agent cannot invoke the privilege if the client has waived it.[41] In the case of litigation privilege, a third party with whom a lawyer or client has communicated for the purposes of adversarial proceedings may not assert the privilege of the party to the actual or prospective litigation.[42]

Legal advice privilege 35.3

The scope of legal advice privilege was the subject of authoritative reconsideration by the House of Lords in Three Rivers No. 6. Lord Rodger defined the privilege (at paragraph 50) as extending to:

> [A]ll communications made in confidence between solicitors and their clients for the purpose of giving or obtaining legal advice even at a stage where litigation is not in contemplation. It does not matter whether the communication is directly between the client and his legal advisor or is made through an intermediate agent of either.

The requirements thereby identified can be summarised as follows:

- a communication, whether written or oral;
- between a client and a lawyer (or an intermediate agent of either);
- made in confidence;[43]
- for the purpose of giving or obtaining legal advice.

Communication 35.3.1

The basic concept of communication is self-explanatory. However, privilege does not arise upon the exchange of pre-existing and previously unprivileged documents: the document's existence must be attributable to the intention to communicate.[44] The scope of the privilege is, however, broader than references merely to 'communications' might seem to indicate. In addition to communications, the following documents will also (if the remaining requirements are satisfied) fall within the privilege:

- a document intended to be a communication between client and lawyer, which was never communicated;[45]

42 Lee v. SW Thames Health Authority [1985] 1 WLR 845, CA; Schneider v. Leigh [1955] 2 QB 195.

45 Three Rivers No. 6, para. 21.

- documents or parts of documents that evidence the substance of lawyer–client communications.[46] This would include, for example, a written record of an oral communication or a document disseminating the contents or substance of legal advice within[47] or even beyond[48] the corporation receiving the advice; and
- the lawyer's working papers, including drafts, attendance notes and memoranda.[49]

35.3.2 Between a client and lawyer

35.3.2.1 Lawyer

The scope of the term 'lawyer' for the purposes of legal advice privilege (and legal professional privilege more generally) is broad rather than formalistic, but not without limits. In R (Prudential PLC) v. Special Commissioner of Income Tax, the Supreme Court confirmed that legal professional privilege is applicable only to 'communications in connection with advice given by members of the legal profession, which includes members of the Bar, the Law Society, and the Chartered Institute of Legal Executives (CILEX) (and, by extension, foreign lawyers)'.[50] The privilege extends to their non-qualified employees including secretaries,[51] clerks, trainee solicitors, pupils or paralegals acting under the direction of a lawyer.[52] For the avoidance of doubt, under English law[53] no distinction is made between in-house lawyers and lawyers in independent practice.[54] However, that an individual happens to be a 'lawyer' in the sense required above will not suffice; in each case the relevant question is whether he or she is consulted in that professional capacity.[55] The lawyer must also be subject to the control of the professional body and the governing rules of practice; in other words, the lawyer must have a current practising certificate. Therefore a qualified solicitor who has been struck off the roll is not a lawyer for the purposes of legal professional privilege,[56] unless the client in good faith does not know that the solicitor has been struck off.[57]

Subject to certain specific statutory exceptions,[58] communications with other professionals – including, for example, patent and trade mark attorneys – will not attract legal advice privilege at common law, even where they are giving advice on strictly legal matters.[59]

Legal advice privilege will apply to advice received from foreign lawyers.[60] It covers advice given by foreign lawyers on English law[61] as well as foreign law.[62]

Client 35.3.2.2

The concept of the 'client' in the context of corporations was the subject of appellate consideration by the Court of Appeal in Three Rivers No. 5 and has recently been the subject of further consideration by the Court of Appeal in The Director of the Serious Fraud Office v. ENRC (which is discussed later in this section). The true ratio of Three Rivers No. 5 has been the subject of controversy. In previous editions of this work, it was said that it appeared that the 'client' would not necessarily be the corporation itself, or its employees per se, but only those within the corporation who were authorised to communicate with the lawyer and receive his or her advice.[63] This was the interpretation of Three Rivers No. 5 adopted by the Singapore Court of Appeal in Skandinaviska Enskilda Banken v. Asia Pacific Breweries. The court in that case commented that: 'The principle is that if an employee is not authorised to communicate with the company's solicitors for the

It is clear that patent and trade mark attorneys do not attract legal professional privilege at common law: Dormeuil Trade Mark [1983] RPC 131; *Wilden Pump Engineering Co v. purpose of obtaining legal advice, then that communication is not protected by legal advice privilege.' It went on to state that authorisation need not be express but may be implied.[64]

However, the concept of the 'client' was interpreted more restrictively in two first-instance decisions of the English High Court.[65] In The RBS Rights Issue Litigation[66] Hildyard J held that notes of witness interviews prepared by RBS's lawyers were not subject to legal advice privilege (although the interviewees were authorised by RBS to communicate with the lawyers), and neither were the notes subject to legal advice privilege on the basis that they comprised lawyers' working papers. In Hildyard J's view, the Court of Appeal in Three Rivers No. 5 established a general principle that 'the client' for the purposes of a lawyer–client communication subject to legal advice privilege must be someone who is authorised to seek and receive legal advice. The approach in The RBS Rights Issue Litigation was followed by Andrews J in the first-instance decision in The Director of the Serious Fraud Office v. Eurasian Natural Resources Corporation,[67] where once again the privileged status of interview notes produced by the lawyers during the course of an internal investigation was in issue. Andrews J held that legal advice privilege attaches only to 'communications between the lawyer and those individuals who are authorised to obtain legal advice on that entity's behalf.'[68] By 'authorised' Andrews J meant being specifically 'tasked' by the corporation to obtain legal advice, a qualification not found in the judgment of the Singapore Court of Appeal in the Skandinaviska case referred to above. That interviewees were authorised to communicate with the lawyers to provide them with information or relevant facts in order for the lawyers to give advice, did not make those communications privileged. Andrews J also agreed with Hildyard J that lawyers' notes of interviews with witnesses would not be privileged on the ground of being lawyers' working papers, unless the notes would betray the tenor of the legal advice.

65 A similar approach was also taken by Chief Master March in Astex v. Astrazeneca [2016] EWHC 2759 (Ch) and by the Divisional Court in R(AL) v. Serious Fraud Office [2018] EWHC 856 (Admin) (although the reasoning on this issue in that case is somewhat confused, perhaps because – on the unusual facts of the case – no party was positively asserting that privilege applied to the interview notes in question).

68 Ibid., at para. 70. Andrews J acknowledged that, in the context of a company, the person giving the instructions to the lawyers may not necessarily be the same as the person or persons who want to receive the advice. Accordingly, there could be instances where particular individuals or groups are authorised to instruct the lawyers, while others individuals are authorised to receive the advice, typically a company's board of directors (see ibid., at para. 84).

The issue came before the Court of Appeal in The Director of the Serious Fraud Office SFO v. ENRC.[69] The Court analysed the decision in Three Rivers No. 5 and concluded as follows:

> We can fully accept that the Court of Appeal could have decided Three Rivers (No. 5) on the simple basis that Freshfields' client was the BIU (not the Bank), and the documents had been prepared by the Bank (not the BIU), so that the position of the particular Bank employee who had prepared them was irrelevant to the question of legal advice privilege. We do not, however, think that, fairly read, that was the Court of Appeal's reasoning. . . . it seems to us that Longmore LJ reasoned that, because agents and employees, on authority, stood in the same position in relation to legal professional privilege, once it was established that only communications between the lawyer and the client, and not between the lawyer and an agent of the client, could attract legal advice privilege, communications between a lawyer and an employee of the client (other than employees specifically tasked with seeking and receiving legal advice) could also not be privileged. As we have said, we are not sure that it is necessary for us to determine whether this reasoning was the ratio decidendi*, but if that did have to be decided, we would hold that it was.*[70]

As to whether Three Rivers No. 5 was correctly decided on this point, the Court of Appeal in ENRC held[71] that this is a question which can only be determined by the Supreme Court. Nevertheless, the Court expressed the view that there was 'much force' in submissions made on behalf of ENRC and The Law Society (intervening in the appeal) that, if Three Rivers No. 5 did indeed decide that the definition of 'client' should be restrictively interpreted as it was in The RBS Rights Issue Litigation, then it was wrongly decided. The Court referred to the policy justification for legal advice privilege, that there is a public interest in a client being able to place all the facts before the legal adviser without fear that they may afterwards be disclosed and used to the client's prejudice, and to the fact that large corporations need, as much as small corporations and individuals, to seek and obtain legal advice without fear of intrusion. The Court acknowledged that, in the modern world, legal advice is often sought by large national and multinational companies where the information on which legal advice is sought is unlikely to be in the hands of the main board or those it appoints to seek and receive legal advice; therefore:

> If a multi-national corporation cannot ask its lawyers to obtain the information it needs to advise that corporation from the corporation's employees with relevant first-hand knowledge under the protection of legal advice privilege, > that corporation will be in a less advantageous position than a smaller entity seeking such advice. In our view, at least, whatever the rule is, it should be equally applicable to all clients, whatever their size or reach.[72]

69 The Director of the Serious Fraud Office v. Eurasian Natural Resources Corporation Limited [2019] 1 WLR 791.

71 Ibid., at para. 124.

The Court also referred to English law being, on this issue, out of step with the international common law and remarked on the undesirability of such inconsistency. The Court concluded that:

> If, therefore, it had been open to us to depart from Three Rivers (No. 5), we would have been in favour of doing so. For the reasons we have given, however, we do not think that it is open to us, so it is a matter that will have to be considered again by the Supreme Court in this or an appropriate future case.[73]

The Court of Appeal in ENRC upheld ENRC's claim to privilege over the relevant interview notes on grounds of litigation privilege, overturning the judgment of Andrews J at first instance, and it was therefore strictly unnecessary for it to consider the issue of who may constitute 'the client', which only arose in the context of the alternative claim to legal advice privilege. It might therefore be argued that the Court's reasoning on this point is technically obiter. However, it is at the very least highly persuasive guidance as to why, in a corporate context, a restrictive approach as to who may constitute 'the client' for the purposes of legal advice privilege is undesirable and unworkable as a matter of policy and principle. If the issue finally reaches the Supreme Court,[74] there is every chance that the restrictive interpretation of 'client' will be reconsidered but, until then, the law should be taken to be as stated by the Court of Appeal in ENRC.

The implications of a restrictive interpretation of 'client' in a corporate context are well rehearsed. This approach is likely to exclude the vast majority of employees within the company. A corporate entity that wishes to obtain legal advice and that needs to carry out a fact-finding investigation within the organisation to obtain the necessary information for its lawyers will not, while these decisions on the proper interpretation and application of Three Rivers No. 5 remain good law, be able to claim legal advice privilege over documents created pursuant to that fact-finding investigation (except, it seems, to the extent that the facts are known to, and obtained by the lawyers from, individuals who also happen to be authorised to seek and receive legal advice). While the rationale of legal advice privilege is, as explained in Section 35.2.3, to enable a client to provide full and frank instructions to its lawyer to enable the lawyer to provide sensible advice, it appears that (pending any clarification from the Supreme Court) a corporate client will be severely restricted in the extent to which it can gather information for its lawyer in order for the lawyer to give advice without its communications being

74 The issue will need to be clarified in another case as the Serious Fraud Office (SFO) did not pursue an application for permission to appeal to the Supreme Court in ENRC.

disclosable in subsequent proceedings. It makes no difference whether information is obtained from employees by other employees of the company or by the lawyers directly.

In this regard, and as recognised by the Court of Appeal in ENRC, English law is also at odds with other common law jurisdictions. The Hong Kong Court of Appeal in CITIC Pacific v. Secretary of State for Justice[75] recognised that a narrow definition of client was incompatible with the rationale for legal advice privilege as explained by the House of Lords in Three Rivers No. 6. The decisions in The RBS Rights Issue Litigation and, at first instance, in ENRC also seem to be doubtful in relation to the lawyers' working papers doctrine. Notes of witness interviews that are prepared by lawyers, provided they are not verbatim transcripts, are types of document that should typically qualify as 'lawyers working papers', in line with the decision in Balabel v. Air India.[76] This was the subject of argument before the Court of Appeal in ENRC. However, the Court declined to decide this issue because, in light of its findings on litigation privilege, it did not strictly arise and moreover the Court considered that it would be preferable for the matter to be addressed by the Supreme Court in the context of any future consideration of legal advice privilege.[77]

Communication need not in all cases be direct, but may occur through an agent of the client or the lawyer. A distinction needs to be made between an agent for the purposes of communication, that is to say a mere conduit between the client and the lawyer, such as an interpreter (where intellectual input by the agent will risk destroying the privilege[78]) and an agent for the purposes of seeking and obtaining the advice (where it will not). Communications between 'the various legal advisers of the client' with a view to the client obtaining legal advice or assistance will generally be privileged.[79]

76 In this regard there must be some doubt as to whether the court was correct in The RBS Rights Issue Litigation and in ENRC – at first instance – in stating that to qualify as lawyers' working papers, documents must betray the trend of legal advice. That is not a requirement specified in Balabel (in which the Court of Appeal was considering a claim to privilege in respect of both communications between client and lawyer and lawyers' working papers) nor is it required in Three Rivers No. 5 itself. In specifying that requirement Hildyard J in The RBS Rights Issue Litigation and Andrews J in ENRC relied on observations made in a different context, namely where a solicitor copies or assembles a collection of documents, and the issue is whether that selection can be said to be privileged (see Lyell v. Kennedy (No. 3) (1884) 27 Ch D 1; subsequently commented on by Bingham LJ in Ventouris v. Mountain [1991] 1 WLR 607.)

35.3.3 For the purpose of giving or obtaining legal advice or assistance

In Three Rivers No. 6, the House of Lords unanimously[80] adopted a statement by Taylor LJ in Balabel v. Air India[81] that:

> [L]egal advice is not confined to telling the client the law; it must include advice as to what should prudently and sensibly be done in the relevant legal context.

In most cases the relevant 'legal context' will be obvious. Where there is room for doubt, Lord Scott suggested[82] that the court should consider whether:

- the advice sought from the lawyer relates to the rights, liabilities, obligations or remedies of the client either under private or public law; and
- the communication falls within the policy underlying the justification for legal advice privilege. In short, 'is the occasion on which the communication takes place and is the purpose for which it takes place such as to make it reasonable to expect the privilege to apply?'

Notwithstanding the first limb of Lord Scott's test, it appears that the 'legal context' is not actually confined to advice concerning the client's legal rights and liabilities. The relevant communications in Three Rivers No. 6 involved presentational advice as to how the client (the Bank of England) could best put material before an inquiry, established by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Governor of the Bank, which was scrutinising the discharge of the Bank's public duties. The House of Lords held that legal advice privilege plainly applied. Lord Rodger emphasised[83] that privilege would similarly have applied 'to presentational advice sought from lawyers by any individual or company who believed himself, herself or itself to be at risk of criticism by an inquiry', emphasising that the 'defence of personal reputation and integrity is at least as important to many individuals and companies as the pursuit or defence of legal rights whether under private law or public law'.

In substance, the test is whether the lawyer is reasonably being consulted because of his or her legal skills. This is reflected in the emphasis placed by the House of Lords on whether the lawyer is being consulted 'qua lawyer',[84] or is being asked to 'put on legal spectacles'[85] and whether the lawyer is being required to exercise 'special professional knowledge and skills'.[86] The concept of a 'legal context' is therefore very broad.

80 Three Rivers No. 6, paras. 38, 59, 62, 111, 122.

84 Ibid., at para. 58 (per Lord Rodger).
85 Ibid., at para. 60 (per Lord Rodger).
86 Ibid., at para. 62 (per Baroness Hale).

Once a 'legal context' is established, the question is whether the relevant communication falls within it. The clearest definition of the ambit of legal advice in Three Rivers No. 6 was that provided by Lord Carswell (with whom all the Law Lords expressly agreed[87]), in the following passage:

> [A]ll communications between a solicitor and his client relating to a transaction in which the solicitor has been instructed for the purpose of obtaining legal advice will be privileged, notwithstanding that they do not contain advice on matters of law or construction, provided that they are directly related to the performance by the solicitor of his professional duty as legal adviser of his client.[88]

This passage can be regarded as an authoritative statement of the modern law. If the larger purpose of the instruction is the obtaining of legal advice, the question in respect of any given communication is simply whether it relates directly to the lawyer's performance of his duty as the client's legal adviser. The House of Lords expressly rejected any requirement that the communication must itself contain 'legal advice', in any strict sense of that phrase. Three Rivers No. 6 therefore both preserves and consolidates a line of authority that supports the attachment of privilege to documents that, while they do not contain legal advice, nevertheless form part of the 'continuum of communications' made for that broad purpose.

The law as stated above was given effect in the regulatory investigations context in the case of Property Alliance Group v. RBS.[89] In that case RBS claimed privilege over documents prepared by its solicitors for the RBS Executive Steering Group (ESG), which had been established by RBS to oversee its response to various regulatory and criminal investigations into manipulation of LIBOR and other rates in the United Kingdom, United States and elsewhere. The claimant, Property Alliance Group (PAG), challenged RBS's claim to privilege over these documents, contending that the role of RBS's solicitors was not confined to the provision of legal advice but extended to the performance of administrative functions (for example, acting as the secretariat for the ESG and attending its meetings) for which privilege could not be claimed. Having inspected the disputed documents, Snowden J was 'entirely satisfied' that RBS's solicitors had been engaged in a relevant legal context. He remarked that:

> RBS was facing Regulatory Investigations in a number of jurisdictions that could have had (and did have) the consequence that RBS was subjected to very large regulatory penalties and consequent private actions for very significant sums of money. Dealing with, and co-ordinating the communications and responses to such regulators was a serious and complex matter upon which RBS > naturally wished to have the advice and assistance of specialist lawyers. Clifford Chance were engaged to provide such advice and assistance, and (to use Lord Scott's words), that advice and assistance undoubtedly related to the rights, liabilities and obligations of RBS, and the remedies that might be granted against it either under private law or under public law.

> *I am also entirely satisfied that, in the words of Taylor LJ in [Balabel] the two types of ESG High Level Documents* [i.e. tabular memoranda informing and updating the ESG on the progress, status and issues arising in the regulatory investigations, and confidential notes or summaries drafted by Clifford Chance concerning the discussions between the ESG and its legal advisers at the ESG meetings] form part of 'a continuum of communication and meetings' between Clifford Chance and RBS, the object of which was the giving of legal advice as and when appropriate.[90]

Snowden J also rejected an argument made by PAG that the ESG documents should be only partly redacted, so that summaries of factual information would not be withheld from inspection, finding that such an approach would be inconsistent with the dicta of Taylor LJ in Balabel.[91] While, depending on the facts, a court might not uphold a claim to privilege in respect of the minutes of a business meeting simply because the minutes were taken by a lawyer who was present and subsequently sent them to the client, that would be because the court would have taken the view that the lawyer was not being asked qua lawyer to provide legal advice.

As to the public policy implications of his judgment, Snowden J noted (at paragraph 45) that there is a clear public interest in regulatory investigations being conducted efficiently and in accordance with law and that the public interest will be advanced if regulators can deal with experienced lawyers who can accurately advise their clients how to respond and co-operate. Such lawyers must be able to give the client candid factual briefings as well as legal advice, secure in the knowledge that any such communications and any record of their discussions and the decisions taken will not subsequently be disclosed without the client's consent.

35.3.4 Communications with multiple addressees

A difficult question that frequently arises in practice, particularly where in-house lawyers are involved, is how to determine the privileged status of communications (typically emails) to which a number of people are party, only one of whom is a lawyer. This issue was addressed in the recent case of R (on the application of Jet2.com) v Civil Aviation Authority.[92] In this judicial review claim Jet2.com is challenging the decision of the Civil Aviation Authority (CAA) to publish a press release about Jet2.com's refusal to participate in a new alternative dispute resolution scheme proposed for the aviation industry and the CAA's decision to publish correspondence between it and Jet2.com about that press release. In Jet2.com's application for disclosure of, inter alia, internal documents at the CAA relating to the drafting of the letter it had written to Jet2.com in response to its complaint, issues arose as to the application of legal advice privilege as a result of the involvement of in-house lawyers in the discussion and drafting of the letter.

The Administrative Court made two findings in relation to privilege issues. First, it held that legal advice privilege is subject to a dominant purpose test (i.e., the communication will only be privileged if it was bought into existence with the dominant purpose of it or its contents being used to obtain legal advice). This is very controversial, and in the authors' view incorrect in law.[93]

The second finding was in relation to the assessment of the privileged status of multi-addressee communications (a communication sent to multiple recipients including a lawyer). The Court said that the correct approach was a two-stage one. First, it is necessary to determine whether the dominant purpose of the email (or an attachment to that email) is to seek or give legal advice; if it is, then the communication will be privileged. If the dominant purpose test is not, however, met, it is then necessary to turn to the second stage and assess whether the email (or its attachment) discloses, or is likely to disclose, or may disclose, the nature and content of the legal advice sought from or given by the lawyer. If it does, then the email (or attachment, as the case may be) is privileged. If not, the communication is not privileged. The clear implication of the judgment is that emails and their attachments are to be treated as separate communications for the purposes of assessing their privilege status.

This decision is potentially problematic. While there is no clear authority as to how multi-addressee communications are to be approached for the purposes of assessing privilege, the Court's approach would appear to be contrary to the established principles as to the scope and application of legal advice privilege set out in Three Rivers (No. 6). As noted above, the touchstone for legal advice privilege is whether the communication was made confidentially for the purposes of legal advice. Where information is passed by the solicitor or client to the other as part of the continuum aimed at keeping the other informed so that advice may be sought and given as required, privilege will attach. However, the effect of this judgment is that there will potentially be communications between legal advisers and the client, also sent or copied simultaneously to other individuals which, although part of the continuum of communication between lawyer and client, and despite having a relevant legal context, will not be privileged. In other words, the copying in of another individual or individuals into the email between lawyer and client may have the effect that privilege is lost. Moreover, the approach that an email and its attachment are to be treated as two communications or documents rather than one is also controversial.[94] The Jet2.com decision is the subject 93 For example, the Court of Appeal in ENRC noted (albeit obiter) that there was no such test in English law. See [2019] 1 WLR 791, para. 132.

94 A similar issue arose in The Financial Reporting Council v. Sports Direct International plc [2019] 2 All ER 974, in which the High Court rejected Sports Direct International's argument that legal of an appeal, which is due to be heard in December 2019. It therefore remains to be seen whether these approaches to determining whether legal advice privilege applies will be upheld.

35.4 Litigation privilege

The leading modern statement of the scope of litigation privilege is contained in the speech of Lord Edmund-Davies in Waugh v. British Railways Board:

> After considerable deliberation, I have finally come down in favour of the test propounded by Barwick C.J. in Grant v. Downs*, 135 C.L.R. 674, in the following words, at p 677:*
> > 'Having considered the decisions, the writings and the various aspects of the public interest which claim attention, I have come to the conclusion that the court should state the relevant principle as follows: a document which was produced or brought into existence either with the dominant purpose of its author, or of the person or authority under whose direction, whether particular or general, it was produced or brought into existence, of using it or its contents in order to obtain legal advice or to conduct or aid in the conduct of litigation, at the time of its production in reasonable prospect, should be privileged and excluded from inspection.'
> Dominant purpose, then, in my judgment, should now be declared by this House to be the touchstone.[95]

Litigation privilege can therefore be described as the privilege of a client to withhold from disclosure:

- oral or written communications between the client or the lawyer (on the one hand) and third parties (on the other) or other documents created by or on behalf of the client or the lawyer;
- that come into existence once litigation is in contemplation or has commenced; and
- that come into existence for the dominant purpose of obtaining information or advice in connection with, or of conducting or aiding in the conduct of, such litigation.

35.4.1 Communications or other documents

Litigation privilege will apply to communications between the client or the lawyer and third parties for the relevant purpose. In the case of client–third party communications there is no requirement that the lawyer either requests the client to advice privilege can be claimed in respect of a document that is not privileged in itself, because it is attached to an email sent by a client to a lawyer seeking advice or by a lawyer to a client giving advice. As noted below, that decision is also under appeal.

95 [1980] AC 521, 543, 544 (emphasis added).

contact the third party[96] or that the communications are actually referred on to the lawyer.[97] In fact, no lawyer need have been engaged at the time of the communication.[98] In light of the narrow definition of 'client' in Three Rivers No. 5, as restrictively applied in subsequent decisions, many 'internal' communications within a corporation risk being characterised as communications between the client and 'third parties'. For example, where, as in Three Rivers No. 5 itself, the corporation sets up a specific committee to deal with the relevant litigation, communications between a member of that committee and a non-committee employee of the corporation are likely to be characterised as communications between client and third party subject to whether the employee is authorised to give instructions or receive advice on behalf of the corporation.

See Section 35.3.2.2

The privilege will also cover material, aside from communications, brought into existence in furtherance of the litigation purpose. The cases have traditionally spoken in terms of granting protection to the 'materials for the brief'.[99] A modern restatement of this principle is that, in an adversarial system 'each party should be free to prepare his case as fully as possible without the risk that his opponent will be able to recover the material generated by his preparations.'[100] As regards documents actually brought into existence by a client's lawyer, the better view is that these are in fact protected by legal advice privilege.[101] The 'materials for the brief' concept would apply to preparatory documents generated by the client that do not embody communications with third parties (such as a client's working notes or internal oral or documentary communications). Provided the document satisfies the other requirement of litigation privilege (as to which see below), it will also apply to a document generated for the purpose of being shown to a prospective adversary in circumstances where the document has not, or not yet, been shared with that adversary.[102]

35.4.2 Litigation commenced or in contemplation

In view of the underlying rationale of litigation privilege, the 'litigation' in question must be adversarial in nature.[103] Furthermore, the litigation must be 'reasonably in prospect'.[104] This matter was considered by the Court of Appeal in USA v. Philip Morris Inc.[105] In summary, it is not sufficient if there is simply a general apprehension of future litigation.[106] The requirement that litigation be 'reasonably in prospect' is not satisfied unless parties seeking to claim privilege can show that they were aware of circumstances that rendered litigation between themselves and a particular person or class of persons a real likelihood rather than a mere possibility; identifying potential causes of action and defendants to possible claims falls short of the necessary threshold.[107] By the same token, however, litigation need not be likely, in the sense of there being more than a 50 per cent chance of it occurring.[108]

The English courts apply a common-sense approach. Hence, litigation may be considered reasonably in prospect even if the cause of action has not yet arisen[109] or the party has not yet decided whether to take legal advice.[110] If litigation was reasonably in prospect when the communication or document was made, it does not matter if that litigation never commences.[111] Moreover, the litigation in which the privilege is later relied on need not concern the same subject matter or the same parties as the litigation in respect of which the privilege originally arose.[112]

The issue of when litigation may be said to be reasonably in contemplation was the subject of extensive consideration in ENRC. In that case, the defendant, ENRC, claimed litigation privilege in respect of documents created during the course of an investigation conducted by its lawyers that was initially prompted by a whistleblower report. The documents were created against the background of an anticipated criminal investigation by the Serious Fraud Office (SFO) and during a period of engagement between the SFO and ENRC (which the SFO contended was part of a self-reporting process).

103 See In re L (a Minor) (Police Investigation: Privilege) [1997] AC 16 (HL) (litigation privilege was held to be inapplicable to the particular wardship proceedings in question, which were inquisitorial rather than adversarial in nature). The Upper Tribunal noted in LM v. London Borough of Lewisham [2009] UKUT 204 that Re L did not decide that there is never any litigation privilege in care proceedings but that their Lordships had confined themselves to cases where the filing of a report requires the leave of the court in order that documents already filed in the proceedings may be disclosed to the expert or that the child nay be examined.

The judge at first instance, Andrews J, accepted that ENRC contemplated that it would be subject to a raid by the SFO, and that it reasonably contemplated a criminal investigation by the SFO, but found that this did not amount to anticipation of adversarial litigation.

She also rejected the submission that once ENRC contemplated a criminal investigation by the SFO, criminal prosecution was also in reasonable contemplation. In particular, she in effect drew a distinction between criminal and civil proceedings, finding that, for the purpose of a claim to litigation privilege where criminal proceedings are said to have been contemplated, the relevant party must have uncovered some evidence of wrongdoing before proceedings could be said to be in reasonable contemplation – otherwise there would be insufficient grounds for believing that a prosecution was likely.[113] She held that unless the relevant party had uncovered evidence of wrongdoing it could not consider the evidential test for the bringing of a criminal prosecution was likely to be met.[114] The implication of that approach seemed to be that for a party to establish that litigation was a real likelihood, it was required to adduce evidence that was itself likely to betray the privilege being asserted and would tend to be self-incriminating (because it would need to identify matters discovered during the investigation leading it to believe that prosecution was likely and not merely possible). This approach (which had been the subject of much criticism following the first-instance decision in ENRC) was firmly rejected by the Court of Appeal, which found that the contemporaneous documents demonstrated that ENRC was aware of circumstances that rendered litigation between itself and the SFO a real likelihood rather than a mere possibility (so satisfying the test in Philip Morris), although uncertainty remained as to what the internal investigation would uncover. In particular, ENRC was in receipt of a whistleblower report making serious allegations of corruption and financial wrongdoing that it had appointed lawyers to investigate, and internal emails showed that senior figures within ENRC were anticipating an SFO raid and investigation. There had also been correspondence from the SFO where the subtext, so the Court found, was the possibility, if not the likelihood, of prosecution if the self-reporting did not result in a civil settlement. The Court indicated that, while not every manifestation of concern by the SFO is likely to be regarded as adversarial:

> [W]hen the SFO specifically makes clear to the company the prospect of its criminal prosecution (over and above the general principles set out in the [Self-Reporting] Guidelines), and legal advisers are engaged to deal with that situation, as in the present case, there is a clear ground for contending that criminal prosecution is in reasonable contemplation.[115]

115 The Director of the Serious Fraud Office v. Eurasian Natural Resources Corporation Limited [2019] 1 WLR 791, para. 96.

Further, while it cannot be assumed that, once an SFO criminal investigation is reasonably in contemplation, so too is a criminal prosecution, on the facts of ENRC the evidence pointed clearly towards the contemplation by ENRC of a prosecution if the self-reporting process did not avert it. The Court of Appeal rejected the idea that because further investigations were required before a party could say with certainty that proceedings were likely that this would prevent proceedings from being in reasonable contemplation, and it rejected the judge's distinction between civil and criminal proceedings. Corporate parties who face the threat of SFO investigation and prosecution may take some comfort from the Court of Appeal's guidance that: 'It would be wrong for it to be thought that, in a criminal context, a potential defendant is likely to be denied the benefit of litigation privilege when he asks his solicitor to investigate the circumstances of any alleged offence.'[116]

The Court of Appeal in ENRC also distanced itself from the decision of the Court of Appeal Criminal Division in R (for and on behalf of the Health and Safety Executive) v Paul Jukes.[117] In that case, the defendant had signed a statement shortly after a fatal industrial accident accepting that he was responsible for the company's health and safety. The Court in that case upheld the judge's decision that the statement was not covered by litigation privilege because criminal proceedings were not in contemplation and any privilege would anyway have attached to the company, which had not asserted it. The Court in Jukes had approved of Andrews J's distinction (at first instance in ENRC) between criminal and civil proceedings when considering whether proceedings were reasonably in contemplation. However, the Court of Appeal in ENRC held that Jukes was a decision on the facts and that the approval of Andrews J's approach was obiter. The effect of the decision of the Court of Appeal in ENRC is such that Jukes is likely to be marginalised and its apparent endorsement of Andrews J's approach to anticipation of litigation in a criminal context disregarded.

While the Court of Appeal's decision in ENRC has brought useful clarity as to the circumstances in which the first limb of the litigation privilege test may be satisfied, particularly in a corporate criminal context, there still remains some uncertainty as to exactly when regulatory proceedings may be regarded as sufficiently adversarial to meet the first limb. (The adversarial nature of the contemplated proceedings in ENRC was not in doubt, and the question of what type of regulatory action may engage litigation privilege was not directly addressed in ENRC). Some guidance can be found in Tesco v. OFT,[118] where the Competition Appeal Tribunal (CAT) was required to consider whether certain enforcement proceedings brought by the Office of Fair Trading were 'litigation' for the purpose of claiming litigation privilege. The decision concerned the OFT's investigation into dairy retail price-sharing between various supermarkets and dairy processors. In September 2007, the OFT issued a statement of objections against a number of undertakings, including Tesco, alleging violation of the prohibition on anti-competitive agreements and practices. The OFT issued a supplemental statement of objections, in support of its case, in July 2009 and made its infringement decision in July 2011. On Tesco's appeal to the CAT, the OFT sought disclosure from Tesco of records of interviews with employees of other companies allegedly involved in Tesco's infringing conduct in the first half of 2011. Tesco resisted the application on the ground (among others) that the records were covered by litigation privilege.

The CAT refused the OFT's application for disclosure on the primary ground that such disclosure was not necessary, relevant and proportionate. However, it also considered the application of litigation privilege, finding that at the stage when Tesco contacted the potential witnesses the ongoing proceedings could properly be characterised as 'adversarial'. It was relevant that the statement, and supplementary statement, of objections had been issued and Tesco was contesting the allegations, that the OFT was determining Tesco's liability for a potential breach of the Competition Act and Tesco faced the possibility of a significant fine as a result, and that the proceedings were regarded as criminal for the purposes of Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights. The Chairman of the Tribunal also had regard[119] to the underlying rationale of fairness that underpins litigation privilege, finding that a fair procedure included the right of Tesco to present its case and to gather evidence, and that, as a corollary, litigation privilege applied to the relevant contacts with third-party witnesses.

The decision of the CAT confirmed that entitlement to claim litigation privilege in the context of regulatory enforcement proceedings will depend on the specific circumstances of the regulatory procedure and the stage it has reached. Passmore suggests that as a general rule one might have thought that a contested process in which the tribunal controlling the proceedings may make some sort of ruling that has mandatory consequences for a participant that are either penal (such as a prison sentence, a fine or other form of sanction such as a suspension from practice), or otherwise require the participant to do something he or she does not wish to do (such as pay damages, obey an injunction or give an undertaking not to do something), are ones in which the privilege should be available.[120] This must be right and is consistent with the decision of the Court of Appeal in ENRC: less significant than the precise stage an investigation by a regulator has reached is whether the client was aware of circumstances meaning that it reasonably contemplated adversarial proceedings ensuing.

The dominant purpose for the communication or the production of the relevant document must have been either to obtain information or advice in connection with the litigation or to conduct or assist in the conduct of it. However, in keeping

119 Ibid., at para. 46.

120 Passmore, para. 3-095.

See Section 35.4

both with the general language adopted by Lord Edmund-Davies in Waugh's case and the overriding rationale underlying litigation privilege, it must be understood as applying to documents and communications produced in many aspects of the litigation process.[121]

The test of 'dominance' is necessarily framed at a certain level of generality. Moreover, it is accepted that in applying it, the court will have to accept that 'human motivation is rarely linear'.[122] A dominant purpose has been described as the ruling, prevailing or most influential purpose – in other words, a purpose that is of greater importance than any other.[123] As a consequence, a practical approach to ascertaining the pre-eminent purpose must necessarily be adopted. In particular, it is not necessary that it be the sole purpose. By the same token, however, it will not suffice if the relevant litigation purpose is merely a secondary, or merely co-equal, purpose.[124] The courts will examine 'purpose' from an objective standpoint,[125] looking at all the relevant evidence, including evidence of the relevant person's subjective purpose.[126] There is sometimes scope for debate as to whether a number of related 'purposes' are properly to be regarded as one overall purpose or as distinct when applying the dominant purpose test. In Bilta v. RBS,[127] the various purposes of (1) providing information to Her Majesty's Revenue & Customs (HMRC) in accordance with RBS's duties as a taxpayer, (2) complying with RBS's Codes of Practice and (3) seeking to persuade HMRC to change its mind over a threatened tax assessment, were all held to be effectively subsumed within the dominant purpose of defeating the expected tax assessment. They were said to be part of the inseparable purpose of avoiding litigation if possible, such that the dominant purpose test was satisfied.[128] Similarly, in ENRC, there was an issue as to whether it was reasonable to regard ENRC's dominant purpose as being to investigate the facts to see what had happened and to deal with compliance and governance issues, or to defend the proceedings that were held to have been in reasonable contemplation at the time. The Court of Appeal held that:

> [W]here there is a clear threat of a criminal investigation, even at one remove from the specific risks posed by the SFO should it start an investigation, the reason for the investigation of whistle-blower allegations must be brought into the zone where the dominant purpose may be to prevent or deal with litigation.[129]

Further, the evidence showed that litigation was indeed the dominant purpose of the investigation. The Court's reasoning suggests that, where a party commences a factual investigation related to litigation that is reasonably in contemplation, a court will be inclined to accept that the contemplated litigation is the dominant purpose of that investigation rather than, for example, a purpose of simply establishing the material facts or dealing with compliance issues. It will be different, however, if the party in question is required by a specific policy to conduct an investigation, independent of any risk of litigation: in such a situation, the satisfaction of that policy requirement will be a distinct purpose that prevents the possible litigation from being the dominant purpose.[130]

The Court of Appeal in ENRC also considered an argument that the documents in question were not subject to litigation privilege because they were created in a period of co-operative dialogue between the SFO and ENRC and, so the SFO said, with the specific purpose of being shown to the SFO. The Court rejected this argument: the evidence did not support a finding that the documents were created with the specific purpose of being shown to the SFO, despite ENRC having stated to the SFO on a number of occasions that it intended to make 'full and frank disclosure' and to produce its investigation report.

The 'dominant purpose' issue was also considered by the Court of Appeal in Rawlinson & Hunter Trustees SA v. Akers.[131] In that case the claimants sought disclosure from the defendants, joint liquidators of certain companies in which the Tchenguiz family had an interest, of five reports prepared by Grant Thornton LLP that, the claimants said, had played a key role in the preparation of, and informed the content of, material placed before a judge in support of the application by the SFO for search warrants of the homes and business premises of Robert and Vincent Tchenguiz. The joint liquidators resisted disclosure on the ground of litigation privilege. Tomlinson LJ explained that the identification of dominant purpose presented the biggest challenge, since 'plainly the first duty of the liquidators was to obtain information simply to establish what if any assets or liabilities existed and what if any steps were open to the liquidators to collect in the assets or to reduce or discharge the liabilities'.[132] The claim to privilege failed in circumstances where the evidence put forward by the joint liquidators in support of that claim failed to grapple with the need to establish which of dual or even multiple purposes was dominant. The dominant purpose must relate to the conduct of actual or contemplated litigation. This includes advice relating to avoidance of that litigation or its settlement once in train.[133]

The law on litigation privilege and dominant purpose seems to have taken a backwards step with the Court of Appeal's decision in WH Holding v. E20.[134] The claimants, West Ham, had sued E20 over the number of seats in the London Olympic stadium that West Ham was entitled to use. The decision concerned an application by West Ham for inspection of six emails over which E20 claimed privilege, passing between E20 board members, and between E20 board members and stakeholders. The emails were produced with the dominant purpose of discussing a commercial proposal for the settlement of the related dispute between E20 and West Ham in relation to rights arising under the concession agreement between the parties, which provided for West Ham to use the stadium for its home football matches. The Court of Appeal rejected E20's claim to privilege and held that litigation privilege does not extend to communications concerned with settlement that neither seek advice or information for the purposes of conducting litigation, nor reveal the nature of such advice or information. This is an undoubtedly narrower approach to assessing dominant purpose than was applied in ENRC, and adopts a much more restricted concept of the 'conduct' of litigation. The decision is also curious because it generates an inconsistency with the approach of without prejudice privilege. As the first instance judge noted, it gives rise to the anomalous position that a without prejudice offer made by one party to the other in litigation would not be before the court in a subsequent case, but any document recording the terms of the offer or its discussion, or the authorisation of the terms and putting of the offer, would be open to inspection. What is clear from this decision is that corporates will need to take great care when documenting internal settlement discussions or discussions to avoid litigation, if they wish to avert the risk of any subsequent application for disclosure, and where possible tie those discussions into legal advice so as to obtain the protection of legal advice privilege.

Common interest privilege 35.5

Common interest privilege (like joint interest privilege, which is not discussed here) can be said to be derivative insofar as it relies on establishing the existence of a primary ground of privilege (whether legal advice or litigation privilege) and then determining the circumstances in which multiple persons become entitled to assert it.

Common interest privilege arises in circumstances where party A voluntarily discloses a document that is privileged in its hands to party B, who has a common interest in the subject matter of the communication, or in the litigation in connection with which the document was produced.[135] Where this occurs, provided disclosure is given in recognition that the parties share a common interest,[136] the document will also be privileged in the hands of party B. Judicial formulation of this principle is found in the following terms:

> [W]here a communication is produced by or at the instance of one party for the purposes of obtaining legal advice or to assist in the conduct of litigation, then a second party that has a common interest in the subject matter of the communication or the litigation can assert a right of privilege over that communication as against a third party.[137]

The function of common interest privilege is not simply to prevent party A's privilege from being waived.[138] Where a common interest is made out, it enables party B actually to assert privilege as against a third party. Notwithstanding some terminological confusion, it seems that (unlike joint interest) common interest privilege, properly so-called, does not give party B the right to obtain disclosure of otherwise privileged documents from party A.[139] The rationale of common interest privilege can be explained as follows:

> It is the communication in confidence to another interested party [in circumstances giving rise to a common interest] that requires the privilege to be available in respect of the document in his hands, whether or not he had the right to require that the document be disclosed to him.[140]

135 See generally Thanki, paras. 6.18 to 6.24.

136 See Newcrest Mining (WA) Ltd v. Commonwealth of Australia (1993) 113 ALR 370, 372, Australian Federal Court.

138 The fact that, independently of common interest, the disclosure of privileged material to third parties need not involve a broader loss of confidentiality or waiver of privilege is discussed in Section 35.8.

139 For support for this view see Thanki, para. 6.21 and Passmore para. 6.035. The point appears to have been misunderstood in The TAG Group Litigation, where it was held that 'common interest privilege' could operate as a 'sword' to obtain disclosure against party A as well as a 'shield' to deny disclosure to third parties. It seems that that case is therefore best understood as a case of joint interest privilege.

140 Ibid., at 645 (emphasis added).

In other words, common interest privilege is concerned with voluntarily shared privileged information. The aspect of voluntarism is important in understanding the limitations of common interest privilege.[141]

It ought to follow that common interest privilege can be waived by the primary privilege holder.[142] This is the logical conclusion if common interest privilege involves the voluntary disclosure of information. It would be an undue fetter on the primary privilege holder to say that he or she cannot waive privilege without the consent of all those parties with whom he or she has chosen to share his or her advice.

Furthermore, insofar as the proper focus of the doctrine is therefore on the voluntary disclosure of privileged material by party A, it seems that the moment when a common interest must be established is when disclosure occurs.[143]

Although the doctrine is well established, its precise scope continues to be clarified and its requirements must therefore be understood by reference to developments in the recent case law. The doctrine of common (as distinct from joint) interest privilege was first recognised by the Court of Appeal in Buttes Gas and Oil Co v. Hammer (No. 3).[144] A number of statements in that case indicated potential limitations to the doctrine, which, subsequent applications of it have clarified, do not in fact restrict its application.

First, in Buttes Lord Denning MR described common interest privilege as being 'a privilege in aid of anticipated litigation'.[145] While this confirms that one core application of the doctrine will be to circumstances in which a common interest arises out of parties' shared concerns regarding prospective litigation (discussed

142 See, for example, N Andrews, English Civil Procedure (2003), para. 27.63. Cf. C Tapper, Cross and Tapper on Evidence (12th edn., 2010), 445, where it is stated, without citing any authority, that common interest privilege cannot be waived by one of the parties, without the authority of the other.

143 This point has not received detailed consideration. In The TAG Group Litigation, it seems that Aikens J wrongly considered that the relevant time was when the privileged material was first created. However, insofar as he was considering the use of 'common interest' as a 'sword', it appears that his remarks should properly be understood as applying to cases of joint interest. Equally, in Robert Hitchins Limited v. International Computers Limited (10 December 1996, CA), Peter Gibson LJ appeared to consider that common interest could not be made out where such an interest did not exist at the time the material first came into being. However, as discussed below, it seems that this did not affect the result in the case, which is probably best seen as a case of common interest privilege.

144 [1981] QB 223, CA. The Court of Appeal's decision was reversed on appeal. However, the House of Lords' ruling (see [1982] AC 888) left unaffected the issue of common interest privilege and the Court of Appeal's decision continues to be seen as the seminal authority for that doctrine.

145 Donaldson LJ (at pp. 251, 252) and Brightman LJ (at p. 267) each spoke of 'contemplated or pending litigation'.

further below), it is now clear that the doctrine is not limited to this context. Hence in Svenska Handelsbanken v. Sun Alliance and London Insurance plc,[146] Rix J stated that:

> It seems to me that if legal advice obtained by one person is passed on to another person for the sake of informing that other person in confidence of legal advice which that person needs to know by reason of a sufficient common interest between them, then it would be contrary to the principle upon which all legal professional privilege is granted to say that the legal advice which was privileged in the hands of the first party should be lost when passed over in confidence to the second party, merely because it was not done in the context of pending or contemplated litigation.

Support for the fact that common interest privilege can apply outside the context of anticipated litigation can also be found within Commonwealth authority.[147]

The second relevant aspect of Buttes concerns whether the parties to the common interest need to have retained the same lawyer (though not under a common retainer). Brightman LJ expressed the doctrine (at p. 267) in terms of the existence of 'a common interest and a common solicitor'. However, it does not appear that either of the other Lords Justice viewed the existence of a common lawyer as a requirement.[148] In some subsequent cases, deference has been paid to Brightman LJ's comments to the extent of suggesting that, while a common lawyer is not required, the commonality of interest requires that the parties could have used the same lawyer.[149] This has also been put in terms of the retention of separate lawyers being a prima facie indication that the parties did not have the necessary common interest.[150]

147 See in particular Unilateral Investments v. VNZ Acquisitions Ltd [1993] 1 NZLR 468, 476, 478 (New Zealand High Court).

148 Donaldson LJ in fact pointed out (at pp. 251-252) that, in that particular case, the parties did not initially share a lawyer. Lord Denning also appears to have contemplated that the parties may have separate legal representation. This is implicit to his comments (at p. 243) that the parties may 'have consulted lawyers on the self-same points' and that each 'can collect information for the use of his or the other's legal adviser'.

149 See Bank of Nova Scotia v. Hellenic Mutual War Risks Association (Bermuda) Ltd (Note) [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep 540, 542 (per Saville J); USP Strategies plc v. London General Holdings Limited [2004] EWHC 373 (Ch), para. 14, The Times, 30 April 2004 (per Mann J).

150 Hellenic Mutual War Risks Association (Bermuda) Ltd v. Harrison [1997] 1 Lloyd's Rep 160, 172 (per Rix J).

However, even this limited expression of the need for a putative common lawyer has been criticised in the Australian authorities, in favour of a broader appraisal of common interest.[151] This also now appears to be the approach under English law.[152]

35.6 Without prejudice privilege

The 'without prejudice' rule applies to exclude all negotiations genuinely aimed at settlement from being given in evidence. As with legal professional privilege, no adverse inferences can be drawn against a party invoking the privilege.[153] The rule has two justifications:

- the public policy of encouraging parties to negotiate and settle their disputes out of court; and
- an implied agreement arising out of what is commonly said to be the consequences of offering or agreeing to negotiate without prejudice.[154]

The first justification is the prevailing justification and the second is now doubted and regarded as being at best of limited application.[155] In this context, 'settlement' means 'the avoidance of litigation'.[156] Therefore, the rule is not limited to negotiations aimed at resolving the legal issues between the parties but applies to any negotiations aimed at avoiding or reducing the scope of litigation, irrespective of whether they directly address or seek to resolve the relevant legal issues.

The rule requires the existence of a dispute and an attempt to compromise it.[157] The crucial consideration is whether in the course of negotiations the parties contemplated or might reasonably have contemplated litigation if they could not agree.[158] The use of a 'without prejudice' heading on a letter is not decisive as to whether the privilege applies but does give rise to a rebuttable presumption that

152 In *Formica Ltd v. the document was intended to be a negotiating document.[159] If a letter is written in reply to a letter written without prejudice or is part of a continuing sequence of negotiations, it will be privileged and cannot be given in evidence without the consent of both parties.[160]

While there was previously some authority to suggest that the without prejudice rule only applied to prevent disclosure of 'admissions', it now appears to be settled that the rule is not limited in this way but that without prejudice discussions as a whole will be protected.[161]

The without prejudice rule is subject to a number of exceptions – it will not apply in the following circumstances:

- Unambiguous impropriety: one party may be allowed to give evidence of what the other said or wrote in without prejudice discussions if the exclusion of the evidence would act as a cloak for perjury, blackmail or other 'unambiguous impropriety'.
- Proof, interpretation and rectification of an agreed settlement: the rule will not operate to render inadmissible an actual compromise agreement.
- Misrepresentation, fraud or undue influence: evidence of without prejudice negotiations is admissible to show that an agreement apparently concluded between the parties during the negotiations should be set aside on the ground of misrepresentation, fraud or undue influence.
- Estoppel: where an estoppel founded on a statement made in without prejudice negotiations is alleged, the relevant without prejudice material will be admissible to determine the existence of the estoppel.
- Reasonableness of mitigating steps: where there is an issue as to whether a party has acted reasonably to mitigate loss in the conduct and conclusion of negotiations for a settlement the without prejudice material may be examined for that purpose.
- Delay: evidence of negotiations may be given to explain delay or apparent acquiescence.[162]

Since the without prejudice privilege belongs to both parties, it cannot be waived without both parties' consent, at least in the context of civil litigation.[163] This is because it is categorised as a joint privilege.[164] However, there is now some limited authority for the proposition that a party to negotiations with a regulatory authority may unilaterally waive without prejudice privilege in respect of communications with that authority if it subsequently puts the basis of the regulator's decision in issue in civil proceedings.

The law took an unusual and unexpected turn in this direction with the decision of Birss J in Property Alliance Group Ltd v. Royal Bank of Scotland plc.[165] The case concerned alleged LIBOR fixing by RBS employees. The claimant, PAG, had purchased interest rate swaps from RBS in 2004–2008 that had been referenced to GBP LIBOR. PAG claimed that it had entered into the swaps in reliance on certain misrepresentations to the effect that RBS was not rigging LIBOR (PAG also relied on alleged implied terms to that effect). In support of its plea that the representations were false, PAG referred to the contents of the final notice issued by the Financial Services Authority (FSA), the predecessor body to the FCA, against RBS, which had found that RBS had manipulated Swiss Franc LIBOR and Japanese Yen LIBOR, but otherwise made no findings in relation to other currency denominations. The FSA final notice had been issued following a settlement reached between RBS and the FSA.

In its defence, RBS admitted that it had manipulated Swiss Franc LIBOR and Japanese Yen LIBOR but denied any wrongdoing in relation to GBP LIBOR. In support of that denial, RBS pleaded: 'For the avoidance of doubt, there have been no regulatory findings of misconduct on the part of RBS in connection with GBP LIBOR.'

PAG sought disclosure of a wide range of documents over which RBS claimed both without prejudice privilege and also legal professional privilege.[166] RBS claimed that communications passing between it and the FSA between December 2012 and January 2013 were subject to without prejudice privilege on the grounds that they recorded negotiations with a view to the settlement announced in February 2013. The FCA wrote a letter in support of RBS's claim to without prejudice privilege on the grounds of public interest.

The judge rejected RBS's right to withhold disclosure of these documents. He held that by pleading in its defence that the regulators had not found any misconduct relating to GBP LIBOR, RBS 'had itself put in issue the basis on which the regulatory findings were made',[167] and as a result RBS had to give disclosure of 166 RBS relied on the doctrine of limited waiver. The part of the decision dealing with limited waiver is uncontroversial and consistent with previous authority (see Section 35.8.1).

167 Property Alliance Group Ltd v. Royal Bank of Scotland plc. [2015] EWHC 1557 (Ch), para. 94.

the communications.[168] The judge's reasoning, while difficult to discern, appears to have been that communications on which the settlement was based might have been incomplete, mistaken or misleading.[169] As he explained:

> If the communications on which the Final Notice was based were false, then to allow RBS to rely on what is absent from the Final Notice but at the same time to withhold inspection of those communications would compound the falsehood. That will not do.[170]

PAG argued that the sort of regulatory context in which the communications between RBS and the FSA took place was not within the without prejudice rule.[171] Birss J rejected the submission that the without prejudice rule was inapplicable, finding that 'the public policy on which the without prejudice rule is based is capable of applying in order to promote the settlement of FCA investigations',[172] but suggested that there is a particular kind of privilege covering settlement negotiations between firms and the FCA (and presumably therefore other regulators) that is 'analogous with' but 'not identical to' without prejudice privilege.[173] Unlike the normal without prejudice rule (where the consent of both parties is required for any waiver of the privilege), this 'analogous' type of without prejudice rule could, according to Birss J, be waived unilaterally by RBS putting the basis on which a final notice was decided in issue in civil proceedings, without the consent of the FCA. This decision is difficult to understand, in particular why the judge decided he needed to fashion a new type of privilege and why this new type of without prejudice privilege is apparently capable of being waived unilaterally.

In the event, RBS applied to amend its defence so as to remove the paragraph that Birss J had held put in issue the basis of the FSA's findings. Birss J held that by doing so RBS could prevent the waiver that had been identified in his earlier judgment from taking place.[174] He held that it was open to a party to decide not to rely on privileged material and therefore amend the relevant pleading, in which case, if the amended pleading was permitted, no waiver would have taken place merely by virtue of having been pleaded previously. Any substantive need for RBS to appeal on the waiver aspect of the first decision of Birss J therefore fell away (and RBS's appeal in relation to other aspects of the decision was in any event settled). The law has accordingly been left in a state of some uncertainty on this topic.

168 For the same reason – namely that RBS had 'put in issue' the basis on which regulatory findings were made – Birss J held that RBS was not entitled to withhold from inspection the six privileged documents that it had shared with regulators (see para. 114). This aspect of the decision is discussed below at Section 35.8, but must be wrong.

35.7 Exceptions to privilege

35.7.1 The crime-fraud exception

Aside from certain very limited statutory exceptions where privilege may exceptionally be overridden, the principal situation[175] where communications may not be protected by privilege is the crime-fraud exception. In broad terms, this exception provides that there is no privilege in documents or communications that are themselves part of a crime or a fraud, or that seek or give legal advice about how to facilitate the commission of a crime or a fraud. This exception applies to both legal advice privilege and litigation privilege.[176]

It is important to bear in mind the truly exceptional nature of the crime-fraud exception. A court will not lightly deprive a party of the fundamental protection of legal professional privilege,[177] particularly where the privilege is challenged on an interlocutory application.[178] The reason for such caution is plain: once the court determines that the veil of privilege is to be lifted, and that the privileged documents are to be disclosed, there is no return. The holder's right to privilege will have been irretrievably destroyed.

The solicitor need not be involved in the crime or fraud for the exception to apply: the solicitor may be wholly innocent.[179]

Notwithstanding its exceptional nature, it may be that regulators or prosecutors in certain circumstances will wish to challenge a party's claim to privilege on the basis of this exception. To successfully challenge that claim the regulator or prosecutor will need to establish that:

- there was a specific dishonest criminal (i.e., fraudulent) purpose; and
- the privileged material was produced in furtherance of or in preparation for that purpose.[180]

175 The Court of Appeal held in the case of R v. Brown (Edward) [2016] 1 WLR 1141 that in addition to the fraud/iniquity exception, the normally absolute rule of privilege is capable of further qualification at common law. The Court of Appeal held that it was appropriate, in what was likely to be an extremely narrow band of cases and by way of an additional common law qualification or exception to the inviolable nature of legal professional privilege, to impose a requirement that particular individuals could be present at client–lawyer discussions if there was a real possibility that the discussions were to be misused for a purpose and in a way involving impropriety amounting to an abuse of the privilege that justified interference. In this case, it was appropriate for two nurses to be present with and handcuffed to the appellant, who was in detention in a high security psychiatric hospital, when he consulted with his lawyers because there was reason to think he would otherwise take that opportunity to harm himself or others.

Board of Trade* [1971] 1 Ch 680 at 689C per Goff J: 'What has to be shown prima facie is not merely that there is a bona fide and reasonably tenable charge of crime or fraud but a prima facie case that the communications in question were made in preparation for or in furtherance or as part of it.'

As to the evidential burden on the party invoking the exception, there must be some prima facie evidence of the crime or fraud; a mere allegation or charge of crime or fraud is not sufficient.[181] In a case where the crime-fraud relied on is one of the issues in the action, the applicable standard is the 'very strong prima facie case'; whereas in a case where the issue of fraud is freestanding it may be sufficient to establish a 'strong prima facie case'.[182]

There is some debate as to the proper scope of the exception. In the authors' view, being an exceptional principle, the crime-fraud exception applies only in circumstances where the conduct in question amounts to a crime or a fraud (i.e., involving an element of dishonesty).[183] There is, however, some suggestion in some texts and cases that the scope of the exception has been broadened to cases arguably not involving crime or fraud (which has also led to the exception sometimes being termed the 'iniquity exception').[184]

The widening of the exception to encompass conduct falling short of dishonesty is said to emanate from the Court of Appeal's decision in Barclays Bank v. Eustice.[185] However, it is doubtful that Eustice should be taken as authority for extending the scope of the crime-fraud extension. Though using the language of 'iniquity', in the context of civil proceedings, the Court of Appeal nonetheless was clear that the impugned conduct was a type of fraud (in this case, on the creditors), within the meaning of section 423 of the Insolvency Act 1986. Equally, in JSC BTA Bank v. Ablyazov, Popplewell J characterised Mr Ablyazov's conduct in terms of concealment and deceit, namely as dishonest and fraudulent.[186]

Even if, contrary to the above, Eustice is understood as having extended the crime-fraud exception to conduct falling short of dishonesty, the basis for such extension is dubious, being based on an authority – Ventouris v. Mountain[187] – that was not about the crime-fraud exception at all. Indeed in McE v. Prison Service of Northern Ireland,[188] Lord Neuberger left open the question as to whether Eustice had been correctly decided.

184 A recent example is the decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal in X v. Y Limited ([2018] 8 WLUK 94), 9 August 2018 where Slade J held that legal advice given to a company to the effect that a redundancy programme could be used to dismiss an employee who had made complaints amounted to advice given for the purpose of facilitating an iniquity such that the crime/fraud exception was engaged. This decision is currently under appeal.

A further issue that may arise is whether the dishonest purpose needs to be a purpose of the privilege holder, or whether a dishonest purpose of a third party will suffice. The decision of the House of Lords in R v. Central Criminal Court, ex p Francis & Francis,[189] followed in BBGP Managing General Partner Limited v. Babcock and Brown,[190] suggests that it may be sufficient if a criminal or dishonest purpose of a third party, not the privilege holder, can be established to the requisite evidential standard. However, those cases do not address the situation where the party claiming privilege is also the party against whom the criminal conduct is alleged.

While these points currently remain untested, it is suggested that the requirements for establishing the crime-fraud exception are likely to present some difficulty for regulators and prosecutors where the privilege holder is a company but where a dishonest or criminal purpose can only be established against certain individuals. In particular, it does not follow that because the criminal or fraudulent purposes of one or more individuals can be established, the necessary fraudulent purpose of the corporate is established. Whether it can be, will depend on complex issues of attribution and the doctrine of identification in the criminal context.

A case of particular interest in the regulatory context is CITIC Pacific Ltd v. Secretary for Justice and anor,[191] in which the Hong Kong Court of Appeal considered the application of the crime-fraud exception in the context of alleged fraud and breach of listing rules by a company (CITIC) listed on the Hong Kong Stock Exchange. Hong Kong's Securities and Futures Commission (SFC) had commenced investigating why CITIC had delayed a profit warning in October 2008, during the financial crisis. As part of its investigation into alleged 'defalcation, fraud, misfeasance and other misconduct' on the part of CITIC's management, the SFC sought various documents, including privileged documents, which CITIC subsequently provided to it. The police commenced criminal investigations and CITIC learned that the SFC had passed the privileged documents to the United States Department of Justice for use in the criminal proceedings. CITIC issued an application for an order that the privileged documents be returned on the basis that privilege had been waived for the limited purpose only of the SFC investigation. The application was resisted by the Department of Justice, inter alia, on the basis that the documents were created by certain of the persons responsible for the management of CITIC for the purposes of the fraud, such that the crime-fraud exception applied.

The Court of Appeal (reversing the decision of Wright J) found that the crime-fraud exception had not been made out since there needed to be evidence of a fraudulent purpose behind the seeking and obtaining of the advice by the relevant directors of CITIC, which had not been established, for there to be the necessary causal relationship between the advice received and the fraudulent conduct.

190 [2011] Ch 296.
191 [2012] 2 HKLRD 701.

The decision in CITIC is instructive in demonstrating a cautious approach by an appellate court to the encroachment of legal professional privilege where the crime-fraud exception is invoked by a prosecuting authority in the context of, and (presumably) in aid of, anticipated criminal proceedings.

Statutory and other exceptions 35.7.2

Previously, the courts did not require a great deal of persuasion that Parliament had intended to override legal professional privilege.[192] That is no longer the case.[193] For example, statutory powers requiring the production of documents would generally be deemed to exclude the right to demand documents subject to legal professional privilege. Any exception to this rule would have to be explicitly supported by primary legislation.[194] Explicit support would require clear language or necessary implication. A necessary implication in this area is not an exercise in interpretation; it is a matter of express language and logic.[195] A necessary implication arises only where the legislative provision would be rendered inoperative or its object largely frustrated in its practical application if the privilege were to prevail.[196] Any curtailment of privilege could only be to the extent reasonably necessary to meet the ends that justify the curtailment.[197]

It appears that there may be a further exception[198] to legal professional privilege where a professional is under investigation by their regulator seeking production of documents over which the professional's client could claim privilege, or the professional wishes to produce the documents to show the regulator that he or she has behaved properly (i.e. 'underlying client-privileged documents' rather than documents over which the professional could claim his or her own privilege).[199] Those documents may be disclosed to the regulator without the client's consent but must not be used against the underlying client, and steps must be taken to

These cases applied the more general principle that a statute is generally not intended to override fundamental rights: *R v. protect the client's confidential privileged material. The justification for the rule is that either there is no infringement of the client's privilege where the documents may not be used against him or her, or that, if there is an infringement, it is of a technical nature that may be authorised without satisfaction of the usual 'clear language or necessary implication' test.[200] This issue recently arose for consideration in The Financial Reporting Council Limited v Sports Direct International Plc.[201] The Financial Reporting Council (FRC), which, among other things, is the regulator for statutory auditors in the United Kingdom, had used its statutory powers to seek the production of certain documents from Sports Direct for the purpose of its investigation into its statutory auditor. Sports Direct withheld the documents on grounds of legal professional privilege and the FRC challenged this, relying on the principle that it, as regulator, was entitled to obtain those documents from Sports Direct, even if they were documents over which Sports Direct had a valid claim to privilege, as long as it did not use those documents against Sports Direct. The judge considered the relevant authorities and, acknowledging that the issue was 'difficult', ultimately agreed with the FRC and ordered that the documents be produced.[202] He summarised the principle as follows:

> [T]he production of documents to a regulator by a regulated person solely for the purposes of a confidential investigation by the regulator into the conduct of the regulated person is not an infringement of any legal professional privilege of clients of a regulated person in respect of those documents. That being so, in my judgment the same must be true of the production of documents to the regulator by a client.[203]

However, the principle is not without controversy, and Sports Direct were granted permission by the judge to appeal; it is expected that the question will be revisited by the Court of Appeal in the near future.

The most significant statutory exception in the regulatory context is covert surveillance under the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 (RIPA).[204] However, if covert surveillance is likely to result in the acquisition of knowledge of matters subject to legal professional privilege, the appropriate authorisations or approval cannot be made unless there are exceptional and compelling circumstances. Unless that risk can be entirely removed, steps must be taken to ensure that any such information will not be used for the purpose of further investigations or during the course of any subsequent criminal trials.[205]

Loss of privilege and waiver 35.8

Although privilege, once established, will endure indefinitely, it may be lost, principally in two ways. First, the party entitled to assert privilege may waive the right. This can occur expressly, for example, by choosing to place privileged material before the court. For this purpose, the partial disclosure of a privileged document will usually involve a waiver of privilege in respect of the whole document.[206] Waiver will also occur by necessary implication in certain proceedings (implied waiver). For example, where a client sues a lawyer, the client will be taken impliedly to waive privilege in respect of those documents arising under the retainer subject to dispute.[207]

The second principal circumstance in which privilege will be lost is where there is a loss of confidentiality. As discussed in Section 35.2.1, the confidentiality of the communication or document is a condition precedent to its being privileged. However, the significance of this requirement should not be misunderstood. It is well established that a privileged document does not lose its quality of confidence simply because it is disclosed to persons other than the client and the lawyer. Plainly, if a document has been made available to the general public, all confidence (and with it privilege) will have been lost.[208] However, where privileged material is disclosed to a limited number of third parties in circumstances expressly or impliedly preserving the overall confidentiality as against the rest of the world, privilege will be maintained. This point is well illustrated by an example cited with approval by the English courts:

> If A shows a privileged document to his six best friends, he will not be able to assert privilege if one of the friends sues him because the document is not confidential as between him and the friend. But the fact six other people have seen it does not prevent him claiming privilege as against the rest of the world.[209]

207 See Paragon Finance v. Freshfields [1999] 1 WLR 1183. An implied waiver may, however, be limited: see Eurasian Natural Resources Corporation v. Dechert [2016] EWCA Civ 375.

208 See (in the general context of an action for breach of confidence) Attorney-General v. Guardian Newspapers Ltd. (No. 2) [1990] 1 AC 109, 177, where Sir John Donaldson MR said: 'As a general proposition, that which has no character of confidentiality because it has already been communicated to the world, i.e., made generally available to the relevant public, cannot thereafter be subjected to a right of confidentiality: O. Mustad & Son v. Dosen (Note) [1964] 1 WLR 109. However, this will not necessarily be the case if the information has previously only been disclosed to a limited part of that public.'

209 USP Strategies v. London General Holdings [2004] EWHC (Ch) 373, para. 19 (per Mann J); Gotha City v. Sotheby's [1998] 1 WLR 114, CA, para. 119 (per Staughton LJ).

It has therefore been accepted that where a client disseminates a record of privileged material, either within its own corporation or to third parties, confidentiality will not necessarily be lost.[210] It is a separate question whether the party to whom the documents are disclosed acquires a right to assert privilege by virtue of a common interest.

See Section 35.5

As noted above in Section 35.6, in Property Alliance Group Ltd v. Royal Bank of Scotland plc,[211] it was suggested that privilege can be lost by a party putting something in issue. This aspect of the decision must be wrong: legal professional privilege is absolute unless waived or overridden by statute. There is no balancing act to be carried out with some competing public interest. It may be that the reference to putting something in issue was a confusion with the doctrine of collateral waiver. However, collateral waiver requires some form of 'deployment' of the privileged material, not simply that a relevant matter is put in issue.

35.8.1 Limited waiver

Limited waiver is achieved where a party discloses a privileged document, or communicates privileged information, to a limited number of third parties in circumstances expressly or impliedly preserving the overall confidentiality of the document or information as against the rest of the world. It is well established that in such circumstances the disclosing party does not lose privilege in the document.[212]

Limited waiver may frequently arise in a regulatory context. In B v. Auckland District Law Society,[213] in the course of investigating a complaint against a law firm, certain privileged documents had been handed over to counsel appointed by The Law Society. The letter handing over the documents stated that the documents were made available to counsel for the limited purposes of the investigation and 'on the express basis that in doing so privilege is not waived'. The Law Society sought to use the documents in subsequent disciplinary proceedings brought against the law firm, on the basis that the privilege had been 'let out of the bag'. The Privy Council rejected this submission. Lord Millett held:

> It does not follow that privilege is waived generally because a privileged document has been disclosed for a limited purpose only . . . . The question is not whether privilege has been waived, but whether it has been lost. It would be unfortunate if it were. It must often be in the interests of the administration of > justice that a partial or limited waiver of privilege should be made by a party who would not contemplate anything which might cause privilege to be lost, and it would be most undesirable if the law could not accommodate it.[214]

There was further development of the limited waiver doctrine in Berezovsky v. Hine.[215] Mr Berezovsky's lawyers had sent privileged draft witness statements in relation to Mr Berezovsky's action against Mr Abramovich to solicitors acting for his friend, Mr Patarkatsishvili, in an asylum application as it was thought they might be useful. Mr Patarkatsishvili died and his estate wanted to use the statements in subsequent litigation against Mr Berezovsky. Mann J held that as the statements had been disclosed by Mr Berezovsky's solicitors without any express limitation on their use, it was not open to Mr Berezovksy to prevent their use by the estate against him. The Court of Appeal disagreed. Lord Neuberger MR said that the statements were obviously intended to remain confidential and were disclosed for a limited and defined purpose. In explaining the nature of limited waiver and its scope, Lord Neuberger noted:

> [W]here privilege is waived, the question whether the waiver was limited, and, if so, the parameters of the limitation, must be determined by reference to all the circumstances of the alleged waiver, and, in particular, what was expressly or impliedly communicated between the person sending, and the person receiving, the documents in question, and what they must or ought reasonably have understood . . . .[216]

The limited waiver principle was also applied in CITIC Pacific Ltd v. Secretary for Justice.[217] The Hong Kong Court of Appeal held that privilege had been waived in favour of the SFC for the purpose of its investigation only, even though at the time of the surrender of the documents to the SFC, CITIC's solicitors provided no written document setting out specific terms as to limitation of the waiver of privilege. It was only several weeks later, in response to an enquiry from the SFC, that CITIC stated in writing what it considered the terms of limitation to have been.

Another instance of the application of the limited waiver doctrine in the regulatory context is the Property Alliance Group Ltd v. Royal Bank of Scotland plc decision.[218] RBS claimed privilege over six documents that it had shown to various regulators and the United States Department of Justice and the Attorneys General of several US states. PAG argued that by showing those documents to third parties RBS had waived any privilege in them. The judge disagreed on the basis that the privilege had been waived for a limited purpose only (applying B v. Auckland District Law Society and Berezovsky v. Hine). Significantly, the judge held that the existence of 'non-waiver' agreements between RBS and the third parties – which recognised by certain 'carve-outs' that the regulator could use the information in a way which could in future destroy the privilege, for example, by publishing the material – did not undermine the limited nature of the waiver. Confidentiality and privilege would continue to be preserved unless some act such as publication, which would destroy the privilege, occurred.[219]

However, while under English law voluntary disclosure to a regulator may not entail a general waiver of privilege, this may be inconsistent with the position in other common law jurisdictions.[220]

In the case of Dechert v. ENRC,[221] the Court of Appeal held that the respondent, ENRC, was entitled to have proceedings for the detailed assessment of the bills of its former solicitors, Dechert, held in private and that ENRC had not waived privilege by commencing assessment proceedings. The implied waiver of privilege the application for detailed assessment had entailed was limited, temporary and extended only to the opposing party and to the judge. Gloster LJ remarked that 'the concept of limited waiver is of general application, designed to ensure that the loss of LPP [legal professional privilege] (given its fundamental importance) is limited to that which is necessary to protect other interests.'[222]

Arguments may arise as to the scope of any limited waiver and whether any wider waiver can be inferred from the conduct of the party waiving privilege or the circumstances in which privilege was waived. The scope of the principle of inferred waiver was the subject of consideration by the Divisional Court in Belhaj v DPP.[223] Belhaj concerned a judicial review of a decision by the Director of Public Prosecutions (DPP) not to prosecute a particular individual. While considering whether to prosecute, privileged material was passed by the government to the Metropolitan Police Service, the Crown Prosecution Service and the DPP under an express limited waiver of privilege. The claimants argued that the waiver must be taken to have extended not only to the police investigation and the decision whether to charge the relevant individual but also to any judicial review proceedings challenging that decision. The Divisional Court rejected that argument, finding that no such wider waiver could be inferred because there was no inevitable or necessary nexus between the decision of the DPP and the subsequent judicial review of the ultimate decision. The key question was whether these were discrete or composite processes. The Court found that the processes were discrete; waiver could not therefore be inferred. There remains scope for argument, on different facts, as to the extent to which a limited waiver to one person may be inferred to extend to another where that other person requires the relevant document for a purpose that is sufficiently connected to the purpose of the initial limited waiver.[224]

Collateral waiver 35.8.2

In certain circumstances the loss of privilege in a document can lead to waiver of privilege in other material. The rationale for this is one of fairness; the court is concerned to avoid having an incomplete picture of the events in question and to avoid 'cherrypicking' of privileged documents by a party.[225] Lord Bingham CJ commented in Paragon Finance v. Freshfields that: 'While there is no rule that a party who waives privilege in relation to one communication is taken to waive privilege in relation to all, a party may not waive privilege in such a partial and selective manner that unfairness or misunderstanding may result.'[226] For this reason it will be more difficult to establish collateral waiver where the initial disclosure was made inadvertently.

The weight of authority suggests that some reliance must be placed on the primary material before any waiver in collateral material can be triggered. Simple disclosure and inspection of the primary material is probably insufficient. The necessary reliance has been said to be deployment of the primary material in court[227] but the approach of the courts to the question of what this means has not always been consistent.[228] Ultimately the touchstone is fairness, and waiver will be found where a party has crossed the line from, for example, merely referring to legal advice to actually relying on that advice in support of its position.[229] In R v. Papachristos & Kerrison,[230] an issue arose as to whether Innospec, a company that had pleaded guilty to corruption charges, had waived privilege in certain interview notes by providing a subsequent PowerPoint presentation to the SFO and United States Department of Justice during negotiations, thereby waiving privilege in the presentation. Innospec was not a party to the proceedings and had not sought to deploy any document before the court. It was held that there had been no sufficient deployment by Innospec of the notes in the presentation to amount to a collateral waiver of privilege in respect of the notes as opposed to the PowerPoint presentation itself.

Rider Levett Bucknall UK Limited* [2010] EWHC 767 (TCC) in which HHJ Havelock-Allan QC found that collateral waiver could occur by referring to and relying on privileged material in a witness statement served in support of an (as yet unheard) interlocutory application with the approach of Hobhouse J in General Accident Fire and Life Corp v. Tanter [1984] 1 WLR 100, holding that there was no collateral waiver where a privileged note of a conversation was used in cross-examination but before the author of the note was called and before it had been formally admitted in evidence.

The court determined that there had been neither express nor collateral waiver in the interview notes because the waiver that had occurred over the PowerPoint was expressly limited and was in the context of the investigatory stage of the case.

Reliance on part of a document may require disclosure of the whole. While severance may be possible if the document deals with entirely different subject matters, where the document deals with only one subject matter the court may conclude that it is or appears dangerous or misleading to allow a party to deploy part of the document and assert privilege over the remainder.[231]

Once privilege is waived in a particular document, the waiver extends to all documents relating to the same 'transaction', and possibly beyond.[232] The underlying principle applied by the courts is the need to ensure that the evidence adduced by the party claiming privilege is being presented fairly. Hence, in R v. Secretary of State for Transport ex p Factortame Ltd, Auld LJ said that:

> In each case the question for the Court is whether the matters in issue in the document or documents in respect of which partial disclosure has been made are respectively severable so that the partial disclosed material clearly does not bear on matters in issue in respect of which material is withheld. The more confined the issue, for example as to the content of a single document or conversation, the more difficult it is likely to be to withhold, by severance, part of the document or other documents relevant to the document or conversations.[233]

35.8.3 Inadvertent disclosure and restraining use of privileged documents

The Civil Procedure Rules (CPR) at rule 31.20 provide that, where a party inadvertently allows a privileged document to be inspected, the party who has inspected the document may use it or its contents only with the permission of the court. While the solicitor for one side does not owe a duty of care to the other party,[234] where there is an obvious mistake the solicitor should promptly notify the other party and then, where the client wishes to use the document, make an application under rule 31.20 of the CPR to allow such use. Such use is unlikely to be allowed where the relevant party wishes to use the inadvertently disclosed document as the basis for a new claim, as distinct from the situation where a document is disclosed during litigation.[235]

235 Fadairo v. Suit Supply UK Lime Street Ltd [2014] ICR D11 (EAT) (Singh J).

The question of what is meant by an 'obvious mistake' was considered by the Court of Appeal in Rawlinson & Hunter Trustees SA & Ors v. Director of the Serious Fraud Office.[236] Moore-Bick LJ stated that, once it is accepted that the person who inspected a document did not realise that it had been disclosed by mistake, despite being a qualified lawyer, it would be a strong thing for the judge to hold that the mistake was obvious. Further, given the scale of the disclosure in the case and the range of documents involved, general assertions in correspondence that the SFO did not intend to waive privilege were not sufficient to make it obvious that any document arguably privileged must have been disclosed by mistake. On the facts, it was held that it would not have been obvious that the documents at issue in the appeal had been disclosed by mistake.

In Ford v. FSA,[237] the claimant established that he had joint interest privilege in two documents provided to the FSA by another party with the benefit of that privilege, and referred to by the FSA in a supplementary investigation report (SIR), without his consent. It followed that the FSA had not been entitled to rely on the content of the communications in the regulatory proceedings. The claimant subsequently sought relief including:

- the quashing of the warning notice issued by the FSA's Regulatory Decisions Committee that referred to the privileged material;
- the destruction of all copies of the privileged documents held by the FSA, together with their permanent deletion from databases and email accounts within the FSA;
- the destruction of all copies of the SIR and warning notices held by the FSA and their permanent deletion from databases and email accounts within the FSA, at least by redaction of the offending passages; and
- the redaction from all hard copy and electronic documents held by the FSA of quotations from or references to the substance of the privileged documents.

Burnett J refused to quash the warning notice, in circumstances where he found that the privileged material formed a very modest part of the overall picture painted by a detailed exposition of the facts and matters on which the FSA relied; it was 'peripheral but not irrelevant'. Rather than equating the FSA's reliance on the privileged material with the public law concept of taking into account an irrelevant matter, the judge held that it was more accurate to consider the error as equivalent to a judicial or administrative body acting, in part, on inadmissible evidence. The warning notice, shorn of the offending references to privileged material, was said to remain a coherent, seamless and powerful document.

However, despite the FSA's submission that it would be sufficient to redact the privileged material from the SIR, warning notice and any other documents now to be deployed by the FSA, and to refrain from using or disseminating unredacted copies, Burnett J went further and ordered the FSA to use its best endeavours to identify and destroy such copies (both hard copy and electronic) of the privileged material that existed, together with such copies of the SIR and warning notices. In dealing with the claimant's further request for an order that anyone who had read the privileged documents or was aware of their content should be removed from further involvement in the relevant FSA investigation, the judge held that, while the approach identified in the private law context to the question whether a lawyer in possession of privileged material should be restrained from acting is a useful guide, when the question arises in judicial review proceedings there will necessarily be a public law element in the underlying dispute. The public interest may form an important element in any discretionary decision made in judicial review proceedings. In the particular circumstances of the case, he found that the order sought would be disproportionate and contrary to the public interest.

35.9 Maintaining privilege: practical issues

At the beginning of an investigation litigation may well not yet be in prospect (in which case litigation privilege will not apply) and therefore a corporate may wish to ensure that sensitive communications are, where possible, covered by legal advice privilege. It will be much more difficult to do this in light of the recent decisions in The RBS Rights Issue Litigation and ENRC, and a corporate embarking on an internal fact-finding investigation with a view to taking legal advice should therefore be aware of the risk that documents created pursuant to that investigation will be disclosable in any subsequent proceedings.

35.9.1 Conducting interviews

The conduct of interviews with potential witnesses is clearly an area of particular sensitivity. Because of the narrow view of who may constitute the 'client' in Three Rivers No. 5, as applied in The RBS Rights Issue Litigation and ENRC (which, while doubted by the Court of Appeal in ENRC, still remains the law), regulators or prosecutors may attempt to challenge a claim that the notes of evidence prepared by lawyers at such interviews are protected by legal advice privilege. In a speech to compliance professionals in March 2016, Alun Milford, then General Counsel of the SFO, emphasised the importance the SFO places on witness accounts of relevant events and stated, in this context, that:

> 1. We will view as uncooperative false or exaggerated claims of privilege, and we are prepared to litigate over them: to do otherwise would be to fail in our duty to investigate crime.
> 2. If a company's assertion of privilege is well-made out, then we will not hold that against the company: to do otherwise would be inconsistent with the substantive protection privilege offers. We will simply judge the question of cooperation in our normal way against our published criteria.

> 3. By the same token if, notwithstanding the existence of a well-made-out claim to privilege, a company gives up the witness accounts we seek, then we will view that as a significant mark of co-operation: here again, to do otherwise would be inconsistent with the substantive protection privilege offers.
> 4. For the same reason, we will view as a significant mark of cooperation a company's decision to structure its investigation in such a way as not to attract privilege claims over interviews of witnesses.[238]

In the first edition of this book, it was suggested that, to preserve privilege when conducting interviews with potential witnesses, in the case of employees, where possible, they should be expressly authorised by the corporate to communicate with the lawyers for the purposes of receiving advice. Such practice would be consistent with the decision of the Singapore Court of Appeal in Skandinaviska Enskilda Banken v. Asia Pacific Breweries and would in principle have provided a reasonable ground for asserting privilege on the basis of that decision. The position is much more difficult in light of The RBS Rights Issue Litigation and ENRC decisions. Following those decisions, and pending any reconsideration of the issue by the Supreme Court, only documents recording communications between the client (i.e., those within the organisation who are authorised to seek advice from, or receive the advice of, the lawyers) and the lawyers will be protected by legal advice privilege. That said, it seems likely that a corporate entity may nevertheless soon seek to maintain legal advice privilege over interview notes (notwithstanding that such a claim to privilege would likely be successfully challenged at a first instance) with the benefit of the Court of Appeal's comments in ENRC about the unworkability of a narrow definition of 'client' in the corporate context.[239] However, until such a challenge (and clarification from the Supreme Court), notes of interviews with other employees or ex-employees of the client organisation, whether taken by employees or by the lawyers, will be potentially disclosable in any subsequent proceedings, unless they can be said to form part of the lawyers' working papers. As to that, the decisions in The RBS Rights Issue Litigation and, at first instance, ENRC suggest that it will be necessary to establish in evidence that the notes, if disclosed, would betray the tenor of the legal advice. It may therefore be tempting for the lawyers to ensure that any notes recording factual information obtained from employees and ex-employees are produced so that they contain the solicitor's commentary and advice and are not merely a recitation of facts provided by the interviewee.

Of course, all interviews conducted for the dominant purpose of anticipated litigation ought to attract litigation privilege.

238 Alun Milford, General Counsel, SFO, Speech at the European Compliance and Ethics Institute, Prague, 29 March 2016.

239 In such a case it would seem very likely that a leap-frog certificate would be granted to enable the issue to be determined by the Supreme Court, bypassing the Court of Appeal.

Where a corporation under investigation provides oral summaries of otherwise privileged interviews to a regulator or prosecutor, it is likely that this would be held to amount to a limited waiver in respect of matters communicated to the regulator or prosecutor because the information is provided for the limited purpose of the investigation.

35.9.2 Ensuring that any waiver is limited

It is clearly very valuable for a regulated entity to be able to waive privilege vis-à-vis the regulator for a particular purpose (e.g., in connection with a specific investigation) but without waiving it more generally. As noted above in Section 35.8.1, in ENRC v. Dechert the Court of Appeal has confirmed that the concept of limited waiver is of general application, designed to ensure that the loss of legal professional privilege (given its fundamental importance) is limited to that which is necessary to protect other interests.[240]

Although it may be possible for a regulated entity to contend that waiver of privilege was impliedly, if not expressly, limited (having regard to all the circumstances of the waiver), the safest course will always be to make clear at the time of disclosure that waiver is for a limited purpose only and confidentiality is otherwise being maintained.

However, as noted above, while it may be possible to achieve a limited waiver under English law, the waiver may not be so regarded in other jurisdictions.

35.9.3 Redaction of documents

Where only part or parts of a document are privileged, the appropriate procedure (assuming the privilege holder wishes to maintain privilege) is to disclose the document but redacting the privileged parts. Disclosure of a redacted document will not give rise to a waiver of privilege in respect of the redacted parts.[241] Disclosure of a redacted document in this way should be distinguished from deployment of a redacted document in court. In the latter circumstance, reliance on the unprivileged part of a document may give rise to collateral waiver in respect of the privileged part, where both parts deal with the same subject matter.

Where there is a dispute as to the justification for a redaction, the court may inspect the relevant document. In civil proceedings, the court's power to inspect documents to resolve an application for specific disclosure is found in the CPR at rule 31.19(6). Previously, it had been held that an order for inspection by the court is usually regarded as a solution of last resort and should not be undertaken unless the court considers that there is credible evidence that those claiming privilege have either misunderstood their duty, or are not to be trusted with the decision, or there is no reasonably practical alternative.[242] A recent Court of Appeal decision has suggested that the hurdle to be surmounted before inspection is ordered is not as stringent, holding that the Court has a general discretion to inspect documents, but that it should nevertheless be cautious before exercising that discretion.[243]

In the criminal context, if the prosecution is asserting public interest immunity in order not to disclose material, there is a defined route to follow under Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act 1996 (CPIA 1996) and the Criminal Procedural Rules (CrimPR) at rule 15.3.

The ability of the defence to challenge the adequacy of prosecution disclosure is provided for under section 8 of the CPIA 1996 and rule 15.5 of the CrimPR, after service of the defence case statement. The court may order disclosure of further material if the defence can demonstrate that the prosecution has that material and is required to disclose it in accordance with the CPIA 1996. A criminal court also has inherent jurisdiction to ensure a fair trial and, in the event of a dispute over the justification for a redaction, a judge can always review the material if he or she considers it appropriate.

If a claim to privilege is challenged by an investigating authority or regulator, and the matter comes before the court, it will be necessary for the party claiming privilege to provide evidence to substantiate its claim. The principles to be applied in assessing that evidence were set out by Beatson J in West London Pipeline v. Total UK.[244] The judge explained that an affidavit claiming privilege 'should be specific enough to show something of the deponent's analysis of the documents or, in the case of a claim to litigation privilege, the purpose for which they were created. It is desirable that they should refer to such contemporary material as it is possible to do so without making disclosure of the very matters that the claim for privilege is designed to protect.'[245]

While these principles are well established, their application may in some instances be controversial. In ENRC the first-instance court did not consider that the evidential burden has been satisfied.[246] In particular, Andrews J was unimpressed by the explanation that had been given as to why evidence had to be 244 [2008] 2 CLC 258. Although note, as set out above, the Court of Appeal's disapproval in WH Holding Limited and West Ham United Football Club Limited v. E20 Stadium LLP [2018] EWCA Civ 2652 of Beatson J's approach to inspection.

245 Ibid., at para. 53. It was also noted (at paras. 65, 86) that an affidavit is generally to be treated as conclusive unless it appears that the deponent has mischaracterised documents or it is reasonably certain from the evidence before the court that it is incorrect or incomplete on material points.

246 Similarly, in The RBS Rights Issue Litigation, Hildyard J did not consider that the evidence adduced by RBS was sufficient to make good RBS's claim that the interview notes comprised the lawyers' working papers as the evidence amounted to no more than a 'conclusory assertion'. As in ENRC, it is not easy to see what further evidence RBS could have adduced in support of the contention that disclosure of the notes would betray the trend of legal advice, without revealing the very matters over which RBS was seeking to claim privilege.

adduced in the form of a witness statement from ENRC's solicitors rather than in the form of direct evidence from individuals at ENRC responsible for giving instructions to their lawyers. (The explanation for this was that the senior officers and employees at ENRC were not willing to give evidence in circumstances where they were or might become suspects in the SFO's investigation, without assurances that the SFO would not pursue cross-examination of those witnesses in the proceedings or seek to refer to that evidence against that witness or against ENRC in any subsequent criminal proceedings. The SFO was unwilling to give any such assurances.) This approach seemed to prejudice a corporate claiming privilege in a criminal context given that necessarily the company can only give direct evidence through its directors and employees who may themselves be at risk of investigation and prosecution.

In rejecting ENRC's evidence, Andrews J was also influenced by what she perceived to be an absence of contemporaneous documents to support the claim. In particular, she commented that she had not been shown any records of discussions either at board level or within any group at ENRC that might have shed light on what ENRC contemplated, and why they contemplated it.[247] She therefore considered that for the purposes of the claim to litigation privilege, ENRC had failed to establish a reasonable anticipation of litigation.

The Court of Appeal in ENRC was critical of this approach and of the judge's failure to have proper regard to the unchallenged evidence of ENRC (put forward primarily by its solicitor) and the contemporaneous documents.[248] Following this decision, it appears that a corporate claiming privilege will not be prejudiced if, in light of the risk of investigation and prosecution of the individual directors and employees who might otherwise give evidence, it is left with no real choice but to give evidence through its lawyers.

Furthermore, the Court of Appeal's decision in ENRC confirms the proper approach explained in West London Pipeline, namely that the evidence in a witness statement or affidavit should be accepted unless there is good reason (e.g., the existence of contradictory contemporaneous documents) to think that the evidence is incorrect.

35.9.5 Use of independent counsel

Where there is a potential dispute concerning the application of privilege, it is reasonably common for independent counsel to be appointed to review the relevant documents. Such counsel would then be prevented from acting for either side of the relevant dispute. An appointment may be made by the court or can be made more informally by the parties themselves. This process is, for example, frequently adopted by the SFO, although parties should always ensure the genuine independence of any counsel appointed.

248 See, in particular, The Director of the Serious Fraud Office v. Eurasian Natural Resources Corporation Limited [2019] 1 WLR 791 at paras. 92, 93.

In R (McKenzie) v. Director of the Serious Fraud Office,[249] the court was required to consider the procedures adopted by the SFO for dealing with potentially privileged material embedded in electronic devices seized using statutory powers or produced in response to a notice. The applicant complained that the SFO procedure was unlawful in using in-house technical staff to conduct an electronic search of the content of seized devices by reference to search terms for the purpose of isolating potentially privileged material for subsequent review by independent counsel. It was argued that this initial exercise should be contracted out by the SFO to independent IT specialists, despite the SFO having detailed procedures in place to ensure, in so far as possible, that its investigators would not gain access to any potentially privileged material before it had been reviewed by independent counsel. The applicant contended that the involvement of in-house SFO IT specialists and the uploading of the digital material, including the potentially privileged material embedded within it, onto the SFO's digital review system unnecessarily exposed the person to whom privilege attached to an avoidable risk that privileged material may come to the knowledge of the SFO and be used to his disadvantage.

The applicant in McKenzie argued that the same approach should apply when an investigating body lawfully comes into possession of potentially privileged material as applies to a solicitor in relation to privileged material relating to a former client. The investigating body must satisfy the court with convincing evidence that there is no real risk of the privileged material being disclosed to an investigator. The court disagreed, finding that it would not be appropriate to apply the same reasoning to the relationship between a criminal investigating body and the subject of its investigation as applies in relation to a solicitor and former client. In the case of an investigating body, there is no fiduciary relationship and the body is exercising statutory powers for the public good in the investigation of suspected crime. It would therefore be imposing too onerous an obligation on the SFO to require it to demonstrate that there could be no real risk of the privileged material being read by anyone involved in the investigation; instead, the seizing authority has a duty to devise and operate a system to isolate potentially privileged material from bulk material lawfully in its possession that can reasonably be expected to ensure that such material will not be read by members of the investigative team before it has been reviewed by an independent lawyer to establish whether privilege exists. There should also be clear guidance in place so that, if an investigator does by mischance read privileged material, that fact is recorded and reported, the potential conflict recognised and steps taken to prevent privileged information being deployed in the investigation. On the facts, the SFO procedure was held to satisfy these requirements.

36.1 Privilege in law enforcement investigations

The attorney–client privilege is recognised in the United States as 'the oldest of the privileges for confidential communications known to the common law'.[2] It is viewed as serving a crucial function in 'encourag[ing] full and frank communication between attorneys and their clients' and thereby promoting 'the observance of law and administration of justice'.[3] The attorney–client privilege protects information shared between a lawyer and the client, where the information is (1) a communication, (2) made in confidence, (3) between a person who is, or is about to become, a client (4) and a lawyer (5) for the purpose of obtaining legal advice or assistance.[4] Attorney–client privileged communications may take many forms, from oral communications, to emails, to text messages, so long as each communication is undertaken in confidence for the purpose of seeking or rendering legal advice.[5] Once the privilege is created, the privilege continues, and may be invoked at any time (unless it has been waived or is otherwise subject to an exception), even following the termination of the attorney–client relationship or the death of the client.[6]

In Upjohn Co. v. United States,[7] the United States Supreme Court held that a company's attorney–client privilege extends to company counsel's communications with employees in certain prescribed circumstances.[8] Rather than providing a simple objective test, the Upjohn court instead established five factors to guide courts in determining whether the company's privilege should extend to counsel's communications with its employees: (1) whether the communications were made by employees at the direction of superior officers of the company for the purpose of obtaining legal advice; (2) whether the communications contained information necessary for counsel to render legal advice, which was not otherwise available from 'control group' management; (3) whether the matters communicated were within the scope of the employee's corporate duties; (4) whether the employee knew that the communications were for the purpose of the company obtaining legal advice; and (5) whether the communications were ordered to be kept confidential by the employee's superiors, including that the communications were considered confidential at the time and kept confidential subsequent to the interview.[9] When these elements are established, courts generally consider communications between company counsel and an employee to be within the scope of the company's attorney–client privilege.[10]

While the privilege provides broad protection for confidential communications among those within the attorney–client relationship, disclosing the contents of these communications to a third party outside the scope of the protection – such as a government agency – may result in a waiver of the applicable privilege.

Crime-fraud exception 36.1.1.1

The attorney–client privilege does not offer an absolute protection for all of a lawyer's communications with the client. An important exclusion is the crime-fraud exception, which removes the protection of the attorney–client privilege for communications concerning contemplated or continuing illegal or fraudulent acts.[11]

9 Id. at 394-96. While the majority of jurisdictions have adopted Upjohn's approach, some states employ other tests to determine if conversations with an employee are covered by the company's privilege. See, e.g., Motorola, Inc. v. Lemko Corp., No. 08 C 5427, 2010 WL 2179170, at *1-2 (N.D. Ill. 1 June 2010) (noting that Illinois continues to apply the control group test and assess privilege questions accordingly).

10 To ensure that the employee understands the purpose of the interview, the expectation of confidentiality, and the scope of the attorney–client privilege, company counsel typically begins each meeting with a company employee by providing a summary of these factors, known as an 'Upjohn warning'.

11 See, e.g., United States v. Zolin, 491 U.S. 554, 563 (1989) (explaining that the crime-fraud exception 'assure[s] that the seal of secrecy between lawyer and client does not extend to communications made for the purpose of getting advice for the commission of a fraud or crime') (citation omitted); Clark v. United States, 289 U.S. 1, 15 (1933); In re Antitrust Grand Jury,

After a party has invoked the attorney–client privilege, the person seeking to abrogate the privilege under this exception has the burden of making a prima facie case that (1) the client was committing or intending to commit a crime or fraud and (2) the attorney–client communications at issue were in furtherance of that alleged crime or fraud.[12] Significantly, for the exception to be applicable, the party need not show that the alleged crime or fraud was actually completed, only that the crime or fraud was the objective of the communication.[13] Further, the party need not show that the attorney was aware of the alleged fraud or misconduct. In fact, the attorney's knowledge or ignorance of the crime is irrelevant. Instead, courts look to the client's intent or objective in the subject communication.[14] As the Supreme Court stated in Clark v. United States, 'A client who consults an attorney for advice that will serve him in the commission of a fraud will have no help from the law. He must let the truth be told.'[15]

For example, in the case of United States v. Gorski,[16] a defendant was indicted for making fraudulent representations related to the ownership and control of his company when bidding on government contracts.[17] The government alleged that the defendant fraudulently represented that his business qualified as a service-disabled veteran-owned small business entity,[18] and also sought to restructure his company through backdated documents to give the appearance of compliance with ownership regulations.[19] In response to a government subpoena for access to communications between the defendant and his lawyer regarding the ownership and restructuring efforts, the trial court held an in camera review and ex parte hearing, and determined that the requested documents should be produced under the crime-fraud exception.[20] On appeal, the First Circuit upheld the trial court's ruling, finding that (1) the indictment provided a reasonable basis to believe that the defendant was engaged in criminal or fraudulent activity and

(2) there was a reasonable basis to believe that the attorney–client communications 'were intended by the client to facilitate or conceal the criminal or fraudulent activity'.[21] In so ruling, the court specifically noted that the crime-fraud exception does not require – and therefore does not reflect – any finding on the ultimate question as to whether the defendant acted wrongfully, nor does it bear on the conduct or intent of the lawyers involved.[22]

The crime-fraud exception has also been found to apply because of an attorney's misconduct, even if the client is found to be innocent of any wrongdoing.[23] The exception does not apply to attorney–client communications that reflect the solicitation or provision of legal advice concerning crimes or frauds that occurred in the past; such attorney–client communications remain protected,[24] unless the communications are made for the purpose of covering up past misconduct or obstructing justice.[25] Attorney–client communications reflecting advice about the legality of a client's intended course of conduct are likewise protected as privileged.[26] Finally, communications where an attorney dissuades or prevents the

26 If a client seeks advice from counsel about the legality of a course of conduct and then relies to his or her detriment on that advice in taking action later determined to be unlawful, the client may choose to assert an 'advice of counsel' defence to demonstrate a lack of wrongful intent. The client generally must show (1) full disclosure of all material facts to the attorney before seeking advice; and (2) actual reliance on counsel's advice in the good faith belief that the conduct was legal. See, e.g., United States v. West, 392 F. 3d 450, 457 (D.C. Cir. 2004). Invoking the 'advice of counsel' defence generally waives the attorney–client privilege protecting the underlying communications with counsel related to the advice, since the client is putting the contents of those communications at issue. See, e.g., Chevron Corp. v. Pennzoil Co., 974 F.2d 1156, 1162-63 (9th Cir. 1992).

There are limits to the ability of an individual employee to assert the advice-of-counsel defence where the client is the company, rather than the individual. In the civil context, for example, if the corporation controls the privilege over the attorney advice at issue, at least one court has found that the company may refuse to waive that privilege on behalf of the individual employee, even if the disclosure would amount to a complete defence of the individual. See United States v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 132 F. Supp. 3d 558, 566 (S.D.N.Y. 2015). In the criminal context, however, there appears to be split authority as to whether an individual's right to present his defence may trump the company's interest in preserving the privilege. Compare United States v. Grace, 439 F. Supp.2d 1125, 1142 (D. Mont. 2006) (finding that such evidence may be 'of such probative and exculpatory value as to compel the admission of the evidence over [the company's] objection as the attorney–client privilege holder.'), with Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 132 F. Supp 3d at 562-63 (suggesting that the Supreme Court's rejection of a 'balancing test' for attorney–client privilege in *Swidler & Berlin v. client from engaging in further illegal conduct are also protected; such communications are viewed as serving an important purpose in the administration of justice by promoting legal conduct.[27]

36.1.1.2 Derivative claim exception

Another exception to a company's assertion of attorney–client privilege arises from the case of Garner v. Wolfinbarger,[28] where shareholders filed a derivative suit against a company, charging management with fraud and seeking discovery of privileged communications between management and in-house counsel.[29] In an effort to balance the importance of maintaining the confidentiality of attorney communications with the need to keep the shareholders informed of matters affecting the corporation, the Fifth Circuit created an exception to attorney–client privilege, which has become known as the Garner doctrine. The doctrine permits a company's shareholders who are suing on behalf of the corporation to bypass the company's attorney–client privilege upon a showing of 'good cause', based on a nine-factor analysis.[30] The Garner doctrine has been recognised as creating a shareholder fiduciary exception to attorney–client privilege, though the doctrine is not universally accepted by the courts.[31] Furthermore, whether the Garner doctrine's 'good cause' exception extends to attorney work product also remains unsettled.[32]

Greenberg Traurig, LLP,* 18 N.Y.S.3d 1, 9-10 (N.Y. App. Div. 2015) (adopting the fiduciary exception test enunciated in Garner and rejecting the corporation's argument that the fiduciary exception is inapplicable once its shareholder-plaintiffs become adverse to the company); but see Hoiles v. Superior Court, 204 Cal. Rptr. 111, 115 (Cal. Ct. App. 1984) (rejecting Garner and holding that California does not afford an 'extraordinary avenue . . . to petitioners to pierce the privilege in their capacity as shareholders'); Pittsburgh History & Landmarks Foundation v. Zeigler, 200 A.3d 58 (Pa. 2019) (rejecting the 'good cause' standard articulated in Garner as inconsistent with the basic tenets of attorney–client privilege law because it introduced uncertainty into the application of the privilege).

32 See Murphy v. Gorman, 271 F.R.D. 296, 311-313 (D.N.M. 2010) (collecting cases).

While the Garner case arose in the context of a shareholder derivative suit, its principles apply more broadly to other situations where a company owes a fiduciary duty to the party seeking to abrogate the privilege.[33] In a case where, for example, a special litigation committee has undergone an internal investigation into the merits of such a claim, derivative plaintiffs might seek access to the investigation materials under Garner. To protect attorney–client privileged communications in this context from the risk of later disclosure to the company's shareholders, counsel should diligently mark any written legal advice as attorney–client privileged and, where applicable, attorney work-product. Counsel should also seek to avoid situations where the only evidence of an unprivileged fact is a privileged writing, as this may support a shareholder's 'good cause' to pierce the attorney–client privilege to discover that underlying fact.

Attorney work-product 36.1.2

In the United States, the doctrine of 'attorney work-product' also protects from disclosure certain documents and other materials prepared in anticipation of litigation or for trial. Although such work-product is most commonly prepared by an attorney, work-product protection may extend to materials prepared in anticipation of litigation by certain third parties at the attorney's direction, including materials prepared by the client.[34] But while the work-product doctrine offers certain protections for an attorney's impressions, opinions and legal conclusions, such documents are not considered 'privileged' like attorney–client communications, but instead are afforded a qualified protection from discovery.[35]

In the seminal case of Hickman v. Taylor,[36] the United States Supreme Court formally recognised the attorney work-product doctrine, establishing the scope of the protection to include materials prepared in anticipation of litigation.[37] The Hickman court also qualified this work-product protection by finding that, upon a showing of good cause, an adversary could obtain discovery of documents containing 'factual work product'.[38] The Court recognised that substantially greater – if not absolute – work-product protection should be given to documents that reflect the attorney's legal theories, strategy, assessments and mental impressions (opinion work-product).[39]

In United States v. Nobles,[40] the Supreme Court extended the work-product doctrine beyond the scope of materials created by counsel, recognising that attorneys often rely on the assistance of investigators and other agents in preparation for trial. The Court found that it is 'necessary that the [attorney work-product] doctrine protect material prepared by agents for the attorney as well as those prepared by the attorney himself.'[41] Following the Supreme Court's guidance in Nobles, work-product protection is understood to be extended to material prepared 'by or for [a] party's representative' as long as the agent is assisting in preparing for litigation and working at the direction of the attorney.[42]

The modern federal work-product doctrine is codified in Rule 26(b)(3) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (the Federal Rules), and stands in line with the Supreme Court's guidance in Hickman and Nobles. In particular, Rule 26(b)(3) eliminates the distinction between attorney work-product and non-attorney work-product, focusing on whether the materials were prepared in anticipation of litigation or trial.[43] Further, Rule 26(b)(3) preserves work-product protections unless the party seeking discovery has a 'substantial need' for the materials in the preparation of the party's case and the party is unable without 'undue hardship' to obtain the 'substantial equivalent' of the materials by other means.[44]

While the attorney work-product doctrine offers a qualified protection for documents created in anticipation of litigation, disclosing the contents of such documents to a third party outside of the attorney–client relationship (such as a government agency) may result in a waiver of this protection.[45] In addition, courts will examine the temporal proximity of the investigation to the threatened litigation in determining whether the work-product doctrine applies.[46]

Common interest or joint defence privilege 36.1.3

The joint defence (or 'common interest') privilege is a doctrine that preserves the attorney–client privilege and work-product doctrine, despite disclosure of otherwise protected information to third parties.[47] As explained by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, the privilege 'serves to protect the confidentiality of communications passing from one party to the attorney for another party where a joint defense effort or strategy has been decided upon and undertaken by the parties and their respective counsel'.[48] In general, a party asserting the privilege must demonstrate that (1) the communications were made in the course of a joint defence effort, (2) the statements were designed to further the effort and (3) the privilege has not otherwise been waived.[49] If the privilege is challenged, the burden is on the defendants to demonstrate the existence of a joint defence arrangement.[50]

While a joint defence arrangement has not been held to create a direct attorney–client relationship between counsel for one party and another, some courts have found that the sharing of confidential information creates an implied attorney–client relationship among the parties to the joint defence. In United States v. Henke,[51] for example, the Ninth Circuit held that the joint defence privilege can, in certain circumstances, create an implied attorney–client relationship, as well as a disqualifying conflict of interest. In that case, three executives – Gupta, Desaigoudar and Henke – were charged with conspiracy, making false statements, securities fraud and insider trading.[52] All three defendants participated in joint defence meetings where they shared confidential information.[53] On the eve of trial, however, Gupta entered into a co-operation agreement and agreed to testify for the government.[54] Gupta's lawyers threatened Desaigoudar and Henke's attorneys with legal action if they revealed any confidential information obtained as part of the joint defence meetings. Desaigoudar and Henke's attorneys eventually moved to withdraw because they believed their duty of confidentiality to Gupta prevented them from effectively cross-examining him.[55] The Ninth Circuit held that the lower court erred in denying the motions to withdraw, as the joint defence privilege created 'a disqualifying conflict where information gained in confidence by an attorney [became] an issue'.[56]

To mitigate the risk that information shared in the context of a joint defence agreement may lead to disqualification at a later time, many lawyers choose to include written disclaimers in their joint defence agreements along the following lines:

> Nothing contained [in this agreement] shall be deemed to create an attorney–client relationship between any attorney and anyone other than the client of that attorney . . . and no attorney who has entered into this Agreement shall be disqualified from examining or cross-examining any joint defense participant who testifies at any proceeding, whether under a grant of immunity or otherwise, because of such an attorney's participation in this agreement, and it is herein represented that each party to this agreement has specifically advised his or her client of this clause.[57]

Courts have found such provisions to permit an attorney to cross-examine a witness who was a former member of a joint defence arrangement and has since become a government co-operator, and have even permitted counsel to impeach the witness using statements that would otherwise be protected as privileged under the joint defence.[58]

The recent case of SEC v. Rashid[59] demonstrates the importance of both confirming and recording the intention to enter into a common interest relationship. In Rashid, the SEC was investigating the defendant's use of corporate expenses while employed at Apollo Management LP. During the investigation, the defendant retained counsel separate from that of the company, and eventually hired a separate firm to replace the first. During a later deposition of a representative from his prior law firm, the SEC sought to inquire about discussions with company counsel. When the defendant claimed such communications were protected by common interest privilege, the SEC moved to compel the testimony, arguing that the common interest privilege is narrowly constructed and that the defendant did not meet his burden of showing that such a relationship existed. The court ordered the deposition to proceed, finding insufficient evidence of a common interest relationship. In so ruling, the court considered, among other things, (1) the lack of a written common interest agreement; (2) testimony from company counsel that they did not recall entering into a common interest relationship; (3) the defendants' lack of ability to recall specific details of the terms of the alleged agreement; and (4) that company counsel had delivered the Upjohn warnings at their first meeting with the defendant. The court determined that the common interest privilege cannot apply in a circumstance where there is no evidence that both parties agreed to pursue a joint legal strategy.

Further, to preserve the attorney–client privilege in the context of a joint defence arrangement, confidentiality must still be maintained against those outside the arrangement, because disclosure to a single outsider could constitute waiver of the information discussed in the outsider's presence.

The 'client' in an attorney–client relationship is generally defined as the intended and immediate beneficiary of the lawyer's services, who communicates with the attorney to obtain legal advice, and interacts with the attorney to advance his or her own interests.[60] Defining the 'client' becomes more difficult in the context of corporate representation, as a company typically speaks by and through its employees, but the corporation's counsel represents not those individual agents, but rather the corporation itself.[61] As a general matter, a corporation's attorney–client privilege is controlled by the management of the organisation.[62] An employee or officer cannot assert the corporation's privilege if the corporation waives it,[63] and an employee cannot waive the corporation's privilege if the corporation asserts it.[64]

In cases where the interests of an employee are or may become adverse to that of the company during a government investigation, the Rules of Professional Conduct[65] dictate that attorneys explain clearly whom they represent.[66] Interviewing employees in the context of a government investigation inevitably creates situations in which conflict between company and employee may arise. In particular, individuals should be advised to obtain separate counsel in situations where they are (1) the target of the investigation, (2) a probable whistleblower or (3) an employee facing risk of criminal liability. In any of these circumstances, employees should not be involved in the day-to-day supervision of company counsel's own investigation, including serving in the reporting chain.

66 ABA Model Rule of Professional Conduct 1.13(f).

Company counsel may encounter circumstances where an employee seeks to assert the attorney–client privilege to prevent the disclosure of information uncovered by counsel during investigative interviews by arguing that company counsel represents the employee as an individual. The Third Circuit in In re Bevill Bresler & Schulman Asset Management Corp, developed a five-part test (the Bevill test) to examine the merits of such an assertion by an individual employee against company counsel.[67] Under this test, employees must show that (1) they approached corporate counsel for the purpose of seeking legal advice, (2) they made it clear that they were seeking advice in their individual capacity, (3) counsel sought to communicate with the employee in this individual capacity, mindful of the conflicts with its representation of the company, (4) the communications were confidential and (5) the communications did not concern the employee's official duties or the general affairs of the company.[68] The Bevill test has been recognised by other jurisdictions as a means of assessing whether a company employee may assert attorney–client privilege in an individual capacity arising out of communications with corporate counsel.[69]

See Chapter 14 on employee rights

In United States v. Blumberg,[70] for example, the District of New Jersey applied the Bevill test where an individual employee sought to claim personal privilege protection for communications with the company's lawyer. In assessing the fifth factor of the test, the court considered the individual employee's claim that he had discussed with company counsel his 'potential for criminal exposure' and the fact that he was just a 'fact witness'.[71] The court ultimately concluded that this exchange did not create an individual attorney–client relationship, and that the company still owned the privilege covering the employee's communications, and thus could waive it (presumably over his objection).[72]

To mitigate the risks created by potentially divergent interests between the company and individual employees, counsel should be clear in their engagement letter about not only whom they represent, but also whom they do not. Further, mindful of the considerations outlined by the Bevill court, company counsel should take care during interviews with individual employees to limit their discussions to matters within the scope of the employee's official duties, rather than matters that may implicate the employee's personal interests. Finally, in the event that discussions with an individual employee diverge to matters implicating legal advice in the employee's individual capacity, counsel should reiterate to the employee that they have been retained to represent the company and the company's interests, and potentially advise the employee to retain separate counsel with respect to these other matters.

It is generally best if counsel conducts the employee interviews in the context of a government investigation, to ensure that what is said during the interview is covered by the attorney–client privilege, and that notes or memoranda documenting the interview are similarly privileged.[73] Recordings of interviews may, however, be considered purely factual communications that – as verbatim transcriptions – may not be subject to the attorney work-product doctrine.[74] Accordingly, it is general practice to have the attorney interviewer (or, more likely, another attorney in the room) take written notes of the interviews that include his or her thoughts and mental impressions. And because opinion work-product receives greater protection than fact work-product, it is more likely that written notes including an attorney's thoughts and impressions will be protected.[75]

While it is often most advantageous to have counsel conduct the witness interviews in an investigation, a court may still find that interviews conducted by non-lawyers maintain attorney–client privilege if they are acting as agents for lawyers. For example, in In re Kellogg Brown & Root Inc (KBR),[76] the DC Circuit court held that the work of an engineering and construction firm involved in an the internal investigation was afforded work-product protection where the investigation was conducted 'under the auspices of KBR's in-house legal department, acting in its legal capacity'.[77] The court held that '[s]o long as obtaining or providing legal advice was one of the significant purposes of the internal investigation, Motors Ignition Switch Litig.*, 80 F. Supp. 3d 521, 527-28 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) (finding that documents related to the internal investigation were protected from discovery because (1) the investigation was conducted at the direction of counsel; (2) those interviewed were told that the purpose of the interview was to facilitate the rendering of legal advice; (3) they were told that that the content of the discussions should remain confidential; and (4) the communications underlying the published report were not shared with third parties).

74 See Fed. R. Crim. P. 26.2(a), (f)(2); see also United States v. Nobles, 422 U.S. 225, 230-32 (1975).

75 It is critical for counsel to establish the expectation of confidentiality and attorney–client privilege protection at the outset of each interview, as interview memoranda merely labelled as privileged and confidential will not 'retroactively render the earlier, otherwise-unprivileged discussions subject to the attorney–client privilege.' See E*rickson v. Hocking Technical College*, Case No. 2:17-cv-360, 2018 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 50075, at *6, *8 (S.D. Ohio 27 March 2018).

the attorney–client privilege applies'.[78] The court's decision in KBR underscores the importance of making it clear that witness interviews conducted in the context of an internal investigation are for the purpose of rendering legal advice.[79]

Consistent with these principles, at the outset of any employee interview, counsel should give the employee an Upjohn warning, which makes clear that the communications between company counsel and the employees are confidential and protected as attorney–client privileged, and specifies that the privilege belongs to the company, and the company may choose to waive that privilege in the future. If clearly given, an Upjohn warning sets the boundaries of the interview and removes any doubt about whether counsel represents the employee.

In KBR, the DC Circuit noted that there are no 'magic words' that must be used to deliver a proper Upjohn warning.[80] Nevertheless, in practice, Upjohn warnings typically include some variation of the following components:

- The lawyer represents the company only and not the witness personally.
- The lawyer is collecting facts for the purpose of providing legal advice to the company.
- The communication is protected by attorney–client privilege, which belongs exclusively to the company, not the witness.
- The company may choose to waive the privilege and disclose the communication to a third party, including the government.
- The communication must be kept confidential, meaning that it cannot be disclosed to any third party other than the witness's counsel.[81]

Once the Upjohn warning is given, and before any substantive interview commences, counsel should confirm that the witness understands the warning, answer any questions the witness has about it and establish that the witness is agreeable to being interviewed under these terms. As an additional precaution, counsel should remind the witness at the conclusion of the interview not to discuss the substance of the interview with anyone else, except to the extent that the witness wishes to convey additional information or to ask follow-up questions of counsel.

Once a witness interview is complete, memorialising the content of the interview is essential to the investigation. The summary should state expressly that it does not constitute a verbatim transcription of the interview and that the 79 In contrast, in Wultz v. Bank of China, the Southern District of New York granted a motion to compel documents collected by non-lawyers in the context of an internal investigation, where the party invoking the privilege failed to demonstrate that the documents were collected at the direction of an attorney to assist the attorney in providing legal advice. 304 F.R.D. 384, 395-97 (S.D.N.Y. 2015). The court also found that the work-product doctrine would not protect the documents from disclosure because the bank had failed to show that the documents would not have been created in 'essentially similar form irrespective of the litigation.' summary contains the thoughts, mental impressions and legal conclusions of counsel. The summary should also confirm the delivery of the Upjohn warning, indicating the employee's understanding of the warning and willingness to proceed with the interview.

The importance of recording the provision of the Upjohn warning is underscored by the case of United States v. Ruehle.[82] In Ruehle, outside counsel conducted an interview of an employee, William J Ruehle, during an internal investigation. During the interview, Ruehle made statements that he later sought to suppress from his criminal trial. He argued that the statements were privileged because outside counsel had previously represented him in his individual capacity in a shareholder lawsuit, and counsel had not otherwise advised him that his statements during the internal investigation could be disclosed to third parties. The court found there to be inadequate evidence that Ruehle had been given Upjohn warnings, finding it persuasive that there was no reference to their delivery in counsel's interview memoranda. While the court's decision was later reversed on other grounds, this case illustrates the importance of maintaining a record of the delivery of Upjohn warnings.

See Chapters 8 on witness interviews and 14 on employee rights

Issues may also arise when interviewing current employees in the context of an internal investigation, to the extent that the investigation is prompted by a government inquiry when there is extensive coordination with a government regulator. In United States v. Connolly,[83] a bank engaged outside counsel to conduct an investigation into the bank's LIBOR practices that was prompted by a letter from the Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) requesting that the bank 'cooperate fully' by 'voluntarily engaging' outside counsel to conduct a review. During the investigation, outside counsel 'coordinated extensively' with both the CFTC and the Department of Justice (DOJ), and the government agencies gave substantial direction to the lawyers as to which employees should be interviewed and how to approach the interviews. After a bank employee, Connolly, was later indicted and convicted for conspiracy and wire fraud for his conduct in connection with the manipulation of LIBOR, he moved to vacate his conviction on the theory that his prosecution was predicated on, and fatally tainted by, statements that he gave in interviews conducted by outside counsel during the investigation. He argued that counsel was effectively deputised by the government in conducting the interviews, and as a result his statements should be deemed involuntary and rendered inadmissible under Garrity v. New Jersey,[84] since he made the statements under the threat of termination of employment in violation of his Fifth Amendment rights. Chief Judge Colleen McMahon of the Southern District of New York found that outside counsel here was 'de facto that Government for Garrity purposes' and noted that she was 'deeply troubled by this issue', which had 'profound implications' for how government investigations are conducted. And while the Court ultimately declined to overturn the employee's conviction, holding that the government did not 'use' his compelled statements in indicting or prosecuting him, the Court's comments and admonition will undoubtedly have a significant impact on the level of coordination with government agencies in investigations going forward.

See Chapter 10 on co-operating with authorities

36.3.2 Former employees

Interviews with former corporate employees about matters within the scope of their prior employment may also be protected by the attorney–client privilege.[85] Indeed, while courts of different jurisdictions are split as to whether attorney–client privilege should extend to discussions with former employees as a general matter,[86] most courts agree that narrowly tailored discussions related to the period of the individual's former employment should remain privileged.[87] As such, counsel conducting an investigation should carefully focus the interview with a former employee on matters that occurred during the former employee's tenure, as some district courts have held that interviews with a former employee on subjects that occurred after the employment had ended are not privileged.[88]

In determining whether a former employee is likely to be co-operative or to maintain the confidentiality of the interview, counsel should consider (1) the circumstances of the employee's departure and (2) whether the employee will be contractually obliged to maintain the confidentiality of the interview, through a severance agreement, for example.

36.3.3 Non-legal advice

At the outset of an internal investigation, the corporation should document that the investigation is being conducted for the purpose of obtaining legal advice and at the direction of counsel. If such intention is not documented, and it appears

Ill. 1 Oct. 1985) (declining to apply privilege protection to communications with former employees, noting that '[i]t is virtually impossible to distinguish the position of a former employee from any other third party who might have pertinent information about one or more corporate parties to a lawsuit').

Pa. 2004) ('the line to be drawn is not difficult: if the communication sought to be elicited relates to [the former employee's] conduct or knowledge during her employment . . . , or if it concerns conversations with corporate counsel that occurred during her employment, the communication is privileged; if not, the attorney–client privilege does not apply') (emphasis in original).

instead that employee interviews are being conducted in the context of a non-legal investigation, such communications may not be effectively cloaked in the attorney–client privilege. In Koumoulis v. Independent Financial Marketing Group Inc,[89] for example, plaintiffs were former and current employees of a company in the business of providing investment products to financial institutions.[90] The Eastern District of New York found that reports documenting internal discrimination complaints and the subsequent investigation by the company's human resources managers were not protected as attorney–client privileged because 'their predominant purpose was to provide human resources and thus business advice, not legal advice.'[91]

In light of Koumoulis, counsel must be ever mindful of stating explicitly at the outset of an investigation that its communications are outside the course of the day-to-day operation of the client's business and are explicitly aimed at assisting the delivery of legal advice. To the extent that litigation is reasonably foreseeable, it should be noted in all memoranda generated in the context of the investigation. Further, counsel should confirm with individual employees that when they are seeking legal advice – rather than business advice – the employees should be similarly explicit in their communications, labelling them as 'attorney–client privileged'. More important than any label or transcription, however, is that the context of such documents must reflect the solicitation and receipt of legal, rather than business, advice.[92]

Even if all the prerequisites for establishing attorney–client privilege are met, whenever a client discloses confidential communications to third parties, including government agencies, the disclosure may constitute a waiver of the privilege as to both the communication that has been disclosed and other communications relating to the same subject matter. Federal Rule of Evidence 502(a) governs disclosures made to a federal officer or agency and also the scope of waiver in such disclosures.[93] The rule explicitly states that disclosures of attorney–client or work-product protection to the federal government creates a waiver that extends to other undisclosed communication or information in a federal or state proceeding if: (1) the waiver is intentional, (2) the disclosed and undisclosed communications or information concern the same subject matter and (3) they ought in fairness to be considered together.[94]

While the 'fairness' requirement of Rule 502(a) creates some uncertainty as to when subject-matter waiver might occur, in practice, courts typically look to the reason for the initial disclosure when determining the scope of a waiver. If a court determines that a party selectively disclosed privileged information to gain a strategic advantage to the government's detriment, it is more likely to find a full subject-matter waiver.[95] But, if the disclosure occurred outside the context of litigation, or if the disclosure was not intended for – or did not actually result in – a strategic advantage to the disclosing party, the court is likely to find a limited waiver.[96] In the case of United States v. Treacy,[97] for example, Judge Rakoff of the Southern District of New York quashed a defendant's subpoena for a law firm's interview memoranda that had not previously been provided to the government, rejecting the theory that furnishing some interview memoranda to the government waived privilege to others covering the same subject matter.[98] The Court relied on the advisory committee notes in Rule 502(a) in support of its 'fairness' assessment, finding that subject-matter waiver should be reserved for the narrow circumstances where a party seeks to disadvantage their adversary through a selective or misleading disclosure.[99] Further, if a party chooses to disclose attorney work-product to the government – in the form of White Papers, presentations or other memoranda – with the purpose of dissuading the government from bringing suit, one court has recently held that such a disclosure will waive any privilege with respect to those materials, which may subsequently be discoverable by third parties.[100]

Co-operation credit and waiver 36.4.1

Corporations subject to criminal or regulatory investigations have long faced the question of whether and when to turn over privileged material to the government. Waiving privilege has historically resulted in increased co-operation 'credit' from the DOJ[101] and the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC).[102] However, changes to DOJ guidelines now forbid the government from requesting that companies waive attorney–client privilege, and preclude consideration of whether the corporation waived privilege in assessing co-operation credit.

Indeed, in response to pressure from the private sector and the legislative and judicial branches, on 12 December 2006, the then Deputy Attorney General Paul J McNulty issued a memorandum containing new corporate charging guidelines for federal prosecutors through a revision to the Principles of Federal Prosecution of Business Organizations.[103] The McNulty Memorandum required that, before requesting a waiver of attorney–client or work-product privileged information from a corporation under investigation, prosecutors must establish a 'legitimate need' for privileged communications and seek approval of the US Attorney, who must obtain written approval of the Deputy Attorney General.[104]

In 2008, the DOJ replaced these guidelines in a memorandum authored by then Deputy Attorney General Mark R Filip.[105] The Filip Memorandum further adjusted what factors the government should consider in determining whether a corporation deserves 'co-operation credit': where co-operation credit had previously turned on factors including waiver of attorney–client privilege or work-product protections, it will now focus on disclosure of relevant facts.[106] In other words, a company could receive the same co-operation credit if it disclosed facts contained in non-privileged materials as it would if it disclosed facts contained in privileged materials, so long as the company discloses all relevant facts known to it.

In September 2015, the DOJ issued a memorandum authored by then Deputy Attorney General Sally Quillian Yates entitled 'Individual Accountability for Corporate Wrongdoing'.[107] The Yates Memorandum set forth policies intended to guide the DOJ in holding individual defendants civilly and criminally liable for corporate misconduct.[108] Significantly, the Yates Memorandum now requires a company to disclose 'all relevant facts relating to the individuals responsible for the misconduct' for the company 'to be eligible for any cooperation credit'.[109] While Yates has publicly remarked that these new policies are not intended to undermine the Filip Memorandum's guidance regarding the waiver of attorney–client privilege,[110] the mandate to disclose 'all relevant facts' creates some uncertainty as to whether, at least practically speaking, such a waiver may now be required once again. In describing the impact of the Yates Memorandum on companies seeking co-operation credit, Yates explained the DOJ's view that 'facts are not [privileged]', and therefore a company must 'produce all relevant facts – including the facts learned through . . . interviews [with company employees] – unless identical information has already been provided.'[111]

In November 2017, the DOJ adopted the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA) Corporate Enforcement Policy, which provided guidance regarding the credit that the DOJ might provide to companies who self-report FCPA violations. The policy authorises certain benefits – including a presumption that self-reporting companies will not be criminally charged – for companies that meet the DOJ's rigorous requirements of disclosure, co-operation and remediation, including disgorgement of ill-gotten gains.[112] In March 2018, the DOJ announced an expansion of the FCPA Corporate Enforcement Policy, noting that it may be employed as non-binding guidance in criminal cases beyond those arising under the FCPA. This announcement underscores the DOJ's encouragement of self-reporting and co-operation by companies in a wide range of criminal cases.

On 29 November 2018, Deputy Attorney General Rod J Rosenstein delivered remarks at the American Conference Institute's 35th International Conference on the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act[113] that reaffirmed the central tenets of the Yates Memorandum, but also announced a revised policy that provides federal prosecutors with greater discretion concerning whether to pursue individuals, based on varying standards between civil and criminal investigations. In particular, Rosenstein stated that companies are no longer expected to 'admit the civil liability of every individual employee' to qualify for co-operation credit. Instead, companies should focus on identifying individuals who were 'substantially involved in or responsible for the misconduct', including members of senior management or the board of directors. While Rosenstein's comments have been considered as a reversion to pre-Yates priorities, where the 'primary goal' in civil cases is to recover money, recent court decisions have demonstrated a continued focus on the concepts of individual accountability articulated by Yates.[114]

In light of this recent guidance, corporate counsel must be mindful about entering into joint defence agreements that might limit their ability to share with the government the underlying facts learned during the investigation, especially if the company is facing exposure to a potentially devastating criminal charge if it does not receive credit for co-operating with the government. In addition, the Yates Memorandum underscores the importance of issuing comprehensive Upjohn warnings when interviewing company employees, as a mandate to disclose 'all relevant facts' may involve the revelation to the government of facts disclosed by (potentially culpable) employees in the context of investigative interviews.

Particularly in cases where large numbers of documents are produced, it is not uncommon that a party might inadvertently disclose privileged communications. Federal Rule of Evidence 502(b) governs the court's treatment of attorney–client privileged and work-product material that has been inadvertently disclosed. The rule provides that, when making a disclosure in a federal proceeding or to a federal office or agency, the disclosure does not operate as a waiver in a federal or state proceeding if: '(1) the disclosure is inadvertent; (2) the holder of the privilege or protection took reasonable steps to prevent disclosure; and (3) the holder promptly took reasonable steps to rectify the error.'[115] According to Rule 502(b)'s advisory committee explanatory notes, courts are to consider several factors in determining whether the privilege holder took steps to promptly rectify the error, including (1) the reasonableness of precautions taken, (2) the time taken to rectify the error, (3) the scope of discovery, (4) the number of documents reviewed and the time constraints for production, (5) the extent of disclosure and (6) 'the overriding issue of fairness'.[116] The explanatory notes also suggest that a party can help demonstrate that its steps were reasonable by employing 'advanced analytical software applications and linguistic tools' in screening for privilege.[117]

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26(b)(5)(B) provides additional guidance on how clawback provisions may intersect with a claim of inadvertent disclosure. Under this rule, if information produced in discovery is subject to a claim of privilege or of protection as trial-preparation material, 'the party making the claim may notify any party that received the information of the claim and the basis for it'.[118] After being notified, a party:

> must promptly return, sequester, or destroy the specified information and any copies it has; must not use or disclose the information until the claim is resolved; must take reasonable steps to retrieve the information if the party disclosed it before being notified; and may promptly present the information to the court under seal for a determination of the claim.[119]

While the same clawback procedure is not explicitly contemplated in the criminal context, parties making disclosures in federal proceedings or to a federal office or agency may choose to enter into a voluntary clawback arrangement under Rule 502(e), including an explicit agreement that inadvertent disclosure will not constitute a waiver.[120] Such agreements are generally binding only on the parties to the agreement.[121] A carefully drawn clawback agreement can be to the benefit of everyone in the context of a government investigation: the agency will benefit from receiving discovery more expeditiously, and the producing party will benefit from minimising the risk and added review costs in the absence of such an agreement.[122] Even where counsel takes reasonable steps to prevent the disclosure of privileged material, the complexity of government investigations creates a real risk that such materials may still be inadvertently produced. To further mitigate this risk, document production letters should include unequivocal language, preserving the client's ability to claw back and recover inadvertently disclosed documents.

36.5 Selective waiver

The attempt to disclose privileged material to the government in the context of an investigation, while still claiming privilege and confidentiality over that same material as to other third parties, is called 'selective waiver'. Generally, courts have refused to sanction selective waiver, finding that the disclosure of privileged material to the government destroys the confidentiality necessary to maintain a claim of privilege in the first place, and therefore waives the privilege with respect to other third parties as well.[123]

The leading case applying the selective-waiver analysis is Diversified Industries Inc v. Meredith.[124] In Diversified Industries, a corporation retained external counsel to conduct an internal investigation into allegations of bribery.[125] The internal report prepared by external counsel was then produced to the SEC.[126] The Eighth Circuit held that this disclosure constituted only a 'limited waiver' that did not preclude the corporation from subsequently withholding the report from private litigants on the grounds of attorney–client privilege.[127] The court reasoned that a contrary ruling may undermine corporate incentives to initiate internal investigations conducted by counsel.[128]

But while Diversified Industries is still good law, the concept of selective waiver is disfavoured by most federal circuit courts,[129] which routinely hold that selective disclosure of a document to the government constitutes complete waiver of the privilege. As the DC Circuit reasoned, the privilege was not designed to allow a client 'to pick and choose among his opponents, waiving the privilege for some and resurrecting the claim of confidentiality to obstruct others'.[130]

The Second Circuit confronted the issue of selective waiver in In re Steinhardt Partners LP.[131] While expressing reluctance to embrace selective waiver, the Steinhardt decision refused to foreclose the possibility that selective waiver may be found in some cases, at least where the disclosing party and the government share a common interest or the disclosing party has entered into an explicit agreement with the government to maintain the confidentiality of the disclosed materials.[132] As a result, in the Second Circuit, a case-by-case analysis of the facts is necessary to determine whether selective waiver may apply.[133]

The recent case of SEC v. Herrera[134] illustrates the risks of selective waiver inherent in making a proffer to the government. In Herrera, external counsel conducted an internal investigation into certain apparent accounting errors in the company's books and records. During a subsequent SEC investigation, counsel was forthcoming to the SEC about documents that it uncovered over the course of its investigation, provided the SEC with a PowerPoint presentation that set forth its investigative steps and factual findings, and provided 'oral downloads' to the SEC of each of the 12 witness interviews it conducted. When former officers of the company were later sued in an SEC action, the defendants subpoenaed the records from the internal investigation during discovery, requesting (among other things) the law firm's written notes and memoranda from the witness interviews that had been described to the SEC and referenced in the PowerPoint presentation. The court rejected the law firm's argument that work-product protection still applied to the interview memoranda, finding that counsel's oral disclosures of their contents was the 'functional equivalent' of giving the SEC the memoranda themselves, removing any protection from them. The court acknowledged that the outcome may have been different had the external law firm only provided 'vague references' to the contents of the memo, or 'conclusions or general impressions' that were free of detail.[135] The court, reflecting the fact-specific nature of these determinations, however, did not find a broader subject matter waiver to the other findings referenced in counsel's presentation.

In In re Grand Jury Investigation,[136] in the context of the United States Special Counsel's Office (SCO) investigation of foreign interference in the 2016 presidential election, the SCO uncovered evidence that Paul Manafort (President Donald Trump's former campaign manager), his lobbying company and its employees made false statements in two letters submitted to the Foreign Agent Registration Act Registration Unit. In the first letter, counsel made factual representations that her clients did not have any agreements to provide services to a foreign entity. In the follow-up letter, counsel represented that one client could 'recall interacting' with consultants for a foreign entity, but did not recall meeting with or conducting outreach or facilitating any phone calls. The grand jury subsequently subpoenaed the attorney to testify about the communications underlying the factual representations in the letters. The attorney refused to answer the questions, citing attorney–client privilege and work-product protection. The court found that counsel had waived, through voluntary disclosure, all attorney–client privilege as to the contents of the letters, which 'made specific factual representations' that are 'unlikely to have originated from sources other than the Targets, and, in large part, were attributed to the Targets' recollections',[137] and extended the waiver to all communications on that same subject matter. The court also found that the crime-fraud exception provided an independent basis for waiver of privilege with respect to several of the questions posed to counsel in the grand jury.[138]

Some courts have suggested that production pursuant to a valid confidentiality agreement entered into with the government prior to the disclosure of attorney–client privileged or work-product information effectively preserves the privilege and does not amount to a waiver as to third parties.[139] Consequently, if the company does intend to disclose privileged material to the government, it should first attempt to obtain such an agreement from the government that it will keep the information confidential (a McKesson letter).[140] But even though future plaintiffs would not be parties to such an agreement, some courts have still found that the production of privileged materials pursuant to confidentiality agreements with the government nonetheless constitutes a waiver.[141] In light of federal courts' reluctance to find selective waiver, when a company voluntarily discloses documents or communications to government agencies, it must do so with the understanding that the documents and communications may lose the protection of the privilege and be subject to discovery by other parties, including private litigants.

Banks, in particular, often face pressure to share privileged materials with the government, both in the context of enforcement actions aimed at suspected wrongdoing and during routine regulatory oversight. But as a statutory matter, sharing privileged materials with bank supervisors results in a waiver of privilege only with respect to those supervisors; it does not waive applicable privileges with respect to third parties. Under Section 1828(x) of the Regulations Governing Insured Depository Institutions, the submission of information to 'the Bureau of Consumer Financial Protection, any [f]ederal banking agency, [s]tate bank supervisor, or foreign banking authority for any purpose in the course of any supervisory or regulatory process' shall not be construed as waiving privilege 'as to any person or entity other than such agency, supervisor, or authority'.[142] This approach provides one of the few examples of federal statutes that explicitly allow for the idea of selective waiver.[143]

Disclosure to third parties 36.6

Generally, the attorney–client privilege is waived if the holder of the privilege voluntarily discloses or consents to the disclosure of any significant part of the communication to a third party or stranger to the attorney–client relationship.[144] A third-party agent may have communications with an attorney that remain covered by the attorney–client privilege if the agent's role is limited to helping a lawyer give effective advice to the client.[145] Whether disclosure to external consultants will constitute a waiver will depend on the surrounding facts and circumstances, including the purpose for the disclosure and the involvement of counsel with that third party.[146]

United States v. Kovel is the seminal case concerning the bounds of attorney–client privilege with respect to third-party consultants.[147] In Kovel, a law firm employed an accountant who was held in criminal contempt for refusing to testify about his conversations with the law firm's client under a claim of privilege.[148] In considering whether the accountant had a basis to assert attorney–client privilege, the Second Circuit recognised that there are situations 'where the lawyer needs outside help', and found that when the accountant assists in the 'effective consultation between the client and the lawyer which the privilege is designed to permit', the privilege should protect the communications.[149] The Kovel court analogised the accountant's role to that of an interpreter, which is sometimes necessary for the attorney effectively to communicate with his or her client.[150] The Kovel doctrine has been recognised by many courts as protecting attorney–client privilege in circumstances where a third party has specialised knowledge or skills that assist the attorney in rendering legal advice.[151] To preserve attorney–client privilege in such circumstances, the consultant is typically appointed directly by counsel and works under counsel's supervision. The mere hiring of the consultant through counsel, however, will not automatically cloak the third-party communications in privilege, if the consultant is otherwise performing a business function.[152] Instead, the company must show that the consultant's involvement was indispensable to – or served some specialised purpose in facilitating – the legal advice.[153]

For example, a client's statements to a private investigator hired by the client's attorney are often protected by the attorney–client privilege when the investigator acts as an agent of the attorney.[154] Similarly privileged (as work-product) are an investigator's interviews to gather background information for the attorney.[155] If, however, the investigator is going to be a fact witness concerning the information he or she has gathered, then all aspects of the investigator's fact gathering may be open to discovery, including statements by third parties to the investigator and the underlying factual data gathered by the investigator. Therefore, any work-product privilege that might have protected that information is waived by virtue of the private investigator's decision to testify.[156]

Courts have also extended attorney–client privilege to include public relations consultants under certain circumstances.[157] In particular, communications with public relations consultants have been found to maintain privilege if the primary purpose of the communication was to aid in the rendering of legal advice.[158] Such communications are found within the bounds of attorney–client privilege if the consultant provides services necessary to promote the attorney's effectiveness in the client's legal representation or the consultant is essentially an extension of the attorney under agency principles, or both.[159]

See Chapter 38 on publicity

Even with this guidance, the extent to which public relations consultants come within the bounds of attorney–client privilege is often unclear. For example, in Calvin Klein Trademark Trust v. Wachner, a court in the Southern District of New York refused to extend the attorney–client privilege to protect documents and testimony sought from Robinson Lerer & Montgomery (RLM), a public-relations firm retained by counsel to Calvin Klein.[160] In so ruling, the court held, inter alia, that the 'possibility' that communications between counsel and RLM might help counsel formulate legal advice was 'not in itself sufficient to implicate the privilege',[161] and that extending the privilege to the documents and communications at issue would apply the privilege too broadly because RLM did not appear to perform functions 'materially different from those that any ordinary public relations firm would have performed'.[162]

A few months later, in In re Copper Market Antitrust Litigation, a different judge from the same district court reached the exact opposite conclusion regarding the same public relations firm, finding that RLM acted as the company's 'spokesperson' when dealing with issues related to a copper trading scandal, and frequently conferred with counsel.[163] Under these facts, the court found that RLM acted as the 'functional equivalent of an in-house public-relations department with respect to Western media relations' and therefore found that the communications between RLM, the company and counsel were made for the purpose of facilitating the provision of legal advice.[164]

Similarly, in FTC v. GlaxoSmithKline, the US Court of Appeals for the DC Circuit found that communications with a public relations firm were protected by the privilege.[165] In so ruling, the court adopted the Copper Market court's rationale, crediting a party affirmation that the consultant became an 'integral member of the team assigned to deal with the issues [that] . . . were completely intertwined with [the client's] litigation and legal strategies',[166] Hence, to improve the likelihood that communications with a public relations firm will be cloaked in attorney–client privilege, the firm should interact regularly with counsel, and act as an agent at counsel's direction.[167]

In sum, a party claiming the benefit of attorney–client privilege has the burden of establishing all of the essential elements to qualify for the protections of the privilege.[168] Consequently, an attorney who wishes to consult with a non-attorney professional must seek to establish that the third party's involvement will facilitate legal advice from the beginning of the engagement.[169]

To support its claim that communications with, and documents generated by, a third party consultant are protected under the attorney–client relationship, counsel should memorialise the nature of the consultant's engagement in a Kovel letter. Such a letter should (1) state that counsel is retaining the consultant to assist with the provision of legal advice to the client, (2) instruct the consultant about specific tasks to be performed in support of the provision of that legal advice, (3) state that all work-product generated under the scope of the engagement is the property of counsel and (4) instruct the consultant to maintain the confidentiality of all information received or created in the course of the engagement. Further, the consultant should be guided in his or her actions by the attorney, rather than independently by the client.

Disclosure to the company's auditors 36.6.1

The disclosure of attorney–client privileged information to a company's external auditors ordinarily constitutes a subject-matter privilege waiver.[170] To the extent that counsel anticipates that the company's external auditors may require information about the status of an ongoing investigation, counsel should be prepared to communicate with auditors in a way that will limit any waiver of privilege. For example, counsel may provide the external auditor detailed information about the investigative process – including the structure, the personnel involved, the document preservation steps that were taken, general information about the process of reviewing documents and conducting interviews, and external consultants employed to assist in the investigation – which may provide the external auditors with a level of comfort about the comprehensive nature of the investigative process, without waiving the privilege regarding the substance of the investigation.

And while the disclosure of privileged information to auditors will likely waive the attorney–client privilege, work-product protection may remain intact if the auditor's interests are found not to be 'adverse' to the client. For instance, in Merrill Lynch & Co v. Allegheny Energy Inc,[171] Allegheny sought to compel discovery of two internal investigation reports (prepared by counsel) that Merrill Lynch had disclosed to its auditor, arguing that the disclosure constituted a waiver of any applicable privilege.[172] The court disagreed, stating that the 'critical inquiry' is whether the auditors 'should be conceived of as an adversary or a conduit to a potential adversary'.[173] The court held that 'any tension between an auditor and a corporation that arises from an auditor's need to scrutinize and investigate a corporation's records and book-keeping practices simply is not the equivalent of an adversarial relationship contemplated by the work-product doctrine.'[174] Consistent with the Allegheny court's guidance, if the client cannot avoid disclosure of privileged information to its auditors, counsel may be able to argue in subsequent civil litigation that work-product protection remains intact under this principle.

36.6.2 Disclosure to foreign governments

When analysing issues of waiver surrounding productions to foreign governments, courts of the United States tend to focus on whether the production of privileged material was compelled or voluntary. Where the submission is compelled or where there was no opportunity to assert the privilege, United States courts will generally find that the privilege was not waived.[175]

36.7 Expert witnesses

Where government investigations involve complex financial transactions and other areas requiring specialised knowledge, counsel will often retain experts during the investigative stage to assist in their assessment of potential liability and in the building of the defence case. As with any external consultants, counsel should take steps to clarify that experts are being retained to assist counsel in their provision of legal advice, to maintain privilege over communications with the expert and their underlying analysis.

In the context of a criminal action that may follow an internal investigation, unless counsel determines that it would be advantageous to present expert analysis in conjunction with a report of its investigative findings to the government or regulatory authority, consulting expert materials will otherwise remain shielded from discovery as attorney–client privileged materials. If the defence intends to call an expert witness at trial, however, counsel may be obliged – at the government's request – to provide a written summary of the testimony that the defendant intends to offer at trial.[176] And while Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 16 contemplates that the expert's underlying memoranda and other documents created during the case investigation will remain protected from disclosure,[177] counsel will still be required to produce documents that may qualify as 'statements' of a testifying expert under Rule 26.2 prior to trial.[178]

In the context of civil litigation that may follow an internal investigation, however, expert discovery will be governed by Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26. Prior to 2010, there was a significant risk that any documents provided to a testifying expert witness would be discoverable under Rule 26, even if they were previously considered attorney–client privileged.[179] But the 2010 amendments to the rule made significant changes that strictly limited the discovery of communications between counsel and experts, including the discovery of draft expert reports. For example, Rule 26(b)(4)(B) was added to provide work-product protection for drafts of expert reports or disclosure.[180] In addition, Rule 26(b)(4)(C) was added to provide work-product protection for attorney-expert communications.[181] These amendments to Rule 26 were designed to protect counsel's work-product and ensure that lawyers may interact with experts 'without fear of exposing those communications to searching discovery'.[182]

Although the 2010 amendments provide significant protection for expert drafts and attorney–expert communications, counsel should still make efforts to limit the scope of potential disclosure by effectively managing a testifying expert's access to information and the development of the expert's opinions. For example, Rule 26 does not preclude discovery of facts or data provided to the expert by an attorney, such as fact work-product prepared for the expert by counsel.[183] Consequently, counsel should create an inventory of all factual materials provided to a testifying expert and ensure that all of such factual materials are accurate and final, and that such materials have been produced or are otherwise matters of public record. Further, where the committee notes accompanying Rule 26 extend to 'any materials considered by' an expert, counsel should ensure that all of the facts made available to a testifying expert are based upon the record in the case, rather than as the result of attorney–client privileged communications.

Finally, while the amendment to Federal Rule 26 protects drafts of expert reports from disclosure, state court rules of civil procedure may vary as to whether such drafts are discoverable. If there is any question as to whether drafts of an expert report may be discoverable, especially if the matter is pending in a jurisdiction governed by state law, it may be advisable to negotiate a stipulation that explicitly extends the protection of the Federal Rules to expert discovery.

Publicity: The UK Perspective

Edward Craven and Alex Bailin QC[1]

Overview 37.1

Publicity is an inevitable by-product of many investigations and criminal prosecutions, particularly in high-profile business crime cases. The potential adverse consequences of publicity for a corporation implicated in an investigation or prosecution – which include reputational damage, harm to relationships with customers, investors and employees, and the spurring of further investigations and interest by other investigating authorities – are self-evident and often significant.

Most individuals and corporations who find themselves caught up in an investigation or prosecution – whether as a suspect, defendant, witness or even victim – will therefore wish to limit the publication of information regarding their involvement. The extent to which English law will assist them in doing this will vary from case to case and will depend on a range of factors, including the nature of the information, the identity and status of the person seeking to restrict publicity, the nature and severity of harm that is likely to be caused if the information is published, the stage the investigation or proceeding has reached and the public interest in the underlying subject matter.

On the other hand, in some contexts a corporation may consider there is benefit in certain information about an ongoing investigation or prosecution being made public. In such cases, the corporation will need to be cognisant of the potential legal restrictions that govern the public disclosure of information regarding live investigations and criminal proceedings.

With these considerations in mind, this chapter examines the rules and mechanisms governing the publication of information about investigations and prosecutions.

37.2 The common law principle of open justice

As a general starting point, anyone hoping to facilitate or restrict the publication of information regarding an investigation, prosecution or related civil or regulatory proceedings will need to be mindful of the central role that the common law 'open justice principle' plays in the UK legal system. This is the rule that, '[w]ith limited exceptions, the English courts administer judgment in public, at hearings which anyone may attend . . . and which the press may report.'[2] As well as the requirement that hearings should take place in public, the open justice principle also includes 'the placing into the public domain of judicial decisions . . . and the obligation to ensure that evidence or information communicated to a court is presumptively available to the public'.[3]

The English courts have described the principle of open justice as 'one of the most precious in our law'[4] and one that is founded on 'the value of public scrutiny as a guarantor of the quality of justice'.[5] It serves two principal purposes: first, 'to enable public scrutiny of the way in which courts decide cases – to hold the judges to account for the decisions they make and to enable the public to have confidence that they are doing their job properly'; secondly, 'to enable the public to understand how the justice system works and why decisions are taken'.[6] In particular, the courts have stressed that: 'it is impossible to over-emphasise the importance to be attached to the ability of the media to report criminal trials.'[7]

The requirement of open justice is not limited to proceedings that take place before criminal courts: it extends 'to all courts and tribunals exercising the judicial power of the state'.[8] It therefore applies equally to criminal and civil courts and other bodies such as the Financial Reporting Council and other regulatory and disciplinary tribunals. Nor is the open justice principle confined to proceedings that take place in public. It may in some circumstances require information about proceedings in private (i.e. proceedings which the public and press are properly excluded from) to be put into the public domain.[9] The position in relation to criminal investigations, prior to the commencement of any court proceedings, is nuanced and is considered further below.

Although it is a longstanding principle of the common law, the significance of the open justice principle 'has if anything increased in an age which attaches growing importance to the public accountability of public officers and institutions and to the availability of public officers and institutions and to the availability of information about the performance of their functions'.[10] The principle has particular implications for the ability of the media to report on court proceedings: 'Since the rationale of the principle is that justice should be open to public scrutiny, and the media are the conduit through which most members of the public receive information about court proceedings, it follows that the principle of open justice is inextricably linked to the freedom of the media to report on court proceedings.'[11]

Open justice and the European Convention on Human Rights 37.3

Although it is a creation of the common law, the open justice principle is reflected in Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR), which entitles everyone to 'a fair and public hearing' of any determination of a criminal charge or civil rights and obligations. It is also reflected in the right to freedom of expression under Article 10, since 'the right to receive and impart information, which is guaranteed by article 10(1), may be engaged where measures are taken in relation to court proceedings to prevent information from becoming publicly available.'[12]

At the same time, the ECHR also contains other rights that may require the publication of information concerning individuals implicated in investigations or prosecutions to be restricted. In particular, Article 8 protects the right to respect for private and family life. Article 8 may also extend to business and company premises.[13] This right is engaged whenever anyone proposes to publish information about a person in respect of which that person has a 'reasonable expectation of privacy'. In such cases, the private information may only lawfully be published if this is a necessary and proportionate means of achieving a legitimate aim.

In addition, Article 6 provides that the press and public may be excluded from trials 'in the interests of morals, public order or national security in a democratic society, where the interests of juveniles or protection of the private life of the parties so require, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice.'

Derogations from open justice 37.4

While the open justice principle is a jealously guarded 'constitutional principle',[14] it is not absolute. First, Parliament has enacted various statutory restrictions on the open justice principle which limit what may be reported about certain court proceedings. Second, since the open justice principle is a development of the common law, the courts have an inherent jurisdiction to determine its scope and requirements.[15] Over the years the courts have recognised a number of circumstances where derogations from the open justice principle are permitted or required. For present purposes, the most pertinent exceptions are those required to give effect to the rights under Articles 2, 3 and 8 of the ECHR.

37.4.1 Restrictions on publicity where absolute rights are engaged

Articles 2 and 3 of the ECHR enshrine the right to life and protection from serious physical harm. The 'absolute' character of those rights means that they cannot be balanced against other 'qualified' rights such as the right to freedom of expression. Nor can they be balanced against countervailing public interests such as the importance of media reporting on court proceedings. Consequently, if the publication of certain information about an investigation or prosecution would expose an individual to a real risk of physical harm or death, then a court is required by Articles 2 and 3 of the ECHR to take effective steps to prevent that risk from materialising. (A court may, for example, make an anonymity order and take other associated procedural steps to protect the identity of a witness or party from a threat of violence arising from the proceedings.)[16] The court must, however, ensure that the extent of the interference with the media's rights is no greater than is necessary to protect against the risk of harm.[17] In civil proceedings, a variety of measures can be utilised to address such risks, including 'ring-fenced' testimony, which is heard in private and accessible only by a limited 'confidentiality club'. But such measures are necessarily more limited in criminal proceedings where the open justice principle is particularly strong and where the power to hear any part of the trial in private is very limited indeed.[18]

37.4.2 Restrictions on publicity where qualified rights are engaged

Where there is a conflict between the media's right to report on an investigation or prosecution and the Article 8 privacy rights of a person implicated in it (e.g. a defendant, suspect, witness or victim) then 'a balance must be struck, so as to ensure that any restriction upon the rights of the media, on the one hand, or of the litigants or third parties, on the other hand, is proportionate in the circumstances.'[19] In applying that balance, neither the right of the media nor the right of the individual affected by publicity has automatic precedence over the other. Instead, the court must apply 'an intense focus on the comparative rights claimed in the individual case'. The respective justifications for interfering with each right must be considered, and the proportionality of the respective interferences must be assessed.[20]

In carrying out that fact-sensitive evaluation, the court must pay close attention to the purpose of the open justice principle, the potential value of the information in question in advancing that purpose and, conversely, any risk of harm its disclosure may cause to the maintenance of an effective judicial process or to the legitimate interests of others.[21] In applying the open justice principle, the courts will generally proceed on the basis that the press 'should be trusted to fulfil their responsibilities accurately to inform the public of court proceedings, and to exercise sensible judgment about the publication of comment which may interfere with the administration of justice.'[22]

Suspects in criminal investigations: before charge 37.4.3

In recent years the English courts have recognised that suspects in criminal investigations who have not yet been charged with any offence have a legitimate interest in limiting publication about their status as suspects. Whether or not there is a reasonable expectation of privacy in a criminal investigation is 'a fact-sensitive question and is not capable of universal answer one way or the other'.[23] However, 'as a matter of general principle, a suspect has a reasonable expectation of privacy in relation to a police investigation'.[24] This is because:

> As a general rule it is understandable and justifiable (and reasonable) that a suspect would not wish others to know of the investigation because of the stigma attached. . . . If the presumption of innocence were perfectly understood and given effect to, and if the general public was universally capable of adopting a completely open- and broad-minded view of the fact of an investigation so that there was no risk of taint either during the investigation or afterwards (assuming no charge) then the position might be different. But neither of those things is true. The fact of an investigation, as a general rule, will of itself carry some stigma, no matter how often one says it should not.[25]

There is therefore a 'clear public policy . . . that suspects in criminal investigations should not be identified prior to charge'.[26] Similarly, the courts have held that the fact that investigators have conducted a search of a suspect's property does not, without more, deprive the suspect of their legitimate expectation of privacy:

> The circumstances of the execution of the warrant may, as a matter of practice, involve a certain compromise of the privacy of the investigation . . . but it does not follow from that that privacy rights should be automatically and totally lost. If there is a legitimate expectation of privacy before the search then the search itself would have to be carried out with a due regard to it (which is doubtless why, in practice, the police do not now identify who the subject of the search was, even if neighbours might know).[27]

It is important to note, however, that although the 'starting point' is that a suspect has a reasonable expectation of privacy unless and until they are charged, there may be 'all sorts of reasons why, in a given case, there is no reasonable expectation of privacy, or why an original reasonable expectation is displaced' even though a suspect has not yet been charged (for example, because there is a risk of harm to the public or because the identity of the suspect is already widely known to the public).[28] Also, the existence of a reasonable expectation of privacy is merely the starting point, and not the endpoint, of the analysis. Once a reasonable expectation of privacy has been established, the lawfulness of publishing that information will depend on whether publication is a necessary and proportionate means of pursuing some legitimate objective in the public interest.

These principles are reflected by the guidance on media relations issued by the College of Policing, which stresses that: 'The police service has a duty to safeguard the confidentiality and integrity of the information it holds and the rights of individuals to privacy.' The guidance explains:

> Suspects should not be identified to the media (by disclosing names or other identifying information) prior to the point of charge except where justified by clear circumstances e.g. a threat to life, the prevention or detection of crime or a matter of public interest and confidence.
> . . . . .
> Police will not name those arrested, or suspected of a crime, save in exceptional circumstances where there is a legitimate policing purpose to do so.[29]

The basic guidance of the Financial Conduct Authority (FCA) on publicity in criminal investigations is set out in the FCA Enforcement Guide 6.6:

> EG 6.6 Publicity during, or upon the conclusion of criminal action
> EG 6.6.1 The FCA will normally publicise the outcome of public hearings in criminal prosecutions.
> EG 6.6.2 When conducting a criminal investigation the FCA will generally consider making a public announcement when suspects are arrested, when search warrants are executed and when charges are laid. A public announcement may also be made at other stages of the investigation when this is considered appropriate.
> EG 6.6.3 The FCA will always be very careful to ensure that any FCA publicity does not prejudice the fairness of any subsequent trial.

The SFO's general guidance on the issue is as follows:

> We try to provide as much information as we can without compromising law enforcement work, prejudicing the right of defendants to a fair trial, or causing avoidable reputational damage or harm to individuals or businesses under investigation. In practice the amount of information we can provide, particularly about cases which are in the investigation stage, is usually very limited.

Before the Director decides whether to open an investigation, the SFO does not normally confirm or deny interest in allegations made against either companies or individuals. If asked, we would normally say no more than that we are aware of the situation and that we are monitoring it.

Once the Director has formally opened a criminal investigation, the position will change in the following circumstances:

(a) the company under investigation itself makes the information public. This normally happens when a publicly listed company is informed of our investigation and considers this fact to be market-sensitive information of which it must inform the market. In such cases the SFO will (usually in co-ordination with the company's lawyers) confirm the fact and focus of the investigation after the market has been informed, or

(b) there are operational reasons for announcing the investigation (such as a call for witnesses). Or,

(c) there is some other substantial reason why the announcement of the investigation would be in the public interest.

Once an investigation results in a decision to prosecute and a company or an individual is charged with an offence, we announce the relevant name and charges. This may happen at the time the individual or company appears in court in answer to a requisition.[30]

Suspects in criminal investigations: after charge 37.4.4

While a suspect is likely to have a reasonable expectation of privacy prior to a charging decision, the position changes if and when they are charged: 'a person cannot ordinarily have an expectation of privacy once s/he has been charged with a criminal offence.'[31] The College of Policing's media relations guidance explains:

Those charged with an offence should be named unless there is an exceptional and legitimate policing purpose for not doing so or reporting restrictions apply. This information can be given at the point of charge.

If charges are withdrawn before someone first appears in court, forces should proactively release this information as soon as possible in order to be fair to the person involved, especially if a case has previously been publicised.

In practice, in the absence of any applicable statutory reporting restrictions or a real risk of death or serious injury, a person who has been charged with an offence will be unable to prevent that information from being publicly reported by the media.

37.4.5 Persons who are named in open court

While a suspect who has not been charged with any offence is likely to have a reasonable expectation of privacy, the position is different if that person is named as a suspect or alleged perpetrator in open court. This is because the Supreme Court has held that 'there is no reasonable expectation of privacy in relation to proceedings in open court.'[32] Nonetheless, the Court also specifically contemplated that third parties (such as an arrested person who has not been charged) may apply for anonymity during the trial of another if they fear being named in open court – under common law powers, backed up with statutory reporting restrictions.[33]

Similarly, if information about a witness or victim of an offence is discussed in open court, in the absence of statutory reporting restrictions or a real risk of death or serious injury, the witness or victim is unlikely to be able to prevent the publication of that information, unless that person has obtained, in advance, anonymity from the criminal court to prevent their naming in open court during those proceedings. In this regard, the courts have acknowledged that although criminal proceedings may have a significant 'collateral impact' on non-parties, this is 'part of the price to be paid for open justice and the freedom of the press to report fairly and accurately on judicial proceedings held in public'.[34]

37.4.6 Uncharged suspects who are named in charges laid against others

There is no statutory or common law rule that requires a charge or indictment to include the names of uncharged persons accused or suspected by a prosecutor of being party to the alleged criminal activity. Such names can be supplied to the defendants without appearing on the face of the indictment. As noted above, however, once a person has been named as a suspect in open court, they lose any reasonable expectation of privacy they may otherwise have had. Accordingly, if an uncharged suspect learns that a prosecuting authority intends to name them in charges laid against another person (e.g. by naming them as an unindicted co-conspirator), they should consider taking urgent steps (including, if necessary, by seeking third-party anonymity, injunctive relief or appropriate reporting restrictions) to prevent their name being included in a publicly accessible charge sheet[35] or indictment or being read out in open court.

33 Ibid., at [18], [35].

34 Ibid., at [34].

35 The inclusion of information (e.g., a person's name) in a publicly accessible charge sheet or indictment is likely to be treated in the same way as if that information had been read aloud in open court.

Criminal proceedings: statutory reporting restrictions 37.5

Under English law, a number of statutory provisions automatically restrict the publication of reports on certain types of hearings or information relating to ongoing court proceedings. In addition, various other statutory provisions confer discretionary powers on the courts to impose reporting restrictions in certain situations.

Contempt of court and the 'strict liability' rule 37.5.1

Section 1 of the Contempt of Court Act 1981 (CCA 1981) establishes the 'strict liability rule', namely that 'conduct may be treated as a contempt of court as tending to interfere with the course of justice regardless of intent to do so.' The strict liability rule applies to any 'publication' that is 'addressed to the public at large or any section of the public'[36] and that 'creates a substantial risk that the course of justice in the proceedings in question will be seriously impeded or prejudiced'.[37] The rule only applies to publications made when proceedings are 'active' – which is the case if a summons has been issued or a defendant has been arrested without warrant.[38]

The upshot of these provisions is that once a suspect has been arrested or charged, no one may publish any statement to the public (or a section of the public) that creates a substantial risk of seriously prejudicing or impeding the course of justice in those proceedings. Such a risk may be created in a number of ways: for example by vilifying a suspect, by publishing prejudicial and inadmissible material (e.g. by revealing the defendant's prior criminal record) or by deterring witnesses from coming forward. No actual prejudice need be shown, merely the risk.

The strict liability rule is subject to an important exception in section 4(1) of the CCA 1981. Subject to the provisions set out below, anything said in open court in any civil or criminal proceedings (e.g. the testimony of a witness or allegations made by a defendant or prosecutor) may be published to the world at large, provided that the publication is a fair and accurate contemporaneous report of those proceedings and is published in good faith.

Section 4(2) of the CCA 1981 allows a court to order that any reporting on civil or criminal proceedings shall be 'postponed for such period as the court thinks necessary'. The power temporarily to postpone reporting only arises where this is necessary to avoid 'a substantial risk of prejudice to the administration of justice' either in those proceedings 'or in any other proceedings pending or imminent'. The power cannot be used to obtain a permanent injunction – if a person seeks permanently to prevent publication of a matter arising during trial, they will need to apply in advance under common law powers to prevent that matter from being aired in open court.

38 Ibid., at Schedule 1.

37.5.2 Automatic reporting restrictions which the court may vary or remove

37.5.2.1 Preparatory hearings

In certain cases involving serious or complex fraud or other complex cases, the Crown Court may hold a preparatory hearing for the purpose of identifying relevant issues, assisting in the management of the trial and considering legal questions such as joinder or severance of charges.[39] Automatic reporting restrictions prohibit the publication of reports of these hearings (or related appeals) until the conclusion of the trial. A judge may, however, disapply or limit the application of those automatic reporting restrictions.[40]

37.5.2.2 Pretrial rulings in the Crown Court

Section 40 of the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act 1996 (CPIA 1996) empowers the Crown Court to make binding rulings at pretrial hearings on 'any question as to the admissibility of evidence' and 'any other question of law relating to the case concerned.' Section 41 imposes automatic reporting restrictions that prohibit any report of a ruling made under section 40 (or proceedings on such an application) or any related varying or discharging order. The judge dealing with the application may, however, remove or limit those reporting restrictions.[41]

37.5.2.3 Applications for dismissal in the Crown Court

A defendant in an indictable-only case sent to the Crown Court may apply for the charge or charges to be dismissed on the basis that the evidence is insufficient for him or her to be properly convicted.[42] Automatic reporting restrictions prohibit any report of the existence of an unsuccessful dismissal application until the conclusion of the trial of the last defendant.[43]

37.5.2.4 Prosecution appeals

Part 9 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003 grants the prosecution various rights of appeal to the Court of Appeal in relation to a trial on indictment. This includes 39 See section 7 of the Criminal Justice Act 1987 (in relation to cases concerning serious or complex fraud) and section 29 of the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act 1996 (in relation to other serious, complex or lengthy cases).

40 See section 11 of the Criminal Justice Act 1987 and section 37 of the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act 1996. If the accused objects to the disapplication or limitation of those restrictions, the judge must hear representations from the accused and must only make such an order if satisfied that it is in interests of justice to do so. If an order is made, the accused's objections or representations must not be reported.

41 See section 40(3) of the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act 1996. As with preparatory hearings, if the accused objects to the disapplication or limitation of the automatic reporting restrictions that apply to pretrial rulings, the judge must hear representations from the accused and must only permit the reporting of such a pretrial ruling if satisfied that it is in the interests of justice to do so. If an order is made, the accused's objections or representations must not be reported.

42 See paragraph 2 of Schedule 3 to the Crime and Disorder Act 1998.

43 Paragraph 3 of Schedule 3 to the Crime and Disorder Act 1998.

appeals against rulings that terminate the proceedings and evidentiary rulings that significantly weaken the prosecution case. Automatic reporting restrictions prohibit any reporting of such appeals, although once again the Court of Appeal and trial judge have a discretion to disapply this.[44]

Discretionary restrictions regarding deferred prosecution agreements 37.5.3

Under paragraph 12 of Schedule 17 to the Crime and Courts Act 2013, a court may order that the publication of information by the prosecutor shall be postponed 'for such period as the court considers necessary if it appears to the court that postponement is necessary for avoiding a substantial risk of prejudice to the administration of justice in any legal proceedings.' In SFO v. Serco the court exercised that power on the basis that the SFO was continuing to consider charging individuals with offences arising out of the matters that were the subject of the deferred prosecution agreement (DPA). Since the agreed statements of facts contained material by which such individuals could be identified, the court ordered that publication of the statement be postponed until a charging decision had been taken (whereupon the matter would be revisited by the court seized of those proceedings).[45] The court exercised the power for a similar reason in SFO v. Tesco Stores Limited.[46] Subsequently, however, all the individual defendants were acquitted, and were aggrieved that the DPA, when eventually made public, effectively identified them and accused them of conduct of which they had been found not guilty. In SFO v. Rolls-Royce plc[47] the DPA statement of facts was made public before the SFO had made charging decisions in respect of individuals in the investigation. The issue of third-party reputational rights in relation to DPAs is likely to be revisited in subsequent DPAs.

Appeals against derogations from open justice 37.5.4

Section 159 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 gives a right to appeal to the Court of Appeal to any 'person aggrieved' by any order under section 4 or 11 of the CCA made in relation to a trial on indictment, any order restricting the access of the public to the whole or any part of a trial on indictment, and any order restricting the publication of any report of the whole or any part of a trial on indictment. Note, however, that a person who is aggrieved by the refusal of the court to make any reporting restrictions order has no statutory appeal right: the only remedy is to seek judicial review.[48]

37.6 Public access to information and documents from criminal courts

In addition to the right to attend and report on hearings held in open court (subject to any applicable reporting restrictions) the Criminal Procedure Rules and Consolidated Criminal Practice Directions recognise the right of the public (including journalists) to obtain access to certain information or documents from court records or case materials.

Any member of the public (including a reporter) may under the Criminal Procedure Rules apply for and obtain the following information from a criminal court: (1) the date of any hearing in public; (2) each alleged offence and any plea entered; (3) any decision by the court at any hearing in public; (4) whether the case is under appeal; (5) the outcome of the case; and (6) the identity of the prosecutor, the defendants, the parties' representatives (including their addresses) and the judge or magistrate by whom a decision at a hearing in public was made.[49] In addition, upon an application by a member of the public the court may direct the provision of 'other information about the case'.[50]

Members of the public and the media may apply for access to copies of other documents referred to during court proceedings. Access will normally be granted in respect of any document that is read aloud in its entirety (or which is treated as having been read aloud in its entirety) in open court. This includes opening notes, expert reports, skeleton arguments and written decisions by the court.[51] Other documents, such as materials from the jury bundles and exhibits, may also be made available to the public and media.[52] Those principles were recently reaffirmed by the Supreme Court, which held that the default position was that the public should be allowed access not only to the parties' written submissions and arguments but also to the documents that had been placed before the court and referred to during the hearing. But a non-party would have to explain why he or she sought access and how granting access would advance the open justice principle; the court would then have to carry out a fact-specific balancing exercise by weighing the potential value of the information sought in advancing the purpose of the open justice principle against any risk of harm its disclosure might cause to the maintenance of an effective judicial process or to the legitimate interests of others.[53]

The Criminal Practice Directions provide that where an application for access is made by legal representatives instructed by the media or by an accredited member of the media 'there is a greater presumption in favour of providing the requested material' and '[t]he general principle . . . is that the court should supply documents and information unless there is a good reason not to in order to protect the rights or legitimate interests of others and the request will not place an undue burden on the court.'[54] The Practice Directions add that: 'the rights of a defendant, witnesses and victims under Article 6 and 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights may also restrict the power to release material to third parties.'[55]

In addition to the right of the media and public to obtain information and court documents, a criminal court is also under a duty proactively to publish information about hearings due to be heard in public, including (1) the date, time and place of the hearing; (2) the identity of the defendant; and (3) 'such other information as it may be practicable to publish' concerning the type of the hearing, the identity of the prosecutor, the identity of the court, the offence or offences alleged and the existence of any reporting restrictions.[56]

An individual or corporation that is the subject of false and damaging reporting in connection with an investigation or criminal prosecution may have a claim in libel against the publisher. To establish liability for libel, a person must demonstrate that they have suffered, or are likely to suffer, 'serious reputational harm' as a result of the defamatory publication. In the case of a body that trades for profit, this requirement is only met if the publication 'has caused or is likely to cause the body serious financial loss'.[57] Under the so-called 'repetition rule', a person who reports a defamatory allegation made by another is treated as though they had made the allegation themselves.[58]

A publisher of a defamatory statement will have a complete defence if the statement is true, or if it meets the requirements of the defence of honest opinion[59] or publication on a matter of public interest.[60] In addition, a fair and accu-

57 Defamation Act 2013, section 1.

58 As Lord Devlin explained in Lewis v. Daily Telegraph Ltd [1964] AC 234 at [284]: 'For the purpose of the law of libel a hearsay statement is the same as a direct statement, and that is all there is to it.'

59 See section 3 of the Defamation Act 2013. The requirements for this defence are, in summary, that: (1) the statement was a statement of opinion; (2) the statement indicated, whether in general or specific terms, the basis of the opinion; and (3) an honest person could have held the opinion expressed on the basis of any fact that existed at the time the statement was published or anything claimed to be a fact that was published in a privileged statement published before the statement complained of.

60 See section 4 of the Defamation Act 2013. The requirements for this defence are, in summary, that: (1) the statement complained of was, or formed part of, a statement on a matter of public interest; and (2) the defendant reasonably believed that publishing the statement complained rate contemporaneous report of any proceedings before any court in the United Kingdom is protected by the defence of absolute privilege.[61]

It is generally difficult to obtain an interim injunction preventing a person from publishing a defamatory statement.[62] Given the potential size of a damages award for a serious libel, however, a well-founded threat to pursue libel proceedings may give a prospective publisher pause for thought before publishing potentially defamatory information.

37.7.2 Data protection

The publication of information about an identifiable living individual will constitute 'processing' of 'personal data' under the Data Protection Act 2018. Part 3 contains specific rules governing the processing of personal data by law enforcement authorities such as the police, SFO, National Crime Agency, Financial Conduct Authority and Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs. All processing of personal data for law enforcement purposes must be lawful and fair. Processing will only be lawful 'if and to the extent that it is based on law' and either the data subject has consented or the processing is 'necessary for the performance of a task carried out' by that authority. Accordingly, any decision by a lawful enforcement authority to publicise particular information about an individual's involvement in an investigation or prosecution will need to comply with these requirements.

See Chapter 40 on data protection

37.8 Public relations

Most corporations involved in a serious investigation or prosecution would be well advised to seek professional communications advice from specialist corporate communications consultants with specific expertise of managing the PR implications of criminal investigations or proceedings. Before doing so, however, it is important to be mindful that communications with such consultants are unlikely to be protected by legal professional privilege and could be the subject of compulsory production by law enforcement authorities or disclosure in related civil litigation.

See Chapters 35 on privilege and 39 on protecting corporate reputation of was in the public interest. For these purposes, if the statement was part of an accurate and impartial account of a dispute that the claimant was a party to, a court determining whether it was reasonable for the defendant to believe that publishing the statement was in the public interest must disregard any omission of the defendant to take steps to verify the truth of the allegation conveyed by the statement.

61 See section 14(1) of the Defamation Act 1996. Similarly, a fair and accurate non-contemporaneous report of court proceedings in public is protected by the defence of qualified privilege at common law: see Reynolds v. Times Newspapers Ltd [2001] 2 AC 127 at [196] and Kimber v. Press Association [1893] 1 QB 65 at [68], [69].

62 As Duncan and Neill on Defamation (Fourth Edition) explains at paragraph 26.02, 'the general rule is that an interim injunction will not be granted in a claim for libel or slander if there is any doubt as to whether the statement is defamatory. Nor will an injunction be granted where the defendant provides a statement asserting that he will be able to prove that the statement complained of is true or that he intends to rely on another recognised defence, such as qualified privilege or honest opinion, unless it is clear that any such defence will fail at trial'.

Publicity: The US Perspective

Jodi Avergun[1]

The US Constitution guarantees defendants in criminal cases the right to a speedy and public trial. It also guarantees all Americans freedom of speech and freedom of the press. In the trial setting, these constitutional rights are sometimes in conflict. For instance, although freedom of the press is guaranteed, media reports about a case can taint a pool of potential jurors or might allow sworn jurors to learn about matters not in evidence. Accordingly, lawyers practising in the United States must be aware of the multiple, conflicting rights that affect judicial proceedings. These rights include the public's right of access to trial proceedings,[2] the media's right to report what occurs in court,[3] the litigants' freedom of speech[4] and the defendant's right to a fair trial.[5] No one right is absolute, and each is limited by various rules and regulations.[6]

A lawyer's ethical obligations, for example, may limit the attorney's First Amendment right to speak publicly about a case. Under the American Bar Association Model Rules of Professional Conduct, which have been adopted, in whole or in part, by the vast majority of US jurisdictions, a lawyer who has or is participating in a matter must not make an 'extrajudicial statement' that 'will have a substantial likelihood of materially prejudicing an adjudicative proceeding in the matter'.[7] In federal criminal cases, prosecutors must also comply with these rules, as well as those published in the Justice Manual, which limits the information a prosecutor may disclose or the issues he or she may comment on.[8]

Apart from the rules prohibiting a lawyer from publicly commenting on a pending case, a lawyer's professional duty to keep client matters confidential may also prevent him or her from publicising information about a case.[9]

38.1.2 Investigatory and pretrial stage

During the investigative stage of the case, before charges have been filed, a court cannot limit an individual involved in an investigation from making public statements about the case. But because such statements can be used by a prosecutor against a defendant in a subsequent criminal proceeding (either as substantive evidence or to demonstrate that the individual waived his or her right to remain silent), lawyers often counsel their clients to exercise their free speech rights carefully, if at all. Prosecutors are more constrained, however. The Justice Manual provides that a prosecutor cannot make public statements about a case if there is substantial likelihood that the statement will materially prejudice an adjudicative proceeding.[10] Similarly, prosecutors, but not individual witnesses, are prohibited from disclosing any matters that occur before a grand jury.[11] Once charges have been filed, however, courts have greater ability to insulate their proceedings

11 Rule 6(e)(2) prohibits a grand juror, interpreter, court reporter, operator of a recording device, person who transcribes recorded testimony, attorney for the government, or person to whom a proper disclosure is made under Rule 6(e)(3)(a)(ii) or (iii) from disclosing a matter occurring from the prejudicial effects of any publicity.[12] A judge's failure to exercise this power may, under certain circumstances, violate a defendant's right to a fair trial.[13] In widely publicised cases, the local rules may authorise the court to issue orders governing extrajudicial statements by parties, witnesses and attorneys, and the seating and conduct of spectators, as well as the sequestration of jurors and witnesses.[14] Sometimes, litigants can attempt to prevent the public disclosure of private or prejudicial information prior to trial by filing their documents under seal and pursuant to protective orders.[15] However, because the First Amendment guarantees the public's right of access to governmental proceedings, sealed filings can only be made with the court's permission and upon a showing of necessity or that unfair prejudice might result from public dissemination. Accordingly, motions to seal proceedings are not lightly granted, and government lawyers in particular are severely limited in their ability to file motions under seal or to consent to their opponent's request to close proceedings.[16] Rather than seal proceedings or files, courts must consider whether a change of venue, jury sequestration or gag orders, among other techniques, would adequately protect the rights of the parties. For example, Judge Amy Berman Jackson, the judge presiding over the criminal case against President Donald Trump's former campaign manager, Paul Manafort, issued a gag order in the trial, barring anyone involved in the case from making public statements that might taint it. In her written order she stated that she wanted to make sure the trial was fair and that potential jurors were not influenced by pretrial publicity.[17] Upon a showing that pretrial publicity about the case will prevent the empanelment of an impartial jury or will otherwise prejudice the defendant, the defendant can move to have the case transferred to another district.[18]

38.1.3 Trial and post-trial stage

Because the right to an impartial jury is also guaranteed by the US Constitution,[19] a defendant may question jurors about their exposure to pretrial publicity.[20] In one of the most highly publicised cases in modern history – the 1995 murder trial of football legend O J Simpson – it took nearly two months to seat an impartial jury not prejudiced by the near-constant media coverage of the case. During jury selection, jurors were prohibited from reading the papers, watching television or even awakening to a clock radio.[21] In widely publicised cases, courts frequently permit lawyers additional peremptory challenges (beyond the number normally allowed), which allow lawyers to summarily disqualify a potential juror without providing a reason to the court.[22] During the trial, jurors may be sequestered to protect them from the prejudicial effect of media reporting.[23] In this day and age, the court may instruct jurors not to read or post information about the trial on social media and other internet forums.[24] A failure to allow for a fair trial or to protect the impartiality of a jury will result in a mistrial.[25]

Discovery of internal corporate communications 38.1.4

Issues of public access affect other areas of legal practice. Even where confidentiality of process and information is assumed, rules governing discovery in civil or criminal cases can lead to the disclosure of internal communications and records, even in sensitive investigations. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure allow for pretrial discovery that is far more expansive compared to other jurisdictions.[26] Specifically, Rule 26(b)(1) allows parties to conduct discovery of 'any non-privileged matter that is relevant to any party's claim or defense and proportional to the needs of the case'.[27] As a result, companies that find themselves subject to class-action or shareholder derivative lawsuits that result from internal investigations are often forced to hand over troves of potentially damaging internal corporate communications. For example, the shareholder derivative litigation against the board of the Walt Disney Company lasted more than eight years, and the extensive discovery produced a damaging factual record about the board's corporate governance practices that ultimately forced Disney CEO and board member Michael Eisner to resign.[28]

Civil discovery is not the only means through which seemingly confidential internal communications and records can become public. Many companies are forced to initiate or expand the scope of internal investigations after a regulator issues a subpoena or civil investigative demand for internal records. Additionally, certain public institutions, such as colleges and universities, are subject to public records laws that may require the institutions to release or publish documents both during and after the investigation.[29] And, increasingly, large-scale document leaks thrust internal corporate documents into the public sphere without warning.[30] The practical reality is that any organisation undergoing an internal investigation must prepare for the possibility that it will have to produce internal documents at some point.

30 For example, in 2007, an employee at HSBC Suisse surreptitiously downloaded client data from approximately 30,000 accounts and provided that data to French authorities. A portion of these files were then obtained through an international collaboration of news outlets and published in 2015 by the International Consortium of Investigative Journalists. See David Leigh et al., 'HSBC files show how Swiss bank helped clients dodge taxes and hide millions', The Guardian, 8 February 2015, https://www.theguardian.com/business/2015/feb/08/hsbc-files-expose-swiss-bank-clients-dodge-taxes-hide-millions?CMP=share_btn_tw.

Although a detailed description of all the defensive measures available to companies is beyond the scope of this chapter, a basic list should include confidentiality agreements to cover sensitive communications with third parties, protective orders (where available) to limit the scope and permitted usage of produced materials, and the careful maintenance of the attorney–client and work-product privilege during investigations.

See Chapter 36 on privilege

38.1.5 Consulting a public relations expert

Given the likelihood that the public may become aware of internal corporate communications relating to an investigation, many organisations (and some well-resourced individuals) resort to hiring a public relations expert to assist counsel during the course of an investigation. Public relations experts can serve a variety of functions, including preparing executives for public appearances during investigations, developing communications strategies around key investigation events (e.g., press conferences regarding investigation status), and planning for potential crises (e.g., a witness leaking the preliminary findings of an investigation prior to the investigation's completion). For many organisations, hiring a public relations expert to advise them during an internal investigation can be a foregone conclusion in the relentless 24-hour news cycle. Volkswagen, for example, hired three public relations firms based in three different countries to advise during its investigation of alleged emissions cheating.[31] During an investigation into potential corporate misconduct, special considerations arise when the public relations specialist works closely with legal counsel for the company. Frequently, questions of whether the attorney–client privilege applies to protect communications between lawyers and public relations experts arise during an investigation. Although the attorney–client privilege normally requires that the protected communication occur between a lawyer and his or her client and exclude third parties, in some circumstances the privilege extends to communications between a non-lawyer consultant and the lawyer's client. In United States v. Kovel, for example, the Second Circuit held that communications from the client to a consultant are privileged if they are made in confidence and 'for the purpose of obtaining legal advice'.[32]

Kovel, however, does not create a blanket privilege to protect communications between attorneys, their clients and public relations experts. Instead, after Kovel, courts determining whether to apply the attorney–client privilege to communications with consultants such as public relations experts have focused on whether the communications with the consultant were 'imparted in connection with the legal representation'.[33] For example, when Martha Stewart and her attorneys hired public relations consultants to assist them in dealing with the media in her high-profile insider trading case, the court protected those communications under the attorney–client privilege because the communications were made for the purpose of giving or receiving advice directed at handling Stewart's legal problems.[34] Applying Kovel, the court explained:

> [T]his Court is persuaded that the ability of lawyers to perform some of their most fundamental client functions – such as (a) advising the client of the legal risks of speaking publicly and of the likely legal impact of possible alternative expressions, (b) seeking to avoid or narrow charges brought against the client, and (c) zealously seeking acquittal or vindication – would be undermined seriously if lawyers were not able to engage in frank discussions of facts and strategies with the lawyers' public relations consultants.[35]

In contrast, the court in Haugh v. Schroder Investment Management found that the attorney–client privilege did not apply to a public relations expert retained for the plaintiff when the plaintiff could not show that the expert's services were 'anything other than standard public relations services' for the client, and were not necessary for plaintiff's counsel to provide the plaintiff with legal advice.[36] The conclusion to be drawn from these two cases is simple. To cloak communications with public relations experts advising clients in legal matters, the lawyer needs to retain the public relations expert, and the communications between the consultant and the client must be intended to assist the attorney in advising his or her client.

Social media as an investigatory tool and as evidence 38.2.1

For better or for worse, social media is more than just a tool for friends and family to connect and communicate. The prevalence of social media has created a continuously updated record that is increasingly used to investigate wrongdoing and that can be admitted as evidence in judicial proceedings.

With respect to investigative activities, whether by the government or private parties, social media users generally do not have an expectation of privacy.[37] However, some of the typical features of social media – for example, the fact that social media users generally have password-protected accounts and various privacy settings to control what information other users can view – have created some legal distinctions. Courts have distinguished between public and non-public postings and focused on a user's privacy settings when determining whether Fourth Amendment protections against unreasonable searches extend to social media content accessed by the government.[38] However, even where a user limited viewable postings to his or her 'friend network', the government is not precluded from seeking co-operation from one of the user's friends authorised to view the user's content.[39] Unlike investigators, private American lawyers are constrained by ethical rules in their use of social media. For example, the New York State Bar Association's Committee on Professional Ethics has ruled that 'friending' an investigatory target or opposing party, or instructing a third party to do so on the lawyer's behalf, is a prohibited act of deceptive conduct or making of a false statement.[40] Accordingly, for private lawyers, care needs to be taken in how social media content is collected and used.

From the standpoint of admissibility as evidence in a proceeding, social media content is not fundamentally different from other paper or electronic evidence. The same evidentiary considerations apply: to be admissible, the evidence must be relevant, have probative value outweighing its potential to unfairly prejudice, and be authentic and free of hearsay.[41] Some courts treat evidence from social media similarly to other types of evidence and require only a threshold showing of authenticity.[42] Other courts require evidence that affirmatively disproves the possibility that evidence from social media was sent or manipulated by anyone other than its putative creator.[43]

38.2.2 Social media and the jury

In jury trials, issues surrounding social media generally fall into two categories: lawyers using social media to screen potential jurors, and jurors using social media improperly during a proceeding.

In the pretrial process, lawyers are ethically permitted to screen jurors based on social media profiles. On 24 April 2014, the American Bar Association issued Formal Opinion 466, which clarified that the act of passively observing a potential juror's public social media information is not improper ex parte contact with a juror or potential juror.[44] However, a lawyer may not send an invitation or request to friend or connect with a potential juror to gain access to the potential juror's information. Social media websites that provide notifications to users when their information is viewed, such as LinkedIn, also do not constitute improper contact as long as the lawyer does not make an active request to view non-public information.[45] If defence counsel learns from internet research that a prospective juror has made misrepresentations during voir dire, counsel should bring this misconduct to the court's attention. Failure to do so could potentially result in a waiver and an impairment of the defendant's right to an impartial jury.[46]

During trial, jurors' use of social media presents a risk of mistrial. To address this risk, counsel may request jury instructions on the use of social media prior to commencement of trial. Formal Opinion 466 also suggests that courts deliver jury instructions on the use of social media 'early and often' and even 'daily in lengthy trials'.[47] This guidance comes as jurors have used social media to publicly discuss trial issues or access witnesses and litigants, which ultimately has resulted in remands, reversals and other judicial inefficiencies.

For example, in Dimas-Martinez v. State, a death row inmate's murder conviction was reversed and remanded, in part because of a juror's tweets during trial.[48] The jury received instructions at the beginning of the trial warning them not to tweet or use social media but a juror nonetheless tweeted at the conclusion of the evidence in the sentencing phase of the trial.[49] The defendant's lawyer notified the court, and the court questioned the juror.[50] The juror admitted to the tweet and promised to discontinue use of social media for the duration of the trial.[51] But even though the juror tweeted at least two more times, the trial court refused a motion for a new trial, finding that the defendant suffered no prejudice from the tweets.[52] The Supreme Court of Arkansas disagreed, concluding that the juror's tweets were impermissible public discussion of the case, and that the insubordination of the juror to the court's instructions contributed to the defendant's denial of a fair trial.[53]

38.3 Risks and rewards of publicity

38.3.1 Risks

High-profile criminal cases often generate media attention. And while courts may adopt judicial measures to limit the adverse effects of publicity, it may become so pervasive that it prejudices jurors' opinions regarding the question of guilt. In such cases, a court may declare a mistrial to protect the defendant's Sixth Amendment guarantee to have his or her case decided by an impartial jury.[54]

High-profile investigations spark widespread media coverage, not all of which may be accurate. In 2017, Robert Mueller was appointed as Special Counsel in a widely covered investigation into Russian interference into the 2016 US presidential election.[55] The investigation was widely reported on in the media. In one instance, BuzzFeed reported a story alleging that President Trump had directed his personal attorney Michael Cohen to lie on the president's behalf. The Special Counsel's office issued a statement in response saying that BuzzFeed's description of the events were inaccurate.[56] The investigation was plagued with allegations of inaccurate reporting, prompting the Special Counsel's office to issue a warning to reporters that, 'many stories about [the] investigation have been inaccurate'.[57]

In other extraordinary situations, defence attorneys may face disciplinary measures – the most severe of which is disbarment – for improperly engaging the media in a manner that prejudices the proceedings.[58] Prosecutors are held to a higher standard than civilian attorneys under the professional rules.[59] For example, in June 2007, Michael B Nifong, the North Carolina prosecutor who pursued a false accusation of sexual assault against three Duke University lacrosse players, was disbarred by the State Bar Disciplinary Commission for making inflammatory statements to the media in violation of Rules 3.6 and 3.8(f) of the State Bar's Rules of Professional Conduct, among other violations.[60]

Unpopular defendants can face extraordinary difficulties in managing publicity while seeking an impartial hearing, which can increase both the cost and complexity of the defence. An example of this situation is the prosecution of Martin Shkreli, a former pharmaceutical CEO and hedge fund manager who was convicted of securities and wire fraud violations stemming from losses suffered by investors in his funds and companies.[61] Prior to his arrest, as the then CEO of Turing Pharmaceuticals, Mr Shkreli unapologetically raised the price of a life-saving drug by 5,000 per cent[62] and became known in the media as 'the most hated man in America'.[63] Mr Shkreli's notoriety generated daily news coverage of his subsequent federal trial which, combined with his ill-advised attempts to personally manage the publicity, required the trial judge to issue orders addressing the media's and Mr Shkreli's potential influence on the jury.[64] Mr Shkreli was convicted on two counts of securities fraud and one count of conspiracy to commit securities fraud.[65]

Civil defamation claims may also follow highly publicised cases. When numerous women accused actor and comedian Bill Cosby of sexual assault, Mr Cosby and his team publicly denied the allegations and accused the women of lying.[66] Several of the alleged victims filed civil defamation suits against Mr Cosby. A federal judge in Pennsylvania dismissed one of the suits on the basis that Mr Cosby's statements did not support a claim for defamation under state law,[67] while Mr Cosby settled a defamation suit that was pending in federal court in Massachusetts.[68]

38.3.2 Rewards

When properly executed, tactical media coverage during an investigation or trial can counter negative public impression and alleviate prosecutorial pressure to bring charges. The public relations consultants hired by Martha Stewart in connection with her insider trading case focused narrowly on neutralising the media coverage that reached the prosecutors and regulators responsible for charging decisions so that they could make their decisions without 'undue influence from the negative press coverage'.[69] In ruling on the attorney–client privilege afforded to certain communications among Stewart, her attorneys and the public relations firm, the Court recognised the necessity of developing a communications plan in high-profile cases:

> Just as an attorney may recommend a plea bargain or civil settlement . . . so too an attorney may take reasonable steps to defend a client's reputation and reduce the adverse consequences of indictment . . . . A defense attorney may pursue lawful strategies to obtain dismissal of an indictment or reduction of charges, including an attempt to demonstrate in the court of public opinion that the client does not deserve to be tried.[70]

Given the importance of advocating outside the courtroom, it may also be beneficial for an attorney to exercise the right to reply under the Model Rules of Professional Conduct. Notwithstanding the prohibition at Rule 3.6(a) against extrajudicial statements that are substantially likely to materially prejudice a fair trial, Rule 3.6(c) permits a lawyer to make extrajudicial statements that protect a client from the 'substantial undue prejudicial effect' of recent publicity that was not initiated by the lawyer or the client to the extent that they are necessary to mitigate the adverse publicity.

Protecting Corporate Reputation in a Government Investigation

Introduction 39.1

Long gone are the days where remaining passive and silent while your client is dissected during a high-profile government investigation was the only sensible approach. You need look no further than the steady stream of such inquiries over the past three to five years to see that persuasive, careful communications – in conjunction with the legal strategy – are the soundest way to preserve and rebuild a company's reputation during a crisis and afterwards.

Of course, no two investigations are the same, and approaches to handling communications around them will inevitably differ according to, among other things, the jurisdictions involved, their media and political culture, and the particular agenda of the investigating authorities. So advice on communications strategy, just like legal advice, must be tailored to the circumstances.

Regardless of the tactics employed, the central objective of both lawyers and communicators is to achieve as successful an outcome to an investigation as possible, namely one that minimises lasting damage to a company's financial position, its reputation and 'licence to operate', and its brand and wider commercial standing. Communicators can work effectively with lawyers to respond to increasingly assertive and sophisticated strategies deployed by government entities, particularly since the financial crisis of 2008.

In that context, some overarching principles can be distilled from the practical experience of acting for companies faced with corporate investigations and crises. These principles are discussed in the pages that follow, addressing the need for close collaboration between communicators and lawyers on worst-case scenarios, planning for and executing disclosures about such investigations, the importance of keeping key stakeholders advised as much as possible, and the critical aspects of managing the endgame of an investigation.

See Chapters 37 and 38 on publicity

39.2 Planning for the worst

The right strategy for managing reputational impact through an investigation depends on a range of factors: the nature of the behaviour under investigation, the authority conducting it, the brand profile of the company, the industry in which it operates and any damage to the public or consumers.

Moreover, the history of every company is different, and how an investigation will play out in many cases turns on how it is perceived as a corporate and social actor. Is the fact of an investigation into, say, corruption allegations a complete surprise because of the company's sterling reputation, or will it be seen as the latest misstep of a recidivist? Equally important is appreciating the context of the investigation itself and whether, for instance, it may be enhanced, or even motivated, by the political agenda of a given government entity.

While understanding and appreciating these factors is critical to developing a successful communications strategy in the context of a particular investigation, one principle cuts across the approach to any investigation. In each case, companies that have planned ahead by developing and testing crisis communications plans fare better than those who have not. That is especially true where a company is involved in (and required to respond to) a dramatic, sudden, visually striking or fatal operational disaster, for example, an aeroplane crash or industrial accident, that subsequently triggers an investigation. But it applies equally to the unforeseen announcement of an investigation into issues, behaviour or incidents that may not have been in public view. These are all business-critical events. Knowing what to say and which lawyers and communications professionals to call in those first hours may be the difference between dealing with one crisis (the original incident) and several (the incident plus making up for legal and communications missteps taken in the heat of the moment) for months or even years to come.

Having a well-documented and well-understood crisis plan is also important even where the incident, and subsequent investigation, does not play out dramatically in real time. Investigations around corporate misconduct are an all too frequent example. It also pays to plan out these types of crises. For instance, and because discovery of corporate misconduct often has its genesis in internal investigations, companies typically have time to consider more fully how they will respond when the conduct eventually comes to light, and they should plan and test such scenarios. Even where there is less lead time – perhaps owing to a whistleblower's actions or a required corporate disclosure – there is inevitably some period for strategic preparation. In those moments smart companies turn to communications strategies that have been developed to be consistent with and to support their legal defences.

The 'disaster' scenarios are guaranteed to attract significant media attention and will require regular and active communications by a company. With other kinds of incidents that spawn investigations – such as those involving bribery and corruption allegations, accusations of misconduct in the manufacturing supply chain, or accounting irregularities – it is often hard to predict at the outset the scale of the impact a company may be facing, making it all the more important to take action as early as possible to plan for different scenarios and to engage the right professional assistance. What may seem like an isolated incident likely to be a 'one-day story' could turn into something far worse if, for instance, deep-rooted company processes, historical conduct involving similar issues, the seniority of individuals involved or multi-jurisdictional problems are at stake.

Needless to say, the more systemic a problem appears to be, the more damage it is likely to cause to the company's reputation. Even minor incidents can become reputational nightmares if they raise questions about the integrity of internal systems, compliance and ethics, culture, or management's control of the organisation. As a result, the tempting choice for management – either to deny there is a problem or to rush to give public reassurance that a problem is limited to one or two individuals – can dramatically backfire.

Likewise, where an incident directly contravenes a company's public image or the reputation of its brand, the stakes are inevitably raised. Fraud, bribery and corruption allegations will be problematic for any company, but all the more so if the company has publicly made a virtue of its ethical conduct.

Large multinational organisations are also always going to be at a disadvantage when it comes to garnering the sympathy of the public, particularly where there are identifiable victims of alleged misconduct or negligence. So, being prepared to get ahead of issues early is a critical aspect of any company's reputational defence.

Planning for the fallout of a government investigation – whether that is done before the fact as part of crisis simulations or other preparation (which is preferable) or as the matter is unfolding (which is not ideal, but often the reality) – requires close collaboration between the company's lawyers and its communications advisers. Few companies have in-house communicators with backgrounds or expertise in complex legal issues. So, just as a company will turn to external counsel on major legal matters, it should turn to outside strategic communications advisers in similar circumstances.

The best-prepared clients understand the value of having a fully joined-up approach where the key speakers for a company (lawyers, communications professionals, investor relations teams, government and public affairs professionals) can coordinate regularly to ensure that every angle, stakeholder and perspective is covered. Working together, these individuals can also help ensure that messaging is consistent and disciplined with respect to all strategically important audiences.

The ideal way to proceed in these scenarios is to establish integrated teams that include in-house and external counsel and communications advisers who can work together in preserving or rebuilding reputation as the investigation unfolds. Without an integrated team, there is always the risk that communicators may be tempted to proceed without fully understanding the legal strategy, and lawyers will view the public communications concerns of a company as less important than questions of legal liability and the eventual adjudication of the matter. These are problems that are only exacerbated where the situation is highly complex, fast-moving and public. Furthermore, without integration, the company's legal strategy may be forever undermined by inappropriate communications or the company's reputation may be lost for an extended period (perhaps even forever) if the company fails to communicate (or miscommunicates) during a crisis solely to preserve the legal arguments. For example, a lawyer not considering the communications aspects of a situation might advise a company to point to legal defences available to a corporation, such as intervening causes, contributory acts of a third party or negligence limited to low-level employees. While all might be valid (and eventually briefed and argued in court), thought should be given to how technical legal defences are heard by the public, by regulators, by investors and even by a company's employees. The goal should be to find ways to preserve the defences while communicating in ways that will be seen more positively by those stakeholders.

The benefits of synthesising communications and legal defence are legion. Communicators and others in regular contact with stakeholders can prove invaluable by providing the legal team with information, context and insights about how the investigation is perceived externally.

In addition to coordination, it is also indispensable to have in place sophisticated media monitoring tools throughout an investigation to track traditional media, social media and digital channels for any comments or interventions by investigating authorities, regulators, political voices and other relevant stakeholders. These include real-time reporting on news stories about the investigation and the company more broadly and monitoring or reporting on social media and blog discussions. Having alerts in place that go to all members of the integrated team to flag relevant developments for legal and public relations assessment is essential.

39.4 The key moments in any investigation

Having planned ahead and established the integrated team, the prudent company will need to prepare communications to manage external scrutiny and reputational impact on a number of occasions, but almost certainly at the following times:

- public disclosure of the investigation, whether that is initiated:
  - directly, by the prosecutor or investigator;
  - indirectly, through actions (such as a dawn raid, arrest or confiscation of evidence) that attract public attention;
  - by the company through legally mandated disclosures (such as in a securities filing) or otherwise; or
  - through a leak (deliberate or accidental) from any of the parties or individuals involved;
- high-profile comment on the progress of the investigation from interested stakeholders (media, analysts, investors, politicians, etc.);
- leaks of key documents or other information during the course of the investigation;

- the announcement of a settlement (or deferred prosecution agreement) and the initial response (which becomes an opportunity for the government to take centre stage);
- parliamentary or congressional hearings in parallel with an investigation;
- final decisions or judgments and the imposition of fines or other penalties; and
- court proceedings following an investigation.

In an ideal world, companies would have reasonable notice of any intention to launch an investigation, and particularly the intention of a regulatory body to comment publicly on proceedings. In practice, that often does not happen, especially where government investigators may perceive public relations benefits in making a surprise announcement.

In other situations, investigations will be launched in reaction to a media story, which means that the investigation, and more crucially the details of the allegations giving rise to it, will be public from the outset, and the affected company will necessarily find itself in a far more reactive mode.

If, by contrast, the company can self-disclose an issue or the existence of an investigation (particularly its own internal investigation), it will have an element of control over communications that is often absent where the government is making the decisions about announcements. Companies deciding to self-disclose may know the basic facts of the situation and have had time to work out the narrative to be presented in conjunction with the announcement. (In certain situations, it may even be possible to reach agreement on and coordinate such announcements with the authorities.) This period is a key window of opportunity for preparing the company's communications messages alongside ascertaining the company's legal position.

Another reputational issue to be considered is whether a company retains an independent investigator to conduct an inquiry into, for instance, ethical standards or compliance procedures, with the goal of having the independent investigator make remedial recommendations in advance of regulatory or prosecutorial authorities concluding their investigations. This step is not without its risks: many companies have found themselves in the position of making changes in the executive ranks because an independent investigator recommended it. But, in the appropriate circumstances, the appointment of an independent investigator can be extremely effective in helping position a company as seizing the initiative and communicating a sense that it is taking proactive steps to identify underlying problems while co-operating with an official external investigation. Should a company decide to proceed in this way, it will be an important moment to plan communications. Among other things (e.g., who to appoint and terms of reference), a company will have to consider whether it will agree to accept the recommendations of an independent agent, and whether it will agree to publish the resulting report, without reviewing them beforehand. In many cases, companies find that they have to do both. There is also the risk that if an investigator's report concludes with predominantly positive findings for the company, it will generate accusations of a whitewash despite the demonstrable independence of the investigator.

39.5 The impact of whistleblowers

Another issue that can have a significant impact on communications strategy is the presence of a whistleblower. Increasingly, whistleblowers go directly to a regulator or a media organisation to expose what they regard as improper conduct or other wrongdoing. In many cases, the company has no warning of the whistleblower's actions and may have had no opportunity to investigate the underlying charges, let alone devise a communications strategy. Moreover, given the disparity in stature of a corporation and a whistleblower, the strengthening of legal protection for whistleblowers in many jurisdictions and the media's tendency to give credence to whistleblower narratives, a corporation often finds itself at a disadvantage when responding to allegations of this sort: being seen to pick on the 'little guy' is never a winning reputational strategy.

Some take the view that, because many whistleblowers are disgruntled employees (or ex-employees), their motives are tainted. Others see whistleblowers as necessary and appropriate watchdogs to hold corporations accountable. Either way, companies must be very careful about deploying aggressive tactics to discredit them. Even where the whistleblower appears to be demonstrably compromised, a full frontal assault can backfire badly and introduce the perception that the corporation is a bully whose instinctive reaction is to lash out rather than accept the possibility that there has been a legitimate exposure of internal failures or wrongdoing by someone brave enough to speak out.

See Chapters 19 and 20 on whistleblowers

For all these reasons, the best (and often necessary) approach in most cases is for the company to respond to the sudden public emergence of a whistleblower with concern about the underlying allegations. The message must be put across clearly that the company is taking swift steps to investigate the allegations, that it takes seriously all allegations of the sort made by the whistleblower and that it has developed robust and effective procedures for dealing with concerns raised by employees.

39.6 Managing disclosures by regulators or prosecutors

Where an investigation is first made public by a government official such as a regulator, legislator or prosecutor, the company will have limited ability to influence the initial news cycle. The focus should turn immediately to trying to ensure that the subsequent reporting is balanced and fairly reflective of all relevant information. Of course corporations will also need to communicate with other stakeholders such as employees, business partners and shareholders through channels other than the media.

After disclosure of the investigation, a first question will be whether to react on the record. In most cases for companies, it makes sense to issue a holding statement – even if only to buy time. Telling the media that the company is reviewing the charges, allegations or statements and intends to co-operate with the investigation is not much, but it is better than making no comment because it conveys at least some action on the company's part. Depending on the coverage, that may be sufficient. Where the investigation is making a bigger splash, and particularly where it is proving unsettling to investors, staff and other key stakeholders, a more substantive response is often necessary once a proper evaluation has been completed.

Public companies may also be under legally binding regulatory disclosure obligations requiring them to confirm otherwise confidential investigations in market announcements. These may be helpful in ensuring the market does not overreact and that the news (with its potential consequences) can be reflected in the share price early. On the other hand, even where more limited disclosures, such as in the legal matters section of regular results releases or the annual report, suffice from a legal point of view, these may not be enough to prepare investors and other stakeholders for the real scale of what may come. The lawyers, communicators and senior leadership of the company should evaluate the best course of action. In any event, the disclosures will need to be kept under constant review.

Where it is clear that the worst is yet to come, it is generally prudent to take the longer view and disclose as much of the information about potential ramifications for the company as rapidly as possible, but with carefully considered language that indicates the company is prepared for and in control of the situation. Although it may seem counterintuitive, presenting the worst-case scenario clearly and rationally can take a lot of the 'fear factor' out of market and wider stakeholder reaction.

The reason for this is simple: the media and other interested parties will want to piece together a narrative about the matter, filling in what they do not get from official sources with either their own or other people's speculation. Where it is possible to get the information out early, the company can effectively take the wind out of the sails of the speculation by preventing the drip-feed of details over an extended period, shortening the period of negative media focus. Of course this strategy, if pursued, must always be non-speculative and undertaken in close consultation with legal counsel to ensure that public statements are as narrowly circumscribed as possible to avoid potential damage to the company's legal defence and misleading information reaching the market.

As well as public statements 'on the record', an additional question is the extent to which the company or its communications advisers assist media with 'off-the-record' guidance or conversations 'on background'. These terms refer to the basis on which journalists are given information and are then able to use it. Constructive engagement of this sort with trusted journalists from mainstream media publications can be a useful and effective tool for conveying internally approved (non-privileged) contextual information and trying to ensure that prejudicial or inaccurate material does not make its way into reporting or, if it does, that it is corrected before it gains currency. Whether to engage, and the type of engagement appropriate in any given instance, will vary depending on a host of factors, including the particular jurisdiction.

All of this means that judging the right amount of information to disclose and on what basis is a delicate skill, and the best statements or announcements will always involve considered input from counsel, communicators and executives. This close coordination will help to avoid situations in which company representatives say or do things at an early stage that will look ill-judged in the light of subsequent events.

In addition, companies typically do well to avoid antagonistic or overly defensive reactions to criticism from regulators. Experience suggests that it is often better to be more circumspect, even if the company feels that criticism directed toward it is inflammatory, contentious or unfair. Snap reactions can lead to embarrassing climb-downs, especially when negotiated settlements may potentially be in the offing.

The best principle is to prepare for the worst while hoping for the best. Time spent preparing a toolkit of materials at an early stage will save time later on. If the company has prepared a crisis plan in advance – as discussed above – some of these materials will be readily to hand; others will be specific to the investigation and will typically include:

- process timelines (with trigger points for media and political interest);
- internal and external Q&As;
- script points for customer relations;
- draft statements;
- stakeholder maps (charting the state of engagement with or understanding of influential parties);
- leak strategies; and
- information on the company's contribution to key territories and its broader social purpose.

These materials can always be revised as the situation evolves and should form the basis for any content that the company needs or wants to publish about matters relevant to the investigation or its subject matter. Content is essential in corporate communications, especially given ever increasing demands for information in a fast-paced multimedia environment and the appetite for digitally accessible material. It is the communicators' job constantly to think creatively what materials may be needed for various purposes and for which particular channels, and to work with the legal advisers to ensure the messaging remains consistent with (and not a risk to) the company's legal position.

Legal counsel and communicators need to be sensitive to the complex dynamics in these situations, including the client's state of mind. Often the company's instinct is to push for robust public expressions of innocence and determination to fight the allegations. They may feel they are as much victims as anyone else in the drama, on the grounds of having been let down by subordinates or dragged into a situation they feel they could never be expected to have known about. Equally, too, they may find it hard to go along with the pragmatism of advisers who have more experience of managing these situations.

From a communications perspective, part of the pragmatism is understanding that there are no quick wins when an investigation is announced. It is the start of a potentially long process – a marathon not a sprint, with varied periods of intensity and activity. The company should be prepared for that and to dig in for a prolonged period.

It may seem obvious, but paying attention to stakeholders other than the government and media is critical during an investigation. These include senior management, non-executive board members, investors, industry analysts, other government agencies with which the corporation interacts or that regulate it, business partners, suppliers, lending banks, customers or clients, and staff. Investigations can consume large amounts of precious management time, but the business must continue, and be seen to continue, to function day-to-day. Maintaining morale and keeping problems in perspective are vital. Business-as-usual communications are something senior management neglects at its peril.

For that reason, even where there are restrictions on what can be communicated, particularly during negotiations to resolve a matter, it is important to have a properly developed and approved set of messages that can be used to ensure that interested parties have a basic understanding of the situation, and are clear that it is being handled properly and professionally. A well-crafted announcement for internal or select external audiences need not say all that much to pay dividends in creating support and a sense of inclusion at a difficult time.

Negative headlines and unhelpful speculation can adversely impact staff morale and unsettle clients or customers, particularly if certain products or sales practices are under investigation. Equally, there can be an opposite danger – that well-intentioned but misinformed parties feel they are doing the company a favour by weighing in, either through a public intervention or by leaking information without appreciating the implications of their actions. For both these reasons, proactive communications to affected or interested parties are worthwhile.

Whatever the type of communication, the essential touchstone is consistency of the message. While particular points may be emphasised more or less for each particular audience (what needs to be highlighted to investors may not be as relevant to clients or government contacts), there must be no contradictions or tensions in the core position of the company. This is again a key reason for coordination between lawyers and communicators: to ensure that the words used are approved for both internal and external use. Inconsistency in the messaging conveyed can cause real difficulty for companies, especially where a specific legal position has been agreed with investigating authorities and external communications are released that conflict with it.

Managing leaks 39.8

Although the substantive findings of investigations in virtually all jurisdictions are likely to be confidential until they have been concluded, leaks can occur for a variety of reasons. Generally, there is little in practical terms one can do to prevent them. In judging what, if any, strategy to deploy in response, it is again important to take a long view. It may not be ideal in the short term for a particular story to run; but coming out strongly against it may not help credibility and can store up problems for later when the company wants to be focused on rebuilding its reputation.

In any event, as set out above, having agreed adaptable leak strategies in place will be an important part of communications planning.

39.9 Role of third-party advocates

During investigations and related crises, third parties can often be helpful sources of commentary and information to articulate the company's point of view – especially where there is media appetite for commentators and 'talking heads'. Media and market analysts often need help understanding complex matters – both the substance and the process – and they frequently turn to industry experts, academics, former executives in the sector or even business partners. Communications professionals can be vital in developing these third-party sources and, in consultation with legal counsel, making sure they understand how to be helpful instead of harmful. In turn, those third parties can be invaluable in shaping coverage and external reaction, ensuring that the company's position is properly understood, and closing down unhelpful speculation before it gains currency and becomes established as 'fact'. In short, it is often useful to have a third party to steer media and other commentators to when it comes to reflecting or defending the company's position.

39.10 To fight or not to fight

At some point in every investigation or subsequent litigation comes the question whether to continue fighting or to settle. Companies, their lawyers and their communicators do not always see eye-to-eye on the right approach, and that will always depend on the circumstances. But companies would do well to understand the difference between what might get results in legal proceedings and what is convincing in the public arena. A perfectly valid legal strategy might actually alienate public opinion if, for instance, it sounds like an attempt to evade sanctions for serious moral or ethical failings by dint of a technicality. In those cases, litigating – even to victory – might do more long-term damage to the company's reputation than an early settlement would have. Which is not to say that the company should not fight – it should just think through the ramifications of doing so.

In some cases, it may be preferable from a reputational standpoint to acknowledge missteps and seek to resolve the matter early. Where this course includes a clear plan for dealing with any wrongdoers and a remediation plan, it can pre-empt the investigation's findings and help to draw a line under the issue. Often such a step can be beneficial in more ways than one, since plans like these are typically required when resolving a government investigation.

The concept of co-operation is obviously also a key element in handling investigations – from both a legal and a communications perspective. Companies may well assert that they have been and are being open, co-operative and transparent with investigators. But difficult issues can arise – especially in criminal investigations – when a company is either directly pressured to disclose material it considers is legally privileged or otherwise feels compelled to do so to demonstrate the extent of its co-operation with the investigation. Public tensions or arguments with investigating authorities about privilege tend to favour the authorities themselves because it is easier for them to create the impression that the company is being obstructive in refusing to give them the documents they have asked for than it is for the company to explain to the media and other parties why it believes privilege obtains, why privilege matters as a fundamental right and why assumptions should not be made about a refusal to waive it.

The point may be academic in circumstances where, as happens more and more often in the United States at least, the government insists on a waiver in deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs) (which have more recently been introduced in the United Kingdom) or a criminal plea – although a waiver may not necessarily be a precondition of a DPA.

Ultimately a company will make this decision after careful deliberation based on all the circumstances, including the legal and financial implications of a refusal to waive and the possibility of prolonging or expanding the investigation. But where it feels that it has no real option, the release of privileged documents will then need to be considered in the context of communicating about the investigation.

When it comes to positioning a company for announcement of the outcome of an investigation, several factors need to be considered. In the run-up to the announcement, the legal team needs to coordinate closely with communicators to make sure that any public statements are properly aligned with the agreed facts of the case. This is obviously paramount where companies have entered into DPAs with the authorities in which they are bound by prohibitions on making – or authorising lawyers, officers, directors, employees, agents or subsidiaries, etc., to make – any public statements contradicting the agreed statement of facts about the company's conduct. Procedures need to be in place to ensure that anyone speaking on behalf of the company – either in connection with the announcement or in other media or public stakeholder engagements (e.g., financial results presentations) – knows what it is permissible to say.

More broadly, so much of the approach to positioning an investigatory decision depends on the nature of the investigation, the sanctions or remedies imposed and the consequences for the particular company. Key questions will be:

- What are the core communications materials that the authority is itself planning to release or distribute on the day of announcement? Will it just be, for example, a press release with a copy of any relevant decision notices, rulings or agreements?
- How does the authority intend to choreograph it? Will there be a press conference and background briefings? Will the authority's leadership be giving news interviews for print and broadcast media?
- Where an investigation has involved more than one authority (domestically or cross-border), will the lead authority lead the communications? Are the authorities coordinating on communications?
- What is the range of sanctions against the company? Is it just a fine (which is likely to be the media focus)? Or are there other remedies – remedial compensation schemes, disgorgement of profits?
- How do the sanctions compare with other similar high-profile cases in size and scale?

- What are the potential consequences of the sanctions for the company?
- What are the other conditions attached?
- Is there a right of appeal?
- Are there likely to be satellite civil litigation proceedings or criminal prosecutions, perhaps against specific individuals?
- Will there be political reaction to the decision? If so, by whom?

Investigators, prosecutors and regulators know only too well that the opportunity to announce a big settlement against a corporation is their day. Their narrative will be taken to be the definitive account and will stand for official purposes as the public record. Seeking to contest that narrative where appeal is unavailable or unlikely is often not recommended (and may be forbidden), particularly as any attempt to contextualise, mitigate or otherwise play down the gravity of the misconduct is likely to backfire in reputational terms.

Nonetheless, a well-developed plan to position the settlement is a must for the company. A number of factors will need to be considered in the plan. In some cases, regulators will expect the company to issue statements expressing contrition, also perhaps setting out consequences for key individuals. This may entail resignations of senior management or board members. Even where this is not an express condition of a settlement, it is often the only credible response. Media and politicians may also expect there to be financial consequences for management who remain. Whatever the particular case, the company's statement will need to draw a line under the matter by conveying a concerted sense of moving forward. This can usually best be done as much out of the limelight as possible – press conferences or interviews with senior management, for example, can often force the company to go back over the very issues it is trying to put to bed.

Share price movement following an announcement will indicate how the market greets the result for public companies, and the impact may not necessarily be negative. The share price may even go up if shareholders broadly expected or are relieved at the result and welcome an end to the uncertainty of a prolonged investigatory process. But there may nonetheless be genuine questions that investors or other stakeholders will want answered. Given the size of some of the post-2008 settlements in the financial sector, investors have had legitimate questions about financial impacts and funding for the required payments.

In some cases, banks have had to announce capital raising measures to plug gaps left by fines. In these circumstances, companies need to have a clear plan in place for addressing all their key audiences, including (for public companies) capital markets through regulatory announcements. In addition, staff morale and relationships with certain customers may have taken a bad knock and may take concerted efforts by management over a long period to repair. Large customers and shareholders will need contacts at the right level of seniority. The roll-out plan will help to ensure that these conversations are properly sequenced to fit any public communications as well as internal briefings to both senior staff and line managers, who will in turn have to speak to key stakeholders.

Rebuilding a company's reputation actually starts the moment an investigation is first reported and continues throughout, including at the announcement of an outcome and beyond. Regardless of how the media perceives each of these points in the road, difficulties will arise if the company is seen to have failed to address or be addressing issues adequately. In such cases, other voices, such as politicians or investors, may start to wade into the conversation, raising the pressure on the company. In such situations, the only way to resolve the situation definitively may be to take steps that the company had hoped to avoid and to take them in circumstances where those measures will be seen to have been forced on the company.

Even if the headlines fade quickly, memories tend to linger. Companies care about their brands and reputations, so they will need to devote significant time, thought and energy to repairing damaged relationships and restoring trust. In many cases, the remediation plan will require difficult actions or statements that convey genuine remorse and a desire to change on a cultural level, and potentially some more practical measures to repair specific failings in procedures and controls. The goal will be to move the company from being seen as part of a wider problem and position it as a proactive part of the solution.

To achieve that outcome will require an honest appraisal of the mistakes and a determination to do what is necessary to rectify them. Serious polling and data-driven analysis will help identify where exactly the reputational damage lies and also help track success in tackling those issues and clawing back trust. Crucial and often forgotten is the need for extra vigilance to ensure that the company avoids committing further errors. In the recovery period, even the slightest issue risks being blown up and setting the company even further back. It is important, too, that the chief executive owns the reputation recovery plan and that he or she and everyone else involved understands that actions really do speak louder than words.

Summary: 10 key considerations 39.13

In summary, and drawing on the above, the following is a practical checklist of communications considerations to bear in mind when navigating an external investigation:

1 Context: Understand the company's backstory and track record, as well as any political agenda of the investigating entity.
2 Planning: Undertake as much advance planning as possible, preferably through crisis exercises, and preparation and planning.
3 Integrated teams: Put together a core integrated team to ensure that the legal advisers are plugged into the communications function and other key functions (e.g., investor relations, public affairs).
4 Active monitoring: Have in place monitoring tools to track continuously for media coverage, both traditional and on social media channels. Information about who is commenting on the process or wider debate, influencing opinion and affecting the climate, is essential.

5 Core content: Content is king. Put together a core suite of materials that can be continuously updated as events change – process timelines, key messages, Q&As, holding statements, stakeholder lists and general information about the company's contribution to key territories and overseas markets. Consider creating public-facing content that can be accessed or distributed digitally via the company's communications channels.
6 Consistency of message: Ensure there's consistency of messaging – jointly developed by the legal and communications teams (with input from other functions) – around key moments in the investigation, especially the final outcome.
7 Stakeholder management: Consider what the company's most immediate key audiences (beyond the media) understand about the investigation and its implications for them, and what the company can say to keep them informed: senior management, non-executive board members, investors, industry analysts, other government agencies with which the corporation interacts or that regulate it, business partners, suppliers, banks, customers or clients, and staff.
8 Third-party advocates: Identify third parties who can potentially provide helpful comment about the process or about the company more generally: industry analysts, former executives in the industry and business partners. Equally, know the company's enemies and who might weigh in against the company's interests.
9 Business as usual: Convey a clear sense that the company is in control of the investigation and that the leadership is focused on the process of getting on with day-to-day business.
10 Reputational rebuild: Consider throughout the investigation what the company may need to do to communicate genuine cultural or behavioural change, using the investigation outcome as a pivot point for building the company's reputation.

Data Protection in Investigations

Stuart Alford QC, Serrin A Turner, Gail E Crawford, Hayley Pizzey, Mair Williams and Max G Mazzelli[1]

Introduction 40.1

Data protection law is a misleading term because the relevant framework will be a combination of employment, whistleblower, criminal and privacy laws. Companies and practitioners must navigate domestic and international legislation that touches on data protection, while ensuring they stay on the right side of regulatory and prosecuting agencies and co-operate with them to the extent that it is of benefit.

Handling data about individuals has become increasingly complex, particularly where the data protection regimes in different jurisdictions appear to be imposing conflicting obligations on data holders.

This chapter will look at both UK (including some European) and US laws and how they frame issues around investigations and data protection. We will look at internal investigations and those conducted by authorities, and provide some specific guidance in respect of data protection and whistleblowing regimes.

In the United Kingdom, a balance must be struck between a company's compliance and regulatory obligations that require the processing of data as part of investigations, and the protection afforded to individuals caught up in those investigations, primarily under the European General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) and UK Data Protection Act 2018 (DPA 2018). UK laws governing the interception and monitoring of communications may also require navigation in the context of internal investigations. Although legislation protecting individuals' data has existed for years, the increased sanctions for breaches under the GDPR (maximum fines being the higher of €20 million or up to 4 per cent of annual worldwide turnover), and increased regulator focus on data privacy, means that those conducting investigations must take the protections afforded to individuals more seriously than they did previously. The GDPR (which took effect on 25 May 2018) largely consolidated the previous European data protection regime and sought to harmonise the position within the European Union, but it does not necessarily simplify the issue between Member States. Each Member State may have its own laws in place as long as the basic standards of the GDPR are met; the GDPR is a floor and not a ceiling.

Furthermore, the GDPR not only catches EU corporations and global company groups with an EU presence (including their use of personal data outside the European Union to the extent that use is intrinsically linked with their EU activities), but also affects any corporations outside the European Union and with no EU presence that actively offer goods and services to, or monitor the behaviour of, individuals within the European Union, even if the data is stored outside it.

In the United States, there is no uniform, omnibus federal privacy regime comparable to the GDPR. However, a patchwork of federal and state privacy laws may come into play in an internal investigation, particularly in the context of reviewing and collecting employees' electronic communications. To minimise legal risk, companies should provide employees with clear notice that their electronic communications stored on company systems or devices are subject to monitoring and search.

Given the GDPR's extraterritorial reach, US and multinational companies may have to grapple with GDPR compliance obligations in conducting an internal investigation or responding to criminal or regulatory investigations. Where a US or multinational company's obligations to comply with US legal demands for personal data conflict with the GDPR's limits on the processing and transfer of that data to the United States, the company must assess whether it can lawfully transfer responsive data to the United States that is subject to the GDPR. If not, the US or multinational company may need to negotiate with the requesting legal authority to narrow the scope of the request or to develop other ways of resolving the legal conflict. Where the conflict cannot be resolved, the US or multinational company may need to consider challenging the request on comity grounds, although such challenges have rarely succeeded in the context of criminal or regulatory investigations.

40.2 Internal investigations: UK perspective

Internal investigations will inevitably deal with personal data, particularly employees' data, and in the United Kingdom this is governed by the GDPR and DPA 2018. For those conducting internal investigations, the key obligations to consider are (1) transparency, namely the requirement to inform individuals about how their personal data is being used (unless there is a relevant exemption), (2) data minimisation, namely the requirement to ensure that use of personal data for the investigation is proportionate, (3) establishing a legal basis for the processing of personal data, as prescribed by the GDPR (consent and legitimate interest are two of the legal bases companies and practitioners can commonly rely on to process data in an internal investigation), (4) if relevant, establishing a relevant condition on which to process any 'special categories' of personal data or any criminal offences data involved (in addition to a legal basis for the processing), and (5) if personal data will be transferred, or accessed from, outside the European Union, ensuring a legal basis for that data transfer, as prescribed by the GDPR (in addition to a legal basis for the underlying processing).

The GDPR and DPA 2018 require relevant organisations to inform individuals in advance about how their personal data is processed, in a clear and accessible manner, and prescribe the minimum information to be provided.[2] This forms part of the wider GDPR principles of transparency and fairness, which seek to prevent organisations from using data in ways that are detrimental, unexpected or misleading to individuals. Meeting these obligations in the context of internal investigations can present practical challenges if an organisation does not have a comprehensive monitoring policy, as use of employees' personal data for investigation purposes may well be detrimental to, and unexpected by, those employees.

There are certain exemptions under the DPA 2018 to the specific obligation to provide minimum information to individuals. (The exemptions do not apply to the requirements to process personal data transparently and fairly.) When collecting personal data directly from an individual, organisations are not required to provide data protection information that the individual already has. This may be relevant for organisations conducting investigations into, or involving, their employees and using personal data the organisation has obtained from them, if the organisation already provides some level of privacy information to them. A wider range of exemptions are available in circumstances where the personal data is obtained from other sources. The most relevant in the context of internal investigations apply if providing the information to the individual would be impossible or would involve disproportionate effort; providing the information to the individual would render impossible or seriously impair achievement of the objectives of the processing; or the organisation is required by law to obtain or disclose the personal data (which necessitates a binding legal obligation, rather than, for example, compliance with a non-binding code of practice or an informal, non-binding regulator request).

In addition to the transparency principles under the GDPR, the UK's regulatory framework for communications monitoring also requires organisations to be transparent with employees about the interception and monitoring of their communications (both in written policies and also in consistent business practices). Taken together in the context of internal investigations, the data protection and communications regimes oblige organisations to be clear and open with employees about how their personal data and their communications are used, and to ensure that any interception and subsequent review, use and disclosure of data and communications in an investigation is both lawful and proportionate. Robust, clear and accessible data privacy information notices for employees, as well as policies on employee monitoring, will provide a valuable shield against claims of employee privacy infringement and non-compliant monitoring practices – at least in the United Kingdom.[3]

2 This minimum information includes, among other things, the purposes of the processing, the lawful basis for the processing, the recipients or categories of recipients of the personal data, details of data transfers outside the EU and applicable data retention periods.

40.2.2 Data minimisation

The GDPR principle of data minimisation should be applied by organisations across their personal data activities generally, including internal (and external) investigations. Organisations should ensure that the collation, review, use and disclosure of individuals' data during the investigation is proportionate and no more intrusive than is necessary to achieve the legitimate purposes of the investigation. This will be relatively straightforward for clearly defined and focused investigations, but may prove more challenging to assess in practice in wide-ranging investigations requiring significant levels of data for loosely defined purposes. Organisations would be well advised to document the investigation's scope and associated personal data proportionality assessment, to demonstrate that data minimisation principles have been applied. Practical safeguards to ensure proportionality should also be applied, such as appropriately limiting the scope of documentation, email and communications review and disclosure (limiting impacted custodians and individuals, using key word searches and time periods to identify relevant information, etc.).

40.2.3 Legal basis for data processing: consent

Consent from the individual provides a legal basis for the processing of that individual's personal data, provided the GDPR consent conditions are met. The GDPR establishes a higher standard for consent for the processing of personal data than the Data Protection Act 1998 (DPA) it replaced.[4] Consent must be given clearly and in plain language and must be an affirmative act – consent cannot be given by inactivity, such as pre-ticked boxes in an online form.

In the typical employer–employee context of an internal investigation, the concept of consent being freely given is a complicated one. Given the dynamic, some jurisdictions consider that consent from an employee to an employer may never be freely given, a position exacerbated in an internal investigation by the added element of potential wrongdoing by the employee or another individual, and tipping-off considerations. Investigators should ensure they comply with the GDPR, either by getting express consent from the data subject to process their data, which may not be feasible in an internal investigation if it cannot be considered freely given or because the organisation does not want to notify the individual of the investigation (blanket clauses in employment contracts will no longer be enough), or by relying on one of the other lawful bases under the GDPR (discussed below) to lawfully process the data.

3 The position in a number of other European jurisdictions (including France and Germany) is considerably more protective of employee rights and restrictive of an employer's ability to intercept or review communications or to access employee devices.

Legal basis for data processing: legitimate interest 40.2.4

The GDPR provides a number of other legal bases for the processing of personal data in certain circumstances.

Under the GDPR, an organisation can consider the legitimate interests of a third party or public interest, as well as its own legitimate interests, when assessing the use and processing of personal data.[5]

In an internal investigation, this ability could allow an organisation to rely on the lawful basis of legitimate interests (of a third party or public interest) to process personal data. The rights of individuals can, however, override a legitimate interest, if the effect on an individual's interests or fundamental rights override the organisation's (or a third party's) legitimate interests.

The UK's Information Commissioner's Office (ICO) enforces data protection legislation and has stated: 'Legitimate interests is the most flexible lawful basis for processing.' The ICO has set out a three-part, cumulative test for establishing whether there is a legitimate interest in processing the data, which may be a useful addition to an investigation plan:

- Purpose test: is the purpose of the processing a legitimate interest?
- Necessity test: is the processing of the data necessary and proportionate for the purpose?
- Balancing test: is the legitimate interest overridden by the individual's interests?[6]

The above test can be used by those conducting internal investigations to justify the processing of data under the GDPR because it is for the legitimate purpose of the company itself, or a third party, provided any risk of undue harm to the individual does not outweigh that interest. In respect of the necessity test, companies must consider whether there is an alternative, less intrusive, means of gathering or processing the same information.

To demonstrate compliance with the GDPR, organisations will have to document their decisions carefully (through a legitimate interests assessment).[7]

5 This provides additional flexibility to data processors; under the Data Protection Act 1998 (DPA), third-party interests were restricted to those third parties to whom the data would be disclosed.

40.2.5 Special category and criminal offences data

When processing data in an internal investigation, data controllers must pay increased attention when dealing with special category data[8] (which replaces the 'sensitive personal data' terminology under the DPA, and expands the categories of personal data subject to additional restrictions). In an internal investigation, this kind of information will often be held in a human-resources file that becomes part of a review within the investigation. There is a possible question mark over whether employee emails or instant messages, etc., could be considered special category data, as they could potentially contain data within this definition. This is not clear, however, and it is certainly arguable that emails should not fall into this category on the basis that any special category data is incidental and not part of the primary purpose of the use of data in that context. This argument is strengthened by the application of data minimisation steps to ensure the special category data is not specifically identified or targeted as part of the investigation. The concept of special category data is dealt with under Article 9 of the GDPR (and section 10 of the DPA 2018) and it has been extended to include genetic and biometric data.

When dealing with special category data, organisations must establish both a legal basis for the data processing (e.g., consent, legitimate interests or another basis under the GDPR) and an additional, specific legal basis for processing the relevant special category data. The GDPR and DPA 2018 provide for a number of specific legal bases or conditions for the use of special category data, the most relevant of which for internal investigations are consent of the individual (specifically to the use of his or her special category data), processing for the purposes of establishing or defending a legal claim, and public interest purposes as specifically provided for in national law.

Information about criminal allegations, proceedings or convictions in relation to an individual may also be relevant in the context of an internal investigation. This data is treated separately under the GDPR, and requires a lawful basis for processing and legal or official authority to handle that data, which must be specifically prescribed under national law. In the United Kingdom, the DPA 2018 authorises the processing of criminal offences data in certain limited circumstances and subject to the conditions set out in the DPA.[9] These legal authority grounds are narrow, though certain grounds may be available in internal investigations, including prescribed public interests grounds, consent of the individual and establishing or defending a legal claim. Special category data and criminal convictions data should be handled with particular consideration, and organisations should ensure that the basis on which they are using this data is clearly documented.

8 Special category data is defined in the GDPR and the DPA 2018 as 'personal data revealing racial or ethnic origin, political opinions, religious or philosophical beliefs, or trade union membership, and the processing of genetic data, biometric data for the purpose of uniquely identifying a natural person, data concerning health or data concerning a natural person's sex life or sexual orientation' (Article 9 of the GDPR and section 10 of the DPA 2018).

Public interest 40.2.6

The public interest ground for processing special category or criminal offences data may be useful in an internal investigation, especially where it is likely to be followed by a regulatory investigation, and where consent or another legal basis is not available in practice. However, this ground is limited to those public interest purposes that are specifically provided for in national law. Under the DPA 2018, these public interest purposes are relatively narrowly defined, meaning this ground will be difficult to satisfy in practice, and organisations should be confident in, and have clearly documented, their justifications before relying on this basis.

Under the DPA 2018, the public interest purposes of particular relevance to internal investigations relate to the prevention or detection of unlawful acts, and to protecting the public against dishonesty, in both cases provided there is also a 'substantial public interest'.[10] Both provisions require that processing be done without consent of the individual, to avoid prejudicing the investigation. The scope of the public interest ground for data processing under the GDPR must be provided for under national law, and may vary across the European Union. Organisations should therefore seek local legal advice in the relevant Member States.

Data transfer outside the European Economic Area 40.2.7

Given the international scope of many investigations, companies should consider the practicalities of exporting data while complying with the GDPR. If the personal data will be transferred, or accessed from, outside the European Economic Area (EEA) – whether from within the organisation's corporate group or externally – that data transfer also requires a separate lawful basis under the GDPR, in addition to the lawful processing of the data itself. This restriction on data transfers does not apply to non-EEA countries recognised as 'adequate' by the European Commission, to which personal data may be transferred freely.[11] Investigations involving data transfers to countries or entities outside the EEA and not recognised as 'adequate' will require other grounds or safeguards to enable the transfer, as set out in the GDPR. The safeguard most commonly relied on in this context, for intra-group transfers within an organisation or to or from third-party providers involved in the investigation, consists of using standard contractual clauses (SCCs).[12] These are European Commission approved standard-form contractual agreements that put in place binding data protection obligations between the data exporting and data importing entities.[13] Many international organisations are likely to be familiar with the SCCs as part of their wider data privacy

11 Currently, Andorra, Argentina, Canada, Faroe Islands, Guernsey, Isle of Man, Israel, Japan, Jersey, New Zealand, Switzerland, Uruguay and United States (for Privacy Shield certified organisations only), are recognised as having adequate protection. Adequacy talks with South Korea are ongoing.

12 Sometimes referred to as the 'Model Clauses'.

13 The current versions of the standard contractual clauses can be accessed at https://ec.europa.eu/info/law/law-topic/data-protection/international-dimension-data-protection/standard-contractual-clauses-scc_en.

compliance efforts. There are alternatives to the SCCs under the GDPR, though they may not be as reliable in practice for organisations conducting investigations. This includes the explicit consent of the individuals, and transfers required to establish or defend a legal claim (applicable for occasional transfers only).

In the event of a no-deal Brexit, the GDPR rules on data transfers will be mirrored into UK law, therefore personal data transfers from the United Kingdom will be subject to similar restrictions and requirements, except in relation to transfers to EEA Member States, which can continue unrestricted.[14] The requirements for data transfers from the United Kingdom to countries outside the EEA will remain similar to current GDPR rules, and the UK government has confirmed that it intends to recognise existing EU adequacy decisions and approved SCCs wherever possible. In relation to transfers from the EEA to the United Kingdom, following any no-deal Brexit when the United Kingdom will cease to be an EEA state, the GDPR's data transfer rules will apply to restrict those data transfers. The UK government has indicated its intention to apply for an adequacy decision from the European Commission in these circumstances (therefore allowing personal data to be transferred freely from the EEA to the United Kingdom), though that will inevitably take time to be negotiated, and granted and the outcome is not currently clear.

Different data transfer considerations apply in the context of investigations by authorities.

40.2.8 Third parties to investigations

Companies and practitioners often rely on third parties to assist with internal investigations (for example in data analysis, legal advice or document review). These third parties will very often require access to personal data in order to act. The GDPR has introduced new requirements when entering into such arrangements, which means that a contract or other legal act under European Union or Member State law is now required where controllers engage the services of processors.

This must set out, among other information, the subject matter and duration of the processing, the nature and purpose of the processing, the type of personal data and categories of data subjects and the obligations and rights of the controller, as well as certain prescribed contractual obligations.[15] The GDPR changed the required clauses, so it is particularly important to ensure that the correct agreements are in place from the outset of any interaction with third parties. In addition, any agreement must contain an obligation of confidentiality.[16]

Monitoring employees' electronic communications 40.2.9

In addition to the data protection considerations discussed above, a framework of regulations is in place in the United Kingdom to govern the extent to which employers can intercept and monitor their employees' electronic communications.[17] These communications regulations are triggered on 'interception' of communications, defined as making the content of the communication available to a person who is not the sender or intended recipient, whether before, during or after transmission of the communication. In the context of internal investigations, this will most likely be of relevance when considering investigation-specific interception and monitoring of employee communications, or when assessing the legality of an organisation's existing communications monitoring practices.

The default position is that employers may not intercept employee communications other than with the consent of both the sender and the recipient of the communication, or as authorised by the exemptions built into the legal framework. In practice, organisations carrying out internal investigations are most likely to rely on exemptions that permit interception: to monitor employee or external users' compliance with rules governing use of the system (whether internal policies or legal or regulatory requirements); to maintain records and establish facts; to prevent or detect crime; or for information security purposes.[18] If consent is relied on for interception purposes, this should be distinguishable from any consent relied on for GDPR purposes (which sets a higher consent standard), so that both interception and data protection consents can be evidenced if required.

Internal investigations: US perspective 40.3

The United States has no single unified data protection regime. However, a patchwork of federal and state privacy laws impose various constraints on the extent to which a company may collect and review information about its employees, particularly their electronic communications.

State privacy laws in the United States vary considerably, but many states recognise a common-law right against unreasonable intrusions into a person's seclusion or privacy. Such causes of action have been brought against employers in the context of searches in the workplace.[19] While courts have typically upheld an employer's right to search company-owned property, including computers

17 This framework consists primarily of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 (RIPA); the Investigatory Powers Act 2016 (IPA 2016), which updates and repeals certain parts of RIPA; the Interception of Communications Code of Practice under the IPA 2016; and the Telecommunications (Lawful Business Practice) (Interception of Communications) Regulations 2000 (Lawful Business Practice Regulations), which were enacted under RIPA but have not to date been replaced or repealed by the IPA 2016.

In cases involving more unusual facts, an employee may be able to make out an invasion of privacy claim based on a workplace search.[20] Accordingly, companies are well advised to have written policies, that all employees must acknowledge, clearly providing that the company's network and systems are subject to monitoring and search. An employee will face difficulty establishing a right to privacy in company-controlled systems or data where such policies are in place.[21]

Other state laws place more specific prohibitions on employers that can limit the outer bounds of a company's investigative actions. For example, various state laws prohibit questioning an employee on issues that serve no business purpose,[22] demanding an employee disclose passwords and other credentials to his or her personal email and social networking accounts,[23] requiring employees to alter privacy

Various state and federal laws also restrict the collection of electronic communications, including emails[26] (both work and personal), phone calls[27] and social media accounts.[28] One primary federal law is the Electronic Communications Privacy Act,[29] which breaks down into the Wiretap Act (which generally prohibits intercepting electronic communications),[30] the Pen Register Statute (which generally prohibits use of a pen register to track communications)[31] and the Stored Communications Act (which generally prohibits unauthorised access to stored electronic communications).[32] These statutes do not generally prohibit an employer from searching its own email system.[33] However, they may limit an employer's ability to use company-owned equipment to access an employee's communications stored with third-party providers (e.g., Gmail),[34] at least without the employee's consent.

Other state laws govern an employer's ability to collect and use biometric data like fingerprints, voice prints or vein patterns from employees. One such law is the Illinois Biometric Information Privacy Act (BIPA).[35] BIPA defines biometric information broadly to include 'any information, regardless of how it is captured, converted, stored, or shared, based on an individual's biometric identifier used to identify an individual'.[36] Employers who intend to use such biometric information for any purpose, including for time management, security access or safety, must first obtain informed written consent prior to collection.[37] Employers can obtain consent via an employment agreement.[38] A failure to obtain proper consent, among other things,[39] can result in potential exposure to liability,[40] as the Illinois Supreme Court has ruled that any violation of the law – regardless of the presence of particularised harm – confers standing on the affected individual to sue for potentially substantial statutory damages.[41]

Finally, besides state and federal laws, internal investigations in the United States may also be subject to the GDPR's restrictions, given its extraterritorial reach. In particular, to the extent the investigation requires review of personal data stored in the European Union – for example, an employment file for an employee in an EU affiliate, stored on a server in the European Union – then the company must evaluate whether (1) the EU company has a legal basis on which to disclose the data to the United States, (2) transparency obligations have been met and relevant information or notices have been provided (or an exemption applies), (3) data minimisation and proportionality principles have been applied and (4) one of the conditions for the transfer of personal data to the United States has been met. If the organisation cannot meet the above requirement to legitimise the transfer, the company may wish to consider ways of handling the data that do not involve transferring personal data to the United States – such as reviewing the relevant personal data in the European Union, or redacting personal information from the data set before it is transferred.

Investigations by authorities: UK perspective 40.4

Companies have always had to consider competing interests when dealing with investigating authorities, but until now data protection has rarely been near the top of any list of considerations. The very significant fines available under the GDPR mean that companies must take data protection much more seriously, particularly the handling of personal data to authorities both in the United Kingdom and overseas. The ICO has shown that it will not hesitate to use its powers under the GDPR to investigate and issue significant fines for breaches. For example, on 8 July 2019, the ICO announced a notice of intent to fine British Airways £183.39 million[42] for a data breach affecting 500,000 individuals brought about by 'poor security arrangements'.[43] This was closely followed by a further notice of intent to fine on 9 July 2019 whereby the ICO is proposing to fine Marriott International £99.2 million[44] for infringements of the GDPR stemming from a data breach at Starwood, which Marriott acquired in 2016, effecting 300 million individuals.[45] It remains to be seen whether this initially robust approach to GDPR enforcement from the ICO will extend into the more nuanced environment of internal and regulatory investigations, with their frequently competing legal obligations.

Guidance from authorities 40.4.1

Prior to the introduction of the GDPR, concerns were raised about the balance companies should strike between their reporting and regulatory commitments (including investigations), on the one hand, and protecting their employees' (or anyone else's) personal data on the other. To offer some guidance in this regard, the Financial Conduct Authority (FCA) and ICO published a joint update on the GDPR in which they made clear that they believed 'the GDPR does not impose requirements which are incompatible with the rules in the FCA Handbook'.[46] Further, the FCA and ICO have published a memorandum of understanding,[47] which (among other things) pledges each regulator to seek to understand and, where appropriate, collaborate and co-ordinate work on their respective policies that have a material effect on the other's objectives. This is yet to be tested and it is unclear whether the FCA will be tolerant of delays, limitations on information and other issues caused by a company's cautious approach to data protection.

Furthermore, the FCA has been keen to point out that it will be considering breaches of the GDPR as part of its supervision of senior management arrangements, systems and controls.[48] Although this is limited to entities regulated by the FCA, it seems likely that other authorities will take a similar approach and companies will need to be ready to show that they have taken their data protection obligations – ongoing and as part of an investigation or data request from a investigating authority – seriously.

40.4.2 Providing data to authorities

Where authorities make requests for data, companies must be absolutely clear about the legal powers by which those requests are being made, to ensure that they can comply with the request while fulfilling their GDPR obligations. The benefits of voluntarily handing over more data than specifically required have probably disappeared with the GDPR's tougher data regulation regime. Among other things, the GDPR requires organisations to be transparent and provide information to individuals, to minimise use of personal data, to establish a legal basis for processing personal data and to legitimise any transfers of data outside the EEA. These obligations apply equally in the context of data disclosures to authorities.

In relation to establishing a relevant legal basis for data processing, as well as the grounds discussed above (consent, legitimate interests, etc.), the 'legal obligation' basis may be relevant in responding to information requests and investigations by authorities. The GDPR and DPA 2018 provide that personal data may be disclosed to comply with a legal obligation (excluding contractual obligations), but only to the extent necessary to comply with that legal obligation: a proportionality test applies. This ground can only be relied on to justify data processing where a clear and binding legal obligation is present, under national UK or European law. Obligations originating from outside the United Kingdom or Europe do not provide a legal basis for data processing on this ground, even where those obligations may be binding on a non-European entity within an organisation's global corporate group, for example. Organisations should carefully document the relevant legal obligation, and the associated assessment of necessity and proportionality, to evidence GDPR compliance.

In the context of international investigations, companies will need to address the GDPR restrictions and requirements for the transfer of personal data outside the EEA. The considerations for organisations disclosing data to third party authorities are slightly different from those concerning internal investigations. For example, reliance on individual consent or the SCCs is unlikely to be practicable. Transfers necessary to establish or defend a legal claim may be a helpful relevant ground in this context, though it is only available for occasional transfers, so may not be appropriate in ongoing investigations or longer-term engagement with authorities. An alternative basis to consider is provided by the GDPR requirements for transferring data under international agreements, such as mutual legal assistance treaties (MLATs).[49] Using MLATs provides a structured system for exchanging information and evidence, but the process can be expensive and lengthy, which is particularly unhelpful where credit for early and responsive co-operation is sought, particularly when dealing with US authorities.

As a general position, companies should be cautious when transferring data, even in response to requests from authorities.

Some national regulators (such as the FCA and the US Securities and Exchange Commission) have reciprocal arrangements in place to transfer data. The use of these inter-regulator arrangements has a number of attractions. However, they often operate through a memorandum of understanding between the regulators, which on its face does not satisfy the definition of a legal agreement under Article 48 of the GDPR and so may not be an appropriate method for data transfer. While the interpretation of Article 48 of the GDPR remains untested, caution should be taken about permitting data to be transferred outside the jurisdiction under a memorandum of understanding between regulators.

See Chapters 11 and 12 on production of information to authorities

An alternative method for complying with the GDPR may be to redact personal information before handing documents over to authorities, depending on the size of the document set. This may, however, be a very expensive way of satisfying the authorities and the GDPR, particularly as it would require not only the data subject's name to be redacted, but also any information from which the data subject could be identified.

Investigations by authorities: US perspective 40.5

As in the United Kingdom, companies in the United States must be mindful of the GDPR's restrictions in responding to subpoenas or other compulsory demands requiring the production of documents. Under US law, a company served with compulsory demands must produce any responsive documents within its possession, custody or control – wherever the data is stored. It is common for US law enforcement agencies or regulators to issue demands for documents to companies requiring the production of large volumes of data. To the extent that responsive data is stored in the European Union, and contains personal data subject to the GDPR, the company must produce it notwithstanding its foreign location. As a result, US companies served with formal demands to produce documents may face a situation where their obligations to comply with US legal process conflict with the GDPR's restrictions.

A US company concerned that it faces such a conflict should first discuss the issue with the regulator or law enforcement agency involved and attempt to narrow the scope of the request to avoid or minimise the need to produce

49 GDPR, Articles 48 and 49.

GDPR-regulated data. This is particularly important because, for the company to rely on the GDPR's legal defence derogation to produce the data to US authorities, the data must be 'necessary for the establishment, exercise or defence of legal claims'.[50] Accordingly, obtaining clarity from law enforcement or the regulatory agency as to what personal data is necessary to respond to the request, and redacting or otherwise anonymising the other personal data that is not needed, will put a company in a more defensible position if GDPR issues arise.

At the same time, US law enforcement authorities or regulatory agencies are likely to press for clarity as to whether the GDPR genuinely prohibits the transfer of the data in question to US authorities. The US Department of Justice has taken a robust approach previously in similar circumstances, by asserting: 'Where a company claims that disclosure is prohibited, the burden is on the company to establish the prohibition. Moreover, a company should work diligently to identify all available legal bases to provide such documents.'[51] Although the risk of breaching obligations under the GDPR should be a major consideration when dealing with investigating authorities, companies must balance this against the risks of non-compliance with US authorities, which may seek sanctions (including even criminal contempt) against a company for failing to comply with investigators' demands.

Where a company truly cannot comply with a demand for documents from US authorities without violating the GDPR's transfer restrictions, and the company is unable to negotiate an adequate resolution with the US authorities involved, the company may choose to challenge the legal process. US courts have long held that, where it would violate foreign law for a company to produce certain documents in response to US legal process, the company may challenge enforcement based on international comity. If the court agrees that compliance with the demand for documents would give rise to a true conflict of laws, it will weigh the conflicting legal obligations of US law and foreign laws case by case.[52] Specifically, a court entertaining such a challenge must consider, among other things, the importance of the records to the US legal matter for which they are sought, the availability of alternative means of securing the information and the extent to which non-compliance with the request would undermine important interests of the United States, or compliance would undermine important interests of the state where the information is located.[53]

However, while courts have sometimes quashed subpoenas on comity grounds in civil litigation,[54] they have typically rebuffed such challenges in the context of criminal investigations, finding that the domestic interest in enforcing the criminal laws trumped the foreign data privacy interests involved.[55] The enforcement of the GDPR and the severe potential penalties that attach to non-compliance may provide greater motivation to companies to challenge US legal process if they believe there is a risk that compliance will run afoul of the GDPR's requirements; and likewise, the prospect of GDPR penalties may lead US courts to give more weight to foreign data privacy interests than they might otherwise in such challenges. Indeed, US court decisions applying the international comity balancing test have sometimes turned, in significant part, on the low likelihood of severe penalties being imposed on the recipient of the legal process at issue if complied with.[56] It is unclear, however, whether and to what extent the GDPR will actually change the equation in this regard – at least prior to a significant fine or other penalty for a disclosure.

Whistleblowers 40.6

The interplay between the increased protections for individuals under the GDPR and the protections for whistleblowers under existing laws is a particularly interesting one for practitioners and companies. More and more, internal and government investigations are triggered by information from (often anonymous) whistleblowers. Senior managers must be acutely aware of the respect to be shown to whistleblowers and whistleblowing laws, in particular with regard to anonymity and protection of the individual.

Whistleblowing policies and data protection 40.6.1

Companies should have in place whistleblowing policies that respect the data protection principles – including specific whistleblower anonymity and privacy protections applicable in some jurisdictions – also providing safeguards for the subject of any whistleblowing report, the whistleblower and any third parties mentioned in the report. Companies will also need to ensure that by default, only personal data necessary for the specific purpose of investigating a whistleblowing report is processed.

40.6.2 Right to access

Where an individual's personal data has been processed during an investigation following a whistleblower report, the individual will still have the rights to access certain information as they would have done in any other circumstances. This includes the purpose and period envisaged for processing and how the data will be stored.[57] The personal information in a whistleblowing report can relate to whistleblowers, the person under investigation, witnesses or other individuals that are mentioned, meaning that companies will need to uphold the data protection rights of all involved.[58]

In addition, under the GDPR, employees may demand any information held about them by their employer. This, the European Data Protection Supervisor has noted, is 'of particular concern in the whistleblowing context as it could, theoretically, risk exposing a whistleblower's identity'.[59] The Article 29 Working Party (now replaced by the European Data Protection Board) has stated that the right to access data may be restricted in order to ensure the whistleblower's rights are protected and '[u]nder no circumstances can the person accused in a whistleblower's report obtain information about the identity of the whistleblower from the scheme on the basis of the accused person's right of access, except where the whistleblower maliciously makes a false statement'.[60] This is reflected in the DPA 2018, which states that companies do not have to comply with a request for access to personal data if it would mean disclosing information about another individual who can be identified from that information, except if the other individual has consented to the disclosure, or it is reasonable to comply with the request without that individual's consent.[61] Therefore, companies may be able to limit access to data following a whistleblower report, but they will still need to balance the data subject's right of access to their personal data against the whistleblower's rights and the rights of any third parties mentioned in the report.[62]

Collecting, storing and accessing data: practical considerations 40.7

A few practical considerations for all investigations:

- Involve data controllers and other relevant organisations at as early a stage as possible.
- Identify any relevant documents to be transferred that contain special category data or any criminal offences data, and document the specific derogations or conditions on which that data will be used.
- Document all decision-making relating to the handling of that data (particularly any assessment of legitimate interests as a lawful basis for processing) and any transfer of that data outside the United Kingdom or the European Union and consider it against Article 49 of the GDPR.
- Work with authorities to agree realistic expectations for the scope and timing of data requests.
- Consider all options for the transfer of data outside the United Kingdom or the European Union, including domestic review, redactions, MLATs and the use of domestic authorities.

Directors' Duties: The UK Perspective

Nichola Peters and Michelle de Kluyver[1]

41.1 Introduction

Corporate governance has become increasingly important in the context of financial crime compliance and investigations. One reason for the development is that good corporate governance is a foundation for asserting substantive legal defences to allegations of misconduct. Legislative developments such as the introduction of the UK Bribery Act 2010 and the Criminal Finances Act 2017 mean that the board's responsibilities for identification, mitigation and ongoing review of financial crime risk have a material impact on whether companies can defend allegations of criminal conduct by associated persons (those providing services to the company). The 'adequate procedures' and 'reasonable prevention procedures' defences contained in that legislation require companies to demonstrate 'top-level commitment' to managing financial crime risk and to show that they have understood and managed their financial crime risks proportionately by reference to the nature, scale and complexity of their operations. In the financial services sector, senior managers in firms subject to the Senior Managers and Certification Regime (SMCR) will have specific statements of responsibilities for which they can be held to account.

See Chapter 23 on negotiating global settlements

In 2014 the United Kingdom introduced deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs) as a new mechanism for resolving corporate criminal investigations where there is evidence of criminal conduct. DPAs have added to the focus on corporate governance. Factors that influence whether to offer a company a DPA resolution include whether the company has an effective compliance programme, the composition and conduct of the management team, and the extent to which corporate structures or processes have been changed to mitigate identified risks. A company's prevention procedures are therefore relevant to corporate outcomes even where they fall short of the legislative standard required to establish a substantive defence. A company's commitment to compliance will also be taken into account in calculating the level of fines or other penalties.

The issue of how companies manage themselves and identify and mitigate their risks has therefore become central in financial crime investigations. Indeed, an investigations process forms part of a company's prevention procedures and companies should take care to ensure that investigations are sufficiently independent and appropriately robust. Where there are allegations of misconduct that may entail significant reputational or commercial risk, the board (or a board subcommittee) is likely to provide oversight of particular investigations, in addition to providing oversight of a company's overall compliance obligations. Directors can also be compelled to give evidence as witnesses in government investigations to explain (among other issues) their company's approach to compliance.[2]

In significant investigations, and subject to managing conflicts of interest, the board is likely to be involved in making strategically important decisions such as whether to self-report suspected misconduct and how to resolve findings of misconduct in a major investigation.

It is therefore important that directors are aware of the multiple sources of their duties and obligations and how they are likely to apply both to the board's oversight obligations regarding the management of financial crime risk and in individual investigation scenarios.

Sources of directors' duties and responsibilities under UK law 41.2

The core duties owed by directors to their companies are set out in sections 171 to 178 of the Companies Act 2006 (CA 2006). Directors may also have additional duties depending on the company they serve. The commentary below identifies and explains the key sources of governance obligations for directors in the United Kingdom. As a result of the global financial crisis and high-profile examples of corporate collapse, the legislative and regulatory framework is increasingly focused on integrity, accountability and driving high standards of business conduct.

The duty to act within powers (section 171 CA 2006) 41.2.1.1

Directors are not permitted to abuse their powers.[3] They must act in accordance with the company's constitution, which includes its articles of associations, resolutions, decisions and investment agreements. In addition, directors are only permitted to exercise their powers for the purposes for which they are conferred, called the 'proper purpose test'. The question of whether a power has been exercised properly will turn on whether the 'substantial' or 'dominant' purpose for which it was exercised was the purpose for which it was conferred.[4] Directors must not exercise their powers to protect their own positions. If power is exercised for a wrongful purpose, the use to which that power is put is voidable.

2 Directors can of course also become suspects in an investigation, but this chapter focuses on oversight responsibilities and not directors' individual defence rights.

In the context of a financial crime investigation, it would be an improper use of power if a director sought to prevent, control or influence an investigation to protect his or her own position. A director in this position would also have a conflict of interest, which would engage the separate duty to avoid conflicts of interest. The conduct would also likely breach the duty to promote the success of the company. Investigators must always be alive to the risk of conflicts of interest within the investigation team and in the reporting line.

The duty to promote the success of the company is relevant to almost everything a director does. The duty requires directors to act in good faith in a way they consider would be most likely to promote the success of the company for the benefit of its members as a whole.[5] The courts will typically respect the decisions of the board provided that they reach the standard of a good-faith business judgment.

When discharging their duties to promote the success of the company, directors must have regard to a list of factors, including:

- the likely consequences of any decision in the long term;
- the interests of the company's employees;
- the need to foster the company's business relationships with suppliers, customers and others;
- the impact of the company's operations on the community and the environment;
- the desirability of the company maintaining a reputation for high standards of business conduct; and
- the need to act fairly as between members of the company.

The list of factors is not exhaustive. Directors may balance the various factors and they must take into account any other factor that would be relevant to a particular decision.[6]

The Association of General Counsel and Company Secretaries of the FTSE 100 (GC100) and the Chartered Governance Institute (ICSA) have published useful, practical guidance notes relevant to the interpretation and application of this duty.[7] The GC100 Guidance on Directors' Duties: Section 172 and Stakeholder Considerations (GC100 Guidance) states that: 'The factors are designed to ensure that, in promoting the success of the company, broader implications of decisions are considered by the directors. You may find it helpful to see the duty as about creating a culture in the business, so that when you take decisions, their wider impact has been considered.'

The duty to promote the success of the company is intertwined with the duty to act with reasonable care, skill and diligence set out in section 174 of the CA 2006. The GC100 Guidance states that: 'The section 172 duty must be fulfilled by a director in accordance with the duty of care, skill and diligence imposed by section 174.'

An interesting application of the duty to promote the success of the company to investigations is that where directors may be implicated in misconduct, they must disclose their own wrongdoing.[8] A director who asserts the privilege against self-incrimination will therefore breach this duty.

In insolvency situations, the interests of creditors will take precedence over the interests of members. This can materially change how the board approaches an investigation. A company's solvency position can change for reasons unrelated to the investigation but also for reasons central to the investigation, such as where there has been an internal fraud. If there are concerns about the company's solvency, directors should proactively seek legal and financial advice as to their altered duties.

Most UK-incorporated companies will have an obligation from their next reporting period (2020) to report on the company's performance of the duty under section 172 of the CA 2006.[9] The government believes that by imposing reporting obligations linked to this duty, directors will consider the wider stakeholder issues more carefully and that boardroom engagement will be improved. In 2018, the Financial Reporting Council (FRC) published its Revised Guidance on the Strategic Report to assist companies in their reporting. It is believed that the enhanced reporting obligations for non-financial information will result in more trust and transparency in business.

General oversight obligations and oversight of material investigations

The duty to promote the success of the company is central to the directors' obligations to ensure that a company identifies and mitigates its financial crime risks.

The GC100 Guidance recommends that directors ensure that they receive the information they need to carry out their roles and satisfy the duty. In the context of the board's oversight duties in relation to compliance, directors should satisfy themselves that both the quality and frequency of the management information they receive is adequate. Directors need to understand the company's risk profile and risk assessment, and how the compliance programme responds to these risks. In addition, directors should expect to receive periodic reporting to satisfy themselves that the procedures adopted remain fit for purpose. There is no one-size-fits-all approach, and the detail and frequency of management information will depend on the size, complexity and risk profile of the organisation. Data about non-material issues and investigations will often be aggregated and shared annually. Where the board has oversight of a material investigation, they are likely to require more detailed information and regular information flows. The company should consider the issue of legal privilege in this regard.

See Chapter 35 on privilege

Where boards are receiving legally privileged advice about investigations or material compliance issues, the way in which it is communicated to the board and documented in the minutes will need to be carefully managed. The GC100 Guidance on Directors' Duties states that directors should not be 'forced to evidence their thought processes' as this would create unnecessary process and 'inevitably expose directors to a greater and unacceptable risk of litigation'.

Directors must exercise independent judgment in the interests of their own company,[10] regardless of whether they align with the interests of other group companies. The principle that underpins this duty is that directors must not subordinate their powers to the will of others unless they are authorised to do so under the constitution. Director nominees may therefore follow the instructions of their appointer if the company constitution so allows, provided that they are able to comply with their other legal obligations.

The duty does not prevent directors from seeking and relying on professional advice to form an opinion provided that the decision they reach is their independent judgment.[11] Directors may also delegate their powers (although they remain responsible for their exercise) provided that such a delegation is authorised.

Directors may also be able to fetter their discretion in certain circumstances, provided that it promotes the success of the company to do so. For example, directors could bind the company to an exclusive commercial arrangement and agree to exercise their powers to ensure that the contract was carried out.

41.2.1.4 Duty to exercise reasonable care, skill and diligence (section 174 CA 2006)

Directors must exercise reasonable care, skill and diligence in how they discharge their duties.[12] The standard is both objective (the care, skill and diligence that would reasonably be expected of a director acting with reasonable diligence) and subjective (the general knowledge, skill and experience that the particular director has). As a general rule, a non-executive director will not be expected to have the same level of knowledge of the internal workings of the business that an executive director would.

Directors must satisfy themselves that they have a proper understanding of the functions and duties of directors, the fundamental principles of company law, the company's business, the risks faced by the company and the regulatory and compliance regime in which it operates.[13] Directors should also, as a practical matter, ensure that they receive a proper induction and ongoing training to keep their knowledge, skills and experience up to date.

Directors may rely on the expertise of colleagues and advisers in discharging their functions. Indeed, a failure to seek expert advice may amount to a breach of the duty.[14] The right (or duty) to seek advice does not absolve a director from the duty to supervise the discharge of delegated functions.[15] It must be reasonable for directors to rely on the advice of colleagues or advisers.[16] For example, directors must ensure that advisers have appropriate expertise and are instructed to address relevant issues; they should also ensure that advisers are free from conflicts of interest.[17] The question of whether reliance is reasonable will depend on the circumstances.

Although there is no difference between the tests to be applied to executive and non-executive directors, the law recognises that because they fulfil different functions, they will reasonably be expected to exercise different levels of care, skill and diligence. The extent to which a non-executive director may reasonably rely on the executive directors would be fact-sensitive.[18] Non-executive directors should expect to comply with high standards. They would also be expected to properly understand any activity that contributed significantly to a company's commercial offering or revenues.[19]

Duty to avoid conflicts of interest (section 175 CA 2006) 41.2.1.5

Companies are entitled to the benefit of impartial decision-making on the part of their directors. Directors therefore have a duty to avoid actual and potential conflicts between their personal interests and those of the company they serve even where they are acting in good faith.[20] The duty is widely drawn. Section 175 of the CA 2006 states that: 'A director of a company must avoid a situation in which he has, or can have, a direct or indirect interest that conflicts, or possibly may conflict, with the interests of the company.' The reference to indirect interests requires directors to take account of whether persons connected with them[21] might have a conflict of interest.

The application of the duty is acute where it involves the exploitation of a company's property, information or opportunity, and it is immaterial whether the company could itself have taken advantage of the opportunity or whether it suffered any loss. The test is an objective one and directors must therefore analyse whether a reasonable person would think that the relevant facts and circumstances gave rise to a real and sensible possibility of conflict. If the situation cannot reasonably be regarded as giving rise to a conflict of interest, the duty will not be breached.[22]

The duty will not be infringed where the conflict has been authorised in advance by the directors where there is a power to do so in the company's constitution.[23] The authorisation will only be effective if the relevant meeting is quorate without counting any interested directors and the authorisation was given without counting their votes. Effective authorisation will require directors to give full disclosure of the scope and nature of the conflict. In 2008, the GC100 published guidance on Directors' Conflicts of Interest, which includes guidance on authorisation.[24] Directors will not infringe their duties if they act in accordance with provisions in the company's articles for dealing with conflicts of interest.[25]

It may be possible for shareholders to authorise a conflict of interest in advance or subsequently ratify a breach of duty. There are limits on the type of conduct that can be authorised or ratified, and the process that applies will need to be checked taking into account the company's constitution.

41.2.1.6 Duty not to accept benefits from third parties (section 176 CA 2006)

Directors must not exploit their positions for personal benefit (financial or non-financial). The duty provides directors must not accept a benefit from a third party conferred by reason of them being a director or their doing (or not doing) anything as a director.[26] The duty will not be infringed if the acceptance of the benefit cannot reasonably be regarded as likely to give rise to a conflict of interest. The duty is very strict and directors need to take account of these obligations when accepting corporate hospitality or gifts. Although in a bribery investigation the focus will be on whether benefits provided to directors or the company were criminal, it is important not to lose sight of this duty where the conduct concerns individual directors. A company may recover the value of any benefits unlawfully received by a director through civil proceedings, and not just criminal action.

41.2.1.7 Duty to declare an interest in a proposed transaction or arrangement (section 177 CA 2006)

Section 177 CA 2006 requires a director to disclose to the other directors the nature and extent of any interest that the director has in relation to a proposed transaction or arrangement with the company. There is no requirement for authorisation. The term 'arrangement' is wider than the term 'transaction' and includes agreements or understandings having no contractual effect. The interest can be direct or indirect and therefore the interests of connected person must be considered.[27] Directors must disclose the nature and extent of the interest before the company enters into the transaction or arrangement.

Directors do not have to make a declaration where they are unaware of having an interest or are not aware of the transaction or arrangement in question. However, they will be assumed to have knowledge of matters of which they ought reasonably to be aware. Directors will therefore need to undertake a certain amount of due diligence regarding their potential interests to avoid breaching the duty.

If the interest cannot reasonably be regarded as likely to give rise to a conflict of interest, it need not be declared. Further, if the other directors are already aware, or ought reasonably to be aware, of the conflict of interest, it does not have to be declared. Finally, interests relating to a director's service contract need not be declared if they have been considered by a meeting of the directors or a committee appointed for the purpose.

The company's articles may contain provisions for dealing with conflicts of interest compliance that are designed to prevent a breach of the general duty.[28] Section 182 of the CA 2006 deals separately with declarations of interest in existing transactions or arrangements not already declared under section 177.[29]

Other statutory, common law and equitable duties 41.2.1.8

The statutory duties are not exhaustive. Directors of all UK companies also owe a duty of confidentiality to the company and have duties to act fairly as between different members and consider the interests of creditors in appropriate circumstances. Directors also have numerous reporting obligations. Other obligations will depend on the nature of the company.

Companies with premium listings in the United Kingdom are required (for accounting periods beginning on or after 1 January 2019) to state in their annual report and accounts whether they have complied with the UK Corporate Governance Code (2018)[30] and if not, explain the reason. The 'comply or explain' approach is designed to promote transparency about how companies have complied with the high standards of governance set out in the Corporate Governance Code and to promote trust.

The Corporate Governance Code (2018) is the latest iteration of a code that was first published in 1992. The revised code has been developed to respond to a modern business environment in which a key role of the directors is to build relationships with a wider group of stakeholders. The principles set out in the code have been updated to emphasise the link between strong corporate governance and long-term success.

27 See s.252 CA 2006.

The Corporate Governance Code is designed around five pillars:

- board leadership and company purpose;
- division of responsibilities;
- composition, succession and evaluation;
- audit, risk and internal control; and
- remuneration.

The Corporate Governance Code sets out a number of principles in relation to each of these items. Although they are all relevant to the identification and management of financial crime risk and the investigation of issues arising, the principles linked to board leadership and company purpose; division of responsibilities; and audit, risk and internal control are the most relevant.

Principles relating to board leadership and company purpose require directors to act with integrity. They must ensure that they establish a framework of prudent and effective controls to assess and manage risk in which the workforce should be able to raise any matters of concern.

The principles linked to the division of responsibilities highlight that the chair should facilitate board relations and the effective contribution of all the non-executive directors. The chair should also ensure that directors receive accurate, timely and clear information. The board must ensure through its composition that no one individual or group dominates the board and that there is a clear division of responsibility between the leadership of the board and the executive leadership of the business.

The principles further provide that non-executive directors must have sufficient time to meet their responsibilities and 'should provide constructive challenge, strategic guidance, offer specialist advice and hold management to account'.[31] The company secretary should support the board to ensure that it has what it needs to function effectively and efficiently. This will include making time and proper information available to the board to discharge its oversight responsibilities.

The principles that underpin the section on audit, risk and internal control are of particular relevance in managing financial crime risk. They state:

> M. The board should establish formal and transparent policies and procedures to ensure the independence and effectiveness of internal and external audit functions and satisfy itself on the integrity of financial and narrative statements.
> N. The board should present a fair, balanced and understandable assessment of the company's position and prospects.
> O. The board should establish procedures to manage risk, oversee the internal control framework, and determine the nature and extent of the principal risks the company is willing to take in order to achieve its long-term strategic objectives.

31 Principle H, UK Corporate Governance Code.

The audit committee plays a key role in how the company complies with these obligations. The Corporate Governance Code sets out the requirements for the audit committee, which is responsible for, among other items:

> - reviewing the company's internal financial controls and internal control and risk management systems, unless expressly addressed by a separate board risk committee composed of independent non-executive directors, or by the board itself;
> - monitoring and reviewing the effectiveness of the company's internal audit function or, where there is not one, considering annually whether there is a need for one and making a recommendation to the board;
> . . . . .
> - reviewing and monitoring the external auditor's independence and objectivity;
> - reviewing the effectiveness of the external audit process, taking into consideration relevant UK professional and regulatory requirements[32]

The board retains overall responsibility for assessing and managing the company's risks. Boards must carry out a robust assessment of the company's emerging and principal risk, have in place procedures to identify its emerging risks and explain how these are being managed or mitigated. The board should monitor the company's risk management and internal control systems and, at least annually, carry out a review of their effectiveness and report on that review in the annual report. The monitoring and review should cover all material controls, including financial, operational and compliance controls.

Separately, the FRC has published Guidance on Audit Committees[33] and Guidance on Risk Management, Internal Control and Related Financial and Business Reporting[34] to assist companies in complying with these principles.

Appendix C of the Guidance on Risk Management, Internal Control and Related Financial and Business sets out the questions the board can ask itself in the context of its risk-related responsibilities, as the small sample of its risk-related questions set out below illustrates:

> Risk appetite and culture
> - How has the board agreed the company's risk appetite? With whom has it conferred?
> - How has the board assessed the company's culture? In what way does the board satisfy itself that the company has a 'speak-up' culture and that it systematically learns from past mistakes?

32 Provision 25, UK Corporate Governance Code.

- How do the company's culture, code of conduct, human resource policies and performance reward systems support the business objectives and risk management and internal control systems?
- How has the board considered whether senior management promotes and communicates the desired culture and demonstrates the necessary commitment to risk management and internal control?
- How is inappropriate behaviour dealt with? Does this present consequential risks?
- How does the board ensure that it has sufficient time to consider risk, and how is that integrated with discussion on other matters for which the board is responsible?

Monitoring and Review

- What are the processes by which senior management monitor the effective application of the systems of risk management and internal control?
- In what way do the monitoring and review processes take into account the company's ability to re-evaluate the risks and adjust controls effectively in response to changes in its objectives, its business, and its external environment?
- How are processes or controls adjusted to reflect new or changing risks, or operational deficiencies? To what extent does the board engage in horizon scanning for emerging risks?

Public reporting

- How has the board satisfied itself that the disclosures on risk management and internal control contribute to the annual report being fair, balanced and understandable, and provide shareholders with the information they need?
- How has the board satisfied itself that its reporting on going concern and the longer term viability statement gives a fair, balanced and understandable overview of the company's position and prospects?

The UK Corporate Governance Code does not override or seek to interpret the general duty under section 172 of the CA 2006 to promote the success of the company. However, it is clear from the above that many of the suggestions for how to identify and manage risk will apply in both the context of the general section 172 duty and also the duty to exercise care, skill and diligence.

41.2.3 QCA Code for smaller listed companies

The QCA Corporate Governance Code[35] is intended to provide small and mid-sized UK quoted companies with a corporate governance framework tailored to their needs and less prescriptive than the UK Corporate Governance Code.

It consists of 10 corporate governance principles that companies should follow, along with step-by-step guidance on how to effectively apply them and the related disclosures companies should make. Since September 2018, companies listed on the Alternative Investment Market[36] have been required to adopt and identify a recognised corporate governance code. Companies are also required to set out how they comply with that code or explain their reasons for non-compliance.

The 10 principles are to:

- establish a strategy and business model which promote long-term value for shareholders;
- seek to understand and meet shareholder needs and expectations;
- take into account wider stakeholder and social responsibilities and their implications for long-term success;
- embed effective risk management, considering both opportunities and threats, throughout the organisation;
- maintain the board as a well-functioning, balanced team led by the chair;
- ensure that between them the directors have the necessary up-to-date experience, skills and capabilities;
- evaluate board performance based on clear and relevant objectives, seeking continuous improvement;
- promote a corporate culture that is based on ethical values and behaviours;
- maintain governance structures and processes that are fit for purpose and support good decision-making by the board; and
- communicate how the company is governed and is performing by maintaining a dialogue with shareholders and other relevant stakeholders.

Wates Corporate Governance Principles for Large Private Companies 41.2.4

In recent years, the government has extended its focus on corporate governance to large private companies. This is in recognition that private companies are both a substantial and an expanding part of the economy. Under the leadership of the Wates Committee, the FRC and others have developed the Wates Corporate Governance Principles for Large Private Companies.[37] The guidance sets out six principles that such companies should consider within the context of the company's specific circumstances and then explain how they have addressed them in their governance practices. The guidance exists to assist companies but does not have the same status as the UK Corporate Governance Code, which requires companies to comply or explain why they have not done so.

The two principles most relevant to financial crime investigations are Principles 3 (Director responsibilities) and 4 (Opportunity and risk). Principle 3 requires the board and individual directors to have a clear understanding of their accountability and responsibilities. Principle 3 states that the board's policies and procedures should support effective decision-making and independent challenge. The responsibility of reviewing the governance processes to confirm that they remain fit for purpose and considering any initiatives that could strengthen the governance of the company reside with the chairman and company secretary. The guidance also emphasises the importance of the integrity of information and that the board papers and supporting information should inform the director what is expected of them on each issue.

Principle 4 states that the board is responsible for a company's overall approach to strategic decision-making and both financial and non-financial risk management, including reputational risk. The board must have oversight of risk and how it is managed, and provide appropriate accountability to stakeholders: 'The size and nature of the business will determine the internal control systems put in place to manage and mitigate both emerging and principal risks. Some companies may decide to delegate to a committee to oversee such matters.'

> The board should establish an internal control framework with clearly defined roles and responsibilities for those involved. It should agree an approach to reporting, including frequency of reporting and the points at which decisions are made and escalated. Responsibilities may include:
> - developing appropriate risk management systems that identify emerging and established risks facing the company and its stakeholders. Such systems should enable the board to make informed and robust decisions, including those associated with material environmental, social and governance matters, such as climate change, workforce relationships, supply chains, and ethical considerations;
> - determining the nature and extent of the principal risks faced and those risks which the organisation is willing to take in achieving its strategic objectives (determining its 'risk appetite');
> - agreeing how the principal risks should be managed or mitigated and over what timeframe to reduce the likelihood of their incidence or the magnitude of their impact;
> - establishing clear internal and external communication channels on the identification of risk factors, both internally and externally; and
> - agreeing a monitoring and review process.

41.2.5 FRC Guidance on Board Effectiveness

In July 2018, the FRC published its revised non-mandatory and non-prescriptive Guidance on Board Effectiveness[38] to assist boards to understand and consider good practice in the context of their corporate governance obligations. The Guidance on Board Effectiveness adopts the same structure as the Corporate Governance 38 https://www.frc.org.uk/getattachment/61232f60-a338-471b-ba5a-bfed25219147/2018-Guidance-on-Board-Effectiveness-FINAL.PDF.

Code. However, there is not space in this chapter to summarise the good practices identified, other than to note that it places a strong emphasis on tone from the top and the continual monitoring of culture. Two important sources of cultural data identified are (1) whistleblowing, grievance and 'speak-up' data and (2) attitudes to regulators, internal audit and employees. The Guidance on Board Effectiveness also suggests taking an integrated approach, noting that resources, internal audit, risk and compliance all have a role to play. Providing examples of questions the board can pose itself on different issues, the Guidance on Board Effectiveness is a rich source of information for those assisting a company with remediation or cultural transformation in the context of an investigation (or outside the investigative process).

Reporting on section 172 compliance and corporate governance generally 41.2.6

The CA 2006 requires that all companies, other than those entitled to the small companies' exemption, prepare a stand-alone strategic report. The statutory purpose of the strategic report is to 'inform the members of the company and help them assess how directors have performed their duty' under section 172 (duty to promote the success of the company for the benefit of members as a whole) and in doing so to have regard to the non-exhaustive range of stakeholder interests and other considerations set out in that section. The strategic report must include an explanation of the principal risks and uncertainties faced by the business and disclose information about a number of issues, including material anti-corruption and anti-bribery issues.

Since 2007, when it first came into force, section 172 has, therefore, enshrined the importance of the consideration of wider interested groups in the creation of a successful business for the benefit of shareholders. However, in light of a number of high-profile examples of poor corporate governance – where there was little evidence that appropriate regard had been had to the needs of a broader range of stakeholders (including employees, suppliers and pension beneficiaries) – the government brought forward The Companies (Miscellaneous Reporting) Regulations 2018 (Reporting Regulations) to fulfil its commitment to strengthen stakeholder voices in boardroom decision-making.

The Reporting Regulations aim to drive greater transparency by requiring companies who must prepare a strategic report (other than those that qualify as medium-sized) to ensure that their strategic reports for each year beginning on or after 1 January 2019 include a statement describing how directors have had regard to the matters set out in section 172(1)(a)–(f) of the CA 2006 when performing their duties under that section. All qualifying companies, including subsidiaries, must report and publish their section 172(1) statements on their websites, whether separately or as part of their annual report. The FRC has revised its Guidance on the Strategic Report accordingly.

The Reporting Regulations also amend the content requirements of the directors' report to require certain companies (meeting different qualifying criteria) to include a basic level of information on their stakeholder engagement. This includes disclosing how the board has had regard to the interests of its UK employees and to the need to foster the company's business relationships with suppliers, customers and others and, in both cases, explaining the effect, including on the principal decisions taken by the company during the financial year.

While there is a degree of overlap between the section 172(1) statements and the revised content requirements for the directors' report, the government's guidance[39] clarifies that the latter requirements are designed to ensure that company reporting includes information about the 'important aspects of the section 172(1) duty even where directors do not judge the information to be of sufficient strategic importance to be included in the strategic report that year'. Where the board considers its stakeholder engagement information is of strategic importance, it may choose to include that information in its strategic report and not its directors' report, with appropriate cross-referencing in the directors' report.

The Reporting Regulations also impose further enhanced reporting obligations as regards governance arrangements on very large UK-incorporated companies, including subsidiaries, with either more than 2,000 employees globally, or an annual turnover over of £200 million globally and a balance sheet total over £2 billion globally. Premium and standard listed companies which are already required to report on their corporate governance arrangements under the Financial Conduct Authority's (FCA) Disclosure Guidance and Transparency Rules (DTR) 7.2 are not within scope.[40] Premium listed companies are required to apply, and comply or explain their non-compliance with, the provisions of the UK Corporate Governance Code under the FCA's Listing Rules.

Companies in scope must include a statement as part of their directors' report stating which corporate governance code, if any, has been applied and how. If the company has departed from the code, it must set out the respects in which it has done so, and the reasons. If the company has not applied any corporate governance code, the statement must explain why and what arrangements for corporate governance were applied. Statements must also be published on a website maintained by or on behalf of the company.

The PRA's and FCA's new regime for supervising and approving the conduct of individuals in regulated firms, the SMCR replaces and extends the previous oversight rules for individuals, the Approved Persons Regime. This is a response to the perceived 'firewall of accountability' protecting senior management from regulatory enforcement. The SMCR is intended to clarify and enhance the division of responsibilities in firms, improve the conduct of all staff and to make disciplinary action against individuals easier for the PRA and FCA (the regulators).[41]

39 Department for Business, Energy and Industrial Strategy, 'Corporate Governance – The Companies Miscellaneous Reporting Regulations 2018 Q&A', November 2018.

40 Community interest companies and charitable companies are also exempted.

41 Firms caught by the SMCR will either report solely to the FCA (solo-regulated) or to both the FCA and PRA (dual regulated). A firm's reporting route will depend on whether it is dual- or solo-regulated.

The SMCR regulates individuals in three segments, divided roughly according to seniority:

- Senior managers are the most senior individuals responsible for managing aspects of a firm's affairs which risk serious consequences for the firm or business in the United Kingdom.[42]
- Certification regulates other individuals in firms who the FCA considers conduct types of roles that carry a risk of significant harm to consumers or the market.[43]
- The conduct rules govern the behaviour of all other employees within firms whose roles relate to regulated or unregulated financial services activity.

There is no territorial limit, so the SMCR can capture individuals based overseas, and is not limited to employees.

Banks, insurers and the largest FCA regulated firms must also submit to the regulators a very detailed 'responsibilities map' of senior individuals, oversight, governance and reporting lines, and a statement of responsibilities for each senior management function manager (SMF manager) setting out what matters that individual is responsible for. The documents must explain to whom certain standard 'prescribed responsibilities' designated by the regulators have been allocated. These documents must be kept up to date.

Only SMF managers are now approved as fit and proper by the regulators: in contrast to the previous approved persons regime, certified persons (who will in many cases include individuals previously approved by the FCA) will now only be certified as fit and proper by their employer firms, not the regulators. Firms must test and confirm the fitness and propriety of SMF managers and certified staff annually. This is likely to lead to more employment claims from staff who lose their certification.

The regulators can take disciplinary action against individuals in any of these three categories for breach of the conduct rules or for being 'knowingly concerned' in the firm's breach of the regulators' rules. In addition to the previous 'knowing concern' test, there is a new statutory test[44] for taking action against a senior manager where: (1) the firm breaches a regulatory rule or requirement; (2) the senior manager was at the time responsible for the activities of the firm where the breach occurred; and (3) the senior manager failed to take reasonable steps to prevent or stop the breach occurring. The test imposes a 'duty of responsibility' on senior managers, which has made the record-keeping of decisions and execution of duties more important.

42 The description set out in s.59ZA of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 as amended Financial Services (Banking Reform) Act 2013. This is the legislative provision empowering the PRA and FCA to designate senior manager functions.

43 This paraphrases the description set out in s.63E of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 (as amended, ibid.), which is the legislative provision empowering the PRA and FCA to designate certification functions.

44 In s.66A of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 (as amended).

Complementary rules on handover arrangements where senior managers depart, notifications of breaches to the regulators, and requirements for detailed regulatory references when certified or senior management staff leave a firm are designed to enhance the effectiveness of the Regime.

The SMCR is already in force for banks and insurers and at the time of writing was due to be extended to all other FCA regulated firms on 9 December 2019, with the senior management requirements coming into force on that date, and firms afforded a further year to December 2020 to certify relevant employees and train staff on the conduct rules.

See Chapter 30 on individual penalties

Consequences of breach

The potential consequences for staff subject to the conduct rules who are found by the relevant regulator to have engaged in misconduct or market abuse include a private warning, public censure, unlimited financial penalty, and in the case of SMF managers a restriction, suspension or prohibition from being an approved person. While some forms of directors' and officers' insurance cover the costs of representing an individual in an investigation, the FCA has drafted rules to ensure a financial penalty is paid by the person on whom it is imposed. GEN 6.1.4A prohibits a regulated firm from paying any financial penalty imposed on an employee, director or partner of the firm or of an affiliated company. GEN 6.1.5 is widely drafted to prohibit insurance arrangements designed to indemnify any person against all or part of a financial penalty.

41.3 Conclusion

There are many and varied sources of corporate governance obligations and related duties on boards and companies. Although the standards expected of the board as a collective and directors individually will vary depending on the company (listed, regulated, subject to the SMCR, large, complex and so on) and the issues involved, there is considerable convergence in relation to the types of behaviour that are regarded as constituting good practice for identifying and managing risk (including financial crime risk). Directors must ensure that they understand their duties and obligations and their application to their compliance oversight obligations.

Directors' Duties: The US Perspective

Introduction 42.1

Directors are generally viewed as stewards of the corporation and fiduciaries of the corporation's shareholders. Boards of directors are primarily responsible for overseeing the company, and in exercising these responsibilities, directors must discharge their fiduciary duties of care and loyalty and their obligation to act in good faith. Directors, however, confront increasing litigation risk and regulatory scrutiny in navigating their fiduciary duties and the demands of shareholders in the face of corporate compliance crises and independent investigations. In addition, regulators in the United States and around the world have become increasingly focused on the role of the board and its directors with respect to governance, financial reporting and reinforcing the commitment to a culture of compliance. In this chapter, we discuss the fiduciary duties owed by directors in the context of independent investigations, potential director liability for violations of those duties, and strategic considerations for directors to satisfy their fiduciary duties when faced with compliance crises.

Directors' fiduciary duties 42.2

In the United States, the fiduciary duties and responsibilities of members of boards of directors arise primarily out of state corporate law, both from state statutes and evolving case law (also known as common law).[2] Fundamentally, directors owe

1 Timothy P O'Toole and William P Barry are members, and Margot Laporte is counsel, at Miller & Chevalier Chartered.

2 While civil liability for breaches of fiduciary duties arises under state law, public company directors separately may face federal criminal and civil liability for violations of the federal securities laws. For example, among other violations, public company directors may be held liable for financial fiduciary duties of care and loyalty to the corporation and are expected to carry out their obligations in good faith.[3] These duties lie at the core of a director's oversight and stewardship responsibilities to the corporation.

42.2.1 Duty of care

The duty of care refers to the obligation of corporate directors to exercise the proper amount of care as they make business decisions on behalf of their corporation. Directors must 'use that amount of care which ordinarily careful and prudent men would use in similar circumstances, [and] consider all material information reasonably available in making business decisions'.[4] To satisfy their duty of care, therefore, directors must, among other things, be knowledgeable about the corporation, its business, its industry and relevant risks, including by regularly reviewing financial statements and inquiring into corporate affairs; remain informed about decisions faced by the board; and engage in meaningful consideration of the issues.[5] If a director 'feels that he has not had sufficient business experience to qualify him to perform the duties of a director, he should either acquire the knowledge by inquiry, or refuse to act'.[6]

Director liability for a breach of the duty of care typically arises in two contexts: (1) 'ill-advised' or grossly negligent board decisions that result in a loss for the corporation; and (2) liability for a loss that arose from an 'unconsidered failure of the board to act in circumstances in which due attention would, arguably, have prevented the loss'.[7] In the seminal case of Smith v. Van Gorkom, the Delaware Supreme Court found that the directors of Trans Union Corporation had breached their duty of care by acting with gross negligence in failing to make an informed decision regarding the sale of the company.[8] The court cited the fact that the board approved the sale without having reviewed a term sheet or any other documentation to support the adequacy of the sale price and that the board relied, without any basis, on the uninformed statements of a director regarding the proposed agreement.[9] reporting and disclosure violations, and insider trading and other fraud violations, under the Securities Act of 1933 (Securities Act) and the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (Exchange Act). The Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 (Sarbanes-Oxley) and the Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act of 2010 also enhanced director liability under federal law for self-dealing and compensation-related violations, among others.

Directors are only liable for breach of the duty of care if their conduct has amounted to 'gross negligence', meaning that they demonstrated a 'reckless indifference to or a deliberate disregard of the whole body of stockholders or actions which are without the bounds of reason'.[10] Courts have found that 'directors' actions need not achieve perfection to avoid liability', and that directors do not breach a legal duty simply because they 'failed to act as a model director might have acted'.[11] In most cases, monetary damages are unavailable to plaintiffs alleging breach of duty of care, even if they can demonstrate gross negligence. This is because many states, in response to Van Gorkom,[12] enacted statutes permitting corporations to eliminate or limit directors' personal liability for monetary damages for breaches of their duty of care.[13] Significantly, these state laws do not authorise corporations to eliminate or limit directors' personal liability for breaches of their duty of loyalty or good faith obligations, and monetary damages remain available to plaintiffs for such breaches.[14]

The duty of loyalty 'mandates that the best interest of the corporation and its shareholders take precedence over any interest possessed by a director, officer or controlling shareholder and not shared by the stockholders generally'.[15] Corporate directors 'are not permitted to use their position of trust and confidence to further their private interests'.[16]

As a 'subsidiary element' of the duty of loyalty, directors must carry out their duties in 'good faith'.[17] The obligation to act in good faith is not an independent fiduciary duty or direct basis for liability, but rather is at the core of the duty of loyalty – 'a director cannot act loyally towards the corporation unless she acts in the good faith belief that her actions are in the corporation's best interest'.[18] A director fails to act in good faith where the director 'intentionally acts with a purpose other than that of advancing the best interests of the corporation, where [the director] acts with the intent to violate applicable positive law, or where [the director] intentionally fails to act in the face of a known duty to act, demonstrating a conscious disregard for [his or her] duties'.[19]

Courts have interpreted the duty of loyalty as giving rise to the duty to exercise oversight in the day-to-day business operations of the corporation. The Delaware Court of Chancery set forth the standard for directors' obligation to oversee and monitor the corporation in In re Caremark International Inc Derivative Litigation, holding that directors have an affirmative duty to establish a reporting system and internal controls, and to monitor and oversee internal compliance activity.[20] Directors must assure themselves that the system of internal controls is 'reasonably designed' to allow senior management and the board to reach 'informed judgments concerning both the corporation's compliance with law and its business performance'.[21] Failure to do so, the court held, may 'render a director liable for losses caused by non-compliance with applicable legal standards'.[22]

Thus, while 'directors' good faith exercise of oversight responsibility may not invariably prevent employees from violating criminal laws, or from causing the corporation to incur significant financial liability or both',[23] directors are expected to take steps to implement reasonable reporting, information and compliance systems, and to address corporate misconduct of which they become aware.[24]

42.2.3 Oversight obligations under US securities laws

In addition to the standards articulated in Caremark and its progeny, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 sets expectations for public company audit committees (and consequently the independent directors that serve on audit committees) with respect to their oversight of companies' accounting, internal controls and auditing matters. These include oversight of the company's independent auditors, review of audit reports and the establishment of procedures to address complaints regarding the company's accounting and financial reporting.[25] Audit committees may also hire independent counsel to assist them in fulfilling their responsibilities, including in independent audit committee investigations and compliance reviews.[26]

42.3 Liability for breach of fiduciary duties

42.3.1 Caremark claims in private civil actions

Directors may be subject to civil action in their personal capacity by shareholders of the corporation, both directly and in derivative suits on behalf of the corporation, for alleged breaches of their fiduciary duties. of the board as a whole.[27] In most US states, the remedy for breach of a fiduciary duty can be '[a]ny form of equitable and monetary relief'[28] that the court finds 'appropriate'.[29]

Caremark established the standard of liability for alleged breaches of directors' duty of oversight, holding that 'only a sustained or systemic failure of the board to exercise oversight – such as an utter failure to attempt to assure a reasonable information and reporting system exists – will establish the lack of good faith that is a necessary condition to liability'.[30] Caremark, therefore, 'articulates a standard for liability for failures of oversight that requires a showing that the directors breached their duty of loyalty by failing to attend to their duties in good faith'.[31] Liability is premised on plaintiffs' demonstration that 'the directors were conscious of the fact that they were not doing their jobs'.[32]

In Stone v. Ritter, the Delaware Supreme Court affirmed the standard for oversight liability articulated in Caremark[33] and held that a Caremark claim for director oversight liability requires the following conditions predicate: (1) that the directors 'utterly failed to implement any reporting or information system or controls'; or (2) that the directors, 'having implemented such a system or controls, consciously failed to monitor or oversee its operations thus disabling themselves from being informed of risks or problems requiring their attention'.[34] In either instance, directors can only be liable if plaintiffs demonstrate that they knowingly violated their fiduciary obligations.[35]

While Caremark and Stone set a high standard for establishing liability for breach of oversight obligations, board processes and decision-making nonetheless can result in director liability. In Wells Fargo & Co Shareholder Derivative Litigation, for example, the plaintiffs alleged that the defendant directors 'knew or consciously disregarded' that Wells Fargo employees were fraudulently creating millions of deposit and credit card accounts for customers as part of 'cross-selling' activities.[36] In denying Wells Fargo's motion to dismiss, the court relied on allegations that the board had been informed of multiple 'red flags' of improper conduct, including alleged communications between employees and board members regarding the fraudulent activity, several related lawsuits, news reports, investigations by government agencies, employee terminations allegedly aimed at silencing whistleblowers, and emphasis on the importance of cross-selling practices in the bank's financial reports.[37] The court found that the numerous red flags alleged 'collectively supported an inference that a majority of the Director Defendants consciously disregarded their fiduciary duties despite knowledge regarding widespread illegal account-creation activities, and that there is a substantial likelihood of director oversight liability'.[38]

42.3.2 The business judgment rule

The 'business judgment rule' is a standard of judicial review that protects directors from personal civil liability for their decisions as long as the decision was independent, informed, made in good faith, with due care and with the honest belief that the action taken was in the company's best interest.[39] The business judgment rule presumes that 'in making a business decision the directors of a corporation acted on an informed basis, . . . and in the honest belief that the action taken was in the best interests of the company [and its shareholders]'.[40] Therefore, the business judgment rule presupposes that directors have complied with their duty of loyalty to the corporation. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, the board's 'decision will be upheld unless it cannot be attributed to any rational business purpose'.[41] If plaintiffs fail to rebut the presumption, they will not be entitled to any remedy, unless the transaction constitutes corporate waste.[42]

Plaintiffs may rebut the presumption by showing that the directors breached one of their fiduciary duties of loyalty or care in connection with the transaction at issue.[43] In that case, the burden shifts to the director defendants to demonstrate that the challenged transaction was 'entirely fair to the corporation and its shareholders'.[44]

Even if directors have exercised their business judgment, the protections of the business judgment rule will not apply if the directors have made an 'unintelligent or unadvised judgment'.[45] Furthermore, the protections of the business judgment rule will not apply in the event of director inaction, unless the directors made a conscious decision not to act.[46] For this reason, it is critical that boards and directors work with management to develop a process that (1) enables the board to obtain the information it needs in order to evaluate and decide on a course of action, (2) facilitates careful consideration and debate at the board level consistent with fiduciary obligations and (3) results in a record that demonstrates the board's execution of its responsibilities.

Regulatory enforcement actions 42.3.3

In addition to being named in securities class action or derivative suits, public company directors can be subjected to regulatory investigations and enforcement actions under US securities laws. Indeed, directors increasingly face all three proceedings – securities class actions, derivative litigation and enforcement proceedings – in parallel. The Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (the Exchange Act), as amended by the Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act, authorises the US Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) to institute administrative and civil proceedings and to seek monetary and injunctive relief from directors for their violations of the securities laws.[47] The SEC also can request that a court permanently or temporarily bar an individual from serving as a public company officer or director for violations of the anti-fraud provisions of the US securities laws.[48] In addition, the US Department of Justice (DOJ) can criminally prosecute directors for 'willful' or 'knowing' violations[49] of the US securities laws or conspiracy to commit such violations.[50]

There are clear and direct consequences for companies when oversight is found lacking. In evaluating corporate compliance programmes, regulators focus on the types of information that the board has examined in its exercise of oversight in the area in which misconduct occurred. US regulators have been vocal in commenting on the roles and responsibilities of directors, and have been critical of boards of directors that, in their view, failed to exercise reasonable oversight.[51] The SEC and DOJ have been particularly outspoken with respect to financial reporting and Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA) matters. In the settlement made with Sociedad Química y Minera de Chile (SQM) for internal controls and books-and-records violations under the FCPA in 2017, for instance, the DOJ explicitly noted that although SQM's board had been briefed on certain internal controls failures flagged by internal audit, 'no adequate changes were made to SQM's internal accounting controls'.[52]

While we do bring cases against directors, these cases should not strike fear in the heart of a conscientious, diligent director').

Of particular relevance to public company directors, Section 20(a) of the Exchange Act provides that every person who indirectly or directly controls another person found liable for a securities violation under the Exchange Act is liable for that same conduct.[53] For 'control person' liability to attach, the majority of US circuit courts require only that the director exercised control over the general operations of the business that included the violation and could exercise control over the transaction or activity giving rise to it.[54] Section 20(a) provides an affirmative defence to a director who 'acted in good faith' and 'did not directly or indirectly induce' the act constituting the violation.[55]

For example, in 2009, the SEC filed a settled enforcement action against Nature's Sunshine Products, its chief executive officer (CEO) and board member, and its chief financial officer (CFO), alleging that the CEO/director and CFO, in their capacities as control persons under Section 20(a), violated the books-and-records and internal controls provisions of the FCPA.[56] Notably, the SEC did not allege that these individuals had direct knowledge of, or participated in, the underlying improper payments or accounting failures, but rather that the executives failed to identify certain red flags that would have alerted them to the improper payments and failed to perform their corporate duties adequately and in good faith.[57]

42.4 Duty of oversight in investigations

Directors' duty of oversight, and their obligation to act in good faith, are implicated at multiple stages of a corporate investigation – from the decision whether to initiate an investigation, to the decision whether to self-disclose potential wrongdoing to regulators, to decisions authorising negotiation or settlement with regulators. At each stage, directors will need to ask appropriate questions, obtain sufficient information and engage in meaningful consideration to satisfy themselves that the decision is in the best interests of the corporation. Increasingly, independent auditors threaten to initiate reporting procedures under Section 10A of the Exchange Act absent an independent investigation into suspected wrongdoing.[58]

In addition, directors must consider that, in the event the corporation is prosecuted for misconduct, the board's execution of its duty of oversight will be considered by prosecutors and the court in sentencing the corporation.[59]

Moreover, directors play a central role in the remediation process that often results from an investigation. Directors must oversee the process of enhancing or establishing internal controls for financial reporting or other material aspects of the company's compliance infrastructure that are found lacking. This often requires directors to adapt to, and sometimes reassess, their view of company processes and the conduct of management based on facts developed during an investigation. At the same time, directors must interact with external auditors in connection with the issuance of an audit opinion and oversee a financial reporting process that contemplates such changes.

Often, director liability for breach of fiduciary duty arises from the alleged failure of the board to respond to red flags of corporate misconduct. When faced with actual knowledge or red flags of wrongdoing, directors must take good-faith steps to conduct reasonable inquiry to understand the cause and scope of the issue, and to implement appropriate remediation, as necessary. Directors may be subject to oversight liability on the basis of inaction, wilful ignorance or failure to investigate and address possible misconduct in good faith.

As reflected in Wells Fargo, there are numerous ways in which a director may be considered to be on notice of possible wrongdoing at the corporation.[60] These include internal and external audit reports, whistleblower complaints, consumer complaints, news reports, regulatory investigations and related civil litigation claims. The case law emphasises the need for directors to respond to repeated signs of misconduct, as courts and regulators may interpret the absence of a response as a conscious disregard of the directors' duty of oversight. As the Delaware Court of Chancery explained, 'a Caremark plaintiff can plead that "the directors were conscious of the fact that they were not doing their jobs," and that they ignored "red flags" indicating misconduct in defiance of their duties. A claim that an audit committee or board had notice of serious misconduct and simply failed to investigate . . . would survive a motion to dismiss, even if the committee or board was well constituted and was otherwise functioning'.[61]

Importantly, by virtue of the audit committee's oversight of accounting, internal controls and auditing matters, the independent directors naturally receive information regarding the corporation's internal controls and compliance system that implicates their duty of oversight. This level of knowledge could subject the independent directors to increased risk of regulatory scrutiny and private shareholder action if they fail to respond to internal control deficiencies and red flags of potential misconduct that are reported to them.

Sentencing Guidelines Manual § 8B2.1(b)(2)(A) ('The organization's governing authority shall be knowledgeable about the content and operation of the compliance and ethics program and shall exercise reasonable oversight with respect to the implementation and effectiveness of the compliance program.').

42.5 Strategic considerations for directors

While there is no effective one-size-fits-all approach to satisfaction of fiduciary duties, directors can take certain steps to meet the ongoing challenges and expectations of regulators and shareholders. Implementation of these strategies may not eliminate the risk of director liability, but they will demonstrate directors' adherence to the core principles of their fiduciary duties.

- Risk-based compliance framework: Directors should require management to demonstrate that the company has adopted an effective risk-based compliance framework to identify high-risk compliance issues and prioritise resources accordingly.
- Remaining informed: Directors should implement a formal process that facilitates communications between the board and management regarding the compliance framework and business performance. Directors should remain informed about ongoing and acute risks, as well as about the broader business environment and industries in which the company is operating.
- Independent investigations and compliance crises: Directors should establish a crisis management strategy and investigative protocol before such measures are needed, including a framework for the board's response if an independent investigation is necessary. This may include proactive delegation of oversight responsibility to the company's audit committee or a special litigation or investigation committee. This also may include an annual presentation from management, including the legal and compliance functions, as to the company's readiness if a government inquiry, whistleblower complaint or other occurrence gives rise to consideration of an independent investigation.
- Training: Directors should have sufficient training not only to be familiar with principles of corporate governance and the corporation's business, but also to provide directors a basis from which they can ask questions regarding compliance risks and analyse responses consistent with their oversight responsibilities.
- Overseeing the external auditor relationship: The audit committee owns the relationship with the external auditor. Too often, directors limit their interaction with the external auditor to engagement of the auditor and a quarterly discussion in advance of the issuance of a filing. The better course is for independent directors, particularly those on the audit committee, to establish a deeper relationship that provides for a foundation of trust and familiarity from which both parties can act when an unexpected problem arises.
- Making the record: A documented approach to corporate governance and adherence to fiduciary duties can mitigate directors' risks in the event of litigation or an enforcement proceeding. Real-time documentation, including through minutes of audit committee or special investigative committee meetings, are critical evidence of directors' fulfilment of their oversight obligations in the context of a board committee's evaluation of issues involving investigations and compliance crises.

Effective board processes enable directors to execute their responsibilities in accordance with applicable fiduciary duties and the expectations of regulators and the market. Adherence to sound principles of corporate governance protects directors and promotes tangible benefits to the company in the form of:

- heightened investor confidence and corporate reputation;
- increased efficiency and avoidance of costly investigation due to early issue spotting and risk mitigation; and
- higher levels of customer and employee retention.

Nicholas Purnell QC
Cloth Fair Chambers

Nicholas Purnell's practice in commercial and business crime and in regulatory and professional disciplinary matters has spanned over four decades. Typically instructed at the early stages of investigations pre-charge, he advises clients in cases under examination by global regulatory and prosecuting authorities including the Serious Fraud Office (SFO), the Financial Conduct Authority, the US Department of Justice and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The development of collaborative investigations across jurisdictions has brought about the need for teams to be in place to provide joint advice on the impact of managing the response to investigations on a global basis. Nicholas has specialist experience in the development of the appropriate strategy to enable businesses to develop and cope with the resource demands imposed by such investigations.

Nicholas acted for ICBC Standard Bank throughout the first ever deferred prosecution agreement to be approved in the United Kingdom. Following months of negotiations with the SFO, Nicholas appeared before the President of the Queen's Bench Division at the High Court where the terms of the agreement were finalised. This case marked Nicholas's hat-trick of firsts: the first civil settlement with the SFO for Balfour Beatty; the first attempt at a simultaneous global settlement in the United States and the UK with the SFO in Innospec; and the combination of this first charge under section 7 of the Bribery Act in achieving this deferred prosecution agreement with the SFO.

Nicholas successfully represented clients in the United Kingdom over allegations made by the SFO against Tesco and Barclays and advised one of the three DePuy International executives who was on trial in Athens.

VOLUME II
GLOBAL INVESTIGATIONS AROUND THE WORLD

Introduction to Volume II

Judith Seddon, Eleanor Davison, Christopher J Morvillo, Michael Bowes QC, Luke Tolaini, Ama A Adams and Tara McGrath[1]

Boards and senior executives have never been more concerned that they or their organisation may come under the scrutiny of enforcement authorities. And with good reason. Recent years have seen an upsurge in confidence among enforcement authorities across the globe, which has manifested and led to increased numbers of investigations, fines of unprecedented orders of magnitude and senior executives facing the much more realistic prospect of investigations concerning their own conduct and, in some cases, prosecution, conviction and imprisonment.

In many jurisdictions, the introduction of new offences and changes to the law of corporate criminal liability have provided enforcement authorities with increased opportunities to pursue criminal investigations and ultimately to prosecute corporate entities. Coupled with this has been the incentivisation of corporates to co-operate with investigations and provide information to assist authorities in pursuing culpable individuals through negotiated settlements. In some jurisdictions, notably the United States, co-operation is an established feature of the enforcement landscape and is regularly used to bring investigations to a pragmatic conclusion without the commercially destructive consequences prosecution of a corporate entity can bring. In others, such as the United Kingdom and France, legislation enabling corporates to conclude investigations short of prosecution is still comparatively young.

The law relating to criminal and regulatory investigations shows no sign of standing still. Law and practice across the globe has changed, often in response to highly publicised scandals. Relationships between enforcement authorities continue to grow closer, and there is a marked trend in politicians, prosecutors and regulators carefully watching the way other jurisdictions choose to combat corporate crime, as they assess the most effective mechanisms to apply in their own national contexts. Recent examples of changes to legislation in terms of either extending corporate criminal liability or legislating for its resolution through deferred prosecution agreements (or both) include significant changes being made in Singapore, Japan, Canada, Australia and Ireland at the time of writing. A similar trend may be observed in the regulatory sphere through the implementation of individual accountability regimes modelled on or drawing from the UK Senior Managers and Certification Regime in, for example, Hong Kong, Australia and Singapore.

All these macro factors, together with important changes to technical local legislation (e.g., the EU General Data Protection Regulation), present numerous, significant challenges to corporates and individuals around the world. They can quickly find themselves the target of fast-moving and far-reaching investigations, whose possible outcomes may vary significantly in different jurisdictions.

In Volume II of this Guide, which now covers 25 jurisdictions, local experts from national jurisdictions respond to a common set of questions designed to identify the local – continually evolving – nuances of law and process that practitioners are likely to encounter in responding to the increasing number of cross-border investigations they face. For the first time, Volume II includes four regional overviews: Asia-Pacific, Europe, Latin America and North America.

Asia-Pacific Overview

Kyle Wombolt and Pamela Kiesselbach[1]

Introduction

The region has witnessed significant corporate investigations, substantive legal reform and aggressive enforcement in recent years. The Banking Royal Commission in Australia, corporate criminal liability provisions inspired by the UK Bribery Act across several jurisdictions in Asia, and the omnipresent focus of the US Department of Justice (DOJ) on China means that companies in the region face clear business risk. And while the continued impact of the United States cannot be underplayed, national authorities are demonstrating an increasing appetite for investigating and prosecuting large cases themselves. Partly as a result of this, there is a continuing increase in complex, multi-jurisdictional investigations. This highlights a further regional trend – increased co-operation between regulators in different jurisdictions. On a practical level, enhanced information sharing requires a coordinated response by investigated parties to manage competing requests for information, determine appropriate remedial steps and ultimately find solutions to conclude multiple investigations. In a region combining civil law and common law jurisdictions, we also see different approaches to data privacy and legal privilege. This can lead to challenges for corporates and their advisers when conducting internal investigations and responding to external regulatory investigations. We highlight below some of the overarching themes and developments that we have been seeing.

Areas of enforcement risk

Bribery and corruption remain core areas for law enforcement, with domestic and international agencies homing in on conduct in the region. National anti-corruption agencies in Australia, Indonesia, Malaysia and China have all bolstered their powers of investigation and oversight. In tandem, some governments (such as Australia and China) have introduced more stringent corporate penalties. Regional efforts such as the Guangdong–Hong Kong–Macao co-operation project highlight a focus on multilateralism in combating regional graft. In terms of international enforcement, misconduct in China has long been the subject of more corporate bribery investigations under the US Foreign Corrupt Practices Act than any other jurisdiction. Further, in the past year, the US DOJ has launched its China Initiative. This focuses on Chinese companies' outbound activity and reflects the US's desire to pursue prosecution where Chinese companies' offshore activities affect US national interests.

Money laundering, tax evasion, (accounting) fraud, competition and cybercrime are other key areas for corporate investigations in Asia-Pacific.

Anti-money laundering (AML) and terrorist financing have been under the spotlight, with several evaluations being undertaken by the Financial Action Task Force (e.g., in China and Hong Kong), and visits on the horizon for Japan, Korea and key south-east Asian countries. Many jurisdictions, including Hong Kong, Singapore, Vietnam and India, are ramping up domestic AML legislation and corporate enforcement. The region's focus on money laundering is best highlighted by hydra-styled investigations such as 1MDB,[2] which started in Malaysia but has spread to the highest levels of public office and corporate business globally, including world-famous banks. Governments are pursuing regulatory and criminal actions against financial and other institutions for their failure to implement sufficient controls to monitor global transactions.

Banks, in particular, are subject to increasing scrutiny through audits, examinations, inspections and investigations. In tandem, authorities are increasingly relying on sophisticated technology to identify suspicious payment patterns. A recent example is the Singaporean law enforcement agencies' collaboration with OCBC Bank to quicken financial crime detection. Project Poet (Production Orders: Electronic Transmission) automates data retrieval from the bank such that information that would have taken three months to process will now be available to law enforcement agencies within one or two working days. Project Poet also makes use of artificial intelligence and data analytics to improve Singapore's anti-money laundering risk management systems.

Tax evasion is another area in which there has been heightened activity in the region. This has been led by the United States under its Foreign Account Tax Compliance Act (FATCA) and the aftermath of its Swiss bank programme, when the US DOJ announced that it would be following funds that are the subject of US tax evasion from Switzerland to financial centres in Asia, such as Hong Kong and Singapore. The pressure on taxpayers and financial institutions has been accelerated and broadened further by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development's Common Reporting Standard. The 'follow the money' initiatives that are being pursued by a number of jurisdictions, including the United States, have highlighted Asian financial centres as targets. The Indonesian tax amnesty – the aim of which was repatriating off-shore funds – is another obvious example, as a vast majority of the funds were located with banks in Singapore. The upshot is further focus on banks in the region, with authorities in India, Australia and New Zealand showing an appetite for reviewing tax-sharing information to root out corporate tax evasion, particularly through multilateral treaties to prevent base erosion and profit shifting.

2 1Malaysia Development Berhad is an insolvent Malaysian strategic development company.

Fraud, particularly tax and accounting fraud, continue to occupy law enforcement too. In one of the most significant recent examples, Punjab National Bank – one of India's largest state-owned banks – reported massive fraudulent activity at its Mumbai branch by junior branch officials issuing fraudulent letters of credit, resulting in fraudulent transactions amounting to nearly US$2 billion.

Cybercrime is now a board-level issue regardless of jurisdiction, but some of the biggest corporate investigations have been in Asia-Pacific. Asia is considered relatively insecure in terms of infrastructure, meaning cyberattacks are more common there. Singapore, one of the leading global digital economies, has become a target, particularly in the health sector. Elsewhere, Toyota Corp suffered a series of data breaches in Australia, Thailand, Vietnam and Japan, while in the Philippines, retailer Cebuana and two fast-food chains, Wendy's and Jollibee, suffered major cyberattacks. In response, domestic authorities and regulators have increased compliance and reporting requirements. This turns up the temperature on corporates, who must be ready for internal and external investigations emanating from cybercrime.

A shift from individual to corporate liability

Historically, enforcement agencies in Asia-Pacific have focused on individual criminal liability in the context of public sector bribery, often concentrating on prosecuting the government officials receiving the bribes. However, there have been some clear shifts in focus, demonstrated by legislative changes and statements made by enforcement agencies. The most uniform shift in a number of Asia-Pacific jurisdictions relates to the introduction of corporate criminal liability and accountability of senior management. Thailand, India, Japan, Singapore, Malaysia, Indonesia and China have all introduced legislation making it easier either to attach corporate criminal liability or to penalise companies involved in bribery. Australia has announced a review of corporate criminal responsibility, to be delivered in 2020. India, Indonesia, Malaysia and Thailand were all inspired by the UK Bribery Act section 7 corporate offence in crafting their own legislation. In simple terms, under these often still fairly new rules, companies may be held criminally liable if their employees or agents or otherwise 'associated persons' commit bribery or other criminal offences while acting on behalf, or for the benefit, of the company. As is the case under the UK Bribery Act, these rules take into account whether a company had adequate procedures in place to prevent the criminal offence when determining the company's liability. While some provisions are limited to bribery offences (e.g., in Malaysia and India), others are more broadly drafted to cover other criminal offences as well (e.g., in Indonesia). On the other hand, the new corporate criminal liability offence recently introduced in Vietnam covers tax evasion and money laundering offences and does not extend to bribery offences.

The corporate liability offences plug gaps in domestic regimes, give law enforcement and regulators greater powers, and ease the requirement of meeting the difficult threshold of showing involvement of the 'directing mind and will' of the company to establish corporate liability. Critically, there is increasing pressure on companies to put adequate procedures and controls in place to prevent bribery if they wish to escape liability for misconduct carried out by employees or agents when acting for the company.

The new corporate liability provisions in Malaysia and India make it clear that they cover foreign entities that carry on their business, or part of their business, in the jurisdiction. Indonesian laws go one step further and provide that a group company, including a parent or affiliate company, may be held criminally liable if it is considered to be involved in the bribery. As a result, companies operating in the region should ensure that appropriate internal control measures are in place or re-evaluate their measures so that they comply with relevant domestic guidelines. The increased corporate exposure has also resulted in investors and, in some instances, lenders conducting heightened compliance-related due diligence on local companies before entering into a merger or a joint venture, or making an investment to gauge and manage their exposure.

Senior managers are also facing enhanced exposure to liability, putting their companies under additional compliance risk. A Senior Managers Regime, similar to the UK's Senior Managers' and Certification Regime, has been introduced in Hong Kong and Singapore to enable the financial sector to improve the individual accountability of senior managers. Anti-bribery provisions in Malaysian, Indian and Indonesian laws potentially extend criminal liability to senior management. This means that senior managers may be held liable for bribery committed under their watch when they are seen to have either proactively authorised or at least known of, and acquiesced in, bribery. Although largely untested at this stage, there is a risk that liability may be inferred when there is a suspicion of bribery and a senior manager does nothing to stop the bribery or turns a blind eye to clear indications of bribery. Indonesian law potentially goes further, in that senior management may be held responsible for wrongdoing by employees or agents acting on behalf of a company simply based upon their status.

Other trend shifts relate to broadening the focus to cover private sector bribery and supply-side bribery to an increasing extent. Notable illustrations of the former are the recent introduction of a private sector bribery offence in Vietnam and the fact that around 70 to 80 per cent of bribery-related prosecutions in Singapore and Hong Kong relate to incidents within the private sector. Although public sector bribery is still traditionally considered to attract a higher level of enforcement risk, it is important not to lose sight of the criminality of private sector bribery. In jurisdictions that still 'only' provide for prohibitions on public sector bribery (e.g., India and Indonesia), the scope of who may be considered a 'public official' is often extended. Further, recent legislative changes in India have introduced a supply-side bribery offence and officials at Indonesia's anti-graft body, the Corruption Eradication Commission (KPK), have been issuing statements indicating that they intend to focus more on the givers of bribes and not just on the public officials receiving the bribes.

Culture

Culture has become a central tenet of –– and compliance imperative for – corporate investigations in the region. Banks in particular have been facing a culture and conduct storm. The Banking Royal Commission in Australia best illustrates the role of corporate culture at the meso (organisation) and macro (industry) levels.

With most jurisdictions moving to disclosure-driven, risk-based systems, an assessment of corporate culture involves a top-down review to assess the readiness of a company to limit the occurrence of misconduct and its reaction to it once on notice. A failing corporate culture can be evidenced by any of the following: a lack of corporate policies and training, poor tone from the top, turning a blind eye, and express or tacit authorisation of poor conduct.

UK Bribery Act-inspired legislation in certain jurisdictions, particularly those with adequate procedures defences, highlights the growing relevance of corporate culture in Asia.

Further, corporate culture continues to affect enforcement outcomes. For example, the US DOJ Criminal Division's updated Guidance on the Evaluation of Corporate Compliance Programs helps to benchmark the effectiveness of a company's compliance programme. The Guidance assists US authorities with decisions when conducting an investigation, determining whether to bring charges or negotiating pleas or other arrangements. Whether in the United States, Asia-Pacific or elsewhere, the Guidance sets out useful prompts for a best practice compliance framework. Given the propensity of regulators to borrow from each other's procedures and practices, it will also be of interest to companies subject to regulatory scrutiny, investigation or enforcement outside the United States, as a benchmark for appropriate remediation and resolution.

Guidance was also recently issued by the Prime Minister's Department in Malaysia setting out anti-corruption programmes and procedures to be adopted by companies doing business in Malaysia. The guidance (which is similar to guidance issued in the United Kingdom under the Bribery Act 2010) describes an effective, risk-based compliance programme that minimises the risk of misconduct occurring and, where it does occur, mitigates the potential consequences for the company.

Information-sharing and multi-jurisdictional investigations

It is rare for an allegation into corporate misconduct to remain a domestic affair, such is the global nature of today's commerce and communication. Regulators are ramping up cross-border co-operation and resolutions in response. Some very high-profile corporate investigations demonstrate how concurrent multi-jurisdictional investigations are now the norm. It is noteworthy in this context that cross-border information-sharing between authorities is often informal and will not always follow formal and time-consuming procedures under mutual legal assistance treaties.

The Rolls-Royce settlement covered allegations that Rolls-Royce bribed officials in multiple countries for a period of more than 20 years. The British company's alleged bribery of Garuda Airlines and other Indonesian officials was covered in the £671 million settlement Rolls-Royce reached with the UK's Serious Fraud Office (SFO), the US DOJ and Brazil's Federal Prosecution Service in January 2017. The KPK in Indonesia has been questioning individuals at Garuda, and in August 2019 arrested Garuda's former president, Emirsyah Satar, who stands accused of accepting several illicit payments totalling €1.2 million (US$1.5 million) and other items worth US$2 million. The KPK has charged him with money laundering and will take forward his prosecution, while also pursuing related individuals. Meanwhile, Garuda is suing Rolls-Royce for compensation in the Indonesian courts. More recently, Indian authorities, including the Central Bureau of Investigation, have also opened an investigation into the use by Rolls-Royce of third-party intermediaries to win contracts.

GlaxoSmithKline plc (GSK) is another famous example of a global brand being caught up in bribery in Asia, leading to investigations and charges in multiple jurisdictions. Between 2004 and 2010, GSK's sales teams in China were alleged to have bribed doctors to prescribe GSK products. A Chinese court fined GSK China a record 3 billion yuan (US$492 million) for bribery in 2014. The former head of GSK China and four other former GSK senior executives were also found guilty, and GSK China's financial compliance and legal departments were found to have been complicit. Related international investigations have been carried out in the United States by the DOJ and the Securities Exchange Commission (SEC) for potential violations of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, and in the United Kingdom by the SFO for possible breaches of the Bribery Act. The US investigation ended in a settlement in October 2016, with GSK paying the US SEC a US$20 million civil fine. The DOJ and the SFO later declined to prosecute.

Privilege and data privacy: complexities in Asia-Pacific

With a mixture of common law and civil law jurisdictions, law enforcement agencies and regulators in Asia-Pacific adopt very different approaches to legal professional privilege and data protection. For example, China, Japan, Korea, Indonesia, Thailand and Vietnam do not recognise legal privilege, but lawyers owe duties of confidentiality over documents provided to them by their clients. However, this can be overridden by authorities in investigations.

In contrast, common law jurisdictions such as Hong Kong, Singapore, Malaysia, India, Australia and New Zealand all recognise legal privilege to a greater or lesser extent. In general, internal investigation notes and investigation reports produced in the context of corporate investigations may be covered by legal privilege and protected from disclosure in common law jurisdictions, depending on the extent of involvement of either internal or external lawyers in the investigation process. In the same vein, there is a basis for pushing back against seizure of privileged material during dawn raids or other inspections by authorities and regulators. This does not apply in civil law jurisdictions, meaning that in cross-border investigations, the approach of authorities and regulators on the question of legal privilege can be diametrically opposed. Corporates and their lawyers will often try to assert legal privilege in civil law jurisdictions, expecting it to be claimed as part of a broader regional investigation in which common law jurisdictions are also involved. However, this will not prevent documents and data being seized or handed over to authorities and regulators in civil law jurisdictions. Such bodies could potentially then share the evidence with authorities and regulators overseas, resulting in a broader loss of privilege protection.

A related issue is data privacy. In the context of cross-border investigations, the extent to which Asian countries restrict data transfers off-shore varies. India, for example, has no specific legislation covering data protection, and provisions on international data transfers in its proposed (draft) Data Protection Bill are expected to be watered down before it is brought into force. New Zealand is also in the process of bolstering its existing data privacy regime. In contrast, China and Korea, for example, already impose very strict data protection requirements. In China, state secrets laws are usually also engaged, preventing the transfer off-shore of documents that may contain politically sensitive information. In practice, most multinational companies in the region tend to seek employee consent to data use and transfer at the on-boarding stage. However, these may not suffice under local laws, which should always be checked.

The extraterritorial nature of the EU General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) adds a further potential layer of complexity for corporates operating in Asia-Pacific, since many have branches or processing operations within the European Union. The mega-fines issued recently pursuant to the GDPR are a sober warning to all companies, regardless of location. Ensuring that the processing of data complies with the GDPR, where it applies, is a commercial imperative. In the context of investigations, the GDPR, in line with most domestic data privacy laws, gives authorities the right to receive from investigated companies or other authorities, personal data in the context of regulatory criminal investigations. In internal investigations, a combination of processing conditions under the GDPR and local data privacy law exemptions and derogations (where applicable) will dictate whether transfers are permissible. This needs to be assessed in each individual case and will remain an area of interest in investigations in the region.

Increased pressure and incentives to co-operate

Asia-Pacific has seen the emergence of corporate settlement regimes in recent years. As seen in the United States and the United Kingdom, deferred prosecution agreement (DPA) regimes create strong incentives for self-disclosure by companies, and those that disclose, co-operate and remediate may avoid prosecution in favour of fines or monitorship.

These voluntary self-reporting regimes are to be differentiated from statutory reporting obligations that exist under many anti-money laundering laws across the region and in some jurisdictions in relation to some predicate offences. Anti-money laundering laws may require the reporting of a suspicion of criminal proceeds flowing from a criminal act such as bribery. Laws in Malaysia and Vietnam go further and require the reporting of a bribery offence (regardless of whether the offence has resulted in criminal proceeds). The failure to report will often in itself constitute a criminal offence, and reporting obligations will need to be kept in mind whenever potential criminal misconduct is being investigated.

In anticipation of a new DPA regime in Australia, various authorities, including the Federal Police, have issued self-reporting guidelines to assist corporations that wish to self-report actual or suspected foreign bribery offences. Self-reporting (together with co-operation) will be taken into account both in deciding whether to prosecute and, if prosecuted, as a mitigating factor during sentencing. Early guilty pleas by a company may also result in significant reductions in sentencing. Federal DPA legislation is expected to be introduced in Australia in late 2019. New Zealand's regime falls short of a DPA system, but certain agencies, such as the Financial Markets Authority, may obtain 'enforceable undertakings' that help companies avoid prosecution.

Financial regulators such as the Securities and Futures Commission in Hong Kong, in limited circumstances, entertain negotiation resulting in reduced sanctions or declinations to prosecute. India and China have no non-prosecution agreement or DPA system, although in practice, self-reporting and co-operation may be taken into account in mitigation.

DPAs were introduced in Singapore in late 2018. This followed on the heels of the first multi-jurisdictional DPA entered into with the US DOJ involving Singapore authorities. This was a rare example of a Singapore company being penalised by Singapore authorities under national anti-bribery laws for bribery committed abroad. It was by far the highest penalty levied against a Singapore company and was the first DPA involving co-operation between the Brazilian, Singapore and US authorities. Singapore's DPA regime is similar to the UK's except that Singapore DPAs cover a more limited range of criminal offences and Singapore prosecutors are not required to issue guidelines on when a DPA is appropriate and on what 'discounts' may be offered in the case of self-reporting, meaning that prosecutors retain maximum flexibility. Further, the Singapore DPA regime is unusual in that, unlike other jurisdictions with a DPA regime, Singapore has not yet introduced a corporate bribery offence, which means that there is likely to be less of an incentive to self-report and seek a DPA.

In Japan, a plea bargaining regime was introduced in June 2018. Unlike DPAs, this applies to individuals, not companies. Suspects and defendants will be rewarded with leniency if they co-operate by providing information or evidence in resolving another person's crimes or by giving depositions against partners in crime (including corporates). This is likely to lead to an uptick in corporate investigations, as individuals become incentivised to inform the authorities about the activities of others, including their employers.

Whistleblowing regimes are a corollary of DPAs; both encourage early notification and co-operation. Australia has introduced new whistleblower protection laws, which came into effect on 1 July 2019. These strengthen protection and compensation for whistleblowers and impose on regulated companies the requirement to implement corporate whistleblowing frameworks, including confidentiality and non-retaliation provisions. India passed a Whistleblowing Act in 2014 but it has not yet been brought into effect. Japan is consulting on expanding whistleblower protections as current laws have been criticised as a toothless tiger, owing to the lack of sanctions on companies that treat whistleblowers unfairly. Hong Kong and Singapore still lack dedicated whistleblower legislation, but do have provisions in a patchwork of laws and regulatory requirements to protect whistleblowers in certain circumstances. China's whistleblower legislation goes further than most in the region in including a reward mechanism for whistleblowers who report crimes to people's procuratorates. Various other financial reward schemes are scattered in sector-specific regulations. However, this does not compare to the huge financial incentives and bounties available in the United States under the Dodd-Frank Act. Regardless of incentives and protections, in Asia at least, there remain cultural and hierarchical norms that often militate against blowing the whistle and reporting up. These may mean that new legislation has limited traction, but time will tell.

Europe Overview

Judith Seddon, Amanda Raad and Chris Stott[1]

Introduction

The European investigations landscape is characterised by a patchwork of varying legislative and regulatory frameworks and enforcement approaches, which are often shaped by past events and current political priorities in particular jurisdictions. These variations and the pace of change mean that cross-border investigations, whether involving multiple European jurisdictions or parallel investigations by enforcement authorities in other regions (or sometimes both), frequently present thorny practical and tactical challenges.

This overview does not seek to duplicate the commentary and analysis set out in many of the chapters in this volume. Rather, it looks at some of the key priorities of enforcement authorities, focusing on anti-bribery and corruption and anti-money laundering, areas where there is particularly significant ongoing activity and in which some authorities are adapting their approaches to make effective use of changes in the law and additions to their toolkits. It also looks ahead to seek to identify the key issues and trends on which those who are subject to investigations around Europe should be focusing.

Areas of enforcement risk

Anti-bribery and corruption

A substantial number of investigations by enforcement authorities have arisen following significant legislative developments introducing corporate offences of failure to prevent bribery, which have extraterritorial effect (such as the UK Bribery Act 2010 (UKBA) and France's Sapin II Law). These legislative developments have been accompanied by new mechanisms enabling criminal investigations involving corporate organisations to be concluded through negotiated settlements. To date in Europe, these mechanisms have been mainly (although not exclusively) used in cases concerning historic bribery and corruption involving corporate organisations. In the United Kingdom, momentum is building for the corporate 'failure to prevent' offences relating to bribery and the facilitation of tax evasion[2] to be extended to cover economic crime more generally.[3]

Further important changes to anti-bribery and corruption legislation are in progress in other jurisdictions. For example, in Ireland an offence analogous to the UK corporate offence of failure to prevent bribery came into force in July 2018.[4] At the time of writing, this offence has not formed the basis of any publicised enforcement action. In the absence of guidance akin to that published by the UK Ministry of Justice in relation to 'adequate procedures' under the UKBA, there is some remaining uncertainty among corporate organisations and their advisers as to exactly what they need to do to be deemed to have 'taken all reasonable steps and exercised all due diligence' and thereby availed themselves of a defence to the corporate offence. As noted below, it seems that the new corporate offence in Ireland is likely to be followed by the introduction of deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs). Arrangements for investigating and prosecuting bribery and corruption and other corporate crime in Ireland are also being overhauled. Together, these developments may have the effect of increasing the number of investigations in this area. Given the nature of the Irish economy, and in particular its attractiveness to multinational technology and financial services companies, there is potential for these investigations to have significant cross-border elements.

Other significant changes are under way in Poland, where legislation enabling prosecutors to take action against corporate organisations for anti-bribery and corruption and other economic offences is in the course of being introduced. This legislation will increase maximum fines and enable corporate organisations to avoid trials by voluntarily admitting liability.

In jurisdictions where changes have already been made, clearer legislation and high-profile successes where it has been used have buoyed the confidence of authorities and bolstered their resources.[5]

Anti-money laundering

Although approaches and the resources available for investigations vary quite considerably between European jurisdictions, anti-money laundering (AML) remains high on most enforcement authorities' agendas. Some of the highest penalties to have been imposed in recent years have resulted from investigations by the UK's Financial Conduct Authority (FCA) and by France's National Finance Office (PNF) for breaches by major institutions of regulatory requirements and criminal law in relation to their AML systems and controls.

The size of fines is not the only notable feature of enforcement activity in this area. Reflecting an increasingly close focus on individual accountability (particularly in financial services, as discussed in more detail below), regulators are showing themselves to be ready and able to pursue individuals whom they consider to have played a part in AML failings.

At the time of writing, enforcement activity in this area is particularly intense in Scandinavia, where regulators and prosecutors are taking action against a number of institutions and individuals in relation to well-publicised AML failings. The uptick in enforcement activity already seen in this part of the region looks set to continue as authorities seek to restore confidence in the robustness of financial crime compliance regulation. Enforcement action in such future cases is likely to be conspicuously more decisive and coordinated and penalties considerably higher than those imposed in past cases. National legislators have signalled their intent clearly. For example, in Denmark, the maximum fines that may be imposed for AML failings have been increased eightfold.[6]

Elsewhere in Europe, some authorities are increasingly exploring how AML compliance provides a template for how firms should comply with their other regulatory obligations. For instance, in the UK the FCA has stated that it expects regulated firms to take steps to prevent rather than simply react to criminal market abuse.[7] In doing so, it has taken rules that have long been a central tenet of AML compliance and applied them to a different section of its financial crime remit.

Increased pressure and incentives to co-operate

In England and Wales, the body of cases in which DPAs have been concluded between the Serious Fraud Office (SFO) and co-operating corporate organisations is slowly growing, although the 20 agreements per year predicted during the passage of the legislation that introduced DPAs still seem some way off.

Notwithstanding recommendations from the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development that they should be available across the United Kingdom, the Scottish prosecution authority (the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (COPFS)) has eschewed the introduction of DPAs and has confirmed that it remains committed to the continued use of civil recovery proceedings in cases where prosecution of corporates is not deemed appropriate.[8] This disparity, in conjunction with the fact that the UKBA applies equally in all parts of the United Kingdom, has led to parallel investigations by the SFO and COPFS in at least one ongoing investigation.

In France, the authorities responsible for investigating and prosecuting financial crime, the French Anti-Corruption Agency (AFA) and the PNF, have now concluded five judicial public interest agreements (CJIPs) with companies of various sizes, including one in which global penalties imposed exceeded US$1 billion.

Mechanisms similar to DPAs and CJIPs (or aspects of them) exist in some other jurisdictions around Europe, including Belgium, the Czech Republic, Romania and Slovakia, although these arrangements do not cover corruption offences in all cases, nor is the practice and procedure as clearly set out in these jurisdictions, and there are yet to be any publicised concluded cases of the same magnitude as seen in the United Kingdom and France.

As noted above, it looks likely that Ireland will be the next jurisdiction in which it will be possible for corporate organisations to conclude criminal investigations through negotiated settlements. In August 2019, the Irish Law Reform Commission proposed the adoption of arrangements similar to the UK DPA regime. This would closely follow the entry into force of a new corporate offence of failure to prevent bribery.

Where they are available, authorities' and courts' expectations as to what is expected of co-operating corporate organisations for negotiations to take place, and for a settlement to be agreed and approved, are becoming clearer. In particular, the AFA and the PNF in France and the SFO in the UK (in June and August 2019, respectively) have released guidance that clarifies what they consider amounts to co-operation to create the right conditions for a negotiated settlement to follow.[9] Courts and prosecutors have also provided guidance on whether corporate organisations may claim to be demonstrating required levels of co-operation while maintaining claims to legal professional privilege (where it is available).

Culture and individual accountability

Among the most prominent themes in investigations concerning corporate organisations is the focus on culture, both at the time when alleged misconduct occurred and when any investigation is commenced. The definition of what constitutes 'good culture' is elusive. Authorities, deciding whether to commence, continue and discontinue investigations and selecting which charges to pursue, attach substantial importance to whether they consider alleged conduct (including individuals' conduct outside the workplace) to be indicative of a poor culture.

In some cases, culture is forming the primary basis for enforcement action. In the United Kingdom in 2018–2019, the FCA opened more cases concerned with culture and governance than in any previous year. Its most recent statistics indicate that this type of case now accounts for more than 10 per cent of all active investigations.[10] The FCA is likely to remain a comparatively active authority in relation to these types of investigations, and has reiterated its commitment to pursuing more enforcement action in this area, including against individuals.[11]

When doing so, it and the Prudential Regulation Authority (PRA) have the benefit of the Senior Managers and Certification Regime (SMCR), which has been in force for banks since 2016 and insurance firms since 2017, and which will be extended to all financial services firms from December 2019. The SMCR in the UK goes further than previous regulatory initiatives directed towards individual accountability. It gives the FCA and the PRA powers to take action against a much broader population of individuals within firms. It also requires firms to document the specific responsibilities of their most senior executives, thus providing the FCA and PRA with clear road maps that may be used to hold those individuals accountable for breaches of regulatory requirements by firms. The FCA is now routinely using the SMCR for this purpose during enforcement investigations. Enforcement authorities around Europe have been watching carefully how the UK regulators are seeking to use these mechanisms to drive up standards of behaviour within the financial services industry by taking dissuasive enforcement action against individuals. It appears likely that similar changes will follow in due course elsewhere in Europe.

The UK regulators are not the only ones to attach particular importance to individual accountability and culture. For example, the SMCR was preceded by amendments to the Banking Code in the Netherlands, including a requirement from 1 April 2015 for bankers to swear an oath or declaration that they will perform their duties to the best of their ability and with integrity.[12] While some commentators have pointed to improvements in standards of individual conduct within Dutch institutions since these reforms were introduced, it has not led to substantial increases in the numbers of investigations or enforcement cases pursued against individuals.

In July 2018, the Central Bank of Ireland released a report produced in conjunction with the Dutch national financial services enforcement authority (De Nederlandsche Bank) based on behaviour and culture reviews of five Ireland-based retail banks.[13] The report's recommendations mirror many of those made by the UK Parliamentary Commission on Banking Standards, from which the SMCR ultimately flowed. They include the introduction of new Conduct Standards and a Senior Executive Accountability Regime, both of which would be similar in most respects to the SMCR. The report also recommends the unification of currently fragmented investigative processes to enable enforcement action to be more effectively and efficiently pursued, particularly against individuals.

Even in countries where enforcement authorities have not explicitly named culture as an enforcement priority, boards are increasingly concerned to demonstrate their commitment to culture. Cases across Europe have shown the substantial reputational damage that can result from allegations of poor cultural practices and the speed at which allegations can cross borders (including into jurisdictions where enforcement authorities are active in this area).

Information sharing and multi-jurisdictional investigations

European investigation and enforcement authorities continue to collaborate actively with one another and with their counterparts globally, using mutual legal assistance and less formal arrangements. There have been particularly noticeable increases in efforts to collaborate across borders in jurisdictions where anti-bribery and corruption legislation has recently been overhauled and where authorities have acquired the ability to enter into global settlements involving overseas enforcement authorities.[14]

Across Europe, traditional boundaries between enforcement authorities' remits are becoming increasingly blurred. Enforcement authorities are having to take an increasingly flexible view of what they are responsible for investigating, which authority should take the lead and how they should most effectively collaborate. Overlaps between the remits of antitrust, data protection and financial services enforcement authorities are becoming increasingly apparent.

Enforcement authorities, conscious of the potential for duplication and delay, are anticipating these overlaps, both within and between jurisdictions. For example, in the United Kingdom, the FCA and the Information Commissioner's Office have in place a detailed memorandum of understanding (most recently updated in February 2019) setting out how they will work together following incidents in which they both have an interest.[15] A particular area where collaboration is required is data privacy. Regulators responsible for this area across Europe are building up their enforcement capabilities following the implementation of the General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR). The body of decided cases in respect of breaches of the GDPR is growing relatively rapidly, and some very significant penalties have been imposed in cases that have also featured close collaboration between national authorities.

Although convictions and other enforcement outcomes in one jurisdiction will commonly be the product of extensive information-sharing between authorities, there are as yet few significant concluded examples of enforcement authorities simultaneously pursuing enforcement cases against the same targets in multiple European jurisdictions. No negotiated settlements in criminal cases entered into by European enforcement authorities have yet involved coordinated settlements in more then one European jurisdiction (although there is at least one case in the pipeline which could involve negotiated settlements in the United Kingdom and France).

EU institutions as enforcement authorities

There have to date been relatively few examples of supranational European authorities (other than the European Commission (EC) in its role as an antitrust enforcement authority) taking overarching enforcement action. That said, there are some signs that frameworks to facilitate a greater number of such cases may develop, both as a response to past incidents in which regulatory arrangements have been found to have been lacking and in an effort to counter perceived growing threats.

14 For example, in France, the National Finance Office [PNF] made 103 requests for mutual legal assistance and extradition to overseas agencies in 2018 (after the introduction of Sapin II) compared with 14 such requests in 2014 – Bilan et Activité 2018 du Parquet National Financier (January 2019) <https://www.tribunal-de-paris.justice.fr/sites/default/files/2019-01/PNF_synthese%202018.pdf>.

15 UK: See 'Memorandum of Understanding between the Information Commissioner and the Financial Conduct Authority' <https://ico.org.uk/media/about-the-ico/documents/2614342/financial-conduct-authority-ico-mou.pdf>.

Investigations in response to AML failings in various Scandinavian institutions provide an example. The investigation by the European Banking Authority (EBA), commenced in February 2019, was concerned with the adequacy of Danish and Estonian regulators' AML supervision and enforcement arrangements, and in particular whether deficiencies in these arrangements amounted to a breach of EU law.[16]

The EBA's investigation did not examine in detail the underlying alleged misconduct by institutions or individuals and was closed in April 2019 without any formal action being taken. Politicians around Europe and the EBA itself have pointed to this investigation as an illustration of the need for its investigative and enforcement powers to be bolstered to enable it more effectively to coordinate action by national authorities and to take more wide-ranging action if those authorities' responses to wrongdoing are not sufficiently robust.

Adding to the EBA's enforcement powers in this way would take time and would require further European legislation. The most effective form for this to take would be a directly applicable regulation imposing uniform powers in all EU Member States. Until now, AML legislation encouraging closer collaboration between national investigation and enforcement authorities has taken the form of successive Money Laundering Directives (which, as they are directly effective instruments requiring transposition by Member States into their national laws, have been implemented in different ways and to different extents).

In some instances, bilateral and multinational arrangements are in place, helping authorities to deploy their resources as effectively and efficiently as possible in cross-border AML investigations. The most recent example, which is also a response to the concerns about previous enforcement arrangements already mentioned, is a formal mechanism to enable Baltic and Nordic AML regulators to exchange information and coordinate enforcement action. There are also increasingly sophisticated mechanisms in place in some jurisdictions to enable information-sharing between private sector organisations and enforcement authorities.[17] However, arrangements are far from uniform across Europe. The extent to which the requirements set out in successive Money Laundering Directives have been effectively transposed, and other provisions relating to cross-border collaboration and resourcing of national authorities have been implemented, varies widely between jurisdictions.

Away from AML enforcement, the EC remains active as an antitrust enforcement authority. Some long-standing themes continue to feature in European antitrust investigations. There are exceptions to rules relating to legal professional privilege (in jurisdictions where it is part of the legal landscape). Leniency provisions often do not dovetail neatly with other regulatory mandatory reporting obligations. There are significant variations in the approaches taken by the EC and national competition authorities. These and other themes mean that European antitrust investigations have to be handled differently from those pursued by other regulators.

In other areas, authorities with a pan-European remit have been active. The European Anti-Fraud Office (OLAF), the division of the EC responsible for investigating fraud against the EU budget and corruption and serious misconduct within EU institutions, has been particularly active in bringing investigations. Its most recent available statistics indicate that it concluded 197 investigations and commenced 215 investigations during 2017 and recommended that national authorities take action to recover more than €3 billion.[18]

17 In the UK, with effect from October 2017, previously voluntary arrangements enabling information sharing within the private sector and between private sector organisations and enforcement authorities were placed on a statutory footing – section 11, Criminal Finances Act 2017 (which amended Proceeds of Crime Act 2002).

Also at the investigative level, Europol has conducted extensive work to seek to coordinate national responses and lay the foundations for possible future multilateral criminal enforcement action in a number of areas, including notably in relation to large-scale cyber attacks.[19]

It seems likely that levels of coordinated pan-European criminal enforcement action will increase in years to come. A new European Public Prosecutor's Office (EPPO) is due to become operational in late 2020. In Member States that have signed up to the arrangements establishing it (which is 22 at the time of writing, with Sweden, Hungary, Denmark, Ireland and Poland having opted out), EPPO will have powers to investigate and prosecute crimes against the EU budget, such as fraud, corruption and tax fraud valued at over €10 million. It will not replace OLAF or other existing investigating and prosecuting authorities (or national enforcement authorities) but will pool experience, adopt a consistent prosecution policy and be able to use streamlined procedures for the exchange of information across borders. In September 2019, Laura Codruța Kövesi, who formerly headed Romania's National Anticorruption Directorate and served as the Romanian prosecutor general, was confirmed as the head of EPPO and Europe's new chief prosecutor. She has indicated a willingness to use EPPO's powers extensively when the agency becomes operational.[20]

Brexit uncertainty

At the time of writing, significant questions remain unanswered as to what the effect of Brexit will be on the mechanisms by which UK authorities work with their counterparts in mainland Europe, especially if no deal is agreed. The withdrawal agreement negotiated between the UK government and the European Union (but which has not been approved by the UK Parliament) does provide for some continuity in relation to existing mechanisms, such as European investigation orders, at least until new arrangements are negotiated. A no-deal situation would mean that authorities would have to fall back on a tangled web of specific agreements. Delays would inevitably follow and practical issues could conceivably flow from the operation of blocking statutes in some jurisdictions (most notably in France and Switzerland).

Latin America Overview

Pamela Alarcón and Diego Cardona[1]

Introduction: anticompetitive practices, corruption and compliance

There cannot be free competition in corrupted contexts; therefore, the degree of competition in open markets will be distorted because of corrupt practices. The connection between anticompetitive practices and corruption is more evident in public tendering or procurement in public contracts, considering the immense effect these offerings can have on a government's finances. Collusive behaviour, conspiracies or agreements to raise prices, lower the quality of goods or obtain public contracts, cost governments and taxpayers billions of dollars and the consequences can be seen in last year's grand corruption scandals in Latin America. The highest-profile corporate investigations in the region currently are those involving corruption in public contracts and concessions in sectors such as infrastructure, health and public function.

The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) recognises that the:

> most common intersection of corruption and anticompetitive conduct occurs in government procurement when bid rigging can be combined with or facilitated by bribery of public officials or unlawful kickbacks. Collusion and corruption are distinct problems within public procurement, yet they may frequently occur in tandem, and have mutually reinforcing effect. Corruption is a big barrier to competition, discouraging genuine competitors from bidding for a contract in cases where they are apprehensive of unfair competition or are unwilling, or unable, to pay bribes.[2]

Most Latin American governments have come to recognise the need to promote free competition as a key to achieving growth and development. An appropriate framework for competition has been linked to better performing economics, and consequently business opportunities increase for citizens and the cost of goods and services decrease. By the same token, unilateral acts and agreements that prevent, restrict or hinder free competition injure the economy and society. Therefore, most Latin American countries have been strengthening their competition and antitrust legal framework to fight anticompetitive conduct such as price-fixing, predatory practices, bid rigging and other collusive practices in public tendering. Allowing participants to compete on equal grounds and without barriers has become an essential goal of competition regulations.

This chapter analyses antitrust laws and regulations, and specific provisions for collusion in public tendering in Colombia, Peru and Chile. It discusses internal and government investigations and litigation from a regional perspective.

Legal framework

In general, competition laws in Latin America aim to protect free competition, thereby promoting economic efficiency and consumer welfare. To achieve these goals, national competition regimes in Latin America prohibit anticompetitive practices that hinder free competition in local markets, ultimately affecting the corresponding economic systems. Competition laws typically prohibit both unilateral conduct and anticompetitive agreements, including price-fixing, output restrictions, market allocation and bid rigging, among others. Competition authorities in the region have increasingly turned their enforcement attention to bid rigging in public procurement processes, as this type of conduct typically affects public resources raised by governments for the welfare of society as a whole.

The following analysis focuses on provisions that address collusion in public tendering.

Chile

The Chilean antitrust regulation is contained in Decree Law 211, 1973 (DL 211) and its subsequent amendments. Article 1 of DL 211 stipulates that the objective of the Law is to promote and defend free market competition. In turn, Article 3 establishes a general prohibition against performing or executing, individually or collectively, any act or agreement that prevents, restricts or hinders free competition, or that tends to produce such effects. Such conduct will be sanctioned, without prejudice to the preventive, corrective or prohibitive measures that may be provided in each case.[3]

Regarding collusive practices in public tendering, Article 3(a) of DL 211 prohibits agreements or concerted practices that involve behaviour between competitors that aims to affect the outcome of bidding processes.[4]

Historically, under this regulation, for such practices to be punishable by law, the authorities had to prove that the person or entity in question obtained market power as a result of the conduct. However, in 2016, the regulation was amended, and obtaining market power is no longer a prerequisite for the punishment of anticompetitive conduct.

4 Id.

For enforcement of the Chilean antitrust law and regulations, there are two independent bodies. The prosecuting authority is the National Economic Prosecutors Office (FNE), and the authority in charge of preventing and sanctioning anticompetitive conduct is the Antitrust Court (TDLC).

Law No. 19.911.7, 2003 and Law No. 20.361, 2009 regulate most of the FNE's faculties and its relationship with the TDLC. In addition, Law No. 20.361, 2009, Article 8, which modified Article 39 of DL 211, strengthened the FNE's power to fight cartels and other serious competition offences.

Several legal powers of the FNE are established in sections (f), (k), (l) and (m) of Article 39 of DL 211 and include:

> (f) to request the collaboration of government services and their employees in the exercise of its functions;
> (k) to require reports from technical government bodies and hire the services of experts and technicians;
> (l) to sign agreements with government services and universities or other (overseas) competition agencies for the purpose of promoting and defending free competition;
> (m) to enter into agreements for the transfer of information with other State bodies or electronic interconnection with private parties or overseas agencies.

Further regulations dictate when the FNE may collect information from private parties and establish that such information can only be gathered in the course of an investigation. Article 43 of DL 211 provides that the FNE's public officials must 'treat all the information or data to which they may have access in the exercise of their tasks and, especially, that information or data obtained as a result of their powers, as confidential'.[5]

Colombia

The current Colombian antitrust regime is marked by the enactment of Law 155, 1959, which was issued before the 1991 National Constitution. Law 155 provides the basic legal standard applying to anticompetitive conduct, agreements and unilateral acts, set forth as a general prohibition against:

> Any agreements or arrangements that directly or indirectly have as their purpose to limit the production, supply, distribution or consumption of national or foreign raw materials, products, goods or services and, in general, any type of practice and procedure or system tending to limit free competition and to maintain or determine inequitable prices.[6]

The Colombian antitrust regime was modernised and restructured in 1992 through Decree 2153, which introduced a list of certain specific agreements and unilateral acts that are deemed contrary to free competition, and certain actions constituting abuse of dominance. Under the provisions of Decree 2153, both agreements and unilateral acts that have anticompetitive purpose or anticompetitive effects are considered unlawful. The general prohibition under Law 155 is still in force, serving as a catch-all for anticompetitive conduct not otherwise specified under the provisions of Decree 2153.

The Colombian competition regime was further updated with the enactment of Law 1340, 2009, which introduced significant amendments to modernise the free competition protection system and to optimise the tools available for enforcing competition law, notably, substantially increasing the applicable fines for competition violations and introducing a leniency programme, among others.

The Superintendence of Industry and Trade (SIC) is the authority that monitors competition matters and enforces competition laws. The SIC is an administrative body attached to the Ministry of Commerce, Industry and Tourism, which has investigative and sanctioning powers.

Collusion in bidding and tendering processes, including in public tendering, is considered contrary to free competition under Article 47(9) of Decree 2153, which specifically prohibits those agreements 'whose object is the collusion in tenders or contests or those whose effect is the distribution of contract awards, the distribution of contests or the fixing of terms of proposals'.

Moreover, in 2011 bid-rigging in public procurement proceedings was established as a criminal offence by Article 27 of Law 1774, which added Article 410a to Colombia's Criminal Code, prohibiting collusive practices in public tendering, regarding agreements or concerted practices that involve behaviour between competitors with the aim of affecting the outcome of public bidding processes. The Attorney General's Office (the SIC has no criminal law enforcement authority) is in charge of enforcing criminal liability for directors, legal representatives or employees who have taken part in collusive practices in public tendering.

Peru

The main law that governs free competition in Peru is Legislative Decree 1034, 2008 (D. 1034), which enacted the Law of Repression of Anticompetitive Conduct. The Peruvian regulatory framework for the defence of free competition aims to promote economic efficiency in the market, as a means to improve consumer welfare.

In general, the Peruvian competition laws prohibit abuse of dominance, as well as horizontal and (certain) vertical collusive practices.

Article 11 of D. 1034 describes horizontal collusive practices as 'agreements, decisions, recommendations or concerted practices made by competitors, with the purpose or effect of restricting, preventing or distorting free competition'. This provision includes a sample list of types of conduct that can be considered collusive, including efforts to 'agree or coordinate offers, bids, proposals or abstaining from bidding in public or private invitations to tender or contests, or other forms of public procurement, and in public auctions'.

Moreover, horizontal agreements on bids or abstaining from bidding in public bids, tenders or other forms of public procurements or actions are considered as absolute prohibitions under Article 11.2 of D. 1034. Similar to per se violations, agreements under the absolute prohibition standard do not require analysis of competitive effects, only requiring the competition authority to prove the occurrence of the conduct to demonstrate the existence of the infraction.

The absolute prohibition standard is opposed to the relative prohibition standard, which requires the competition authority to demonstrate the existence of the conduct and its potential negative effects within the market.

The Peruvian competition regime is enforced by the National Institute for the Defence of Competition and Protection of Intellectual Property (INDECOPI).

Article 384 of the Peruvian Criminal Code makes it a crime to engage in collusion in public tendering. The most important element in the crime of collusion is defined or known as the concertation (agreement), between a public servant and a private party. The concertation for collusion requires an agreement between the parties to defraud a public entity. Accordingly, under this crime, a simple request or proposal is not sufficient to be punishable within the framework of a criminal process.

The law on collusion in public tendering requires the offender to be an official or public servant. For the existence of an illegal agreement, an interested party within the private sector must participate. The participating private party (known as extraneous) is considered a primary accomplice, and, according to Article 25 of the Peruvian Criminal Code, is sanctioned with the same penalty as the initiator of the crime.

Any agreement that falls within the scope of the crime of collusion must be clandestine and necessarily harm the interests of the state, or cause damage. For this, public servants or officials must violate their functions, prioritising their own interests before those of the state.[7]

Cultural context

In this section, we analyse compliance of antitrust laws that address collusion in public tendering, to identify trends and behavioural patterns within antitrust authorities.

Chile

Since its implementation, the antitrust regime in Chile has been accompanied by a strong legal culture, marked by increased compliance and respect for the law, especially regarding collusive practices in state-contracted bidding. This can be evidenced in the limited number of bid rigging cases persecuted by the Chilean Competition Authority,[8] which led its last bid rigging investigation in 2018 after more than five years of inactive investigations.[9] There is thus a shortage of cases, rather than a disinterest in pursuit from the Chilean authority. Consequently, for the Chilean market, there is a lack of recognisable patterns at this time.

Colombia

In the past decade, the media has taken an increased and sustained interest in cases involving collusive practices in public tendering, helping expose them to the public. Negative opinion surrounding such conduct can be traced back to the 'public procurement carousel',[10] which inspired a significant institutional movement with the aim of protecting public procurement and combating collusive practices. In response to the scandal, the Colombian government promoted the enactment of a new law on corruption in state procurement processes – Law 1471, 2011. It criminalised collusive practices in public tendering and made the Attorney General's Office a critical player in the battle against this type of illicit behaviour. In addition to other administrative and legal efforts, the SIC promoted new institutional projects, including the creation of an Interdisciplinary Group of Collusion in 2012,[11,12] and its relaunch in 2016 as an Elite Group Against Collusive Practices in Public Tendering.[13]

In 2015, the SIC and the Attorney General's Office signed a co-operation agreement to enforce anti-collusive practices in the private sector. This agreement includes the exchange of information and evidence collected, and training programmes for public servants. It also includes a system to post complaints to the Attorney General's Office once the SIC begins an administrative investigation.

Following these efforts, the past decade has seen an increase in the number of investigations carried out by the Colombian competition authority. Between 1992 and 2009, there were some 16 decisions against anticompetitive behaviour relating to collusive practices in public tenders.[14] Between 2010 and 2017, the SIC formally opened 24 investigations into bid rigging in public procurement, imposed sanctions in 13 cases and closed two cases for lack of evidence. These 15 decisions (13 sanctions and 2 closed files) on bid rigging in public procurement amount to approximately 24 per cent of all antitrust cases decided by the SIC during this period.[15] Finally, between January 2018 and May 2019, the competition authority sanctioned 23 market agents for bid rigging in public procurement cases.[16]

Between 2004 and 2018, the SIC's rulings concerning collusive behaviour in public procurement processes tackled some of the most significant corruption scandals in the country.[17] The SIC maintained its focus on investigating and sanctioning collusive practices regarding infrastructure and the provision of services.

In 2018, the SIC formally charged 23 companies for competition law violations relating to hardcore cartel practices in public tendering during 2014 and 2017 (Resolution Order N. 27915). The Resolution indicated that:

- among the alleged cartelists, the parties would determine who would be the bidder or bidders in each contracting process in which they would apply the cartelist or collusive strategy;
- the proponent or bidder who was slated to win the bid would offer the competitors a sum of money or bribe. The SIC established that, in some cases, the bribe payment was made through façade collection accounts that were purportedly for transport services offered;
- the competing bidders who accepted the bribe payment then refrained from improving their offers in the reverse auction. As a result, the bidder slated to win by the cartelists was awarded the contract, after the alleged competitors withdrew from the process; and
- to ensure the highest possible award, the proponent made offers substantially close to the official budget provided by the contracting entity.

In those cases, the SIC ordered copies of the administrative actions to be sent to the Attorney General's Office for criminal investigations for collusive practices in public tendering.

Peru

The Peruvian competition authority investigates and sanctions colluding with private entities, primarily for improper price arrangements and other practices, such as the abuse of the dominant position. Unlike Colombia and other Latin American jurisdictions, collusion cases in public tendering are not a frequent occurrence.

The few cases of collusion in public tenders have involved the purchase and sale of goods and services for state agencies, for instance, haemodialysis services, lubricant containers, and medicinal liquid and gaseous medical oxygen.

These cases occurred during a period of approximately 10 years and affected the capacity of the Peruvian government to service its citizens. This is not surprising as, in Peru, public procurement represents more than 11 per cent of the nation's gross national product.[18]

In 2018, INDECOPI published a document titled 'Guide to Fight Collusion in Public Procurement', which establishes certain parameters and analysis for government officials to identify warning signs for colluding practices within public procurement processes.

In criminal cases, the main problem faced by prosecutors relating to collusive practices is to find evidence to prove the existence of an illegal agreement. In most cases, collusive agreements are verbal and not written. Therefore, unless one of the accused confesses or the conversation has been recorded, prosecutors face serious problems in obtaining a conviction for collusion.

In some critical cases, prosecutors have reached agreements with the accused in exchange for a confession, which has allowed prosecutors to bring criminal convictions. Nevertheless, these cases are the minority.

When prosecutors fail to find enough evidence to prove the collusive agreement, generally they choose to modify the accusation for the lesser crime of incompatible negotiation,[19] which requires a much lower standard of evidence than collusion (i.e., prosecutors do not need to prove that there was an unlawful agreement, only that the public official had a particular and illegal interest in the contract). However, since the crime of incompatible negotiation is exclusive to public officials, all other persons are excluded from the criminal investigation (i.e., charges are dismissed) and nobody is punished for the illegal conduct.

Administrative sanctions

Chile

The antitrust court may sanction a person who engages in any of the practices described in the 'Legal framework' section, above, namely (1) modifying or terminating those acts or agreements that hinder free competition or (2) ordering the modification or dissolution of partnerships and corporations involved in such conduct, with fines up to the equivalent of 60,000 annual tax units (approximately 35,955 million Chilean pesos).[20]

In the case of the conduct foreseen in Article 3(a) of Decree Law 211 of 1973, the antitrust court may also prohibit colluding private companies from contracting in any capacity with public entities, with autonomous organisms or with institutions, organisations, companies or services in which the state makes contributions, with congress and the judiciary, and from awarding any concession granted by the state, for a period of up to five years.

Colombia

The current competition regime expanded its scope of application with the enactment of Law 1340, 2009. Article 2 of Law 1340 establishes that a natural or legal person who affects, or may affect, the development of economic activities may be subject to sanctions. Under Article 25, a contracting entity that violates free competition rules may be sanctioned, if the crime is proven, with economic fines in favour of the SIC up to 100,000 legal monthly minimum wages (approximately 82 billion Colombian pesos) or, if greater, up to 150 per cent of the profit derived from the conduct displayed by the offender.

In addition to administrative sanctions imposed on economic entities, any natural person who collaborates, facilitates, authorises, executes or tolerates such infractions will be subject

20 The annual tax unit (UTA) corresponds to the monthly tax unit (UTM) implemented in the last month of the respective commercial year multiplied by 12 or according to the number of months comprising the commercial year. to administrative sanctions. In such a case, as per Article 26 of Law 1340, the legal representatives and the senior managers will have to pay fines of up to the equivalent of 2,000 times the legal monthly minimum wage (approximately 1,666,368,000 Colombian pesos) in favour of the SIC.

Peru

If a person engages in any of the practices described in the 'Legal framework' section, above, the INDECOPI may impose the following administrative sanctions.[21]

Economic sanctions

In accordance with D. 1034, INDECOPI may impose economic fines of up to 4,291,601.25 Peruvian soles depending on the severity of the conduct. If the infraction is considered very serious, the fine may exceed the limit set forth by law but is capped at 12 per cent of the gross annual income of the offender.

A related person who promoted or participated in the illegal practice, such as legal representatives, managers or directors of the company, may be sanctioned too. The maximum fines for each representative involved can total 429,069.10 soles.

Corrective measures

In addition to the sanctions imposed for the infringement, INDECOPI at its own discretion may impose corrective measures to restore the competitive process and reverse the effects of the illegal practice.

Corrective measures may include:

- an order to cease illegal activities;
- an obligation to contract with a supplier; and
- the declaration of ineffectiveness or unenforceability of certain anticompetitive clauses or agreements.

The corrective measures that are applied should be based on the degree of impact or harm on the competitive process.

Antitrust compliance programmes

Promoting competition and reducing the risk of corruption and anticompetitive practices in the private sector is a priority of international organisations, such as the OECD. Different guidelines and recommendation documents have been issued to make governments and companies aware of the need to avoid practices that prevent, restrict or hinder free competition. As a result, competition law in many countries has been strengthened, and authorities have been fighting against practices such as collusion.

Currently, it is common to find domestic regulations that protect whistleblowers and enforce leniency programmes, encouraging those with relevant information to come forward, to better enable authorities to conduct investigations of bid rigging in public tendering. In the same way, severe sanctions, including criminal liability and imprisonment, which serve to

Therefore, companies should be aware of the implications and contingencies (legal, reputational and operative) of competition law breaches, mainly those pertaining to collusive practices. For example, if an employee colludes with someone from another company, administrative and criminal sanctions in some jurisdictions could be imposed not only on the individuals – including directors and board members – but also on the corporation or legal person.

In that situation, and if an investigation is started by any competition authority, the employee and the company would be likely to try to seek immunity and the company and the employees may have the same interests; however, the authorities may be interested in granting immunity just for one of them, and to prosecute and sentence the other. In most cases, that 'other' would be the company, considering that it is more attractive for authorities in the region to sanction and impose fines on corporations than individuals. Thus, the authorities use employees as a tool to gather information and evidence on companies' anticompetitive practices.

To avoid this situation, companies should strengthen their compliance programmes, unequivocally condemn price-fixing and collusion, and adopt a zero-tolerance policy towards cartels.

An antitrust compliance programme should include, among other things:

- a clear tone at the top, meaning that the directors and executives commit to abide by the antitrust policies established by the company;
- risk assessments for anticompetitive practices;
- the programme should be implemented effectively and in harmony with policies such as the anti-corruption policy;
- training for employees and executives in identifying antitrust practices;
- the implementation of a channel for complaints and whistleblowing on antitrust issues; and
- guidance or a procedure to ensure information is accurately preserved for later use.

Conclusion

A robust legal culture has emerged in Latin America during the past decade, with increased levels of compliance and respect for the law, especially regarding collusive practices in state-contracting bids. Authorities have more power and legal tools to pursue competitive law infractors. Thus, different kinds of sanctions have been added over the years, including criminal and administrative sanctions for natural and legal persons.

Consequently, companies are more aware of the importance of preventing anticompetitive and antitrust practices that may affect their business and cause damage to customers and the market. Therefore, adopting an antitrust compliance programme in harmony with anti-corruption policies is a useful tool for preventing the commission of such practices and the imposition of fines and sanctions.

North America Overview

John D Buretta and Allison Eisen[1]

In late 2018, Canada, Mexico and the United States entered into the aptly named United States-Mexico-Canada Agreement. This Agreement, which imposes obligations on signatory countries to enforce anti-corruption laws, signalled the beginning of a renewed effort to coordinate prosecution efforts across North American borders. The winter of 2018 also saw a convergence at the doorsteps of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York of investigative matters spanning the United States, Canada and Mexico. As federal prosecutors were preparing for trial against the famed Mexican drug cartel leader Joaquín Archivaldo Guzmán Loera, also known as El Chapo, other prosecutors in the District were preparing for an extradition battle over Meng Wanzhou, a Chinese national and Huawei executive arrested in Canada on a US federal warrant seeking her extradition to the United States on charges of bank fraud, theft of trade secrets and sanctions evasion. These two matters, among others discussed below, reflect the expanding multilateral nature of enforcement actions in North America, and shed further light on authorities' ability to gather evidence, seek extradition and otherwise coordinate with authorities around the world. A nuanced understanding of the progress, and playbook, on North American corporate enforcement continues to be critical.

The United States-Mexico-Canada Agreement

In late 2018, each country in North America agreed to abide by the United States-Mexico-Canada Agreement, a tripartite treaty that contains an entire chapter on anti-corruption enforcement and compliance.[2] The treaty imposes a range of obligations on signatory countries, effectively to enforce anti-corruption laws and to enact legislation in support of anti-corruption efforts.[3] The agreement obliges each country to enforce its anti-corruption laws adequately through active prosecution, and provides clear, uniform definitions for terms, such as illicit enrichment and embezzlement.[4] Importantly, the treaty also requires co-operation between the United States, Mexico and Canada, both in sharing resources and experience and in the exchange of information to prevent, detect and deter bribery and corruption.[5] The agreement further extends to promote integrity, honesty and responsibility among public officials of the signatory nations.

Co-operation between the United States and Mexico

Recent cross-border interactions

Conviction of Joaquín Archivaldo Guzmán Loera

In perhaps the most high-profile conviction of a Mexican citizen by the United States in recent memory, in February 2019, Joaquín Archivaldo Guzmán Loera (known as El Chapo) was convicted by a federal jury in Brooklyn of being a principal leader of a continuing criminal enterprise – the Mexican organised crime syndicate known as the Sinaloa cartel – on charges that included 26 drug-related violations and one of conspiracy to commit murder.[6] The case of El Chapo was investigated by the US Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA), Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, working in close consultation with their counterpart authorities in Mexico.[7]

Building the case against El Chapo necessarily required extensive co-operation between authorities in the United States and Mexico. The Sinaloa cartel was built on border crossings – cartel members smuggled narcotics from Mexico to wholesale distributors in the United States, then transported billions of illicit dollars back across the border to the Sinaloa area of Mexico – so marshalling evidence required monitoring activity and gathering evidence that spanned a significant geographical range.[8] Throughout the 2000s, officials from both countries worked to build a case against El Chapo, from money laundering to murder charges, and worked for years to pinpoint his exact location.[9] On 22 February 2014, Mexican Marines, with co-operation from US government agencies, arrested El Chapo in Mazatlán, Mexico.[10]

Following the second of El Chapo's two escapes from prison, Mexican officials, sharing intelligence with their US counterparts, together engaged in a manhunt and recaptured him.[11] Despite a history of publicly stating that El Chapo would serve out his sentence in Mexico, the Mexican government subsequently agreed to extradite the cartel leader to the United States to face charges in the Eastern District of New York.[12] The extradition process was not without conflict, however. Mexico outlawed capital punishment in 1975 and has remained steadfast in its refusal to extradite suspects who face the death penalty in the United States.[13] US officials agreed to take the death penalty off the table.[14]

Following his extradition on 19 January 2017, El Chapo was due to stand trial in the United States, which would prove to be another testament to the advanced co-operation between Mexican and US authorities.[15] The evidence presented at El Chapo's trial included testimony from 14 co-operating witnesses, narcotics seizures, weapons, ledgers, text messages, videos, photographs and intercepted phone recordings.[16] The co-operation of witnesses was crucial to building the case against El Chapo. This was particularly true of Vicente Zambada-Niebla, a high-ranking member of the cartel and the son of El Chapo's cartel partner, who was extradited from Mexico to the United States and provided critical testimony about the inner workings of the criminal enterprise.[17]

Following El Chapo's conviction, DEA Acting Administrator Uttam Dhillon stated that the 'success of [the] case is a testament to the strength of [the United States'] relationship with Mexican counterparts'.[18] The strength of this relationship was tested at each stage of the enforcement action, from building the case until conviction at trial.

Past cross-border investigations with Mexico

Although El Chapo's trial and conviction may present the most high-profile example, sustained co-operation between US and Mexican authorities has been evident in corporate investigations during the past few years, and may well expand as Mexico enhances its enforcement tools and efforts.

In December 2016, the US Department of Justice (DOJ) secured guilty pleas from six individuals – four businesspersons employed by Hunt Pan Am, a Houston-based company that provides aircraft maintenance and related services, and two former Mexican government officials – in a cross-border bribery scheme.[19] The criminal proceeding, which was investigated by US Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the Internal Revenue Service, involved corrupt payments paid to Mexican foreign officials who had responsibility for maintaining Mexico's aircraft, in violation of the US Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. In exchange for the payments (which were made to and from bank accounts in Texas, owned by Hunt Pan Am and the government officials) the government officials awarded contracts for aircraft maintenance and parts to Hunt Pan Am.[20]

The US Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) has likewise pursued cross-border investigations with Mexico, including in a matter using satellite imagery of land in Mexico as evidence against a Mexican company and its employees. In March 2017, the SEC announced that Mexico's largest homebuilder, Desarrolladora Homex SAB de CV (Homex), 'had agreed to settle charges that it reported fake sales of more than 100,000 homes to boost revenues in its financial statements during a three-year period'.[21] Later that year, the SEC announced related charges against four of the company's former executives, each of whom was a Mexican citizen residing in Mexico.[22]

The SEC alleged that Homex improperly recognised billions of dollars of revenue by 'systematically and fraudulently report[ing] revenue from the sale of tens of thousands of homes annually that it had neither built nor sold'.[23] The SEC's complaint contained satellite images of land in the Mexican state of Guanajuato showing 'housing units which Homex claimed to have built or sold, and for which it had recorded sales and reported revenue', but had clearly not been built.[24] Melissa Hodgman, Associate Director of the SEC's Enforcement Division, noted that the SEC 'used high-resolution satellite imagery and other innovative investigative techniques to unearth that tens of thousands of purportedly built-and-sold homes were, in fact, nothing but bare soil'.[25]

Although Homex is based in Mexico, the SEC claimed jurisdiction because the company's stock had been listed on the New York Stock Exchange.[26] The SEC's announcement of the settlement noted that it 'appreciates the assistance of the Mexican Comisión Nacional Bancaria y de Valores',[27] a regulatory agency that supervises Mexican financial entities. Mexico's enhanced corruption enforcement

During the past year, Mexico has made a concerted effort to enforce its existing criminal code to combat corruption. President López Obrador, who was elected in 2018, ran on a campaign of taking on the 'mafias of power' and shifting away from what has traditionally been viewed as relatively lax enforcement of Mexico's corruption laws.[30] Following López Obrador's election, the Senate enacted a new law that created a Chief Prosecutorial Office and appointed Alejandro Gertz Manero, a former attorney general of Mexico, to fill the role of chief prosecutor.[31] Gertz Manero announced in May 2019 that his office would begin building criminal corruption cases that had sat dormant in the previous administration.[32] At the time of López Obrador's election, more than 300,000 investigations – a disproportionate number of which related to bribery and corruption of elected officials – had been backlogged.[33]

Thus far, both López Obrador and Gertz Manero have made progress. In June 2019, the López Obrador administration froze assets and issued arrest warrants in connection with the sale of a fertiliser plant from a state-owned Mexican oil and gas company (Pemex) to one of Mexico's biggest multinational companies (AHMSA).[34] Efforts like these may well expand as further progress is made. Additionally, 18 anti-corruption magistrates are to be appointed to the Federal Tribunal for Administrative Justice, which has exclusive jurisdiction over grave administrative offences such as embezzlement and money laundering.[35] Further implementation of Mexico's National Anti-Corruption System – a framework for a tougher and more comprehensive approach to battling corruption – is also planned.[36]

Expansion of Mexico's anti-corruption laws

In August 2019, the Mexican government passed the National Law for Dominion Extinction, which will allow the federal government to transfer ownership of any type of property derived, or presumptively derived, from illegal activities without indemnity or payment to the owner.[37] The country simultaneously expanded the definition of the type of conduct that could trigger asset forfeiture to include corruption, both by corporate entities and public servants as private persons.[38]

In December 2018, the federal-level Citizen Participation Committee presented a proposal for a National Anti-Corruption Policy, with 60 priority strategies for combating corruption through investigations, awareness, civil involvement and access to public service.[39] The Committee has also advocated for whistleblower protections and greater autonomy for institutions involved in identifying official misconduct.[40]

With the renewed energy and focus on anti-corruption enforcement in Mexico, it is likely that corporations operating in Mexico will begin to face greater scrutiny from Mexican officials. If the current trajectory holds, corporations should expect Mexico to join the United States and Canada as a significant player in corporate anti-corruption efforts.

Co-operation between the United States and Canada

Recent cross-border interactions

Extradition of Meng Wanzhou

A matter that is currently unfolding – the arrest by Canadian authorities of a prominent Chinese national at the behest of the United States – has garnered widespread media attention. Meng Wanzhou, the chief financial officer, deputy chairwoman of the board of Chinese multinational technology company Huawei and daughter of Huawei's chief executive officer and founder, was arrested on 1 December 2018, at Vancouver International Airport, at the request of the DOJ on multiple federal criminal charges, such as bank fraud, trade secrets theft and sanctions evasion.[41] Meng is currently awaiting a hearing, scheduled for January 2020, on her possible extradition from Canada to the United States.[42]

Meng and her attorneys have vigorously disputed the charges, and called her arrest politically motivated. Lawyers for Meng also announced that they were suing the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP), the Canadian Border Services Agency and the Canadian federal government for breaching Meng's constitutional rights during her detention but prior to her arrest.[43]

Canada has faced significant backlash from China as a result of Meng's arrest, including the detention of Michael Kovrig, a former Canadian diplomat, and Michael Spavor, a Canadian businessman, under suspicions of spying and stealing state secrets; Canadian shipments to China of goods worth billions of dollars have also been blocked.[44] In addition, following the arrest of Meng, China quickly retried two Canadian citizens, who had been sentenced to jail for drugs smuggling, and sentenced both to death.

Kinross gold FCPA enforcement action

Co-operation between the United States and Canada on anti-corruption matters also continues. In March 2018, for example, the SEC announced a settled action against the Canadian corporation Kinross Gold Corporation for US Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA) books and records, and internal controls violations 'arising from the company's repeated failure to implement adequate accounting controls of two African subsidiaries'.[45] Kinross Gold had acquired a number of African subsidiaries in 2010 as part of a US$7.1 billion transaction and, according to the SEC, understood at the time that those subsidiaries 'lacked anti-corruption compliance programs and internal accounting controls'. The SEC alleged that, despite this awareness, Kinross Gold failed to implement adequate controls for more than three years, even though multiple internal audits had alerted the company to the control deficiencies.[46] Moreover, the SEC alleged that even after Kinross Gold implemented various internal controls, it failed to maintain them.[47] Without admitting or denying the findings, Kinross agreed to a cease-and-desist order, a penalty of US$950,000 and undertakings to report on its remedial steps for a period of one year.[48] Kinross Gold stated that it received a declination from the DOJ.[49]

Conviction of Robert Barra under the Corruption of Foreign Practices Act

Canada has recently enhanced enforcement of its own evolving anti-corruption laws. Prosecutions based on Canada's Corruption of Foreign Public Officials Act (CFPOA), the equivalent of the US FCPA, had been rare until recently. In 1998, 2004 and 2011, Canada was criticised by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) for not meeting its OECD anti-corruption obligations.[50] In 2013, the CFPOA was amended to add a books and records offence, expand jurisdiction based on nationality, and increase the maximum penalty for convicted individuals.[51]

In January 2019, however, following only the second trial under the CFPOA, Robert Barra, a US citizen, was convicted in the Ontario Superior Court of Justice of agreeing to bribe a foreign public official.[52] The convictions in R v. Barra and Govindia arose from the same facts as a 2014 case, R v. Karigar, the first case in which an individual – Nazir Karigar, a Canadian – was sentenced to imprisonment for an offence under the CFPOA (he received three years in jail).[53] Barra, a former executive of the biometrics company Cryptometrics US, was charged in a conspiracy involving bribing various Air India employees, and a number of Indian government officials, to ensure that Cryptometrics was awarded a contract with Air India to instal facial recognition software at airports.[54] The complaint alleged that Barra 'was a co-Chief Executive Officer of Cryptometrics US, which he controlled' and that 'Cryptometrics US provided the required funding for Cryptometrics Canada's operations'.[55]

Shailesh Govindia, an Indian citizen, was also convicted. Govindia argued that he was not subject to the jurisdiction of the Canadian courts because, at the time of his conduct, he was unaware that the Canadian laws would apply to him. The court rejected this argument, finding 'that a Canadian court did have jurisdiction and that there was a substantial connection to Canada' and that Govindia's mistake of law was not a valid argument.[56]

That Canada used the CFPOA to charge a US citizen who was the executive of a US company for offences that occurred at least in part in New York may represent the beginning of a new era for Canadian enforcement of its bribery laws. The DOJ had long been aware of the allegations regarding Cryptometrics – as early as 2007, 'someone called Buddy sent an email to the fraud section of the US DOJ advising that he had information about US citizens paying bribes to foreign officers'.[57] The DOJ assisted the RCMP in the investigative efforts that led to Govindia's conviction in Canada.[58]

Corporate frauds

On 19 September 2018, Canada's Criminal Code was amended to establish a Remediation Agreement (the equivalent of a deferred prosecution agreement in the United States), which may signal an increased focus on enforcement of the CFPOA with regard to corporations. This new tool will allow voluntary agreements between prosecutors and organisations accused of committing crimes, which the Canadian government hopes will provide an incentive for companies to rectify their wrongdoing, while avoiding some of the negative consequences of a criminal conviction.[59] Canada's Global Affairs department has described the new tool as 'available for use by prosecutorial authorities – at their discretion, in the public interest and in appropriate circumstances'.[60] Accordingly, Canada's new Remediation Agreement may allow the country to resolve its investigation regarding embattled engineering giant, SNC-Lavalin, which has been involved in an ongoing foreign bribery investigation.[61]

Competition protection enforcement in the digital economy

The co-operation between the United States and Canada is not limited to criminal actions and securities enforcement. US–Canadian co-operation with regard to antitrust and consumer protection matters has evolved into a robust bilateral enforcement regime. Following the August 1995 Agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States of America Regarding the Application of Their Competition and Deceptive Marketing Practices Laws (the Agreement), the two nations have closely coordinated on common consumer protection matters.[62] The Agreement sets forth seven obligations for each nation:

- notification about enforcement activities in the other's interests;
- co-operation in enforcement and information exchange;
- coordination in enforcement initiatives;
- avoidance of conflicts;
- consultations to resolve concerns regarding the agreement;
- maintenance of confidentiality; and
- use of principles of comity.[63]

Though these obligations had been in effect for more than 20 years, in 2017 both countries recommitted to strengthening North American co-operation in competition law enforcement in the digital economy.[64] Since this agreement, both countries have made strides towards improving antitrust enforcement in the digital space. Canada unveiled a new Digital Charter, designed to maintain a competitive online marketplace, increased fines and penalties to encourage global digital leaders to promote compliance, increased global enforcement coordination, and hosted a global summit to discuss competition policy in the digital era.[65]

The US Federal Trade Commission likewise recently launched a Technology Task Force, which is dedicated to monitoring competition in US technology markets, and Congressional leaders have taken an interest in understanding competition in the digital marketplace.[66]

Given these trends, and the standing Agreement between the United States and Canada, it is likely that corporations will see increased co-operation between the two countries on digital antitrust enforcement in the coming years.

Argentina

Pedro Serrano Espelta, Gustavo Morales Oliver and María Lorena Schiariti[1]

General context, key principles and hot topics

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

The Notebooks case is the highest-profile ongoing investigation for bribery-related crimes, at the time of writing. The investigation was initiated in early 2018 and involves various high-ranking current or former public officials and numerous businessmen.

The case is moving on to trial. It has triggered other parallel investigations, such as the investigation of the Antitrust Commission for cartelisation.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

Currently there are several statutes that establish criminal sanctions for corporations in Argentina. The most notable is the Law No. 27,401 (on corporate criminal liability), which entered into force on March 2018. Corporations can also incur liability for economic crimes as prescribed in section XIII of the Federal Criminal Code, or by virtue of a breach of any of the following statutes:

- Customs Code Law No. 22,415;
- Foreign Exchange Criminal Law No. 19,359;
- Tax Criminal Law No. 27,430;
- Competition Law No. 27,442;
- Supply Law No. 20,680; and
- Retirement and Pension System Law No. 24,241.

1 Pedro Serrano Espelta, Gustavo Morales Oliver and María Lorena Schiariti are partners at Marval, O'Farrell & Mairal.

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

Corporations are regulated by the relevant public register of commerce as well as other government agencies, for example, the Argentine tax authority (AFIP).

Also, depending on the industry, additional regulatory agencies or entities may issue regulations that govern corporations' activities, such as the Argentine Securities Commission for corporations that trade securities, or the Argentine Central Bank for corporations that provide certain financial services or products.

Jurisdiction between the authorities based on their subject matter and competence is allocated by territory.

There are no specific policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

In some instances, the law indicates the degree of suspicion to initiate or defer an investigation to another agency. The Anti-money Laundering Law No. 25,246 establishes that the Argentine Financial Intelligence Unit shall notify the public prosecutor when there are 'sufficient elements of conviction' to determine that an operation under review may indicate a case of money laundering or terrorism financing.

As regards criminal investigation, the mere affirmation of the possible existence of a crime is enough to start an investigation. The authorities have the duty to investigate all facts that come to their knowledge and can constitute a crime under their jurisdiction.

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

A notice or subpoena may be challenged through a procedural remedy requesting it to be declared null. It may be admissible when the notice or subpoena contains a serious irregularity that prevents the party from promptly complying with the obligations that stem from it.

The most common irregularities that give grounds for challenging a notice or subpoena include that the notice does not contain the court details, the court details are wrong, or service of the complaint was effected in a domicile other than that of the defendant.

If the notice or subpoena is issued by an administrative authority, it must first be challenged before the administrative authority to allow questioning before the courts.

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

Argentine law allows individuals suspected of participating in certain crimes set forth in Law No. 27,304 to enter into collaboration agreements with the prosecution. Under this regime, suspects and defendants who provide relevant information may obtain a penalty reduction in exchange of their assistance. Once signed, the collaboration agreement has to be submitted to the court for approval.

As regards legal entities, Law No. 27,401, for example, includes the possibility for corporations under investigation to sign collaboration agreements with the prosecution. The corporation must provide useful and verifiable information or accurate details that assist in clarifying the facts under investigation, identify the persons involved, or recover the assets or proceeds of the crime, among other requirements. Once signed, the collaboration agreement has to be submitted to the court for approval.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

The Office of the Federal Public Prosecutor has not issued policy papers stating its current priorities. However, recently there has been a reported interest in economic and financial crimes, such as money laundering, as well as public bribery and corruption offences.

Also relevant are drug crimes and gender-based violence.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

Argentina lacks a comprehensive legal framework addressing cybersecurity issues. However, there are certain resolutions ruling cybersecurity issues applicable to the public sector. Technological Standards for the Federal Public Administration were approved by Disposition 5/2019, published in the Official Gazette on 2 September 2019.

The Argentine Data Protection Authority (ADPA) has issued Resolution No. 47/2018, which establishes two sets of recommended security measures for the processing and conservation of personal data with the aim of ensuring the continuous improvement of the administration, planning and control of information security.

Resolution 47/2018 entails a change in the approach towards personal data security that follows the principle of accountability, introduced by ADPA in other recent regulations and in line with the European General Data Protection Regulation. It is worth noting that among these recommended measures, Resolution 47/2018 lists that security incidents should be notified to ADPA.

Certain industries have their own cybersecurity regulations and standards (e.g., financial institutions are required to report security incidents to the Argentine Central Bank).

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

On 22 November 2017, the Argentine Congress signed the Convention on Cybercrime of the Council of Europe (ETS No. 185) adopted in Budapest, Hungary, on 23 November 2001 (the Budapest Convention), but is still pending enactment by the president.

In 2008, Argentina passed the Cybercrime Law No. 26,338 and amended its Criminal Code to include several cybercrimes, modelling them on those contained in the Budapest Convention. Consequently, the new aspects relate to procedural law and international co-operation. Argentina still uses these rules for securing physical evidence for searches in computer systems, which is inefficient from a digital evidence standpoint.

Regarding the approach by law enforcement authorities, various federal and local authorities (including prosecutors and police) have created specialist cybercrime units.

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

Overall, Argentine criminal law is applicable to acts committed in its territory and places under its jurisdiction (e.g., national aircraft and embassies).

The application of local criminal law will be extended to acts committed abroad the effects of which are deemed to be produced in the territory of Argentina or places under its jurisdiction.

Likewise, Argentine criminal law will apply to offences committed abroad by federal authorities' agents or employees in the exercise of their public functions. Moreover, criminal law will apply to bribery of foreign officials committed abroad by Argentine citizens and legal entities domiciled in Argentina.

Finally, Argentina has ratified several treaties that establish universal jurisdiction over serious crimes, such as genocide and torture.

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

There are many legal, operative, strategic, technological, communicational and accounting challenges in cross-border investigations that arise in the initial stage and continue throughout the investigatory process. The most important challenges are the protection of the attorney–client privilege and compliance with data privacy and data protection regulation, especially across jurisdictions that have different legal standards of compliance.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

Argentine law protects against double jeopardy, that is to say a person who has been convicted or acquitted of an offence cannot be prosecuted again for the same offence.

The principle of double jeopardy (also known as ne bis in idem) is established in the Federal Criminal Code, the Federal Constitution and certain human rights treaties that have constitutional hierarchy in Argentina. The law does not distinguish between federal and foreign jurisdictions when it prohibits double jeopardy. Depending on the jurisdictions involved, there may be co-operation treaties establishing rules to resolve a potential double jeopardy conflict.

The fact that a corporation has entered into a deferred prosecution agreement (DPA) in another country is unlikely to prevent prosecution in Argentina, unless a treaty prescribes otherwise or the DPA is viewed as being equivalent to an acquittal, a conviction or any other decision that puts an end to the criminal proceeding.

There is nothing analogous to the United States 'anti-piling on' policy between Argentinian law enforcement authorities.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

Global settlements are not usual in cases investigated by Argentinian authorities.

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

Decisions made by foreign authorities may attract the attention of Argentine authorities and be the catalyst for local investigations.

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

Argentina has not implemented a specific autonomous trade sanctions system. However, Argentina complies with the sanctions established in the United Nations Security Council's resolutions. In that context, compliance with the sanctions established therein is mandatory for Argentina. Also, once the Ministry of Foreign Affairs publishes the United Nations Security Council's resolutions in the Argentine Official Gazette, those sanctions regimes become mandatory for Argentine individuals and legal entities.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

Argentina has not conducted any relevant enforcement activity.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

Argentina has not conducted any relevant enforcement activity.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

Law No. 24,871 regulates the extent of the application of foreign regulations. In particular, it sets forth that any foreign laws establishing extraterritorial sanctions intended to trigger, for example, negative consequences on a third country, would be deemed null and inapplicable in Argentina.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

Any individual or legal entity shall not invoke rights, execute or claim the execution of acts nor be compelled to comply with measures, orders, instructions or indications that are a consequence of the extraterritorial application of foreign regulations, as referred to in question 18.

Additionally, Law No. 24,871 establishes additional provisions regarding, for example, the enforcement of foreign rulings under the aforementioned foreign regulations, or the exchange of information between Argentine authorities and the authorities of the foreign country issuing sanctions.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

In our experience, most allegations of wrongdoing in companies in Argentina have been made through whistleblower reports on ethical lines.

In our experience, in many cases, when an issue comes to light as a result of a regular internal auditing process, most companies fail to take early action to investigate the matter.

Information gathering

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

Personal data protection is governed by Personal Data Protection Law No. 25,326 (PDPL), which has the main purposes of guaranteeing (1) the complete protection of the data contained in files, records, databases or other technical means, whether public or private, and (2) the rights to reputation, privacy and access to information. Any information relating to individuals or companies, whether identified or identifiable, is considered personal data and subject to the terms of the PDPL.

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

The PDPL is enforced by ADPA and the judicial courts. Depending on the type of behaviour, failure to comply with the PDPL could be considered as minor, serious or very serious infractions.

During 2018, ADPA imposed sanctions with fines for an accumulated amount of 71,625,320 Argentine pesos.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

As a general rule, valid data treatment requires the free, express, informed and written (or similar) consent of the data subject (i.e., the relevant individual or legal entity). Data subjects are free to revoke their consent, although this will only have effect for the future (not retrospectively). They also have the right to have access to, rectify and delete their personal data.

Treatment of data that is limited to the data subject's name, identification number, tax identification number, occupation, date of birth and domicile, does not require consent.

Moreover, the PDPL determines restrictions to cross-border transfers of data.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

From a privacy perspective, it is highly important to provide employees with prior notice explaining the way in which the company treats the data they use (generally through corporate IT or privacy policies).

From a labour law perspective, there are no specific regulations in force regarding the access, monitoring and surveillance of electronic communications and devices in the workplace.

It is of key importance to analyse any internal policy (duly notified to the employees) relating to the monitoring of corporate emails and, upon default thereof, implement an internal policy for the monitoring of emails, electronic communications and devices, and the use of working tools and to notify employees in advance that (1) electronic communications and devices are work tools and, thus, they shall be used only for work purposes and (2) they should have no expectation of privacy in connection with their use (even if a personal password has been created). Further, a company should have in place further provisions for monitoring employees' activity and ultimately to prove misconduct.

Dawn raids and search warrants

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

According to the Federal Criminal Procedural Code, if there is reason to presume that in a certain place there are things relating to the investigation of a crime, or the suspicion of a criminal offence, a judge may issue a search warrant. Further, a judge may order the seizure of objects and documentation that (1) may be relevant to the investigation, (2) may be subject to confiscation or (3) can serve as evidence.

Besides the formal requirements, search warrants must indicate the crime under investigation, the exact place where the search will be conducted and its purpose. If any of these requirements are not fulfilled, the search – and any evidence collected during the search – can be challenged in court.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

The Federal Criminal Procedural Code protects letters and documents sent to or received by a defendant's counsel from being seized, as long as they are connected to a criminal investigation.

Moreover, a judge may request the testimony of witnesses and third parties and the submission of documents in their possession. However, this order shall not be addressed to persons exempted from testifying as witnesses by reason of family or professional links, or state secrecy.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

Judges can request the testimony of any person who may have relevant information relating to a criminal investigation. The request is mandatory and the person summoned to render testimony must appear before the judge and state the truth of what they know, unless an exception applies. Failure to do so may be construed as contempt of court or harbouring, and may trigger raids to seize the information. According to Argentine law, these offences are only attributable to individuals.

Argentine law protects the right against self-incrimination. For instance, when a representative of a legal entity is called to give information relating to a criminal investigation, the representative may refuse to give testimony on the basis of the constitutional right against self-incrimination.

Additionally, the Federal Criminal Procedural Code establishes that those who must keep the secrecy of what they learn by virtue of their service, profession or official capacity must abstain from rendering testimony of facts and issues covered by such secrecy. Among the persons expressly included are lawyers, notaries, doctors, nurses, military personnel and public officials. However, they cannot refuse to give testimony when released from their secrecy duty by the interested party, for instance.

Whistleblowing and employee rights

28 Describe the whistleblowing framework in your country. What financial incentive schemes exist for whistleblowers? What legal protections are in place for whistleblowers?

Law No. 27,319 regulates special investigation techniques than can be used in the investigation of certain complex crimes, such as drug-related crimes, smuggling, terrorism and economic crimes.

Under this framework, persons who provide useful and relevant information to initiate or guide an investigation concerning the crimes set forth in the law will be entitled to receive monetary compensation. The identity of whistleblowers will be withheld and, if necessary, other adequate protective measures may be ordered to protect the life and integrity of the whistleblower and his or her family.

Depending on the circumstances, other regimes may apply. For instance, recently a permanent rewards fund for whistleblowers created in 2009 was used to offer monetary rewards in exchange for useful information to trace and recover assets in a high-profile corruption case.

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

There is no specific labour regulation concerning investigations or a specific procedure for internal investigations. Nevertheless, labour and civil rights are fully applicable to all employees. Thus, it is important to bear in mind that any kind of discrimination or adverse effect on employees' dignity or right of defence could be challenged within the context of the investigation.

Investigations should be carried out as quickly as possible, so that disciplinary action, if any, can be decided as soon as possible after discovery of the behaviour under investigation.

If the personnel involved are board members or authorised signatories of the company, measures regarding removal of control and replacement to ensure the normal operation of the company should be jointly analysed.

Additionally, since each case will be different on its merits, there could be different practical matters to consider within the context of a labour investigation; thus, it is important to duly liaise with the appropriate legal adviser.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

Different courses of action and different sanctions could be implemented, depending on the seriousness of the misconduct, the extent to which it affects the employer's activity or business, the level of responsibility of the relevant employee, previous performance, among other aspects, all of which should be considered in each case.

Damage caused by the misconduct could also be considered, although this is not essential since the misconduct itself could be subject to disciplinary measures. Possible sanctions could involve a first warning, suspension from duty without payment of salary or even dismissal with just cause, subject to full analysis of the case in question.

Prior to implementing any course of action or disciplinary sanction, it is important to bear in mind that (1) there are both specific requirements applicable to disciplinary sanctions and practical legal recommendations, and (2) dismissal with just cause is interpreted narrowly in Argentina.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

Employees are entitled to refuse to participate in an internal investigation, without their refusal construing a just cause for termination of the employment contract.

Commencing an internal investigation

32 Is it common practice in your country to prepare a document setting out terms of reference or investigatory scope before commencing an internal investigation? What issues would it cover?

Before commencing an internal investigation, it is useful for companies to draft a flexible investigation plan, which may lead the investigation process and determine, among other things, its scope, time limits and main objectives.

There is currently no legal requirement regarding the need for an investigation plan. Therefore, in practice, implementing such a plan depends on each company, the complexity of the subject under investigation and the regulations involved.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

Law No. 27,401 (on corporate criminal liability) addresses the concept of internal investigations and sets forth that each legal entity, depending on the risks to its activities, may implement an internal investigation system.

In general, there is no particular legal obligation to comply with when misconduct comes to light in the course of an internal investigation; however, certain industry-specific regulations may establish additional provisions regarding internal investigations, which companies should take into account.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

If a company receives a notice seeking the production of documentation or a subpoena requiring its testimony to clarify the facts or allegations under investigation, the company shall comply within the terms specified, unless it is subject to any exception provided in the applicable regulation.

There is no specific regulation setting forth mandatory steps for companies to comply with such notices or subpoenas. Therefore, the measures implemented may depend on the company's policies and procedures, the facts and persons under investigation, and so on.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

A public company in Argentina is not obliged to disclose the existence of an internal investigation until the investigation results in verification of the existence of an event that, in all likelihood, could have a substantial effect on its trading value (except when an investigation was commenced following verification of the existence of an event having such effects, which must be disclosed). Likewise, there is no obligation to disclose any contact by a law enforcement authority until the company is served with notice of the commencement of formal proceedings (except where such circumstances are made public or disclosure is required by a law enforcement authority).

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

Provided that the rights of employees are respected, internal investigations are well tolerated. Investigations of wrongdoings and crimes in Argentina are usually conducted by law enforcement authorities; therefore, as yet, acceptance among local agencies is not widespread.

Law No. 27,401 (on corporate criminal liability) encourages companies to implement an internal investigation system that respects the rights of the persons under investigation and permits the imposition of effective sanctions on those who breach the company's policies.

In this sense, an internal investigation may be useful to show to the authorities that the company acted diligently and in good faith to try to prevent, identify and remedy a potential wrongdoing. Given the recent enactment of Law No. 27,401 there are no precedents yet to establish how law enforcement agencies will assess the efforts taken by companies during an internal investigation.

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

Attorney–client privilege stems from the constitutional right to defence during trial. Criminal procedure codes prohibit disclosure of protected confidential information when obtained by certain professionals when performing as such, including attorneys and doctors. Further, the Federal Civil Procedure Code establishes that a witness may refuse to answer questions if the answers may disclose information protected by the attorney–client privilege.

There is very little legislation and jurisprudence regarding the attorney–client privilege on internal investigations. As a minimum, all attorney work-product is protected by the attorney–client privilege. Marking documents as confidential and protected by attorney–client privilege is recommended.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

The Federal Supreme Court has ruled that privilege protects documents or communications held on the occasion or in the performance of the profession of attorney. Another key principle is that the client may waive the privilege.

The holder of the privilege is the client, and the attorney has the duty and the right to protect the privileged information.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

There are no legal standards in Argentina for this. However, according to the majority of legal experts, provided the attorney is a member of a professional association, the attorney–client privilege will apply if he or she is either in-house or external counsel.

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

The applicable regulation in Argentina does not make any difference between advice sought from foreign and local lawyers. Privilege should apply equally to both.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

There are no precedents that would allow us to consider the waiver of attorney–client privilege as a co-operative step. Privilege waiver is not mandatory or required.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

The applicable regulations do not stipulate partial waivers.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

There is no developed jurisprudence on this matter.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

This concept does not exist in Argentina.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

There are no material studies or case precedents in Argentina that would allow us to conclude that privilege protects the work-product of third parties that assisted the work performed by the lawyer.

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

Witness interviews as part of internal investigations are not forbidden or specifically regulated in Argentina.

Nonetheless, the Guidelines of the Argentine Anti-corruption Office on Compliance Anti-corruption Programmes briefly address certain mechanisms for corporate investigations, including witness interviews. In particular, the Guidelines emphasise that all the investigative mechanisms carried out by companies shall not put the employees' rights in jeopardy.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

There is no law that particularly regulates the extent of attorney–client privilege in internal investigations. In this context, a company may claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports, but its chances of success will depend on the factors relevant to the case.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

There is neither Argentine regulation nor relevant judicial precedents setting forth legal or ethical requirements or guidance for conducting witness interviews, whether they involve employee or third parties (e.g., former employees or contractors).

We advise our clients to apply internationally accepted common practices, such as providing Upjohn warnings to interviewees, avoiding recording interviews and preparing reports that merely include attorneys' impressions on the topics addressed in the interviews.

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

The timing, order and steps taken in each interview (e.g., putting documents to the witness) will vary from case to case.

We advise our clients to consider all factors and good practices, as mentioned in question 48, when carrying out interviews. There are case precedents that acknowledge, for example, a witness's rights to be informed about the scope and nature of an interview, and to be accompanied at the interview by their own lawyer.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

Under Argentine law, there is no general obligation to report misconduct to law enforcement authorities. However, depending on the industry, some laws and regulations may mandate companies to disclose certain forms of misconduct to the authorities.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

Self-reporting in Argentina is still unusual. Whether this is a convenient course of action will depend on the case in question.

Generally speaking, a company might be advised to self-report if it is likely to receive some leniency from the authorities. For instance, Law No. 27,401 (on corporate criminal liability) provides a regime under which companies may seek exemption from criminal liability. It also allows legal entities seeking a reduction in penalties to enter into 'effective collaboration agreements' with the authorities (see question 52).

The decision to self-report to foreign authorities should be made having taken into account the law of the jurisdictions involved and the particular facts of the case.

Note that public officials have a duty to report offences that are known to them in the exercise of their public functions. Directors of state-owned companies and those appointed by the government might be considered public officials for the purpose of this reporting duty.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

The particular steps to be taken will depend on the requirements imposed by the respective applicable laws and competent authorities.

For instance, Law No. 27,401 (on corporate criminal liability) provides a regime for companies to obtain an exemption from criminal liability and for it to be possible to sign 'effective collaboration agreements' with the prosecution to obtain a reduction in applicable penalties.

In the former situation, the law requires self-reporting of a crime as a consequence of internal detection and investigation, which suggests that conducting an internal investigation will be necessary to engage in negotiations with the prosecution.

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

In the case of a judicial notice or subpoena, the company must respond to it through judicial channels within the relevant legal terms laid down under the Procedure Code.

It is possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to establish the position of the defendants. However, official challenges, requests and decisions must be made through judicial or administrative channels, according to the relevant procedural rules.

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

Any decision issued by the centralised or decentralised federal administration is deemed legitimate, but could be challenged before courts if the requisites set forth in the applicable administrative regulations of the proceedings are fulfilled.

Since Argentina is a federal country, depending on the territorial competence of the relevant authorities, local regulations may be applicable and the particular requisites established therein shall be taken into account.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

There is no general statute covering this matter. The approach will have to be assessed for each case, taking into account applicable laws and international treaties, if any.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

The company must comply with the requirement for production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders. However, according to the Federal Civil and Commercial Procedural Code, it is necessary to establish whether the company in question is party to the proceedings or not.

In the case of companies acting as plaintiffs or defendants, they must produce the required material (documents or information) that is in their possession, even when the documents or information are outside the country.

If the company is a third party to the procedure in which the requirement is made, it is also obliged to produce the documents or provide the required information. However, the requested party may challenge the request if the material required is its exclusive property and its disclosure may cause damage.

The company that intends to produce material that is abroad will face certain difficulties that could delay the procedure. For instance, the company must comply with the requirements imposed by international treaties to verify the authenticity of foreign documents (i.e., through the Hague Apostille or authentication through diplomatic channels as well as translations, among other things). Further, the attendant costs could be significantly higher.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

The frequency of co-operation and challenges to co-operation vary according to the law enforcement authorities involved.

On the one hand, in respect of judges and prosecutors, cross-border co-operation and exchanges of information usually proceeds after a long period of time because of the many difficulties that can arise. For instance, in the Operation Car Wash bribery cases, leniency agreements and evidence produced in Brazil and requested by Argentine authorities are still pending.

On the other hand, certain law enforcement authorities frequently share information within the federal administration. For example, the Argentine Financial Intelligence Unit – being a member of the Egmont Group of Financial Intelligence Units – shares information with other units across the world, and the AFIP shares information in accordance with the Common Reporting Standard, among other methods.

Additionally, international treaties (either multinational or bilateral) may govern cross-border co-operation.

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

Overall, law enforcement authorities are bound to maintain confidentiality with respect to information obtained during investigations. They shall not share or disclose information or documents unless such conduct falls within one of the exceptions set forth in their statutes or applicable laws.

In some cases, the law allows the transfer of information between law enforcement agencies. For instance, the AFIP may share certain information with revenue agencies from the provinces, or foreign tax agencies, in accordance with applicable co-operation agreements.

In the course of a criminal investigation, the secrecy of the proceedings shall be respected. In particular, under Law No. 27,401, when corporations enter into negotiations with the prosecution with the aim of concluding a collaboration agreement, the information shared will be kept confidential.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

In these circumstances, companies should claim an exception and inform the relevant law enforcement authority that they cannot reasonably comply with the request without violating the laws of another country.

In addition, foreign legal advice should be obtained as to the company's exposure to liability if it produces the requested information.

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

Certain statutes and regulations set forth secrecy obligations, including those relating to banking (Law No. 21,526), tax (Law No. 11,683) certain professions (e.g., attorneys, health professionals) and confidential commercial information (Law No. 24,766). These statutes and certain regulations (e.g., Anti-money Laundering Law No. 25,246) establish certain circumstances when secrecy does not prevail and compliance with a notice or subpoena becomes mandatory.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

The rules applicable in a certain jurisdiction and the type of proceeding initiated against a company will determine the applicable rules of evidence. Nonetheless, Argentina does not regulate discovery rules. Thus, production is usually compelled by law enforcement authorities and interested parties can occasionally produce complementary evidence (e.g., expert witnesses).

Production of evidence within civil procedures is usually available to the parties and any other stakeholder, unless confidentiality is expressly imposed, which may be the case, for instance, in procedures where family issues are in question or when minors are involved.

Production of evidence within criminal procedures is confidential and withheld from the parties (including private prosecutors) during the investigative stage. However, during the trial stage, production of evidence is, in general, not subject to confidentiality and is accessible by the general public.

Prosecution and penalties

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

Companies may be subject to the following penalties:

- fines that normally will be determined based on the 'undue' benefit obtained or that could have been obtained through the crime;
- total or partial suspension of activities;
- debarment from participating in government bids and contracts, or in any other activity relating to the government;
- dissolution and liquidation of the legal entity;
- suspension or termination of government benefits;
- publication of the conviction sentence at the cost of the convicted entity; and
- forfeiture of assets obtained through the illegal actions.

Directors, officers and employees are subject to the penalties prescribed for the specific crime in the relevant statutes. Penalties for individuals include imprisonment, fines and debarment. Additionally, defendants may be subject to forfeiture of assets that have been obtained illegally.

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

Depending on the circumstances (such as the existence of a criminal investigation or whether precautionary measures were issued against the company), there might be restrictions on relocating assets sited or registered in Argentina to another country.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

In a criminal trial, judges must refer to the penalty scale of the crimes and take into account aggravating and mitigating circumstances, whenever applicable. Additionally, they will consider, among other things:

- the nature of the conduct;
- the means employed to commit the crime;
- the injury or risks caused;
- personal circumstances of the defendant, such as his or her age, education;
- conduct during the proceedings;
- motive to commit the crime (especially state of necessity or indigence);
- degree of participation in the crime; and
- recidivism.

Moreover, in respect of economic and financial crimes committed with intervention, on behalf, or for the benefit, of a legal entity, judges will also consider:

- compliance with internal rules and procedures;
- failure to monitor the conduct of the perpetrators and accomplices;
- the extent of the damage caused;

- the amounts of money involved;
- the size, nature and economic capacity of the legal entity; and
- the need to continue the activities of the company (for the purposes of suspension or debarment).

Finally, in respect of publicly traded companies, penalties shall be prescribed having in mind the protection of shareholders to whom no liability is attributable.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

Since the enactment of the Law No. 27,401 (on corporate criminal liability), corporations can enter into agreements with the prosecution. The law envisions two sets of circumstances:

- It allows companies to be exempted from criminal liability when they have:
  - self-reported a crime set forth in that law as a consequence of internal detection and investigation;
  - established a proper control and supervision system before the facts under investigation occurred and breaching this system required an effort by the wrongdoers; and
  - returned the undue benefit obtained.
- Companies may execute 'effective collaboration agreements' with the prosecution to obtain a reduction of applicable penalties.

Companies must disclose precise and verifiable information that is useful for the investigation. The agreement is subject to court approval to enter into effect. At the time of writing, there are no precedents of collaboration agreements signed by corporations.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

Argentina has regulated effective collaboration agreements in Law No. 27,401. Until the conclusion of an agreement with the public prosecutor, all negotiations are deemed to be strictly confidential.

The law makes no reference to the confidentiality of the information after the agreement is concluded and approved by the criminal judge. Therefore, there are no provisions that determine implementation of further restrictions or anonymity until the conclusion of the criminal proceedings. Consideration may be given to these measures in a particular case, depending on the potential risks that may affect a fair resolution of those proceedings.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

When considering entering into an agreement with any Argentine enforcement authority, a company should conduct a thorough analysis of the alleged facts and the possible legal violations that may be triggered, either in Argentina or abroad. The company should also consider whether entering into a collaboration agreement would allow the authorities to gather information to prosecute other crimes.

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

Corporate compliance monitors are not regulated as an enforcement tool in Argentine law.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

When conduct gives rise to civil liability that also constitutes a crime, Argentine law allows both civil and criminal actions to be pursued simultaneously. Both proceedings are independent of each other; however, the civil judge is foreclosed from reaching a decision until a judgment is passed on the criminal case. Therefore, plaintiffs usually do not incur efforts and expenses until a decision is reached by the criminal court.

In criminal cases, the Federal Criminal Procedure Code recognises victims' right to offer and control evidence. It prescribes that the case docket is public to the parties, which includes the private prosecutor but not the civil petitioner, whose participation is limited to claiming compensation, restitution or other civil remedies. Despite this general principle, during the criminal investigation, judges may be reluctant to grant private prosecutors full access to some confidential information for reasons of security or privacy. During the trial, the private prosecutor has access to all files and evidence that will be used in court.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

In criminal investigations governed by the Federal Criminal Procedure Code, the docket file is withheld until the first appearance of the defendant before the judge (the investigative statement), where the defendant is put on notice about the investigation and informed of their rights.

However, third parties (e.g., the defendant, the victim and state authorities) may request information if they justify having a 'legitimate interest'. After this stage, the docket file can be accessed by the parties, including the defendant, the public prosecutor and the private prosecutor, if any. Notwithstanding, judges may order the secrecy of some information when disclosure would jeopardise the investigation. Only acts that cannot be reproduced at a subsequent stage shall not be kept confidential. The docket file will continue to be withheld from third parties during the investigation.

Once the case is in trial, hearings are public unless the court decides, as an exception, to restrain access by some or all public parties (e.g., relevant witnesses who have not yet given their testimony).

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

In our experience, companies have used both their in-house public communications department and external firms. Larger companies are more likely to retain the services of public relations companies when there is a risk of negative publicity.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

First, it should be assessed whether there are any disclosure restrictions. Public communications, whether involving an external public relations company or not, should be vetted by the company's legal adviser and the team in charge of litigation to ensure that there is nothing that could compromise the company's position in the proceedings.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

Settlements are made within a criminal action, the existence of which must be disclosed upon service of process. Disclosure of settlements is forbidden until endorsement by the criminal court under penalty of sanctions under the Criminal Code.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

Certain bills that address corporate misconduct, asset recovery and corruption-related crimes were recently introduced to the Argentine Congress. Additionally, a new bill to reform the Criminal Code was submitted to the Senate in March 2019. These bills are expected to be assessed in the near future.

Moreover, in view of the latest development in corporate governance matters, it is likely that regulatory bodies will issue specific regulations focusing on corporate misconduct and internal policies or procedures.

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

A Royal Commission into misconduct in the banking, superannuation and financial services industry (often described as The Banking Royal Commission or BRC) has received a high volume of media and industry attention, particularly since the release of its final report on 1 February 2019. As a result of the BRC's final report, the country's key corporate regulator, the Australian Securities and Investments Commission (ASIC) has publicly stated that it will adopt a 'why not litigate' enforcement approach, which will have a significant effect on its investigation and enforcement practices.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

Under Australian law, offences committed by 'a person' will, unless specifically excluded, include a corporation (including those offences punishable by imprisonment). Criminal liability is generally established if both a physical and fault element is proven. Fault elements include intention, knowledge, recklessness and negligence. In the case of strict or absolute liability offences, there are exceptions to the proof of fault elements. These offences are more commonly pursued against a corporation.

If a fault element is required to be proved against a corporation, it may be shown in a variety of statutorily defined ways, including by proof that a corporation failed to maintain a corporate culture of compliance.

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

Regulation of Australian companies is principally done at a federal level, with some limited involvement by state or territory regulators. There is a broad range of law enforcement agencies that have authority to investigate corporations, including but not limited to the following:

- ASIC, an independent statutory body that enforces and administers the Corporations Act 2001 (Cth) (the Corporations Act), which is the main corporations legislation in Australia;
- Australian Prudential Regulatory Authority (APRA), a statutory body that supervises the banking, insurance and superannuation bodies;
- Australian Competition and Consumer Commission (ACCC), which regulates the interaction between consumers and businesses;
- Australian Criminal Intelligence Commission, which investigates national serious and organised crime, such as cybercrime;
- Australian Federal Police (AFP), which investigates and enforces cross-border compliance, including fraud, drug trafficking, organised crime, money laundering and people smuggling;
- Australian Taxation Office, which enforces compliance with Australia's taxation legislation;
- Australian Transaction Reports and Analysis Centre (AUSTRAC), which regulates and enforces cross-border financial transactions; and
- Commonwealth Director of Public Prosecutions (CDPP), which prosecutes criminal misconduct based on referrals from investigatory bodies.

Australian regulatory bodies coordinate their efforts so as to share information and intelligence-gathering powers (subject to certain restrictions). In the event of serious criminal allegations, it is common to have two or more regulatory authorities involved. Joint task forces, such as the Serious Financial Crime Taskforce, have been established to streamline and consolidate information sharing, investigation and reporting lines in Australia.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

Regulators have wide-ranging statutory investigatory powers. The trigger point is generally suspicion of a breach of legislation within the regulator's jurisdiction. For example, an investigation under section 13 of the ASIC Act 2001 (Cth) will be triggered if ASIC thinks it expedient for the due administration of the corporations legislation and where it has reason to suspect that a contravention may have been committed. The degree of suspicion is not defined but the threshold is low.

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

A company should carefully consider the scope of the notice and any grounds for objecting to it, including whether it has been properly issued, the information sought is clearly defined and relevant, and the request is not oppressive or unreasonable. Any concerns should be raised directly with the law enforcement authority before making an application to the court to set aside the notice.

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

Yes, in narrowly defined circumstances various enforcement bodies can apply their discretion for the benefit of defendants who assist with investigations. For example, the ACCC has a 'first past the post'-style policy that provides immunity to the individual or corporation who is first to disclose cartel conduct and co-operate fully with the investigation. The CDPP has a defined indemnity policy with strict criteria that must be met before a grant of immunity can be sought.

As to leniency, sentencing for criminal conduct is entirely at the discretion of the court. The High Court decision of Barbaro makes it clear that a prosecuting body cannot make submissions to the court regarding a preferred sentence or penalty range. More flexibility is provided for negotiated outcomes in civil penalty proceedings.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

Top priorities presently include misconduct in the financial services industry, financial crimes and corporate culture, including executive accountability. Cross-border business and transactions are also an area of focus, as are money laundering and tax evasion.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

Cybersecurity is legislated at both a federal level, and a state and territory level through various legislative frameworks relating specifically to cybersecurity and more broadly to data protection and privacy. A Joint Cyber Security Centre has been established, which brings together business, government, academia and other key partners. In March 2019, the Australian government announced an intention to increase penalties under the Privacy Act 1988 (Cth) (the Privacy Act), from A$2.1 million to A$10 million, expand the regulator's scope to ensure breaches are addressed and add further protections to certain vulnerable groups.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

Legislation provides regulation for computer and internet-related offences, such as unlawful access and computer trespass and creates investigation powers and criminal offences designed to protect security, reliability and integrity of computer data and electronic communication. There are also a number of offences addressing cybercrime contained in the Commonwealth Criminal Code.

Since March 2013, Australia has been a member of the Council of Europe Convention on Cybercrime, which addresses both domestic and international responses to cybercrime.

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

Criminal law has extraterritorial effect, provided there is an appropriate nexus to Australia. Conduct must have been either wholly or partly undertaken within Australia. Foreign entities with Australian subsidiaries or associated entities will fall within Australian laws as regards conduct in Australia. For example, if a foreign entity is conducting business in Australia through a subsidiary and the subsidiary breaches Australia's laws, both may be charged – the subsidiary for a breach of domestic laws and the foreign entity for directly breaching domestic laws or aiding and abetting the breach.

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

Australia has entered into mutual assistance treaties with numerous countries in a bid to facilitate information sharing and to expedite investigations. There are also information-sharing arrangements with certain jurisdictions, and therefore a formal request for mutual assistance is not always required. However, challenges arise when there are inconsistent approaches to an investigation by regulators. Legislative requirements as to the gathering of evidence, the integrity of investigators and the reliance on compulsory powers can present issues in cross-border matters.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

A person or corporation cannot be tried twice for the same alleged breach of Australian legislation. There is no prohibition in Australia against being prosecuted by multiple authorities where alleged contraventions of the law span the jurisdiction of multiple regulatory agencies; however, there is usually coordination between jurisdictions and agencies, to ensure prosecutions remain in the public interest.

However, double jeopardy does not apply internationally. Accordingly, if offending has traversed multiple jurisdictions, a defendant can be charged with an offence under Australian legislation despite having concluded proceedings of a similar nature in another country. A guilty plea or a negotiated outcome in another jurisdiction may affect the investigation, charge or sentencing in Australia.

There is nothing expressly analogous to the 'anti-piling on' policy in the United States.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

Global settlements are not common, per se. Ordinarily, any negotiations regarding settlement in Australia will be influenced by settlements in other jurisdictions. ASIC's new 'why not litigate' approach may affect prospects for a 'global' settlement as ASIC will be keen to ensure any resolution withstands public comment in light of the BRC.

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

Given the co-operation mechanisms available to Australian regulators (such as mutual assistance agreements), it is possible to conduct concurrent investigations in multiple jurisdictions regarding the same factual matters. It is usual for one or more Australian investigatory bodies to coordinate domestically and with international investigatory bodies. A coordinated effort will usually result in one regulator taking the lead in an investigation and other jurisdictions supporting its efforts to round out the information gathering.

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

The administration and implementation of Australia's sanctions laws is done at federal level, by the Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade (DFAT). Sanctions are implemented in accordance with the United Nations Security Council (UNSC) regime and further autonomous, Australian lead, sanctions regimes. DFAT has the power to issue a sanctions permit, should it be suitable, which will allow an importer or exporter to undertake activity that would otherwise contravene a sanction imposed in Australia. A full list of Australia's sanctions regimes is publicly available and it is expected that individuals and companies doing business in Australia should make their own enquiries to ensure compliance.

In April 2019, Australia imposed sanctions on the direct or indirect supply, sale or transfer to the Central African Republic on arms or related materials, without the issuance of a sanctions permit. In March 2019, Australia issued autonomous 'financial sanctions and travel bans on seven Russian individuals for their role in the interception and seizure of Ukrainian naval vessels'.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

Australia is obliged to closely follow the UNSC in relation to enforcement of sanctions. Contraventions are enforceable against Australian individuals and companies, and certain sanctions will have effect irrespective of whether the activities are located in Australia or overseas. The Australian government has successfully prosecuted a number of companies for sanctions violations. A small number of individuals have also been charged.

In recent times, there has been discussion as to whether sanctions enforcement should also more readily incorporate AUSTRAC, which regulates cross-border monetary transactions, including money laundering and terrorism financing.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

DFAT may consult other Australian government agencies, other countries or the Sanctions Committee of the UNSC on a range of issues, including in consideration of whether to agree to a sanctions permit.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

Australia currently does not have blocking legislation in relation to sanctions measures taken by third countries.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

Not applicable.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

There are a number of ways in which misconduct can be brought to the attention of a company, which include the following:

- ASIC conducts a preliminary investigation into every allegation of misconduct to assess whether further action is required. ASIC may be made aware of suspected contraventions by shareholders, media reports or whistleblowers.
- Whistleblower legislation requires that companies have avenues available to employees to report suspected misconduct. Whistleblowers may trigger internal investigations or investigations by ASIC.
- AUSTRAC monitors international transactions and transactions of (or more than) A$10,000 and will investigate any suspect transactions under anti-money laundering and counter-terrorism legislation.
- The Australian Securities Exchange (ASX) monitors share trading in publicly listed companies and can enquire into suspicious activities, including spikes in trading volume or share price. The ASX can refer suspected contraventions (such as insider trading) to ASIC for further investigation.

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

The Privacy Act regulates the handling of personal information and the Australian Privacy Principles (APPs) provide guidelines for dealing with such information. The Notifiable Data Breaches scheme, established through the Privacy Act, obliges entities to notify individuals whose personal information is the subject of a data breach, and the Australian Information Commissioner, when it is likely the breach will result in serious harm.

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

The data protection regime is enforced through the Office of the Australian Information Commissioner (OAIC). The Privacy Act confers powers on the Commissioner to facilitate compliance with best practice. The OAIC's preferred regulatory approach is to facilitate compliance and prevent breaches although it also has investigative and enforcement powers.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

The APPs regulate how personal information is collected and used. If an entity investigates the actions of an employee, it must be careful that any personal data is collected in accordance with these principles. A heightened level of protection attaches to sensitive information, such as a person's religious beliefs, sexual orientation or health information. Entities must comply with their legal obligations, particularly those that require an employee to be notified that personal data has been collected. It is also important to consider any implications of cross-border transfer of personal information.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

Employers are bound by contractual arrangements with employees, which often specify the rights an employer has over communications made during the course of employment. Interception of employment-based communications can be triggered by an internal investigation or well-founded suspicion of a contravention of company policy or legal obligations. Interception of personal, non-work-associated communications is governed by strictly applied privacy and telecommunications legislation and is likely to be illegal if beyond the scope of the employment arrangement. Enforcement of this legislation can involve the AFP.

Dawn raids and search warrants

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

Generally, the AFP executes search warrants on behalf of Commonwealth agencies. If an investigation is being conducted by another regulatory body, AFP officers may attend with officers of that regulatory body. Warrants contain information as to the restrictions on entry time, dates and the evidence that can be gathered during the execution of the search warrant, which may include hard copies of documents as well as stored communications (such as computer hard drives or mobile phones). Defendants are entitled to have legal representatives present and to request an itemised list of the property seized, and have a right to challenge the warrant's validity.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

Defendants may claim legal professional privilege (LPP) over materials seized during a legitimate search. Practically, this may mean the materials are sealed and delivered to the relevant court registry or regulator to await resolution of any disputed privilege claim by litigation or negotiation. The mere seizure of material without it being read does not constitute a waiver of privilege.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

During an investigation by a regulator, an individual can usually be compelled to give evidence in an examination. The individual cannot refuse to answer questions on the basis that those answers may tend to incriminate him or her. However, the individual can claim privilege against self-incrimination, meaning that the investigatory body cannot use the evidence gathered as an admission by the individual. There are some regulatory bodies that can derivatively use the information gathered during these types of examinations.

In a litigation context, an accused person has a right to claim privilege against self-incrimination or self-exposure to penalty, which means that they cannot be required to give evidence during proceedings against them. A witness may object to the giving of evidence in proceedings if the response would tend to prove that the witness had committed an offence under Australian or foreign laws or make them liable to a civil penalty.

Whistleblowing and employee rights

Whistleblower legislation has undergone noteworthy amendment in 2019. Whistleblower protections apply to both current and former employees within a defined list of roles, reporting lines have been expanded and the role of a corporation in affording protections to whistleblowers has strengthened. It is a strict liability offence not to have a company policy relating to whistleblowing (companies are afforded some time since the implementation of the legislation to have this policy available).

There is no financial incentive programme in Australia for whistleblowers.

Corporate whistleblowers who provide information to ASIC about contraventions of the Corporations Act are granted three main legal protections, which are that:

- their identity and the information given cannot be disclosed unless authorised by law;
- they are protected against civil or criminal liability for making the disclosure (e.g., for defamation); and
- they are protected against being victimised for making their disclosure.

Protection will only be given to persons who meet certain criteria, including being an existing employee or officer of the company. In the financial sector, whistleblowers who provide information to APRA are given similar protections.

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

Under the Fair Work Act 2009 (Cth), certain employees are protected against unfair dismissal. In the event of an internal investigation, certain omissions by the employer may violate the right against unfair dismissal, including failing to provide the employee with a support person. The employee has a right to be given information relating to the allegations against him or her and adequate time to respond.

Under the Corporations Act, officers and directors are subject to significantly higher standards of conduct. Contravention of these duties may attract significant penalties, disqualification or imprisonment.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

If an employee has engaged in misconduct, his or her rights will depend on the precise nature of the misconduct. For example, an internal finding of serious misconduct may constitute valid grounds for dismissal. However, a finding of serious misconduct by law enforcement may constitute an offence, and the employee's rights would depend on the associated laws.

There are no express requirements for employers to impose disciplinary or other steps if an employee is suspected of misconduct.

If 'serious misconduct' is established, the employee's contract of employment may be immediately terminated. The Fair Work Regulations 2009 (Cth) define 'serious misconduct' as including wilful or deliberate behaviour that causes serious or imminent risk to the health or safety of employees or reputation to business. Examples include theft, fraud, assault, being intoxicated at work, or refusing to carry out lawful and reasonable instructions.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

Mere refusal to participate in an internal investigation is unlikely to constitute valid grounds for dismissal.

Commencing an internal investigation

It is common to set out the scope of an investigation before it commences, although this is not mandatory. Consideration should be given to any regulatory compliance obligations, including reporting obligations. It is common for a board of directors to refer an internal investigation to an external adviser, such as a law firm, particularly if the board has concerns about litigation and risk management.

The terms of reference should outline the key allegations or concerns, define the sources of information that it is proposed should be gathered during the investigation, and identify who will report on the findings or recommendations of the investigation and the recipient of the report.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

When a company becomes aware of potential issues, an investigation should be undertaken to identify the nature and extent of any misconduct. Care should be taken in setting up the investigation, including to ensure that communications are confidential and privileged to the extent possible. A company may be obliged to report to regulators in relation to certain breaches, or may elect to self-report or seek immunity. Legal advice should be sought prior to making such decisions as the consequences may be serious. A company should work towards containing the breaches and, as far as possible, secure complete cessation of the offending behaviour. Evidence of the suspected breaches should not be destroyed and document preservation notices should be issued in appropriate circumstances. Any dismissal or discipline of individuals suspected to have participated in the misconduct should be carefully managed and based on legal advice.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

Compulsory document production notices must be strictly complied with as it is a criminal offence not to do so without a reasonable excuse. The notice may be addressed to an individual or the 'appropriate officer' within the company. The named individual does not have to coordinate the response but they should be kept informed as they may be held personally liable for any non-compliance.

It is necessary to make 'reasonable endeavours' to respond to a notice. A structured approach to the collation and production of materials should be taken, including where data will be sourced, relevant individuals or custodians of data, document preservation, and how the documents will be collated and stored to preserve original documents and metadata.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

If the internal investigation is confidential, there is no requirement for a company to disclose its existence publicly. Disclosure may be required if it is not possible for the conduct to be contained or if media or market speculation needs to be addressed. If the company is being investigated by regulators, disclosure will often depend on the preferred approach of that regulator. It is usual for regulators to ask that disclosure of the fact of their investigation not be made public unless mutually agreed.

Private companies have no legislative obligation to disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from law enforcement.

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

An efficiently run internal investigation is welcomed by the regulator, particularly if it leads to self-reporting. In some circumstances, a regulator may ask the corporate to undertake the first stage of the investigation. If an internal investigation is running concurrently with a regulator's investigation, co-operation in expediting the process and ultimate outcome is encouraged.

Attorney–client privilege

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

Communications made for the dominant purpose of giving or receiving legal advice, or existing or contemplated litigation, can be subject to a legitimate claim for legal professional privilege. If the dominant purpose relates to a factual investigation, it is unlikely that the communication will be privileged.

Lawyers' notes regarding internal investigations are usually protected by legal professional privilege. To protect the privilege, all communications should be marked as confidential and privileged and should not be distributed outside the lawyer–client communication lines unless necessary.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

Legal professional privilege is held by the client (company or individual), not the legal adviser. Employees of the company may have grounds to assert common interest privilege, if the employee reasonably believed the lawyer was giving them legal advice and their interests were not adverse to the company. In circumstances where a company seeks to maintain control over the privileged information, lawyers will ordinarily be instructed to communicate that distinction, adopting the US-style Upjohn or corporate Miranda warnings.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

Yes. The dominant purpose test applies, irrespective of whether the lawyer is internal or external to the company. Best practice is for in-house counsel to hold a current practising certificate and be independent. Privilege claims of advice from in-house counsel generally will be scrutinised, particularly if they hold another non-legal position within the company, or if they are accustomed to providing commercial advice (which will not be privileged).

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

Yes. Australian clients can claim the privilege if the communications are with a qualified lawyer admitted to practise in the foreign country and the communications satisfy the dominant purpose test.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

It is normal for companies and individuals to maintain claims of LPP. Waivers are generally restricted to circumstances in which the entity is essentially opening its doors on a no-restrictions basis. It may be considered that not claiming LPP signals an increased level of co-operation with the investigating authority. A court may compel an entity to produce documents if it has determined that the claims for privilege cannot be maintained. However, regulators are increasingly challenging claims for LPP, including taking some matters to court to dispute claims by companies withholding production of documents on the basis of LPP.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

Yes. For instance, a party responding to a compulsory notice to produce documents to ASIC may enter into a voluntary confidential LPP disclosure agreement, which allows production of the documents to ASIC, while protecting their disclosure to third parties. ASIC will undertake to treat the information as confidential and will defer to the privilege holder if ASIC is compelled to produce the documents. These agreements have not been tested by the courts as to whether they will withstand a challenge.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

Possibly. Relevant considerations will include the context in which the waiver was made (under compulsion or voluntarily), the use of the information subsequent to the waiver and whether, in Australia, privilege would still properly apply to the information.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

Common interest privilege does exist. The interest of the parties claiming the privilege must be the same, or almost the same (such that the parties could use the same lawyer), and it will not be available if they are potentially adverse. There is no requirement for a formal agreement between parties to establish this privilege, nor to identify an intention to claim the privilege at the time of communication, although it is advisable to do so to establish the extent of the common interest.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

It is not uncommon for lawyers to brief third-party experts to assist on matters relevant to the giving of legal advice. Communications with the third party will be covered by LPP if they fall within the dominant purpose test.

If a party serves a report or advice prepared by a third party during litigation, all materials (including briefing materials) used by the third party in informing an opinion generally become discoverable. There are limited circumstances in which a party can resist production of communications underpinning a report.

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

Organisations are permitted to conduct fact-finding interviews during an internal investigation. Consideration ought to be given to ensuring that the individual is afforded the appropriate amount of time to prepare and respond to questions. Whistleblowers, who may be among the first interviewed, are afforded additional legislative protections that must be adhered to.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

LPP can be claimed over witness interviews and reports prepared by legal advisers for the dominant purpose of giving or receiving legal advice or in the preparation of legal proceedings.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

Corporate Miranda or Upjohn warnings are not required to be given, although they are common in cross-border investigations. It is prudent to outline the scope of the lawyer's engagement at the time of the interview, to avoid any misconception as to whether the parties intend privilege to apply. The same approach applies to both current employees or third parties, although there is less scope for privilege to apply to third parties.

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

The style of interview will depend on the seriousness of the allegations being investigated. Notes of interviews should be kept confidential and a record of any materials discussed during the interview should be retained for future reference. Generally, a witness will be asked for an independent recollection of events before being presented with any documents. Documents put to a witness should be restricted to those about which the witness has first-hand knowledge. If the allegations are serious and directed to the interviewee, then it is not unusual to provide the interviewee with the option of having their own legal representation at the interview.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

It is mandatory under anti-money laundering and counter-terrorism financing legislation to report suspicious financial transactions to AUSTRAC. The company must have formed a suspicion that the dealings may be related to an offence (such as money laundering, terrorism financing or operating under a false identity, tax evasion or proceeds of crime) and must report within 24 hours if it relates to terrorism, or otherwise three business days.

Australian financial services licensees must report any significant breaches, or anticipated breaches, of obligations under the Corporations Act.

State legislation may also apply.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

If an internal investigation has led to findings of misconduct, a decision will need to be made whether to self-report. Self-reporting may be advisable if the findings are likely to affect the company's ability to conduct its business or trading of the company's shares.

Disclosure to regulators outside Australia may depend on whether the conduct has occurred outside the jurisdiction and the reporting obligations in those other jurisdictions.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

In self-reporting, the company should be prepared to co-operate honestly and completely with authorities and assist regulators' investigations, which may go beyond internal investigation. This will involve providing to authorities any information gathered during the internal investigation at the time of self-reporting.

The company should be prepared to plead guilty to any offence identified and may be required to assist in the prosecution of related parties. Public disclosure will need to be considered for listed companies, consistent with disclosure obligations.

In certain circumstances, immunity for being first-in-time can be sought when reporting to the ACCC.

Legislation allowing deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs) is proceeding through the Australian Parliament. It has been the subject of extensive consultation and is expected to be introduced in late 2019. Once passed, it is anticipated that this legislation will provide benefits to corporates who self-report relevant offences (see question 65).

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

Companies take seriously their obligation to comply with notices from regulators. It is possible to enter into a dialogue with a regulator in relation to a notice or subpoena, particularly if there are concerns about scope or time for production. This would be done by speaking or writing to a representative of the regulator in the first instance.

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

A company may challenge an investigation if the investigation is an abuse of process or harassment.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

Consistency is key when a company is facing allegations of wrongdoing regarding the same facts in multiple jurisdictions. A company should ensure responses are coordinated and that production of documents or information is strictly responsive to the notice. There is no requirement to go beyond the strict terms of the notice and doing so may amount to voluntary disclosure and not be afforded protections (such as confidentiality and privilege) that would otherwise be available.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

Materials must be produced if they are in the possession, custody or control of the company in Australia (irrespective of the location where they are held). It may be possible to resist production of materials outside Australia if to do so would be oppressive.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

Australian regulators make use of mutual recognition agreements with regulators from other jurisdictions, such as the International Organisation of Securities Commissions. Less formal arrangements exist between some regulators, such as the AFP's arrangements with other police agencies globally. Mutual assistance requests are a formal mechanism by which authorities can obtain information from overseas regulators for use in criminal proceedings.

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

Information produced under compulsion can only be used for the purpose for which it was obtained. Materials can be shared between regulators, subject to satisfying legislative requirements, and can be disclosed to third parties during an investigation if it is deemed necessary.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

Refusing to produce a document that is disclosable under the notice will be a breach and may give rise to legal action by the regulator. Open dialogue with the regulator is encouraged at an early stage to attempt to negotiate an amendment to the notice to exclude production of documents that give rise to a breach of laws in another jurisdiction. Otherwise, the company should look at avenues to challenge the notice.

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

Australian data privacy laws prevent the disclosure of certain personal and sensitive information. The APPs apply to government agencies, private sector and not-for-profit organisations (with an annual turnover of more than A$3 million), private health providers and small businesses.

Disclosure is permitted if compelled (such as by a document production notice or subpoena) or reasonably necessary for one or more enforcement-related activities by an enforcement body. In defending allegations of misconduct, data may also be transferred for the purposes of, or in connection with, legal proceedings (including prospective legal proceedings) or for the purposes of establishing, exercising or defending legal rights.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

It is common for companies to request that a regulator issue a notice to compel the production of materials to preserve claims of confidentiality and privilege. Such a claim may be waived by voluntary production. Regulators can be compelled to produce documents to third parties by court order, but may segregate documents that are subject to claims of privilege (including LPP and public interest immunity) and confidentiality, and leave it to the court to rule on such claims.

Prosecution and penalties

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

Companies can face financial penalties, which can be up to 10 times what is imposed on an individual, or more for offences for which penalties are based on company turnover.

Penalties against an individual will vary depending on the offence. Criminal wrongdoing may result in imprisonment or financial penalties, or both. Civil penalty proceedings can result in fines, compensation orders and disqualification from managing corporations.

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

The Commonwealth and state/territory government does not automatically suspend or disbar a company for any conduct, although it does have discretion to preclude a company from public procurement contracts.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

Courts will consider a range of factors, including the seriousness of the offence, the number of contraventions and the period during which they occurred, the need for general deterrence, remorse, retribution, co-operation and any relevant personal circumstances.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

DPAs are not currently available but are likely to be introduced in the near future (see question 52). Based on the current proposed legislation, DPAs will allow companies to negotiate terms of settlement for allegations of serious corporate crime, which include the setting of a penalty for contravention, but will require approval by an approving officer before they can be finalised. Not all corporate crimes are covered in the proposed legislation and DPAs will not be available to individuals.

DPAs under the proposed incoming legislation are similar to non-prosecution agreements under US law.

Another mechanism in which a company may reach agreement with authorities to avoid prosecution in return for co-operation is by seeking an indemnity, more formally referred to as an undertaking, under the Director of Public Prosecutions Act 1983 (Cth). The circumstances in which an indemnity may be granted are generally governed by the Prosecution

Policy of the Commonwealth. In the context of cartel prosecutions, applications are governed by the ACCC Immunity and Cooperation Policy for Cartel Conduct.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

There is no certainty regarding implementation of DPAs in Australia at present; however, the proposal is that the DPA be published in full, except in exceptional circumstances, such as when the publication would prejudice court proceedings. This approach would be consistent with that taken when a company has pleaded guilty, or been granted an indemnity for prosecution, but proceedings are also under way against connected individuals or corporate entities (for instance in the case of cartel proceedings).

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

Considerations relevant to settlement include an assessment of the facts and allegations made against the company, the strength of the evidence, the terms on which the regulator is willing to settle (where they can be agreed) and the potential consequences of any settlement (including on business operations, investigations in other jurisdictions and the risk of collateral civil litigation).

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

The proposed DPA process suggests the use of an independent monitor, paid for by the company, to assess compliance with the terms of the DPA. The reason for this is, in part, that the body responsible for entering into DPAs with companies, the CDPP, does not have a monitoring function. External corporate compliance monitors have also often had a role in enforceable undertakings with ASIC.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

Private actions are permitted to run in parallel with criminal or regulatory proceedings, provided they do not prejudice the accused's right to a fair trial, or the right to maintain privilege against self-incrimination or exposure to penalty, and do not interfere with the criminal proceedings. It is common for private or civil actions to be stayed pending the outcome of criminal proceedings.

Private plaintiffs are entitled to apply to regulators to access files through various mechanisms, including Freedom of Information requests and subpoenas. In addition, ASIC has the power to provide information to private litigants in certain circumstances. The disclosure of information by regulatory bodies is subject to overriding considerations of public interest, the risk of prejudice to an ongoing investigation or proceeding, and statutory restrictions.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

Criminal investigations are generally confidential. An accused has the right to a fair trial and a presumption of innocence. Investigatory bodies, such as the AFP, have media policies that restrict the publication of information that may prejudice an ongoing investigation or affect an accused's right to a fair trial, particularly in tainting the jury pool.

Criminal court proceedings are a matter of public record. There are limited situations in which a corporation or individual can restrict access to, or publication of, the court proceedings. Although the media are entitled to report on public hearings, they are required to follow orders from the judge relating to non-publication of certain information. Jury deliberations are confidential. It is an offence to publish anything regarding the identity of a juror or the discussions that take place in the jury room.

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

It is common for public relations firms to be hired, particularly in high-profile matters. Lawyers will generally work with a public relations firm to ensure accuracy of reporting and in making any public statements during an investigation or proceeding.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

Corporations need to carefully manage the release of information regarding ongoing proceedings to avoid being in contempt of the proceedings or prejudicing the proceedings, especially any criminal proceedings before a jury, and to meet any relevant continuous disclosure obligations. Regulators will announce the commencement of proceedings and may provide procedural updates but generally will not comment on substantive matters for the duration of the proceeding.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

If the settlement is likely to have a material effect on the price or value of the company's securities and does not fall within an exception (such as the information being confidential), it is required to be disclosed to the market by a public company. Confidentiality alone is not grounds for non-disclosure of the fact of settlement. It is often the case that parties agree the terms of disclosure of a settlement as part of the settlement negotiations.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

The outworking of the BRC is likely to result in a higher volume of civil penalty proceedings and criminal proceedings against companies and individuals arising from investigations by regulatory bodies such as ASIC and the Australian Financial Complaints Authority (which provides a dispute resolution mechanism for consumers). Consequential civil litigation is likely to arise in the form of class actions or other private civil actions, in which individuals and organisations seek to make use of the regulators' more public and aggressive enforcement approach.

Austria

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

Since 2017, a wide-ranging investigation of the construction sector has been pending in Austria. Currently, the authorities involved are assuming that the companies concerned have colluded on up to 800 construction projects. In most cases, the projects were administered by public authorities who were required by law to invite tenders for their public works. The cost of the construction projects is estimated at several hundred million euros.

The Central Public Prosecutor's Office for Economic Crimes and Corruption (WKStA) and the Austrian Federal Competition Authority are involved in the investigation. Following the first raids in 2017, and further raids in 2018, around 60 companies and more than 150 individuals are now subject to prosecution. To date, the authorities have seized more than 70,000 pages of documents and 57 terabytes of IT data.

While it is currently assumed that the criminal proceedings conducted by the WKStA (natural persons face a prison sentence of up to 10 years, companies face fines of up to €1.3 million) will still take several years before indictments are filed, the Federal Competition Authority announced the first applications for fines by the turn of the year. Antitrust behaviour may be sanctioned with fines of up to 10 per cent of a corporate entity's total turnover.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

The Austrian legal system distinguishes between civil liability (for breaches of private law), criminal liability (for offences against criminal law) and liability under administrative penal law (for regulatory offences). The main focus of this chapter is on criminal liability of corporations.

Pursuant to the Law on Corporate Liability (VbVG), corporations are liable for the unlawful and culpable actions of their decision makers and, under more restrictive conditions, for the actions of their employees, provided that the offence was either committed for the benefit of the corporation or the offence violated duties incumbent on the corporation. Moreover, an offence committed by an employee must have been either rendered possible or facilitated by the decision makers' failure to take essential precautionary measures, in particular of a technical, organisational or personal character.

In contrast to the liability for criminal offences, corporations are only directly liable for regulatory (administrative law) offences against tax law (section 28a, Penal Tax Code). In other areas of administrative penal law, there is only an indirect joint liability of the corporation for fines imposed for offences committed by the managing director or other 'persons in charge' (section 9, Administrative Penal Code). However, these offences are considered offences by the natural person, not the corporation.

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

Criminal offences are investigated by public prosecutors with the assistance of the criminal investigation department of the police. Pursuant to section 20a of the Code of Criminal Procedure (StPO), the WKStA is responsible for prosecuting economic crimes and corruption. The Federal Bureau of Anti-Corruption assists the WKStA in matters relating to corruption.

Administrative law is enforced by various administrative authorities, often with sector-specific competences. The most notable examples are the Financial Market Authority, which oversees, inter alia, banks, insurance companies and companies listed at the Vienna Stock Exchange, and the Competition Authority, which conducts investigations into possible violations of national and European competition law.

Although competences between criminal and administrative authorities are distinguished ratione materiae, situations can arise in which different authorities have parallel competence over the same facts. Pursuant to section 15 of the StPO, criminal courts must autonomously decide preliminary questions pertaining to other areas of law. However, they may await the decision of a competent court or administrative authority on such preliminary questions if the decision is to be expected in the foreseeable future. Administrative authorities, in turn, may suspend their investigations if a preliminary question forms the object of another proceeding.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

Yes, for the opening of a criminal investigation, an 'initial suspicion' is required. Pursuant to section 1, paragraph 3 of the StPO, this is the case whenever specific indications give reason to suspect that a criminal offence has been committed.

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

Persons suspected of a crime have a right against self-incrimination (see question 27). However, non-compliance with a notice to produce documents or a subpoena to appear before the investigation authority may lead to coercive measures, such as house searches. A coercive measure can be challenged by means of a complaint, arguing, for example, that the measure violates the principle of proportionality (section 87, StPO). If documents are protected by attorney–client confidentiality, an objection to the temporary securing can be filed and the sealing of the documents or data can be requested, to obtain a court decision to release the data (see question 26).

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

See questions 28 and 51. The intention of the leniency programme is to promote assistance from the perpetrator of a crime, to detect and prosecute other crimes that could otherwise not, or only with great difficulty, be investigated. In this way, both the state and the perpetrator derive benefit from the leniency programme.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

Fighting corruption is an express priority of the current government, more specifically the Austrian Ministry of Justice. Since Austria's ratification of the UN Convention Against Corruption in January 2006, a – more or less – constant improvement of the anti-corruption laws could be observed. A number of legislative improvements have been implemented to fight corruption, including the creation of the Federal Bureau of Anti-Corruption in 2010 and the WKStA in 2011 (see question 3).

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

The Austrian Act on Security of Network and Information Systems (NISG) was enacted in 2018 to implement the corresponding EU Directive (2016/1148 concerning measures for a high common level of security of network and information systems) as the first EU-wide regulation on cybersecurity. It obliges companies to establish comprehensive security measures and to prove their effectiveness. Failure to comply with the requirements of the NISG could result in penalties and loss of reputation. The focus of the NISG is on operators of essential services that are of major importance, in particular for the maintenance of public health services, the public supply of water, energy and vital goods, public transport, and the functionality of public information and communication technology, the availability of which depends on network and information systems.

Additionally, the General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) must be considered in connection with requirements of cybersecurity (see question 22).

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

In 2013, the European Parliament enacted Directive 2013/40/EU on attacks against information systems, which was incorporated as part of Austrian national (criminal) law in 2015. The Directive seeks to 'approximate the criminal law' in the area of cybercrime and to improve co-operation between competent authorities.

Moreover, a cybercrime competence centre to combat computer crime was set up as a separate unit within the Austrian Federal Criminal Police Office. The cross-border prosecution of computer-related crime in the European Union is coordinated by the European Cybercrime Centre, set up by Europol.

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

Austrian criminal law has no general extraterritorial effect (section 62 of the Austrian Penal Code (StGB)). Criminal offences committed on an Austrian ship or aeroplane are subject to the StGB, as are certain offences regardless of the criminal law of the location of the offence, including economic espionage, criminal offences against an Austrian official, human trafficking, terrorism, corruption and several other types of major crimes (section 64, StGB).

Other offences committed abroad are only subject to Austrian criminal law (1) if the offence is also punishable under the laws of the place where the offence is committed, (2) if the offender is Austrian or is arrested in Austria and cannot be extradited, and (3) none of the exceptions set out in section 65(2)4 of the StGB applies.

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

The co-operation between Austrian prosecutors and their counterparts in other EU Member States is greatly facilitated by three instruments: the European evidence warrant, the European investigation order (EIO) and joint investigation teams (JITs). Hereafter, the focus of our discussion is on the latter two. Also of relevance is the Law on Judicial Cooperation in Criminal Matters.

The EIO replaces the classic system of judicial assistance, as it allows the competent authority of one EU Member State (the issuing state) to order, after validation by a court or public prosecutor of the issuing state, the execution of most acts of investigation, including coercive measures, in another EU Member State (the executing state) (Article 2, Directive 2014/41/EU of 3 April 2014). Subject to certain grounds for non-recognition, non-execution or postponement, the executing state must ensure the execution of the order as if the investigative measure concerned had been ordered by a domestic authority (Article 9, Directive 2014/41/EU). The national law of the executing state may provide that authorisation by a domestic court is required (Article 2(d), Directive 2014/41/EU). When this is not the case, the EIO may be directly executed by the executing authority.

JITs are multinational investigation teams based on an agreement between two or more law enforcement authorities in EU Member States and are set up to investigate a specific matter for a fixed period. The co-operation can be extended to non-EU Member States if all other participating parties agree.

By contrast, the co-operation between Austrian prosecution authorities and non-EU Member States (and Denmark) still follows traditional judicial assistance practice based on the principle of reciprocity and governed by international agreements and, when these do not contain a governing rule, the Extradition and Judicial Assistance Law, which only applies in ongoing criminal proceedings in Austria; it does not apply to administrative proceedings. Unless an international agreement provides for direct judicial assistance, the Austrian authorities must request judicial assistance through the Federal Ministry of Justice. Moreover, unlike in an EIO, the public prosecutors must request and obtain court authorisation from the domestic court for coercive investigation measures.

Finally, special challenges arise when investigations relate to countries with strong secrecy rules, for example Swiss banking secrecy.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

The transnational effect of the ne bis in idem principle (established in section 17(1), StPO) is based on international agreements to which Austria is a party (see Alois Birklbauer in Fuchs and Ratz, Wiener Kommentar zur Strafprozessordnung, section 17). Of particular importance for the transnational effect of the principle is Article 54 of the Convention implementing the Schengen Agreement (the implementing Convention), which prohibits prosecution for 'the same offence', if a person has been 'finally judged' and has already served, or is serving, a sentence in another contracting state (note that Austria has made declarations relating to all exceptions enumerated in Article 55 of the implementing Convention).

In the context of Article 54 of the implementing Convention, Austrian authorities apply different concepts of 'same offence' to different situations. For a criminal court, confronted with a previous sentence of another criminal court, the previous sentence deploys a blocking effect in relation to the same factual matrix. This concept is favourable for the accused. By contrast, a criminal court can convict an accused on the same facts if the accused was previously sanctioned by an administrative authority (rather than a criminal court) and the sanction did not fully correct the injustice done.

Article 54 of the implementing Convention speaks of a person who has been 'finally judged'. According to both case law and legal scholarship, the concept of final judgment encompasses all judgments that conclude a main trial, namely both convictions and acquittals. No differentiation is made by the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) between an acquittal based on a judgment on the merits or a procedural judgment. Moreover, the closure of proceedings by the prosecution authority without the involvement of a court has a blocking effect for the purpose of Article 54 of the implementing Convention if it is the result of an action for compensation (in Austria, this is called diversion – see question 51) brought by the person under investigation and the closure is final (Gözütok and Brügge, CJEU judgment of 11 February 2003, C-187/01, C-385/01). Other provisions dealing with previous convictions abroad are section 192 of the StPO and section 66 of the Austrian Penal Code (StGB).

A further provision entitling criminal prosecutors to refrain from prosecution is contained in section 192(1) of the StPO (which applies in cases falling outside the scope of the implementing Convention or other international agreements), provided that the suspected person is charged with several offences, the person has already been convicted by a foreign court for the offence, or the person has made compensation abroad and as a result has been exempted from further prosecution (diversion), and no more severe penalty is to be expected in Austria. Finally, pursuant to section 66 of the StGB, Austrian courts must take into account a punishment for the same crime imposed and served abroad. Otherwise, the Austrian legal system does not provide for a 'anti-piling on' policy.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

Global settlements are not common in Austria. For the effect of a diversion in EU Member States, see question 12.

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

See question 12, and paragraph 17 of the Preamble to Directive 2014/41/EU regarding the European investigation order in criminal matters, which allows an EIO aiming 'to establish whether a possible conflict with the ne bis in idem principle exists'.

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

Austria itself has not imposed any sanctions against other states. However, for the Austrian economy, the sanctions imposed by the European Union on various states, for example in connection with Syria or Russia, must be considered.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

Parallel to the (primarily) EU sanctions that should be taken into account, a supplementary Austrian Sanctions Act (SanktG) is in force, which regulates, for example, domestic implementing measures of sanctions of the European Union or the United Nations and penal provisions relating to any violation of imposed sanctions.

According to published crime statistics, there has been no conviction under the SanktG – which is only a subsidiary offence – in recent years.

There has been no apparent increase in the enforcement of sanctions violations, based on publicly available information.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

Yes. The co-operation is based on the existing European legal instruments (see question 11).

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

Austria, itself, has not enacted any blocking legislation. However, see question 60 regarding Council Regulation (EC) No. 2271/96 protecting against the effects of the extraterritorial application of legislation adopted by a third country (the Blocking Statute).

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

Austria, itself, has not enacted any blocking legislation. However, see question 60 regarding the Blocking Statute.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

Occasionally, allegations of misconduct arise out of tax audits. It is also not infrequent that competitors and victims of misconduct bring unlawful conduct to the attention of the authorities. Other common ways are chance discoveries of an offence, whistleblowers, standard screening processes, suspicious activity reports, internal audits, tax reporting, compliance and media reports.

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

EU regulations on data protection – with their usual high standards – are applicable in Austria. The GDPR, which is directly applicable in all EU Member States, became effective on 25 May 2018. In addition to the GDPR regime, the Austrian Law on Data Protection (DSG) has further provisions on data protection, and on institutional and procedural aspects.

Personal data is defined as any information relating to an identified or identifiable natural person (see Article 4, GDPR). When it comes to the processing of personal data during an internal investigation, companies must comply with GDPR stipulations. According to Article 5 of the GDPR, personal data shall be collected only for specific, explicit and legitimate purposes and, inter alia, be processed lawfully, fairly and transparently. In that regard, the processing of personal data is lawful only if the data subject has given consent and if it is necessary, inter alia, for:

- the performance of a contract or responds to the data subject's request prior to entering a contract;

- compliance with a legal obligation to which the data's controller is subject; or
- the purpose of the legitimate interests of the data's controller (see Article 6, GDPR).

Moreover, the GDPR provides for a catalogue of rights applicable to data subjects, including the right to be informed about the processing and storage of personal data, the purpose of data processing and the duration of storage. Furthermore, the GDPR provides for a data subject's right to file a complaint with the relevant supervisory authority (see question 22) if the processing of personal data may have violated data protection rights.

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

As is widely known, infringements of GDPR provisions are sanctioned by severe administrative fines, which can amount to €20 million or 4 per cent of the corporation's annual global turnover, whichever is higher. Implementing the GDPR provisions, Austria's Data Protection Authority (DSB) was established to monitor the application of the Regulation and, as Austria's supervisory public authority, is competent to enforce GDPR provisions.

As an exceptional measure in implementing GDPR provisions, the Austrian legislature added its own provision regarding the DSB's use of corrective powers (see Article 58, GDPR). According to section 11 of the DSG, the DSB shall make use of its corrective powers under Article 58 of the GDPR, particularly in the case of first-time infringements, primarily by issuing warnings. Since the GDPR does not entitle EU Member States to direct supervisory authorities on how to exercise their powers, this provision may violate the DSB's independence, under Article 52 of the GDPR.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

As in all EU Member States, GDPR provisions must be considered carefully when data is processed. The term 'processing' is defined as any operation or set of operations performed on personal data or on sets of personal data, whether or not by automated means, such as collection, recording, organising, structuring, storage, adaptation or alteration, retrieval, consultation upon, use, disclosure by transmission, dissemination or otherwise making available, alignment or combination, restriction, erasure or destruction (see Article 4, GDPR).

During an internal investigation, a considerable amount of evidence, including personal data, will be processed by collecting, storing, using, disclosing, etc. To comply with GDPR provisions, it should be well documented which data is classified as personal and which as non-personal. Furthermore, investigating companies should document in detail the purpose of processing personal data and comply with GDPR provisions regarding storage limitations, integrity and confidentiality. Besides that, companies should be especially careful when it comes to transnational data transfers, especially from or to non-EU Member States.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

Private email accounts or telephone conversations may not be monitored by the employer under any circumstances.

The protection of the employee's privacy must also be observed regarding professional emails or telephone calls. Monitoring affects human dignity and triggers the employee's or works council's obligation to give his or her prior consent. The obligation of pre-approval does not depend on whether the private use of the professional email account or internet connection is permitted by the employer; it applies in every case, unless higher interests justify the screening of the company's data. In any event, the GDPR must be considered (see question 21).

Affected employees can assert injunctive relief claims and, if necessary, contact the DSB (see question 22).

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

With the approval of the court, the public prosecutor may order the search of a specific location – for instance, an office building – to collect, temporarily secure or seize evidence, or any kind of assets that may serve as evidence, not only for the subsequent phases of the proceedings but also for the sole purpose of securing civil claims of parties injured by the (alleged) criminal offence (section 119(1), StPO). In cases in which there is a risk that by waiting for a court order the evidence may become unavailable, the public prosecutor may order the search of a location before seeking court approval (section 120, StPO).

Persons in possession of documents, data carriers or assets that form the object of a request for temporary securing are under a legal duty to comply unless they are suspected of the underlying offence or discharged from testifying, or have a right to refuse to give evidence (section 111, StPO). However, the public prosecutor can obtain the evidence by coercive means, such as a house search. Regarding the protection of privileged material, see question 26.

In addition to prior or subsequent court approval, house searches are subject to certain prerequisites. Most importantly, there must be a founded suspicion (this threshold is higher than the initial suspicion required to open investigations – see question 4) and the coercive measure needs to comply with the principle of proportionality. A temporary securing or seizure is not lawful if a less intrusive means is available (for instance by photocopying documents – see section 110(4), StPO).

Persons against whom a search warrant was issued, or whose premises have been subject to a search, can file an objection with the competent public prosecutor within six weeks of the measure (section 106 StPO). The public prosecutor can either comply with the objection or, within four weeks, pass the objection to the competent criminal court.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

Attorney work-product and attorney–client communications are protected in several ways. Attorneys (and a small number of other professions) have a legal duty of confidentiality and a right to refuse to give evidence (section 157, StPO). The duty may not be circumvented. This prohibits the seizure of attorney documents and the information contained therein at the attorney's premises and, since November 2016, also at the premises of clients under suspicion or accused in criminal proceedings. The attorney–client confidentiality only extends to the attorney's work-product and attorney–client communications created for the purpose of defending the client and not to previously existing evidence.

Any person subject to or present during a measure of temporary securing may object to the temporary securing of material protected by attorney–client confidentiality (sections 106 and 115, StPO). In the case of such an objection, documents and data carriers have to be sealed and presented to a court, which must decide promptly whether the evidence is protected (section 112, StPO).

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

Accused individuals or companies have a right to avoid self-incrimination. In the case of a corporation, the managers (persons in charge) and the employees suspected of having committed an offence are to be interrogated as accused (section 17(1), VbVG). It is forbidden to use coercive measures (or promises or misleading statements) to induce the accused to make a statement (section 7(2), StPO). Pursuant to section 166 of the StPO, compelled testimony is classed as prohibited evidence and is null and void.

Relatives of the accused are discharged from the duty to testify (section 156(1)1, StPO) and witnesses can refuse to testify if they would incriminate themselves or expose a relative to the risk of criminal prosecution (section 157(1)1, StPO). On attorney–client confidentiality, see questions 26 and 38.

Privileges exist for members of certain professions, such as lawyers, auditors, medical doctors, psychiatrists, mediators, priests and reporters (section 157, StPO).

Whistleblowing and employee rights

28 Describe the whistleblowing framework in your country. What financial incentive schemes exist for whistleblowers? What legal protections are in place for whistleblowers?

Whistleblowers can bring alleged offences anonymously to the attention of the WKStA through a whistleblower website, for which a legal basis was created in 2015.

A whistleblower may benefit from the crown witness regulation (section 209a, StPO). This regulation concerns serious offences and is available, if the witness freely confesses his or her contribution to the offence, if the information disclosed is new and not yet part of an investigation against the witness, and if it contributes substantially to the investigation. Subject to further prerequisites (section 209a, StPO), criminal prosecutors may terminate the investigations against such a person, for example in return for payment of a monetary contribution. This will generally be less than a fine imposed by the court in the event of a conviction, which can also create a financial incentive.

Similarly, section 11b of the Austrian Act on the Establishment of a Competition Law Authority also contains a crown witness regulation. Other provisions on whistleblowing are contained in section 160 of the Federal Law on the Stock Exchange 2018 (BoerseG).

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

Employers have a duty of care towards their employees, including those in an executive or managerial position (section 1157(1), Austrian Civil Code; section 18(4), Law on Employees (AngG). Pursuant to this duty, the employer must, inter alia, respect the private life of employees, protect their honour and treat them equally. This also has an effect on the conduct of internal investigations. Prior to an interview, the employer (or third party acting for the employer) should, for instance, inform employees that they may be accompanied by their own legal representative, at least in situations of a (potential) conflict of interest. For protection provided by other branches of law, see question 48.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

A finding of misconduct will frequently destroy the trustworthiness of an employee and justify dismissal. However, a mere suspicion of a criminal offence is insufficient. Stricter standards apply to employees in executive positions (Decision of the Austrian Supreme Court, RS0029652).

Under Austrian law, an employer may only dismiss an employee without giving notice if the employer exercises this right immediately after becoming aware of the reason justifying the dismissal (Decision of the Austrian Supreme Court, RS0029131). Employers forfeit this right if they fail to exercise it immediately (a requirement that has proved controversial in cases of a suspected criminal offence – see Silke Heinz-Ofner in AngG: Angestelltengesetz – Kommentar, Reissner (editor), 2nd edition, section 27, No. 52). If there is any doubt, an employer can suspend an employee until the investigation yields more evidence.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

Employees have a duty of loyalty to their employer and a duty to inform (for the employer's corresponding duty of care, see question 29). Whether this duty gives rise to an obligation to answer the questions of private investigators that may reveal personal misconduct is a matter of controversy in Austrian scholarship. On the one hand, it is recognised that the right against self-incrimination is only applicable as regards state authorities. On the other, it has been argued that an employee must have some right against self-incrimination, if the internal investigation forms a prelude to criminal investigation, since the employee would otherwise be effectively deprived of his or her defence rights in criminal proceedings (see, for example, Ingeborg Zerbes, 'Strafrechtliche Grundsatzfragen "interner Untersuchungen"', Jahrbuch Wirtschaftsstrafrecht und Organverantwortlichkeit 2013, 263, at pages 271 and 272). To our knowledge, the matter has not yet been decided by a court.

Commencing an internal investigation

32 Is it common practice in your country to prepare a document setting out terms of reference or investigatory scope before commencing an internal investigation? What issues would it cover?

Austrian corporations follow the international practice of setting out the terms and the personal, material and temporal scope of an internal investigation in a document. The issues usually covered include:

- person acting as internal investigator;
- definition of types of documents and electronic data (correspondence, documents) and method of screening;
- internal or external interviewers;
- persons to be interviewed;
- definition of documents or (provisional) outcomes of the internal investigation with which the interviewees will be confronted;
- channels of communication;
- involvement of an accounting department;
- definition of spheres of confidentiality;
- phases of the internal investigation;
- point in time of informing persons whose data is used; and
- treatment of data during and after completion of the investigation.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

In principle, companies are under no legal duty to bring misconduct to the attention of enforcement authorities. Doing so can allow a company to benefit from the crown witness regulation (see question 28) or from gaining 'victim status' (as an injured party) rather than being treated as a suspect in the proceedings. Reporting duties can arise from rules on corporate governance and company law, depending on a company's size and other relevant factors (see, notably, the requirement of a status report pursuant to section 243 et seq. of the Austrian Commercial Code). Managing directors of public limited companies must report to the president of the supervisory board any violations, or any suspicions of violations, that are of significant consequence to the company, and managing directors of limited liability companies have a corresponding duty to report to the shareholders.

See also question 73 regarding the duty of publicly listed companies to issue ad hoc notifications.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

As a general rule, everyone is under a legal duty not to destroy material that may become relevant in a legal dispute. Suppression of evidence is a criminal offence (section 229, StGB).

Advisable measures include the search and preservation of relevant data and the drawing up of an internal memo recording the findings. Companies should also review the settings of deletion routine and instruct employees not to delete any emails, nor to destroy relevant data.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

See questions 33 and 73.

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

The views of local enforcers can vary. Internal investigations may be regarded as helpful, especially if the results are shared with the prosecution, or as a fig leaf that obfuscates rather than assists the criminal investigation. The sharing of the results of an internal investigation may be taken into account as a factor leading criminal prosecutors to refrain from prosecution (section 18, VbVG – see also question 51).

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

If an attorney is conducting an internal investigation or mandates a third party (see question 45), products such as investigation reports are covered by attorney–client confidentiality (see question 26). It is recommended to store attorney work-product so that the data continues to belong to the attorney, for example using only a SharePoint provided by the attorney. In this way, objections and challenges in the case of a house search at a client's or third party's premises can be avoided.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

The holder of the confidentiality obligation is the attorney. He or she owes it to the client and the client may release the attorney from the duty. However, attorneys are under no duty to testify. Even if the attorney is released from the duty of confidentiality by the client, he or she still must consider the potential to cause damage to the client when testifying and, if required, refrain from testifying. If, on balance, a refusal to testify serves an attorney's client's interests better, he or she is under a duty not to testify. The confidentiality obligation applies regardless of whether the client is an individual or a company.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

The attorney–client privilege applies only to external counsel.

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

Section 157 of the StPO (see question 26) stipulates that lawyers are entitled to withhold testimony. This applies to Austrian lawyers and to lawyers from other European countries who can work in Austria as service providers or as European lawyers in private practice in accordance with EIRAG (Federal Act on the Free Movement of Services and the Establishment of European Lawyers and the Provision of Legal Services by Internationally Active Lawyers in Austria). It has not yet been decided whether a non-European lawyer may also invoke the obligation of confidentiality under Austrian law in Austrian proceedings. In our opinion, this would have to be permissible otherwise the procedural right of the accused client to avoid self-incrimination could be circumvented. In practice, Austrian courts respect the right of a private practitioner to refrain from testifying against the interests of a client.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

There is a general understanding that waiver of the attorney–client privilege is necessary to obtain co-operation credit. However, no legal rule exists that would render a waiver mandatory. As noted under question 38, attorneys may be under a duty to insist on confidentiality even if a client has discharged them from it.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

It is not possible to limit disclosure of information to the prosecuting authority for the whole duration of the proceedings. The prosecuting authority must share relevant information with the parties who have access to the criminal file. It can only grant confidentiality for a limited period but will ultimately have to disclose it.

Accused or suspected persons may release their attorneys with regard to certain aspects of the facts only. As explained in questions 38 and 41, attorneys are under no obligation to testify, even if they are released from their duty of confidentiality.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

There is no legal requirement in Austria to waive attorney–client confidentiality. However, if information is in the public domain, it is no longer protected. If information is made part of the criminal file, the prosecution may restrict access only for a limited time.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

Given the fundamental difference between the discovery provisions under Austrian law and those applicable in common law jurisdictions, there is no need for a US-style concept of common interest privilege.

Third parties to whom information was disclosed may not have a duty to keep the information confidential or may not benefit from a right to refuse to testify.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

Where it is necessary for an attorney to resort to third parties (e.g., a forensic or accounting expert) for the purpose of carrying out his or her own mandate, these third parties are considered as assistants of the attorney and information they obtain or the work-product they produce is confidential (section 9(3), Law on Attorneys; see also Alexander Tipold and Ingeborg Zerbes in Fuchs and Ratz, Wiener Kommentar zur Strafprozessordnung, sections 110 to 115, No. 30).

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

Yes. Based on their duty of loyalty, employees must participate in such interviews (for limitations, see questions 29, 30 and 31). If the interview is conducted by an Austrian lawyer, he or she must refrain from influencing the witness' future statements.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

There is no case law confirming that attorney–client confidentiality covers interviews conducted by, or reports drafted by, attorneys on the instruction of their client. However, based on the general principles outlined in questions 26 and 37, it must be presumed that such information is protected. The attorney–client privilege applies in the same way regardless of whether the client is an individual or a company.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

Any interview has to be conducted within the confines set by law, notably the employer's duty of care towards its employees (see question 29), the protection of privacy, substantive criminal law and data protection law. Data protection law requires, inter alia, the respect of the principle of proportionality in using data. In most situations, recording the interview will require the agreement of the interviewee, but may also be justified by the prevailing interests of the company (section 12(2), DSG).

Whether further legal restrictions apply, in particular the right against self-incrimination, is subject to debate in Austria (see question 31). As long as the current legal uncertainty persists, it seems advisable to at least inform interviewees of their potential right against self-incrimination and their right to legal representation. There is no duty of care between a company and third parties who are not employees.

If the interview is conducted by an attorney, the attorney will have to comply with the attorneys' code of conduct. This requires the attorney to inform the interviewee about the capacity in which he or she is acting and by whom he or she was instructed. Attorneys conducting interviews are required, moreover, to avoid influencing the witness' future statements.

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

Interviews are usually conducted by two interviewers with the help of a questionnaire. It is common that a written record is taken of the interview. Less frequently, interviews are recorded (see question 48). Depending on the circumstances, the interviewee may be presented with documents. Especially in the case of a potential conflict of interest between the interviewee and the interviewer or company, an employee may be accompanied by his or her own legal representative (see question 48).

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

There is no legal duty for private companies to report misconduct to law enforcement authorities. There may be such a duty for state companies exercising sovereign power.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

Self-reporting may be advisable in circumstances in which the company can take advantage of a leniency programme, such as through the crown witness regulation (see question 28) or the diversion procedure, or to gain victim status in the proceedings (as an injured party) rather than facing the risk of accusation.

Diversion in relation to corporations is regulated in section 19 of the VbVG. Pursuant to this provision, the public prosecutor must close a criminal prosecution against a corporation if certain requirements are met. These include that the alleged offence is liable to ex officio prosecution, the facts of the case are sufficiently established (here self-reporting may be essential), the personal culpability of the accused is not grave, the consequences of the alleged wrongdoing was appropriately compensated by the payment of damages, and the punishment of the corporation is necessary for reasons neither of special nor of general prevention.

Moreover, dropping charges pursuant to section 19 of the VbVG is subsidiary to section 18 of the VbVG, which entitles public prosecutors to close a criminal prosecution against a corporation if punishment seems unnecessary considering a number of factors, including the conduct of the corporation after the alleged offence (here self-reporting may again be of particular importance), the seriousness of the alleged offence, the amount of the fine to be imposed, and the detriment suffered by the corporation owing to the misconduct.

To take advantage of the leniency programme, it is important, inter alia, to self-report before the criminal prosecution becomes aware of the alleged misconduct. The disclosure should include all companies and persons who are to benefit from the leniency programme. Owing to the complexity of the procedural rules, it is highly recommended to engage a local lawyer to secure the benefits of such a programme.

In cases involving misconduct in several countries, the advice will have to take into account the principle of ne bis in idem. It is essential to form a strategy considering all countries having criminal or regulatory jurisdiction over the case simultaneously.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

See question 51. In any event, a local lawyer who specialises in business crime law should be engaged before taking any practical steps of self-reporting in Austria. The disclosure can be made anonymously, using, for example, the WKStA's whistleblowing tool, or openly by providing the names of all involved parties, as is especially the case when seeking leniency.

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

Companies should immediately inform their attorney of a notice or subpoena and should, in most cases, seek to enter into a dialogue with the law enforcement authority. In most instances, this will be initiated by calling the authority to arrange a meeting between the company and its attorney at the authority's offices.

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

The only remedy to challenge an ongoing investigation is a motion to terminate the prosecution (Einstellungsantrag), which can be filed with the public prosecutors, at the earliest, three months after the opening of the investigation (section 108, StPO). The public prosecution may either close the prosecution or pass the motion to the court, with an (optional) statement of its position. Generally, the motion is likely to succeed if it is filed with the blessing of the authority or even if an initial suspicion is lacking. However, if the authority is of the opinion that further facts need to be clarified, the court would usually allow the investigation to continue and dismiss the motion.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

The company may regard the two proceedings as separate and handle them separately. However, a negotiation of disclosure packages with authorities from various countries is advisable, especially if the prosecution teams co-operate closely. In any event, companies are well advised to safeguard consistency.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

Companies are not required to search for and produce material, whether they are located in Austria or abroad. Orders for temporary securing of evidence (see question 25) can extend to documents abroad, but require either traditional judicial assistance or, between EU Member States, an EIO (see question 11).

Although there is no obligation, it may be advisable for a company to search for documents and produce them to avoid coercive measures, such as house searches.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

See question 11.

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

Austrian officials may not disclose any secret entrusted or accessible to them by virtue of their office (section 310, StGB). In practice, leaks to the public are quite common in Austria as soon as a more extensive number of parties have access to the criminal file (see question 42). In addition, in cases of public interest, the authorities are expressly required to keep the public informed (see also question 70 concerning the Media Decree of the Ministry of Justice). This duty to inform compromises the duty of confidentiality to a certain extent.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

If the company does not want to disclose the document, we would advise the public prosecutors that our client is not entitled to disclose the document. If the company prefers to disclose the document, we would inform the public prosecutors that they have to resort to coercive measures based on judicial assistance or an EIO to obtain the document in the country where the document is located (see question 11).

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

On 7 August 2018, the European Union enacted an updated Blocking Statute to nullify US sanctions on countries trading with Iran, after the US announced sanctions against those countries following its withdrawal from an agreement permitting trade if Iran curtailed its nuclear programme. The 2018 Blocking Statute essentially prohibits companies within the European Union from direct or indirect (via subsidiaries or intermediary persons) compliance with the laws listed in the US Sanctions Annex. It also does not recognise any verdicts by courts that enforce US penalties. Reuters described the Blocking Statute more 'as a political weapon than a regulation', as its rules are 'vague and difficult to enforce'.

Otherwise, the term 'blocking statute' is not part of Austria's legal system. Of course, in cross-border cases, complying with a notice or subpoena in one country may often have implications in other countries. For example, a potential waiver of privilege is an important negative side-effect to consider. We have seen Austrian authorities accept well-argued excuses arising out of restrictions provided by foreign law, such as the potential waiver of privilege.

There is no blocking statute in Austria. However, the applicable data protection law, including the GDPR, must be considered in this regard, as it contains several requirements in connection with the cross-border transfer of data (see questions 21 to 23).

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

Voluntary production of evidence may expose the management and board members who authorised the disclosure to liability, whereas compelled production entails no exposure to any liability.

As discussed in question 58, third parties with a duly substantiated legal interest may access the file of criminal proceedings, unless conflicting private or public interests prevail (section 77, StPO). Confidentiality therefore only extends to persons who lack a legal interest. The general public may gain knowledge of information contained in the file through the media. The accused, the defence lawyer, victims and third parties entitled to access the file are subject to regulatory restrictions (section 54, StPO) when passing on information obtained from the criminal file, in particular, when passing it on to the media. The media must take due account of the presumption of innocence when using the evidence and respect data protection laws (see question 60). Officials are under a duty of confidentiality (see question 58).

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

Pursuant to the VbVG, corporations are subject to fines, which are measured in units per day, and to court directives (e.g., to compensate for harm done or to implement a proper compliance system). The current maximum fine for companies is €1.8 million (depending on the corporation's earnings). Moreover, they can be ordered to make redress, most notably in the form of compensation for harm done and donations to charity. The corporation cannot be indemnified by directors, officers or employees for fines imposed against the corporation (section 11, VbVG). However, the company may pursue its representatives for damages arising from a breach of their employment duties.

Natural persons are subject to the whole set of penalties and other sanctions if they are found (personally) guilty of an offence (section 18 et seq., StGB).

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

Pursuant to the Federal Law on Public Tenders 2018 (BVergG), a company can be excluded from public tenders if one or more of its managers are convicted of an offence that casts doubt on the professional reliability of any of the managers. Companies participating in a public tender must provide proof of professional reliability by submitting criminal records issued by their home country (section 82(2), BVergG). However, a company may establish that, notwithstanding such a reason for exclusion, its professional reliability is guaranteed, notably by implementing measures preventing future offences.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

Section 5 of the VbVG contains a non-exhaustive list of aggravating and mitigating factors. Aggravating factors include gravity of harm done by a corporation, benefit flowing from the offence for the corporation, and toleration or facilitation of misconduct by employees. Mitigating factors include preventive measures taken by a corporation prior to the offence, including directives to adhere to the law issued to the employees, the employees being solely responsible for the offence, the contribution to the resolution of the case, compensation of harm done, essential measures to prevent future offences, and significant economic detriment to the corporation. The sentencing of natural persons follows similar principles (section 32, StGB).

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

Non-prosecution agreements are not available in Austria. For the dropping of charges through diversion and closure of proceedings pursuant to section 18 of the VbVG, see question 51. The closure of a criminal prosecution by diversion has the advantage that the corporation is not condemned and no entry is made in the criminal register for corporations. The amount paid as a fine is also less than a fine imposed following a conviction for the same offence.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

Law enforcement authorities have a duty to confidentiality (see question 58). For the possibility of limiting disclosure of information of the case files, see question 42.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

Austrian law does not allow for settlements with law enforcement authorities. Under very limited terms, it is possible to resolve criminal prosecution by diversion (see question 51) or to benefit from the crown witness regulation (see question 28).

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

As far as publicly known, Austrian law enforcement authorities have not yet used external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

Under Austrian law, private parties may declare a joinder of their civil claims to the criminal proceedings (section 67, StPO). Private plaintiffs who make a joinder declaration may access the criminal file insofar as their interests are affected (section 68, StPO).

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

Investigations are not public in Austria (section 12, StPO). If a matter is deemed to be in the public interest, the prosecutor is asked to inform the public about the status of an investigation through the media offices of the larger courts and the public prosecutors. The co-operation of the prosecution authorities and courts with the media is governed by the Media Decree of the Federal Ministry of Justice JMZ 4410/9-Pr 1/2003, dated 12 November 2003.

Main trial and appeal proceedings are in the public domain (section 12, StPO), but may neither be broadcast on the radio or television, nor recorded by audio or visual means (section 228(4), StPO). In cases of public interest, it is common to have online live news ticker reporting. There are some exceptions to the principle of the public nature of a trial, including for reasons of public policy or to safeguard legitimate interests of the accused, witnesses or third parties.

However, a criminal file is accessible only to the accused and his or her defence lawyer, victims, private plaintiffs, and parties with a duly substantiated legal interest (section 77, StPO; see questions 61 and 69).

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

It is common to use public relations (PR) firms. The author strongly recommends using firms that specialise in litigation PR and crisis management.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

The PR strategy should not only focus on managing the criminal trial, but also include all aspects of the legal matter, including (potential) civil liability matters.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

Pursuant to section 155 of the BoerseG in conjunction with Regulation (EU) No. 596/2014 (the Market Abuse Regulation), companies publicly listed at the Vienna Stock Exchange must issue ad hoc notifications regarding inside information, namely information that has not been made public and, if it were made public, would be likely to have a significant effect on the price of the company's shares or other related financial instrument. Under certain circumstances, immediate disclosure can be delayed, in particular if it would impair the company's interests, the public is not misled and the fact that a settlement has been reached can be kept confidential to the point of its intended disclosure (see Article 17(1), Market Abuse Regulation).

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

Currently, we are unaware of any specific projects to further address corporate misconduct.

General context, key principles and hot topics

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

Operation Car Wash is the largest corruption and money-laundering investigation in Brazil. There has been series of developments since the operation was launched in March 2014. It led to the indictment and imprisonment of key political figures in Brazil, such as former president Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, and well-known businesspersons. Moreover, the operation has been divided into additional cases, including Operation Resonance, Operation Fratura Exposta, Greenfield and others.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

In Brazil, criminal liability is personal and subjective, which means that only individuals who have some degree of involvement in a criminal activity may be held liable for it.

In the vast majority of cases, legal entities, such as corporations or other non-natural persons, cannot be charged with crimes, but only for administrative and civil sanctions. The exception to this general rule is criminal liability for environmental crimes.

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

In case of violations of the Anti-Corruption Law (Federal Law No. 12,846/2013), the highest authority of the relevant agency or entity of the executive, legislative and judiciary branches may investigate the matter and impose administrative sanctions. The Office of the Federal Comptroller General (CGU) has authority to investigate, process and sanction illegal acts set forth in the law that are committed against foreign public administration. At the federal executive level, the CGU will also have concurrent authorisation to initiate administrative proceedings against legal entities as well as to audit the proceedings handled by other authorities. In the case of judicial sanctions, prosecutors follow the procedure established by the Brazilian Class Action Law set forth in Law No. 7,347/1985.

Other authorities have power to enforce rules relating to specific legal areas, such as the Administrative Council for Economic Defence, which enforces antitrust violations, and the Securities Commission, which enforces rules relating to publicly traded corporations.

The Federal Court of Accounts has powers to review public disbursement and violations of public procurement laws.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

The authorities must be aware of minimum elements of the occurrence of a crime to initiate an investigation. This means that a mere suspicion would not allow authorities to trigger an investigation; however, it is not necessary to have certainty about the occurrence of a crime or about the individuals responsible for it.

According to a Brazilian Supreme Court precedent, no criminal investigation can be initiated based only on anonymous information.

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

Individuals and legal entities may challenge the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority in the courts. Depending on the matter, individuals and entities may file a habeas corpus or an injunction.

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

Individuals can enter into a plea agreement with local authorities in exchange for a reduction in sentencing. Note that the agreement is usually signed by a federal or state prosecutor and only imposes the reduction.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

Corruption is the main object of the most recent and ongoing investigations in Brazil, which include Operation Car Wash, Operation Resonance, Operation Fratura Exposta, Weak Flesh,

Greenfield and others. Operation Zelotes is looking into bribery payments to tax authorities and politicians, in addition to an ongoing tax evasion investigation.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

Brazil has no specific regulation on cybersecurity, but has approved a data privacy law that will enter into force in 2020. Certain violations, including distributing private photos, may be investigated and prosecuted by local authorities.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

Brazilian law includes specific norms against cybercrime activities (e.g., hacking of devices and illegal wiretapping). Also, other norms may apply to illegal activities conducted via the internet, software or hardware (e.g., terrorism, crimes against intellectual property of computer software, crimes against children and teenagers, crimes against honour, racism and xenophobia).

As a rule, cybercrimes are investigated by the Brazilian state police departments. However, the Federal Police is specifically allowed to investigate (1) terrorism crimes, (2) crimes involving misogynistic crimes, or internet activity that amounts to hatred or aversion of women and (3) crimes that have a transnational characteristic, all of which Brazil is committed (via international treaties) to combat and prevent.

In general, the state police departments, Federal Police and public prosecutors' offices will have specialist teams in charge of the criminal investigation and prosecution of cybercrime and wrongdoing committed via the internet, software and hardware. Police departments, public prosecutors' offices and court teams work round the clock and are available for considering and deciding emergency criminal cases.

Brazil has entered into multilateral and mutual legal assistance treaties with various countries, which set forth proceedings and include provisions for dawn raids, freezing of assets, interviews, delivery of documents, etc. to obtain information or documents to be used in a criminal investigation or lawsuit, including any relating to cybercrime.

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

The Criminal Code sets forth the requirements for applying Brazilian criminal law to crimes that have occurred abroad (from start to finish) (Articles 7 and 8, Criminal Code). Brazilian jurisdiction has extraterritorial effect in two sets of possible situations. The first of these is the consideration of genocide (when the offender is Brazilian or is living in Brazil) and crimes committed against:

- the Brazilian president's life or freedom;
- public trust;

- property owned by public administrative bodies;
- companies owned by public administrative bodies or public foundations; or
- a public administrative body, including crimes against an individual who is acting on behalf, or under the orders, of a public administrative body.

An offender who commits any of the above-mentioned crimes should be punished according to Brazilian criminal law even if he or she has been acquitted or convicted by a foreign court.

The second series of situations require different conditions to be applied according to the type of crime, including crimes that Brazil is obliged to repress based on an international treaty or convention, or those committed by Brazilian individuals or in Brazilian aircraft or vessels (commercial or private) in a foreign territory if no other court decision on its merits has been issued.

In addition, for Brazilian jurisdiction to be applied, all the following conditions should be fulfilled:

- the offender must be in Brazil for criminal prosecution to begin, and must:
  - not have been previously acquitted by a foreign court or fully served a penalty abroad;
  - not have been acquitted or pardoned by a foreign court; and
  - be criminally liable (e.g., the statute of limitation was not reached);
- the fact must be deemed a crime under the criminal law of both countries; and
- Brazilian law must authorise extradition in such a case, if required.

If a Brazilian citizen is the victim of a foreign individual's conduct, Brazilian jurisdiction is applied provided that (1) the above-mentioned conditions are fulfilled, (2) extradition of the offender has not previously been requested or denied, and (3) the Brazilian Minister of Justice has requested the law enforcement authorities to punish the crime.

Note that the hypothesis of jurisdictional extraterritorial effects is related to crimes that occurred abroad (from start to finish). Indeed, if any part of an individual's action or omission essential to the occurrence of a crime has taken place in Brazil, Brazilian Criminal Law determines that the crime was committed in Brazil. Also, if an individual's action or omission essential to the occurrence of a crime has taken place abroad, but its result occurs in Brazil, again the crime is considered as having been committed in Brazil. Consequently, both hypotheses (action/omission and its results in Brazil) would be under Brazilian jurisdiction. This means none of the conditions relating to the extraterritorial effects, as described above, needs to be complied with for the offender potentially to be criminally charged in Brazil.

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

Brazilian authorities both co-operates on criminal matters with foreign authorities and requests the co-operation of foreign authorities. Co-operation between authorities can involve the execution of acts relating to the collection of evidence (interviews, breach of bank secrecy), transfers of convicted individuals, freezing of assets, etc., during criminal investigations or lawsuits. Brazil has multilateral and bilateral co-operation agreements with various countries. If there is no previous agreement between the countries, it is possible to enter into a mutual commitment for future situations.

The main challenges faced in cross-border investigations are (1) the time spent waiting for other countries' answers or proceedings, (2) the necessary observation of formalities to ensure that the evidence collected abroad would be considered valid in Brazil (not null or illicit), and (3) situations in which Brazil does not have a previous agreement.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

As a general rule, double jeopardy is not allowed according to Brazilian law.

Exceptions apply regarding the extraterritorial effects of genocide (when the offender is Brazilian or is living in Brazil) and crimes against (1) the Brazilian president's life or freedom, (2) public trust or property owned by public administrative bodies, or companies owned by public administrative bodies or public foundations, (3) public administrative bodies, including crimes against an individual who is acting on behalf of an administrative body (see question 10).

However, those hypotheses do not relate to crimes against the environment, which are the only crimes for which legal entities are potentially criminally liable in Brazil (see question 2).

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

Brazilian legislation has no clear disposition regarding global settlements, including the possibility and requirements. Nevertheless, a higher number of global settlements have involved Brazilian companies (e.g., Embraer, Petrobras, Odebrecht/Braskem).

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

Although Brazilian authorities should conduct their own investigations, it is common for the essential evidence to be collected to ensure a conviction relying on co-operation agreements with foreign authorities investigating similar matters. Moreover, the Criminal Code provides that, and respecting foreign judicial decisions, when the application of Brazilian law would produce the same consequences and civil remedies, such as damages orders and restitution, or other security measures, can be recognised and enforced in Brazil if the necessary requirements are fulfilled.

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

The Brazilian Clean Company Act, issued in 2013, may require financial penalties to be imposed on companies involved in corrupt acts, which can amount to as much as 20 per cent of the gross revenue in the year prior to commencement of the administrative sanctioning proceeding, plus loss of assets representing the undue advantage obtained. Other Brazilian legislation may regulate similar irregularities and lead to companies facing debarment from entering into contracts with the government.

In terms of economic sanctions, the Head Minister of the CGU has signed 11 leniency agreements involving the payment by sanctioned companies of more than 11 billion reais to the Treasury (including fines and reimbursement of damages). Also, at the federal level, Brazilian authorities have, to date, barred more than 12,000 companies from entering into contracts with public administration authorities.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

The level of enforcement action has increased dramatically during the past decade. In the past, executives of large companies and politicians were rarely arrested. Currently, based only on the Federal Public Prosecutor's website regarding Operation Car Wash in Paraná (updated in July 2019), almost 2,500 proceedings have been conducted, including 1,237 search and seizure warrants, more than 300 arrests and 11 leniency agreements.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

Brazil has signed several co-operation agreements with enforcement agencies in countries such as Chile, Switzerland and the United States.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

Brazil has not enacted any blocking legislation.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

Not applicable.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

Allegations of misconduct most often come to the attention of companies through whistle-blowers, either in-house or external, investigations conducted by enforcement authorities and internal audits (often with the assistance of external auditors).

Information gathering

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

Brazil has passed data protection legislation that will enter into force in 2020. The law will limit access to an individual's personal data.

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

It is still uncertain how the data protection regime will be enforced. The Data Protection Authority was created only in July 2019, and no directors have been appointed yet. It is therefore not yet clear whether the main purpose of the Data Protection Authority will be to educate society in general or to impose sanctions.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

The new data privacy law may generate discussions about data collection and access to employees' personal information during an internal investigation.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

No. Under the current system, accessing employees' communications on corporate devices is permitted.

Dawn raids and search warrants

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

Yes. Recent major criminal investigations (e.g., Mensalão, Car Wash, Zelotes and Greenfield) show that search warrants and dawn raids have been the mechanism for public authorities to collect evidence more quickly and effectively. Under Brazilian criminal law, the police must present a specific search and seizure warrant, duly authorised by the court, for a particular department of the company or for material pertaining to certain employees. General searches inside company premises are not allowed. If authorities exceed the limits of the search warrant, both the individuals and companies involved and affected by the improper collection of evidence can claim for such documents to be retracted and excluded from the case.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

Under Brazilian law, attorney–client communication is privileged and confidential. The definition of specific spaces within the legal department and the explicit identification of documents covered by privilege are ways to protect material from being improperly seized during a dawn raid.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

Under Brazilian criminal law, individuals who are suspected of involvement in committing an offence cannot be compelled to give testimony. Such individuals also have the right against self-incrimination and there is no crime of perjury. Compelled testimonies regarding such individuals are illegal and cannot be used in criminal procedures.

Witnesses, on the other hand, are obliged to collaborate with an investigation. If witnesses do not comply with an order to attend a hearing, they can be sanctioned with a fine, can be coercively conducted to a police station or court, and be charged with the crime of disobedience.

Whistleblowing and employee rights

28 Describe the whistleblowing framework in your country. What financial incentive schemes exist for whistleblowers? What legal protections are in place for whistleblowers?

Law 13608/2018 establishes that any individual may report a crime to public authorities and may have their identity protected. There is no financial incentive to whistleblowers in Brazil.

In the corporate world, the Clean Company Act regulates the requirements for a compliance programme, which should contain a proper whistleblower channel and policies regarding confidentiality and non-retaliation.

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

Employment law in Brazil has undergone major changes, but it continues to be protective towards employees. As regards conduct within the scope of an investigation, it is recommended that an employee be allowed to defend their actions and counter any accusations.

The investigation must adhere to the required levels of secrecy and discretion to avoid anything being revealed that might cause harm to the employee.

There is no distinction between officers and directors.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

An employee involved in misconduct may be reprimanded or dismissed with cause. In either case, he or she has the right to apply for the matter to be addressed in court.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

No.

Commencing an internal investigation

This should be assessed on a case-by-case basis, taking into consideration the company and the complexity of the investigation to be undertaken. However, in general, it is deemed good practice to prepare a document that sets out a list of the matters that need to be clarified by the investigation and which mechanisms will be used to achieve those clarifications (e.g. gathering computer records and mobile phone data, interviews and background checks), such as identifying the parties potentially involved in the alleged irregularities, any violations of the relevant legislation and which authority has jurisdiction in the matter.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

In the first instance, is it recommended that, according to Brazilian labour laws, any individuals who may be involved in an offence be suspended. Second, companies must make sure that they collect as much evidence as possible relating to the offence, as this can be used in the company's defence (if a charge is brought) or to conclude a leniency agreement (as it will require the company to provide clear evidence of the misconduct and to help identify the individuals involved). In addition, the Brazilian Anti-Corruption Law includes provisions relating to interference with investigations and, therefore, the company must issue a retention notice to all employees warning that no documents or data should be eliminated until further notice.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

If a company receives a subpoena, it should immediately involve its legal team (in-house, external or both) to identify the extent of the allegations, the potential risks, whether other authorities would also have jurisdiction, and which stakeholders should be informed.

The company must respond to the relevant authority in a timely manner, be co-operative, transparent and provide all the information requested, in an accessible format. It is also very important to establish which documents are subject to the attorney–client privilege and that they be dealt with accordingly.

The company should also evaluate and indicate which information and documents should be treated by the authorities as confidential, such as trade secrets.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

The timing and quality of disclosure should be considered in each case or event. Therefore, the decision to publicly report the existence of an internal investigation or contact by law enforcement depends on several factors, including whether the company has shares that are publicly traded.

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

Internal investigations are currently encouraged by local law enforcement agencies and, in some cases, local authorities request the assistance of internal investigators to structure their cases.

Attorney–client privilege

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

Any communication between an attorney and a client in the context of a representation are protected in Brazil and are not subject to disclosure to third parties, with limited exceptions. Considering this main rule, an internal investigation may claim privilege over any investigative act conducted under the direction of a lawyer duly registered with the Brazilian Bar Association. To safeguard the protection of privilege, the involvement of individuals who are not lawyers must be as limited as possible.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

Under the Brazilian legal system, privilege rules protect any communication between a lawyer and a client in the context of legal representation. The Brazilian Bar Association Code of Ethics provides that an attorney has a duty to maintain confidentiality of all facts of which he or she has become aware while practising law, including activities of mediation, conciliation and arbitration. The rule makes no distinction between a company or an individual.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

The attorney-client privilege protects communications involving lawyers and makes no distinction between in-house or external lawyers. To claim such privilege, the lawyer must be licensed by the Brazilian Bar Association and must have received a power of attorney from the client (individual or company) that is being represented.

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

If the legal advice was provided by a lawyer licensed and registered at a foreign bar association and the advice was requested under the direction of a Brazilian lawyer, the advice is protected by Brazilian legislation.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

Waiver of the attorney–client privilege may be requested by authorities as part of a plea agreement or a leniency agreement. Usually, at the beginning of settlement discussions, the authorities and the individual or company sign a non-disclosure agreement to protect the information that will be shared in the context of the negotiation. After the agreement is signed, a waiver may be included in the resolution.

The attorney–client privilege may be waived in other circumstances, including at the client's request, and may be breached if the communication is in furtherance of a crime, if it may avoid a threat to someone's life or honour, or if an attorney needs the information for his or her own protection or in defence of the client.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

There is no specific regulation covering the extension of a waiver or the prohibition of a limited waiver. In this context, the client may claim a limited waiver. Note that legal proceedings in Brazil have a different level of secrecy and, in some instances, the docket case file may be deemed entirely confidential at the court's discretion.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

As discussed in question 42, clients may claim limited waiver in Brazil and thus privilege may be claimed over information provided from another country.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

Parties with a common interest may share privileged information in Brazil as long as lawyers duly represent them and they have authorised communication between counsel.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

Considering that the attorney–client privilege in Brazil requires the directive involvement of a lawyer, it is not clear whether the protection may be extended to other parties and must therefore be considered on a case-by-case basis.

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

Yes.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

Yes. Provided an attorney was involved in the process, privilege may be claimed.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

Brazilian legislation has no provision in this regard. Nevertheless, it is deemed advisable to indicate that the content of the interview is privileged and that the witness should regard the matter as confidential.

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

Typically, the lawyer conducting the investigation should have a list of questions and documents to be shown as evidence to a witness. Employees, if they so wish and at their request, may have their own legal representation at the interview.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

Reporting misconduct is not mandatory in Brazil. However, if a company or individual wants to enter into a leniency agreement or plea agreement, co-operation is required.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

Self-reporting is advisable when a company wants to enter into a leniency agreement to obtain the benefits of self-reporting and co-operation.

Prior to self-reporting, it is highly recommended to identify which authorities are likely to have jurisdiction over the matter and contact them all, to mitigate any risk of legal uncertainty in connection with a subsequent investigation and to avoid any lawsuits being initiated by other authorities on the basis of the information reported to a specific authority.

This same process should be extended to foreign countries. If other potential jurisdictions are identified, it is recommended to seek legal advice in those countries to establish whether self-reporting is advisable, and to aim to reach a global settlement.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

Self-reporting can be very complex in Brazil as more than one enforcement agency may have an interest in any single case. For example, based on the Clean Company Act, the federal comptroller general, the Federal Prosecutor's Office and the Office of the Attorney General should participate in a leniency agreement.

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

In cases where a company has already launched an internal investigation and may be expecting contact from the relevant authorities, the counsel conducting the investigation should recommend the best strategy. When a notice or subpoena is issued unexpectedly, the company should immediately retain an experienced counsel and discuss the best approach.

Some authorities are open to being approached by companies and may agree to initiate discussions on a possible settlement. Other authorities are more restricted and may not agree to provide any information to companies. In the latter case, companies may claim access to investigative proceedings in court.

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

Any individual or company under investigation may challenge proceedings in a court of law if any rights are violated. The challenge may be broad, such as to terminate the investigation, or limited, with respect to a specific act or piece of evidence.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

Based on recent cases in Brazil, it is clear that Brazilian and foreign authorities are in constant communication and have shared relevant information between them. Thus, it would be advisable to retain counsel in all countries that may be involved in the enforcement actions. Counsel should decide the best strategy on a case-by-case basis and, if possible, should initiate communications with all authorities at the same time.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

In general, a company must search and produce any material requested by the authorities. It is important to note that, if the material or documents are located in a country with restricted privacy laws, the company must retain local counsel and must report the legal conflict to the authorities. In certain cases, to avoid local claims, the foreign authorities should request production of the document directly to a local authority and not to the company.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

As has been seen during the Operation Car Wash investigations, the Brazilian authorities have shared and received information from several authorities, including in the United States and Switzerland. Brazil has signed bilateral co-operation agreements with several other countries, including Chile and Switzerland, and has ratified international agreements such as the Palermo Protocols and the US Foreign Account Tax Compliance Act.

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

The Supreme Federal Court is expected to deliver a final decision (by the end of 2019) regarding the legality and extent of the sharing of information obtained by financial intelligence units with prosecutors, and whether prior authorisation from a judge is necessary. That decision will be a key factor in current and future investigations.

As regards the content of a leniency agreement, its provisions will regulate restrictions on the sharing of information. There are court precedents authorising the sharing of information with other authorities, provided that the restrictions agreed by the parties are respected.

Any evidence gathered during the course of investigations conducted by prosecutors shall be confidential, and withheld from any third parties.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

Some authorities have a duty to preserve the confidentiality of investigation proceedings (such as the police and the Council for the Control of Financial Activities). However, they must share any information that relates to criminal activities or felonies with other authorities who have launched criminal proceedings. A docket criminal case may be deemed to be sealed (to protect a victim or if the victim is a minor), but the main ruling deems that any criminal case should be public and accessible. Companies may claim secrecy, but the matter will be decided by the judge responsible for the case.

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

Brazil has just promulgated a data protection law that is expected to enter into force in 2020. According to this law, companies and individuals may only retain information about other individuals or companies if supported by particular requirements. It is not clear how the law will be implemented.

There is existing legislation that regulates international law and requires approval from the Superior Court of Justice for the enforcement of international decisions or subpoenas. Such decisions or subpoenas will not be deemed valid and enforceable if they violate Brazilian sovereignty.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

There is no particular risk for voluntary production. Considering that co-operation may result in a reduction of sanctions in the context of the Brazilian Anticorruption Law, companies may consider voluntary disclosure. Once produced (voluntarily or compelled), the material may be discoverable if there is no requirement to maintain secrecy in the case. There is no particular confidentiality in the production of material, but a company may request secrecy in respect of all material or business-related information.

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

Following conviction, penalties that may be applied to individuals (including company directors) are imprisonment, restriction of rights, or fines.

The restriction of rights may be substituted for imprisonment if the following requirements are fulfilled: (1) the penalty applied is less than four years' imprisonment and no violence or serious threat was used (in case of negligent conduct, there is no temporal limit); (2) the convicted person should not have committed the same wilful crime previously (specific recidivism prevents this substitution); and (3) the offender's personal characteristics and behaviour should indicate that such penalties are adequate.

According to the Criminal Code, restriction of rights can include:

- payment to the victim or to charitable entities;
- confiscation of assets and valuables;
- attending conferences or courses, or participating in educational activity at a prison facility, for five hours on a Saturday and Sunday;
- community service;
- temporary removal of certain rights, such as holding a public or elective position, joining a profession that requires a special licence or authorisation from public agencies, visiting certain locations, or applying for public competitions, evaluations or exams.

Other types of restriction of rights penalties can be applied in specific instances, such as for crimes against consumers (under Federal Law No. 8,078/1990) or environmental crimes (under Federal Law No. 9,605/1998).

Legal entities are subject to the following criminal penalties:

- fine;
- community service;

- partial or total suspension of activities;
- temporary restrictions on establishments, plants, projects or activities;
- disqualification from contracting with government entities, and from obtaining public subsidies, grants or donations for up to 10 years (Article 22, Federal Law No. 9,605/1998).

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

From a criminal perspective, settlement in another country does not prevent a company (or its directors) being held criminally liable in Brazil. In view of the co-operation between authorities, information presented to a foreign authority can potentially be shared with Brazilian authorities and, therefore, expose the company and its directors to criminal liability in Brazil.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

Brazilian courts should follow three steps to determine the penalties that will be imposed on an individual. In the first instance, the court should consider:

- regarding the individual: his or her culpability, criminal background and social behaviour;
- regarding the crime: the motivations, circumstances and consequences; and
- regarding the victim: his or her conduct (i.e., any contribution to, or facilitation of, the crime).

Second, penalties should be made more severe in consideration of:

- recidivism by the offender;
- the motivation for the crime;
- how the crime was committed;
- who the victim is;
- the behaviour of the offender during the crime;
- the context in which the crime was committed; and
- the leadership of the offender.

Conversely, penalties may be reduced in consideration of:

- confession of the crime by the offender;
- the offender's age;
- the motivation for the crime; and
- any attempt by the offender to mitigate the consequences of the crime.

As a third step, the court should consider general or specific criteria – depending on the crime in question – to increase or decrease penalties (e.g., attempted use of a firearm).

In relation to fines, criminal law prescribes certain parameters. In addition, the financial situation of the offender should be considered in applying an appropriate penalty.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

No. However, Brazil has settlements in place to mitigate sanctions in the form of leniency agreements.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

Reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates are determined in each leniency agreement to ensure the effectiveness of the collaboration and the useful outcome of the lawsuit. In general, to ensure fairness in these proceedings, a proposed leniency agreement will not be announced to the public until after the agreement is effective or after the district attorney's office presses charges against the defendants.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

Companies must understand that a settlement must be negotiated with all the enforcement agencies at the same time.

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

There is no legal provision regulating the use of external monitors, although there has started to be some use of this tool in Brazil, such as in the Odebrecht case.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

Third parties may file an indemnity or contractual judicial claim and a court or authority may decide to provide access to third parties.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

According to Brazil's Criminal Procedure Law, a police investigation is generally public. However, an investigation may be conducted in secret when this measure is necessary for the police to ensure the effectiveness of the investigation or to protect the identity of a suspect or victim. Individuals under investigation and their attorneys are entitled to have access to the records of the investigation, except any measures that are still being conducted (e.g., searches and seizures that are still being prepared or ongoing wiretapping).

Criminal lawsuits are also public, unless secrecy is necessary to protect the privacy and identity of the defendant or the victim.

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

It is common for larger companies to use external public relations companies, and publicly traded companies make use of their internal investor relations departments. These are the most common options for handling external communications. In view of the vast repercussions from involvement of the media in Brazilian corruption cases, it is suggested that companies seek the assistance of consultants who specialise in investor relations (if the company is listed) or a public relations firm that specialises in crisis management. It is also recommended that companies put in place internal procedures for handling these kinds of situations.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

Companies should always be aware of the pros and cons of disclosing, or not disclosing, relevant information in relation to an ongoing investigation. Furthermore, it is advisable that the attorneys responsible for the case always be involved in the decision-making process to avoid a higher degree of risk regarding the individual's or company's liability.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

This should be assessed on a case-by-case basis, but is mainly dependent on whether the matter involves a publicly traded company, in which case, the company has a duty to disclose material information regarding the its business and finances, as they relate to the settlement.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

The data privacy law is due to enter into force and will restrict access to certain information. This may have a great effect on internal investigations and on the sharing of information with the authorities. Further, several bills of law are in Congress, which may have a great effect on anti-corruption measures. One of the proposals is to impose limits on certain investigation measures and to make any wrongdoing or misconduct by a member of the judicial or police authorities a criminal offence. Finally, a new anti-corruption project put forward by Minister of Justice Sérgio Moro is under discussion in Congress.

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

In February 2015, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) charged leading Canadian construction and engineering company SNC-Lavalin Group Inc in connection with alleged fraud relating to the construction of a Montreal hospital and alleged bribery of foreign officials in Libya. Following the initiation of the investigation, the company replaced its senior management and board and introduced robust compliance policies and procedures. SNC-Lavalin pleaded not guilty to the charges and, in May 2019, a judge of the Court of Quebec in Montreal determined that the Crown had met the evidentiary burden to commit the company to trial. The case is widely expected to set an important benchmark for corporate criminal liability in Canada.

It was expected by many observers of the matter that the recent enactment of amendments to the Criminal Code introducing deferred prosecution agreements in Canada (known as remediation agreements) would lead to a possible negotiated settlement of the charges. However, the company was informed by the Director of the Public Prosecution Service of Canada in early October 2018 that the prosecution was not prepared at that time to initiate negotiations for a remediation agreement.

In February 2019, a national newspaper in Canada reported that the Prime Minister's Office had placed improper pressure on the then-Attorney General to intervene in the prosecution so that SNC-Lavalin could secure a remediation agreement. Shortly after the decision to not offer SNC-Lavalin a remediation agreement, the Attorney General was transferred to the Ministry of Veterans Affairs as part of a cabinet shuffle. Although the Prime Minister's Office disputed the newspaper report, the former Attorney General resigned from cabinet and spoke out against the Prime Minister's Office during testimony before a House of Commons committee. The Prime Minister eventually expelled the former Attorney General from the Liberal caucus in April 2019 and the matter was front-page news in Canada for several weeks.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

Criminal law applies broadly to 'organisations', including corporations and partnerships. The liability of a corporation is assessed through an evaluation of the actions of its senior officers. 'Senior officers' are defined to include a representative who plays an important part in the establishment of an organisation's activities and, in the case of a body corporate, includes a director, its chief executive officer and its chief financial officer. A 'representative' is defined as a director, partner, employee, member, agent or contractor of the organisation.

For offences that require the prosecution to prove fault (apart from negligence), a corporation will be a party to an offence, if, with the intent at least in part to benefit the organisation, one of its senior officers (1) acting within the scope of his or her authority, is a party to the offence, (2) having the mental state required to be a party to the offence and acting within the scope of their authority, directs the work of other representatives of the organisation so that they carry out the act or make the omission specified in the offence, or (3) knowing that a representative of the organisation is or is about to be a party to the offence, does not take all reasonable measures to stop them from being a party to the offence.

For offences that require the prosecution to prove negligence, an organisation is a party to an offence if (1) one of the organisation's representatives, acting within the scope of his or her authority, is a party to the offence, and (2) the senior officer responsible for the aspect of the organisation's activities relevant to the offence departs markedly from the standard of care that could reasonably be expected to prevent a representative of the organisation from being a party to the offence.

In addition, there are a multitude of provincial and federal strict and absolute liability offences for which a corporation can be prosecuted but that do not require proof of intent.

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

The law enforcement authorities most frequently encountered by corporations are the Canadian Competition Bureau (which enforces the Competition Act), the RCMP (which typically investigates alleged breaches of the Corruption of Foreign Public Officials Act as well as complex, multi-jurisdictional terrorist financing and money laundering offences proscribed by the Criminal Code) and the provincial securities regulators (which enforce provincial securities legislation). There are no specific policies pertaining to the prosecution of corporations.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

No particular threshold of suspicion is required. However, to take investigative steps that involve compelling the production of documents from the target of the investigation or third parties, the authorities generally need reasonable grounds to believe that an offence has been committed. The one exception is securities regulatory investigations, for which there is no threshold of suspicion necessary for provincial securities regulators to issue a summons.

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

Subpoenas are generally not a tool that is available to law enforcement authorities at the investigative stage. There is no way to compel individuals to provide statements, and documents can only be obtained from the target of an investigation through a search warrant. The one exception is securities regulatory investigations, for which provincial securities regulators do have the authority to compel individuals to be interviewed by way of a summons and to compel the production of documents.

A summons from a provincial securities regulator can be challenged through an application to a court to quash the summons. However, such an application would generally need to be premised on a challenge to the regulator's jurisdiction to issue the summons.

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

Immunity agreements for individuals who co-operate with authorities are available. They generally involve an agreement by the Crown to refrain from prosecution or to terminate a prosecution regarding an individual in exchange for that individual's co-operation. The Crown will typically offer an immunity agreement when the individual's co-operation is of significant value such that it is clearly in the public interest not to hold the individual accountable for criminal activity. In making this determination, the Crown will examine a variety of factors, including:

- the seriousness of the offence at issue;
- the reliability of the individual;
- the reliability of the anticipated evidence;
- the importance of the individual's co-operation;
- the nature and extent of the individual's involvement in the offence at issue; and
- protection of the public.

When the Crown determines that an immunity agreement is not warranted, an individual may still receive leniency as a result of co-operating with the authorities. Co-operation with the authorities is a well-recognised mitigating factor during sentencing and so sentencing judges will regularly take co-operation into account when imposing a sentence on an accused. Section 3.3 of the Public Prosecution Service of Canada Deskbook provides guidance on immunity agreements and sets out the applicable criteria in determining whether the Crown should enter into an immunity agreement, discusses the handling of co-operating information providers and distinguishes the role of the Crown from that of the investigating agency in the immunity process.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

Enforcement authority is divided by subject matter, level of government (federal, provincial or municipal) and geographical jurisdiction. As a result, enforcement priorities vary considerably across the country and by subject matter. In recent years, the RCMP has indicated that it is giving priority to organised crime, terrorism and national security and economic crimes. At the provincial level, priorities have varied, with money laundering attracting greater priority in British Columbia and corruption being a key focus in Quebec.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

Cybersecurity is regulated through both federal and provincial legislation. At the federal level, the Personal Information Protection and Electronic Documents Act (PIPEDA) applies to federal government organisations and to businesses in provinces that do not have 'substantially similar' privacy protections. Under PIPEDA, covered organisations must protect personal information with security safeguards that are appropriate to the sensitivity of the information. The security safeguards must protect the information against loss or theft, as well as unauthorised access, disclosure, copying, use or modification. The Privacy Commissioner of Canada oversees compliance with PIPEDA.

Recent amendments to PIPEDA now require covered organisations to notify the Privacy Commissioner and affected individuals, as soon as is feasible, of breaches of security safeguards involving personal information under the organisation's control. Organisations are subject to this mandatory reporting regime if it is reasonable in the circumstances to believe that the breach creates a real risk of significant harm to individuals. Organisations that knowingly fail to comply with these provisions are subject to criminal punishment.

The provinces of Alberta, British Columbia and Quebec have legislation in force that is substantially similar to PIPEDA and so businesses in those provinces are subject to provincial legislation.

In addition to federal and provincial legislation, various industry regulators, such as the Mutual Fund Dealers Association and the Investment Industry Regulatory Organization of Canada, also publish guidance documents that set expectations for how regulated entities are to address cybersecurity risk. Further, the Canadian Securities Administrators have notified registered firms in Staff Notice 33-321 (Cyber Security) that registered firms should ensure their compliance systems address the risks of cyber threats and cybersecurity.

In June 2019, Desjardins Group, a leading Canadian banking institution, reported a serious data breach in which the social insurance numbers, names, dates of birth and addresses of 2.7 million customers were compromised. As a result of the data breach, the bank is currently subject to a joint investigation by the Privacy Commissioner of Canada and the provincial privacy authority of Quebec into whether it complied with applicable federal and provincial privacy laws. The Privacy Commissioner of Canada has conducted similar investigations into past data breaches at Equifax Inc in 2017 and VTech Holdings Ltd in 2015, which resulted in findings that both organisations failed to implement adequate security safeguards.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

The Criminal Code contains a wide variety of offences that authorities in Canada have historically used to combat cybercrime. The RCMP, which is generally responsible for combating large-scale cybercrime in Canada, distinguishes between cybercrime that involves technology as a target and cybercrime that involves technology as an instrument. In the former category, the RCMP includes criminal offences that target computers or other information technologies, such unauthorised use of a computer and mischief in relation to computer data. In the latter category, the RCMP includes criminal offices that are committed using the internet and information technology, such as fraud, identity theft, intellectual property infringements and money laundering.

In addition to the RCMP, cybercrime offences may be investigated by other relevant federal government agencies and local police authorities across the country. The RCMP typically works in partnership with these other authorities to investigate cybercrime issues that fall within overlapping jurisdictions. For example, the Canadian Anti-Fraud Centre is a combined effort by the RCMP, the Ontario Provincial Police and Competition Bureau of Canada to counter internet and mass-marketing fraud.

In February 2018, the federal government announced the creation of the National Cyber Crime Co-ordination Unit, which aims to coordinate cybercrime investigations across Canada, provide a single national reporting mechanism for incidents of cybercrime and work with Canada's global partners to combat cybercrime. In that regard, Canada has ratified the Council of Europe's Convention on Cybercrime (also known as the Budapest Convention) and actively participates in international efforts to combat cybercrime, such as the Inter-American Cooperation Portal on Cyber-Crime.

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

In general, Canadian criminal law does not apply extraterritorially. Section 6(2) of the Criminal Code provides that 'no person shall be convicted . . . of an offence committed outside Canada' unless a specific provision provides otherwise. That said, 'outside Canada' has been judicially interpreted in the leading Supreme Court of Canada case (R v. Libman) as lacking a 'real and substantial' connection to Canada. In other words, an offence committed outside the territory of Canada could be prosecuted in Canada if there remains some 'real and substantial' link to Canada.

Importantly for corporations, many relevant proscriptions contain language that gives them extraterritorial effect. For instance, both the anti-money laundering (AML) provision in the Criminal Code and the terrorism financing provision contain specific language to give them extraterritorial effect. The AML provision prohibits dealing in property acquired as a result of the commission abroad of an act that would be a criminal offence in Canada. A terrorism financing offence is deemed to be committed in Canada when there is a nexus between the underlying terrorist act and Canada, either through the perpetrator or the victim, or if the person who commits the terrorist financing offence is linked to Canada. In addition, bribery of foreign officials in contravention of the Corruption of Foreign Public Officials Act is prosecutable in Canada if the offence is committed by a corporation, firm or partnership that is 'incorporated, formed or otherwise organised under the laws of Canada or a province'.

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

Cross-border criminal investigations are often hampered by difficulty in obtaining information from foreign sources. Canada has mutual legal assistance treaties (MLATs) with some 40 countries and Canadian legislation allows non-treaty assistance. MLAT requests can be time-consuming and administratively burdensome. Canadian authorities also have enforcement co-operation agreements and memoranda of understanding with counterpart agencies in other countries in matters such as competition law and securities. Informal co-operation also takes place between Canadian enforcement agencies and their foreign counterparts; however, the extent of co-operation is often limited as a result of statutory and policy restrictions on disclosure of confidential information.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

Double jeopardy and similar principles apply in Canada to limit the criminal exposure of a defendant that has already been convicted in another jurisdiction of a relevant offence. To determine whether such principles apply, a Canadian court will typically assess whether the foreign offence and the Canadian offence at issue have a sufficiently close legal nexus (i.e., elements of the offences) and factual nexus (i.e., factual basis for the offences).

There is no analogous policy in Canada to the 'anti-piling on' policy that exists in the United States.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

No.

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

Canadian enforcement authorities do not, as a general matter, defer to the findings of foreign agencies (absent a double jeopardy issue where the same matter has been definitively determined by a foreign court). That said, Canadian authorities will consider both the fact of and the outcome of foreign investigations when determining priorities for case and resource allocation.

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

Canadian sanctions are imposed under five statues:

- the United Nations Act, whereby Canada implements sanctions mandated by the United Nations Security Council, which are consistent across UN Member States;
- the Special Economic Measures Act, whereby Canada maintains unilateral measures against certain foreign states in cases where a grave breach of international peace and security has resulted or will result in a serious international crisis, a foreign state commits gross and systematic human rights violations, a foreign state or foreign public official is responsible for or complicit in significant acts of corruption, or where an international body, of which Canada is a member (other than the United Nations), recommends for its members to enact economic measures against a foreign state;
- the Justice for Victims of Corrupt Foreign Officials Act, whereby Canada may impose measures against foreign nationals who are responsible for, or complicit in, gross violations of human rights or corruption;
- the Criminal Code, which enables Canada to sanction terrorist entities, including those not listed by the United Nations Al-Qaeda and Taliban Regulations or the Regulations Implementing the United Nations Resolutions on the Suppression of Terrorism; and
- the Freezing Assets of Corrupt Foreign Officials Act, which allows Canada to freeze the assets or restrain the assets of politically exposed foreign persons believed to have misappropriated or acquired property improperly.

Sanctions are implemented by the government in the form of statutory regulations. The measures imposed on specific states, organisations and individuals may take varying forms, such as arms and related material embargos, asset freezes, export and import restrictions, financial prohibitions and technical assistance prohibitions.

Canadian sanctions measures are in force against the following states: Central African Republic, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Eritrea, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Libya, Mali, Myanmar, Nicaragua, North Korea, Russia, Somalia, South Sudan, Sudan, Syria, Ukraine, Venezuela, Yemen and Zimbabwe. Schedule 1 of the Justice for Victims of Corrupt Foreign Officials Regulations lists all designated individuals, which include individuals from Russia, Venezuela, Myanmar, South Sudan and Saudi Arabia. Canada has enacted measures under the Freezing Assets of Corrupt Foreign Officials Act against Tunisia and the Ukraine.

Global Affairs Canada is generally responsible for the administration of Canadian sanctions and works with other agencies in enforcement matters (notably the RCMP and the Canada Border Security Agency).

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

There has been increased scrutiny of compliance with sanctions measures by Global Affairs Canada.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

Yes, Global Affairs Canada co-operates with its counterparts in other countries to enforce Canadian sanctions measures.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

Canada has enacted the Foreign Extraterritorial Measures Act (FEMA) in relation to the extra-territorial measures of foreign states. FEMA prevents Canadian individuals and companies from complying with foreign laws in Canada and authorises the Canadian federal cabinet to issue orders to block or otherwise counter the effects of foreign extraterritorial measures in Canada.

The only foreign extraterritorial law blocked under FEMA is the United States embargo against Cuba, which is comprised of a range of statutory measures, including the United States Liberty and Democratic Solidarity (LIBERTAD) Act of 1996 (the Helms-Burton Act). Canadian companies, including Canadian subsidiaries of US companies, are prohibited from complying with the Helms-Burton Act, creating the potential for significant intra-company conflict between Canadian subsidiaries and their US parents.

On 2 May 2019, the United States lifted the suspension of a private right of action under Title III of the Helms-Burton Act. This suspension now permits US nationals to bring civil claims for treble damages against foreign businesses and individuals for trafficking in property confiscated by the Cuban government after the 1959 revolution. Under FEMA, judgments of US courts until Title III are not enforceable in Canada and Canadian defendants may counter-sue in Canadian courts to recover any losses suffered from a Title III judgment.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

Under the Foreign Extraterritorial Measures (United States) Order, Canadian corporations are required to give notice to the Attorney General of:

> any directive, instruction, intimation of policy or other communication relating to an extra-territorial measure of the United States in respect of any trade or commerce between Canada and Cuba that the Canadian corporation, director or officer has received from a person who is in a position to direct or influence the policies of the Canadian corporation in Canada.

Canadian corporations who commit an offence under FEMA are subject to fines not exceeding C$1.5 million or imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years.

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

Allegations of misconduct come to the attention of enforcement authorities and corporate management through a wide range of sources. Whistleblowers, internal or compliance audits and media reports are frequent sources of both internal and government investigations. In 2015, the Ontario Securities Commission (OSC) adopted a whistleblower policy to award up to C$5 million to persons who report securities law violations. In the first two years after the whistleblower policy came into effect, the OSC received approximately 200 tip-offs and it made its first three awards under the policy in February 2019 (totalling C$7.5 million).

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

Canada has privacy laws at both the federal and provincial levels. The Personal Information Protection and Electronic Documents Act applies to federal government organisations and to businesses in provinces that do not have 'substantially similar' privacy protections. Canada does not have a broad data protection law equivalent to the European Union's General Data Protection Regulation.

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

Contraventions of privacy laws are generally enforced through complaints to and investigations by commissioners appointed federally or provincially.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

Canadian privacy and data protection laws have not been impediments to internal investigations to date.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

There is no bright-line rule about whether an employer may monitor the communications of its employees on company-owned devices. An employee's contract of employment and company policies will typically provide that an employee's company computers, tablets and mobile phones are the property of the company and therefore may be monitored by the company without notice to the employee. If an employee has provided prior consent by signing such documents, courts will generally find that the employee's reasonable expectation of privacy is diminished.

Organisations that are covered by PIPEDA, or provincial privacy laws in Alberta, British Columbia or Quebec, are subject to additional restrictions regarding the collection and use of personal information, which can include information about topics such as an employee's health or financial situation. Although the various privacy laws differ in some respects, under the strictest of laws, an employee's prior consent in the form of a contract of employment or signed company policies will generally permit the employer to monitor employee communications that contain personal information.

Dawn raids and search warrants

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

Search warrants are a feature of law enforcement in Canada.

Generally, a warrant to search a particular location may only be issued where there are reasonable grounds to believe that the search will yield evidence of the commission of an offence. The search warrant will outline the parameters of the search, including the date, time and the specific location (or locations) to be searched. An application for a search warrant must be supported by affidavit evidence establishing the requisite grounds.

If the requisite grounds for the search are lacking, or the parameters of the search authorised by the warrant are exceeded, the search will be unreasonable, in violation of Section 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (the Charter), which protects both individuals and corporations from unreasonable searches and seizures. At the investigative stage, an application to quash a search warrant can be brought after the search has been executed (there is usually not an opportunity to bring the application beforehand because the target of the search will typically only become aware of the search at the time the warrant is executed). If the application is successful, the fruits of the search may be returned to the party from which they were seized. If a prosecution is initiated, it is also possible to have evidence obtained from an unlawful search excluded pursuant to a pretrial application brought under Section 24(2) of the Charter.

When a search warrant is being executed, the target being searched (or its legal counsel) may make a claim of privilege over privileged documents. In such circumstances, the documents will be sealed in an envelope and provided to the clerk of the local superior court. The investigating authorities and defence counsel may then negotiate a review process for the privileged records.

If the search warrant authorises the seizure or imaging of a computer, the target being searched (or their legal counsel) can still make a claim for privilege. A variety of methods may be used to review the computer data to protect the privilege. For instance, an officer not involved in the investigation may review the seized or imaged data to segregate the privileged records.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

Section 11(c) of the Charter provides for a right against self-incrimination. It stipulates that any person charged with an offence has the right not to be compelled to be a witness in proceedings against that person.

Section 13 of the Charter also provides for a right against self-incrimination. It protects a testifying witness from compelled incriminating evidence that he or she provided being used against him or her in any other proceeding (except in a prosecution for perjury or for giving contradictory evidence). This protection is different from that afforded by the Fifth Amendment in the United States, under which a witness can refuse to testify.

A subpoena must be obtained to compel the attendance of a witness. For a judge to issue a subpoena, the party seeking the subpoena must be able to establish that the witness would probably, or is likely to, have material evidence to give.

Whistleblowing and employee rights

Under the Criminal Code, it is an offence for an employer to discipline, demote or dismiss an employee in retaliation for that employee providing information to the authorities about a violation of federal or provincial law, or to threaten to do so. It is also an offence to do any of these things in an attempt to dissuade the employee from providing information to the authorities.

In addition, in recent years the provincial securities regulators in three provinces (Ontario, Quebec and Alberta) have introduced whistleblower programmes. Each of these provides various protections to whistleblowers who engage in protected activity, including assurances of confidentiality and anti-reprisal measures. For example, under the Ontario programme, employment agreement provisions that preclude an employee from engaging in whistleblowing activity are automatically void.

The Alberta and Ontario whistleblower programmes also provide a civil right of action for whistleblowers who have experienced reprisals. For example, under the Ontario programme, employees who engage in protected whistleblowing activity have a private right of action against companies that take reprisals. In any suit brought under the private right of action, the typical burden of proof is reversed such that the company must demonstrate that it did not take a reprisal against the employee. Remedies in such an action include the employee's reinstatement and payment to the employee of two times the amount of remuneration that the employee would have been paid but for the reprisal.

Of the three provincial whistleblower programmes, only the Ontario one offers monetary awards for information regarding misconduct. Under the Ontario programme, a whistleblower can receive up to C$5 million for submitting information about potential securities misconduct that leads to an enforcement action. In the first two years after the programme launched, the Ontario securities regulator received approximately 200 tip-offs and, in February 2019, it made its first three awards under the programme (totalling C$7.5 million).

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

As a general matter, employees do not have any particular rights under employment law that govern how the company must interact with them during an internal investigation. However, if an employee is a whistleblower, the employee may have rights under local law against the company taking reprisals against him or her for the whistleblowing activity.

Apart from whistleblower protections, if an employee is treated unfairly and subsequently demoted or dismissed, that treatment may be a factor in wrongful termination proceedings instituted by the employee. Also, employees may be found to have a reasonable expectation of privacy in relation to their personal use of company computers, tablets and mobile phones. This expectation of privacy may preclude the company from voluntarily turning over the contents of these devices to law enforcement authorities for their use in a criminal investigation of the employee.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

An employees' rights under local employment law do not differ, and there are no particular steps that need to be taken by the employer, when an employee is implicated in, or suspected of, misconduct.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

It may be possible to dismiss an employee for refusing to participate in an investigation, particularly when the contract of employment imposes a duty on the employee to participate in an investigation.

Commencing an internal investigation

There is no mandatory process for conducting internal investigations in Canada. Independent investigations often begin with a document or work plan that sets out the subject matter and scope of the investigation. The work plan will generally evolve as the investigation progresses and its evolution is typically the subject of discussion between the investigators and the corporate authorities instructing the investigation.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

Internal reports of potential illegal conduct should be passed on to management and, depending on the nature or severity of the conduct, to the board of directors. If a company lawyer becomes aware of certain types of misconduct, he or she may be obliged by local ethical rules to report that misconduct to management or the board, or both. The relevant corporate authority should consider whether immediate remedial action is required and consult counsel prior to deciding on the appropriate course of action, which can involve an internal investigation conducted by company personnel or an independent investigation by outside investigators. It is generally prudent to conduct a review and investigation of potential illegal conduct under the guidance and direction of counsel to preserve privilege on behalf of the corporation and to avoid inadvertent waivers of privilege before the scope and severity of the potential misconduct can be determined.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

Note that such orders are only used against third parties and not the target of an investigation. If served with a preservation demand, a preservation order or production order, a company should immediately take steps to preserve and produce (as applicable) the data subject to the order.

If a company is unable to comply with the terms of the order in the time prescribed, the company may apply to the court to vary or revoke the order. Such an application may assist the company in obtaining more time to comply with an order (which can be broadly drafted) or address concerns about privileged documents. Notice of this application must be made to the officer named in the order within 30 days of the day on which the order is made.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

The obligation of a corporation to publicly disclose an internal or government investigation of illegal conduct varies according to a wide range of factors, including whether the corporation is private or publicly traded, the business activities of the corporation and the type of conduct in question. Public companies have disclosure obligations under Canadian securities laws with respect to 'material information'. Whether specific information regarding potential misconduct rises to the requisite level of materiality depends on several factors, both qualitative and quantitative. In certain sectors (e.g., financial services, consumer health and safety, and government procurement), companies are subject to legal or contractual obligations to disclose certain types of misconduct. In other instances, particularly those that have the potential to affect consumers, early public disclosure may be prudent for reputational reasons.

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

As a general rule, Canadian enforcement agencies welcome the efforts of corporations to address wrongdoing by officers, directors and employees, including conducting internal investigations. However, the posture towards internal investigations varies immensely from agency to agency and is affected by the safeguards that the company adopts to preserve the integrity of the internal investigation and the evidence collected.

Attorney–client privilege

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

Yes. Both attorney–client privilege and litigation privilege may attach to work-product produced in an internal investigation. Attorney–client privilege will protect communications made in furtherance of the provision of legal advice. Litigation privilege will attach to documents where the 'dominant purpose' of creating the document was anticipated or ongoing litigation. Neither attorney–client privilege nor litigation privilege will attach to documents that predate the investigation, or transcripts or factual summaries of interviews of employees or third parties not directly involved in instructing the lawyers conducting the investigation.

It is prudent to clearly define who the client is at the outset of the mandate (e.g., the corporation alone, the corporation and certain senior officers or a special committee of the board of directors) and who will be instructing the lawyers on behalf of the corporation. Documents should also be marked as 'solicitor–client privileged' or 'litigation privileged' and their dissemination should be restricted to the individuals directly involved in instructing the lawyers. Also, the client may choose not to have interviews recorded or verbatim transcripts prepared, but instead have their lawyers prepare impressionistic memoranda over which a tenable claim of litigation privilege may be made.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

Attorney–client privilege applies to communications between an attorney and a client that are (1) expected to be confidential and (2) in furtherance of obtaining legal advice. The attorney–client privilege is held by the client and can only be waived by the client. This is the case irrespective of whether the client is a corporation or an individual. Privileged communications are shielded from disclosure indefinitely.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

The fact that the lawyer giving legal advice is in-house (as opposed to external) counsel is irrelevant. A communication will be privileged if it is in furtherance of obtaining legal advice. Privilege will not attach to communications when in-house counsel is providing business advice. Also, over-circulation of a document by in-house counsel can result in a finding that the communication is not privileged because it was not intended to be kept confidential.

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

Although the law on this issue is not settled in Canada, courts will generally apply the law of the forum to issues of attorney–client privilege. On that basis, when advice is sought from a foreign lawyer in relation to foreign law, attorney–client privilege will attach if the requirements of local law for the privilege are satisfied. Specifically, the communication between the foreign lawyer and the client must be made with the expectation of confidentiality and in furtherance of obtaining legal advice.

To support the strongest possible assertion of attorney–client privilege, it is best practice for domestic counsel (rather than the client) to undertake any communication with foreign lawyers during an investigation. In this way, the communications with the foreign lawyers are protected by privilege just as any other third-party and expert assistance engaged by counsel for the purposes of conducting the investigation.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

With the exception of provincial securities regulators, Canadian enforcement authorities do not generally request waiver of privileged information, and waiver of privilege is not generally required to obtain credit for co-operation. However, some agencies (particularly the RCMP) can be sceptical of extensive privilege claims even when they are well-founded. It is prudent in RCMP investigations of such matters as foreign corrupt practices, procurement fraud, sanctions and export control violations, to consider whether appropriate waivers of specific privileged information may be beneficial to the corporation.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

The concept of limited waiver of privilege exists in Canada, but the circumstances in which a corporation can successfully assert that it intended a limited waiver are uncertain. Although the precise contours of the limited waiver doctrine are unclear, when the production of privileged information is required by statute, and the privileged information is produced for that purpose, the doctrine of limited waiver will apply.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

If the preconditions for the assertion of privilege exist, and it is clear that only a limited waiver for a specified purpose was intended, privilege could possibly be maintained in Canada.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

Common interest privilege does exist in Canada. Common interest privilege may be invoked if a party voluntarily discloses a privileged document to another party who has a common interest in the subject matter of the communication or in the litigation in connection with which the document was created. For common interest to exist, the parties must share a common goal, seek a common outcome or have an identical and shared interest. The common interest does not need to exist at the time the privileged document is created, so long as the common interest exists at the time the document is disclosed.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

Yes, as a general rule, third-party and expert assistance engaged by counsel for the purposes of conducting an investigation, such as forensic accountants and investigators, data recovery services, translation services and document review, is covered by privilege.

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

Yes. Witness interviews are generally a key part of internal investigations.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

Internal witness interviews may be covered by litigation privilege, provided that the interviews are for the dominant purpose of existing or contemplated litigation. Because litigation privilege does not protect underlying facts from disclosure, a successful assertion of privilege can only be made regarding impressionistic summaries prepared by the lawyer. Attorney–client privilege will also attach to interviews of key individuals involved in instructing the lawyers.

Reports prepared by lawyers as part of an internal investigation may also be attorney–client privileged, provided that (1) the report is delivered in the context of a attorney–client relationship, (2) the report is prepared for the purpose of providing legal advice, and (3) the report is prepared and delivered with the expectation of confidentiality.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

It is generally considered prudent to give an employee an Upjohn-type warning, although the issue of whether such a warning is required has not been considered by a Canadian court. In addition, if an employee is to be interviewed by a lawyer on behalf of the employer, local ethical rules require the lawyer to make it clear that he or she is acting on behalf of the employer and not for the employee, and if the employee subsequently seeks legal representation, the lawyer cannot interview the employee except with the express consent of the employee's lawyer.

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

Documents may be put to the witness. The interview may be recorded, but the recording will not be privileged. Employees should be advised that the interviewing lawyer acts for the employer and so the employee may seek their own legal representation. If the employee retains a lawyer, they cannot be interviewed except with the express consent of the employee's lawyer. Such an interview would generally take place in the presence of the employee's lawyer.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

There is no general obligation to report misconduct to law enforcement authorities. However, companies in certain sectors (e.g., financial services, consumer health and safety, and government procurement) are subject to legal or contractual obligations to disclose certain types of misconduct to the appropriate authorities.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

A company might be advised to self-report if it is likely to receive credit for doing so and the underlying misconduct is likely to come to the attention of law enforcement. Formal credit for co-operation programmes have been established by the OSC for securities regulatory offences and by the Canadian Competition Bureau for offences under the Competition Act. Other agencies may have also been known to give credit or decline to prosecute in the case of self-disclosure, for example in matters involving economic sanctions, export controls and foreign corruption. With recent legislation that provides for deferred prosecution agreements, it is possible that the circumstances under which voluntary self-reporting would be advisable will expand. The Public Prosecution Service of Canada has not entered into any such agreements to date.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

Both the OSC and the Canadian Competition Bureau provide guidance in respect of how to self-report under their credit for co-operation programmes.

Under the OSC programme, an organisation will, typically through counsel, contact the staff of the OSC to self-report and offer its co-operation. The staff will generally require the organisation to disclose particulars of the conduct at issue, including by forwarding documentation, providing fact witnesses for interviews and responding to the staff's questions. An organisation's co-operation under the programme can result in the staff agreeing to take no enforcement action against the organisation, a settlement agreement in which the organisation makes no admissions of liability or a reduction in sanctions.

The Canadian Competition Bureau self-reporting regime comprises two programmes: the Immunity Programme and the Leniency Programme. Under the Immunity Programme, organisations that are the first party to self-report a competition offence may be eligible under the programme for complete immunity from prosecution. To benefit from the Immunity Programme, an organisation must provide complete, timely and ongoing co-operation to the Bureau at its own expense. Under the Leniency Programme, organisations that are not the first party to self-report a competition offence may be eligible for leniency in sentencing as long as they have terminated their participation in the activity at issue, agreed to plead guilty to the offence at issue, and agreed to co-operate fully and in a timely manner with the Bureau.

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

The company is likely to approach the authority conducting the investigation to understand the allegations. Discussions may be entered into to assess whether there is information the company can provide that will enable it to avoid a prosecution, either because the information refutes the allegations or establishes that a prosecution is not in the public interest (i.e., because the company has undertaken an internal investigation and subsequent remedial action).

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

In theory, investigations can be challenged through an application for judicial review of administrative action. Such an application is likely to be successful only if the law enforcement agency undertaking the investigation clearly lacks the lawful authority for doing so.

In a recent high-profile example, engineering company SNC-Lavalin Group challenged by way of judicial review the decision of prosecutors not to offer it a deferred prosecution agreement (also known as a remediation agreement) for charges of bribery of foreign government officials. SNC-Lavalin sought to have the court compel prosecutors to negotiate a remediation agreement with the organisation in good faith. In a March 2019 decision, the court refused the application, concluding that the decision not to offer a remediation agreement falls within the ambit of prosecutorial discretion and so is not reviewable.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

As a first step, local counsel should be retained in both jurisdictions and counsel in each jurisdiction should serve as the contact point for the local authorities. Counsel may then wish to make enquiries directed at determining whether the action is coordinated, taking care not to reveal that they are the subject of the investigation in the other jurisdiction if prohibited from doing so under local law. If it is confirmed that the action is coordinated, it would be prudent to consider whether a consistent disclosure package can be negotiated. If prohibited from revealing the existence of the investigation, it is likely that this can only be done through the agency in the locality that prohibits revealing the existence of the investigation. Generally, in Canada, there is some scope for negotiation around what is to be produced, even if there is a court order compelling production.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

Yes. A production order would apply to information in the company's control anywhere in the world.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

Canadian law enforcement agencies can share information with foreign agencies pursuant to various arrangements, both formal and informal. For example, information can be provided to a foreign agency through a formal mutual legal assistance request managed by the International Assistance Group of the federal Department of Justice. Certain agencies also have formal arrangements with their foreign counterparts that provide for information-sharing and assistance (e.g., the Competition Bureau has co-operation agreements with the US Department of Justice and Federal Trade Commission, the European Commission and other foreign competition authorities). The provincial securities commissions have memoranda of understanding with the US Securities and Exchange Commission that authorise information-sharing in specific circumstances. Other agencies (including the RCMP) have close relationships with foreign enforcement agencies and can contact their counterparts for assistance and information that is not confidential or otherwise restricted by the relevant foreign government.

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

Yes. Disclosure will be restricted to parties facing a criminal or regulatory prosecution arising out of the investigation. Disclosure to third parties, such as in a class action, will generally only be made pursuant to a court order.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

Canadian enforcement agencies are familiar with foreign data protection laws that restrict disclosure of information. While referencing those laws is important in the discussion of production expectations and timing, it is often useful to obtain a foreign legal opinion to determine whether the foreign law prohibits the disclosure of the precise information that is being requested by Canadian authorities.

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

Canada does not presently have a traditional blocking statute that prohibits disclosure to foreign authorities or persons except as permitted by treaty.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

Confidentiality will attach to information that is compelled and information that is produced voluntarily. When information is produced voluntarily, a company is generally precluded from challenging the admissibility of that information as evidence in a subsequent prosecution against it at the instance of the regulator. Disclosure to third parties, such as in a class action, will generally only be made pursuant to a court order.

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

Companies face fines, probation, disgorgement and debarment. Directors, officers and employees face fines, probation, disgorgement and imprisonment.

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

The federal government maintains an integrity regime that provides for suspension and debarment of suppliers of goods and services to the government of Canada if they have been charged with or convicted of designated offences in Canada or in a foreign jurisdiction. Designated offences include fraud, corruption, price-fixing and bid rigging and other economic crimes. The integrity regime provides for mandatory debarment for 10 years if a company has been convicted of a designated offence. The debarment can be reduced by up to five years if the company enters into an administrative agreement with Public Services and Procurement Canada (PSPC). Suspension and debarment are discretionary if an affiliate of the company is charged or convicted in a foreign jurisdiction, and depend on a determination by the PSPC as to whether the Canadian company had any role, or participated, in the foreign offence. Companies can, in certain circumstances, avoid suspension pending trial by entering into an administrative agreement with the PSPC to implement or maintain agreed compliance measures.

Quebec and New Brunswick are the only provinces to maintain a similar suspension and debarment regime. The Quebec regime is administered by the provincial securities regulator and applies to both private and publicly traded companies. The New Brunswick regime applies to prospective provincial government suppliers and predicated on convictions of enumerated offences, including economic crimes and foreign corrupt practices.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

The fundamental principle of sentencing is that the sentence or penalty should be proportionate to the gravity of the offence and the degree of responsibility of the offender. There is a whole host of other aggravating and mitigating factors prescribed by statute and that have been recognised at common law. Among the most commonly considered are whether the company or individual entered into an early resolution, whether they co-operated with the authorities in the investigation, and whether they voluntarily repaid ill-gotten gains or otherwise voluntarily undertook remedial action.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

Canada has introduced deferred prosecution agreements (referred to as remediation agreements) as a result of amendments to the Criminal Code that came into force on 19 September 2018. A remediation agreement is defined as 'an agreement between an organisation accused of having committed an offence and a prosecutor, to stay any proceedings related to that offence if the organisation complies with the terms of the agreement'. Remediation agreements are subject to judicial approval and are available for specified offences, including foreign and domestic corruption, fraud, stock manipulation and insider trading. The Public Prosecution Service of Canada has not entered into a remediation agreement to date.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

Under recent legislation in Canada that introduced remediation agreements, once a court approves a remediation agreement, that agreement must be published by the court unless it is satisfied that non-publication is necessary for the proper administration of justice. In determining whether to publish a remediation agreement, the legislation provides that the court must consider, among other things, the prevention of any adverse effect to any ongoing investigation or prosecution.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

Settlements attract deference from courts and regulatory authorities, but they are generally not bound by them. Also, when making admissions as part of a settlement, the admissions should be qualified as being for that purpose and not for any other purpose. Once a settlement is entered into, it is likely that litigation privilege will no longer apply to documents prepared for the purpose of the regulatory proceeding.

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

The use of external corporate compliance monitors has historically been limited to non-criminal regulatory matters. Provincial securities regulators and self-regulatory organisations will sometimes require that a company engage an independent monitor to assist with remediating compliance deficiencies identified as part of a regular compliance review or misconduct investigation. These regulators usually require that they approve the organisation's selection of monitor and set the monitor's mandate. The monitor will be given reasonable access to the organisation's books and records as is necessary to fulfil its mandate and will typically be required to report its observations and recommendations to the regulator.

The 2018 legislation in Canada that introduced remediation agreements may result in an expanded use of monitors in the resolution of criminal matters. Under the new legislation, a prosecutor may require the appointment of an independent monitor for the organisation as a condition of a remediation agreement. The independent monitor is charged with verifying and reporting to the prosecutor on the organisation's compliance with remedial measures during the term of the remediation agreement. Prosecutors must approve the organisation's selection of monitor and the organisation is obliged to co-operate with the monitor and pay its costs. Since the Public Prosecution Service of Canada has not yet entered into a remediation agreement under the new regime, no monitors have been imposed to date.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

Yes. In some instances, such as for certain violations of securities regulations or the Competition Act, the applicable statutes provide for a private right of action. Access to the authorities' files is possible through a court order.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

Publicity at the pre-charge stage is generally very limited. Law enforcement agencies will generally not release information voluntarily unless there is a particular investigative objective to be achieved by releasing the information. However, it is possible that the media will be able to gain access to information through court records of applications for search warrants. Although these records are often sealed, an application to unseal them can be brought in high-profile cases (which is often done).

Once a charge has been laid, court proceedings are open to the public and, with few exceptions, the proceedings can be reported by the media.

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

Yes. However, corporate communications should be vetted by the company's lawyers as they are admissible against the company in court proceedings.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

A corporate communications firm may be engaged, but if the company is a party to the proceedings, or could be a party to future proceedings, its communications should be vetted by the company's lawyer to ensure that they do not compromise the company's position in those proceedings.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

A public company will be required to disclose an investigation or a settlement where it constitutes a 'material fact' or a 'material change' under applicable securities laws.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

Canada's federal government held parallel public consultations in 2017 and 2018 on expanding measures to address corporate misconduct and updating its policies on debarment from public procurement. The consultations resulted in the introduction of remediation agreements (deferred prosecution agreements) in the Criminal Code in September 2018. The consultations also led to the publication in November 2018 of draft amendments to the federal Integrity Regime, which governs eligibility, suspension and disqualification for federal procurement. The amendments propose, among other things, to eliminate mandatory debarment upon conviction of a predicate offence and to leave the period of debarment to the discretion of the Integrity Regime Registrar. The government has indicated that it intends to adopt the amended policy at a future date.

Canada has been broadly criticised by the Financial Action Task Force, and other international and domestic organisations, for its lax anti-money laundering legislation and enforcement. The federal and provincial governments issued a joint statement in June 2019 committing to improving beneficial ownership transparency to combat money laundering and financial crime. The statement contemplates consultations on a public beneficial ownership registry. A timeline for the consultations has not yet been announced.

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

The highest-profile corporate investigation currently under way in Chile is Corpesca, a criminal case against a Chilean fishing company (Corpesca), loss of privilege senator Jaime Orpis and former congresswoman Marta Isasi.

The investigation relates to a scandal that affected the entire political spectrum in 2015 with regard to the illegal financing of electoral campaigns by large businesses. It involves charges such as illegal financing of electoral campaigns, bribery and tax fraud, among others. It also involved important Chilean companies, such as Penta and SQM (one of the country's largest privately owned mining companies), and several politicians from all sides of the political spectrum.

However, Chilean prosecutors have only pressed charges in criminal court against Corpesca, Senator Orpis and former congresswoman Isasi. Therefore, and notwithstanding that the political scandal affected several politicians and businesses, currently Corpesca is the only Chilean company that could face criminal sanctions arising from the 2015 scandal, and Senator Orpis could be the first Chilean politician to face criminal sanctions, risking a jail term.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

Law 20,393 (enacted in 2009) provides that corporations are criminally liable for certain criminal offences carried out by their owners, managers and employees acting in the interests of the corporation when this is a consequence of breaching duties of supervision (Article 3,

1 Andrés Jana and Karen Werner are partners at Bofill Mir & Alvarez Jana.

Law 20,393). In practice, this means that a company might be liable if it failed to develop and implement an effective compliance programme with the aim of preventing such offences from being carried out.

The legal framework operates under some express offences established in Law 20,393. In its original form, the law limited the offences to those under which Chile had international duties of criminal enforcement (i.e., terrorism funding, foreign bribery). However, the scope has expanded to certain general offences such as bribery, several environmental crimes and, lately, some forms of corporate fraud.

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

The primary enforcement authorities relating to corporations are: the Tax Authority (SII), the Financial Market Commission (equivalent to the US Securities and Exchange Commission) and the Antitrust Prosecution Office. The Criminal Prosecution Office (Ministerio Público (MP)) centralises all criminal enforcement competences. Each office has jurisdiction over its own subject matter.

In general, there are no normative rules or protocols to coordinate and distribute activities between the different offices. The MP has some limitations in its jurisdiction, but these are rare.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

Chilean law does not generally provide for limitations of this kind. Discretionary decision-making by prosecutors and officials in the different agencies, acting under the traditional sources of motivation and constraint found in institutions of this kind, determines these outcomes. In some cases, the agencies have internal guidelines regarding the decision-making process. In the case of the MP, two General Instructions provide some guidance about the content of the law, but it does not go beyond the formal text of the statute in establishing certain criteria to prosecute a corporation.

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

The legal regulation of criminal enforcement does not provide for subpoenas requesting documentary information from private parties. In practice, a private party that receives a subpoena requesting documents from the authority can refuse to comply. Prosecutors are then likely to ask a judge to grant them seizure powers of those documents, according to Article 217 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Subpoenas to give testimony in the context of a criminal investigation are mandatory. All witnesses must comply with at least answering the summons. They can only refuse to testify on a given question under privileges against self-incrimination or professional secrecy.

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

Leniency agreements have started to appear in different areas of Chilean law. While there is no general criminal law provision regulating immunity and leniency, a prosecutor may offer to ask for diversion or other benefits in the context of a plea bargain or in the case of minor felonies.

The particular areas that provide for leniency agreements include antitrust regulation, financial market regulation, criminal law dealing with corruption, and some forms of organised crime.

In the case of corporate criminal liability, a defendant can also receive some benefits if he or she makes significant contributions to the process.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

The scale of national attention on the Penta Group and SQM cases are indicative of the interest in incidents relating to tax evasion. Nevertheless, in the past few years, the SII has become reluctant to allow the MP to prosecute tax evasion offences in high-profile cases. Law enforcement officials seem to prefer to prioritise corruption and corporate frauds. This focus was given a boost with the enactment of Law 21,121 in November 2018, which considerably expanded the scope of these types of offences.

Law enforcement agencies are also focusing on antitrust behaviour. During the past decade, the work of antitrust enforcement agencies and the Antitrust Tribunal in Chile has become increasingly relevant.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

Entities that receive personal data must ensure that the rights of the data subject are safeguarded and transmission of information is related to the tasks and purposes of the participating organisations. Also, if there is a request for personal data via an electronic network, the following information must be recorded: (1) the enquirer's identity, (2) the motivation and purpose of the request, and (3) specifics of the personal data being transferred.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

Although cybercrime regulation in Chile is old and incomplete, some law enforcement authorities do have departments that specialise in cybercrime matters, such as the Chilean Investigations Police. The National Prosecution's Specialised Office on Economic Crimes includes cybercrime as part of its remit. However, few specific cybercrime offences are included in criminal legislation. Cybercrime is instead prosecuted under general offences (such as fraud) that are committed through the internet (e.g., phishing).

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

Criminal laws operate under the principle of territoriality established in Chile's Constitution. Extraterritorial liability is only allowed by law in some specific cases. There are some regulations of extraterritorial effects relating to offences between Chilean parties, conspiracies that affect the Chilean market, several types of sexual offences, offences perpetrated by Chilean officials overseas against the state, and foreign bribery.

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

Whereas coordination with foreign offices was virtually non-existent 15 years ago, some law enforcement agencies have units that are responsible for international co-operation. Lack of regulation and similarity with the regulations of other countries create difficulties in cross-national cases. For example, Chilean law has a fragile framework for asset freezing and forfeiting, which has created problems in attempts to recover assets overseas and to comply with asset recovery demands.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

Chilean criminal law recognises double jeopardy as a general principle. Article 13 of the Criminal Procedural Code (CPP) recognises the effects of criminal judgments made by a foreign court. Thus, criminal law impedes double jeopardy. The only exception provided for is in cases that the Chilean judge deem to be mock trials.

In the past few years, anti-piling on has been on a hot topic of debate. Since its judgment STC 244 of 1996, the Chilean Constitutional Court explicitly acknowledges that the general principles of criminal law also apply to the sanctioning powers of other agencies, including the protection against double jeopardy. The exact conditions under which such provisions apply is obscure, however. In its judgment STC 496 of 2006, the Chilean Constitutional Court declared that the principles of criminal law apply only with 'nuances', without specifying them. In the past few years, both the Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court have discussed several cases of double jeopardy, in particular regarding securities offences: both criminal law and administrative law provide for sanctioning powers for such offences. The general conditions under which the anti-piling on rule works are unclear.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

Global settlements are not common in Chile.

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

Authorities are likely consider them and weight them depending on the ruling by the foreign authority. However, there is no legal regulation on this issue.

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

Criminal law provides for the traditional types of sanctions that can be found in any penal regime, imprisonment and fines being the most common. Under Chilean law, people can go to prison if the nominal penalty goes beyond three years' imprisonment (in some cases, five years) and the defendant has not been convicted of a crime in the past 10 years or of a simple felony in the past five years.

In cases of white-collar crime, defendants are unlikely to serve time in prison as they will not generally have prior convictions, and penalties rarely go beyond three or five years in these cases. This situation may change with the enforcement of Law 21,121, as the nominal penalty for bribery offences has been increased. Although Law 21,121 is already applicable in Chile, there are been no convictions since November 2018, when it was published.

Criminal fines have been traditionally low. However, this has changed regarding a corporate's liability because fines can now be as much as 300,000 unidades de fomento.

Individuals may also face several prohibitions to exercise public duties and to serve as directors or managers in open corporations. Corporations may also be punished by being prohibited from negotiating contracts with the state and losing benefits obtained from such contracts. The most severe punishment for corporations is dissolution.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

Criminal and administrative enforcement has increased in the past decade as a result of different scandals and a general change in public opinion. The general approach in criminal enforcement has also become more professional, taking into account the number of specialist departments that now exist. However, in certain areas (asset forfeiture, for example), it still remains ineffective.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

Several institutions, including the MP, have international co-operation departments.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

Not that we are aware of.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

This does not apply.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

Although local authorities claim that their screening and reporting mechanisms are robust, most major corporate scandals have been initiated by media reports, self-reporting in the context of an investigation and whistleblowing.

Perhaps the best illustration of this is the Penta case, which started with an investigation into possible tax evasion, in which an internal official had collaborated. It gained ground when one of the individuals involved confessed to being part of the scheme, alongside a senior manager within the Penta Group. Feeling betrayed by his employers after being fired, that individual co-operated with the authorities and provided critical information.

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

Law 19,628 provides a general regulation on the matter. As the regulation stems from before the data revolution of the last few decades, it is generally considered obsolete.

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

Chile does not have an agency that is responsible for the surveillance of compliance of the enforcement of personal data protection regimes. Instead, general courts of justice oversee the protection of data under the Data Privacy Law in the following circumstances: (1) a particular procedure before civil courts is considered in the Data Privacy Law for breaches to said Law, and (2) a constitutional protection action can be filed if a breach affects the constitutional right to the protection of personal data, which must be used in accordance with the law.

Bill No. 11,144-07, which amends the Data Privacy Law and is currently being reviewed in the Senate, states, among other things, the creation of a Personal Data Protection Agency, which must certify that the breach prevention model and the compliance programme that the Bill also sets forth, meet the requirements provided in the new law and its regulations, and shall monitor compliance therewith.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

Lack of regulation is the most pressing issue. The status of basic information, including employees' email, is unclear and has been the subject of discussions about their legal and constitutional status when used both to prevent and to prosecute criminal offences.

Discussions are generally based simply on the general rules of criminal law (necessity or less heinous defences) or of constitutional law (intimacy rights).

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

See question 23. Employers tend to give consent for the use of communications for such purposes in employment contracts, but the validity of such clauses is arguable.

Dawn raids and search warrants

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

Search warrants need to be authorised by a judge and, generally, are effected after giving notice. With due cause, prosecutors can request that prior notice need not be given.

Authorities executing search warrants have to maintain strict custody of, and record, all seized items. They are prohibited from seizing communications that fall under the umbrella of professional secrecy.

A company can request that excessive behaviour should cease by presenting a constitutional action to consider a violation of fundamental rights. Moreover, a company can formally request consideration that the evidence obtained is null and void.

Authorities executing search warrants must safeguard and record all seized items.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

All witnesses are obliged to answer a summons and testify. However, if there is a risk of self-incrimination, or if a person's testimony could affect spousal or family relationships, or professional secrecy (such as attorney–client privilege), witnesses can refuse to testify, although they still have to answer the summons.

Witnesses who do not answer a summons can face fines and arrest. All witnesses, except defendants and their close relatives, can face charges of false testimony.

Whistleblowing and employee rights

28 Describe the whistleblowing framework in your country. What financial incentive schemes exist for whistleblowers? What legal protections are in place for whistleblowers?

Chile does not have a specific whistleblower regulation in respect of employment matters. However, there are regulations relating to sexual harassment at work (Article 211-A et seq., Labour Code).

Internal claims (apart from sexual harassment) are not lawfully regulated in respect of whistleblowers but a company could create its own incentives. However, if an employee makes specific allegations before the Labour Department or labour courts, the employer cannot dismiss them (Article 485, Labour Code).

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

Employment law does not confer exclusive rights to employees who participate in an internal investigation. If it is an investigation conducted by the Labour Department, individuals may have protection against dismissal. Employment law does not distinguish between employees, officers and directors.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

Each case must be considered on its merits. If the matter relates to sexual harassment, or another form of harassment in the workplace, in the first instance, the suspect should be separated from the injured party. That may represent a suspension of the suspect's duties or relocation from the usual place of work. In any case, the employer could not stop paying the salary while the investigation is taking place.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

There is no scope for compelling someone to participate in an internal investigation. The only possible cause for dismissal is when a suspect is declared guilty of sexual harassment, or another form of harassment in the workplace (Article 260(1)(b) and (f), Labour Code).

Commencing an internal investigation

32 Is it common practice in your country to prepare a document setting out terms of reference or investigatory scope before commencing an internal investigation? What issues would it cover?

Internal investigations are a relatively new phenomenon, so there are few common practices in place. However, before starting any investigation, companies usually prepare documents containing the claimant's name, the accused's name and a summary of the accusation. It also may contain details regarding the investigation process, such as the dates involved and details of the investigation process.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

Reporting can make leniency rules applicable. In labour cases, such as matters relating to sexual harassment, the affected employee can request the intervention of the Labour Department. In these circumstance, the company should provide the information requested by the authority.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

There is no specific labour regulation. However, subpoenas from the labour authority must be met. Also, the employer has a legal duty to store all labour documentation.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

In labour issues, the only applicable situation is with sexual harassment cases. If a company carries out an internal investigation, the results of it should be sent to the Labour Department within 30 days of the date of the initial claim.

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

Regarding labour issues, such as mobbing or sexual harassment, usually, they are resolved through internal investigations, which is permitted by the Labour Code.

Regarding sexual harassment procedures, the law includes minimum requirements such as deadlines and investigations carried out according to due process.

Attorney–client privilege

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

There is no specific rule regarding internal investigations within a company. However, the attorney–client privilege is a general rule established in the Lawyer Ethics Code. A lawyer must always maintain and protect a client's confidentiality.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

There is no difference between an individual client or a company. The holder of the privilege is the lawyer. The main principles of the attorney–client privilege are as follows:

- strict confidentiality (the scope for which extends to all the information that an attorney receives from a client);
- the attorney's right to recognition of privilege;
- prohibition on disclosure;
- duty of care towards all information received or disclosed;
- duty of care towards people who assist an attorney; and
- indefinite duration.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

The law does not distinguish between, and applies equally to, in-house and external counsel. The attorney–client privilege generally applies, and is extendable to law firms.

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

Lawyers in Chile should comply with the rules established in the Lawyers Ethics Code.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

The Lawyer Ethics Code only establishes the duty to waive the attorney–client privilege to avoid or impede a crime. Also, it provides for the possibility to waive in specific instances, such as to avoid serious risks of death or serious injury, to obtain advice from another lawyer with the duty of confidentiality, or to comply with a duty of law. Co-operation is not established as a specific waiver.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

Chile does not regulate this issue expressly. The Lawyers Ethics Code only provides for those instances when a lawyer must or can waive the right.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

Attorney–client privilege should be maintained in Chile.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

No, the privileges only apply regarding the client.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

Yes, the Lawyers Ethics Code establishes a broad scope of privilege, and relates to all information that has been received by a client or third parties that relates to issue raised by the client.

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

This is not addressed by Chilean law, so it is common practice for witnesses to be interviewed. In fact, it is one of the most widely used forms of evidence in an internal investigation.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

This is not addressed by Chilean law. Privileges are claimed in practice, but their effects are unclear.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

There is no specific regulation on this issue. However, the main requirements relate to the confidentiality of communications and data protection. Since there is a lack of common standards regarding interviews, the most prudent way for a witness to handle an interview is to identify straight away any risk of self-incrimination or conflict of interest.

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

There is no specific regulation in respect of such interviews, but typically those present are the interviewer and the witness. Interviews are sometimes recorded. Relevant documents are presented to the witness depending on the case. It is not typical for an employee to have legal representation.

The lack of common standards means that, in general, there is no requirement for attendance by an attorney other than the company's attorney, but an employee may wish to do have their own representation. The company attorney should make it clear that he or she is not acting for the witness to avoid any confusion on the matter.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

The moral obligation to report misconduct is rare in Chilean law. As a matter of doctrinal law, however, there may be a case for criminal liability for omission if the misconduct continues after the party becomes aware of it.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

As regards antitrust, self-reporting to the relevant law enforcement authority is crucial in cases of collusion. Articles 39 bis and 63 of Decree Law 211 establish and regulate a leniency programme. According to Guidelines issued by the Fiscalía Nacional Económica (the national competition authority responsible for defending and promoting competition), the programme allows individuals or companies who have engaged in collusive conduct to be exempted from the relevant sanctions, or to have them reduced, provided that the applicant provides information that can be used to prove the conduct and identify the parties involved. Therefore, if a client has participated in a collusion scheme, self-reporting would be advisable.

In matters other than collusion, there are no rules regarding self-reporting. Usually, if it is an important issue, it will be disclosed as material information, or as a note in the financial statements. Further, companies usually name one specific internal authority for the resolution of a case. In most cases, a company's managing director will determine whether the matter in question is sufficiently important.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

Given that there are no incentives to self-report to law enforcement authorities, it is not usual for companies or compliance officers to make a self-report (except in cases of collusion). However, the formal method would be to submit a writ before the criminal court. If deemed admissible, the writ of self-report would be assigned to the MP for further investigation.

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

There is always a chance to have a dialogue with the authorities and to request a meeting through public processes as regulated by law, either before or after charges are brought.

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

Yes.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

Two main principles in the Chilean legal system are the (1) territoriality and (2) relative effects of the awards. Thus, negotiating a consistent disclosure package might not be very useful, considering each of the different cases. Extraterritorial liability is allowed by law only in certain specific cases, such as offences between Chilean people, conspiracies that affect the Chilean market, a number of sexual offences, foreign bribery, among others.

Individuals may also face restrictions or bans, such as exercising public duties or serving as a director or manager in public corporations. Corporations may also be punished by being barred from negotiating contracts with the state and losing the benefits obtained from such contracts. The most severe punishment for corporations is dissolution.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

According to Chilean law, companies must disclose all the documents requested by the authorities that are in their possession or to which they have access. However, should a company decide not to present requested documents, the only sanction is that the company is not allowed to use those documents in its own favour.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

In private law, this is not usual. In criminal law, however, information regarding border control, international crimes, among other things, is routinely shared. For example, the International Co-operation Unit of the MP does provide information to international law enforcement agencies. The Financial Analysis Unit, a government agency, also provides information when required.

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

Prosecutors must keep all their internal proceedings and investigations secret from third parties while there is an ongoing investigation.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

We would present a statement in response, asserting that, according to the country where the documents are available or were produced, it is not possible to obtain them. In any case, according to Chilean law and under Chilean jurisdiction, the only sanction on a party that does not produce documents is a ban on using those documents in its own favour.

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

Not that we are aware of.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

Both criminal and civil proceedings are public in Chile. In criminal law, during the course of an investigation, all the evidence produced should be treated as confidential; however, once it has been produced in open court, it becomes public information, unless a particular exemption applies.

There is no difference between voluntary or compelled production of documents in private law. In criminal law, however, if a defendant co-operates with the authorities, it might gain some benefits, such as a reduction in penalties or lesser charges.

Prosecution and penalties

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

The usual sanctions for misconduct are imprisonment and fines.

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

There are unlikely to be any restrictions because of the principle of territoriality.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

Sentencing is underdeveloped in Chile. Judges will generally apply the minimum prison sentence that the law allows. Regarding fines, there is more room for discretion, though even here there is no clear guidance. In general terms, a penalty might be more severe to reflect the seriousness or scale of the infringement, or in the case of a repeated infringement.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

These are available only in cases of diversion agreements and plea bargains.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

Even though prosecutors must keep all their internal proceedings and investigations secret from third parties, in general terms, all criminal proceedings are public unless a judge rules to the contrary.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

Companies should confirm that the law enforcement authority is authorised to sign the agreement (proxies), that the settlement covers every aspect of the case, that the law enforcement authority is waiving any actions regarding the same issue, and that the agreement is legally usable and confidential.

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

Authorities seldom use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

Private parties can file private actions, but they will generally not be able to go beyond a certain point if the prosecutor decides to dismiss the case.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

Prosecutors must keep all their internal proceedings and investigations secret from third parties (Article 182, CPP). All procedures that take place before the courts are public unless a judge rules to the contrary.

Despite the duty to keep all proceedings secret from third parties to avoid reputational damage, prosecutors are known to inform the press when it is beneficial to the case. Although measures have been taken to avoid this taking place, higher MP authorities have been unable to police such misconduct effectively.

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

It has become common, and sometimes essential, in corporate cases involving potential criminal liability for a company to use a public relations firm. However, internal communications are usually dealt with by a company's managing director or communications manager.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

There is no rule regarding this issue. If it is an important matter, it will be duly disclosed as material information, or as a note in the financial statements. It is usually the managing director who determines whether a matter is sufficiently important for details to be published.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

As regards listed companies, if a settlement is in relation to 'material information', in accordance to the relevant law, it must be disclosed immediately. Further, the law establishes certain cases where disclosure may be withheld temporarily.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

Law No. 21,121 has provided for a significant change in local regulation. It is likely that in the next few years, there will not be any further similar changes, except in some specific areas, such as cybercrime and data protection, which are key objectives for local authorities as regards regulations.

General context, key principles and hot topics

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

China's gift-giving culture (guanxi), combined with an abundance of state-owned enterprises (SOEs), pose clear corruption risks. China has a unique enforcement environment and corporate investigations take many forms. The local domestic market is dominated by SOEs and President Xi Jinping's anti-corruption campaign has targeted them, with large-scale investigations in a number of industries. However, these investigations have generally resulted in prosecutions and disciplinary actions against senior management personnel, rather than the SOEs themselves. For example, in 2018, both the former president of the People's Insurance Company of China and the former general manager of the state-owned conglomerate, Sinochem Group, were separately prosecuted for corruption.

In relation to multinational corporations (MNCs), the highest-profile corporate investigation to date remains that of British pharmaceutical giant GlaxoSmithKline (GSK) in 2014. The trial resulted in GSK itself, and senior executives of its China branch, being found guilty of bribery. GSK was penalised with a fine of US$492 million by a Chinese court.

The pharmaceutical sector remains under considerable scrutiny by regulators and authorities, with a number of investigations under way. Of particular note is the announcement by China's Ministry of Finance in June 2019 that 77 major pharmaceutical companies would undergo an audit over a two-month period, including the local branches of MNCs Sanofi, Eli Lilly & Co and Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. This announcement followed a filing by Kangmei

Pharmaceutical Co that its 2017 results contained multiple 'accounting errors', which raised potential issues of corruption and bribery.

There have also been a number of significant corruption investigations announced in the technology sector in recent months, including suspected corruption by individual employees of Meituan Dianping and the head of the video platform Youku.

Activity in China has also been the focus of more US corporate enforcement actions than conduct in any other country since the enactment of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act in 1977. These US-driven investigations have led to an increased number of concurrent or follow-on investigations by China's criminal law enforcement authorities and regulators.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

Corporate entities can be held criminally liable for giving bribes to state personnel (and persons closely associated with state personnel), non-state personnel, foreign officials, and state entities and enterprises. Corporate criminal liability generally attaches where the relevant misconduct is an exercise of 'corporate will' (i.e., the decision to engage in misconduct was a group decision or was made by the personnel in charge). For example, in the high-profile GSK prosecution, GSK was found guilty on the basis that its management encouraged bribery of doctors, hospitals and other institutions for the benefit of the corporate entity.

Amendments to the Anti-Unfair Competition Law (AUCL), which came into force in January 2018, revised the legal framework for civil bribery. Business operators, which includes corporates, can be found liable for civil bribery offences if they bribe individuals or entities to seek transaction opportunities or a competitive edge. Vicarious liability is expressly presumed.

By virtue of its control over SOEs, the Communist Party of China (CPC) is an omnipresent participant in the corporate enforcement arena. The CPC established the National Supervision Commission (NSC) in March 2018 under the Supervision Law 2018. It is China's new 'super graft agency' and enjoys a status close to the cabinet. It has absorbed and extended the investigative and enforcement powers of the CPC's Central Commission for Discipline Inspection. The NSC may detain individuals, interrogate them for up to six months, freeze assets, search premises with a warrant and seize evidence. Moreover, detainees are not entitled to legal advice as the NSC operates outside the purview of the Criminal Procedure Law of the People's Republic of China of 1979 (as amended) (the Criminal Procedure Law).

The NSC's jurisdiction focuses on corruption and bribery by individuals but it is likely that both SOEs and MNCs will get caught up in investigations initiated by the NSC, particularly given its ability to call on the services of other law enforcement agencies.

The NSC carries out investigations of suspected bribery by SOEs and state personnel before referring cases for potential criminal investigation or prosecution by the Ministry of Public Security, public security bureaux (PSBs), people's procuratorates and the Supreme People's Procuratorate. PSBs and people's procuratorates are organs of state and constitute the police and investigative arms, and the prosecution service, respectively.

PSBs investigate, via the economic crime investigation units set up within the bureaux, criminal bribery offences, fraud, other financial crimes, and crimes relating to food and drug safety. People's procuratorates, as prosecuting bodies, enjoy their own investigatory powers, but are primarily responsible for prosecutions. According to the Supervision Law, people's procuratorates will prosecute if they are of the opinion that the facts of a crime have been ascertained and the evidence is concrete and sufficient. The authorities have published no policies specifically relating to the prosecution of corporations, although there are thresholds for the investigation of corporates (see question 4).

Distinct from law enforcement, other bodies exercise investigative, disciplinary and regulatory powers over corporates. For example, the State Administration for Market Regulation (SAMR) investigates potential violations of the AUCL and sanctions civil bribery. It is not unusual for multiple agencies to be involved in a single matter. If relevant and within their jurisdiction, authorities do not generally refrain from pursuing matters simply because the corporate is under investigation by another domestic body.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

In practice, the authorities have considerable leeway in initiating investigations, both procedurally and substantively. The NSC in particular enjoys broad investigative powers, with no particular suspicion threshold stipulated in the Supervision Law.

The Supreme People's Court, the Supreme People's Procuratorate and the Ministry of Public Security have issued guidelines that prescribe minimum monetary thresholds for commencing investigations for certain financial crimes, including minimum thresholds for investigations of corporations.

The Criminal Procedure Law contains a general provision that investigative authorities should 'promptly examine the materials provided by a reporter, complainant or informant, or any voluntary confessions by any suspect'. After initial examination and preliminary investigation, if they consider there are facts indicating criminal liability, they should initiate a formal criminal investigation. The Criminal Procedure Law contains no other insight on the threshold of suspicion required to trigger a formal investigation.

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

Assuming that the investigating authority is properly authorised to issue the notice, it is unlikely that a person will have a valid ground to challenge a notice, given that the concept of privilege is not recognised under Chinese law. Challenges to procedural issues may be raised, but such issues can usually be resolved through government actions (e.g., issuance of an amended notice with proper authorisation). In addition, even if a person refuses to produce documents, the investigating authority has broad power to search and seize evidence during an investigation.

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

Whether an individual is granted any leniency or immunity for assisting with authorities is generally a matter left to the discretion of the authority. However, both the Law on Administrative Penalty and the Supervision Law (enacted in March 2018) contain provisions for more lenient penalties to be available when an individual has assisted or co-operated with authorities.

Article 27 of the Law on Administrative Penalty provides that lenient or reduced administrative punishments will be provided to those who have won credit in helping administrative organs investigate unlawful acts.

Similarly, Article 31 of the Supervision Law provides that the supervision organs may issue a recommendation for lenient punishment when a person actively co-operates with the authorities, takes active measures or otherwise renders significant assistance in cases involving matters of major national interest.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

Recent cases against corporations highlight corruption, fraud, product safety, tax evasion, money laundering and terrorism financing as the key areas of focus. As noted in question 1, there has been an increased focus on investigating potential economic crimes in certain sectors, such as the pharmaceutical, technology and the financial sectors.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

The Cybersecurity Law (CSL) is the key legislation regulating cybersecurity. It contains a set of cybersecurity obligations and requires the authorities to take action against companies and management in relation to cybersecurity-related failings. A key regime under the CSL is the Multi-Level Protection Scheme (MLPS). This requires each network operator to be assessed and designated a particular level of security obligations. The MLPS will be implemented through technical standards and a regulation that is currently being drafted by the Ministry of Public Security.

The penalties applicable in the case of a violation of the CSL include an order for rectification, warning, forfeiture of illegal income, fines, suspension of business, closure of website, withdrawal of operation permit or revocation of business licence. To date, most enforcement actions have focused on warnings and orders for rectification. However, with the MLPS regime being established, more enforcement actions are expected.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

Cybercrime is regulated under the Criminal Law of the People's Republic of China of 1979 (as amended in 1997) (the Criminal Law), which punishes:

- illegal invasion or control of computer systems (or providing programs or tools for such);
- destruction of computer systems causing serious consequences;

- refusal to discharge cybersecurity protection obligations despite administrative orders, resulting in serious consequences;
- using information networks to commit certain crimes, such as fraud and the sale of drugs; and
- abetting others in committing cyber-related crimes.

These crimes are punishable by fines and imprisonment for up to seven years. China's law enforcement authorities have been focusing on infringement of personal data and intellectual property, cyberfraud, cybergambling, cyberpornography and online exam cheating. Law enforcement authorities receive many requests for assistance in cybercrime investigations from international agencies, such as Interpol, and counterparts overseas.

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

In general, the Criminal Law applies when either the act or the consequence of a crime occurs within China. Individuals who commit a criminal act are subject to the Criminal Law if they are located in China, regardless of their nationality, and Chinese nationals who commit crimes outside China are subject to the Criminal Law provided the punishment is more than three years' imprisonment. The Criminal Law applies to companies organised under Chinese law, including joint ventures, representative offices of non-Chinese enterprises and wholly foreign-owned enterprises.

In late 2018, China passed an amendment to the Criminal Procedure Law to allow judgment to be delivered in corruption cases when the defendant is absent. The amendment is designed to tackle cases in which suspects escape justice by hiding overseas. The amendment allows prosecutors to proceed with a case if evidence against the suspect is ample and the crime is clear.

The bribery of foreign public officials by individuals and entities was criminalised in 2011 through an amendment to the Criminal Law. This has not been prosecuted in practice.

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

In practice, cross-border investigations involving conduct in China are typically triggered by the US authorities (the Department of Justice or the Securities and Exchange Commission). The principal challenge is how to deal with Chinese laws on issues such as data privacy, state secrets, trade secrets and the absence of privilege, while seeking to co-operate with US enforcement authorities. The movement of evidence from China is particularly problematic. The divergence in both procedural and substantive law in these areas means that what the US authorities expect from a corporate investigation, and what the corporate can do and provide within the purview of Chinese law, are often at odds. This in turn leads to tension between complying with Chinese law and demonstrating co-operation, which is necessary for leniency, deferred prosecution or a declination in the United States.

While challenges are most often encountered in the context of US cross-border investigations, similar tensions may be encountered in relation to other jurisdictions who may be investigating corporate conduct in China.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

Chinese law does not expressly recognise the concept of double jeopardy or anything similar, even for domestic criminal proceedings. In fact, under the Criminal Procedure Law, even if a case has been closed, it can be retried if there is new evidence suggesting that the facts relied on in the original judgment or sentencing were incorrect. In practice, it is not uncommon for a defendant to become a suspect again in respect of the same allegations after a court has delivered a not-guilty verdict.

China is also unlikely to recognise the double jeopardy concept in international criminal enforcement actions. Under the Criminal Law, a person may be investigated and prosecuted in China even if he or she has already been tried in a foreign country. However, those who have received criminal punishment overseas may be exempted from punishment or receive a mitigated penalty. However, we are not aware of informal negotiation or co-operation to afford corporate defendants relief in the face of enforcement actions in multiple jurisdictions.

There is no system analogous to the US 'anti-piling on' policy.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

We are not aware of any concluded global settlement involving China.

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

Decisions of foreign authorities may be influential for a number of reasons. They may draw the attention of the Chinese authorities to the matter. They may also serve to make the issue newsworthy and therefore exert political pressure on the Chinese authorities to escalate the matter themselves.

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

China does not have a comprehensive sanctions programme in the same way as other jurisdictions, such as the United States. Rather, the legal basis for its sanctions programme is found in a patchwork of laws and regulations. The Foreign Trade Law authorises China to take corresponding measures against any country or region in response to discriminatory measures. It also allows China to take action based on breaches of anti-monopoly or unfair competition laws. The Customs Law and the Regulations of the People's Republic of China on Import and Export Duties (through which China imposes customs duties) also form part of China's sanctions programme. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs issues circulars that serve as the legal basis for other organs at ministerial level to implement UN sanctions. Through the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, China also unilaterally threatens or imposes sanctions based on its foreign policy needs. For instance, in July 2019, China threatened to sanction US companies involved in selling arms to Taiwan.

China has released a draft of its Export Control Law, which seeks to bring China's export control system closer to other regimes. The draft Export Control Law introduces four categories of controlled items: dual-use goods; military items; nuclear items; and other goods, technologies, services and items that are related to national security. The draft Export Control Law also provides for the maintenance of a blacklist of foreign importers and end users that have been found to violate the law. According to the draft Export Control Law, China may adopt retaliatory measures against any country that imposes discriminatory export control measures against China.

On 1 June 2019, the Ministry of Commerce announced an Unreliable Entities List, which has been compared to the United States' Entity List. The Unreliable Entities List is understood to restrict the business of foreign companies in China that severely damage the legitimate interests of Chinese firms by not obeying market rules, violating contracts or blocking or cutting off their supply for non-commercial reasons. It is not known whether the Unreliable Entities List will be incorporated into the draft Export Control Law or whether it will continue as a stand-alone measure.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

China's approach to sanctions enforcement should be viewed in the context of its broader geopolitical status, particularly the ongoing trade war between the United States and China. Enforcement could increase in light of the draft Export Control Law and its possible incorporation of the Unreliable Entities List.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

Generally no, unless this would be mutually beneficial.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

No.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

Not applicable.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

Whistleblower reports (either internally to a compliance officer or colleague, or externally to a regulatory or enforcement agency) often trigger allegations of corporate misconduct. Internal audits may also identify misconduct. To a lesser extent, complaints by competitors, which may be channelled through media reports, can also cause allegations of misconduct to surface. Inspections by external bodies such as the SAMR or regulatory authorities may also flag issues.

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

China's data privacy regime has been evolving quickly, conferring broader rights on data subjects and imposing ever more regulation on companies operating in China. The CSL, which came into force in June 2017, attempts to harmonise China's data privacy laws. Prior to the CSL, data privacy rights had been arranged in a patchwork of legislation (including the Criminal Law, the Civil Law and the Tort Law), and in industry-specific regulations (e.g., the banking, healthcare and securities sectors).

The CSL's data protection provisions cover any data that is generated, collected or processed in China by network operators – this covers both domestic companies and MNCs. Data collection must comply with relevant laws and regulations and be for a legitimate and necessary purpose. Consent of the data subject to data processing is required. The Personal Information Security Standards, which came into effect in May 2018, provide the first general good practice guide on data protection, which may serve as a reference for both users and the authorities.

The Civil Law protects the privacy rights and personal data of individuals, who can bring a civil law claim against the infringer in court. An illegal breach of personal data privacy rights could, in serious cases, give rise to criminal prosecution and penalties, including imprisonment and a fine. A breach of the CSL may trigger administrative penalties, including a fine, suspension of the business, closure of a website and revocation of an operation permit or business licence.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

Investigations should always be conducted in compliance with applicable data privacy legislation (see question 60). In recent years, the Chinese authorities have taken an aggressive approach to data privacy violations in the context of internal investigations. For example, as part of an internal investigation, China Auto Logistics collected data about its employees, which the employees subsequently reported to the police. A number of executives of the company resigned following the investigation and the company announced that its securities would be delisted from the NASDAQ stock market in August 2018. Data privacy laws should therefore be borne in mind in the context of investigations and companies should handle relevant data with the utmost care when conducting or responding to an investigation.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

Interception of employees' communications by an employer is restricted and must be conducted in accordance with the law.

Interception by employers of employees' communications on employees' personal property is generally prohibited unless explicitly permitted by the employees. It is important for an employer to make clear to employees that they should not have work-related communications on their personal devices, to avoid potential risks of leaks of confidential work-related information.

Interception of employees' communications on employers' devices or systems is possible, subject to compliance with cybersecurity and data protection laws and regulations. Employees need to be made aware that communications on their employer's devices or systems could be intercepted by their employer. This is usually dealt with at the onboarding stage. Additionally, prior consent from employees should be obtained for the collection, review, search, holding, processing and transfer of information and communications on employer devices or systems for employment-related reasons.

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

Search warrants and dawn raids are a common feature of law enforcement in China. Pursuant to the Criminal Procedure Law, a search warrant issued by a chief prosecutor of a people's procuratorate or the head of a PSB is normally required before conducting a search in a criminal investigation. However, in emergency situations, including when the person under investigation may conceal, destroy or transfer evidence of a crime, a search may be conducted without a search warrant.

The Supervision Law empowers the NSC to conduct broad searches and seizure with a warrant. The Criminal Law authorises investigators from people's procuratorates and PSBs to conduct wide searches and to seize property and documents found during a search to prove a crime. Other authorities (e.g., the SAMR and antitrust law enforcement authorities) may also conduct searches within the scope of their competence and functions.

Chinese law imposes few limitations on authorities executing search warrants other than the requirement that the search should be witnessed and recorded. Corporations subject to investigation may challenge the authorities' decisions or action during a search (e.g., restriction of personal freedom, sealing up, seizing or freezing of property) before the courts.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

Privilege in the common law sense is not recognised under Chinese law. Authorities therefore have wide powers to seize documents and, in practice, may demand documents that would be protected from disclosure in other jurisdictions. There is no right to resist the disclosure of legal advice or other categories of evidence.

While lawyers owe their clients a duty of confidentiality, this does not assist if documents are sought directly from a client or a third party rather than the lawyer. Moreover, under the Lawyer's Law of the People's Republic of China, this duty of confidentiality does not apply to communications aimed at or involving criminal acts causing harm to state security, public security or persons and property. Additionally, this duty may be overridden in the context of investigations. The authorities have a general power to collect or obtain evidence from relevant entities and individuals concerned with a case pursuant to a search warrant or court order.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

There is no right to privilege over documents (see question 26). Article 52 of the Criminal Procedure Law explicitly prohibits a suspect from being compelled to give evidence to prove his or her own guilt. This protection was introduced in 2012. It is ambiguous as Article 52 only limits the measures interrogators can use to force interviewees to talk. They still have an obligation under the Criminal Procedure Law to answer truthfully all relevant questions put to them. Owing to its imprecise scope and an apparent continued enforcement of the previous law, which afforded no such protection, this right is likely to be of limited use in practice.

Whistleblowing and employee rights

Under the Provisions of the People's Procuratorates on Reporting of Crimes 2009 (strengthened in 2014), whistleblowers who report crimes to the enforcement authorities are entitled to protection, anonymity and a right of appeal in the face of refusals to investigate. There is also a reward mechanism for whistleblowers who report crimes to people's procuratorates, and various other financial reward schemes are scattered in sector-specific regulations. The Criminal Procedure Law also contains several measures that protect the personal safety of witnesses giving evidence in legal proceedings and their families, including keeping personal information about witnesses confidential, and adopting protective measures so that the witnesses' appearance or voices are not made public.

An employee who is dismissed for whistleblowing would need to commence an action for wrongful dismissal against the employer, claiming either reinstatement or compensation. Retaliation by employers against whistleblowers in certain circumstances may constitute offences under the Criminal Law and Chinese labour laws. In such cases, the employee should report the matter to the people's procuratorate and the labour authority, as applicable.

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

Chinese labour laws are generally employee-friendly. In the course of an internal investigation, an employee must continue to be paid in accordance with his or her contract (salary and position are key terms that may only be altered with the mutual consent of the employer and the employee).

During an internal investigation, an employee may submit a dispute to the Labour Dispute Arbitration Commission for resolution. If the employee does not accept the arbitral award, the employee may generally institute court proceedings.

Officers and directors enjoy the same rights as employees. However, the employer may sue officers and directors in a civil action for breach of fiduciary duty separate from an employment claim. However, the employer cannot be compensated twice for the same damage.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

If an employee is subject to a criminal investigation by a prosecutor of a people's procuratorate, the employer may suspend the employment contract. If the employee is not convicted of a crime, he or she may ask for state compensation for lost salary and may request reinstatement. If the employee is convicted and sentenced for a crime, the employer may unilaterally terminate the employment on the sentencing date.

In general, as long as an employee continues to be paid his or her basic salary, the company can suspend the employee pending an investigation. As regards dismissal for refusing to participate in an internal investigation, an employee's contract cannot be terminated at will. An employer must have permissible legal grounds, such as a serious violation of company policy by the employee, or if his or her misconduct has caused material damage to the company.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

Generally, if an employee refuses to participate in an internal investigation, this is not of itself a sufficient ground for summary dismissal. In practice, terminations are generally agreed privately on the basis of a payment to the employee. Liability for wrongful dismissal is twice the statutory severance.

Commencing an internal investigation

32 Is it common practice in your country to prepare a document setting out terms of reference or investigatory scope before commencing an internal investigation? What issues would it cover?

This is likely to depend on the nature of the company. While investigations are not unusual, the management of a Chinese company is unlikely to conduct its investigation in such a structured fashion. Being a domestic company, management and the company's lawyers are also likely to be less concerned about issues such as protecting privilege or procedures for transferring data and state secrets overseas. Such matters are likely to be of far less relevance. If, on the other hand, the company is an MNC, the China branch or its lawyers will generally prepare a document setting out the scope of the investigation, which is likely to include such issues.

The scope of any investigation plan will depend on the type and complexity of the issues being investigated, the level of detail needed to brief members of the board or management about the investigation, and the preferences of the company and professionals running the investigation. Generally, it will address who comprises the investigation team, the external lawyers or third-party experts (if any), and the objectives and scope of the investigation. The latter would cover who needs to be interviewed and the document types and date ranges to be searched (addressing privilege and dealing with state secrets and data transfers as appropriate).

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

China's culture is largely a collective, hierarchical one and it is likely that those within the company will report up internally. However, reporting externally is a different matter.

As part of the company's internal investigation, any duty to report the matter to law enforcement authorities or regulators (in the case of a regulated entity, see below) should be kept under review.

There is a general duty on individuals and entities under the Criminal Procedure Law to report suspected crimes to the PSB, the people's procuratorate or the court; however, there is no specific penalty for a failure to do so. Therefore, the provision lacks teeth and the obligation does not tend to be observed in practice.

If the company is a regulated entity, for example a financial institution, trading house, insurer or food and drug company, notification requirements are very likely to apply. If it is a domestic, non-regulated entity, it is not common practice that the company will report the issue externally.

In respect of MNCs operating in China, there may be more structured processes in place for reporting internally, as well as an awareness and culture of reporting externally. This may also be influenced by the approach of the lawyers representing the entity.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

Under Article 54 of the Criminal Procedure Law, an investigating authority may request evidence from relevant entities or individuals. In practice, evidence collection might be accomplished by broad document seizure authorised under a seizure permit. However, it is also possible for an enforcement authority to issue notices for the provision of certain documents or data (especially when the person receiving the notice is not the direct target of the criminal investigation).

There are no strict rules regarding the preservation of documents or electronic data, or the issuing of litigation holds. However, intentional destruction or tampering with evidence is prohibited. Given that a domestic enforcement action could easily attract the attention of enforcement authorities in other countries, it is preferable that a proper litigation hold notification is issued and implemented.

The government is unlikely to allow the entity being investigated to propose its own custodians or search terms. Instead, it might ask the defendant to freeze all electronic data on the system and then conduct its own review of the data collected.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

Privately owned companies and unlisted SOEs are generally not required to make public the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority.

Under applicable securities laws, issuers and listed companies (including relevant SOEs) must observe their respective information disclosure obligations pursuant to applicable laws. Major investigations and litigation are generally required to be disclosed in annual and interim reports of listed companies. In addition, listed companies must generally immediately disclose any major event that may have a significant effect on the trading price of its securities.

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

Internal corporate investigations, particularly SOE audits, are common in China. What is quite unusual is self-reporting to local enforcement bodies on the back of an internal investigation. Usually, internal investigations identify remediation steps that are actioned by the company and this concludes the matter. The notion of self-reporting does not generally arise unless it is in the context of foreign enforcement bodies, and parallel reporting to Chinese law enforcement may then be considered. See questions 51 and 52.

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

No. However, if the conduct in question is, or is likely to be, investigated in a common law jurisdiction, the company and its lawyers should conduct themselves in such a way as to maximise privilege.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

No concept of attorney–client privilege exists in China (see question 37). A lawyer owes a duty of confidentiality to his or her client, but this is not akin to legal privilege in the common law sense. In any event, this duty of confidentiality does not apply to communications aimed at or involving criminal acts causing harm to state security, public security or persons and property. This is widely interpreted, rendering the scope of confidentiality protection limited in practice.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

No concept of attorney–client privilege exists in China.

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

No concept of attorney–client privilege exists in China.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

No concept of attorney–client privilege exists in China.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

No concept of attorney–client privilege exists in China.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

No concept of attorney–client privilege exists in China.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

No concept of attorney–client privilege exists in China.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

No concept of attorney–client privilege exists in China.

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

Yes, this is common practice.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

No concept of attorney–client privilege exists in China.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

There are no strict rules in China relating to the conduct of interviews (such as the requirement to give an Upjohn warning). However, the interviewer could be criticised for not explaining the situation and being transparent (e.g., if the investigation is likely to involve contentious labour law issues). Therefore, from a practical perspective, it is advisable to give something similar to an Upjohn warning.

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

Interviews will usually be conducted at the company's offices, with in-house counsel and external lawyers present. The interview usually involves a chronology covering employment history, the alleged events and the employee's recollections of the events. Assuming they are available, documents will be shown to the employee.

In general, the question of the employee's legal representation will turn on whether the investigation relates to an MNC or a domestic company. An MNC is likely to allow employees to have their own representation, from cultural and risk perspectives (potential exposure in another jurisdiction would militate in favour of allowing separate legal representation for the employee).

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

Yes, see question 33. Under the Criminal Procedure Law, crimes should be reported, but this is not commonly observed in practice. Reporting of misconduct to regulators and to law enforcement authorities, as appropriate, will be mandatory in most regulated sectors in China.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

Self-reporting in China is often regarded as a confession; indeed, the terms are regularly used interchangeably in a way they are not in the West. The assessment of whether to self-report is generally driven by the risk that a third party may disclose the matter to the authorities. Usually, the risk of an individual disclosing the matter to Chinese law enforcement authorities is lower than in the West.

In practice, and where the matter raises potential liability overseas, a report is usually made to the relevant law enforcement authority in that jurisdiction before anything similar is done in China (e.g., for the purposes of leniency or co-operation credit). Disclosure to foreign law enforcement authorities generally raises the concern that the matter will become public. This in turn may prompt disclosure by the company to the Chinese authorities. Self-reporting is viewed by the Chinese authorities as being highly unusual.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

Self-reporting can be challenging in practice. Finding the right person to report to and documenting the report (e.g., for mitigation purposes) is not straightforward. Law enforcement officials may approach the concept of self-reporting with some doubt (see question 51), and may in turn be reluctant to sign documents or officiate the process. Moreover, it is very unusual in China to involve external lawyers when dealing with regulatory or criminal authorities before charges are laid, partly for reasons of face.

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

It is possible to enter into a dialogue with the investigating authority to clarify the scope of evidence sought, or even to further limit the evidence. This dialogue can be conducted through formal or informal channels, with or without lawyers. However, the investigating authority may choose not to accommodate any such request.

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

A person or company subject to investigation may bring administrative proceedings against an authority's decision or actions. Pending litigation, the authority's action (e.g., seizing or freezing property) is not usually suspended. In exceptional cases, where non-suspension would result in irretrievable damage or if the relevant administrative authority deems it necessary to suspend the action, the court may, upon request, order suspension of the alleged action. The amended Administrative Procedure Law lowered the threshold for bringing an administrative proceeding. However, from a practical perspective, the courts may lack sufficient muscle to deliver judgments without interference from government departments.

Aside from recourse before the courts, an individual may file a petition or complaint to PSBs and people's procuratorates against the unlawful exercise of certain powers in an investigation. These do not tend to be rigorously reviewed. In addition, Article 60 of the Supervision Law provides for certain acts of the NSC to be forwarded to a supervisory body for review within a month. It is too early to say whether and how challenges to the NSC's investigative powers will be addressed.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

The Chinese authorities are unlikely to limit the scope of their review in consideration of foreign laws. Indeed, since China does not recognise the concept of privilege, the potential scope of disclosure to the Chinese authorities is far broader than under a notice issued by the authorities of common law countries (see questions 26 and 27).

The company should seek to comply with each notice, ring-fencing and curtailing disclosure pursuant to applicable laws by asserting legal rights. Issues may arise in China in relation to the transfer of personal data, state secrets and trade secrets overseas. Any appraisal of notices received from another country should ensure that any data and documents are only transferred out of the country in accordance with the limited exceptions provided under Chinese law.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

In practice, when a search is conducted and the information sought is located overseas, Chinese authorities have not generally expected companies to search outside mainland China and its Hong Kong and Macao special administrative regions (SARs). The authors are aware of a limited number of circumstances in which material on servers in Singapore has been sought and provided, but this is rare.

Technically, while investigating authorities may seek to impose such a requirement, they may not generally directly search and seize data overseas. Treaties on mutual legal assistance in criminal matters have been signed by China with 61 jurisdictions but these are of limited practical assistance in requiring a company to produce documents located overseas. In practice, the investigating authority might use other means (e.g., an administrative penalty) to seek to force a company to comply if the data located overseas is regarded as highly important.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

The scope of assistance under bilateral legal assistance agreements includes mutual assistance in taking evidence, executing search and seizure warrants, and producing documents. In this regard, people's procuratorates and PSBs do conduct inquiries into corruption-related matters in response to requests from overseas law enforcement organisations and judicial authorities, or vice versa. Most bilateral agreements on legal assistance contain provisions for tracing, restraining, confiscating, sharing or repatriating the proceeds of crime.

Currently, China's authorities co-operate with SAR enforcement authorities (Hong Kong's Independent Commission Against Corruption and the Macao Public Prosecution Office) in tackling cross-border corruption mainly through a mutual case assistance scheme and practice between the enforcement authorities on the mainland and in the Hong Kong and Macao SARs. In addition, the Supervision Law expressly encourages international co-operation and states that the NSC will coordinate anti-corruption co-operation with relevant countries, regions and international organisations and implement anti-corruption international treaties.

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

People's procuratorates or PSB investigators must keep the following information confidential: the identity of the person who makes the complaint; the identity of any suspects; the identity of any witnesses; and any state secrets, trade secrets and matters of personal privacy or personal information. These provisions are intended to contain dissemination of information to third parties. The Supervision Law expressly requires the NSC to keep state secrets, trade secrets and personal privacy confidential. Given the NSC's power to involve other authorities in its investigations, sharing other information with third parties should be expected.

In general terms, an investigation should be kept confidential. By disclosing matters about an investigation to a third party, a person may fall foul of Article 50 of the Law on Penalties for Administration of Public Security. This Article punishes those who obstruct a functionary of a state organ (which includes the various investigating bodies) from performing their duties.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

It is not typical for Chinese law enforcement authorities to request documents located overseas from a Chinese company (see question 56). If they do, and to comply would violate the laws of the other country, this should be explained. The Chinese authorities will generally respect this. Though this should not be necessary, the company could seek a legal opinion setting out how disclosure would violate such laws.

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

At the end of 2018, China enacted a law governing how assistance is provided to foreign authorities and other bodies in criminal investigations. The International Criminal Judicial Assistance Law may serve as a blocking statute and restrict cross-border discovery of evidence. Institutions, organisations and individuals within China may not provide assistance to foreign countries without the consent of a competent authority, who may refuse on several grounds. In addition, the CSL attempts to harmonise rules on cross-border transfers of personal data. Draft regulations issued under the CSL indicate that personal and other important data can only be transferred offshore subject to a security assessment by the government authority. The government is currently drafting measures setting out the scope of security assessments. Since the CSL has significant implications for Chinese companies and MNCs operating in China, the new rules should be kept under review.

A related point concerns state secrets in the context of foreign notices or subpoenas. State secrets are defined very broadly. Therefore, the content of documents may be classified as a state secret under Chinese national security legislation. There is a risk that an investigation of Chinese documents may implicate state secret issues. This will also affect the ability to transfer such documents overseas in response to a notice or subpoena.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

Disclosure to the Chinese authorities is generally compelled in an investigation. While a producing party can assert that confidentiality attaches to the investigation conducted by the Chinese authority, whether that assertion will create an effective shield from disclosure will depend on the relevant Chinese and foreign laws. For example, pursuant to Chinese law, documents containing state secrets should not be disclosed to a third party.

Confidentiality requirements in China are very general and are unlikely to prevent the sharing of documents provided that disclosure is within the purview of Chinese law. Once documents have been shared with law enforcement authorities, a company cannot guarantee that they will not be shared with third parties. It is important for the company to assert its legal rights pursuant to the laws of the relevant jurisdictions so as to limit contagion issues.

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

A corporate entity found guilty of misconduct will generally be sanctioned by a fine and confiscation of assets. The personnel in charge of the company and other personnel responsible for the crime may also face criminal liability (imprisonment, fines and confiscation of assets). In addition, individuals who have been convicted of corruption or bribery offences may also be disqualified from being directors or in senior management for five years.

As regards bribery offences, the April 2016 Judicial Interpretation to the Criminal Law introduced monetary thresholds for sentencing linked to the severity of the offence. For those in the private sector, individuals can be sentenced to up to 10 years for an offence of giving or offering a bribe and (technically) up to 15 years for receiving a bribe. Corporates committing bribery offences are liable on conviction to fines ranging from 100,000 yuan to twice the amount of the bribe.

For civil bribery offences under the AUCL, a corporate entity and its officers and employees may face administrative fines up to 3 million yuan, revocation of business licences and confiscation of illegal gains.

The Supervision Law expressly empowers the NSC to confiscate, recover or order restitution of ill-gotten gains. It should transfer such assets to the people's procuratorate to then prosecute in the usual way.

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

Government procurement is conducted by local government under the general guidelines set out in the Government Procurement Law. Serious illegal conduct (i.e., any conduct that results in criminal liability, revocation of business licence or large civil fines) within the previous three years should disqualify an entity from participating in government procurement under Article 22 of the Government Procurement Law. In addition, misconduct during government procurement (e.g., corrupt acts that result in a fine ranging from 0.5 per cent to 1 per cent of the procurement value) will also disqualify an entity from participating in future government procurement for a period of one to three years under Article 77 of the Government Procurement Law. Although there is no national registry of qualified government contractors, the government has maintained a publicly available list of suppliers subject to the debarment under Article 77 of the Government Procurement Law, and information regarding serious illegal conduct under Article 22 is generally accessible via company searches on relevant Chinese authorities' websites.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

Under the Criminal Law, the Chinese courts should take into account factors including the nature of the crime, circumstances relating to the criminal conduct and the damage caused to society. Circumstances relating to the criminal conduct include aggregating or mitigating factors, such as whether it is a first or repeat offence, or self-reporting. Additionally, the courts may exercise discretion in considering other circumstances, such as motive, the surrounding circumstances and whether there was any confession.

Regarding criminal bribery offences, both the ninth amendment to the Criminal Law (November 2015) and the April 2016 Judicial Interpretation provide clarification on the effects of self-reporting and co-operation. Generally, if the crimes are relatively minor or the offender has 'played a key role in investigating or solving a major case', self-reporting may mitigate or even exempt the offender from liability. Otherwise, offenders who self-report should be entitled to lenient treatment, but cannot expect to be exempted from liability. The Supervision Law also proposes leniency when a person surrenders or voluntarily confesses, actively co-operates with the authorities, takes active measures to disgorge ill-gotten gains or otherwise renders significant assistance in cases involving major national interests.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

No such settlement scheme exists in China.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

No such settlement scheme exists in China.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

No settlement scheme exists under Chinese law.

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

It is not typical for Chinese law enforcement authorities to use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

Yes. However, this is rarely encountered given the domestic litigation environment, and the documents and files of the authorities would not be made available for a civil action. Also, authorities cannot share information classified as a state secret under the Chinese national security legislation. Procedurally, there are no class actions, derivative actions or analogous procedures to deal with broader issues of corporate fraud.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

At the investigatory stage, a confidentiality requirement is imposed through a general provision in the Criminal Procedure Law. By disclosing confidential matters about an investigation, a person may fall foul of Article 50 of the Law on Penalties for Administration of Public Security. See questions 27 and 58.

Once a case is before a court, the trial should technically be conducted with full public access unless state secrets, trade secrets or issues attracting privacy rights are implicated. Judges often take a very conservative approach, and access to the court by journalists and the general public is limited in practice. Although there is no general restriction on publicising a case during the trial process, this is rare in practice and parties to litigation are generally advised not to make public statements during trials.

Chinese media outlets are controlled by the state, for the most part. As such, investigations and trials involving SOEs, or broader public industry issues, are not fully reported in China (in contrast to overseas or Hong Kong media). On the other hand, the major private sector criminal investigation into GSK was reported in both China and overseas.

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

The way in which corporate communications are managed will depend on the nature of the company (e.g., is it an SOE, a privately owned Chinese company, a listed company or an MNC with operations in China?). For the most part, it would be unusual for a public relations firm to be retained. However, this has occasionally been seen in high-profile matters involving MNCs or large multi-jurisdictional investigations involving the US authorities.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

Related proceedings may be in the public domain and therefore could attract more publicity. Generally, statements to the press about ongoing litigation should be limited, and contagion issues should be managed carefully throughout. Leaks to the press are not advisable; the parties should focus on the issues within the public court arena.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

There is generally no such mandatory disclosure requirement under corporate laws.

Under the PRC Security Law and related regulations, publicly listed companies are required to issue a market announcement of any major events that may materially affect the trading price of their shares. Although not specifically stated, settlement of criminal proceedings could constitute a major event, provided this materially affects the share price.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

There have been a number of changes recently that are designed to address both corporate and public misconduct. These include amendments to the AUCL and the introduction of both the Supervision Law and the International Criminal Judicial Assistance Law. There have also been administrative and structural changes to the enforcement of key legislation in this area, including the introduction of the NSC and the SAMR. The SAMR administers the AUCL and other antitrust legislation.

We anticipate that the focus of regulators and authorities will now shift to enforcement under these new laws, rather than further amendments. In fact, we have already seen a significant number of investigations commenced by these bodies.

That said, the recent focus on investigations in specific sectors may result in changes to the regulations or the publication of additional guidance to allow authorities to more closely monitor and regulate the activities in the pharmaceutical or technology space.

General context, key principles and hot topics

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

The highest-profile corporate investigations in Colombia are those regarding corruption in public contracts, and concessions in sectors such as infrastructure, health and public functions.

Criminal and administrative investigations that gain the highest profile are those related to illegal awards of public contracts, collusion and bribery to obtain public contracts and concessions, and breach of contract to the detriment of public finances and goods.

Odebrecht is currently the highest-profile investigation in Colombia, because of the amounts of money involved; the company has acknowledged paying US$11 million in bribes to government officials between 2009 and 2014 and US$6.5 million in relation to the contract for the Ruta del Sol 2 toll road concession.

As part of the criminal investigations, several other people, including a vice minister, a senator and the former president of Corficolombiana, have been sentenced for their involvement in the Odebrecht corruption case.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

One of the principles of Colombia's criminal law is societas delinquere non potest, whereby corporations cannot be held criminally liable. Nevertheless, it is possible for a corporation to be civilly liable in a criminal matter when the conduct of its employees or directors is related to their work or activities within the corporation, such as corruption (Colombian Criminal Procedure Code and Law 600, 2000). The Attorney General's Office enforces the sanctions and judges rule on the cases.

1 Pamela Alarcón is a partner at Philippi Prietocarrizosa Ferrero Du & Uría.

In terms of administrative liability concerning corrupt conduct, two principal authorities are in charge of imposing sanctions on corporations:

- The Superintendence of Companies imposes administrative sanctions on companies for transnational corruption conduct, under Law 1778, 2016. Additionally, when a sentence is executed against a legal representative or an administrator of a company located in Colombia or a branch of a foreign company, the Superintendence of Companies could impose a fine on the corporation of up to 200,000 times the minimum monthly wage.
- Antitrust practices such as collusion could also be liable to administrative sanctions on corporations as enforced by the Superintendence of Industry and Commerce (Law 256, 1996; Decree 2153, 1992; Law 1340, 2009).

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

Administrative sanctions relating to transnational bribery are enforced by the Superintendence of Companies under Law 1778, 2016.

Other administrative sanctions linked with corrupt practices against free competition are enforced by the Superintendence of Industry and Commerce (Law 256, 1996; Decree 2153, 1992; Law 1340, 2009).

Civil sanctions relating to criminal activities are enforced by the Attorney General's Office, under the Criminal Procedure Code and Law 600, 2000.

Jurisdiction between the authorities is allocated depending on whether the case is civil, administrative or criminal. However, different authorities can pursue a corporation at the same time for the same conduct in the event that there has been an infringement of different laws or regulations.

Authorities may have internal policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations; nevertheless, procedures are established in the laws, decrees and circulars.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

The Attorney General's Office is obliged by law to initiate an investigation following a criminal complaint or receipt of information relating to a criminal complaint. There is no need to corroborate the information before the initiation of an investigation. However, prosecutors have the duty to verify the information and gather new evidence before the indictment.

In the same way, administrative authorities, such as superintendencies, have a broad discretion to initiate investigations.

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

Under Colombia's legal framework, natural and legal persons are encouraged to co-operate with the authorities. However, the lawfulness of a notice or subpoena may be challenged in any case with a constitutional action, such as a writ for protection of fundamental rights (amparo).

Depending on the law enforcement authority and the jurisdiction, and when the procedures permit it, ancillary claims or appeals against a subpoena or notice can be made before a fundamental guarantees judge.

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

Depending on the jurisdiction, co-operative agreements can be made with different authorities.

For some criminal matters, prosecutors may apply the principle of discretionary prosecution principle (Article 324, Criminal Code) or reach a settlement with natural persons who assist or co-operate with authorities.

Under Decree 1523, 2015, companies and natural persons involved in a business cartel may denounce its existence, confess their participation and provide evidence that will allow the authorities to sanction the other participants, and thus obtain total or partial leniency of a fine imposed by the Superintendence of Industry and Commerce for an infringement of free competition.

Additionally, Article 7 of Law 1778, 2016 establishes that sanctions for transnational bribery could be adjusted in consideration of criteria such as collaboration, acknowledgement or express acceptance of an offence.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

The top priorities for Colombia's law enforcement authorities are currently illegal drug trafficking, money laundering, financing of terrorism, corruption and antitrust practices.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

Guidance on cybersecurity is established by the National Council of Economic and Social Policy (CONPES). Two strategy documents – CONPES 3701, 2011 and 3854, 2016 – set forth national cybersecurity policy guidelines with the aim of developing a national strategy to counteract the increase in computer threats that significantly affect the country. In this frame of reference, cybersecurity is defined as the capacity of the state to minimise the level of risk to its citizens and the degree to which they may be affected by cybernetic threats or incidents.

There is a broad national legal framework for cybersecurity relating to data protection, cybercrime and e-commerce, among others.

There are different guidelines for corporations regarding cybersecurity. For example, the Ministry of Information and Communications Technology – which is in charge of promoting the access, effective use and mass appropriation of information and communications technology – has issued guidance regarding the security and privacy of information, and for the assessment of digital security risk Assessment.

Finally, enforcement action in relation to companies' preparedness for and response to data breaches is taken by the Superintendence of Industry and Commerce. The majority of such incidents relate to data breach protection. However, when breaches become felonies, criminal investigations may be initiated by the Attorney General's Office.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

With Law 1273, 2009, Colombia has included in the Criminal Code more than 10 crimes relating to cybercrime. Under Law 1928, 2018, Colombia adopted the Budapest Convention on Cybercrime.

Special units have been created within the national police service and in the Attorney General's Office to enforce cybercrime prevention and investigations.

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

Colombian criminal law has extraterritorial effect in six situations, as set out in Article 16 of the Colombian Criminal Code:

- if a person carries out any of the following acts in a foreign country:
  - crimes against the security of the Colombian state;
  - crimes against the constitutional system;
  - crimes against economic policy (excluding money laundering crimes);
  - crimes against public administration;
  - counterfeiting Colombian currency; or
  - financing terrorism;
- if a person working for the Colombian state is covered by international law immunity and perpetrates a crime in a foreign state;
- when a person working for the Colombian government is not covered by international law immunity but commits a crime other than those listed above, provided the perpetrator has not been convicted of that crime in the foreign country;
- if a Colombian person, except in relation to the aforementioned felonies, is in Colombian territory after committing a crime abroad, and when the sanction under Colombian criminal law is imprisonment of no less than two years, provided the perpetrator has not been convicted of that crime in the foreign country;
- if a foreigner (other than a person described above) is in a Colombian territory after committing a crime abroad that affects the Colombian state or a Colombian national, and when sanction under Colombian criminal law is imprisonment of no less than two years, provided the perpetrator has not been convicted of the crime abroad;
- if a foreign person perpetrates a crime abroad against another foreigner. Nevertheless, the crime must comply with the following conditions:
  - the offender must be in a Colombian territory;
  - Colombian criminal law sanctions the crime with imprisonment of no less than three years;
  - the crime is not political; and
  - extradition has not been granted.

Besides the aforementioned legislation, Colombian criminal law has extraterritorial effect for prosecuting cross-border bribery of a foreign public official in international transactions. This is regulated in Article 433 of the Colombian Criminal Code. (Note that Colombian criminal law only pursues individuals, not corporations.)

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

The principal challenges that arise in cross-border investigations in Colombia are to:

- accomplish a constant and effective communication between the two countries' authorities that are in charge of the legal investigation and prosecution of the crimes;
- ensure that each country's authorities fully exchange useful information pertaining to criminal investigations;
- ensure effective co-operation between the countries involved, to carry out the legal investigation and prosecution of the felonies;
- identify (in the event that the countries with different laws regarding the same event) which legal framework is applicable;
- ensure that the legal authorities in the countries involved in cross-border investigations apply any precautionary measures requested by other states; and
- ensure that the legal authorities of the countries involved in cross-border investigations pursue assets relating to foreign felonies requested by other states.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

Double jeopardy is established in Article 8 of the Colombian Criminal Code, specified as a prohibition of double criminality, in that no person can be charged more than once for the same criminal conduct, regardless of the name given to the conduct in other countries (provided that the core set of facts are the same).

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

Global settlements are not legally binding nor are they common; however, Colombia has signed international treaties and co-operation agreements with various countries, including Peru, Brazil and Spain, for mutual assistance in pursuing certain crimes, such as cross-border bribery and corruption.

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

According to the Colombian legal system in criminal matters, the decisions issued by a foreign authority abroad shall be legally binding for all judicial proposes. Therefore, the notion of prohibition of double criminality or double jeopardy, would also apply in this case.

However, this rule does not apply to decisions made abroad in connection with the following situations:

- when a Colombian national commits a crime abroad on a state-owned or state-operated ship or aircraft;
- when a person commits any of the following felonies in a foreign country:
  - crimes against the security of the Colombian state;
  - crimes against the constitutional system;
  - crimes against the economic policy (excluding money laundering);
  - crimes against public administration; or
  - counterfeiting Colombian currency; or
- if a person working for the Colombian state, who is covered by international law immunity, perpetrates the crime abroad.

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

In an administrative case that falls under its jurisdiction, the Superintendence of Companies an impose the following administrative sanctions on a corporation for transnational corruption conduct (Law 1778, 2016): (1) disqualification from contracting with the Colombian government for up to 20 years; (2) a fine of up to 200,000 times the statutory monthly minimum wage; (3) publication in national newspapers, and on the website of the sanctioned legal entity, of an excerpt from the sanctioning administrative decision, for up to one year; (4) disqualification from receiving any type of incentive or subsidy from the government for five years.

Since Colombia does not have criminal liability for corporations, the sanctions on natural persons in a case of bribery could be imprisonment, a fine of between 66.66 and 150 times the statutory monthly minimum wage, or disqualification from contracting with the Colombian government for up to 20 years.

However, the disqualification from contracting with the Colombian government will extend to the corporation, its parent, its subordinates and the branches of foreign companies, with the exception of limited companies, if (1) the actions of the natural person involved in corruption crimes relate to the corporation's activities and (2) if a convicted person is an administrator, legal representative, member of the board of directors, or controlling partner or shareholder of the company.

Currently, numerous corruption investigations are being carrying out by different authorities; nevertheless, until now, only the Superintendence of Companies has imposed a significant fine on a corporation (4.6 billion Colombian pesos) in the framework of an agreement.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

Since Law 1778, 2016 came into force, there has been an increase in enforcement activity relating to corruption investigations involving corporations and individuals; nonetheless, most of them are still under investigation, and therefore no sanctions have yet been applied.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

Law 1573, 2012 promotes co-operation between the Colombian authorities and their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement of anti-corruption legislation. The Criminal Procedure Code and statutes such as Law 1778, 2016 also allow for international co-operation in investigations.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

Colombia has not enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries. However, Colombia is a party to the United Nations Security Council Consolidated List of sanctions and it is common practice for reference to be made to the sanctions list compiled by the Office of Foreign Assets Control of the US Department of the Treasury.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

Not applicable.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

Allegations of misconduct in Colombia most often come to light by means of media reports and criminal complaints. It has become more common that former employees of companies file complaints against it; therefore, whistleblowers are also relevant in allegations of misconduct. Note that collaboration agreements for whistleblowers are being vigorously enforced by the authorities.

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

Individuals in Colombia have the constitutional right to be aware of, update and rectify the information about them in databases. This constitutional right is implemented by specific legislation on personal data protection and privacy – primarily by Law 1581, 2012, Decree 1377, 2013, Decree 1074, 2015 and certain additional implementing regulations.

There is also a separate specific regulation, primarily contained in Law 1266, 2008, that regulates the collection, use and transfer of financial information (i.e., credit, risk and banking information).

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

The data protection regime is enforced by the Superintendence of Industry and Trade (hereinafter SIC), which has the power to initiate administrative investigations, ex officio or at the request of an interested third party. The SIC is active in its enforcement of the data protection regime, but the likelihood of an enforcement action will ultimately depend on the type of irregularity or infraction, and how it is brought to the SIC's attention. For any kind of violation of Colombian data protection regulations, the SIC may:

- impose sanctions (e.g., fines of up to 1.475 billion pesos, temporary suspension or cancellation of activities related to data processing); or
- order preventive measures (e.g., issue instructions to protect personal data).

The SIC may also co-operate with international data protection authorities when a foreign legal entity is violating the data protection rights of individuals located in Colombia.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

Under Colombian data protection regulations, any type of processing of personal data requires prior and informed consent. Moreover, personal data must be collected for specified, explicit and legitimate purposes. Thus, save for certain exceptions (e.g., public data, or information required by a government entity or in connection with judicial proceedings, among others), personal data may only be processed with prior consent and for the specific purposes for which it was collected.

Additionally, even in an internal investigation, individuals must be afforded all the rights granted by data protection laws.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

The interception of employees' communications may be legal as part of an internal audit or investigation. Nevertheless, the scope of that interception must remain restricted to corporate emails and other correspondence relating to company matters. Investigation of any other communications will be illegal without prior authorisation by a judge.

Dawn raids and search warrants

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

Yes. According to Articles 219 to 232 and 237 of the Criminal Procedure Code (Law 906, 2004), the following legal limitations apply to any authority executing a search warrant or a dawn raid:

- a written order from the prosecutor must exist, unless:
  - the owner or the holder of the property agrees with the authorities that the written order is not necessary;
  - the property is an open field, abandoned or in full public view; or
  - there is an emergency;
- the written order must be limited to a specific area of the property;
- the purpose of the written order is to gather evidence or to capture the possible liable person;
- a probable cause shall exist relating to the existence of evidence or that the possible liable person is inside the property; and
- a judge must study the dawn raid procedure within 24 hours after the competent authority has submitted its activity report, and confirm whether Colombian law has been respected.

If the above conditions are not met, the authority cannot admit any of the evidence that has been collected, and if a person has been captured, the authority must free him or her.

Furthermore, although there is no automatic redress, if the limitations are not observed, there may be legal consequences for the authority, such as for prevarication.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

During a dawn raid, a company or natural person can ask the authority in charge directly not to seize privileged material. If the authority nevertheless seizes this kind of material, the company or natural person can note this irregular situation in the dawn raids record.

Furthermore, the company or natural person whose privileged material has been seized can ask for a hearing to be held, at which a judge will study the specifics of the case and determine whether the material could be seized or not.

The authority must exclude from the investigation and process all privileged material that could be seized unlawfully.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

The general rule for an individual's testimony to be compelled is that anyone with knowledge about relevant facts that are investigated by the authority has the duty to testify. The person testifying must refer only to the truth, or otherwise be at risk of committing perjury. The principal exceptions to this duty are the privilege of professional secrecy and the right against self-incrimination or incriminating a relative.

Whistleblowing and employee rights

28 Describe the whistleblowing framework in your country. What financial incentive schemes exist for whistleblowers? What legal protections are in place for whistleblowers?

In view of Colombia's history of civil war and the fight against illegal drugs and terrorism, there is a broad protection programme for informers, victims and public officials, mostly in connection with investigations relating to terrorism, illegal drugs, sexual harassment and violence. Nevertheless, in high-profile corruption cases too, whistleblowers may request protection.

The programme is under control of the Attorney General's Office and the National Protection Unit. There are also financial incentive schemes for whistleblowers, which are authorised by the government through the Ministry of Defence.

Further, Article 19 of Law 1778, 2016 establishes some benefits for whistleblowers in transnational corruption cases, such as total or partial exoneration of an administrative sanction.

The Superintendence of Companies also promotes the existence of whistleblower channels in corporations as good anti-corruption practice.

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

Colombian law does not limit employees' rights within the scope of internal or external investigations and there is no distinction between officers or directors for these purposes. Nonetheless, employees whose work requires monitoring and enforcing could be subject to internal company controls or have their employment agreement terminated if they are found to be in breach of their labour obligations.

To sanction an employee, a company must comply with the disciplinary procedure incorporated in both its employee handbook and the constitutional guidelines set forth in Ruling C-593 of 2014, which require the employer to notify the employee of:

- the date of the disciplinary procedure;
- the possibility of being accompanied by a co-worker during the procedure; and
- the misconduct that led to the procedure.

In addition, the employee has the right to:

- provide evidence and arguments that contradict the allegations made by the employer;
- evaluate the evidence submitted by the employer; and
- appeal any and all sanctions imposed.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

Colombian law does not limit or differentiate rights for employees who are considered to have engaged in misconduct. A company may take disciplinary measures against such employees, following the disciplinary procedure set forth in its employee handbook and the constitutional guidelines.

Furthermore, employees whose job descriptions include additional ethical compliance obligations may have their employment agreement terminated for cause, in which case, the employee shall not be entitled to the legal severance payment.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

Yes. If this conduct has been included in the employment contract, handbook or company policy as a cause for termination of the employment agreement, the employer may terminate the labour relationship with cause.

Commencing an internal investigation

32 Is it common practice in your country to prepare a document setting out terms of reference or investigatory scope before commencing an internal investigation? What issues would it cover?

Preparing a document setting out the terms of reference or investigatory scope before commencing an internal investigation will depend on a company's internal audit structure, its experience and the information available; however, it is common for internal auditors and members of a company's compliance department to do this.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

There are no internal steps that companies are legally required to take. Nevertheless, it is important for the company to follow its own good practice policy. For instance, first, the company should conduct an internal investigation (using internal resources or hiring a third party specialist in auditing and risk consultancy) to enable it to gather information and documentation about the issue. Once the issue has been analysed and the compliance officer has assessed the risk, it is important to report the matter to the board. The compliance officer may consult an expert to gain an understanding of the possible consequences for the company, and thus be able to offer proper advice to the board regarding the best course of action to be taken. The board will decide whether to denounce the issue to the authorities, provided it is not mandatory under the Criminal Code.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

Colombia's legal framework encourages individuals and corporations to co-operate with the authorities. Nevertheless, the lawfulness of a notice or subpoena may be challenged in any case with a constitutional action such as a writ for the protection of fundamental rights (amparo) or, in criminal case, before a fundamental guarantee judge.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

An internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority are confidential; therefore, there is no legal obligation to publicly disclose their existence.

Decree 2555, 2010 establishes that companies registered on the Colombian Stock Exchange must disclose 'relevant events'. Contact from a law enforcement authority could be interpreted as a relevant event if, for example, it could affect the share price or the company value.

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

The authorities always welcome internal investigations as a sign of co-operation. There are no requirements regarding the conduct or form of internal investigations, except for labour internal investigations, as discussed in question 29.

Attorney–client privilege

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

Attorney–client privilege may be claimed over communications or any kind of information exchanged between a lawyer and a client.

A company should have a professional relationship (i.e., a written contract) with external counsel and all communications or information shall refer to the matter of this relationship. Furthermore, the protected material shall specify that it is covered by attorney–client privilege.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

There is a general obligation for all professionals, including attorneys, to keep professional secrecy. Article 74 of the Colombian Constitution sets forth that professional secrecy is inviolable. This privilege protects the privacy as its underlying interest (Article 15, Colombian Constitution).

Attorneys must refuse to disclose or testify about a client's information. Lawyers cannot be compelled to testify against their clients. Nevertheless, lawyers can be excused from complying with this duty if they know that a crime has been, or is going to be, committed.

The holder of the attorney–client privilege is the client.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

Although there is not a specific law that differentiates between in-house and external counsel regarding professional secrecy, currently it is considered that the privilege applies only to external counsel.

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

The attorney–client privilege applies equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to an investigation in Colombia.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

The waiver of the attorney–client privilege is not necessarily considered a co-operative step. What triggers co-operative conduct is the fact that any person will share information about the investigation. In addition, there is not a specific context in which the privilege waiver is mandatory. However, there will be a lawyer will not be penalised if he or she contributes to stopping a crime from being committed.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

Yes. As the client is the holder of the privilege, he or she can specify what part of the information he or she wishes to share and with what authority.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, it can be maintained in Colombia.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

The concept of common interest privileges does not exist in Colombia.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

Yes. This could pertain to a new relationship protected with a new privilege, or part of the attorney–client privilege if the assistance relates to the same matter.

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

Colombia allows witnesses to be interviewed as part of an internal investigation.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

Attorney–client privilege includes all the activities and information known by the attorney, if they relate to the attorney–client relationship. A company can claim attorney–client privilege in this situation.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

When interviewing with an employee or a third party in Colombia, the following steps are recommended:

- informing the interviewee:
  - who is the attorney's client;
  - that he or she has the right to have his or her own representation;
  - about the facts that are being investigated and the purpose of the interview;
  - that only the truth is expected and that possible falsehoods will be communicated to the authority;
  - if he or she is an employee, about the company's relevant internal policies;
- avoiding incriminating questions; and
- drawing up a record of the interview, which should include a signed declaration by the witness that the deposition was given voluntarily.

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

An internal interview will typically include the following:

- explaining the nature of the investigation;
- asking questions to elicit personal information about the interviewee and his or her background;
- asking the witness about the facts being investigated;
- putting to the witness relevant documents found during the investigation – with prior authorisation from the client – and asking him or her about them; and
- listening to the witness's deposition.

The interview should be recorded and that record should be signed by the interviewee.

Employees may have their own legal representation.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

Article 67 of the Criminal Procedure Code sets forth a general duty of reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities. Nevertheless, in accordance with Article 441 of the Criminal Code, a penalty for non-compliance with this obligation will only be applicable when the said misconduct relates to genocide, enforced displacement, torture, enforced disappearance, homicide, kidnapping, terrorism, illicit enrichment, drug trafficking, money laundering, or any other misconduct that may affect sexual integrity.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

A company should self-report to law enforcement when any misconduct has been committed that jeopardises the company's legal activity, even if there is no legal obligation to do so.

In addition, the company should self-report in other countries when the misconduct could have a negative impact outside Colombia.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

An internal investigation regarding the misconduct should be carried out, and all relevant documents and information collected. The company should be advised about the legal consequences of the misconduct and the self-reporting. Depending on the case, the company should hire an attorney to ascertain the legal requirements for the self-report and its consequences.

The person or entity should co-operate with the competent authority during the investigation and ask the authorities to be admitted as a victim, provided this possibility is pertinent to the case.

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

Prior to filing charges, it is customary that the authorities enter into a dialogue with the company (except in a criminal investigation). The company should appear before the authority within the established notification period, be engaged in the case so that it can be informed, provide the necessary evidence and exercise its right to a defence.

The Colombian administrative sanctioning proceeding involves a preliminary investigation in which the authority determines whether there are reasons to open a formal investigation and to file charges. During the preliminary investigation, the authority is allowed to request the company's information, make inspections of the company's facilities, examine computers and obtain testimonies from the company's workers, officers and directors.

Throughout a preliminary investigation, some authorities, such as the Superintendence of Industry and Commerce, may allow the voluntary offering of information, and if the company offers warranties to the authority, its penalties may be reduced.

Overall, preliminary investigations are subject to confidentiality.

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

Only a deciding administrative act can be appealed and challenged before the courts. A 'deciding administrative act' is defined as one that resolves the merits of the specific case and can produce a definitive legal effect. As such, authorities' decisions to initiate preliminary investigations and request evidence are not subject to judicial control in general.

Nevertheless, if within the investigation period there is a violation of the right of a fair proceeding, or if there is an infraction of a fundamental right, the company can file a constitutional injunction, which should be resolved by the court within 10 days.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

There is no standard practice as to how a company should act in this situation. The existence of a foreign investigation does not create effects to an investigation in Colombia per se. Recently, Colombian and foreign authorities have engaged in joint investigations in administrative matters. Colombian authorities are not obliged to follow foreign decisions, although in many cases they can be directly recognised in Colombia or through special proceedings.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in Colombia seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, the company must search for and produce the documents in other countries to satisfy the request, unless it is impossible under the laws of the foreign country to obtain or reveal such information. The General Procedural Code establishes that when it is easier for one party to the process to prove certain facts, that party has the burden of providing the material to the authority. When the documents are in another language, they should be translated by an official translator and sent to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs for legalisation and apostilles as required by the relevant countries involved.

The costs of the translation and the time taken for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to legalise the translation of the documents may be considered as difficulties.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

Law enforcement in Colombia may share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries, depending on the authority that is requesting the information.

Recently Colombia has become a member of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD), which has led to Colombia signing different types of agreements for the exchange of information with international authorities, mostly concerning tax requirements compliance.

There is frequently an exchange of information with international authorities when the matter concerns trust, financial, criminal and corporate authorities.

Framework for co-operation with foreign authorities in Colombia

- Foreign Account Tax Compliance Act
- Foreign Corrupt Practices Act
- American Convention Against Corruption
- UN Convention Against Corruption
- OECD Anti-Bribery Convention
- Basel Committee (Basel III: International Regulatory Framework for banks)
- Law 1474, 2011
- Law 1712, 2014
- Law 1778, 2016
- Organic Statute of the Financial System
- Decree 1848, 2016
- Circular Externa 100-00005 of the Superintendence of Companies
- Decree 950, 1995

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

The enforcement authorities in Colombia should act according to the legal requirements regarding retention and secrecy for any type of information relating to fundamental and constitutional assets, especially when there is an ongoing judicial proceeding. Individuals can also request certain authorities (antitrust, financial, corporate and tax) to grant special confidentiality to the information disclosed during an investigation.

Concerning commercial companies, an authority is only allowed to order the disclosure of commercial books and papers for the following purposes:

- appraisal of taxes;
- surveillance of credit institutions, commercial companies and institutions of common utility;
- investigation of crimes; and
- bankruptcy and liquidation of companies in both cases and of successions in the latter.

There may be partial disclosure of commercial books in a situation other than as listed above, and the authority can only examine what is related to the specific litigation.

The disciplinary code for public authorities contains a ban on allowing access to records, documents or information by unauthorised persons during and after an investigation.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

A company that has received such a request should oppose the release of information establishing that the production of the content of the documents would violate the law in the other country. In this event, it is important that the company obtains a legal opinion with the translation of the support regulations, explaining why it is impossible under law to obtain, furnish or reveal that information.

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

- Law 1581, 2012 establishes that any person who intervenes in the management of personal data is obliged to secure the confidentiality of that information.
- Decree 2153, 1992 establishes that natural or legal persons subject to Superintendence of Industry and Commerce investigations may request that any information regarding business secrecy, or information that is to be supplied during the investigation and the administrative process, be kept confidential. The company should paste a non-confidential summary of the matters included in the document on top of the privileged document. If the authority fails to meet this request, it is liable to disciplinary penalties.
- Law 1712, 2014 establishes that anyone can appeal a request for information when it involves commercial, industrial or professional secrets.

All information subject to investigation that is determined by its owners to be confidential cannot be accessed by third parties other than those who are part of the relevant judicial process.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

There is a potential risk relating to how the competent authority may interpret the behaviour of a company with regard to the compelled production of material. Nevertheless, that interpretation is not a substantive merit against the party that produces material. Private persons can also request certain authorities (antitrust, financial, corporate and tax) to grant special confidentiality to the information disclosed during an investigation.

Prosecution and penalties

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

Penalties under the Criminal Code that directors, officers or employees may face for misconduct in Colombia (depending on the crime) include:

- imprisonment;
- fines;

- seizure of goods and instruments used in committing the misconduct;
- disgorgement;
- forfeiture; or
- disqualification – for up to 20 years – from participating, directly or through a representative, in public contracting procedures such as public bids and government contracts.

Under the Criminal Procedure Code and Criminal Code, companies will be subject to a civil sanction that consists of paying for all the damage caused by the misconduct of their employees or directors, fines and disqualification from contracting with the government for up to 20 years.

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

This does not apply in Colombia.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

When fixing penalties in transnational corruption cases, the Colombian authorities may consider a graded series of criteria for sanctions (Article 7, Law 1778, 2016), based on the following:

- the economic benefit obtained or intended by the offender by his or her conduct;
- the greater or lesser capital capacity of the offender;
- the repetition of behaviour;
- the resistance, refusal or obstruction to the investigative or supervisory action and the procedural conduct of the offender being investigated;
- the use of means or of the person interposed to hide the infraction, the specific benefits or money, the goods or services susceptible to economic valuation, or any benefit or utility, offered or delivered to a national or foreign public official, or any of the effects of the infraction;
- the recognition or express acceptance of the infraction before the decree of evidence;
- the existence and compliance of transparency and business ethics programmes or anti-corruption mechanisms within the company, in accordance with the provisions of Article 23 of Law 1779, 2016;
- the degree of compliance with precautionary measures;
- if an appropriate due diligence process has been carried out, prior to a merger, spin-off, reorganisation or acquisition of control process in which the company committing the infraction is involved; and
- if the authorities responsible for sanctioning commission of behaviours set forth in Article 2 of Law 1778, 2016 by employees, legal representative or shareholders, have been informed in accordance with the provisions of Article 19 of Law 1778, 2016.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

Under Law 1778, 2016 (administrative liability of legal entities for acts of transnational corruption), non-prosecution or deferred prosecution agreements are not available in Colombia for corporations.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

Under Law 1778, 2016 (administrative liability of legal entities for acts of transnational corruption), Colombia does not provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

Under Law 1778, 2016, settlements with law enforcement authorities cannot be reached through agreement or negotiation. Although Law 1778 allows the authority to grant benefits in exchange for effective collaboration, the process for obtaining those benefits is not a negotiation but rather consists of filing a request with admissions of wrongdoing and supporting evidence for the same, and the authority will unilaterally determine the effectiveness of the alleged collaboration and make its own decision.

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

Law enforcement authorities in Colombia do not use external compliance monitors as an enforcement tool.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

No. Access to Law 1778 files is very restricted.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

Under Colombia's Criminal Procedure Code (which applies only to natural persons), preliminary investigations undertaken by the prosecutor are classified. Therefore, information relating to the case will not be made public until the indictment. The Criminal Procedure

Code provides that all hearings must be public. However, judges may make some exceptions in relation to the publicity of certain criminal hearings.

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

It is common for companies to use a public relations (PR) firm to manage a corporate crisis, and larger companies will have their own PR and communications department. In either situation, it is also common for companies to hire criminal and compliance lawyers to work on the matter with their communications team.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

Ongoing proceedings are confidential until the indictment hearing. However, the media are always interested in high-profile cases, and will therefore gather confidential information, which is usually provided by the parties or authorities involved in the case.

When trials begin – since they are open to the public – it is common for the media to attend high-profile cases.

It is also common for individuals or companies to use the media to expose their case arguments to generate positive public opinion and to try to put pressure on the authorities.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

Agreements may be confidential; thus, it depends on the kind of agreement that has been reached.

However, an excerpt from the sanctioning administrative decision sentence for transnational corruption will be published in newspapers and on the website of the sanctioned legal entity for a maximum of one year.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

During the next two legislative periods, we expect to see key legislative changes such as the approval of a law regarding criminal liability of corporations, as has been suggested and requested by the OECD. Therefore, compliance programmes will also be more regulated and enforced by different authorities.

General context, key principles and hot topics

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

The year 2019 marks a new era in the implementation of anti-corruption and financial crime measures in France. The UBS decision notably shows that the French authorities – and the National Financial Prosecutor (PNF) in particular – intend to adopt a more hard-line approach that has a noticeable effect on companies that violate French law. UBS, which chose to stand trial rather than settle through the French equivalent of a deferred prosecution agreement (a CJIP), was convicted on 20 February 2019 and ordered to pay a €3.7 billion fine and €800 million in damages to the French state for unauthorised banking solicitation, aggravated tax fraud and money laundering – the highest sentence to date imposed on a company for these offences. The choice to leave it to the courts, resulting in a considerably higher payout, has raised the question of the judicial strategy that prosecuted companies should adopt in such cases. Some have concluded that recourse to a CJIP would have been beneficial, while others await the decision of the appeal court, arguing that UBS has strong judicial arguments in defence.

Following the introduction of the CJIP, the French authorities clearly defined the first sets of rules: the Anti-Corruption Agency (AFA) and the PNF have published guidelines detailing the criteria to be taken into account when concluding a CJIP and assessing the fine.

A new CJIP has been signed between the PNF and Google following the failure by Google Ireland Ltd to subscribe to declarations to corporate income tax for the tax years 2011 to 2014. In this CJIP in the area of tax fraud, the PNF acted jointly with the tax authorities, which also entered into an agreement with Google regarding tax matters.

Another CJIP is pending with Airbus, which is currently under investigation. Since 2016, the aircraft manufacturer has been co-operating with the PNF and the UK's Serious Fraud Office in connection with allegations of corruption. The US Department of Justice (DOJ) subsequently joined the French–English investigation pool on a regulatory aspect: Airbus is alleged to have repeatedly omitted certain statements to the US authorities regarding the sale of weapons. This case is a renewed illustration of the tendency for international coordination between foreign authorities prosecuting the same facts. It is yet to be determined whether the prosecution pool will take the Société Générale case as an example case and coordinate a multi-jurisdictional settlement.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

Corporations can be held liable on both civil and criminal grounds. Corporate criminal liability is limited to 'offences committed on [companies'] account by their organs or representatives', namely for actions committed by persons who exercise direction, administration, management or control functions, or by persons who act on behalf of an identified delegation of power that meets specific criteria. Thus, corporate liability does not exclude individual liability.

From 2006, a new trend in case law appeared, by which the Criminal Division of the French Supreme Court (the Court of Cassation) found corporations liable without identifying an organ or representative, relying instead on facts that reflect an endorsement by company management. The Criminal Division has nevertheless reiterated that corporate criminal liability implies the identification of an organ or a representative.

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

Enforcement authorities include judicial and administrative authorities. For the most part, jurisdiction between the authorities is based on subject matter, with numerous opportunities for co-operation – and competition – between authorities.

Each superior court has jurisdiction over offences committed within its territory or based on the location of headquarters. Specialised interregional courts have jurisdiction over economic and financial matters of some importance or complexity and whose scope involves several jurisdictions. Some particular fields fall within the scope of specialised sections of the prosecution authorities in Paris; for example, terrorism, war crimes and human rights, health and safety, and the environment. The aforementioned PNF was created in 2013 to deal with breaches of probity, public finance and proper functioning of the financial market.

Alongside judicial authorities, the main administrative authorities with jurisdiction over corporations are the French financial markets authority (the AMF, which regulates the integrity of financial markets, ensuring investor protection and information, and preventing market abuse), the Competition Authority (which conducts sector enquiries, antitrust activities, merger control, and publishes opinions and recommendations), the French supervisory and resolution authority (the ACPR, which investigates wrongdoing, issues warnings and sanctions French banks), the tax authority within the Ministry of Finance and the AFA (which controls, sanctions and monitors the implementation of anticorruption programmes by companies to which the Sapin II Law applies).

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

In respect of criminal offences, there is no minimum standard for a prosecutor to request enquiries to be carried out; prosecutorial discretion is considerable. In practice, investigations are opened after a complaint, self-report or flagrante delicto. If the matter is particularly complex, prosecutors may turn it over to an independent investigating magistrate to carry out a comprehensive investigation into the facts and give an opinion as to guilt. Investigating magistrates can also be required to investigate pursuant to a specific complaint filed by alleged victims, including, under specific conditions, non-government organisations.

Investigations can also stem from authorities' detection of suspicious activities within their material jurisdiction (e.g., if mandated by a foreign authority, responding to a report from a whistleblower or an alert triggered by the anti-money laundering branch of the Ministry of Finance (TRACFIN), or owing to a legal obligation to support facts that may constitute a criminal offence).

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

Although exceptions do apply (e.g., the AFA), it is unlikely that an enforcement authority would use a notice or subpoena to collect documents or data. There is little ground for challenging such a request if it is within the scope of the authority's prerogatives and respects the legal requirements (see question 25). The company may argue against communicating data and documents that are covered by attorney–client privilege or medical secrecy, for instance.

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

As such, there is no co-operative agreement that grants immunity or leniency for individuals. At the Société Générale CJIP (SG CJIP) certification hearing, Mrs Houlette, former president of the PNF, stressed that the company's co-operation had been taken into account in determining the penalty. The provisions of the CJIP do not create incentives for legal representatives to report misconduct as they remain personally liable for their actions during the performance of their work and the CJIP will only benefit the company. Similarly, whistleblower status does not provide for situations in which the person would agree to reveal his or her actions either. However, the guidelines enacted by the PNF regarding CJIPs expressly encourage the co-operation of legal persons to be eligible for the procedure and minimise the amount of any fine imposed.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

The two main priorities for enforcement authorities are tax evasion – for individuals and corporations – and corruption. Since it was created, the PNF has aggressively moved to fight tax evasion, including in instances when the tax authorities themselves have decided not to impose sanctions, by relying on money-laundering offences. The PNF's ability to prosecute tax evasion has been extended by reducing the power of control and appreciation of the Ministry of Economy in this area.

The PNF currently has more than 240 open probity offences cases, of which 10 per cent involve international corruption. The Sapin II Law created the AFA – headed by a senior former investigating magistrate – which has carried out many audits of compliance programmes and, where a suspicion of crime is identified, referred the facts to the PNF.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

Cybersecurity is a national priority in France. During the past 10 years, France has adopted a comprehensive framework at different levels to address the specific issues of cybersecurity: the central office for the fight against crimes linked to information and communication technologies within the National Police Office, the centre for the fight against digital crimes within the National Gendarmerie and the brigade for the investigation of information technology fraud within the Paris Prefecture. The National Information Systems Security Agency (ANSSI), created in 2009, is the national authority in the area of cyber-defence and network and information security. ANNSI's missions target government departments and public services, businesses and operators of vital importance, and aims to provide a proactive response to cybersecurity issues.

At the European level, a Regulation was adopted on 17 April 2019 on the European Union Agency for Cybersecurity (ENISA) and on information and communications technology cybersecurity certification (the Cybersecurity Act), giving ENISA a permanent mandate while strengthening its role and establishing an EU framework for cybersecurity certification.

As regards the enforcement of cybersecurity-related failings, when it comes to data protection, a failure to implement cybersecurity measures is an administrative offence, subject to administrative fines and civil liability (see question 22). Further, pursuant to the Law on Military Programming dated 26 February 2018, those with the status of 'operators of vital importance' have an obligation to implement a cybersecurity framework. Failure to comply is sanctioned by the French Criminal Code.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

The legal framework for tackling cybercrime in France has grown steadily in recent years. Most of the tools used to regulate cybercrime are inspired by the Budapest Convention signed by the European Council on 23 November 2001. The French Criminal Code penalises cybercrimes relating to offences such has hacking and denial-of-service attack, and the French Code of Intellectual Property further sanctions phishing and possession or use of hardware used to commit cybercrime. These offences are punishable by imprisonment and fines of up to €375,000.

In addition, French law provides for an extraterritorial application of its provisions since a cyber offence is deemed to have been committed in France (i.e., committed through an e-communication network to the detriment of a person in France or a company with its registered office in France). The implementation of cybercrime regulations is coordinated by the Ministry of the Interior, in collaboration with the ANSSI and dedicated police services.

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

Criminal law can have an extraterritorial effect, based on the nationality of the perpetrator or the victim. It is applicable to any crime committed by a French national outside French territory. It is also applicable to a misdemeanour (délit) committed by French nationals outside French territory if the conduct is punishable under the legislation of the country in which it was committed (double criminality). French criminal law also applies to any felony, and to any misdemeanour punishable by imprisonment, committed by a French or foreign national outside French territory when the victim is a French national. The extraterritorial effect of French criminal law can also apply when an element constituting the offence takes place on French soil.

The extraterritorial reach of French criminal law can also apply in other limited circumstances, for instance when fundamental interests of the nation, diplomatic or consular premises are targeted. The Sapin II Law extends the extraterritorial effect of criminal law for corruption and influence peddling offences involving non-French perpetrators. French criminal law applies to acts of corruption or influence peddling committed abroad by a person carrying out all or part of their economic activity in the French territory.

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

To a large extent, pressure to increase enforcement of international financial and corruption issues comes from the United States, and co-operation with the United States usually works well in those matters, despite regular tensions and the overall impression that US prosecutions are, at least in part, carried out in support of US industry. Co-operation with other EU Member States is generally smooth.

Concern arises from the blocking statute that applies when a foreign authority is involved. The purpose of the statute is to prohibit compelled communication of virtually any information of commercial value without some involvement of French authorities. It carries both a fine and a prison term for violations. Appropriate contact with the French authorities that have been taking the lead in explaining its legitimacy, should mitigate risks – the AFA is tasked with ensuring observance of the French blocking statute, in the context of corporate compliance programme obligations imposed on French companies by foreign authorities.

EU-wide data protection and privacy rules are enforced by the French Data Protection Authority (CNIL), and the right of privacy of individual employees and the management of personal information should be properly addressed. The EU's General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR), adopted in France on 20 June 2018, has introduced new rules on communication of personal data to foreign authorities and requires, pursuant to Article 48 of the GDPR, without prejudice to any other grounds for cross-border transfers, that any transfer of personal data be based on international conventions such as mutual legal assistance treaties. Although burdensome, both can be dealt with effectively by addressing the privacy issue as a firm policy and complying with data protection rules.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

The principle of double jeopardy is enshrined in Article 14.7 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Article 50 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union and Article 4 of Protocol No. 7 to the European Convention on Human Rights.

However, the French state has made an exception in the interpretation of Article 4 of Protocol No. 7, limiting the application of the rule to offences falling within the jurisdiction of courts ruling in criminal matters. On 11 September 2019, the Court of Cassation confirmed this restriction, refusing to consider that previous tax sanctions fell into the scope of the previous criminal sanctions authorising the application of the double jeopardy principle.

Another exception is provided by French criminal law, which states that there is no extra-territorial application of the double jeopardy principle.

On 14 March 2018, in a decision regarding the Oil-for-Food Programme, the Court of Cassation confirmed that Article 14.7 of the UN International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights applies only when both proceedings are initiated in the territory of the same state, and refused consequently to apply the double jeopardy provision to a US deferred prosecution agreement.

The European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) adopted a similar position on the ne bis in idem principle in the Krombach case. The applicant argued that the German decision to drop charges prevented France from prosecuting him for the exact same facts. This indicates that a foreign decision does not automatically have res judicata in another state, in line with recent French Court of Cassation decisions on the issue.

Although this appreciation by French case law and the fact that there is no equivalent to the US 'anti-piling on' policy in the current French legal landscape, that situation may change. Indeed, on 6 June 2019, France was convicted by the ECHR for violation of the ne bis in idem principle (Nodet v. France, Case No. 47342/14). The case involved a double penalty from the AMF and the criminal courts for market offences. The ECHR calls France to encourage the various authorities to ensure that each procedure is duly considered and that the overall amount of all penalties is proportionate.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

Multiple authorities often investigate the same facts at the same time. There is no particular procedure for global settlements as relationships vary from co-operation to competition and sometimes lead to a race to a decision. A prior sanction or decision on the same facts will be taken into account by the other authorities involved. However, the CJIP agreed with Société Générale in 2018 (the SG CJIP) demonstrates an intent for stronger co-operation between authorities in the coming years (see question 14).

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

See question 12.

If a foreign court decision could be recognised by the French jurisdiction, the French authorities could decide to open their own investigation or to send the case before the French tribunals. However, the emerging trend is towards co-operation between French and foreign authorities. Efforts to co-operate with foreign authorities arise in the SG CJIP, for instance, although the US authorities were the first to open an investigation, as early as 2014. The PNF started working with the DOJ, reciprocally communicating details of the investigation on account of the mutual legal assistance treaty. It was determined that the fine would be divided equally between the DOJ and the PNF and the monitoring would be carried out by the AFA.

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

The implementation of economic sanctions in France is essentially part of UN sanctions policy and the EU Common Foreign and Security Policy. Restrictive measures (such as asset freezes, embargos, commercial restrictions) are enforced by a European Council decision supported by EU Regulations and are directly binding on EU Member States. Unilateral measures can also be implemented by national decree or order. The sanctions may target governments of foreign countries, non-government entities and individuals. France's Ministry of Europe and Foreign Affairs oversees the implementation of any sanction decided at European level and is assisted by several ministries. On 17 May 2019, the Council of the European Union extended the economic sanctions against the Syrian government until June 2020, as the repression of Syria's civilian population continues. France officially acknowledged this extension by a decree dated 13 June 2019. The sanctions currently in place against Syria include restrictions on certain investments, a freeze of assets and an oil embargo. As regards the latter, the company LafargeHolcim has been prosecuted in France for violation of this embargo.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

Economic sanctions are an instrument of France's foreign policy and, as an EU Member State, it follows decisions laid down by the European Union. Nevertheless, autonomous measures can also be taken by each Member State. During the past few years, there has been an increase in measures to fight terrorism financing. For that purpose, the French Monetary and Financial Code entitles the Minister of Economy to order the freezing of assets belonging to individuals or legal entities who commit, or attempt to commit, terrorist acts, or who facilitate or participate in such acts (Articles L 561 and L 562). The French Directorate-General of the Treasury, which is the authority in charge of economic sanctions, published (on 17 June 2019) the updated version of the Guidelines drafted with the ACPR on the implementation of French economic sanctions.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

As part of a multilateral decision system, economic sanctions shall result from a collective implementation and co-operation. Nevertheless, there is a lack of precedent relating to implementation of sanctions in French law, and the LafargeHolcim case might create the first guidance if it goes to trial. In addition, there is still no general provision to criminalise the violation of economic sanctions, although a bill for this purpose was considered by the French Parliament in 2016.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

On 22 November 1996, in response to extraterritorial legislation in force at the time against Cuba, Iran and Libya, the European Commission adopted Council Regulation (EC) No. 2271/96 protecting against the effects of the extraterritorial application of legislation adopted by a third country, and actions based thereon or resulting therefrom (the Blocking Regulation). This Regulation is directly enforceable in France. The measure forbids EU citizens from complying with third-country extraterritorial sanctions unless exceptionally authorised to do so by the European Commission (as set forth in Commission Implementing Regulation (EU) 2018/1101). On 6 June 2018, the Blocking Regulation was updated by the European Commission (Council Regulation (EC) No. 2271/96), adding to its scope the extraterritorial sanctions that the United States reimposed on Iran in August 2018.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

Although the Blocking Regulation sanctions EU companies that would comply with third-country sanctions, the measure has much more of a symbolic effect than an economic one. It has only been applied in 1998 in the context of a complaint filed by the European Communities before the World Trade Organization. As regards the US sanctions on Iran, experts are sceptical about how far Europe will ultimately go to enforce such a rule. It could also prove difficult to enforce, in part because of the international banking system and the significance of the United States in international financial markets.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

Whistleblowers are an increasingly common source of disclosure of misconduct within corporations (see question 28).

As some specific professions – including financial institutions – are required to report any suspicious activity to TRACFIN, anti-money laundering reports have generated several high-profile cases.

The Sapin II compliance requirement is likely to create a new compliance culture. The transitional phase is likely to generate its share of new matters.

Extensive freedom of the press and protection from disclosure of journalists' sources have led mostly web-based media to reveal facts resulting in prosecution of key political figures in recent years.

Under specific conditions, non-government organisations (NGOs) can initiate criminal procedures. Several landmark corruption investigations have been initiated by NGOs in recent years. For instance, in 2016, the NGO Sherpa filed a complaint against the cement group LafargeHolcim for alleged terrorist financing in Syria. In 2007, the Sherpa initiated criminal proceedings by a joint complaint with Transparency International France on charges of ill-gotten goods against the son of the president of Equatorial Guinea.

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

France adopted a data protection regime in 1978 with the Law on Information Technology, Data Files and Civil Liberties. Legislation has been amended to integrate the GDPR in France's internal legislative framework. Law No. 2018-493, which was passed on 20 June 2018, serves to incorporate the GDPR legislative updates within the existing 1978 Law.

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

Law No. 2018-493 grants new investigating and sanctioning powers to the CNIL. The major change of this law is that, except for the processing of certain sensitive data and data controllers no longer having to file CNIL declarations, data processing is no longer subject to former formalities. Through the GDPR, data controllers have more prerogatives, having to maintain a record of the processing of data and notify any data protection violation without undue delay.

The right to information and the right of access, rectification and deletion of personal data for the individual are reinforced and the sanctions in the event of obstruction or non-compliance with the legal provisions are increased. The CNIL has the power to impose a periodic penalty (limited to €100,000 per day) in addition to administrative fines (which can be as much as €20 million or 4 per cent of annual global turnover). CNIL agents also have a broader right to survey and investigate places used for the processing of personal data.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

The use of personal information must not impinge on an individual's right to privacy. Databases containing any kind of personal information must be established in accordance with European and French rules under the supervision of the CNIL. The GDPR will require careful consideration when conducting an internal investigation: without prejudice to any other grounds for cross-border transfers, that any transfer of personal data be based on international conventions.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

See question 29. Employees' communications through information technology devices made available to them by the company for professional purposes, are presumed to be professional and would therefore only be outside the scope of the company's right to intercept communications if they are identified as private. However, employees who benefit from a protective status because of their position in the company (social representatives, for instance) must be given working devices that prevent their communications being intercepted and their correspondents being identified.

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

Dawn raids are a key element of enforcement and evidence gathering in an overwhelming majority of cases by judicial and administrative authorities. However, external counsel should be contacted immediately, if for no other reason than to collect valuable intelligence about the investigation. There is little room for a company to object to a dawn raid if it abides by the rules framing the process and is authorised by the public prosecutor for in flagrante delicto and preliminary investigations or the investigating judge for judicial investigations. An important procedural rule is that, provided the raid does not relate to organised crime or terrorism, it may not start before 6am or after 9pm.

Companies should ensure they identify everything that is being seized, seek permission to make copies and specifically identify material that is attorney–client privileged or otherwise protected by law. If privileged materials are taken, they should be put under seal. Also, any incident should be reported in the minutes of the dawn raid and the minutes should not be signed if there is a disagreement as to content. Subsequently, if the legal requirements of a dawn raid have been violated, nullity of procedural steps can be obtained. The acts resulting from a raid, including the seizure of materials and all legal implications, will be considered ineffective. The company will therefore be able to apply for the return of the materials seized in the event that the raid did not comply with the legal requirements.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

There is a distinction to be made between external and in-house counsel. Legal privilege attaches to any advice provided by external counsel. Very often, privileged materials will be seized along with other material and a specific request must subsequently be filed to have the material covered by privilege returned to the company. There is no in-house counsel privilege, however, thus communications with in-house counsel are not protected by attorney–client privilege.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

An individual and (at least in theory) a company can refuse to answer questions based on the right against self-incrimination, and on the basis that the information is privileged. Provided there is no self-incrimination or information under privilege, an individual or a company that is not yet part of proceedings can be compelled to attend a hearing to testify – failure to do so incurs a €3,750 fine.

Whistleblowing and employee rights

The first legal protection for whistleblowers dates back to 2007 and has developed since to target specific areas, including corruption and risks to public health or the environment. The Sapin II Law provides for a general whistleblower protection. Whistleblowers cannot be excluded from recruitment procedures or professional training, or face dismissal or discriminatory measures, whether direct or indirect, notably regarding remuneration. However, they are submitted to a three-tier process, consisting of a preliminary report to the whistleblower's supervisor and, in the event of that supervisor's failure to address the report within a reasonable amount of time, to the relevant administrative or judicial authorities or professional orders, and, as a last resort, to the public via the press.

In addition, France has two years to transpose a new whistleblower directive on the protection of persons reporting on breaches of European Union law dated 7 October 2019. This directive grants a broader protection to whistleblowers (beyond the scope of the work environment and applicable to their relatives). Unlike French law, the European provisions further provide for a two-stage process: disclose the information (1) internally, to the legal entity concerned, and (2) externally, to the competent national authorities, or to the relevant EU institutions, bodies, offices and agencies.

The idea of a financial incentive scheme was considered but the French Constitutional Council censored it. However, a Decree of 21 April 2017 set an experimental provision of two years that gave the General Directorate of Public Finance the authority to compensate any person, outside public administrations, who would provide information to lead to the discovery of tax evasion. This system has been perpetuated by the law of 23 October 2018 on the fight against tax evasion. The directive, without providing a direct financial incentive, guarantees whistleblowers access to free and independent advice.

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

Data protection and privacy laws apply to all employees regardless of allegations of wrongdoing. Pursuant to French case law, messages sent by a company's employees using information technology devices made available to them by the company for professional purposes, are presumed to be professional. Hence, the employer is entitled to access the files and folders located on the company's computers or open messages within a professional messaging system without the employee being present, unless that employee has identified the material as personal. Nevertheless, the employee is entitled to invoke the right to privacy, which includes the secrecy of correspondence.

Officers and directors of companies who are subject to board decisions must be dealt with in the same way. In certain positions, which are subject to authorisation by a regulatory authority, removal of the authorisation can lead to termination.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

An employee deemed to have engaged in misconduct must be allowed the same rights as other employees (i.e., delay in being summoned for a prior interview and the application of legal and statutory conditions of sanctions).

If the misconduct is confirmed, an employer has a large set of tools to sanction the employee, including releasing the employee from his or her duties until completion of the investigation.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

An employee can be sanctioned for refusing to participate in an internal investigation, which is considered a sufficiently severe fault by the labour courts.

Commencing an internal investigation

It should be considered good practice to prepare a document setting out the investigatory scope, especially when a judicial review seems likely by labour courts if an employee who is deemed to have engaged in misconduct challenges the findings of the internal investigations, for instance. The Paris Bar is due to publish detailed ethics recommendations for lawyers involved in internal investigations based on a report by Stéphane de Navacelle.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

There is no obligation to report back to authorities nor is there a leniency programme. The company should assess the scope of the facts and the likelihood of a leak as soon as possible without creating unnecessary internal awareness.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

It is very likely that the enforcement authority would collect documents or data directly by conducting a raid within the company, having gathered sufficient information from third parties to ensure they are able to collect relevant information. If a company has any reason to believe a raid is likely, it should immediately ensure that any documents that may be seized are created in a privileged manner if possible, and consider providing separate representation to key employees. In some specific instances, it may make sense to reach out to the appropriate authority ahead of time.

Administrative authorities, for example the AFA, the AMF, the ACPR, the Competition Authority and the Ministry of Economy, can request communication of data and documents from companies under review or directly from third parties.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

Other than obligations attached to publicly traded companies, there are no obligations as to when a company must disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from law enforcement. Self-disclosure is voluntary.

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

Having initially been embedded in legal culture, internal investigations have been accepted by specialised financial investigating magistrates as a necessary evil. Extra caution should nonetheless be taken if a judicial investigation is likely, as speaking to potential witnesses could be regarded as subornation and obstruction of justice, which is a crime in itself. It is useful to note that, in France, there is a monopoly on an investigation by the public authorities.

In a legal culture where negotiating a deal with a prosecutor or an investigating magistrate is uncommon, and as in-house counsel has no legal privilege, close attention will be paid to attorney–client privilege in internal investigations.

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

There is no attorney–client privilege for communications with in-house counsel in France. For privilege to attach, the internal investigation should be carried out by external counsel, namely French lawyers admitted to the Bar. Interviewed employees are bound by contractual obligation to confidentiality, but this obligation cannot be used to avoid answering questions put by an investigating magistrate or police investigator. The Paris Bar released an opinion stating that professional secrecy applies between lawyers and their clients but does not apply to communications between lawyers and the employees of their clients when lawyers interview employees. Lawyers must therefore notify the employees of this, and their right to be represented by a separate attorney.

Professional secrecy applies to conversations between lawyers whether or not there is a common interest between their clients. Providing separate counsel to individuals is recommended to facilitate communications safely.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

The principle of the attorney–client privilege was set down in Article 66-5 of the Law of 31 December 1971, amended by the Law of 7 April 1997 and by Article 226-13 of the French Criminal Code.

These provisions expressly set out that an attorney may not disclose information that contravenes professional secrecy. Article 226-13 of the French Criminal Code states that disclosure of secret information by persons entrusted with such a secret, by virtue of their position or profession, or a temporary function or mission, is sanctioned by imprisonment for one year and a €15,000 fine. Attorney–client privilege only applies when the lawyer is acting as a lawyer, that is to say, giving legal advice.

The holder of the privilege is the attorney's client, whether an individual or a company.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

No privilege attaches to communications with in-house counsel. Privilege only attaches to external counsel although the Gauvain Report dated 26 June 2019 recommends introducing a privilege applicable to legal advice given by in-house counsel.

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

Article 2 of the National Rules Procedure for Lawyers provides that the lawyer is of necessity the confidante of the client. Attorney–client privilege is a matter of public policy; it is general, absolute and unlimited in time. Subject to the strict requirements of their own defence before any court and the cases of declaration or disclosure prescribed or authorised by law, lawyers may not make, in any matter, any disclosure in violation of attorney–client privilege.

There is no general provision regarding attorney–client privilege as regards foreign lawyers in relation to investigations. However, the Paris Bar Council has stressed that email exchanges between a client and a foreign lawyer are covered by attorney–client privilege. In addition, foreign lawyers can be temporarily and occasionally authorised to practise consulting and counselling activities in France. In that case, they are bound by both their home country's professional rules and the ethics rules applicable to French lawyers, which include attorney–client privilege.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

Waiver of the attorney–client privilege is not specifically considered a co-operative step in France. The attorney–client privilege cannot be waived by the attorney under any circumstances, save for some exceptions (if an attorney must present his or her defence in a conflict opposing the attorney to his or her client). Only the client is entitled to waive the attorney–client privilege. At this point in time, there is still little reliance by enforcement authorities on internal investigations.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

This concept does not exist in France.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

Privilege can be maintained in France after a limited disclosure abroad. However, co-operation between enforcement authorities would be likely to make the privilege moot.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

Common interest privileges do not exist per se in French law. However, it is possible, for the purpose of defending a client, to share privileged information with other attorneys (without losing the privilege) – whether the clients share a common interest or not – and retained experts, such as forensic accountants.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

The scope of professional secrecy is very broad and lawyers are expected to rely on experts. That being said, it is usually safer to have the information collected and processed within the law firm's offices.

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

There are no clear rules as regards internal investigations, and interviews with individuals who are not employees or former employees of the company should be considered with great caution. If the underlying facts amount to an offence under French law, such an interview would be likely to be considered an obstruction of justice. The proper alternative is to rely on external counsel.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

There are competing doctrinal opinions as to whether or not internal interviews are covered by attorney–client privilege. Attorney reports are covered by attorney–client privilege as long as the attorney is providing legal advice. On the other hand, attorneys' reports are not covered by attorney–client privilege if the attorney is providing an expertise assignment, as indicated in addendum XXIV to the Rules of Procedure of the Paris Bar published in 2016 by the Paris Bar Council. If this is the case, attorneys who draft an internal investigation report could be required to testify at a later stage in judicial proceedings.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

Interviews of third parties should be ruled out unless specific precautionary steps are taken. The Paris Bar Council has issued recommendations, according to which attorneys should explain the purpose of an interview and its non-coercive nature to employees and inform them that their exchanges are not covered by professional secrecy (equivalent of Upjohn warnings). Employees should also be informed that they can be assisted by an attorney, but only when it appears that they may be blamed for their actions at the end of the investigation.

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

Assuming external counsel carries out the interview, they should explain both whom the attorney–client relationship is with and how the privilege rule works. Independent counsel should be provided to interviewees if there is any sense that they might be involved in any wrongdoing. Documents are usually provided ahead of time when counsel for the employee is involved, from the counsel for the company to the counsel for the employee directly, as correspondence between attorneys is covered by privilege. This ensures that the employee is not given the opportunity to communicate the documents to third parties and that the authorities are unable to seize such documents.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

Except for specific crimes that are inchoate and can be avoided, only civil servants have a general obligation to report crimes of which they become aware in the context of their employment. There is no requirement to self-report. However, the guidelines on CJIPs clearly state that voluntary self-reporting of offences to prosecutors, if made in a timely manner, both as regards the choice of the CJIP procedure and as a factor reducing the amount of the public interest fine, will be taken into consideration favourably.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

Except for antitrust issues, only in very limited circumstances does a corporation have an interest in reporting wrongdoing to enforcement authorities. It should first determine the scope of the wrongdoing and the responsibilities of those involved to assess potential corporate criminal liability. If the wrongdoing is carried out by a current or former employee, the corporation should weigh the pros and cons of filing a criminal complaint against the perpetrators to deter others, show commitment to compliance and shield itself from prosecution by acquiring the status of victim.

Self-reporting outside France should be based on a decision tailored to the foreign country's laws and enforcement policies. Should the company decide to self-report in a foreign jurisdiction, reporting the facts to French authorities should also be considered. Arguments to weigh up include the potential interest of French authorities in the underlying matter, where the facts occurred, whether they are continuing, and how closely national and foreign authorities work together. The SG CJIP suggests full co-operation between authorities and a real willingness on the part of the French authorities to take up investigations occurring in France or involving a French entity.

In more than 300 ongoing matters, the PNF is working closely on trying to address cases at the preliminary enquiry phase of criminal investigations before an investigating magistrate is appointed, namely, the instruction phase, which limits the leeway for plea bargaining and considerably extends the length of procedures.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

There is no specific procedure for self-reporting and no legal requirement to do so. Informal contacts should be made, through external counsel, with the competent authority, at the appropriate hierarchical level, after a thorough cost/benefit analysis. Although there is no statutory requirement to evaluate self-reporting and co-operation in a CJIP, the AFA and the PNF guidelines published on 26 June 2019 indicate that self-reporting within a reasonable period of time shall be favourably considered, in particular as a factor for reducing the fine.

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

There is no common practice by enforcement authorities of providing advance notice to corporations that may become defendants in criminal procedures. Contact should be made with the police investigator, prosecutor or investigating magistrate depending on the status of the investigation. Challenges can be made against requests beyond the scope of the instruction from the judicial authority.

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

Ongoing investigations led by the public prosecutor are not subject to challenge before the courts. Challenges are only possible once the investigation is closed.

Ongoing investigations led by the investigating magistrate can be challenged before the courts.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

The company should answer all the authorities involved separately, as the questions that can be raised by different authorities could vary, and it should be borne in mind that authorities communicate with one another. When dealing with foreign authorities, blocking statute, privacy and data protection issues should also be addressed.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

The collection of material abroad will have to be carried out in compliance with the applicable foreign law. However, national authorities will only be concerned about the actual answer to the production request.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

There is extensive co-operation with foreign enforcement authorities both within the European Union and elsewhere, through mutual legal assistance treaties, agreements between regulators and enforcement authorities, and EU co-operation agreements. With the SG CJIP having signed deferred prosecution agreements with the DOJ and the US Commodity Futures Trading Commission, this co-operation is even more visible.

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

Except where the law provides otherwise, and subject to a defendant's rights, enquiry and investigation proceedings are secret. Any person contributing to an investigation is bound by professional secrecy, and the disclosure of secret information is punishable by imprisonment for one year and a €15,000 fine. In practice, information is often leaked by people who are under no legal obligation and leaks to the press in sensitive matters occur very frequently.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

The company should retain external counsel to explain the foreign country's law to the requesting French authority, and work with the French and foreign authorities for the production to be carried out appropriately, possibly pursuant to formal co-operation agreements.

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

France has both blocking and data protection and privacy statutes. The French blocking statute, subject to treaties or international agreements and to currently applicable laws and regulations, prohibits communication to foreign public officials of economic, commercial, industrial, financial or technical information or documents if that communication is harmful to France or is to be used as evidence in view of foreign judicial or administrative proceedings or in relation thereto. Secrecy should also be properly addressed when a notice or subpoena concerns a bank: banks owe a legal duty to their customers not to disclose information about their affairs to third parties. Breach of this duty is criminally sanctioned pursuant to the French Monetary and Financial Code and the French Criminal Code. To ensure that the blocking statute, the data protection law and, if applicable, banking secrecy, do not affect domestic enforcement, the communication should be properly addressed when responding to a foreign authority.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

Voluntary production is limited to very specific circumstances, mostly when foreign authorities are involved, or when, in an ongoing investigation, there is a strategic interest to do so. Criminal files are accessible to all parties involved, including victims and other defendants. Although legally covered by secrecy rules for legal professionals, parties themselves are free to share information from the file – not documents – with third parties. Information from high-profile cases is regularly leaked to the press.

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

Corporate liability does not shield individuals from liability. In an overwhelming majority of cases (as required by law), the courts have to identify the individual or organ acting on behalf of the company (see question 2).

Penalties for individuals include fines, imprisonment, payment of civil compensation to victims within the same criminal procedure and prohibition from specific managerial positions in addition to publication of the decision in the press. Except for imprisonment, penalties for companies include all the above, as well as dissolution and debarment for certain specific offences.

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

Ordinance No. 2015-899 of 23 July 2015, which transposes Directive 2014/24/EU on public procurement, prohibits companies found guilty of specific offences (e.g., corruption, fraud, money laundering, terrorism or embezzlement and misappropriation of property) from competing for government contracts throughout the European Union. This exclusion is automatically for a period of five years unless the sentencing decision specifically provides for a more limited period (Article 45 of the Ordinance). Article 39 of the Sapin II Law amended Article 45 of the Ordinance, which now allows a declaration on honour as sufficient proof that the candidate is not prohibited from applying for a government contract.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

Although laws provide for very high penalties, including those based on a percentage of overall revenues for companies, penalties will be based on net worth, income, personality and mens rea. Although not recognised as such by law, deterrence appears to be a growing component of the rationale for penalties.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

Non-prosecution agreements are not part of the French legal system. Deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs) are slowly becoming part of the legal system. The Sapin II law provides for a DPA procedure limited to corruption and 'probity offences': the CJIP. Plea agreements – also limited to specific offences – have been available for more than a decade.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

There is no such reporting restriction under French law outside applicable labour law that the individual could invoke against the company at a later stage. Far from providing reporting restrictions, the recently published CJIP guidelines provide that the aim of internal investigations conducted by a prosecuted company is also to determine individual liabilities. To that extent, keys witnesses shall be identified and, if interviews have been conducted with witnesses or with persons likely to be involved, the reports shall be communicated to the prosecutor.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

There is an increasing recourse to the pretrial guilty plea procedure (CRPC) and CJIPs in France. The Sapin II law provides for CJIPs limited to instances of corruption and 'probity offences'. Companies should move swiftly to settle if possible, as both procedures provide for, and are likely to include, forceful involvement of alleged victims who will pursue their own interests. If the case may involve foreign jurisdictions, companies should assess the consequences of admitting guilt in France.

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

The AFA was empowered by the Sapin II Law to supervise companies as part of the implementation of CJIPs. Among the obligations imposed by the CJIP is the implementation of an action plan, as required, with the aim of improving the company's compliance system under the AFA's control for a maximum of three years. In such cases, the AFA can be helped by law firms and experts. During the past two years, of the six companies that entered into a CJIP, four designated the AFA as a compliance monitor.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

Parallel private actions are possible. In most instances, alleged victims will join the criminal procedure as civil parties and, as such, will be granted full access to the files and be able to submit requests for investigative steps to investigating magistrates. Also, alleged victims can start a criminal investigation by filing a specific complaint to that effect.

Private parties do not normally have access to administrative authorities' investigation files.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

Secrecy at the investigatory stage is required by law. However, defendants and victims have access to the file. It is sometimes very difficult to keep communications and information taken from the criminal file private. Once a case is before a court, the press can cover the event, be present at the hearing (albeit microphones and cameras are prohibited) and attend the debates. Defendants and victims are free to make statements.

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

It is very common to have press releases, communications and crisis management strategies prepared, and, when appropriate, public relations firms assisting. The spokesperson is often a lawyer on the case, especially when individuals are involved.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

Publicity is part of the overall strategy, especially in high-profile matters that attract political attention and have numerous civil parties.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

Unless otherwise specifically requested by an agreement, there is no obligation to disclose settlements to the public. In anti-corruption matters, the Sapin II Law makes disclosure compulsory. Any settlement in criminal matters will have to be approved by a judge at a public hearing. Although investigative measures and the results of investigations are to remain confidential, and police officers, judges and legal experts are bound by that confidentiality, administrative authorities are permitted to communicate on sanctions and settlements.

It is interesting to note that CJIPs do not amount to an admission of guilt in France and companies will not have a criminal record, thus allowing them to still participate in public procurement proceedings.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

France is quite proactive. The Gauvain report entitled 'Restoring French and European sovereignty and protecting our companies from extraterritorial laws and measures' (published on 26 June 2019) recommends a number of legal changes with the aim of strengthening the French legal framework applicable relating to foreign procedures initiated against French companies. The main recommendations include strengthening the blocking statute by heightening applicable sanctions and by making sure that requests for information go through the competent channel (the Economic Strategic Information and Security Department); introducing a legal privilege applicable to in-house counsels; and protecting French companies' data against the Clarifying Lawful Overseas Use of Data Act (or US Cloud Act, enacted in 2018) by imposing administrative fines similar to those applicable for violations of the GDPR (up to 4 per cent of annual global turnover or €20 million) in the event of transmission of any such data by US data hosting companies outside applicable international agreements or treaties.

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

The diesel emissions cases involving several German carmakers continue to be the highest-profile corporate investigations in Germany. The automotive industry is one of the key German industries and the emission investigations against several major German car manufacturers have therefore attracted a lot of public attention. Furthermore, the high volume of damage allegedly suffered by customers, investors and others, and the technical and regulatory complexity of the topic, are remarkable. The criminal investigations by various German public prosecutor offices focus on individual criminal liability of managers, including former chief executive officers, while at the same time leading to triple-digit millions of euros in fines against the companies involved.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

Even though strict corporate criminal liability is under discussion de lege ferenda and may be introduced within the next year, under current German law, companies are technically not criminally liable. Instead, companies whose employees have committed criminal or administrative offences face the risk of an administrative fine or a confiscation order.

These administrative fines are capped at €10 million, though this amount can be – and, in practice, frequently is – exceeded by the financial benefit the company has obtained from committing the offence (i.e., profit disgorgement). This legal mechanism (administrative fines plus profit disgorgement) have led to quite significant fines in the past, as in the following cases: Siemens (€395 million), MAN (€150 million), Ferrostaal (€140 million), Volkswagen (€1 billion) and Audi (€800 million).

As an alternative to an administrative fine, a confiscation order can be imposed on a company if an unlawful act has been committed. The maximum amount for a confiscation order is the entire gross value of the proceeds from the respective criminal offence, and the fined party (i.e., the company) is not permitted to deduct any costs it incurs.

Recently a draft bill concerning corporate criminal liability (Draft Corporate Sanctioning Act) became public. The new law will change the landscape for compliance and investigations in Germany significantly. Penalties are being increased to up to 10 per cent of the group's global turnover, although they may be reduced if the company has initiated an independent and state-of-the-art internal investigation, and co-operates fully with the investigating authorities. The Draft Corporate Sanctioning Act further introduces an alternative for ending proceedings, similar to a deferred prosecution agreement or non-prosecution agreement, including the possibility for the court to order the appointment of a compliance monitor.

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

Various law enforcement authorities, at both federal and state levels, regulate corporations, including, among others, the public prosecutors offices, antitrust authorities, tax authorities, financial regulators and customs authorities.

The matter of jurisdiction between the authorities depends on the scope of the potential investigation. To this extent, various areas of responsibility are assigned to specialist authorities. It is important to understand that all 16 German states have their own prosecutors, and thus some of them are more active in prosecuting corporations (e.g., Munich, Frankfurt and Stuttgart) than others.

There are no guidelines for the investigation of corporations in the form of laws or legal regulations. However, we are aware of some internal guidelines drafted to assist authorities when investigating corporations.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

The public prosecutor's office is generally obliged to take action in relation to all prosecutable criminal offences, provided there are sufficient factual indications (or initial suspicion). However, this duty of legality pertains only to criminal offences. Therefore, the public prosecutor has discretion whether to open administrative proceedings against a corporation (see also the mechanisms of corporate fines described in question 2).

This would change with the Draft Corporate Sanctioning Act and the mandatory prosecution principle would also apply to the prosecution of companies.

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

Enforcement measures taken by authorities against suspects or witnesses (e.g., search warrant, confiscation) can be subject to, inter alia, judicial review. This applies to the order itself as well as to the manner of execution.

Subpoenas as such are not challengeable. However, potential enforcement measures or court decisions following a subpoena may be challenged. In German criminal proceedings, the defendant is not obliged to co-operate with the authorities or to provide information about evidence-relevant facts.

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

Generally, the public prosecutor cannot grant immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with investigations. However, prosecutors and courts regard co-operation as a major factor in determining the level of sentences. Furthermore, in certain cases, prosecutors have some discretionary powers to dispense with the prosecution with the consent of the accused and of the court, and co-operation is certainly a factor in this decision.

The German antitrust authorities can grant cartel participants who co-operate, and thereby contribute to uncovering a cartel, immunity from or a reduction of fines. This leniency programme is available to individuals as well as companies. Full immunity will be granted to cartel participants if they are the first to disclose the cartel and fully co-operate with the antitrust authority throughout the proceedings.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

Corporations in Germany are most severely prosecuted for antitrust violations and corruption. The highest fines are regularly imposed in both these areas. In the recent past, fraud and tax fraud proceedings have also been a priority (for instance, alleged irregularities regarding diesel engine emissions and cum/ex or cum/cum trading patterns of banks and financial institutions). We expect data protection violations and the betrayal of business and company secrets to attract more enforcement activity as a result of stricter legal regulations and increased sanctions.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

Since 2015, the issue of cybersecurity has been addressed by various laws and regulations in both German and European legislation, including the German IT Security Act, the EU Directive on Network and Information Security and the EU Cybersecurity Act. This legislation addresses the cybersecurity landscape without imposing any specific duties on individuals or companies.

Under the EU General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR), companies that are processing personal data must implement appropriate technical and organisational measures to ensure a level of security that is appropriate to the risk. A violation of this duty can trigger administrative fines and claims for damages. As regards data breaches, companies may be obliged to notify supervisory authorities and the individual data subjects.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

Cybercrime, that is criminal activities carried out by means of computers or the internet, is covered by general German criminal law pursuant to a variety of specific provisions regarding data espionage, computer fraud, data forgery, deception in the context of data processing and data tampering.

Cybercrime investigations are seldom only national in scope. They call for coordinated action at international level and require a high level of cross-border co-operation. As an EU Member State, Germany is a signatory to the Convention on Cybercrime, which includes provisions on international co-operation with the other EU members and further signatories, such as the United States, Japan and Australia.

On the practical side, law enforcement authorities have implemented cross-border communication networks and coordination units, including the Interpol Global Complex for Innovation, the European Cybercrime Centre at Europol, and others.

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

German criminal law is generally applicable if either the offender acted in Germany or the offence had a consequence in Germany. Furthermore, Germany implemented the Convention on Combating Bribery of Foreign Public Officials in International Business Transactions of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development in 1999. Since then, the German Criminal Code prohibits illicit payments to foreign public officials, in a similar way to the US Foreign Corrupt Practices Act and the UK Bribery Act. In addition, bribery payments in the private sector that exclusively affect foreign competition, are covered by German law.

Furthermore, German criminal law is applicable, among other reasons, if the offence is committed abroad against a German or if a German commits an offence abroad and the act is a criminal offence at the place where it was committed as well.

Under the Draft Corporate Sanctioning Act, a corporation could be sanctioned for corporate crimes abroad if the corporation is registered in Germany.

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

Cross-border investigations generally demand a high level of sensitivity with regard to the different expectations of the authorities involved and the different legal frameworks applicable to investigative steps in different countries.

If an investigation has links to a common law jurisdiction, privilege is often a topic because the principles of legal privilege differ. As the concept of pretrial discovery does not exist under German law, privilege is only relevant in relation to law enforcement authorities. Under German law, communication between a company and its legal advisers is not generally privileged, but the concept of legal privilege is limited – in most cases – to communication with the criminal defence counsel. The disclosure of separate information to public authorities does not generally put the legal privilege at risk.

To ensure that privilege is adequately protected, cross-border investigations require clear processes in line with the privilege provisions of all the jurisdictions involved.

Differences in data protection laws are relevant in cross-border investigations outside the European Union where the GDPR is not applicable. In cross-border investigations, information is gathered in and transferred from and to different jurisdictions, and breaches of applicable data protection laws must be avoided.

When interviewing employees, employment law has to be observed. In Germany, broadly scoped investigative measures may require the involvement of the works council.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

Companies are not protected, in principle, from sanctions in Germany after having resolved charges on the same core set of facts in another country outside the European Union (see, for example, the fines imposed against Volkswagen in the emission matter in the United States and Germany, or the fines imposed by German and other antitrust authorities in cross-border cartel cases based on the local effect in their respective jurisdictions). In addition, confiscation orders and similar measures against companies are not recognised as 'sanctions' in the sense of double jeopardy, so that companies are not yet effectively protected in this regard even within the European Union. Often, however, authorities consider a (potential) foreign sanction at their discretion when determining a (national) sanction.

To avoid double jeopardy, the Draft Corporate Sanctioning Act provides for the possibility to refrain from national prosecution if sanctions by foreign authorities are expected and the potential sanctions in Germany do not carry substantial weight or are not necessary from a preventive point of view.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

There is no legal framework for 'global' settlements under German law. However, as co-operation between authorities across borders generally increases, 'global' settlements with German authorities are generally achievable, at least to some extent. In the past, German authorities sometimes took account of foreign sanctions when determining a (national) fine (e.g., the Siemens case).

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

In principle, the decisions of foreign authorities have no (legal) effect on an investigation of the same matter in Germany (see question 5). In some cases, however, German and foreign authorities coordinate with each other to avoid duplicate investigations.

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

Authorities are making increased use of the sanction options described in question 2. In 2018 and 2019, fines of €1 billion, €800 million and €535 million were imposed on Volkswagen, Audi and Porsche, respectively, in connection with potential irregularities regarding diesel emissions. Further, significant fines were imposed in antitrust proceedings and cases of corruption (Siemens, €395 million; MAN, €150 million; Ferrostaal €140 million).

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

Sanctions enforcement activities have steadily increased in recent years, although there are still considerable differences across the 16 German states. We expect a further increase in the intensity of prosecution if corporate criminal liability legislation is passed, whereby the mandatory prosecution principle would be extended to the prosecution of corporate offences.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

In some cases, there is co-operation between national and foreign authorities. This possibility has been codified in the form of mutual legal assistance, within the framework of which formal enquiries can be made.

In our experience, there is also an informal exchange between national and foreign authorities. However, there is often no such co-operation because of the effort involved and the sometimes low yield.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

According to German law, a boycott declaration is prohibited (this does not apply to resolutions of the United Nations, the European Union or Germany).

In addition, the EU Blocking Regulation applies in Germany. The Regulation prohibits all companies registered in the European Union from complying with the US acts listed in the Annex to the Regulation (which are currently mainly US sanctions against Iran), unless exceptionally authorised to do so by the European Commission. Furthermore, the Regulation enables such companies to seek compensation if they suffer damage as a result of those US acts. In addition, judgments by foreign courts (in particular those of the United States) that are imposed to enforce the sanctions are not recognised in the European Union.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

A violation of the national and European blocking legislation is punishable by fines of up to €500,000. Furthermore, there is the risk that legal transactions in violation of the EU Blocking Regulation may be null and void or that violations of that Regulation may trigger contractual claims for damages by the affected business partner.

So far, the Regulation has not been applied in practice. There is therefore no known case in which administrative offence proceedings have been initiated for an infringement.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

Allegations of misconduct come to light in many ways. In practice, investigations into serious wrongdoing are most often initiated by whistleblowers or as a side effect of running internal investigations.

Information gathering

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

Yes. Data protection law in Germany is regulated by the GDPR and the national German Data Protection Act. Further, there are various provisions on data protection law in sector-specific legislation (e.g., the German Telecommunications Act).

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

With the introduction of the GDPR, the situation for companies in the European Union has changed substantially. Previous to that, only a limited number of fines were imposed for data protection breaches. Now, companies can face a maximum fine of €20 million or 4 per cent of their annual global turnover, whichever is higher. Although authorities have so far not exhausted this penalty range, the level of company fines has increased significantly since the introduction of the GDPR in May 2018.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

The collection and use of personal data from employees during internal investigations has to be in line with the GDPR and the German Federal Data Protection Act, and this applies in particular to email and data reviews as well as interviews. For each investigative step involving the processing of personal data, one must assess whether the processing is necessary for the purposes of the legitimate interests pursued by the company and whether those interests of the company are overridden by the interests or rights of the respective data subject. Specific requirements apply with regard to employees when the private use of company information technology is allowed. Furthermore, affected employees have to be informed about the subject and purpose of the investigation, and their rights under the applicable data protection laws, unless doing so would interfere with the integrity of the internal investigation. The involvement of entities other than the employing entity typically requires the conclusion of data protection agreements. Works council agreements (concluded to comply with German labour law) can stipulate further requirements.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

The live monitoring of employees' communications is not explicitly prohibited under German data protection, criminal and labour laws, but the threshold for justifying measures of this kind is high and requires, inter alia, a thorough weighing of the company's interests – including the possibility of less invasive measures – against the rights and interests of the respective employee.

The review of historic email and other communication data is generally permitted if justified by legitimate interests of the company and if there are no overriding interests of the respective employee. To preserve proportionality, some specific rules for data reviews have to be observed, such as the exclusion of private data, search term filters and independent reviewers obliged to secrecy. The employee's prior consent would only justify the processing of the data if it is given freely on an informed basis, which can generally be disputed in hierarchical structures.

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

In the course of criminal or cartel proceedings, companies are often subjected to search and seize measures. The relevant orders must, inter alia, include the facts giving rise to the suspicion and be proportionate.

Affected companies can, among other remedies, apply for a judicial review of such a measure or defend themselves against it by means of a judicial complaint. In practice, however, such legal remedies are mostly unsuccessful.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

The conditions under which documents from internal investigations in Germany are exempt from seizure are largely unclear. To protect (potentially) privileged documents, the following measures, among others, may be taken:

- enter into an attorney–client relationship with the company affected by an investigation (and not, for example, its holding company) and document that the purpose of the mandate is (at least) to defend the company;

- do not establish client's possession of work products at risk of seizure;
- take organisational measures to separate documents that are expected to be seizable from documents that are expected to be privileged; and
- label correspondence and documents as 'privileged' or similar.

The Draft Corporate Sanctioning Act could have a significant effect on the protection of attorney work-product. According to the official explanation to the draft bill, documents from internal investigations shall be seizable, even if they are held in the custody of lawyers, unless the client is formally a defendant in criminal proceedings and there is a 'relationship of trust' with regard to the documents. Practitioners in Germany have – rightly – criticised this interpretation and it is possible that it will be changed in the course of the further legislative proceedings.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

Defendants have the right to remain silent towards the authorities and do not need to actively participate in the investigation (i.e., the right not to incriminate oneself).

Witnesses (at least in public prosecutors' offices and courts) are obliged, in principle, to provide information. As an exception, they may refuse to testify if (1) they are related to the defendant or (2) their testimony would expose them or a relative to the risk of prosecution.

If the witness is subject to the obligation of professional secrecy (as are lawyers), testifying may be refused in this regard.

Whistleblowing and employee rights

28 Describe the whistleblowing framework in your country. What financial incentive schemes exist for whistleblowers? What legal protections are in place for whistleblowers?

There is currently no general legal framework for whistleblowing in Germany. In April 2019, the European Parliament passed the EU Whistleblowing Directive, and the European Council is expected to confirm it in the near future. The EU Member States will then have two years to implement laws aimed at strengthening whistleblower protection in line with the Directive. From then on, at least larger companies will have a duty to implement whistleblowing systems. Whistleblowers who act in good faith will be protected from any retaliation if they report misconduct to the company or the competent authority.

Until this legislation has been passed, German law provides protection for whistleblowers under general labour law principles and some specific provisions, such as with respect to the reporting of safety-at-work issues and prohibited uncovered short sales.

Currently, there is no general duty on German companies to implement whistleblowing structures under German law except for financial institutions (section 25a of the German Banking Act).

Financial incentive schemes for whistleblowers are not common in Germany and are not expected to be implemented in the near future. However, as already discussed (see question 6), if the whistleblower is one of the perpetrators, disclosure to the authorities may well reduce a potential sentence significantly (see section 46b, German Criminal Code). In cartel cases, the fine to be imposed on a cartel participant is even waived if he or she is the first to contact the German cartel authorities to uncover the cartel.

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

Employees are generally obliged to co-operate with internal investigations and no distinction is made here between employees who are suspected of having committed a wrongdoing and those who have potential knowledge about a wrongdoing or just the circumstance surrounding it. Employees are obliged to co-operate even if their co-operation could result in them being convicted for specific crimes.

If an employee co-operates with an internal investigation, the company may have to cover the costs of the employee's legal counsel, subject to a case-by-case analysis.

German data protection laws impose specific information duties on employers that process employees' information in the course of an internal investigation. Affected employees have to be informed about the subject and purpose of the investigation and their rights under the applicable data protection laws unless doing so would interfere with the integrity of the internal investigation.

The duty to co-operate applies in the same way whether the individual is an employee, an officer or a director. However, directors are not just obliged to co-operate with internal investigations but may be obliged to actively initiate and conduct them.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

Although there is no general differentiation between employees under suspicion and others, German labour and data protection laws require the weighing of the employee's interests against those of the company's before measures are taken that affect the employee's rights. The degree of suspicion against an employee may tip the scales in this context.

Under German corporate law, a company's management board must investigate potential misconduct and must put a stop to any misconduct discovered, revise the compliance programme and the internal controls affected and take steps, including relating to personnel, as a result of the misconduct. Therefore, the management board may be required to transfer or even give certain employees their notice, based on a thorough case-by-case analysis.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

In general, employees are obliged to co-operate with internal investigations, even if this could incriminate themselves. Depending on the specific case and the impact of the refusal, an employee may be dismissed if he or she refuses to co-operate.

Commencing an internal investigation

32 Is it common practice in your country to prepare a document setting out terms of reference or investigatory scope before commencing an internal investigation? What issues would it cover?

Yes, an investigation plan is key to an efficient and successful investigation. An investigation plan would normally include the scope of the investigation, the respective responsibility of the company and the law firm, the steps to be taken, the data and documents to be collected and the custodians.

The investigation plan is an important starting point and requires ongoing revision subject to the findings made and the obstacles encountered.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

The concrete steps to be taken in this situation really depend on the nature of the issue discovered. Generally, German corporate law imposes certain duties on the company's management board if there are indications of misconduct. First, the management board has to investigate the potential misconduct and put a stop to it. Second, the management board has to revise the compliance programme and the internal controls affected and take action, potentially including relating to personnel, as a result of the misconduct.

To a certain extent, the management board can delegate those obligations to internal department (e.g., compliance). However, to fulfil the board's supervisory duty, regular reporting to the management board of incidents handled by the internal departments is required. If an issue comes to light that points to severe misconduct or a matter that is potentially of high risk for the company, the management board should be notified immediately.

Although there is no general duty to report misconduct to the competent authority, reporting may be required in some specific cases. In particular, misconduct with a tax implication for the company has to be reported to the tax authorities in the vast majority of cases.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

First, it is generally advisable to enforce a litigation hold and to collect the respective data. This step should further be extended to documents and data in the relevant context and should not be restricted to the documents and data requested by the law enforcement authority.

In a second step, the company will have to assess whether it is actually obliged to produce the requested data and documents. Independently of the result of this assessment, the company will have to answer the question whether it is willing to co-operate and will have to find a strategic position regarding the authority. In many cases, it is advisable to co-operate with the authority to prevent coercive measures and reputational damage.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

In general, there is no duty to publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority. Whether a disclosure is made or not largely depends on the interests of the company in the specific case.

Exceptionally, stock listed companies may be subject to a disclosure requirement if the investigation has an effect on the company that would be likely to have a significant effect on the company's stock price (ad hoc announcements).

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

Especially in larger and complex proceedings, authorities welcome internal investigations as part of a company's pledge to co-operate with a criminal investigation. In our experience, in most cases, authorities take into account the costs of an internal investigation when it comes to sanctions and fines if the internal investigation is done properly and the company has co-operated fully with the authority.

As far as possible, the measures to be taken as part of an internal investigation conducted in parallel with an official investigation should be coordinated with the authorities. Otherwise, there is a risk that an authority might feel obstructed by an internal investigation and that a possible bonus could turn into a handicap.

Attorney–client privilege

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

German case law is inconsistent on this issue. In principle, protection against seizure depends on whether (1) the company is already under an official investigation or at least objectively likely to be officially investigated and (2) the relevant documents are drafted for defence purposes.

To protect potentially privileged materials, the protective measures described in question 26 may be taken.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

The key principles are as described in question 37. In general, these principles are true for both companies and individuals.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

The exemption from seizure as outlined in question 37 applies in principle only to defence communication with external counsel.

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

Protection from seizure can also cover work-product of foreign lawyers drafted in their capacity as defence counsel. International attorneys, however, may be subject to restrictions as to their ability to appear in court.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

The disclosure of privileged documents is generally regarded as a co-operative step by national authorities. However, there is no general concept of waiving privilege under German law.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

There is no concept of limited waiver of privilege in Germany.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

Waiving privilege in another country has no direct legal effect on privilege claims in Germany. However, it is possible that the waived documents may be seized from the third person abroad if he or she does not enjoy protection against seizure under German law.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

The concept of common interest privilege does not exist in Germany.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

The question as to the extent to which assistance should also be included in protection against seizure has not yet been conclusively clarified by case law. As a rule, the further documents leave the sphere of an external counsel, the weaker their protection.

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

Interviews are an important and common part of internal investigations in Germany.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

National case law is inconsistent on this issue. In principle, protection against seizure depends on whether (1) the company is already under an official investigation or at least objectively likely to be officially investigated, and (2) the relevant documents are drafted for defence purposes.

In the case of interview protocols and attorney reports, it should be argued that these work-products also serve as preparation for corporate defence and are therefore privileged.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

An employee is generally obliged to co-operate with internal investigations and to tell the truth even at the risk of self-incrimination. This may not apply to interviews of third parties, such as former employees.

As many employees are not aware of their duty to tell the truth, it is customary to inform them about it in an introduction. Other customary elements of the introduction, if applicable, are:

- information that the legal counsels conducting the interview are lawyers of the company and are not acting for the interviewee;
- the possibility of an employee engaging his or her own attorney and clarification about the costs (if relevant and to prevent disruption, this information may already be provided in the invitation to the interview);
- the company may choose to share parts or all information provided in the interview with national or foreign courts, or law enforcement authorities;
- refusing to co-operate may lead to disciplinary action;
- the modus of the protocol, whether the employee will be granted access to it and whether he or she will have to confirm its content; and
- the employee's data protection rights, ideally accompanied by such information in writing.

Essentially, this information is very similar to the Upjohn warning concept developed in the United States.

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

A state-of-the-art interview in Germany usually begins with a briefing about, inter alia, the subject of the interview and the interviewee's rights as set out under question 48. The interview environment should be appropriate (e.g., a neutral meeting room on the company's premises or at the law firm's offices) and – depending on the duration of the interview – sufficient breaks, drinks and food should be offered.

Depending on the stage of the internal investigation, documents may well be shown to witnesses during interviews.

German case law is not yet settled on the question of whether an employee has the right to be accompanied at an interview by his or her own counsel and who has to bear the costs. However, companies usually allow interviewees to have a legal representative of their own in attendance, at least in cases where the company is represented as well. In the recent past, there have been discussions as to whether an employee's right against self-incrimination in internal investigations shall be introduced into German law. According to the new Draft Sanctioning Act, employees may (indirectly) be granted the right to remain silent if they risk self-incrimination.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

In principle, there is no obligation in Germany to report misconduct to law enforcement authorities. Exceptionally, however, individual statutory regulations may require a report. This applies, inter alia, in connection with incorrect tax returns and in the field of money laundering.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

This depends on a comprehensive analysis in each particular case. Generally, in cases where there is a high risk that the competent authorities may get hold of the information, or the company's future business may be compromised as a consequence of the undisclosed misconduct (e.g., if a declaration of honour cannot be signed), disclosure may be advisable.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

First, you should make sure you have the right timing, in particular with respect to the ongoing investigations. Then, the company representative should contact the competent authority and set a meeting for initial discussions based on a summarised set of facts, including evidence. During this meeting, the further proceedings should be agreed mutually.

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

This will depend on the status of the investigation and the negotiations. It is generally possible to discuss requests made by the authorities. It is important to understand that, although there is no legal duty to reply to requests for information in criminal investigations, refusal to do so is likely to lead to a raid by the law enforcement authority.

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

The investigation itself cannot be challenged in court.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

Preventing inconsistent communication with different authorities is certainly important. However, it should be considered that, in particular in complex investigations, different authorities develop different focus areas, for example as a result of a different legal assessment.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

In principle, companies are legally not obliged to produce any material from abroad. However, refusal to do so could lead to legal assistance requests from German authorities to their foreign counterparts and would be seen as unco-operative, thus jeopardising any co-operation bonus. Therefore, it might be advisable to produce the documents outside Germany, provided the company has the power to do so under company law. In situations such as this, the company is also obliged to respect local laws, in particular data protection laws.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

As already discussed in question 9, law enforcement authorities have implemented cross-border communication networks and coordination units to co-operate effectively, and we have see a rise in international co-operation. The legal framework is fragmented and includes EU regulations as well as bilateral and multilateral treaties.

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

Generally, investigating officers are bound by confidentiality with respect to information received in the course of an investigation. However, third parties may have a right to access the investigation file or parts of it, for instance to prepare civil claims against the perpetrator.

Public officials in the tax authorities are additionally obliged to observe tax secrecy (under section 30, German Fiscal Code).

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

Subject to a thorough assessment of the local law prohibiting the production, we would generally advise complying with applicable law and trying to convince the German authority either to forego the requested documents or to seek administrative co-operation to formally seize the documents locally.

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

See questions 18, 19 and 59. We would generally advise engaging with the investigating authorities to evaluate alternatives.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

Before voluntarily producing documents, privilege issues in cross-border situation have to be considered. In addition, in the case of voluntary production, increased attention should be paid to data protection aspects. With respect to confidentiality, there are no relevant distinctions between voluntary production and compelled production under German law.

Prosecution and penalties

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

Individuals can, in particular, be sanctioned by fines or imprisonment. They may also be banned from carrying on their profession.

For companies, fines and profit confiscation are particularly relevant. In addition, exclusion from (public) tenders can have a significant negative effect on companies (see questions 2 and 65 regarding potential changes that may be introduced with the Draft Corporate Sanctioning Act).

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

A debarment under German public procurement law can also be based on misconduct of the company or its employees abroad. To mitigate this risk, a settlement abroad should be accompanied by self-cleansing and remediation measures by the company in Germany. These may include, inter alia, disciplinary measures against the individuals involved, compensation for damage sustained, co-operation with investigating authorities, and strengthening of the compliance management system.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

Authorities take into account, inter alia, the degree and extent of the misconduct committed, the subjective accusability of the misconduct, economic circumstances and the extent to which the parties concerned have co-operated with the investigating authorities. In addition, the Federal Supreme Court recently decided that the design of a compliance management system and the extent to which it was adapted at the time of the misconduct, and the improvements implemented after the misconduct, must also be taken into account.

The Draft Corporate Sanctioning Act, in particular, and in addition to the criteria set out above, allows for a reduction in sanctions imposed on corporations if the company initiates an internal investigation and fully co-operates with the authorities. To be eligible for such a reduction, the internal investigation must (1) be independent (i.e., not conducted by the company's defence counsel), (2) be fair and (3) make a material contribution to clarifying the corporate misconduct. Further, the company must co-operate continuously and unrestrictedly with the prosecuting authorities, and the results of the internal investigations, the essential documents and the final report on the internal investigations must be disclosed to the prosecuting authorities.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

Not at the moment. Currently, settlements with authorities are reached via a 'negotiated' fine or confiscation order where the misconduct and the facts are described. Under German law, neither the order nor the statement of facts are public. Nevertheless, in high-profile cases, the authorities usually issue a short press release summarising the facts and the case (approximately one to two pages). The settlement need not be approved by the court, but lies in the discretion of the public prosecutor. German authorities often expect the company under investigation to improve their internal structures before a settlement is made in order to achieve a decent deal.

The current German federal government seeks to revise the corporate sanctions regime.

The Draft Corporate Sanctioning Act offers the alternative of ending proceedings by warning the undertaking, reserving the right to impose penalties and, in some cases, tied to conditions and directives during the period for which such a right is reserved. In such cases, the court may additionally order the appointment of a compliance monitor.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

No.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

Companies should consider in particular the economic and reputational effects of the settlement itself, the (regularly positive) consequences of terminated investigations for the operational capacities of the company, the consequences for public procurements (e.g., potential debarments in Germany or abroad), further co-operation with investigations against individuals and the structural consequences to be drawn to prevent similar misconduct in the future.

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

See question 65. At the moment, corporate compliance monitors are not foreseen by the law and are therefore not used in Germany. However, the Draft Corporate Sanctioning Act, if enacted, would introduce compliance monitors as a procedural instrument to enable deferred prosecution.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

Parallel private actions are allowed. In some cases, however, civil courts tend to suspend proceedings until criminal proceedings on the same subject have been completed.

Private plaintiffs may have the right to access criminal files if, inter alia, they present a legitimate interest in this, and if this is not opposed by the overriding interests of the defendant or other persons who are worthy of protection.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

In principle, investigations are not public. However, they regularly become publicly known if the case is interesting enough. Apart from a few exceptions, criminal trials are public.

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

This depends on the specifics of the case and the in-house capabilities of the company. In larger cases where public opinion is of an elevated relevance, the engagement of public relations consultants is quite common. The communication strategy needs to be fully aligned with the company's internal findings and legal defence strategy. In our experience, the communication strategy should strike a balance between 'litigation language' and frank and honest communication.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

Usually, no substantial public statements on the allegations should be made while the facts are still under investigation. If possible, next steps can be communicated.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

This must be assessed on in each particular case, taking into account all rights and legitimate interests of the company, its shareholders and the authorities involved.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

Following a programmatic agreement of the grand coalition, Germany's Federal Ministry of Justice has unveiled the draft of a new Corporate Sanctioning Act, introducing corporate criminal liability in Germany and significantly ratcheting up corporate liability for business-related criminal offences. The draft bill:

- raises possible penalties significantly, to up to 10 per cent of group turnover;
- creates incentives to invest in corporate compliance programmes;
- facilitates penalty reductions when an independent internal investigation is conducted and the company in question co-operates with the investigating authorities;
- significantly limits legal privilege (not only for internal investigations);
- offers the alternative of ending proceedings by warning the undertaking, reserving the right to impose penalties and, in some cases, tied to conditions and directives during the period for which such a right is reserved; and
- permits a court to order the appointment of a compliance monitor.

Currently, the draft is still under wraps. It may be passed by the German Bundestag following deliberation by the cabinet and any necessary amendments.

General context, key principles and hot topics

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

For the past four years, the Anti-Corruption Prosecutor's Office has been investigating an alleged high-profile corruption case involving a multinational pharmaceutical company. The investigation was initiated when the prosecuting authorities in Greece received knowledge of allegations made by unknown witnesses, who acted as whistleblowers to the authorities in the United States. According to these testimonies, executives of the pharmaceutical company allegedly bribed high-ranking public officials (including politicians) in exchange for securing favourable treatment as regards the price-listing of its products. Moreover, the investigation expanded into alleged bribery schemes involving healthcare professionals to increase the prescription of the pharmaceutical company's products. This has been a highly politicised criminal case, in which politicians (two former prime ministers and former ministers of health) from the major political parties, as well as other individuals, have been openly targeted by the media and officers of the former government.

The Anti-Corruption Prosecutor's Office carried out multiple dawn raids at the company's premises in Athens and seized a large number of documents and laptops. A significant number of witnesses have been examined as well. In parallel, other agencies, such as the Economic and Financial Crime Unit (SDOE) and the Health and Welfare Inspectorate, have been investigating this case. To date, the Prosecutor's Office has not been able to find any evidence to corroborate the whistleblowers' vague allegations, and it has recently dropped the case in respect of the former prime ministers and ministers of health (with the exception of one).

1 Ilias Anagnostopoulos, Jerina Zapanti and Alexandros Tsagkalidis are members of Anagnostopoulos.

Other major investigations have been conducted in relation to multinational companies that have reportedly been systematically giving money to public officials to secure awards of multimillion-euro government contracts, in respect of advanced communication systems, medical supplies and military expenditure (such as Siemens, Johnson & Johnson/DePuy, HDW/Ferrostaal, STN). Investigations have also targeted acts of corruption of former government officials in relation to facilitating payments and tax fraud schemes through real estate deals.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

Criminal liability is an exception when referring to a legal entity because, under Greek law, only an individual may be liable for a criminal act. However, harmonisation with international corporate standards, and the need to bring internal legislation in line with European and international instruments, has led to provisions for liability of entities in the form of administrative measures and fines, among others.

Corporate conduct may be punishable in certain cases. Company conduct (e.g., in the context of anti-corruption, anti-money laundering and anti-cartel legislation) is usually punishable when it is linked with positive gains or advantages. The company is liable as an entity – notwithstanding the individual liability of employees – when there is some type of profit, gain or advantage to the company. The severity of punishment in these cases (in the form of administrative penalties or fines) usually depends on the type of profit or gain, and the annual turnover of the company.

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

The responsibility for the investigation of corporate conduct lies with regulatory and prosecuting authorities (depending on the subject of investigation) but the responsibility for criminal prosecution of corporate conduct always lies with the Prosecutor's Office (the Prosecutor). Regulatory authorities may investigate – within their scope – corporate conduct (e.g., the Competition Commission for cartel offences or the Capital Market Commission for insider dealing or market abuse), and any findings relating to criminal offences are forwarded to the Prosecutor to decide on further proceedings.

It is most common for the SDOE to undertake the necessary preliminary investigations, evidence gathering, reports, and so on, following a prosecutorial order. In cases of money laundering, the Greek Financial Intelligence Unit gathers all necessary information and evidence, and if it believes there is enough to support a criminal case, it forwards the case to the Prosecutor.

The Prosecutor opens a case against the natural person or officers of an entity, following standard criminal procedure, namely conducting a preliminary investigation, filing charges and making a referral to investigation (conducted by an investigating judge). It is not unusual in serious and complex cases (e.g., corruption, large-scale money laundering and fraud) for enforcement agencies and the Prosecutor to take action to secure evidence (by issuing a warrant for search and seizure or issuing freezing orders) before any charges are filed and before persons of interest are called for questioning.

Companies are not criminally prosecuted because they are not criminally liable, but sanctions are imposed against them in the form of administrative penalties for the actions of individuals held liable for criminal acts from which the companies have benefited.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

A preliminary investigation is initiated by the Prosecutor following a notitia criminis, namely a criminal complaint (by an individual or entity, usually the victim of a crime) against certain persons, or information submitted to the Prosecutor by another authority, or even information that has come to the knowledge of the Prosecutor through the media or any other sources, and it is usually the very first stage of the proceedings. It is ordered by a prosecutor, unless an agency or enforcement authority may by law gather evidence and information through a preliminary enquiry and submit a request to the Prosecutor for further investigation. All preliminary investigations, apart from regular tax reviews, are supervised by the Prosecutor.

The standard of proof to open a preliminary investigation is low. Even slim evidence of an alleged criminal offence (e.g., unconfirmed press reports or anonymous information) may justify a preliminary investigation.

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

The prosecutor or the investigating judge who supervises the investigation should be informed regarding any objections raised against a notice or subpoena. Also, if there is a disagreement between a defendant and the prosecutor or the investigating judge regarding such matters, the validity or lawfulness of a notice or subpoena could be challenged before the Judicial Council, according to the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure (CCP).

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

Yes. Articles 263A and 187A of the Criminal Code (CC) provide for immunity or leniency for individuals who inform or assist (or both) the prosecuting authorities on corruption cases (263A) or cases involving criminal or terrorist organisations (187A).

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

The detection and prosecution of corruption is one of the main goals of prosecuting and enforcement authorities. Legal provisions in respect of acts of corruption have been amended three times in the past five years to conform with international instruments. Greece has ratified all major EU and international conventions and has passed internal legislation to comply with them. However, continuous amendment of existing legislation creates legal uncertainty and poses complex issues in respect of pending investigations or ongoing trial hearings. More generally, it is apparent that an integrated anti-corruption policy is needed, including better coordination of various legal instruments and anti-corruption agencies.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

In 2016, Greece transposed Directive 2013/40/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 12 August 2013 on attacks against information systems, and replacing Council Framework Decision 2005/222/JHA, and amended its criminal legislation accordingly to strengthen cybersecurity protection; in particular, under the CC, to punish:

- hindering the operation of information systems (Article 292B);
- the supply of hardware or software for the purpose of hindering the operation of information systems (Article 292C);
- unlawful access to an information system (Article 370C);
- unlawful extraction of data from an information system (Article 370D); and
- computer fraud (Article 386A)

The investigation of criminal cases in relation to the above-mentioned crimes is handled by the Cyber Crime Division of the Hellenic Police. After their investigation is finished, they forward the case file to the prosecutors with the court of first instance.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

All regular crimes committed with the use of a computer are punished by Greek law. Special provisions can be found for the crimes of child pornography and attracting children for sexual purposes through information systems (Articles 348A and 348B of the CC). The Cyber Crime Division of the Hellenic Police handles the investigation of cybercrimes as well.

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

As a general rule, Greek law does not have extraterritorial effect. Enforcement and sanctions imposed by the Greek authorities are not effective in other jurisdictions unless they meet the requirements of mutual assistance in criminal matters and mutual recognition of judgments through bilateral and multilateral treaties.

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

Cross-border investigations and co-operation with other countries' law enforcement or prosecutorial authorities have become common practice in large-scale investigations. Special law enforcement agencies, such as the SDOE, have entered into agreements with similar agencies in other countries, which has enabled a faster and more efficient exchange of information. Agreements between agencies usually follow framework agreements or treaties between countries. In the case of Greece, most aspects of international co-operation are treaty-based. There are two sets of rules applicable to this prosecutorial co-operation, one of which applies to co-operation with Member States of the European Union (in these cases, all procedures and functions are simplified and faster). In all other cases, provisions for mutual assistance apply (for investigating acts or requests for information).

Greek legislation has undergone a series of amendments to fully comply with international treaties and the obligations arising from Greece's participation in international organisations, among others. However, the introduction of new legislation and measures not totally compatible with existing procedures and practices has prevented a smooth integration of new measures with traditional prosecutorial and investigative practices. Also, efforts to adjust legislation to international instruments as much as possible (especially in combating corruption and money laundering) have led, in many instances, to the powers of different law enforcement agencies overlapping, and there is no general rule or central authority to resolve such issues or to propose any necessary adjustments.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

The rules of double jeopardy, or ne bis in idem, are not directly applicable to entities as they are not the subject of a criminal prosecution. These rules may be indirectly applied (through examination of individual criminal liability) but this is a disputed matter.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

No. In certain cases, Greece has entered into a settlement in the context of ad hoc agreements with the companies under investigation. These types of settlements do not cover the criminal liability of individuals, such as directors or employees of the company.

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

Foreign decisions are usually taken into account by Greek courts in relation to the findings regarding the merits of the case, but they do not bar Greek proceedings from advancing. The Greek state, in practice, applies its law to companies for conduct within the country or for acts that have effects within the country. In this respect, Greek authorities seek to impose the law on companies either registered in Greece or active in the Greek economy (e.g., companies with registered offices in other countries that have agencies or subsidiaries in Greece).

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

Greece does not have its own sanctions programme but sanctions are imposed through EU Regulations, which are directly applicable, and by UN Resolutions, which are implemented by Presidential Decrees.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

See question 15.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

As regards the freezing and unfreezing of assets of states, legal persons, legal entities or natural persons imposed by UN Security Council resolutions, UN decisions or pursuant to EU Regulations or Decisions, for any legitimate reason under international law, the competent authority is Unit B of the Hellenic Financial Intelligence Unit. As regards restrictions on imports and exports, the competent authority is the General Directorate of International Economic Policy, Directorate of Import-Export Regimes and Trade Instruments of the Ministry of Development and Competitiveness. These authorities often liaise, coordinate and communicate with their foreign counterparts to exchange information.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

Council Regulation (EC) No. 2271/96 (known as the Blocking Regulation) is directly applicable in Greece.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

See question 18.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

Allegations of corporate misconduct most often come to light through investigations conducted by regulatory agencies such as the Competition Commission, the Capital Market Commission and the Financial Intelligence Unit in respect of breaches of regulations within their competence. The authorities regularly receive related information (officially and unofficially) from a number of sources, including whistleblowers. Self-reporting by companies is still rather unusual.

Information gathering

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

- Regulation (EU) 2016/679 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 27 April 2016 on the protection of natural persons with regard to the processing of personal data and on the free movement of such data, and repealing Directive 95/46/EC (the General Data Protection Regulation), which came into effect in May 2018. Legislation is currently being drafted to implement the Regulation.
- Law 2472/1997: Protection of Individuals with regard to the Processing of Personal Data.
- Law 3471/2006: Protection of personal data and privacy in the electronic telecommunications sector and amendment of Law 2472/1997.
- By-laws issued by the Hellenic Data Protection Authority (HDPA).

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

The HDPA is a constitutionally independent administrative authority that supervises the application of data protection laws and regulations, and imposes administrative sanctions on natural or legal persons who violate those laws. The primary mission of the HDPA is the protection of individuals from the unlawful processing of their personal data and providing assistance if it is established that an individual's rights have been violated in any sector (such as financial, health, insurance, education, public administration, transport or mass media).

Moreover, criminal sanctions may be imposed by the courts on persons who violate data protection legislation.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

Internal investigations are not regulated by special legal provisions, so the general rules concerning data protection and privileges apply. As a general rule, employees must be loyal to the company they serve, handle sensitive information with care and avoid activities conflicting with the company's interests. On the other hand, the company, as an employer, must respect and protect sensitive personal information about its employees and any personal communications.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

It is common practice, also recognised by the Greek courts, for an employer to have access to its employees' business communications, such as emails, calls or text messages circulated through the company's communication infrastructure (servers, backup storage, etc.). In most cases, this type of access is provided for in the company's internal work regulations and is agreed by both parties in the employment contract.

Dawn raids and search warrants

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

In the majority of cases, the authorities will send a written request to a company to provide certain information or documents. In principle, a company must co-operate with the authorities, at least in terms of providing requested information and documentation. Failure to comply with such a request usually has no direct consequences (unless otherwise provided for by law) but may lead to an unfavourable report by the authorities or an on-site search and seizure to obtain requested material.

In all cases, the company may object to handing over certain documents or material (e.g., privileged commercial information or correspondence) and refer to the Prosecutor to resolve the issue. In practice, when an on-site search is in progress, the company may not refuse to hand over material but may raise its objections regarding the nature of the material taken (e.g., privileged information) when signing the confiscation documents, in which case the material is sealed and taken by the agency, pending resolution of the issue by the courts.

On some occasions (depending on the scope and nature of an investigation), the company may be requested to submit its views in respect of the issues under investigation or to offer evidence in its defence (of any type: witnesses, bank records, correspondence, among others) contesting the views of the investigating authority (usually included in a draft report).

Dawn raids may take place in emergency situations (to secure evidence, for instance) and home searches are conducted in the presence of a prosecutor or magistrate.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

According to Article 212 of the CCP, information in the possession of clerics, lawyers, doctors, pharmacists and military diplomatic officials is considered privileged. During a search of its premises, a company may declare that certain documents are privileged information pursuant to Article 212 of the CCP. If the investigating authority contests this assertion, it will confiscate the documents, seal them without acquiring knowledge of their content and request the competent professional association to decide on the confidentiality of the seized documents. The general rule is that documents containing privileged information may not be included in the confiscated documents. This restriction is not applicable when the person protected by privilege (such as a lawyer, doctor or cleric) is under investigation as an accomplice in a criminal act. Personal documents of employees are protected to a certain extent, depending on the specifics of the case.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

All authorities with the power to conduct investigations in their field (e.g., the Prosecutor, the police, the Financial and Economic Crime Unit, the Capital Market Commission) may request that individuals give statements following an order by the Prosecutor or in accordance with specific legal provisions. In cases of serious business crimes, the Prosecutor usually orders a specific person to give a statement either as a witness or as a suspect (witness under caution) while the actual questioning is most commonly conducted by the police or the Financial and Economic Crime Unit (which is an agency supervised by the Ministry of Finance and has powers similar to the police, such as conducting investigations, examining witnesses and performing on-site inspections).

If an individual is called as a witness, he or she appears before the authority that has received the Prosecutor's order and gives a statement under oath. Persons called as witnesses to provide testimony must appear before the authority that conducts the investigation to answer the questions. Witnesses have the right to avoid self-incrimination.

Individuals called as suspects have the right to request copies of the case file and sufficient time to prepare for questioning. At this preliminary stage, suspects are also entitled to a defence attorney, who may be present during questioning, and to file written submissions in their defence.

In all cases where questioning of individuals as suspects is involved, relevant provisions of the CCP apply, namely the right to avoid self-incrimination, the right to an attorney, time to prepare one's defence, the right to remain silent, and so on. The structure of pretrial procedure is such that a suspect may have full representation by a defence attorney and full protection of his or her rights.

Whistleblowing and employee rights

Greece does not have systematic legislation protecting whistleblowers in either the public or the private sector, nor does it have any relevant financial incentive schemes. Whistleblowers may be considered as witnesses in the public interest, which results in complete protection from criminal prosecution with respect to offences such as disclosure of privileged information or filing a false complaint relating to the information the whistleblower provides to the authorities, according to Article 47 of the CCP.

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

Local employment law does not grant special rights to employees who are under investigation, nor does it distinguish between officers and directors. Nevertheless, employees must be treated with respect, and the investigation should be conducted in accordance with data protection and labour laws.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

In cases of alleged serious misconduct, both employees and directors are usually notified in case the individual wishes to have counsel present at interviews; it is for the individual to decide on the presence of counsel.

A company's policy in cases of individual liability will depend on the type of misconduct (negligent or deliberate), the seriousness of the actions, the position of the individual, among other things. It is customary for a company to collaborate with an individual's counsel when the action occurred as a result of his or her position in the company (e.g., administrative proceedings or criminal proceedings against a managing director for an environmental offence).

Termination of an employee's contract is something that the company has to decide on after reviewing the whole case and assessing possible consequences for the entity. If the employee has acted against the company's best interests and the actions are the reason the government seeks to impose liability, the company may have no option but to terminate the contract to protect its interests, privileged information, and so on. In the end, it is a strategic decision for the company unless the particulars of the case leave no option other than to terminate the employment. This is especially the case when an employee is involved in large-scale or serious violations of duties, has deliberately acted against the company's interests, or engaged in fraudulent activity against the company itself, its clients or the general public.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

The obligation of an employee to participate in an internal investigation depends on the terms of the employment contract and the applicable law. Refusal to participate in internal proceedings could eventually lead to dismissal.

Commencing an internal investigation

32 Is it common practice in your country to prepare a document setting out terms of reference or investigatory scope before commencing an internal investigation? What issues would it cover?

No special statutory rules regulate internal investigations. Thus, the way in which internal investigations are conducted varies. Usually, the department of a company that is to conduct the investigation decides how to proceed.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

There is no general rule or obligation for self-reporting. A series of legislative measures have been passed to enable enforcement agencies to detect misconduct with or without the co-operation of the companies. In this respect, accounting officers must report any suspicious activity (relating to tax evasion, money laundering and the like) if there are indications of misconduct.

However, there are special provisions in numerous laws and regulations that stipulate self-reporting of internal wrongdoing and cover most aspects of business activity. In some fields or industries, provisions for self-reporting are more stringent (e.g., banking and financial services), while in others there is no explicit provision for self-reporting (most commercial activities in the private sector); however, rules for reporting criminal acts to the authorities (as a general legal obligation) may apply and this might, to some extent, lead to some kind of self-reporting.

There are specific industries or fields in which self-reporting is a prerequisite to obtaining the benefit of leniency measures or for immunity provisions to apply in cases of violations of competition law, exposure of corrupt practices of public officials, organised crime and terrorism.

In any of these procedures, the authorities can choose to impose lesser penalties or grant complete immunity. These provisions may apply to corporate entities only, to individuals only, or to entities and individuals alike. Considering that, in the majority of cases involving serious corporate misconduct, the authorities may impose administrative penalties and measures affecting the company's ability to continue and develop its activities, as a rule, participation in a leniency programme is considered the better option for a company and the implicated individuals.

Where leniency or immunity measures are provided for (e.g., cartel offences, corrupt practices or money laundering), the extent to which they apply depends on the type of information provided to the authorities. As a rule, effective and complete exposure of illegal practices may lead to lesser penalties or immunity from criminal prosecution or administrative sanctions. Immunity would usually be granted when the reporting of illegal practices is of such significance that it contributes substantially to the exposure of illegal activity or perpetrators.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

- Notify the legal department regarding the nature of the notice or subpoena and consult on how to proceed next.
- Retrieve any requested documents or data.
- Evaluate the possible implications from a criminal and an administrative perspective in relation to the requested documents or data.
- Decide whether and how to comply with the request.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

No general obligation is provided for by Greek law, but in certain fields (e.g., competition regulation), corporations are given motives for self-reporting through provisions for leniency or immunity programmes, or both. Listed companies must disclose relevant information to the public in accordance with the existing regulations.

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

Internal investigations are welcomed by the law authorities, when they are conducted in a manner that leads to direct gathering of evidence, preservation and referral of evidence to the authorities. However, the absence of a clear legal framework for regulating internal investigations poses complex issues in relation to the protection of affected individuals.

Attorney–client privilege

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

Attorney–client privilege may be asserted at any time. However, it is not always easy to determine what falls under this protection. Apart from the obvious privileged information (such as correspondence between an attorney and a client), there are other forms of communication (e.g., memos, drafts of letters or other documented material) that may contain privileged information.

The company is not expected to waive its rights or privileges (especially attorney–client privilege) as part of its co-operation with the authorities. However, the company may choose to waive its rights in whole or in part with respect to such privileges if it becomes necessary for the purposes of its defence in regulatory or criminal procedures. For documents and material protected by special legislation (e.g., patents), the company is entitled to deny access, give limited access or request that the material be handled by the competent authorities in accordance with special legal provisions.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

Attorney–client privilege is considered to be of paramount importance and is well established in Greek legislation. Sources of this privilege are to be found in the Lawyer's Code of Conduct, the CCP, the Criminal Code and the Code of Civil Procedure. Attorney–client privilege is broad and covers any type of data (verbal, written, electronic, etc.) obtained from the client, regardless of whether the client is a natural or legal person. Attorney–client privilege may be invoked even after the termination of the relationship between an attorney and a client.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

Yes. In Greek law there is no distinction between in-house and external counsel in this respect.

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

No. In principle, it applies to lawyers registered in Greece.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

Waiving the attorney–client privilege is not common practice in the legal system and is not provided for as a mandatory or required step in any context.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

When a company is requested by the authorities to produce privileged information (and has decided to comply with the request), it is common practice to provide limited information relating only to the scope of the request. However, no effective safeguards are in place as to how the information provided could be used by third parties, including other authorities and agencies.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

Yes. Waiver of privilege is valid only when it is conducted according to the provisions of Greek law.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

There is no special rule regarding common interest privilege. It falls under the attorney–client privilege.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

There is no explicit legal provision or relevant case law covering this matter. Privilege can be claimed regarding the documents in the lawyer's possession. However, it is doubtful whether privilege would apply to communications between lawyers and third parties or in relation to documents in the possession of third parties.

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

Yes.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

Yes.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

See questions 36 and 29. Third parties are not obliged to testify as witnesses in corporate internal proceedings.

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

There is no established protocol for conducting internal interviews of witnesses. It is usually decided by the department within the company that is to conduct the investigation, which also decides on the strategy of the questioning and whether documents will be put to the witnesses. In cases of alleged serious misconduct, the employee is usually notified in case he or she wishes to have counsel present; it is for the employee to decide on the presence of counsel.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

A business may conduct its own internal investigation on any occasion. Whether the results should be shared with the authorities depends on the results and the nature of the case, since there is no general rule for self-reporting – with the exception of certain aspects of business activities usually related to regulatory rather than criminal provisions.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

If there is evidence of serious wrongdoing, the company may be left with no choice but to refer all gathered information to the authorities. It is important to keep in mind on all occasions that any report to the authorities by the company, especially in relation to its employees or clients, should be done carefully to avoid any possibility of it being held liable for filing false accusations. It is not expected, of course, that a case be presented to the authorities proven beyond any doubt, but care should be taken to forward information that indicates with some certainty that serious misconduct has taken place.

Self-reporting may extend to third countries, when there is favourable legislation regarding self-reporting from which the company could benefit (e.g., if the company could reach a leniency or immunity agreement under certain conditions).

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

The first step is to gather and secure all evidence regarding the alleged wrongdoing. Next, a detailed report should be drafted, to explain, with some certainty, that serious misconduct has taken place. Finally, the report is filed with the Prosecutor or other competent authority.

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

In principle, a company must co-operate with the authorities, at least in terms of providing requested information and documentation. Failure to comply with such a request usually has no direct consequences (unless otherwise provided for by law) but may lead to an unfavourable report by the authorities or an on-site search and seizure to obtain the requested material.

In practice, a company's attorney (in-house counsel or an independent attorney) liaises with the authorities and informs them whether or not the company will comply with the notice or subpoena, and requests additional information regarding the scope of the investigation and its purpose.

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

Although it is not common, the validity of investigative actions, such as searches and seizures, may be challenged before the Judicial Council, according to the provisions of the CCP.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

When multiple jurisdictions are involved, an international instrument or treaty may be applicable in the first instance. If the relevant jurisdictions are all EU Member States, EU law is applied; this is very similar to Greek law on the basic elements of procedure. If a bilateral or international treaty is in force (in relation to other countries), the provisions of the treaty are primarily applied. Treaties usually have specific provisions on how to handle privileged information or private data but, in some cases, Greece reserves the right to refuse to forward requested information if it is against Greek law, or may reserve the right to forward it subject to approval from the competent authority (e.g., dealing with protection of private data).

In large-scale investigations involving more jurisdictions, all investigations are usually carried out locally in accordance with Greek law and regulations. Exceptions may apply in cases involving national security or relating to Greece's diplomatic relations, in which case different rules (as set out in international or bilateral treaties) may apply.

A company can always notify the authorities in different jurisdictions of a current investigation in Greece, to avoid multiple prosecutions or sanctions and a potential breach of the ne bis in idem principle.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

See question 55.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

Co-operation with other countries' law enforcement or prosecutorial authorities has become common practice in large-scale investigations. Special law enforcement agencies, such as the SDOE, have entered into agreements with foreign counterparts, which has enabled a faster and more efficient exchange of information. Agreements between agencies usually follow framework agreements or treaties between countries. In the case of Greece, most aspects of international co-operation are treaty-based.

In recent times, there has been a marked increase in the co-operation of special prosecuting and investigating task forces with the corresponding authorities in other countries (especially in Germany and Switzerland) by adopting more flexible and quicker procedures.

There are two sets of rules applicable to this prosecutorial co-operation, one of which applies to co-operation with EU Member States (in these cases, all procedures and functions are simplified and faster). In all other cases, provisions for mutual assistance apply (for investigating acts or requests for information).

Greece is party to numerous international and European conventions and bilateral agreements covering all aspects of cross-border judicial co-operation, such as:

- the European Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters (1959);
- the European Convention on the suppression of terrorism (1977);
- the Convention of the Council of Europe on Laundering, Search, Seizure and Confiscation of the Proceeds from Crime (1990);
- the UN Convention against Transnational Organized Crime (2000);
- the UN Convention against Corruption (2003);
- the Council of Europe Convention on Laundering, Search, Seizure and Confiscation of the Proceeds from Crime and on the Financing of Terrorism (2005); and
- bilateral agreements with the United States, China, Poland, Mexico and other countries.

Greek courts co-operate with those of other EU Member States through the Eurojust agency.

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

Under the Greek Code of Criminal Procedure, investigation proceedings are confidential and this confidentiality applies to all information gathered by the enforcement authorities. Only the person under investigation and the authorities have access to this information. Information gathered is not disclosed to third parties unless they have a specific legitimate interest to obtain such information, following special authorisation by the prosecuting authorities.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

The company should inform the Greek authorities that complying with such a request would be illegal under the laws of that third country. Thus, the Greek authorities would decide whether to obtain the evidence through official channels (such as filing a request for mutual assistance).

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

According to Article 212 of the CCP, information in the possession of clerics, lawyers, doctors, pharmacists and military diplomatic officials is considered privileged. If an individual under investigation declares that certain documents are privileged information pursuant to Article 212 of the CCP and the investigating authority contests this assertion, the documents confiscated are sealed, without the latter acquiring knowledge of their content, and a request is submitted to the competent professional association to decide on the confidentiality of the documents.

This restriction does not apply if the person protected by privilege is under investigation as an accomplice to a criminal act.

Data protection statutes (Law 2472/1997) are not applicable in criminal proceedings.

In criminal proceedings, as opposed to administrative or tax proceedings, there is no general legal framework governing the co-operation of a private legal entity with the investigating authorities (except when explicitly stated by law). In this respect, companies are not obliged to carry out the investigating authorities' requests for providing evidence, unless stated otherwise by law (e.g., telecommunications companies are obliged to provide data, when requested by a prosecutor or the investigating judge). However, 'passive' co-operation is expected when searches are conducted at the premises of companies; in other words, a company is not allowed actively to hinder searches conducted at its offices, such as by destroying evidence.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

As a general rule, material requested by the prosecuting authorities during the conduct of a criminal investigation must be produced. If part of this material contains privileged information, there are procedures under the CCP for handling this information accordingly. Most privileges do not apply in investigations into corruption. The Anti-Corruption Prosecutor, the Financial Crime Prosecutor and certain agencies, such as the SDOE, may have full access to most of the privileged information. Production of material by third parties is also taken into consideration if they have legal access to it and it is not gathered or accessed through violation of criminal provisions (e.g., illegal recording of conversations or illegal access to personal data).

Prosecution and penalties

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

Depending on the nature of the misconduct, a broad variety of administrative sanctions may be imposed against a company, such as fines, licence revocation, a permanent or temporary ban from public tenders or state funding, or a temporary suspension of the business operations of the company.

Individuals may face criminal penalties (which may include imprisonment and monetary penalties) if they are found guilty of a criminal offence.

It should be noted that crimes relating to an entity may be committed by members of the entity, mainly managers, officers and directors. These individuals are personally liable in any case, but they cannot be held liable for criminal acts 'committed' by the entity if they do not meet the criteria (objective and subjective) of the relevant legal provision. For some types of offences (e.g., tax offences), there are special provisions as to which persons are deemed liable under the relevant law. These legal provisions may expand or restrict liability to individuals holding certain positions within an entity.

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

Suspension and debarment of a company from government contracts in Greece is an administrative penalty that can be found in various laws:

- According to Article 45 of Law 4557/2018 regarding money laundering, failure to comply with the Law's anti-money laundering provisions may lead to the corporation being prohibited from carrying out certain activities, establishing new branches in Greece or abroad, or increasing its share capital. In the case of serious or repeated violations, failure to comply may result in final or provisional withdrawal or suspension of authorisation of the corporation for a specific time or prohibition from carrying out its business.
- According to Article 28, Paragraph 5 of Law 1650/1986 (as amended by Article 7, Paragraph 4 of Law 4042/2012) regarding the protection of the environment, a company may be banned temporarily or permanently from public tenders if it is found liable for polluting or degrading the environment to gain illicit profits.
- According to Article 24 of Law 3340/2005 for the protection of the capital market from actions of persons that possess inside information and market manipulation, the activities of a company found to be violating the provisions of that Law may be suspended.

The company should primarily examine whether the intended settlement in another country concerns facts that have taken place in Greece and evaluate the risk of that settlement being used in future proceedings in Greece.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

When imposing sanctions (in the form of administrative penalties) on a corporation, the competent authorities consider the following factors: entity size and annual turnover, seriousness of the offence, damage caused, the amount by which the company benefited from the conduct and prior misconduct. The fine is imposed by the relevant competent authority (usually the Revenue Service). Apart from a fine, the competent authority may impose additional measures, such as prohibition of business activity for a specified period, revocation of licences and registrations, a ban from public tenders or investment programmes, etc. Judicial control of sanctions is always available to affected parties.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

No. However, alternative forms for the resolution of criminal cases involving individuals were recently introduced into the CCP.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

No.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority, a company should consider whether the settlement agreement could be used as evidence against individuals (i.e., directors or employees of the company) or even against the company itself in any type of proceeding (i.e., criminal, administrative or civil). Also, the company should thoroughly negotiate with the authorities the wording of the settlement agreement to avoid any indirect admission of wrongdoing that is not covered by that agreement.

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

Regulatory agencies (such as the Competition Commission, the Capital Market Commission and the Greek Gaming Commission) monitor the adherence of corporate entities to standards set by the relevant legal provisions in respect to matters within their competence. In the case of breaches, these agencies have the powers to pose administrative penalties and to forward their findings to the Prosecutor's Office for a criminal investigation to be initiated.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

Yes, private actions seeking damages in the course of civil proceedings are allowed. Private plaintiffs may gain access to authorities' files, provided that they can adequately prove their legitimate interest in obtaining the files to support their civil claims against the company.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

According to Article 241 of the CCP, the pretrial stage of the proceedings, which includes the preliminary inquiry and the main investigation, is conducted in secrecy, not publicly. However, in highly publicised cases, it is not unusual that information (including, inter alia, documentary evidence, witness statements) is leaked to the media during the investigation phase.

After a case has been referred for trial, all procedures, including the trial hearing, are, as a rule, in the public domain, according to Article 329 of the CCP.

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

There is no standard corporate communication protocol in Greece, thus companies would usually follow the international standards regarding communications in crisis management. However, it is common for companies to have their own public communications and media department. In some cases, companies also use public relations firms to manage a corporate crisis.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

Companies decide on how to manage publicity case by case. Crucial factors that help to develop a company's strategy are the nature of the proceedings and the company's involvement regarding the facts under investigation and the investigated persons.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

No, but it may be advisable in some circumstances.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

No.

General context, key principles and hot topics

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

The Hong Kong Securities and Futures Commission (SFC) remains active in pursuing alleged corporate misfeasance among listed companies, as well as members of their current or former senior management. It works closely with the Independent Commission Against Corruption (ICAC). Following a joint operation with the SFC, in May and July 2019, the ICAC charged a number of former executive directors and managers of Convoy Global Holdings Limited with conspiracy to defraud. In June 2019, the SFC and the ICAC mounted another joint operation and searched the offices of two sponsor firms, two listed companies and a financial printing company. The ICAC arrested a former joint head of the Initial Public Offering Vetting Team of the Listing Department of the Hong Kong Exchanges and Clearing Limited and two of his associates.

Another notable feature is the close co-operation between the SFC and the Mainland Chinese regulators, including the China Securities Regulatory Commission (CSRC) and the China Banking Regulatory Commission. In late 2017, the SFC and the CSRC carried out a joint investigation into an individual (Tang Hanbo) for stock manipulation through the China-Hong Kong Stock Connect programme, leading to administrative penalties imposed by the CSRC and the criminal conviction of Tang in China.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

The law of Hong Kong has followed the common law of England and Wales in ascribing corporate liability for criminality, and has developed two main techniques for attributing to a corporate the acts and states of mind of the individuals it employs:

- the 'identification principle', whereby, subject to some limited exceptions, a corporate entity may be indicted and convicted for the criminal acts of the directors and managers who represent its directing mind and will, and who control what it does; and
- vicarious liability, under which a corporation is liable for the criminal acts of its employees or agents under statutory offences that impose an absolute duty on the employer.

A number of offences in Hong Kong legislation target corporates and regulate business activity. They include offences provided in the Companies Ordinance, the Securities and Futures Ordinance (SFO), the Trade Descriptions Ordinance and the Theft Ordinance.

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

Corporations are subject to investigation or regulation by a number of authorities, including the ICAC, the Hong Kong Police Force (HKPF), the Customs and Excise Department, the Companies Registry, the Inland Revenue Department, the SFC, the Hong Kong Monetary Authority (HKMA), the Insurance Authority (IA), the Competition Commission and the Office of the Privacy Commissioner (OPC).

Hong Kong's Department of Justice (DOJ) has overall responsibility for conducting criminal prosecutions; the other authorities named above conduct investigations and sometimes carry out prosecutions, depending on the offences involved. There has been an increase in co-operation between law enforcement authorities in mounting joint investigations into suspected misfeasance by listed companies and their directors and officers. See, as an example, the joint operations by the SFC and the ICAC described in question 1.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

In general, criminal authorities must have reasonable grounds to suspect that a crime has been committed before starting an investigation. The threshold of suspicion is relatively low.

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

A challenge to a search and seizure warrant or production order, and a request to exclude evidence gathered as a result, can be made based on scope, the grounds on which the order was obtained, legal professional privilege or public interest grounds through an application to the Hong Kong courts.

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

Deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs) are commonly used by prosecutors and regulators in the United States and the United Kingdom. Although they have not been formally introduced in Hong Kong, different Hong Kong regulators have, in practice, their own co-operation arrangements. For example, the ICAC or the HKPF from time to time grant perpetrators immunity from prosecution in return for co-operation, after consultation with the DOJ. Both the SFC and the HKMA have published guidance notes on co-operation in investigations and enforcement proceedings under which a person may obtain a credit on the disciplinary penalty if they settle with the regulators. These guidance notes do not apply to criminal cases over which the DOJ has sole discretion. It is also common for the SFC or the HKMA to require, as a part of a settlement, the appointment of an independent reviewer, which may perform a role similar to a that of a monitor under DPAs in the United States or the United Kingdom.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

The HKPF's priorities are violent crime and domestic violence, triads, syndicated and organised crime, dangerous drugs, public safety and the prevention of terrorism. The HKPF is also prioritising cybersecurity and technology crime, particularly criminal groups engaged in internet and telephone fraud.

The SFC's enforcement priorities include corporate misfeasance and fraud by listed companies or senior management, insider dealing and market manipulation, intermediary misconduct and money laundering.

The HKMA's work priorities include risk management relating to operational resilience and technology, money laundering and terrorist financing, misconduct, liquidity and market risk management, and credit.

The IA focuses on protecting and promoting the rights and interests of policyholders and facilitating the sustainable development of the insurance industry both in Hong Kong and regionally. Starting from 23 September 2019, the IA has delegated certain inspection and investigation powers to the HKMA with respect to insurance-related businesses carried on by authorised institutions.

The ICAC has announced a focus on corruption occurring in connection with the Belt and Road Initiative and helping other countries to strengthen their anti-corruption capabilities. It continues to ensure public sector integrity and to investigate cases that violate the common law offence of misconduct in public office.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

There is no overarching legal framework for cybersecurity in Hong Kong. Entities regulated by the HKMA and the SFC must abide by the regulatory guidance issued, including the various guidelines and circulars concerning cyber risk management, resilience testing and management accountability. The Personal Data Privacy Ordinance (PDPO) addresses the security of personal data, including data storage and security measures.

Large-scale cybersecurity failings resulting in breach of personal data protection rules are treated seriously by regulators. The OPC regularly carries out investigations of such failings and issues enforcement notices, which, if not complied with, may lead to criminal sanctions.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

There are a number of offences under Hong Kong law targeting cybersecurity-related crimes, including unauthorised access to a computer by telecommunications under the Telecommunications Ordinance and access to a computer with criminal or dishonest intent under the Crimes Ordinance. Other offences that may be applied to prosecute cybercrime include criminal damage under the Crimes Ordinance and theft under the Theft Ordinance.

The Cybersecurity and Technology Crime Bureau (CSTCB) of the HKPF is responsible for handling cybersecurity issues, carrying out investigations into technology crime and computer forensic examinations, and the prevention of technology crime. The CSTCB also liaises closely with local and overseas law enforcement agencies for combating cross-border technology crime and to exchange experience.

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

The primary basis of criminal jurisdiction in Hong Kong is territorial, and the courts apply a strong presumption against construing statutes as having extraterritorial effect.

The Criminal Jurisdiction Ordinance (CJO) deals with Hong Kong's extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction. The offences to which the CJO applies are divided into Group A offences, which include theft, fraud, deception, blackmail and offences relating to false instruments, and Group B offences, which cover conspiracy, attempting or incitement to commit a Group A offence, and the offence of conspiracy to defraud.

The CJO allows Hong Kong courts to exercise jurisdiction over offences under Groups A and B in the following circumstances:

- any one of the constituent elements of the offence occurs in Hong Kong;
- there is an attempt to commit the offence in Hong Kong, whether or not the attempt is made in Hong Kong or elsewhere and irrespective of whether it has an effect in Hong Kong;
- there is an attempt or incitement in Hong Kong to commit the offence outside Hong Kong; and
- the substantive offence was not intended to take place in Hong Kong.

As regards a conspiracy to commit a Group A offence, or conspiracy to defraud, jurisdiction depends on proof that the pursuit of the agreed course of conduct would involve conduct punishable under the law in force in the place where the conduct was intended to take place. The prosecution must also prove that:

- a party to the agreement constituting the conspiracy, or a party's agent, did something in Hong Kong in relation to the agreement before its formation;
- a party to the conspiracy became a party in Hong Kong (by joining it either in person or through an agent); or
- a party to the conspiracy, or a party's agent, did or omitted to do anything in Hong Kong in pursuance of it; and
- the conspiracy would be triable in Hong Kong, but the parties to it had not intended that the offence or fraud would take place in Hong Kong.

In relation to conspiracies to commit all other offences, section 159A of the Crimes Ordinance codifies the general common law rule limiting extraterritorial jurisdiction in conspiracy cases and provides that conspiracies entered into in Hong Kong are triable in Hong Kong only if the agreement is to commit substantive offences triable in Hong Kong. Conspiracies entered into abroad to commit substantive offences in Hong Kong would be triable in Hong Kong even before any acts were carried out in Hong Kong in furtherance of the conspiracies. However, conspiracies entered into in Hong Kong to commit offences abroad would not be triable in Hong Kong.

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

Cross-border investigations may touch upon Hong Kong's data privacy regime, or those of other countries in Asia, such that employee or customer consent may be required prior to disclosing certain protected information. Cross-border investigations involving China should be conducted in compliance with the Chinese Law on Guarding State Secrets and the new Chinese Cybersecurity Law. In certain cases, investigators may need to undertake their work on site in China with strict protocols in place to prevent the prohibited export of information to Hong Kong or elsewhere.

In July 2019, the Chinese Ministry of Finance (MOF), the CSRC and the SFC entered into a memorandum of understanding concerning the obtaining of audit working papers in China. The aim of this is to facilitate the SFC's access to these documents when conducting investigations into Chinese companies listed in Hong Kong and their related entities or persons. Under the memorandum of understanding, the MOF and the CSRC will provide the fullest assistance in response to requests by the SFC for investigative assistance regarding the provision of audit working papers.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

The right of an accused to advance double jeopardy is found in the Hong Kong Bill of Rights Ordinance and the Criminal Procedure Ordinance. This protection extends to corporations convicted or acquitted of an offence abroad. There is no express or specific legislation or regulation analogous to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

Generally, settlements involving more than one Hong Kong agency do not occur because one agency will have primacy to resolve the case. There is some uncertainty as to whether this will remain the case with the increased joint operation between law enforcement authorities (see question 1). With regard to global settlements involving more than one country, there are no published figures on their prevalence. The SFC has co-operative arrangements for investigatory assistance and exchange of information with many overseas regulators. In particular, the CSRC and the SFC have maintained a close strategic partnership to tackle cross-border trading misconduct. See, for example, the joint investigation into Tang Hanbo referred to in question 1.

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

To facilitate investigation of the same matter, the Hong Kong authorities generally try to co-operate with their counterparts in foreign jurisdictions and in China. For example, in October 2014, the SFC and the CSRC entered into a memorandum of understanding on strengthening cross-boundary regulatory and enforcement co-operation with a view to tackling market manipulation in China and Hong Kong. See also the memorandum of understanding entered into between the MOF, the CSRC and the SFC on audit working papers referred to in question 11.

In addition, Hong Kong has mutual legal assistance agreements with a number of countries, and a number of international treaties provide for cross-border co-operation.

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

Hong Kong generally adheres to United Nations Security Council sanctions, including pursuant to the Weapons of Mass Destruction (Control of Provisions of Services) Ordinance, the United Nations Sanctions Ordinance and the United Nations (Anti-Terrorism Measures) Ordinance with oversight by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Hong Kong does not currently impose unilateral or autonomous sanctions. Of note, in June 2018, Hong Kong amended the United Nations Sanctions (Democratic People's Republic of Korea) Regulation to incorporate United Nations Security Council resolutions adopted since December 2014.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

Multiple agencies share responsibility for the administration and enforcement of Hong Kong sanctions, including the Chief Executive, the DOJ, the HKMA, the SFC, the Commerce and Economic Development Bureau, the Customs and Excise Department, and the Trade and Industry Department. Although regulatory focus has increased, particularly for the financial sector, there have been no notable cases of criminal enforcement of Hong Kong sanctions in recent years.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

Hong Kong has a variety of mutual legal assistance arrangements with foreign jurisdictions, which may be used in support of sanctions-related investigations.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

Hong Kong has no such legislation.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

Not applicable.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

Whistleblower complaints, both internal and external, are a frequent source of allegations of misconduct leading to investigations, particularly with respect to bribery and corruption. The ICAC plays a critical role in receiving and investigating complaints made against individuals. Enquiries by the ICAC to companies regarding their employees' conduct will often lead to an internal investigation to identify potential breaches of internal policy even when there is no corporate liability under the law.

Regulatory reviews by the SFC, the HKMA or other regulators are another source of allegations of misconduct. Further, corporations and institutions licensed by the SFC or the HKMA have an obligation to report material breaches (or suspected breaches) of any law, rules or regulations (including suspected misconduct) to their regulators. Specifically, corporations licensed by the SFC are expressly required to report material breaches (or suspected breaches) of market misconduct provisions under the SFO by their clients.

Information gathering

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

Hong Kong has a data protection regime that has been given statutory force through the PDPO. The PDPO applies to any data relating directly or indirectly to a living person from which it is possible to identify that person and the data is in a form in which access to or processing is practicable. The PDPO contains six data protection principles (DPPs) that govern the purpose and manner of collection, the accuracy and duration of retention, the use and security of personal data, and rights of access and correction.

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

Contravening a DPP may give rise to a complaint to be investigated by the OPC. A data user may be punished under the PDPO for failing to comply with an enforcement notice issued by the Privacy Commissioner for Personal Data, after a finding of a contravention. An enforcement notice may direct the data user to take steps to remedy the contravention and prevent a recurrence. A data user may separately bring a civil claim for damages on the basis of a contravention of a DPP, whether or not the Privacy Commissioner has issued an enforcement notice.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

The provisions of the PDPO cover the monitoring and gathering of data in the context of internal investigations, whether this be by monitoring the internet, telephone calls or email. An individual who suffers damage (including 'injured feelings') by reason of a breach may sue.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

Interception of communications and covert surveillance are regulated by the Interception of Communications and Surveillance Ordinance and can only be exercised by the Customs and Excise Department, the HKPF and the ICAC with prescribed authorisation.

Monitoring and surveillance of employee communication is regulated by the PDPO. Prior to implementing any surveillance system, the employer must take such steps as are reasonable, in the circumstances, to ensure the employees are aware of (among other things) the fact that the information is being collected and the purpose of collection.

Dawn raids and search warrants

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

Dawn raids are used by the SFC and the HKMA in the context of regulatory investigations, by the ICAC in bribery investigations and by the HKPF in relation to the commission of any offence. Dawn raids may also be used by the Competition Commission in investigating offences under the Competition Ordinance. They can take place either with a warrant issued by a magistrate or without a warrant in limited circumstances.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

Generally, privileged material cannot be seized during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant. To protect privileged material from seizure, a claim of privilege should be made, and if there is a dispute as to whether certain material is privileged, the material should be sealed until the dispute is resolved. However, privilege may be overridden by a court order. Privilege will also not attach to material created for the purpose of committing a crime.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

Privilege against self-incrimination is recognised in Hong Kong. A person may decline to provide information in an investigation that may lead to self-incrimination.

An exception is that authorities such as the SFC and the HKMA may issue a notice under relevant statutory provisions compelling a witness to answer questions or produce documents, and self-incrimination is not a reason for non-compliance. However, the information provided by the person compelled by the notice will be inadmissible in evidence against the person in criminal proceedings except for certain offences, such as perjury.

Whistleblowing and employee rights

28 Describe the whistleblowing framework in your country. What financial incentive schemes exist for whistleblowers? What legal protections are in place for whistleblowers?

Hong Kong currently does not have a comprehensive or overarching framework to protect whistleblowers. There exist no financial incentive schemes for whistleblowers to volunteer information. However, listed companies are encouraged to adopt a whistleblowing policy as 'recommended best practice' under the Hong Kong Exchanges and Clearing Limited Corporate Governance Code. The legal protections for whistleblowers are limited.

Under the Employment Ordinance, an employee giving evidence in proceedings or in response to enquiries in connection with the enforcement of the Employment Ordinance, work accidents or breach of work safety legislation is protected from dismissal and discrimination.

Other ordinances covering race, gender, family status and disability also protect individuals who act against discrimination or assist with investigations against victimisation.

Hong Kong law protects individuals who disclose suspected money laundering or other crimes by preventing the disclosure from being treated as a breach of any restrictions imposed by contract, enactment or rule of conduct.

The Competition Commission in Hong Kong has also published its Leniency Policy, which is designed to encourage companies that may have engaged in illegal activity, such as bid rigging or price-fixing, to report it in exchange for leniency.

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

Employees have limited rights under local employment laws if a company conducts an investigation and may be suspended with pay if the employment contract so provides. An employee may also be suspended without pay in the limited circumstances specified in the Employment Ordinance for generally no more than 14 days. Employees are protected against wrongful, unreasonable or constructive dismissal under local legislation.

Employees have the right to a disciplinary hearing if the company handbook, manual or policy provides for such in relation to employee misconduct. Employees of government or public bodies have the right to a fair hearing.

Executive directors owe additional duties under the Companies Ordinance, the company's articles and common law. In addition to rights they have as an employee of the company, directors also have rights under the Companies Ordinance and articles with respect to the potential threat of removal or disqualification in the case of breach of directors' duties.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

There are no statutory requirements for companies to take disciplinary steps when an employee is suspected of misconduct. However, companies' internal policies and employment contracts may adopt disciplinary procedures for their employees. Companies in regulated industries may be required to suspend or take disciplinary action against employees who carry out regulated activities. Aside from their mandatory obligations, companies may take disciplinary action or steps to investigate misconduct as part of the company's proper internal controls and good corporate governance.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

An employee may potentially be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation after failing to heed the employer's lawful and reasonable instructions and absent any protected circumstances, such as the employee taking sick leave, maternity leave, paternity leave or work injury leave.

Commencing an internal investigation

32 Is it common practice in your country to prepare a document setting out terms of reference or investigatory scope before commencing an internal investigation? What issues would it cover?

It is common practice for an internal investigation to begin with the drafting of an investigation plan detailing the objectives, scope, roles and responsibilities for the investigation. A clearly defined communications plan and the protocol for maintaining legal professional privilege are also essential from the earliest stages. Increasingly, scoping documents will also identify data custodians and outline procedures for electronic document review.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

Depending on the nature of the issue, necessary internal steps could be managed by a company's compliance or legal department in less serious cases, or senior management and the board of directors in the more serious cases. Under the supervision of legal counsel to ensure the protection of legal professional privilege, a company should gather and secure any relevant documents and data, and interview key employees to ensure the continued availability of critical information. Corrective action plans or disciplinary measures should be adopted to address gaps or breaches in compliance controls, which may earn a company mitigation credit in any related enforcement actions.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

Ideally, a company should have an established protocol for responding to law enforcement requests, subpoenas or dawn raids, including procedures for the preservation of relevant documents and data. The legal department should issue a preservation notice to all relevant employees immediately upon receiving a law enforcement request, or if it believes that such a request or legal proceedings may be forthcoming. Paper documents and electronic data on servers, laptops, mobile devices or other media should be collected from relevant custodians and logged under the supervision of legal counsel and the company's information technology department. Privileged communications should be segregated and clearly stamped to help prevent accidental disclosure.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

There is no general duty to publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from law enforcement (indeed, most agencies impose a secrecy obligation on the subjects of an investigation). The exception is in the case of a listed company when such facts would constitute price-sensitive information, as defined under the SFO, unless exempted or when the SFC has granted a waiver (e.g., in cases involving disclosure restrictions imposed by a foreign government authority). Conversely, there are strict prohibitions against publicly reporting details of investigations by the ICAC for both listed and unlisted companies.

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

In most cases, the authorities recognise the need for, and welcome, at least initial or preliminary internal investigations carried out by corporations. Those corporations licensed by the SFC have a regulatory duty to self-report when there is a material breach (or suspected breach) by their employees of any rules administered by the SFC, or when there is a material breach (or suspected breach) by their clients of any market misconduct provisions under the SFO. Particular care must be taken to avoid tipping off, whereby corporations are prohibited (except with the authorities' consent) from disclosing the existence of the authorities' investigations to a third party, which may include their employees and their clients.

Attorney–client privilege

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

Legal professional privilege can be claimed over various aspects of an internal investigation.

Case law holds that the whole process of obtaining and giving legal advice should be privileged. Therefore, internal communications (including those between employees of a non-legal function) and materials generated during the information-gathering process of an internal investigation (such as minutes of meetings and interview notes) for the dominant purpose of obtaining and giving legal advice could be privileged. However, legal advice privilege will not attach to communications with, or materials prepared by, a third party (unless the communications or materials are for the dominant purpose of obtaining or seeking legal advice), nor will it cover legal advice given by persons who are not legally qualified (e.g., tax accountants).

During an internal investigation, confidential communications or documents prepared for the dominant purpose of obtaining information or evidence for use in actual or reasonably contemplated litigation – even if the communications are merely for the purpose of establishing facts – will be covered by litigation privilege. To protect privilege, the company should:

- involve lawyers (whether in-house or external counsel) as soon as it is apparent that legal advice is likely to be required;
- avoid creating unnecessary records (where there is no prospect of litigation) that summarise, quote or amend the legal advice received;
- limit circulation of privileged documents on a strictly need-to-know basis;
- manage documents effectively by separating privileged and non-privileged documents; and
- ensure that all documents that are considered to be protected by legal professional privilege are clearly marked 'privileged and confidential'.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

Under Hong Kong law, legal professional privilege falls into two categories:

- Legal advice privilege attaches to communications between a client and his or her legal adviser for the purposes of giving and receiving legal advice.
- Litigation privilege attaches to confidential communications between a legal adviser and the client, and to communications between a legal adviser or client and a third party if three conditions are met: litigation is in progress or reasonably in contemplation; the communications are made with the sole or dominant purpose of conducting the actual or anticipated litigation; and the litigation is adversarial, not investigative or inquisitorial.

The privilege belongs to, and can only be waived by, the client and not his or her legal adviser.

In the corporate context, it is advisable to identify the employees authorised to act for the company to seek legal advice for the purposes of claiming legal advice privilege, as English and Hong Kong law have diverged in recent years on this issue.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

Legal professional privilege applies equally to in-house and external counsel. However, privilege will only cover communications made by an in-house lawyer acting in a legal (not a managerial) capacity.

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

Legal professional privilege applies equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers if the advice is given in Hong Kong. If the advice is given from outside Hong Kong, it is possible that privilege can be asserted under Hong Kong law even if the home jurisdiction of the foreign lawyer does not recognise legal professional privilege.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

Waiver of legal professional privilege (usually limited) is generally regarded as a sign of co-operation by authorities in a regulatory investigation, although it is not mandatory.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

The Court of Appeal has confirmed that a waiver of privilege with regard to one party does not automatically mean that privilege has been waived at large and that privilege is not waived because a privileged document has been disclosed for a limited purpose. The scope of the waiver is determined by the party waiving the privilege. Where privilege is waived for a limited purpose, it is important to ensure that the terms and scope of the limited waiver are clear.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

Generally, privilege will not be lost because a privileged document has been disclosed for a limited purpose.

Whether privilege can be maintained if it has been partly waived in another country will depend on a number of factors, including, but not limited to:

- whether the concept of limited or partial waiver is recognised in the country where privilege has been waived;
- the scope and terms of the waiver; and
- whether any statutory provision overrides privilege.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

Common interest privilege exists in Hong Kong. Privilege will not be waived if privileged material is disclosed to a third party who shares a common interest in the subject matter of the privileged material. Common interest must exist at the time when the privileged material is disclosed to the third party.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

Communications between a third party and the lawyer (or the client) are protected from disclosure by litigation privilege if they are made for the dominant purpose of obtaining information or evidence for use in actual or reasonably contemplated litigation. However, legal advice privilege will generally not apply to communications with third parties (see question 37).

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

Yes. There is no general prohibition under Hong Kong law against interviewing witnesses as part of the information-gathering process in an internal investigation.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

Legal advice privilege is often claimed for the records of internal witness interviews. Case law in Hong Kong suggests that a corporation may argue that legal advice privilege exists regarding such records if the interviews are conducted (or the reports are compiled) for the dominant purpose of obtaining and giving legal advice during the internal investigation. This is in contrast to the position in England, for example.

Litigation privilege may only be claimed if it is established that the witness interviews are conducted for the dominant purpose of use in an actual or reasonably contemplated litigation.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

Whether the interviewee is an employee or a third party, it is recommended that they be informed that:

- the interview is part of a fact-finding exercise;
- the lawyer conducting the interview represents the company, not the interviewee;
- the interview is protected by legal professional privilege belonging to the company, which can choose to disclose the contents of the interview to third parties, including regulators and authorities, without the interviewee's permission;
- the interviewee may provide personal information covered by data protection laws, which will only be used for the fact-finding or review exercise. This exercise may involve sharing the interviewee's personal information with other advisers working for the company, regulators and authorities; and

- the contents of the interview are confidential and should not be shared with any other person (including other employees).

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

The internal interview will typically be attended by in-house legal counsel and any specialised investigation team with or without external counsel (depending on the nature and seriousness of the issues involved). Relevant documents are typically put to the witness at the internal interview for reference, comment and explanation, as necessary. There is no legal requirement that employees have their own legal representation at an internal interview, and this is not common in practice.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

Generally, a person is under no positive obligation to report crimes or provide assistance to law enforcement authorities, aside from suspicious transaction reports under anti-money laundering laws, which are mandatory, and certain exceptions for licensed corporations and financial institutions.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

While there is no formal arrangement or mechanism for deferred prosecution agreements in Hong Kong, it may be advisable for a company to self-report with a view to demonstrating its proactive and full co-operation with the authorities, which may militate against a decision to prosecute or be considered as a mitigating factor in sentencing.

Whether the self-report should extend to foreign countries will depend on the nature and extent of the issues involved, in particular whether it has a cross-border, regional or global element.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

A company should undertake appropriate internal investigations to ascertain the nature and extent of the issues, and to ensure the contents of any self-report are correct and not misleading (including through any material omission). It should also seek legal advice on the applicable self-reporting obligations.

For licensed corporations and financial institutions that are under a regulatory duty to self-report, a balance needs to be struck between making timely self-reports and ensuring that reports are correct and not misleading.

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

Hong Kong enforcement agencies, such as the ICAC and the SFC, have extensive powers to compel information to be provided to them by corporations involved in investigations, and there is very little that can be done to challenge requests for information when they are made.

However, it would be unusual for criminal charges to be brought against a corporation without it having an opportunity to discuss the circumstances of the allegations with the enforcement agency. In financial misconduct investigations, the twin regulatory and criminal nature of the supervisory jurisdiction of the SFC and the HKMA means that there would be an opportunity for representations to be made by the corporation, through its lawyers, as to the circumstances, and the proposed remediation, prior to criminal charges being brought.

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

The circumstances under which an ongoing investigation could be challenged in the courts are difficult to envisage, short of provable mala fides on the part of the enforcement agency.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

These circumstances are most likely to arise in the context of financial regulatory investigations by regulators in different jurisdictions, or international anti-bribery enforcement under the US Foreign Corrupt Practices Act or the Bribery Act in the United Kingdom. In circumstances in which the notices or subpoenas have been validly issued, warrant substantive responses and relate to identical subject matter, it is advisable to adopt consistent disclosure with each agency. Further, assuming that a financial institution's operations are international in nature, coupled with self-reporting obligations imposed in other countries (most notably the United States and the United Kingdom), this usually means that some form of notification or reporting to overseas regulators would be required even in the context of an investigation that primarily concerns Hong Kong, and in the absence of any separate notices or subpoenas being issued by overseas regulators. Given the increasing prevalence of international co-operation between regulators and criminal enforcement agencies, a failure to disclose certain matters in one jurisdiction may well be apparent and seized on as an indication of inadequate compliance or co-operation.

Assuming that the investigation primarily concerns Hong Kong, it is advisable to adopt the disclosure made to the local regulators (e.g., the SFC or the HKMA) as a 'base' document in framing the appropriate disclosure to overseas regulators with reference made to the nexus with other countries (e.g., by reason of the institution's or an individual's licensing status, client impact, and so on). Care should also be taken to ensure that notification has been given to, and in appropriate cases, consent obtained from, the local regulators, before overseas notification or disclosure is made. In particular, the SFC almost always insists that its written consent be obtained before a licensed corporation can disclose the existence or content of an ongoing investigation, even to an overseas regulator.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

Under notices issued by the various Hong Kong enforcement agencies, companies may be required to produce material in their possession, custody, control or power, whether this is located in other countries or solely in Hong Kong, subject to having a reasonable excuse not to do so.

This may give rise to issues in some foreign jurisdictions, where the transmission of certain types of information outside that country may be prohibited by local law. In Hong Kong, exposure to criminal liability under foreign law would not constitute a reasonable excuse for non-compliance with a notice or subpoena. This applies in circumstances where a reasonable person would conclude that the Hong Kong public interest in the investigation of criminal activities outweighs any public or private interest in compliance with the foreign law. However, if there are alternative means of obtaining the documents without materially adverse consequences to the investigation, a real and appreciable risk of prosecution under foreign law would constitute a reasonable excuse for non-compliance.

A related issue arises as to the extent that the company is required to produce relevant material in the possession, custody or power of its parent, subsidiary or an associated company (which may be incorporated in other countries). In general terms, this depends on whether the company subject to investigation (the subject company) has a presently enforceable legal right to obtain the documents from such other companies without the need to obtain the consent of anyone else. This is a question of fact, which depends on whether the subject company has sufficient control over the other companies such that the documents in the possession, custody or power of such other companies can be said to be in fact within the power of the subject company.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

Hong Kong regulators, including the HKMA and the SFC, have signed memoranda of understanding to establish co-operative arrangements that include the sharing of information with foreign counterparts, including those in China (see questions 11 and 14). One of the most important of these is the International Organisation of Securities Commissions Multilateral Memorandum of Understanding, which was the first global information-sharing arrangement among securities regulators.

Hong Kong authorities routinely co-operate with their foreign counterparts reciprocally in criminal matters under the framework established in the Mutual Legal Assistance in Criminal Matters Ordinance. However, this particular legislation is not applicable to China, Macao or Taiwan, and there was a failed attempt in June 2019 by the Hong Kong government to expand a modified regime to cover these jurisdictions.

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

Information provided to enforcement authorities in Hong Kong confidentially during an investigation will remain confidential, except to the extent that its use is necessary within an investigation, prosecution or regulatory enforcement. While it may be shared with other enforcement agencies or regulators under the information-sharing agreements referred to in question 57, it would not be disclosed to other third parties without an order from a court.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

It may be possible to refuse production on the grounds that the foreign illegality constituted a reasonable excuse not to produce the documents under the relevant legislation. However, this would be a difficult argument on which to succeed. These issues should be brought to the attention of the enforcement agency, which should consider whether assistance could be sought under formal channels from the agency in the foreign jurisdiction, to allow the documents to be produced without violating foreign law.

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

There are no blocking statutes as such in Hong Kong.

The jurisdiction to order corporations and individuals to provide evidence in aid of foreign proceedings is derived from Part VIII of the Evidence Ordinance. Section 75 of the Evidence Ordinance requires the application to be made pursuant to a 'request issued by or on behalf of a court' outside Hong Kong. In terms of procedure, therefore, a letter of request is required and order 70 of the Rules of the High Court provides the procedural framework for taking evidence or obtaining documents from a Hong Kong entity.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

Care must be taken to ensure compliance with a company's confidentiality obligations in relation to information. If disclosure to an authority is voluntary, rather than compelled, then the disclosure may violate these obligations.

Law enforcement authorities in Hong Kong must maintain the confidentiality of confidential disclosures made to them (whether voluntary or compelled), except to the extent that they choose to share them with other enforcement authorities, or use the information in an investigation, prosecution or regulatory enforcement action.

Prosecution and penalties

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

Companies or their directors, officers or employees may face disciplinary action – and, in the case of directors, disqualification – and attract potential civil or criminal liability for misconduct in Hong Kong. For entities regulated by the SFC, misconduct would include breaches of the SFO, contravention of the terms of any SFC licence or any act prejudicial to the public interest. Sanctions may include a private or public reprimand, a fine of up to HK$10 million or three times the profit gained or loss avoided, revocation or suspension of licences or registrations, and a ban on regulated persons from applying to be licensed or approved as a responsible officer.

The SFC has powers under the SFO to seek criminal prosecution by the DOJ and, in practice, the SFC refers all market misconduct cases to the DOJ for advice. The maximum penalties for a person convicted of a market misconduct offence are imprisonment for 10 years and a fine of HK$10 million.

The SFC may also institute civil proceedings before the High Court or the Market Misconduct Tribunal (MMT).

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

It depends on the laws of the other country in which the corporate wants to settle. The risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in Hong Kong does not, as a matter of Hong Kong law, restrict the corporate from settling in another country; however, there may be legal requirements in that other country (e.g., disclosure obligations) that allow a regulator or law enforcement agency in that country to reopen a settlement if it subsequently discovers the restrictions on the corporate in Hong Kong of which it has not been previously informed.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

The authorities will consider all the circumstances of the case, including (1) the nature and seriousness of the conduct, (2) the value of profits accrued or loss avoided, (3) other circumstances of the firm or individual, and (4) other relevant factors.

In considering the nature and seriousness of market misconduct, the SFC will have regard to the effects of the conduct on market integrity, the costs of the conduct caused to clients or the investing public, the duration and frequency of the conduct, whether there is a breach of fiduciary duty and whether any serious or systematic management or internal control failures are revealed. The SFC will also consider the degree of co-operation with the SFC and other authorities.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

There are no formal mechanisms in Hong Kong for the negotiated settlement of criminal investigations or proceedings that are equivalent to DPAs in the United Kingdom or the United States. However, in some limited circumstances, negotiations with, or representations made to, the SFC and the DOJ may result in a decision being taken not to prosecute.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

Not applicable.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

The SFC has wide powers to enter into settlement agreements under the SFO, and may do so if this is in the public interest. In considering settlement, aside from considering factors such as the strength of the prosecution and defence cases, the costs and reputational damage of a lengthy investigation and potential subsequent legal proceedings, and possible penalties, institutions should also be aware that the SFC may insist on a public reprimand of the financial institution via an announcement on the SFC's website. The SFC will take into account the degree of co-operation in considering the settlement package.

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

Not applicable.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

The SFO gives a person who has suffered pecuniary loss as a result of market misconduct the right to bring a civil action to seek compensation. Compensation will only be payable if it is fair, just and reasonable in the circumstances of the case. Findings of the MMT in relation to market misconduct will be admissible as prima facie evidence in the private action, though proceedings before the tribunal are not a prerequisite for bringing civil proceedings. The SFC will not intervene in private legal proceedings.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

In practice, law enforcement agencies do not normally publish the commencement of investigations of criminal cases (although they sometimes announce high-profile arrests or dawn raids). Publicity usually follows when a decision has been made to charge an individual or during criminal proceedings once instituted. Criminal trials in Hong Kong are conducted in open court. Some agencies, such as the SFC or the ICAC, publicise the outcome of enforcement proceedings they have initiated on their websites from time to time.

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

There are no particular factors specific to Hong Kong in managing corporate communications in Hong Kong. The steps are likely to be similar to those that would be taken to manage corporate communications in other jurisdictions, for example, timely, accurate and effective messages using the right media channels, while being sensitive and perceptive to the geopolitical environment. Public relations and media companies can be and have been used in Hong Kong to manage certain corporate crises.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

Publicity is usually managed by a press officer or communications department that will monitor media reports and suggest the making of public statements as and when necessary. Any public statements made by the company should be carefully drafted and any prejudicial effects on ongoing proceedings should be taken into consideration.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

For a listed corporation, settlement of a regulatory investigation may constitute inside information (depending on the nature and severity of the underlying offence or misconduct) and thus require disclosure as soon as reasonably practicable. In practice, the corporation and the authorities will usually agree on a press release being issued as part of the settlement and will agree on the timing for the release.

By way of context, inside information is defined to include specific information about the corporation that is not generally known to the public but would, if generally known, be likely to materially affect the price of the listed securities. Under Part XIVA of the SFO, a listed corporation must, as soon as is reasonably practicable after it becomes aware or is notified of any inside information, disclose the information to the public (subject to certain exceptions).

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

We do not expect the formalisation of DPAs in the next year or so in Hong Kong. Corporate misconduct, in particular, by listed companies, will remain a key enforcement priority of the SFC, the ICAC and the HKPF.

We also expect closer co-operation between the SFC and the CSRC in cross-border investigations, in particular concerning market manipulation in the context of the China-Hong Kong Stock Connect programme, and increased joint operations between enforcement agencies within Hong Kong, such as those mounted by the SFC and the ICAC into corporate misfeasance (see question 1).

General context, key principles and hot topics

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

The most high-profile corporate investigation currently under way is the Infrastructure Leasing and Financial Services (ILFS) case that is being investigated by the Serious Fraud Investigation Office (SFIO) and the Enforcement Directorate. The total outstanding debt of the ILFS is approximately 990 billion rupees. The issue came to light when, between July to September 2018, a few subsidiaries of the ILFS reported having problems paying back their loans and inter-corporate deposits (liquidity crunch). The government thereafter replaced the board of the ILFS and is presently investigating the allegations against the company.

Another issue that has grabbed the attention of the authorities is the role played by globally renowned auditing firms and credit rating agencies. The auditors, which include three of the four biggest auditing firms in India, failed to make adequate disclosures and point out red flags. They now face the risk of being banned for a few years. The credit rating agencies are being investigated for having given the ILFS the highest credit rating before downgrading the company when the investigations commenced.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

Corporations can be held criminally liable under the Indian Penal Code 1860 (IPC) since the definition of person includes any company or body of persons, whether incorporated or not. In 2005, the Indian Supreme Court held that corporations can be punished for offences, including those that require mens rea and also eradicated the immunity from prosecution demanding mandatory imprisonment, as provided to corporations.

In the 2018 amendment to the Prevention of Corruption Act 1988 (PCA), which is the premier anti-corruption legislation in India, a commercial organisation can be liable if an associated person (performing services for or on behalf of the commercial organisation) provides or promises to provide any undue advantage to a public servant to obtain or receive any unjustified gains. Further, under the Information Technology Act 2000 (the IT Act), a corporation can be held criminally liable for misuse of sensitive information.

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

Indian companies are governed by two sets of authorities – Enforcement Authorities and Regulatory Authorities. The Ministry of Corporate Affairs (MCA) is primarily concerned with administration of the statutes, rules and regulations that regulate the functioning of the corporate sector.

The premier anti-corruption enforcement authority is the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI). Other authorities empowered to investigate cases of bribery and corruption in India include:

- the Central Vigilance Commission, a statutory body that supervises investigation of corruption in government companies, departments and among public servants;
- the SFIO, established under the MCA to investigate the affairs of companies suspected of fraudulent activities based on orders from the central government; and
- the Enforcement Directorate, established under the Ministry of Finance to investigate and prosecute cases pertaining to economic offences under the Prevention of Money Laundering Act 2002 (PMLA) and the Foreign Exchange Management Act 1999.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

There are a number of regulatory authorities that have been empowered under specific laws to investigate and prosecute offenders in India. The powers bestowed on these regulatory authorities often overlap and hence, at times, those authorities may work in tandem for specific investigations. Various authorities can therefore commence an investigation with respect to the same matter under different legal grounds. The threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation varies from case to case.

Under the anti-corruption laws, both the bribe receiver and the bribe giver can be prosecuted. Another recent development in the anti-corruption regime in India is that property that has been purchased through the proceeds of crime can be attached by the enforcement authorities through measures provided under the PMLA, depending on the gravity and nature of the alleged offence.

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

The company can challenge a notice in the appellate body of the authority from which the notice was received. When a notice is sent by the Enforcement Directorate, the company can challenge the notice before the adjudicating authority under the PCA.

The company, on receiving a summons notice from the enforcement authorities, can file a writ petition before the high court of the concerned state to challenge a notice and request the court to quash it.

However, the high court does not normally quash such a notice unless, in its opinion, grave prejudice will be or is being caused to the person to whom it has been issued.

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

The PCA provides a company with the opportunity to report to law enforcement authorities that it has been compelled to provide an undue advantage to a public official within seven days of the date of providing such undue advantage. However, India does not make use of co-operative agreements in order to provide immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities in cases of corruption.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

The Indian government has been battling the menace of corruption in response to a number of corruption cases. In 2017, the government – with the objective of fighting black money, corruption and terror funding – implemented the demonetisation of all 500 rupee and 1,000 rupee banknotes.

Other legislative developments brought in by the government include the following:

- Benami Transactions (Prohibition) Amendment Act 2016 provides that competent authorities can attach and confiscate properties that are illegally held by one person on behalf of another person.
- The Fugitive Economic Offenders Act 2018 (the FEO Act) was introduced to govern laws pertaining to those who have allegedly committed an economic offence but have absconded to another country to obtain asylum and avoid criminal prosecution in India.
- A goods and services tax has been implemented in an effort to control the circulation of black money in the economy.
- Black Money (Undisclosed Foreign Income and Assets) and Imposition of Tax Act 2015 governs provisions regarding tax evasion, especially the concealment of foreign income and assets.

Additionally, the Indian government has been entering into bilateral agreements and treaties in pursuance of information-sharing with tax havens. The government has been endeavouring to make use of technology to prevent corruption by promoting cashless transactions and launching Government e-Marketplace (in an effort to make public procurement-related transactions more transparent), among other initiatives.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

Cybersecurity is regulated and implemented by the IT Act and the rules notified thereunder. The Ministry of Communications and Information Technology (MCIT) is empowered under section 87 of the IT Act to formulate these rules. Under section 69B, central government may authorise any agency of the government to monitor and collect data generated, transmitted, received or stored in any computer source. In line with the same, the MCIT has notified the Information Technology (Security Procedure) Rules 2004, the Information Technology (Procedure and Safeguard for Monitoring and Collecting Traffic Data or Information) Rules 2009 and the Information Technology (Reasonable security practices and procedures and sensitive personal data or information) Rules 2011, which lay down the practices to be followed and the standards to be adhered to regarding cybersecurity.

Other key powers include the following:

- confiscating computer systems or other devices that have been used to contravene the law;
- entering public places, and searching and arresting without a warrant, if the person is guilty or is reasonably suspected of committing a crime;
- search and seizure;
- requiring attendance of a witness; and
- issuing summons.

For cybersecurity-related failings, Chapter 9 of the IT Act deals with penalties, compensation and adjudication. Under section 43A, when any corporate body, possessing, dealing or handling any sensitive personal data in a computer resource that it owns, controls or operates, is negligent in implementing and maintaining reasonable security practices and procedures, and thereby causes wrongful loss or wrongful gain to any person, the corporate body shall be liable to pay damages by way of compensation to the person so affected.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

The Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 (CrPC), the IT Act, the IPC and the Indian Evidence Act 1872 (IEA) regulate this sphere. Acts such as tampering with computer source documents, propagating or sending offensive messages via a communication service, dishonestly receiving stolen computer resources or communications, identity theft, etc. are listed as punishable offences under the IT Act. The IT Act also grants powers to issue directions for the interception, monitoring or decryption of any information through any computer resource, and to authorise the monitoring and collection of traffic data or information through any computer resource for the purposes of cybersecurity. It also ensures that the enforcement authorities have the power to investigate and lay down penalties for breaches, and prescribes guidelines for compensation payable in such cases.

The procedure for investigation, prosecution and the resulting proceedings are governed by the CrPC and concerns arising out of evidence collection and retention are governed by the IEA.

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

Criminal law can have extraterritorial effect as laid down by the IT Act, CrPC and sections 2 to 4 of the IPC. Every person (including a person not a citizen of India) shall be punished under the IPC for committing an offence in India. Any person liable for an offence under any Indian law who is to be tried for an offence committed outside India shall be dealt with according to the provisions of the IPC for that act in the same manner as if the act had been committed within India.

The provisions of the IPC apply to any offence committed by any:

- citizen of India in any place without and beyond India;
- person on any ship or aircraft registered in India, wherever it may be; and
- person in any place without and beyond India committing an offence targeting a computer resource located in India.

The word 'offence' includes every act committed outside India which, if committed within India, would be punishable under the IPC.

The IT Act also applies to any contravention or offence under the IT Act committed outside India, by any person, irrespective of nationality, or any contravention or offence committed outside India by any person, if the act or conduct involves a computer, computer system or computer network located in India.

To initiate or supplement criminal proceedings beyond the territorial jurisdiction of Indian criminal courts, section 105 sets down reciprocal arrangements regarding process. Further, Chapter VIIA of the CrPC discusses reciprocal arrangements for assistance in certain matters and procedures for the attachment and forfeiture of property.

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

Data privacy issues

The ease of accessing information depends on the strength of the document and information retention laws in the country from where information is to be obtained. This would predominantly depend on the laws governing data privacy and attorney–client privilege. India has signed mutual legal assistance treaties (MLATs) with 39 countries for sharing information and to obtain evidence from another country's jurisdiction. An alternative approach is to send a letter rogatory to a foreign court.

Legislative differences

It is important to ensure that an investigation does not result in violation of any laws overseas while accessing the required information. Moreover, it can be difficult to get assistance and co-operation from the local government for the process of collecting evidence. Differences in laws on data protection, attorney–client privilege and labour laws specifically pose difficulties in proceeding with an investigation.

Extradition of the accused

The government has been grappling with the issue of economic offenders in high-profile cases fleeing abroad. The process of extradition from another country can lead to delays in investigations.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

The concept of double jeopardy is enshrined in Article 20 of the Constitution of India. The doctrine of double jeopardy protects a person from being tried and punished twice for the same offence but not from different offences arising out of the violation of different laws by the same set of facts. However, a corporation facing criminal exposure in India after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another country may not avail itself of protection against double jeopardy.

While the judiciary has attempted to prevent multiplicity of case, multiple agencies with similar powers under the PCA, PMLA and Companies Act 2013 (the CA Act) are competent to investigate different aspects of similar sets of facts.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

Global settlements are not the norm in India. However, global co-operation is practised with jurisdictions outside India. India has co-operated with other enforcement agencies such as the US Department of Justice (DOJ) and Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), especially under the regime of the US Foreign Corrupt Practises Act (FCPA). Examples of global co-operation include the Louis Berger case and the recent Cognizant/Larsen and Toubro FCPA investigation.

Given the amendment to the PCA (see question 2), global settlements may commence in the year to come and subsequently become fairly common in India.

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

It is a settled principle that decisions in criminal cases by courts in foreign countries cannot be enforced in India. It was recently held by the Bombay High Court in Prabodh K Mehta v. Charuben K Mehta (2018) 3 Bom CR 1 (Bom)(FB), that the conviction of an individual in a foreign court will not be ipso facto binding on Indian authorities.

However, the conviction will not be overlooked and will be recognised under the principle of comity. Indian authorities may seek relevant information from the foreign courts for the purpose of proceeding with an investigation in India. While the conviction will not be completely relied upon, the information that is available by way of the decision of the foreign courts may form a source of evidence while proceeding with an investigation in India.

It is also important to note that the stance of the Indian judiciary varies in civil matters. Under sections 13 and 14 of the Civil Procedure Code 1908 (CPC), foreign judgments are automatically enforceable in India, unless there is proof in support of the contrary and it is contested by the parties.

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

Sanctions against a corporation can be in the form of a fine or imprisonment of key personnel associated with the commercial organisation involved in the wrongdoing or misconduct, or both. Penalties imposed on corporations can also take the form of fines.

In 2018, SEBI banned a big four auditing firm, PricewaterhouseCoopers Private Limited (PwC), from auditing listed companies in the country for two years following PwC's failure to detect fraud of more than US$1 billion at the IT services company, Satyam Computer Services, which is one of India's largest corporate fraud matters to date.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

India has witnessed a rise in the economic sanctions being imposed on corporations and the key personnel in such corporations. There has also been an evident increase in the number of dawn raids carried out by government authorities in connection with matters involving corruption and tax evasion.

On account of an increasing number of delinquent borrowers and non-performing assets, law enforcement authorities have shifted their focus towards fraud and evergreening of loans in the financial sector. In the recent Punjab National Bank fraud case, the Enforcement Directorate has taken a stringent stance on prosecuting the perpetrators, including the fugitive, Mr Mehul Choksi.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

Enforcement authorities co-operate for the purpose of sharing information relevant to their respective investigations. Both formal and informal mechanisms can be used to coordinate with each other. Formal mechanisms include the following:

- MLATs: These can be multilateral or bilateral agreements for gathering and exchanging information in furtherance of enforcing public and criminal laws. India has such treaties with 39 countries.
- Extradition treaties: These lay down the framework for one state to surrender an individual to another state for prosecution or punishment of crimes committed in the requesting country's jurisdiction. India has signed bilateral treaties with 43 countries.
- Extradition arrangements: These are arrangements wherein detainment of the accused would depend on the local laws of that country and international regulations. India has extradition arrangements with 10 countries.

- Tax information exchange agreements: These provide for the exchange of information in a request relating to a specific criminal or civil tax investigation or civil tax matters under investigation. India has such agreements with 17 countries.

Informal mechanisms include co-operation between the intelligence and diplomatic services of various countries for the exchange of information.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

The Indian Parliament has not promulgated any blocking legislation. However, the government has the option of imposing countermeasures that prevent Indian entities from avoiding compliance with extraterritorial sanction measures. To conclude, there is no policy or mechanism currently favouring Indian companies.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

India has not enacted sanctions blocking legislation. However, if countermeasures are enacted, companies could find themselves caught between the conflicting directives of the sanctioning country and the country seeking to implement countermeasures.

In June 2019, India introduced retaliatory tariffs on certain goods imported from the United States in response to the higher tariffs imposed on steel and aluminium imports by the Trump administration.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

Allegations of misconduct most often come to light by way of the following means:
- whistleblower complaints;
- red flags highlighted as part of due diligence conducted during acquisitions and takeovers;
- competitors and industry sweeps;
- traditional police investigations;
- suspicious activity reports;
- audits and compliance checks; and
- media investigations and reporting.

However, the Whistle Blowers Protection Act 2011, which is yet to come into force, does not apply to corporate whistleblowers. The Act covers only those who make disclosures of wrongful acts committed or attempted by a public servant. Nonetheless, whistleblowers are usually protected under their respective company's whistleblower policy. The SEBI (Listing Obligations and Disclosure Requirements) Regulations 2015 require listed companies to devise an effective whistleblowing policy.

Information gathering

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

India presently does not have any express legislation governing data protection or privacy. The key legislation in this sphere is the IT Act. Additionally, the transfer of personal data is currently governed by the Sensitive Personal Data and Information Rules 2011 (the SPD Rules).

The IT Act deals with payment of fines and imprisonment under civil and criminal laws for cases of wrongful disclosure and misuse of personal data, and violation of contractual terms regarding personal data. The Personal Data Protection Bill 2018 focuses on consent being central to data sharing, with respect to data processed by both government and private entities. However, in Justice Puttaswamy (Retd) v. Union of India (2017) 10 SCC 1, also known as the Aadhar judgment, the Supreme Court of India, while establishing the right to privacy as a fundamental right, held that it was not an absolute right and could be made conditional on reasonable grounds.

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

The IT Act, through the Finance Bill, merged the Cyber Appellate Tribunal with the Telecom Disputes Settlements and Appellate Tribunal, which are the two adjudicatory bodies for infringements of the IT Act. When compensation for failure to protect the confidentiality of sensitive information is less than 5 million rupees, the IT Act provides for the government to appoint an adjudicatory officer with the powers of a civil court. However, although there are penalising provisions, the enforcement of the provisions is not widespread.

Section 50 of Data Protection Bill contemplates the establishment and incorporation of a data protection authority by central government. This authority will consist of six full-time members appointed for a five-year term by central government.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

Companies are required to incorporate policies and practices that impose stringent measures concerning document collection and internal investigations. Under the IT Act and the Information Technology (Reasonable Security Practices and Procedures and Sensitive Personal Data or Information) Rules 2011, a company can be penalised for negligence in handling sensitive personal information. Further, recipients of sensitive personal data or information may be obliged under attorney–client privilege laws to exercise extreme caution while handling data during investigations.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

The IPC criminalises the disclosure or destruction of any document or electronic record that may be required to be produced as evidence in legal proceedings. During an investigation, it is general practice to circulate a document hold memorandum to those employees who are suspected of having documents relevant to the investigation, in an effort to preserve the documents. This would also be likely to include access to electronic data for further analysis, such as email forensics.

Dawn raids and search warrants

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

Search warrants are governed by section 93 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973, which establishes certain stipulations regarding the issuing of search warrants:

- They can be issued only by a magistrate.
- The magistrate must apply his or her judicial mind while issuing a search warrant.
- There must be a search and seizure report (known as a panchnama) following any search or seizure.

Chapter XIV of the CA Act makes provisions pertaining to inspection, enquiry and investigation in corporate entities. Central government has established the SFIO under section 211 of the CA Act to investigate fraud relating to a company. The provisions of the CPC apply, mutadis mutandis, to every search and seizure made under these provisions.

Further, section 41 of the Competition Act 2003 empowers the director general of the Competition Commission of India to conduct dawn raids. The director general is required to obtain a warrant from a magistrate before conducting a raid after satisfying the competent court with material documents and evidence of anticompetitive conduct.

The Companies (Arrests in Connection with Investigation by Serious Fraud Investigation Office Rules 2017 were notified by central government on 24 August 2017. Under the notification, the SFIO is required to follow a number of procedures before making an arrest. These act as a limitation and further delay the SFIO's initiatives to arrest an accused. For instance, the arrest of an individual in connection with a government company or a foreign company under investigation must be made with prior written approval from central government. Further, the initiation of this arrest must also be given to the managing director or other person in charge of the affairs of the company.

Furthermore, a seizure report must be issued. A seizure report is the official record of a raid. It documents the operation and must be prepared by the law enforcement authorities conducting the raid. Among other things, the seizure report must specify the material particulars pertaining to the raid, such as the address of the site being raided, particulars of the person occupying the site at the time of the raid, particulars of the investigating officer or officers, and details of any independent witnesses present. Most importantly, the seizure report must contain a detailed statement of all the materials, documents, objects or articles seized from the site. The completed report must be vetted by two independent witnesses who observed the raid. The investigators usually request company representatives to sign the seizure report and can provide a copy of it upon request.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

The company may object to the review or taking of copies of privileged documents during a dawn raid, including confidential communications between the client and its external attorney. Sections 126 to 131 of the IEA govern attorney–client privilege in India. However, attorney–client documents are not protected in the strictest sense from the police or other law enforcement agencies, should they be found during a dawn raid or a search under a valid warrant. It would depend on the law enforcement agency's discretion whether to respect the company's request not to access such documents. If the authorities decide that the documents are not privileged or confidential, company counsel should request that the documents be placed in sealed envelopes when seized. The objection to the taking of such documents shall also be documented or recorded.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

Principally, an individual's testimony cannot be compelled in India for acts of bribery or fraud. The Constitution under Article 20(3) states that no person accused of any offence shall be compelled to be a witness against himself or herself. Further, under section 161 of the CrPC, individuals being interviewed by the police are not bound to answer questions that could expose them to a criminal charge or to a penalty. Compelled testimonies constitute an infringement of an individual's rights and freedom.

Whistleblowing and employee rights

28 Describe the whistleblowing framework in your country. What financial incentive schemes exist for whistleblowers? What legal protections are in place for whistleblowers?

The PCA itself does not provide any protection to whistleblowers. A separate act – the Whistleblower Protection Act 2011 – is primarily intended to protect whistleblowers with respect to disclosure of:

- acts of corruption by a public servant;
- wilful misuse of power by a public servant; and
- wilful misuse of discretion or the commission, or attempted commission, of a criminal offence by a public servant.

The Whistleblower Protection Act has been passed by both houses of Parliament but has not yet been brought into effect by the government by way of a notification in the Official Gazette. There are no provisions for providing financial incentives for whistleblowers. Moreover, the Act does not deal with corporate whistleblowers, and therefore does not extend its jurisdiction to the private sector.

The SEBI (Listing Obligations and Disclosure Requirements) Regulations 2015 require listed companies to devise an effective whistleblowing policy. Further, the Central Vigilance Commission can initiate investigations based on allegations or complaints by employees of a government corporation.

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

Employees are governed by both central and state legislations. However, these laws do not specifically elaborate on employee rights with respect to investigations. Employees are required by their contract or internal policy of the employer to co-operate in an internal investigation. In appropriate cases, non-participation may entitle the employer to take disciplinary steps against an employee. However, the employer has no coercive powers, and all individuals have a right against self-incrimination under Indian laws.

No special protection is provided to key managerial persons in the event of internal or external investigations under labour laws. The only difference lies in the fact that the circumstance leading to the dismissal of a director who has been appointed by the board, is provided under the CA Act.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

The rights of an employee deemed to have engaged in misconduct depend on the employment contract and the compensation policy of the company. These may include various retaliatory actions, such as denial of pay rises, suspension or termination of employment or warnings.

A number of Indian companies have resorted to clawbacks of bonuses or stocks from key managerial persons who have been involved in misconduct and acted against the interests of the company shareholders. In May 2019, Yes Bank – one of the leading private sector banks in India – announced that it would be clawing back bonuses amounting to approximately 20 million rupees from a former managing director.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

If a company has adequate proof of misconduct against an employee who refuses to participate in an internal investigation, the company may dismiss the employee, while adhering to the principles of natural justice. However, the process shall be governed by the employment contract and relevant policies of each company.

Commencing an internal investigation

32 Is it common practice in your country to prepare a document setting out terms of reference or investigatory scope before commencing an internal investigation? What issues would it cover?

Structuring the scheme of an investigation will follow a preliminary analysis of the allegation framework and the documents available that pertain to it. Thereafter, the investigators shall draw up broad terms for conducting an investigation, which will entail the following:

- deciding who has to be investigated – the informant, reporter or whistleblower, the accused, witnesses and other relevant individuals;
- the objective and scope of the investigation;
- the legal issues under consideration;
- a potential defence strategy, if any;
- materials in the form of documents, business structures, emails, official call records, etc., required for substantiating the allegation that initiated the investigation; and
- setting a deadline for concluding the investigation and submitting the findings of the investigation.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities becoming aware or engaged, the company shall first and foremost conduct an internal investigation and seek legal advice on how to proceed with the issue. Subsequently, on conclusion of the internal investigation, the company shall, based on the findings of the investigation, implement countermeasures or adopt policies to prevent similar issues in the future.

The company shall generally have an effective whistleblower policy, which shall ensure that the identity of the whistleblower is kept confidential. Companies listed in the stock exchange are required to have an effective whistleblower policy in place. Further, depending on the applicable laws, it may be mandatory for a company to make disclosures to law enforcement agencies.

However, there are no legal or statutory requirements for a company to take any internal steps on becoming aware of any issue, except in the case of a complaint alleging sexual harassment in the workplace. The Sexual Harassment of Women (Prevention, Protection and Redressal) Act 2013 requires every branch or office or company employing 10 or more persons to constitute an internal complaints committee.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

A company that is the subject of an external investigation must co-operate fully and furnish complete and correct information and documents within the time provided by the law enforcement agency.

If the law enforcement agency has sought the production or preservation of documents or data, the company should impose a document hold to ensure the preservation of certain documents and information that may be necessary for completion of the inquiry, or in anticipation of any future litigation. Further, the appointment of a document custodian to maintain control over the relevant documents and information would be advisable.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

Disclosure of the existence of an internal investigation or contacting a law enforcement authority will depend on the nature and gravity of the case. Under section 39 of the CrPC, an individual can be penalised for not reporting the commission of a crime by another entity, or the intention to do so. However, in other circumstances, the counsel or advocate of the entity will advise with respect to the disclosure of an investigation or contacting an authority. In India, there is hardly any incentive to approach law enforcement agencies, since it does not provide for any guarantee of immunity or leniency.

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

Investigations allow corporate entities to flag problem areas. The past few years have been significant as regards the development of white-collar criminal jurisprudence in India. Owing to greater pressure for compliance, an increasing number of organisations now opt to conduct internal investigations. Internal investigations aid in keeping a check on the affairs of the corporate entity and protect against unwarranted raids, and any other actions by authorities.

Moreover, before approaching a law enforcement agency, it is advisable that companies carry out their own investigation to substantiate the claims themselves. Commercial organisations can thereby analyse whether the procedures in place were adequate to prevent wrongdoings and subsequently claim it as a defence. This also aids in highlighting the company's strong stance against such misconduct, and may prevent an adverse action by the law enforcement authorities against them.

Attorney–client privilege

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

Legal advice given by a lawyer to a client is privileged under the IEA, the Advocates Act 1961 and the Bar Council of India Rules. As a rule, attorney–client privilege is subject to certain exceptions (e.g., communications made in furtherance of illegal purposes or offences discovered in the course of advising a client are not privileged.).

In Larsen & Toubro Limited v. Prime Displays (P) Ltd (2003) 114 CompCas 141 (Bom), it was held that a document that has come into existence in anticipation of litigation will be covered by privilege. The documents should have come into existence while seeking legal advice or for use for the purpose of defence or prosecution of the legal proceedings. Legal advice is not confined to telling a client the law; it must include advice as to what actions or steps shall be undertaken in a certain set of circumstances.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

The IEA governs the law regarding privileged communication that is attached to professional communications between a legal adviser or counsel and a client. No one shall be compelled to disclose to a court any confidential communication between an individual and his or her legal adviser or counsel, except when offering himself or herself as a witness, to the extent necessary for providing evidence.

The key elements for ensuring privilege in correspondence are:

- to provide sound legal advice and advocacy;
- to maintain the client's privacy;
- that parties should have agreed upon the representation of the client;
- that the client can waive privilege; and
- to protect client communications, including the slightest action or inaction.

The client is the holder of the privilege. When the client is a corporation, the privilege is part of corporate control whereby the officers and directors decide whether to assert or waive the privilege. However, principally there is no difference in the privilege when the client is an individual or a corporation.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

Attorney–client privilege does not apply equally to in-house and external counsel. External counsel with the required expertise are often engaged to conduct internal investigations.

Documents created in the course of an internal investigation, or as an outcome of an investigation, are generally protected. The extent of privilege available to communications with in-house counsel would be limited. The privilege would extend only to the legal advice and work undertaken by the in-house counsel in lieu of litigation. It shall not cover any work of an executive nature undertaken by the in-house counsel.

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

Foreign lawyers are prohibited from practising in India. Under the English law of privilege, communications between clients and their foreign lawyers will be protected on the basis of the law of the land where protection is sought. In India, the position is unclear, although 'barristers' (i.e., barristers 'of England or Ireland, or a member of the Faculty of Advocates in Scotland', as defined under the General Clauses Act 1897) are bound by attorney–client privilege.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

Section 126 of the IEA provides certain exceptional grounds on which attorney–client privilege shall stand denied. This includes communications with an attorney regarding furtherance of any illegal purpose or becoming aware of facts that either a crime or fraud has been committed since the commencement of the attorney's employment. The client's intention to reveal such information to the attorney is irrelevant.

Under section 128 of the IEA, the privilege will be considered to be waived if the client calls his or her attorney or legal adviser as a witness and questions him or her on the same. In Mandesan v. State of Kerala 1995 Cri LJ 61, it was remarked by the sitting judge that there shall be express consent either by the client or the attorney to waive privilege.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

Sections 126 to 129 of the IEA do not contemplate limited waiver and a client may waive privilege entirely or not at all. The same shall be expressly consented to by either of the parties. Further, the Act does not contemplate sharing of attorney–client communications or work-product with a third party with common intentions without waiving protections.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

Privilege that has been waived on a limited basis in another country will be maintainable in India only if the same is proven in India. Indian courts will assess the laws of the country under which the privilege has been waived on a limited basis.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

Sections 126 to 129 of the IEA do not contemplate sharing of attorney–client communications or work-product between persons with a common interest without waiving protection. The scope of attorney–client privilege extends only to the persons and circumstances mentioned under sections 126 to 129 of the IEA.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

Communications between an attorney and a client are privileged even if they contain information from third parties. This privilege also extends to interpreters, clerks or servants of the attorney. Information sought or requested by the client and provided by an employee or third party for legal advice or litigation is also protected. However, communication between the employees of the client in the ordinary course of business, not in anticipation of litigation, is not protected. Accordingly, there is no protection accorded to:

- statements made by an employee on or relating to the subject matter of the proceedings that were not requested to be provided to the attorney; or

- written communications from one employee to another that is potentially useful to the attorney.

To claim privilege, the communications should be of a private and confidential nature, and must have been provided in confidence. Communications made in the presence of third parties would be privileged if it were proven that it was the intention of the client.

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

It is common practice to carry out interviews of witnesses during internal investigations. There are no set statutory rules for conducting a witness interview involving an employee in India, and the purpose of the interview usually depends on the requirements or procedures to be followed in the investigation. Based on the preliminary documentary review pertaining to an investigation, there may be a need to proceed with interviews of a certain set of sampled individuals.

Authorities are not required to be consulted before initiating witness interviews. However, in most cases, the witnesses shall be informed about the interview beforehand.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

Companies and corporations enjoy a right to privilege with respect to information disclosed or documents provided to external legal counsel for the purposes of an internal investigation. Internal witness interviews and attorney reports constitute legal advice and therefore fall under the ambit of attorney–client privilege.

However, in practice, in-house counsel are required to sign employment contracts with confidentiality clauses, whereby damages can be claimed from in-house counsel in the event of a breach of a confidentiality clause.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

Upjohn warnings are issued before commencing an interview. Additionally, investigations are to be conducted in accordance with principles of natural justice. Generally, documentation of an investigation relates to interviewing the complainant, alleged accused and other relevant witnesses. Two of the key principles to keep in mind while conducting witness interviews are as follows:

- proper representation to the interviewee that the attorney–client privilege extends, belongs solely to and is controlled by the company or corporation that has engaged the counsel to conduct the investigation; and
- the corporation may decide to waive the aforementioned privilege and disclose the information provided by the interviewee to any government or enforcement agency, or any third party.

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

It is imperative to assess the logistics of conducting an interview. Most investigations endeavour to elicit complete information at the first opportunity during the initial interviews. Interviews help investigators to understand the motives and truthfulness of the person being interviewed.

Planning for interviews includes a number of processes that are determined in each case. However, the following factors must always be looked into:

- deciding or sampling the interviewees;
- fixing the venue and scheduling time slots for conducting the interviews;
- investigating the witnesses' background;
- deciding the sequence of conducting interviews, especially when a significant number of individuals are required to be interviewed. Moreover, this step shall include anticipating witness questions and preparing an outline for each of the witness interviews; and
- documenting and recording the findings of the interviews.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

There is no legislation mandating the reporting of misconduct in India. Most companies prefer to conduct an internal investigation to substantiate the allegation themselves before proceeding to inform the law enforcement authorities. Disclosures made by companies have to be voluntary. A disclosure will be viewed as the company co-operating with law enforcement and may contribute towards acquiring a favourable judgment in court. However, listed companies must check their disclosure obligations in accordance with the listing agreement signed with the stock exchange.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

The self-reporting mechanism in India is at a nascent stage. Statutes providing leniency in return for disclosures are scarce in India and are limited to the Competition Act 2002 and the Income Tax Act 1961. Self-reporting to the concerned authorities in cases of serious fraud, corruption or criminal acts have to be voluntary. Self-reporting may be advisable when followed by a robust internal investigation undertaken by the corporation itself. However, under the Prevention of Corruption (Amendment) Act 2018, a company that has been compelled to pay bribes may be exempted from liability, on reporting it to the relevant law enforcement authority within seven days of the date of making the illegal payment.

Advice to self-report in other countries would depend on the laws in that country. For example, in the United States, there are mandatory self-reporting clauses under various pieces of legislation. Additionally, the DOJ and SEC consider self-reporting as a mitigating factor for providing leniency in cases of bribery, corruption and fraud.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

Before approaching the law enforcement authorities, it is imperative to first substantiate the allegations internally. Therefore, an internal investigation must be carried out wherein the purpose of the investigation is clearly defined, and an internal report is prepared that sets out the findings of the investigation.

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

The company would first want to ensure that the communication received is in fact a notice from a law enforcement agency. The company shall contact its counsel, note the scope of the search by the authorities and keep a record of any items that are seized during the procedure. Notices may be issued under various circumstances and legal assistance may be sought to determine the nature of the legal communication received.

The following must be analysed in such a circumstance:

- full name of the issuing court, tribunal or authority in the document's title or letterhead;
- the parties addressed or the company's name, or both;
- a specific date, time and location for appearance or the materials demanded;
- in certain cases, the penalty for non-compliance;
- the document title; and
- the provision under which the notice has been issued, the liability or the charges alleged.

Whether the company can address these issues before the charges are brought varies from case to case. When a notice is issued to a company during the course of a criminal investigation by the police department or enforcement agency, it could be possible to discuss the issues with the investigating officer to aid investigation. However, this option is not available in every situation.

If the notice has been issued by a court or tribunal, then the company must enter proceedings before the tribunal and no dialogue may be possible after charges are brought. In such cases, the company must send an appropriate representative to court.

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

If investigations are initiated, a petition for quashing the first information report (a written document prepared by the police when they receive information about the commission of a cognisable offence) may be filed before the high court of the concerned state. However, if the National Company Law Tribunal is taking cognisance of the matter, there cannot be a challenge to an ongoing investigation.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

If different notices have been issued by different law enforcement agencies, they would have to be responded to separately. This is because different violations or offences could arise from the same set of facts. These violations or offences could be subject to the jurisdiction of different law enforcement agencies and each of these agencies must be provided with an explanation.

The company may request the courts to admit information or decisions of a foreign court along the same set of facts. However, such a request is merely persuasive and not binding. Additionally, judgments or orders of local courts arising out of the same set of facts may also be presented.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

While an Indian company is not obliged to procure and produce evidence from a foreign counterpart, the concerned enforcement agency may request such evidence through the relevant tribunal or court. While there are formal means (through bilateral treaties) of seeking the production of information from other jurisdictions, these can have their limitations in terms of delays, ambiguities and incomplete information.

Further, letters rogatory, also known as letters of request, are formal requests from a court in a foreign jurisdiction for judicial assistance, especially to begin the process of examining the relevant individual as a witness or gathering relevant evidence. In 2017, the Ministry of Home Affairs also issued a Comprehensive Guideline for Investigations Aboard and Issuance of Letters Rogatory in 2007. The Indian government has resorted to letters rogatory with respect to high-profile corruption matters. The Enforcement Directorate had issued letters rogatory to the United Kingdom in the loan fraud cases against the liquor baron, Vijay Mallya.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

Both the law enforcement agencies and the court systems can share information and investigative materials with foreign countries. For legal co-operation in civil and commercial matters, MLATs are signed with the countries concerned. These assist in seeking co-operation for judicial proceedings, collection of evidence, investigation and witness examination.

For sharing information and investigative materials for criminal matters, the court or tribunal may issue letters rogatory to the court within whose jurisdiction the accused or witness resides, or the evidence may have been found.

Furthermore, India has guidelines for its law enforcement on extradition proceedings against fugitives, especially economic offenders under the FEO Act.

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

Disclosure obligations primarily depend on the nature of the document and the legal status of the company. Courts normally do not promote disclosure of sensitive information revealed during the investigation. However, there is no specific legislation imposing confidentiality obligations on law enforcement. Discovery statements (statements made to the police that can be proved by subsequent discovery of facts) under section 27 of the IEA can be further used as evidence by the judiciary for furtherance of a case.

Under the SEBI (Listing and Disclosure) Regulations 2015, companies are required to make disclosures pertaining to their compliance of mandatory requirements and adoption of the non-mandatory requirements. Further, refusal to produce information or documents may be viewed as a sign of non-co-operation, which can eventually result in the law enforcement making adverse findings.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

There is no specific legislation providing for an Indian law enforcement agency to request a company in India to provide documents from another country. As counsel, we would normally advise the client to refrain and to reject such a request. However, the advice may be altered or modified on the basis of other compelling aspects, such as the gravity of the offence and the charges levied.

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

Although India has statutes that provide for the protection of data, there is no blocking statute. The aim of these data protection laws is to ensure that sensitive personal data is not leaked without the permission of the data provider.

These protections do not apply when a statutory or judicial authority seeks information; therefore companies must comply with the requests made by the appropriate authority. Under the IT Act, authorities may access computer systems or other devices to collect information that may constitute evidence for a court proceeding or government investigation.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

Confidentiality for voluntarily produced documents cannot be ensured. The material so reproduced before law enforcement agencies could be reproduced to the court. Therefore, it is at the discretion of the courts if the information or material produced should form part of the judgment.

Under section 91 of the IPC, a court can compel the production of any document. However, under section 129 of the IEA, no one can be compelled to disclose confidential information protected by attorney–client privilege; a client would need to waive privilege before protected information is disclosed. If the client does waive privilege, his or her attorney can be compelled by the court to provide as evidence any communication or document previously protected.

Further, an international agency (for example, Interpol or a foreign government) that seeks the assistance of the Indian law enforcement agencies in gathering information with respect to an investigation, a witness or evidence may be provided with the confidential information.

Prosecution and penalties

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

Company officials or employees may be penalised with imprisonment, fines, debarment or disgorgement, or a combination of any of these sanctions, depending upon the nature and gravity of the offence and the governing provision. For example, under section 24 of the SEBI Act 1992, a person found guilty may be imprisoned and fined 250 million rupees, or three times the amount of profit made, whichever is higher.

In many cases, often the assets of the accused individuals are also attached until the investigation is completed.

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

In most cases, the suspension, debarment or other restrictions on a corporation in India will not result in automatic suspension or debarment in another country. Restrictions or options applying to a company in another country will depend on the nature and magnitude of the offence and whether that offence is listed as a criterion for suspension in another country.

Legislation in other countries with extrajudicial reach may have an effect on the corporation's options in India and that country. However, that would entail only after investigations regarding the claim are carried out in that country.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

To determine liability in any offence, the two elements to be established are (1) the commission of the punishable act and (2) the intention to commit that act.

Individuals at lower levels of management or the workforce often do not participate in the decision-making process in a company and since the corporate entity cannot develop an intention on its own, directors and top management are therefore regarded as the 'directing mind' of the corporate entity. These aspects are scrutinised while ascertaining and accruing the liability of an entity. Other factors such as the nature of the offence, its effects and gravity, parallel provisions, the threshold of compliance, etc. are also taken into account. Further, co-operation and good conduct on behalf of the company towards the law enforcement authorities can contribute towards the courts imposing more lenient penalties on the accused.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

Neither non-prosecution agreements nor deferred prosecution agreements are available in India for corporations. These terms are not recognised under any of the Indian statutes. However, the Competition Commission of India has the power to impose lesser penalties under the Competition Act 2002 if it is satisfied that any producer, seller, distributor, trader or service provider included in any cartel, which is alleged to have entered into an anti-competitive agreement, has made a full and true disclosure in respect of the alleged violations. If that disclosure is vital, the Commission has the power to impose upon the producer, seller, distributor, trader or service provider a lesser penalty, as it may deem fit, than is provided for under this Act or the rules or the regulations. Depending upon how useful or at what stage such a disclosure is made, the penalties may be reduced.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

These provisions do not exist under the Indian legal system.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

Offences of fraud, corruption and bribery are non-compoundable under the Indian criminal law and the PCA does not have a provision in support of plea bargaining.

Additionally, when a case concludes in favour of a company, then the application of double jeopardy will prevail, wherein the accused company or entity cannot be tried again on the same or similar charges and on the same facts, following an acquittal or conviction.

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

Private entities are prohibited from being involved in investigations under the CA Act unless they are the ones being investigated or required by statutory or legal authority to make disclosures. Further, while India does not impose corporate monitors on companies involved in bribery and fraud, the SEC does impose corporate monitors on companies that may have operations in India. The SEC has previously imposed corporate monitors on Walmart for two years to guard against corruption in its foreign ventures.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

In India, parallel private investigations can be conducted by companies in addition to government investigations. Internal investigations by companies allow for an understanding and the detection of the root cause of the crisis. Findings of such investigations can subsequently be shared with law enforcement agencies and form part of the evidence. Although this mechanism is not part of any present legislation, such a step by a company may be considered by the court and result in leniency in penalties. Additionally, under The Right to Information Act 2005, a person can request access to any government record or document unless it is confidential.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

There are no specific laws or policy guidelines regarding publicity of cases relating to white-collar crimes at the investigatory stage. However, in 2016, the Supreme Court of India held that a 'first information report' is a public document and, therefore, the media may publish information pertaining to such cases at any stage (including the investigation stage). The press in India is free to attend legal proceedings and report ongoing matters. Generally, the Indian media report on investigations as soon they commence, especially in high-profile cases.

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

Companies may either have an in-house public relations department, with communications and publicity managers, or may outsource the services to another entity specialising in handling publicity-related tasks. Companies also consult their legal and compliance teams before disclosing any such information to the public.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

Since all investigations are not made public, companies under normal circumstances attempt to ensure that no public disclosure is made at all. If investigations or proceedings become public, public relations agencies are engaged to manage the media. Consultants who have experience in handling government relations during a crisis are also engaged for damage control. Companies may also, at times, provide public disclosures on their official website, if they are directed to do so during the investigation procedure.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

Normally, information pertaining to a settlement would be disclosed soon after a settlement has been agreed. However, plea bargaining or similar settlement mechanisms are not prevalent in India in matters pertaining to fraud and corruption, which are considered as serious crimes.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

India has witnessed a rise in corporate misconduct in the banking sector recently, especially in relation to non-banking financial companies. There have also been numerous incidents of high-profile corporate misconduct within well-known audit companies. The government is expected to create regulations governing specific sectors that have been at the forefront of this corporate misconduct.

Further, the Whistle Blowers Protection (Amendment) Bill 2015, which has not yet been enforced in India, provides for a mechanism for receiving and enquiring into public interest disclosures against various acts of corruption, wilful misuse of power or discretion, or criminal offences by public servants.

General context, key principles and hot topics

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

The investigation into the Irish Bank Resolution Corporation by a Commission of Investigation remains the highest-profile ongoing corporate investigation in Ireland. It is very significant as it is connected to the collapse and subsequent wind-down of Anglo Irish Bank plc, a prominent Irish bank that collapsed in connection with the financial crash. The related trial of certain high-ranking banking executives concerning their conduct before the collapse was the longest criminal trial in the history of the state and resulted in penal sentences, which are rarely imposed in Irish business crime cases. This investigation is one of the most complex ever to have been carried out by the Garda National Economic Crime Bureau (GNECB) and concerns allegations of a €7.2 billion conspiracy to defraud.

It is important for both the subject matter under investigation and the procedural conduct of any similar investigation in the future. In that regard, the Commission of Investigation has published a number of interim reports that have highlighted difficulties in conducting this type of investigation in Ireland, such as duties of confidentiality, privilege and the constitutional rights of persons implicated in the investigation.

A draft order and terms of reference for a Commission of Investigation into the National Asset Management Agency (NAMA) were published by the Irish government and an interim report was published in September 2017. The terms of reference provide for an investigation into Project Eagle (the name given to NAMA's Northern Ireland property loans portfolio), which it sold in April 2014 for about €1.6 billion. This was previously the subject of an inquiry in Northern Ireland.

1 Claire McLoughlin and Karen Reynolds are partners and Ciara Dunny is a senior associate at Matheson.

The Office of the Director of Corporate Enforcement (ODCE) has also recently launched high-profile investigations into both Independent News & Media PLC (INM) and the Football Association of Ireland (FAI). In September 2018, the president of the High Court granted an application by the ODCE to appoint inspectors to INM and investigate whether there may have been alleged unlawful sharing of the company's information. The investigation into the FAI was commenced subsequent to its auditors filing a notice to the Companies Registration Office alleging breaches of the Companies Acts on the grounds that financial accounts were not properly maintained. If it is proved that there was a failure to keep proper accounting records, this would result in a breach of sections 281 to 285 of the Companies Act, and the potential conviction of individual board member, who could face a fine of up to €50,000 or imprisonment for up to five years, or both.

There has been only a very limited number of applications to appoint inspectors by the High Court. The approach in relation to the INM investigation was the first brought under section 748 of the Companies Act 2014, which is a relatively new provision but one that is very similar to the legislation under which previous applications were made and which this provision has replaced. The judgment, therefore, provides guidance on the scope of the powers of the High Court. Significantly, the Court clarified that the actions of a director or chairman, even if acting outside his or her usual authority, will come within the meaning of conducting the 'affairs of the company' for the purposes of a section 748 application.

The High Court provided a useful analysis of the matters it will take into consideration in exercising its discretion under section 748, confirming that public interest in ensuring that proper standards of probity and good governance in companies are maintained is one of the primary matters that should be taken into account for any such application. The Court noted that public interest in the circumstances of this case was particularly engaged because of the nature of the company's business, the position it occupies in the Irish media sector and its status as a public company.

The Court also held that another important factor in the exercise of its discretion is the existence, or potential existence, of other statutory investigations into the subject matter of an application. Such investigations do not automatically preclude the appointment of inspectors and the Court will engage in an assessment of the adequacy of those investigations to deal with the issues raised in an application, taking into account matters such as the nature of the powers available to the statutory bodies in question, their power to publish a report and the effect and status of such reports.

An interesting side aspect of the judgment is that it brings renewed focus to an issue that has been occupying headlines for quite some time; specifically, the role of the ODCE and its ability to carry out its enforcement functions effectually. As a result of the Anglo Irish Bank investigation and recent trials, the ODCE has found itself subject to scrutiny as a result of comments made by Judge John Aylmer regarding its investigative process. Against that backdrop, the government, in its Package on White Collar Crime announced in November 2017, committed to re-establish the ODCE as a new independent agency in an effort to enhance the state's corporate law enforcement capacity. Under the General Scheme of the Companies (Corporate Enforcement Authority) Bill 2018, which was published in December 2018, it is proposed that the ODCE will be re-established in the form of a commission, known as the Corporate Enforcement Authority (CEA). The CEA will be established as an independent company law compliance and enforcement agency and will have greater powers than the ODCE. The CEA will operate independently of any government department to provide more independence in addressing company law breaches. The establishment of the CEA is regarded as a fundamental element of the government's commitment to enhance Ireland's ability to combat white-collar crime.

During 2018, the government made some significant progress in implementing the proposals set out in the Measures to Enhance Ireland's Corporate, Economic and Regulatory Framework. This included the enactment of the Criminal Justice (Corruption Offences Act) 2018, which commenced on 30 July 2018, and publication of the General Scheme of the Companies (Corporate Enforcement Authority) Bill 2018 in December 2018. In addition, the Minister for Justice and Equality appointed Mr James Hamilton, former director of public prosecutions, to chair a review of Ireland's anti-corruption and anti-fraud structures and procedures in criminal law enforcement. In March 2019, the review group issued a call for submissions on a number of issues under its terms of reference, the results of which have yet to be published.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

Corporations are separate legal entities and a company can be found liable for the criminal acts of its officers. Section 18(c) of the Interpretation Act 2005 provides that the term 'person' when used in legislation includes a corporate, unless otherwise specified. Companies can also be vicariously liable for the conduct of employees. Where the doctrine of vicarious liability does not apply, the state of mind of an employee can be attributed to the company in circumstances in which the human agent is the 'directing mind and will' of the company, or when an individual's conduct can be attributed to the company under the particular rule under construction. A company can also be guilty of a strict liability offence, which is an offence that does not require any natural person to have acted with a guilty mind, such as health and safety legislation infringements. Since its commencement on 30 July 2018, this is now also an offence under the Criminal Justice (Corruption Offences) Act 2018.

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

An Garda Síochána (the Irish police) is the primary body with responsibility for the investigation and prosecution of crime in Ireland, with a specialised wing for complex fraud-type offences (the GNECB). There are also a number of regulatory bodies with a separate specific remit to investigate and enforce corporate crime. These types of investigations are often carried out with the assistance of the police. The regulatory bodies include:

- the ODCE, which monitors and prosecutes violations of company law;
- the Office of the Revenue Commissioners (the Revenue Commissioners), which is responsible for the collection, monitoring and enforcement of tax laws;
- the Competition and Consumer Protection Commission (CCPC), which is responsible for competition law and consumer protection;
- the Central Bank of Ireland (CBI), which regulates financial institutions;
- the Health and Safety Authority, which enforces occupational health and safety law; and
- the Data Protection Commission (DPC), which is responsible for data protection law.

In terms of prosecution, offences are divided between summary (minor) offences and indictable (serious) offences. In general, regulatory bodies, such as those listed above, are authorised to prosecute summary offences directly. The Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (DPP) is the relevant body for the prosecution of criminal offences on indictment, or for prosecution of summary offences outside the remit of regulatory bodies. The DPP has no investigative functions; the relevant investigating body prepares a file and submits it to the DPP for consideration. It is then solely at the discretion of the DPP as to whether a case will be taken.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

This will depend on the statutory basis for that investigation. For the most part, investigations are initiated on the basis of a complaint alleging that an offence has been committed. Some bodies (such as the Standards in Public Office Commission) can only initiate investigations following receipt of a complaint alleging that an offence has been committed, whereas others, such as the DPC, can also initiate investigations on their own initiative. Different bodies use different factors to consider whether to initiate an investigation into a specific matter. For example, the GNECB has stated that it will assess whether to investigate a complaint on the basis of different factors, such as the monetary loss involved, the international dimension of the complaint and the complexity of the issues of law or procedure that arise.

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

The lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority may be challenged in the Irish courts through judicial review proceedings. However, it may be possible to reach a compromise with the law enforcement agency on the scope of the notice. It may also be possible to obtain an interim injunction in certain circumstances preventing the exercise of the notice, subpoena or warrant, or preventing the authority from using information already obtained, unless and until the court determines that the validity of the instrument is valid and enforceable.

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

Irish law does not recognise plea bargaining or co-operative agreements. The decision to prosecute is at the discretion of the DPP and the courts have discretion in imposing sentences within the statutory minimum and maximum periods.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

Regulatory bodies typically publish their enforcement priorities annually. The CBI's priorities include, among other things, outsourcing by financial firms, MiFID implementation, fintech, conduct, behaviour and culture of regulated entities, money laundering and counter-terrorist financing compliance, while the DPC and the CBI have both stated that their current focus is on cybersecurity.

As mentioned in question 1, the Irish government has a specific renewed focus on tackling white-collar crime. A key part of its efforts in this space was the introduction of the Criminal Justice (Corruption Offences) Act 2018, plans to establish the ODCE as an independent company law compliance and enforcement agency, and piloting a Joint-Agency Task Force to tackle white-collar crime. The government also intends to enact the Criminal Procedure Bill, the aim of which is to streamline criminal procedures to enhance the efficiency of criminal trials.

The CBI, in collaboration with the Dutch Central Bank, conducted an assessment of the behaviour and culture in five Irish retail banks. In July 2018, it published the findings of this review. As part of these findings, the CBI has proposed the introduction of a new individual accountability framework, which would apply to banks and other regulated financial service providers. The framework includes conduct standards for regulated financial services providers and the staff working in them, a senior executive accountability regime, and enhancements to the existing fitness and probity, and enforcement processes. This is a top priority for the CBI and a consultation paper is expected imminently.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

The European Union (Measures for a High Common Level of Security of Network and Information Systems) Regulations 2018, which were introduced in September 2018, impose requirements on operators of essential services (OESs) and digital service providers (DSPs) to manage the risks to the security of network and information systems. OESs include operators within specified sectors, including energy, transport, banking, financial market infrastructures, health and digital infrastructure. DSPs are those who provide digital services, including online marketplaces, online search engines and cloud computing services. There is a centralised computer security incident response team in the Department of Communications, Climate Action and the Environment, which both OESs and DSPs must notify if there are incidents that have a significant or substantial impact on these services. The CBI also takes enforcement action against any financial service provider whose failings in cybersecurity cause it to breach its regulatory requirements. For example, in June 2018 the CBI sanctioned an asset management firm for exposing itself to cyber-fraud, which resulted in the loss of €650,000 in client funds. This was the first such enforcement action of its kind.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

The Criminal Justice (Offences Relating to Information Systems) Act 2017 was the first Irish legislation to specifically address the issue of cybercrime. The Act created new dedicated cybercrime offences, including:

- accessing or interfering with an information system without lawful authority;
- interfering with data without lawful authority;
- interfering with the transmission of data without lawful authority; and
- use of a computer or data for the purpose of the commission of any of these offences.

The Criminal Justice (Theft and Fraud Offences) Act 2001 also provides that it is an offence to use a computer with the dishonest intention of causing a loss to another person.

As outlined in question 3, An Garda Síochána, the country's national police force, have a specialised division called the Garda National Cyber Crime Bureau, which investigates and enforces cybercrime. Any prosecutions for cybercrime are managed by the DPP.

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

In general, Ireland does not assert extraterritorial jurisdiction in respect of acts conducted outside the jurisdiction. However, extraterritorial jurisdiction is conferred by statute in respect of specific offences to varying degrees. For instance, section 4 of the Competition Act 2002 provides that it is an offence to be party to an anticompetitive agreement that has the effect of preventing, restricting or distorting competition in trade in goods or services within the state. Importantly, section 4 is not restricted to agreements made within Ireland.

Examples of specific offences for which Ireland exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction are as follows.

Corruption

The Criminal Justice (Corruption Offences) Act 2018 prohibits bribery offences occurring outside Ireland in two sets of circumstances: (1) if an Irish person or company does something outside Ireland that, if done within Ireland, would constitute an offence under the corruption legislation, that person is liable as if the offence had been committed in Ireland; and (2) if an offence under the corruption legislation takes place partly in Ireland and partly in a foreign jurisdiction, a person may be tried in Ireland for that offence. There is no requirement that the offending act should also be an offence in the foreign jurisdiction where the offending act took place. To date, there have been no prosecutions in Ireland under these extraterritorial provisions.

Money laundering

The Criminal Justice (Money Laundering and Terrorist Financing) Act 2010 (as amended) (the CJ(MLTF) Act) sets out specific circumstances in which an action can be taken for money laundering occurring outside Ireland. If an individual or a company engages in conduct in a foreign jurisdiction that would constitute a money laundering offence both under the CJ(MLTF) Act and in that foreign jurisdiction, they can be prosecuted in Ireland. This extraterritorial jurisdiction may only be exercised if the individual is an Irish citizen, ordinarily resident in the state, or the body corporate is established by the state or registered under the Companies Act 2014.

The Proceeds of Crime Acts

Under the Proceeds of Crime Act 2016 (the PCA Act), the Irish High Court can make orders depriving a defendant of assets that are merely suspected of being the proceeds of crime, regardless of whether the defendant has been convicted of a criminal offence. The standard of proof required to determine any question arising under the PCA Act is that applicable to civil proceedings. 'Property' in relation to the proceeds of crime is broadly defined and includes money and all other property, real or personal. 'Proceeds of crime' for the purposes of the PCA Act means any property obtained or received at any time by, or as a result of, or in connection with criminal conduct. The definition of 'criminal conduct' is such that foreign criminality is covered by the scope of the act where the proceeds are within the state. Therefore, the legislation has extraterritorial effect when (1) the criminal conduct occurred outside the state, but the respondent and the property are situated within the state, provided that the conduct constituting the offence is also an offence in the foreign state, (2) the respondent is situated within the state and the criminal conduct occurred outside the state and the property is located outside the state, or (3) the property is located within the state, the respondent is situated outside the state and the criminal conduct occurred outside the state, provided that the conduct constituting the offence is also an offence in the foreign jurisdiction.

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

Cross-border investigations, whether by law enforcement, regulators or internal investigations by companies, pose challenges in every jurisdiction for practical, political and legal reasons. For investigations by Irish regulators and law enforcement agencies, the foremost consideration will be whether there is an existing framework for co-operation between Ireland and the other jurisdiction or jurisdictions. The Criminal Justice (Mutual Assistance) Act 2008, as amended, is the primary piece of legislation governing mutual legal assistance between Ireland and other countries. The extent of available co-operation under mutual legal assistance procedures is dependent on the identity of the corresponding state, and the greatest level of co-operation is among other EU Member States. Co-operation with third countries (i.e., those outside the European Economic Area) is dependent on their ratification of relevant international agreements or the existence of a mutual assistance treaty agreed between them. Regulators and law enforcement can co-operate with their counterparts outside these formal procedures, and this will depend on the relationships between such bodies.

Investigations by regulators or law enforcement and by corporations can also encounter difficulties owing to different legal standards. For example, data protection laws in some countries can restrict the flow of information out of the country, and different levels of protection for private data may restrict the possibility of transfer between the jurisdictions. Further, different rules can apply to matters such as the application of privilege and the constitutional protections owed to persons under investigation.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

The long-established principle of double jeopardy applies in Ireland. A corporation cannot be prosecuted twice for the same or similar offences on the same facts following a legitimate acquittal or conviction by an Irish court or by a court of competent authority in a foreign jurisdiction. There must be identity between the foreign and domestic offences. It is possible for the same course of conduct in an international setting to give rise to multiple separate offences in different jurisdictions.

The fact that a corporation entered into a deferred prosecution agreement (DPA) in a different country is unlikely to prevent prosecution in Ireland, which does not provide for the use of DPAs, unless the DPA was viewed as being equivalent to an acquittal or conviction.

Typically, the principle does not apply until proceedings are concluded. However, under the Criminal Justice (Money Laundering and Terrorist Financing) Act 2010 (as amended), no proceedings may be initiated in circumstances where an individual has been charged under that Act in the absence of consent from the DPP.

There is no anti-piling on policy in Ireland that prevents multiple enforcement authorities from taking action against an entity in relation to the same conduct.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

It is possible for a domestic authority to reach a resolution as part of a coordinated approach with an overseas authority. However, if a party wishes to reach a settlement with authorities in another country or countries, it should be aware that such an agreement may not prevent Irish authorities from continuing to pursue a prosecution.

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

Investigations into similar matters in other jurisdictions are often the catalyst for investigations in Ireland. Irish authorities will usually try to co-operate with foreign investigation authorities, and the exchange of information through appropriate channels can aid an investigation greatly. Irish investigatory authorities will take notice of decisions made by foreign investigatory authorities, but the weight given to such a decision will vary depending on factors such as the similarity of the facts under investigation and the jurisdiction concerned. Ultimately, it will be a matter for the Irish authorities to determine whether and how to conduct their own investigations, and prosecutions and enforcement actions in other jurisdictions will at most be one of a number of factors considered.

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

While sanctions are imposed at an international level, they are implemented at a national level. Therefore, individuals and companies operating in Ireland should be aware of the restrictions imposed under Irish law that implement international sanctions. As a Member State of both the United Nations and the European Union, Ireland is required to observe and enforce UN Security Council sanctions and EU restrictive measures. Each Member State is required to designate their competent authorities that are engaged with sanctions issues. In Ireland's case, these are the Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade, the Department of Business, Enterprise and Innovation and the CBI. The competent Irish authorities are not responsible for designating sanctions against individuals or other states. The competent authorities enact legislation that enforces sanctions imposed by either the European Union or the United Nations. For example, the Department of Business, Enterprise and Innovation implements trade sanctions issued by the United Nations and the European Union, and the CBI handles all financial sanctions. The CBI's website includes up-to-date information on the most recent EU financial sanctions and UN targeted financial sanctions.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

As outlined in question 15, sanctions are implemented at a national level. The CBI is responsible for ensuring that regulated entities operating in the financial services sphere in Ireland comply with financial sanctions. Any regulated entity in Ireland could find itself subject to enforcement action in respect of policies and procedures around financial sanctions screening.

Sanctions enforcement activity in recent years has increased on account of the European Union being more proactive in imposing sanctions. For example, in recent years, the emergence of ISIL as a terrorist threat, the sanctions imposed on Russia after the annexation of the Crimean peninsula and the ongoing conflict in Syria have all resulted in increased sanctions activity, with which Irish companies are obliged to comply. While several enforcement settlements issued by the CBI have to date related to anti-money laundering failures, there have been no settlements yet specifically related to failures concerning a firm's financial sanctions screening process.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

Coordination and co-operation between competent authorities of each Member State is facilitated through the implementation of EU and domestic legal instruments. This ensures efficient national coordination and communication mechanisms between all relevant competent authorities.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

As a member of the European Union, Ireland is subject to the EU Blocking Regulation, which was expanded in August 2018 to curtail the effects of the United States' withdrawal from the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action. The Regulation effectively nullifies the extra-territorial application of the US sanctions against Iran by prohibiting compliance with any sanctions imposed by the United States; preventing the enforcement of any judgment from a foreign court outside the European Union that gives effect to the sanctions; by requiring any EU person, natural or legal, to notify the European Commission of any effects that the sanctions may have on them; and by allowing any EU person to seek compensation caused by the application of the sanctions.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

The Irish courts implement certain aspects of the EU Blocking Regulation by not enforcing or recognising any judgments that may be made outside the European Union. Further, the courts will allow EU persons to seek compensation in the Irish court system for any adverse effects caused by the application of US sanctions.

Under SI 217/1997 (European Communities (Extraterritorial Application of Legislation Adopted By a Third Country) Regulations), failure to comply with the EU Blocking Regulation is an offence and may be punished by a fine or up to 12 months' imprisonment.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

- Allegations of misconduct will often by raised by whistleblowers, who are protected by the Protected Disclosures Act 2014. Accordingly, great care must be taken not to violate these protections when allegations come to light in this way. Under the Central Bank Act (Supervision and Enforcement) Act 2013, there are specific whistleblower protections in relation to making disclosures to the CBI when breaches of financial services legislation may be in issue.
- Thematic reviews are typically carried out by regulators. By the time an allegation of misconduct has arisen on a thematic review or as a result of any other regulatory oversight, the company may not be able to remedy the matter or otherwise prevent an investigation or enforcement action. For example, the CBI often bases its investigations on the Administrative Sanction Procedure under the Central Bank Act 1942 (as amended) on matters identified during thematic reviews.
- When allegations arise through media reports, publicised litigation or other publicised external sources, there are more immediate public relations risks than when a matter arises internally. Companies should consider engaging a public relations agency if there are significant reputational risks attached to any allegation of misconduct.
- There are specific legislative provisions that oblige persons to report information in relation to certain offences in certain circumstances. The Supreme Court recently upheld the enforceability of section 19 of the Criminal Justice Act 2011 in Sweeney v. Ireland [2019] IESC 39. If a company is a regulated entity, it may be required to make certain disclosures to its regulator, or indeed to self-report unintentional breaches or offences. Auditors have disclosure obligations, and misconduct coming to light during their engagement may trigger a reporting obligation.

- There is political appetite to ensure Ireland remains an attractive location in which to do business. The introduction of the 'corporate offence' in the Criminal Justice (Corruption Offences) Act 2018 enables a corporate body to be held liable for the corrupt actions committed for its benefit by any director, manager, secretary, employee, agent or subsidiary. The single defence available to corporates for this offence is demonstrating that the company took 'all reasonable steps and exercised all due diligence' to avoid the offence being committed. Although there is no Irish guidance on the legislation yet, 'reasonable steps' could include ensuring measures are taken to promote and ensure a corporate culture of reporting suspicions or concerns in relation to corruption and that any suspicions or concerns are notified and, where appropriate, reported to the relevant authorities.

Information gathering

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

Ireland's data protection regime mainly comprises the General Data Protection Regulation (Regulation (EU) 2016/679) (GDPR) and the Data Protection Acts 1988–2018 (the DP Acts). Within this regime, there are a number of duties on data controllers, including an obligation to process personal data (under the meaning of the GDPR and the DP Acts) fairly, for it to be kept up to date and secure.

Additionally, the Criminal Justice (Offences Relating to Information Systems) Act 2017 (enacted on 24 May 2017) gives effect to provisions of Directive 2013/40/EU on attacks against information systems. The Act introduced a number of criminal offences, including:

- unauthorised access of information systems;
- interference with information systems or with data on such systems;
- interception of the transmission of data to or from information systems; and
- the use of tools to facilitate the commission of these offences.

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

The DPC is responsible for monitoring the application of the DP Acts and the GDPR to protect the rights and freedoms of individuals in relation to processing.

The DPC has a number of investigative powers, including the power to conduct an audit, the power to compel individuals and companies to provide it with information and documentation, and the power to prohibit the transfer of personal data overseas.

Summary proceedings may be brought and prosecuted by the DPC. In relation to indictable offences, the DPC prepares a file and submits it to the DPP for consideration; it is then solely at the discretion of the DPP as to whether a case will be taken in respect of a suspected offence.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

The GDPR and the DP Acts restrict the use and disclosure of an individual's data in Ireland. There are exceptions to the protection given under the DP Acts, but there is no specific exemption when an internal investigation is being carried out. Therefore, all the rules and protections regarding personal data, as set out in the DP Acts, must be followed during an internal investigation. Traditionally, companies have relied upon consent to support internal investigations; however, the DP Acts now require that consent be freely given to be valid. In the context of employment, there is an inherent imbalance of power between employee and employer. In addition, the GDPR requires that a data subject can withdraw his or her consent at any time. These factors make it difficult for employers, in the majority of circumstances, to rely upon consent as a legal basis for processing data, albeit not impossible.

Companies should therefore seek an alternative lawful basis for processing in the context of internal investigations. The DP Acts allow for data to be processed if it is necessary for the purposes of legitimate interests pursued by the data controller, which can be the case for an internal investigation, but that needs to be balanced against the fundamental rights and freedoms and the legitimate interests of the data subject in question.

Organisations do have a legitimate interest in protecting their business, reputation, resources and equipment. However, Irish law recognises a broad 'right to privacy', which includes a right to privacy at work, and a person does not lose privacy and data protection rights simply by being an employee. Any limitation of an employee's right to privacy should be proportionate to the likely damage to the employer's legitimate interests.

If an employer seeks to use 'legitimate interests' as the basis for processing data, an employee as data subject will have a right to object to that processing of their data. This right is not absolute and may be overridden by the employer having 'compelling reasons' to process the data. The severity of the suspected offence will therefore affect the employer's ability to satisfy this requirement. Companies should also ensure that this balancing exercise between the legitimate interests of the company and those of the employee be carried out prior to conducting the internal investigation, and information in respect of any such exercise should be made available to employees.

In any event, companies must inform their employees of the right to object and should draft an internal investigation policy reflecting this balance. Employees should be notified of the possibility that an investigation might take place and, in particular, the ways in which their personal data might be processed in the context of an investigation. For new employees, this information should be provided when they join the company. However, for existing employees, the provision of an updated internal investigation policy will be sufficient.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

Irish employers have the right to monitor employees' communications. However, this is subject to the right to privacy that employees are afforded under both the Irish Constitution and the European Convention on Human Rights, as well as under data protection law. Any intrusion of an employee's right to privacy must be proportionate to any likely damage caused to the employer's legitimate interests.

When an employee wishes to enforce the right to privacy or believes that it is has been infringed, he or she may do so by referring a dispute to the Workplace Relations Commission or by commencing proceedings in the courts. If the dispute involves the employee's personal data, it may be possible to lodge a complaint with the DPC.

Dawn raids and search warrants

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

Search warrants and dawn raids are often used as part of investigations against companies, particularly by the CCPC and the ODCE. Both company premises and private homes of relevant persons can be searched on the basis of an appropriate warrant.

There are constitutional protections for persons subject to searches, particularly of private homes. Depending on the specific statute, a regulator or investigatory body would obtain a search warrant to enter a dwelling to conduct a search and to seize documents. There is a general requirement that there is some nexus between the investigation by the regulatory body of the offence in question and the dwelling in question. The body is only permitted to search the premises specified in the warrant and to seize items coming within the terms of the warrant.

Evidence seized outside the scope of a search warrant may, depending on the circumstances, be inadmissible at trial.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

Privileged material is prima facie protected from examination by law enforcement or regulatory bodies. Specific statutes, such as the Companies Act 2014 and the Central Bank (Supervision and Enforcement) Act 2013, also provide for the protection of privileged information during investigations.

In practical terms, it can be difficult to determine during a seizure operation whether material is privileged, and sometimes the material will be isolated so that a claim of privilege can be assessed later.

The mechanism to assess whether privilege has been properly asserted will be dependent on the legislation under which the search warrant was granted. For example, the Competition and Consumer Protection Act 2014 provides a mechanism whereby material that is seized, and is claimed to be legally privileged, is retained and vetted by an independent assessor to determine whether privilege has been properly asserted.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

The Irish Constitution recognises a right to silence and the privilege against self-incrimination. Arrested suspects are brought into police custody for questioning 'under caution'. The suspect should be cautioned that they have the right to maintain silence and that anything they say may be used in evidence. However, the Criminal Justice Act 1984 (as amended) provides that, in the case of arrestable offences (i.e., those for which a person can be imprisoned for five years or more), inferences can be drawn at trial from an accused's silence.

The right to silence can be abridged by statute, most often in the context of regulatory investigations, meaning that answers can be compelled. However, Irish courts have frequently held that statements given under statutory compulsion (such as in connection with a regulatory investigation attracting a civil penalty) cannot be used against that person in subsequent criminal proceedings, whereas voluntary statements can be.

Whistleblowing and employee rights

28 Describe the whistleblowing framework in your country. What financial incentive schemes exist for whistleblowers? What legal protections are in place for whistleblowers?

The Protected Disclosures Act 2014 (the 2014 Act) protects whistleblowers and provides for a tiered disclosure regime with a number of avenues open to whistleblowers. The 2014 Act encourages the vast majority of protected disclosures to be made to the employer in the first instance. However, other options are available if this is inappropriate or impossible.

There are no financial incentive schemes for whistleblowers.

When a worker makes a protected disclosure, the employer in question is prevented from dismissing or penalising the worker, taking an action for damages or an action arising under criminal law, or disclosing any information that might identify the person who made the disclosure. If the employer were to dismiss or penalise a worker wholly or mainly as a result of him or her making a protected disclosure, the worker could be awarded up to five years' remuneration, re-engagement or reinstatement by the Workplace Relations Commission (the employment tribunal in Ireland). Further, the 2014 Act creates a cause of action in tort for the worker for detriment suffered as a result of making a protected disclosure. The definitions of 'protected disclosure', 'relevant wrongdoing' and 'worker' are quite broad, and care should be taken to consider whether the Act applies in every case of reported misconduct.

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

As a general matter, employees have a constitutional right to 'fair procedures' in any investigative or disciplinary process. This means that, among other things, the employee must be kept appraised of the investigation and must be permitted to participate in the investigation and make points in their defence. The extent and scope of fair procedures and natural justice that must be afforded during a workplace investigation depends on the actual nature of the investigation and the potential consequences thereof.

The rights do not differ for officers and directors who are employees.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

The rights outlined in question 29 apply in an investigation and disciplinary process when a person is implicated or suspected of having engaged in misconduct.

Prior to a finding of misconduct being made, an investigation and disciplinary process should be carried out.

The disciplinary process should, at a minimum, follow the Workplace Relations Commission's Code of Practice on Disciplinary and Grievance Procedures, the employer's own procedures and involve the basic principles set out below.

- Advance written notice of any allegations, and any supporting documentation and witness statements, should be provided to the employee.
- The employee should be invited, in writing, to an investigation meeting to discuss the allegations and to put forward his or her response.
- The investigation should go no further than to determine whether there is a sufficient factual basis to warrant a matter being put to disciplinary hearing.
- Suspension should only be imposed after full consideration of the necessity for it pending a full investigation of matters. It may be justified if it is to prevent repetition of the conduct complained of or interference with evidence; to protect individuals at risk from such conduct; to comply with any regulatory rule applicable to the individual or their role; or to protect the employer's business and reputation. Suspension must be for no longer than is reasonably necessary and on full pay and benefits.
- Depending on the outcome of an investigation, the employee should be invited in writing to a disciplinary meeting to discuss the allegations and to put forward a response. Documents obtained during the investigation should be provided to the employee.
- The employee should be allowed to bring a colleague or trade union representative to any meetings.
- Any sanction must be proportionate and reasonable in the circumstances and should be confirmed in writing to the employee.
- A right of appeal to someone not previously involved should be provided.
- Unless the allegations are sufficient to constitute gross misconduct, the sanctions should progress from verbal warning to written warning to final written warning to dismissal. Summary dismissal will only be permitted where the circumstances genuinely constitute gross misconduct.

The following specific protections may arise in the context of conduct-related investigations and dismissals.

- Unfair dismissal. In general, an employee with one year of continuous service may bring a claim for unfair dismissal. An employer cannot lawfully dismiss an employee unless substantial grounds exist to justify termination, such as the employee's conduct. Regard will also be given to the reasonableness of the employer's conduct and the extent of any failure to adhere to agreed procedures. A preliminary investigation is an essential precursor to a fair disciplinary process.

- Discrimination. Irrespective of length of service, an employee may bring a claim for discriminatory dismissal or discrimination based on any one of the nine discriminatory grounds contrary to equality legislation (i.e., gender, civil status, family status, sexual orientation, religion, age, disability, race (including colour, nationality and ethnic or national origin) and membership of the traveller community).
- Whistleblowing. See question 28.
- Wrongful dismissal or High Court injunction. An employee can seek a High Court injunction to restrain an employer from implementing a dismissal if the decision is not implemented correctly. An injunction maintains the status quo pending the determination of an overarching breach of contract claim. A similar order may also be brought to restrain an investigation or disciplinary hearing before matters even reach the dismissal stage. A challenge may be based on corporate governance grounds, the fairness of the procedures adopted or failure to terminate the contract in accordance with its terms.

For dismissal for out-of-work misconduct to be deemed fair, there must be a genuine connection between the employee's offence and his or her employment. The connection must be such that it leads to a breach of trust or causes reputational or other damage to the employer. In such circumstances, the employer should carry out its own internal investigation and disciplinary process (in accordance with the requirements set out above).

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

The extent to which an employer may take disciplinary action against an employee for failure to participate in an investigation, up to and including dismissal in accordance with its disciplinary procedure, will depend on the circumstances.

Commencing an internal investigation

32 Is it common practice in your country to prepare a document setting out terms of reference or investigatory scope before commencing an internal investigation? What issues would it cover?

There is no statutory requirement for such a document, but it would be considered general good practice. Depending on the circumstances, it may be useful to detail the purpose and scope of the investigation and to clarify the remit of the investigators' role. Matters to cover might include:

- the structure and methodology of the investigation;
- a definition of the issues to be covered; and
- details of any engagement with legal counsel and related matters concerning privileged material.

If the investigation concerns employees of the company, it should go no further than gathering the relevant information or evidence to determine whether or not there is a sufficient factual basis to put particular allegations at a formal disciplinary hearing. The investigation should be carried out in accordance with any relevant internal procedures and not reach any factual conclusions on the evidence or decide whether the allegations are proved.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

Depending on the severity of the issue, it would usually be prudent for a business to carry out a certain level of enquiry and investigation. However, a company should take care in carrying out any investigations and in creating any reports, as it is possible that any such documents could be subject to disclosure in any subsequent legal proceedings. A company would not generally be obliged to voluntarily provide the results of such an investigation to the relevant authorities unless it is required under a court order, statute or as part of a self-report. A number of legislative provisions impose a positive obligation on persons (including businesses) to report wrongdoing in certain circumstances (see question 50).

It is also essential, of course, that any wrongdoing ceases as soon as the company becomes aware of it, and that remedial measures are taken where appropriate. Care should be taken to preserve evidence of the wrongdoing, as a failure to do so could result in accusations of destruction of evidence, which can itself be an offence under certain legislation, such as pursuant to section 793 of the Companies Act 2014.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

It is advisable to immediately implement a 'document hold' by suspending deletion policies and circulating document retention notices.

The company should review the request and consider the power under which it is exercised, and in particular if the request is voluntary or mandatory. There are risks associated with releasing documentation, particularly when it might contain confidential or personal information, without being lawfully compelled to do so. External legal advice may be required in this regard.

An inventory listing the materials falling within the notice should also be prepared. The material should then be assessed for privilege. Copies of anything provided to the investigation authority should be retained.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

Privately owned companies are not required to publicly disclose the existence of internal investigations or contact from law enforcement. There may, of course, be commercial reasons for doing so (or not doing so) in any particular case.

Under the Irish Listing Rules, publicly listed companies on the Irish Stock Exchange (Euronext Dublin) must, without delay, provide to Euronext Dublin any information that it considers appropriate to protect investors. Euronext Dublin may, at any time, require an issuer to publish such information within the time limits it considers appropriate to protect investors or to ensure the smooth operation of the market.

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

Internal investigations are considered part of good corporate governance. However, companies operating in Ireland can be subject to certain reporting obligations in respect of certain offences and will therefore be required to notify matters to law enforcement or regulators in certain circumstances (see question 50).

The Irish High Court ruled in Mooney v. An Post [1998] 4 IR 288 that the acquittal of an employee of criminal charges does not preclude employers from considering whether an employee should be dismissed on the basis of the impugned conduct. However, if criminal prosecution precedes an internal investigation, in general, internal disciplinary procedures are suspended to respect the individual's right to silence.

Attorney–client privilege

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

Any requirement to disclose documents obtained through an internal investigation to the Irish authorities is qualified by legal professional privilege. In Ireland, documentation, including electrical documentation and audio and visual records of communication, may attract legal professional privilege either in the form of legal advice privilege or litigation privilege. Legal advice privilege arises regarding confidential communications between a lawyer and a client that are created for the sole or dominant purpose of giving or seeking legal advice, even if there is no actual or potential litigation. Litigation privilege applies to communications between a lawyer and a client made in the context of contemplated or existing litigation or regulatory action and also covers communications with third parties, such as experts. Litigation privilege can be a broader form of privilege to assert in the context of an internal investigation, provided there is actual or contemplated litigation or regulatory action.

The main way to protect privilege is to involve lawyers in internal investigations at an early stage, although it should be noted that privilege cannot be created regarding existing documents after they have been created merely by involving lawyers. To ensure that existing privilege is not lost, it is important to limit the disclosure or sharing of materials to essential persons only. Legal advice should not be summarised or copied and shared by non-legal persons. If privileged materials need to be shared with third parties, it is important to ensure that appropriate confidentiality agreements are put in place to govern such disclosure and that, as far as possible, privilege is not inadvertently waived or lost.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

Legal professional privilege applies equally to individuals and companies and belongs to the client (see question 37). Under Irish law, the question of who is the client in a corporate context was considered in UCC v. ESB [2014] IEHC 135. In that case, it was held that if the client is a corporate body, it is necessary to consider whether the individual making the communication to the lawyer is a person engaged or employed to obtain or receive legal advice on behalf of the client.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

Both in-house and external counsel attract legal professional privilege when the criteria for legal professional privilege are met. In-house counsel must be acting in their capacity as a legal adviser and not, say, as an officer of the company. However, the position with regard to in-house counsel in the context of certain external matters is not straightforward and advice should be sought as a result of the decision of the European Court of Justice in Akzo Nobel Chemicals Ltd and Akcros Chemicals Ltd v. Commission (Case C-550/07 P).

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to investigations in your country?

The position in Ireland is that, as far as legal professional privilege is concerned, the definition of 'lawyer' extends to foreign lawyers. There does not appear to be any question about this and it is generally accepted that foreign legal advice is privileged to the extent that it fits Irish legal rules on privilege.

For example, in Sports Direct International Plc v. Minor & ors [2015] IEHC 650, the High Court applied privilege to English legal advice without questioning whether it would apply.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

Asserting legal professional privilege is a legal right and the fact of its assertion should not be held against a party. However, if the materials regarding which legal professional privilege is being asserted are central to any enforcement investigation (such as a party defending certain conduct on the basis that it was taken following legal advice), it may appear unco-operative to refuse to disclose such material. In such a case, disclosure could, in fact, be in a party's strategic interest. Any decision to waive privilege should be carefully considered as, once waived, legal professional privilege is lost. It is generally recommended that a waiver should be limited to those materials that are strictly necessary and should be made on a limited and specified basis; in other words, a general waiver of all legal professional privilege in respect of a particular matter is not advisable.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

It is possible to waive privilege on a limited basis. However, care should be taken as privilege can inadvertently be lost in such circumstances. The scope of the waiver should be clear, limited and in writing; furthermore, it is of utmost importance that confidentiality in the material should be maintained.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

If the waiver of privilege was appropriate, limited and restricted, it should not defeat the overall assertion of legal professional privilege. However, this will depend on the extent and nature of the waiver in each case.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

Common interest privilege does exist in Ireland. It is important that common interest privilege is expressly asserted and that the third party is aware of the necessity of preserving privilege in the materials received, such as by not disclosing it to any other persons outside the common interest circle.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

Third-party communications are only protected against disclosure in the context of litigation privilege. Litigation privilege can be asserted regarding third-party communications where the dominant purpose of the communication is in anticipation of existing or contemplated litigation (which currently includes regulatory proceedings).

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

Witnesses can be interviewed in internal investigations and are often seen as an integral part of the fact-finding exercise of an investigation. However, the internal investigation would not be able to compel witnesses to attend, except to the extent that employees can be requested to co-operate in the context of their employment.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

Reports that contain legal analysis, advice or conclusions, or which are prepared with the dominant purpose of preparing for, or in contemplation of or in connection with litigation or regulatory proceedings, can be protected by legal professional privilege.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

It can be important that witnesses are informed of the nature of the interview, whether they are implicated in any wrongdoing and, crucially, of any possible consequences for them of the investigation process to preserve the ability to take appropriate action, if necessary, following or as a result of the investigation. It is important to note that any lawyers present are acting for the company and not for the employee, who may, in some cases, have his or her own legal representation.

Existing employees have a greater right to fair procedures as they are more likely to face the possibility of an adverse outcome, such as dismissal. However, it is best practice to accord equal, fair procedures to all interviewees.

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

It is good practice to ensure that any documents of relevance to the witness are put to them. 'Interview by ambush' is contrary to fair procedures and open to challenge, particularly by employees.

Employees have no statutory right to legal representation at witness interviews. However, if the employee or witness is, or may become, the subject of the investigation, the employer should consider advising the employee or witness to have legal representation to minimise the risk of a later legal challenge to the investigation process. If the person requests permission to have legal representation, the company should assess each case separately. It is generally considered prudent to permit such representation, or not to proceed in the absence of such representation.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

A number of legislative provisions impose a positive obligation on persons (including businesses) to report wrongdoing in certain circumstances. Most significantly, section 19 of the Criminal Justice Act 2011 provides that a person is guilty of an offence if he or she fails to report information that he or she knows or believes might be of 'material assistance' in preventing the commission of, or securing the prosecution of another person in respect of, certain listed offences, including many corporate crimes. The disclosure must be made 'as soon as practicable', and a person who fails to disclose such information may be liable to a fine or imprisonment for up to five years, or both. However, the person considering making the report may need to make enquiries to be satisfied that a report is justified.

The Supreme Court case of Sweeney v. Ireland, Attorney General and Director of Public Prosecutions [2019] IESC 39 has important implications for section 19 of the Criminal Justice Act 2011.

In overturning the High Court decision, the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of section 9(1)(b) of the Offences Against the State (Amendment) Act 1998. This decision has implications for section 19 of the Criminal Justice Act 2011 (the 2011 Act), which provides that a person is guilty of an offence if he or she fails to report information that he or she knows or believes might be of material assistance in preventing the commission of, or securing the prosecution of, another person of certain listed offences, including many white-collar offences. The wording of section 19(1)(b) of the 2011 Act is identical to that of section 9(1)(b) of the 198 Act except that the former applies to a 'relevant offence' and the latter applies to a 'serious offence'. In finding that the provision was sufficiently certain, the Supreme Court held that the 1998 Act was clear in what it obliges witnesses to do – to disclose information pertaining to serious offences that they know will aid in the prosecution of such an offence. Although the Supreme Court noted that no comment has been made as to the constitutionality of similar provisions, such as section 19(1)(b) of the 2011 Act, it would appear to indicate that such reporting obligations would be likely to withstand a similar legal challenge.

Other mandatory reporting obligations include the duties of:

- persons with a 'pre-approved control function' to report breaches of financial services legislation;
- designated persons (auditors, financial institutions, solicitors) to report money laundering offences;
- auditors to report a belief that an indictable offence has been committed;
- auditors or persons preparing accounts to report theft and fraud offences; and
- all persons to report any offence committed against a child.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

A company might be advised to self-report, in Ireland or overseas, to mitigate the risk of prosecution or any potential sentence that may be imposed by a court. There are no express provisions for immunity or leniency in prosecution under Irish law, but self-reporting can be considered a mitigating factor in sentencing. The DPP does have discretion to grant immunity in certain circumstances. Some regulatory regimes, such as the CBI's administrative sanction procedure, also consider self-reporting as a mitigating factor affecting the level of sanctions. The list of sanctioning factors set out in the CBI's Administrative Sanctions Procedure (published in 2018) includes 'how quickly, effectively and completely the regulated entity brought the contravention to the attention of the CBI or any other relevant regulatory body'.

The exception is the Cartel Immunity Programme operated by the CCPC, which allows a member of a cartel to apply for immunity in return for co-operating with the CCPC. Only the first member of a cartel to come forward can avail of the programme and must meet strict eligibility criteria.

In terms of extraterritorial self-reporting, an Irish company may self-report to authorities in other jurisdictions that have immunity or leniency programmes if the conduct in question could also be investigated or prosecuted by those authorities. For example, the European Commission runs a cartel immunity programme and an Irish company may self-report to the Commission to avail of this.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

It is important that a company has considered its risks and, as far as possible, investigated the matter before making a report. A report can be made in writing, such as by letter to the appropriate authority, or by providing a written statement upon attending a Garda station. The form and content of the report will depend on the specific circumstances of the matter, including, for example, whether the company might be implicated, or whether there are other legal, commercial or reputational issues to be considered. Data deletion policies should be suspended and relevant materials retained in case they are subsequently required in the context of an investigation or legal or regulatory proceedings.

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

Dialogue may start with the authority once a notice has been received and analysed. For example, the company may wish to address concerns such as the scope of the request, the legal basis or the deadline for compliance. It is important that care is taken with such communications, as they can set the tone for engagement with the authority and may be relevant for any subsequent court challenge or dispute that may arise.

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

Ongoing investigations may be subject to challenge in the courts, for example through an application for judicial review. It is also possible to seek injunctions, typically on an interim basis, to protect legal rights while the underlying challenge is resolved.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

Each request should be treated separately as the legal basis for the request is likely to be different. A request that may appear to compel disclosure of documents may not in fact have legal effect if it is from outside the jurisdiction and the procedures for compelling cross-border information (such as the procedures under the Criminal Justice (Mutual Assistance) Act 2008, as amended (see question 57)) are not engaged. It is generally not advisable to release information, particularly personal data within the meaning of the DP Acts, in the absence of lawful compulsion. 'Package disclosures' are therefore usually unadvisable, as documents that one agency has a legal right to obtain may not be within the compulsory power of another agency. That said, where requests are made by different authorities, it is important to have a consistent approach with regard to how requests are treated and what arguments are made to authorities.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

The appropriate response will depend on the nature of the request and the relationship between the company that is subject to the request and the entities holding the documents across borders. If the company in receipt of the request has the power to compel production, such as from a branch or subsidiary, it may be required to do so. However, generally, the entity to which the request is addressed will be the only body with an obligation to respond.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

Irish law enforcement and regulatory bodies are known to share information informally with equivalent bodies in different jurisdictions.

In terms of formal co-operation mechanisms, the Criminal Justice (Mutual Assistance) Act 2008 gives effect to 12 international agreements that establish the existing legislative framework for the provision of mutual legal assistance. The Criminal Justice (Mutual Assistance) (Amendment) Act 2015 gives effect to a further six international instruments not provided for by the 2008 Act. This has enhanced the already significant level of co-operation between Ireland and other EU Member States. Co-operation with third countries (those outside the European Economic Area) is dependent on their ratification of relevant international agreements or the existence of a mutual assistance treaty agreed between them.

The transposition of the EU Fourth Money Laundering Directive into Irish law has also led to further enhanced international co-operation, as the Directive requires information to be shared between competent national authorities, including the creation of a central register of beneficial owners of entities.

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

There is no generally applicable statutory obligation that creates an obligation on the police to keep information received during an investigation confidential.

Irish law does recognise a broad 'right to privacy', however, which is protected by the Irish Constitution, the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights and the European Convention on Human Rights. Further, data protection is regulated in Ireland primarily by the DP Acts. Irish data protection laws reflect EU data protection laws and protect the personal data of individuals from disclosure in certain circumstances. The police are subject to the same obligation under the DP Acts as all 'data controllers', within the meaning of the DP Acts, when processing personal data. There are exceptions to the rules set out in the DP Acts, including where the processing is required to investigate or prevent an offence.

The police may disclose information to law officers and other law enforcement agencies during an investigation or on the basis of the prevention and detection of offences, under mutual assistance agreements with Interpol Europe and other agencies that have a statutory investigative and enforcement role.

Whistleblowers are protected from identification by the Protected Disclosures Act 2014. Accordingly, great care must be taken not to violate these protections when an investigation involving whistleblower information is under way. However, the identity of whistleblowers can be disclosed to prevent a crime or to aid in the prosecution of a criminal offence.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

In such circumstances, it would usually be prudent to advise the company not to provide the documents. However, the company should ensure that it is not violating any laws in its own jurisdiction by doing so. The company should inform the requesting authority of the basis for the decision to refuse the request for documents.

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

Data protection is regulated in Ireland primarily by the DP Acts. Irish data protection laws reflect EU data protection laws and protect the personal data of individuals from disclosure in certain circumstances. The transfer of data outside Ireland is restricted, but there is no outright 'block' preventing all transfers. The main implication of Irish data protection law is that companies may be reluctant to release materials in the absence of a legal obligation.

As discussed in question 23, Irish law also recognises a broad right to privacy, which can restrict the disclosure of data even when the disclosure would comply with the DP Acts.

Further, care should be taken when releasing documents that relate to any type of contractual relationship, as there may be confidentiality terms in the contract or engagement terms that could be violated by the disclosure. A party should always be mindful that if it releases information without being compelled to do so, it is not protected from claims that it has breached Irish data protection legislation or breach of confidence claims.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

As outlined in questions 59 and 60, there are risks attached to voluntary production of documents, and it is generally not advised unless there are compelling reasons to do so. In particular, as noted in question 58, a company may be in breach of the DP Acts if it releases materials that contain personal data in the absence of lawful compulsion, and may also be in breach of confidence if it releases confidential material without being compelled to do so. There may also be other contractual consequences for a company releasing certain materials voluntarily. There is no automatic confidentiality attached to materials disclosed to law enforcement, unless restrictions have been agreed to that effect. Accordingly, material provided to authorities voluntarily may be shared with other authorities or used for purposes other than the initial basis of the request. Materials obtained on the basis of a compulsory power are subject to greater protections. However, once material is in the possession of an authority, there is nothing to prevent a third party from seeking the material, such as through a non-party discovery order.

Prosecution and penalties

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

Irish criminal legislation typically provides for monetary fines or terms of imprisonment for offences. Given the nature of corporate entities, the most common form of sanction is a fine. However, while less common, Irish legislation also provides for specific remedies, such as compensation orders and adverse publicity orders under health and safety legislation.

Common sanctions in the context of business crime are restriction and disqualification orders. Under section 839 of the Companies Act 2014, if a person has been convicted of an indictable offence in relation to a company, or convicted of an offence involving fraud or dishonesty, that person may not be appointed to, or act as, an auditor, director or other officer, receiver, liquidator or examiner or be in any way, whether directly or indirectly, concerned or take part in the promotion, formation or management of any company.

As discussed further under question 63, companies convicted of certain offences may be excluded from participation in public tenders for a specific period.

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

The EU Public Sector Procurement Directive (2014/24/EU) was transposed into Irish law by the European Union (Award of Public Authority Contracts) Regulations 2016. Under these Regulations, companies must be excluded from public procurement for a specific period when they have been convicted of certain offences. The Regulations also provide for offences that carry discretionary debarment. These include offences under EU law, meaning that a company should take care when settling charges in another country, as doing so could, depending on the offence, trigger these exclusion rules.

The Regulations enable companies to recover eligibility to bid for public contracts by demonstrating evidence of 'self-cleaning', such as the payment of compensation to the victim, clarification of the facts and circumstances of the offence, co-operation with the investigating authority, and the implementation of appropriate measures to prevent further criminal offences or misconduct.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

Sentencing of corporate crimes is largely a function for the courts. There is no express provision under Irish law for immunity or leniency in prosecution. If a business is found guilty of an offence, a wide range of factors may be taken into account at the discretion of the court. Mitigating factors include whether the company ceased committing the criminal offence on detection or whether there were further infringements or complaints; whether remedial efforts to repair the damage caused were used by the company; the existence of a compliance programme; and whether the company itself reported the infringement before it was detected by the prosecuting authority. Additionally, in imposing any sentence, the court must comply with the principle of proportionality as set out in People (DPP) v. McCormack [2000] 4 IR 356.

Certain sanctions, such as those available to the CBI under the administrative sanction procedure or the CCPC in connection with cartels, can be expressed as a percentage of turnover. This allows the size of the entity to be considered when penalties are imposed.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

Non-prosecution agreements and deferred prosecution agreements are not available in Ireland. There has been some consideration of these types of arrangements at policy level; for example, the Law Reform Commission (LRC) has recommended in its Report on Regulatory Powers and Corporate Offences (published on 23 October 2018) that deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs) be introduced, based on the UK model, which are subject to court approval. In the United Kingdom, the court must be satisfied that (1) the terms of a DPA are fair and proportionate and (2) a DPA is in the interests of justice before it is approved. Although any recommendations of the LRC are not always followed or implemented, they are usually given serious consideration by the Irish government.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

Non-prosecution agreements and DPAs are not currently available in Ireland.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

It is possible to enter into a settlement with some regulatory authorities in prescribed circumstances. For example, the CBI commonly uses settlements to resolve investigations brought under the Administrative Sanctions Procedure under the Central Bank Act 1942 (as amended) (in respect of civil sanctions only). In addition, pursuant to the Cartel Immunity Programme, a settlement may be achieved in specific circumstances.

Generally, any company considering entering into a settlement with a regulatory or enforcement authority should balance the seriousness of the charge, the scope of a conviction and the strength of the case against it, against the terms of the settlement, such as the quantum of any fine and whether there is publicity associated with the settlement. Care should be taken with regard to a settlement under the Cartel Immunity Programme to ensure that the stringent eligibility criteria are met before engaging with the CCPC.

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

As DPAs and non-prosecution agreement are not currently available in Ireland, the use of external corporate compliance monitors is not an enforcement tool used by Irish law enforcement authorities. In its Report on Regulatory Powers and Corporate Offences, the LRC has indicated that the detailed procedures concerning DPAs are best left to be determined in a Code of Practice to be developed by the DPP, comparable to the DPP's Guidelines for Prosecutors and the DPP's Guidelines for the Cartel Immunity Programme.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

A defendant may be subject to simultaneous civil and criminal proceedings arising out of the same set of circumstances. There is no obligation on the courts to adjourn the civil proceedings pending the completion of the criminal proceedings. However, civil proceedings are commonly adjourned pending the outcome of the criminal case. As there are different burdens of proof in civil and criminal matters, the outcome of civil and criminal proceedings will not necessarily be the same. It is also possible, although rare, for individuals to initiate private criminal prosecutions by issuing a summons pursuant to the Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act 1851 in certain limited circumstances.

Authorities are not obliged to disclose their files to such persons unless the particular file is generally open to the public or a court order has been obtained.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

The Irish judiciary is extremely protective of the accused's right to a fair trial and will prohibit or stay a trial if necessary. This sometimes occurs in respect of high-profile cases when the extent of publicity affects the ability of the defendant to have a fair jury trial. An example of this is the trial of a high-profile former chairman of Anglo Irish Bank, which was adjourned in October 2015 and initially rescheduled for seven months later, owing to concerns of adverse publicity surrounding the trial.

Reports that undermine legal proceedings can amount to contempt of court. Further, any reporting that goes beyond a faithful account of the court proceedings could give rise to defamation claims.

Pursuant to the Data Protection Act 2018, new court rules have been introduced to allow access to documents on court files. Under these new rules, an accredited member of the press may access documents that are 'opened' in court (i.e., read out in court by a lawyer or by the judge) and those that are 'deemed to have been opened' at a hearing before the court (i.e., documents that the judge has read in chambers and does not require the parties to formally open in court).

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

In larger companies, corporate communications are generally managed by a team of marketing professionals, and it is common for companies to employ public relations companies when there is a risk of negative publicity.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

It is important that any public statements issued by a company do not potentially prejudice current criminal proceedings or investigations. Statements issued by a company in such circumstances should be brief, factual and approved by the company's legal advisers. Care should also be taken that no comments are made that potentially identify any persons, as there could be a risk of defamation proceedings if the statement incorrectly implies that the person has committed any wrongdoing.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

As discussed in question 35, Euronext Dublin may require an issuer to publish information within such time limits as it considers appropriate to protect investors or to ensure the smooth operations of the market.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

Following the publication in November 2017 by the Irish government of its Measures to Enhance Ireland's Corporate, Economic and Regulatory Framework, aimed at strengthening Ireland's response to corporate misconduct, there have been a number of key legislative changes including:

- the enactment of the Criminal Justice (Corruption Offences) Act 2018, which commenced on 30 July 2018 and effectively repealed and replaced the seven existing Prevention of Corruption Acts 1889 to 2010 into a single statute; and
- the publication in December 2018 of the General Scheme of the Companies (Corporate Enforcement Authority) Bill 2018. This Bill proposes that the ODCE will be re-established as an agency, in the form of a commission, which will be known as the Corporate Enforcement Authority.

As referenced in question 1, the Minister for Justice and Equality appointed Mr James Hamilton, former DPP, to chair a review of Ireland's anti-corruption and anti-fraud structures and procedures in criminal law enforcement in 2018. In March 2019, the review group issued a call for submissions on a number of issues under its terms of reference, which could result in further legislative changes being introduced. The deadline for submission was 19 April 2019 and the results have yet to be published online.

General context, key principles and hot topics

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

Based on publicly available information, the highest-profile corporate investigations in Italy focus on international corruption involving the most important Italian companies, infiltration of organised crime in the economic sector and investigations against corporate giants for tax evasion. Italian criminal counsels observe, in particular, the increased focus on regulatory topics, increasing the number of dawn raids with a focus on the internal audit departments of companies, the frequent use of precautionary measures and a growing involvement in cross-border investigations.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

While the Italian system has always recognised a civil and administrative liability for companies, only in 2001 did it provide for criminal liability in relation to companies.

This criminal liability is triggered if criminal offences included in a compulsory list have been committed by persons holding representative, administrative or (de facto) managerial positions in the company, or by persons working under their control, provided that these persons have committed the crimes at least 'also' in the interests, or for the benefit, of the company, and the company cannot demonstrate that it has taken adequate measures to prevent the commission of such crimes (in particular, for not having implemented an adequate organisation model or an internal control system).

Foreign companies can also be held criminally liable for crimes committed in Italy, irrespective of whether the laws of the companies' home country contain similar rules or not.

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

Several law enforcement authorities regulate corporations in Italy, including the Prosecution Service and independent administrative authorities.

While the Prosecution Service has exclusive jurisdiction on investigations in relation to criminal matters, the independent administrative authorities, which have investigative powers and the power to impose sanctions, only have jurisdiction in specific matters, provided for by law.

As there are several enforcement authorities, the policies and protocols in this regard can differ. However, it is important to highlight that authorities usually have specific protocols relating to co-operation and the exchange of information.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

While the law does not provide for a threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation carried out by some independent administrative authorities, the public prosecutor shall immediately enter in the dedicated register any criminal data he or she receives or acquires and then start a criminal investigation. The duty of the public prosecutor to bring criminal action is compulsory (and not discretionary).

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

Depending on the authority and type of notice, a company may challenge the lawfulness or scope of the notice or production order by way of an application to court.

As regards criminal proceedings, the lawfulness and the scope of a search warrant, and the production of documents or a seizure, may be challenged before the courts. However, subpoenas regarding summoning of witnesses are not challengeable themselves. Witnesses have a duty to testify in front of a judge.

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

Italian law does not provide for a general application of immunity or leniency in recognition of co-operation with investigative authorities.

As regards criminal proceedings, Italian law has provided several case examples of leniency for specific offences, such as criminal organisation and drug trafficking, and – more recently – immunity (for example, with regard to fiscal-related offences in the case of a voluntary collaboration procedure).

A new law (Law No. 3 of 9 January 2019, Measures to Combat Crimes Against the Public Administration, as well as on the Statute of Limitations for Crimes and the Transparency of Political Parties and Movements) has introduced a new cause of immunity concerning crimes against the public administration, aimed at exempting from punishment anyone voluntarily reporting the fact within a set amount of time and providing useful and concrete indications to ensure the proof of the crime and to identify the others responsible.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

The fight against national and international corruption has been a top priority for the Italian government and its law enforcement authorities (in particular, the National Anti-corruption Authority) for the past few years.

Tax evasion is also a key priority. As a result of the changing international situation, Italy developed a parallel domestic strategy aimed at combating tax elusion and tax evasion by means of the signing of bilateral agreements with well-known tax havens, the introduction of the crime of self-money laundering, and the possibility – for a limited amount of time – of voluntary disclosure.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

During the past 20 years, a broad framework of laws has been developed (often as a result of international regulations). In particular, Italy has recently implemented the General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR), which concerns the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data and the free movement of such data, and Directive (EU) 2016/1148 concerning measures for a high common level of security of network and information systems across Europe (known as the NIS Directive).

Criminal offences have been provided in the case of failure to comply with the security measures set out by the law and regulations issued by the Personal Data Protection Authority, unlawful data processing and any untrue or false statement sent to the Authority.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

Italian law provides for a wide range of offences to prevent cybercrime. For example, the law punishes the conduct of hacking, phishing, infection of information technology systems with malware, possession of hacking tools, identity theft and electronic theft.

Over the years, the law enforcement authorities (in particular, the Prosecution Service and the Personal Data Protection Authority) have given substantial attention to cybercrime, having acknowledged that the insufficient investment in cybersecurity in Italy risks seriously affecting the country's growth and development.

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

Italian criminal law provides that Italian courts have jurisdiction on all offences committed within the Italian territory (that is, when at least a part of the prohibited conduct takes place in Italy).

Italy does not have general extraterritorial jurisdiction, although there are specific cases in which it will exercise extraterritorial jurisdiction (e.g., bribery involving Italian public officials and market abuse on financial instruments admitted on an Italian regulated market, even if these offences are committed abroad).

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

The principal challenges in cross-border investigations derive from the need to identify which states have the relevant jurisdiction and then the full co-operation and coordination of actions between the state in charge of the investigations and the other states, or all the competent agencies and organisations involved (e.g., in Europe, Eurojust and Europol).

Co-operation is needed because of the existence of different laws and regulations in all the countries, mostly relating to privacy, professional privilege regimes and labour laws.

To facilitate coordination among (at least) the EU Member States regarding criminal matters, Directive 2014/41/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council regarding the European Investigation Order in criminal matters came into effect in May 2017. There are also bilateral and multilateral agreements between Italy and other non-Member States.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

Pursuant to the provisions of the conventions to which Italy is a party (given its status as a Member State of the European Union), the international principle of ne bis in idem can only be applied in the event of res judicata (final judgment). Therefore, there is no prohibition against two criminal proceedings on the same cause of action against the same person or corporation taking place at the same time in two different European countries. At the international level, there is the principle of lis alibi pendens, but no specific rules aimed at settling the issue of proceedings pending simultaneously.

At the EU level, Council Framework Decision 2009/948/JHA of 30 November 2009 (adopted by Legislative Decree No. 29 of 15 February 2016) provides for a mechanism of 'consultation' among the Member States with the aim of achieving a consensus on any 'agreed' solution so as to avoid parallel proceedings in different Member States.

There are no measures in Italy that are comparable to the US 'anti-piling on' policy.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

To date, there have been no global settlements involving Italy. However, Italian law does provide for a specific discipline regarding the execution of decisions of foreign states.

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

The Italian Criminal Code provides for judgments issued by foreign authorities to be recognised in relation to specific matters, such as reparation. When there are international agreements for recognition in force between the parties, the Italian Code of Criminal Procedure provides for enforcement in Italy according to Italian law. Moreover, a 2010 law provides for a new type of mutual recognition of foreign criminal judgements, when they order a minimum of three years of detention.

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

As an EU Member State, Italy follows its restrictive measures, including the Sanctions Regulation. Further, the EU applies restrictive measures for the purposes of pursuing the specific Common Foreign and Security Policy (CFSP) objectives. These measures are thus binding in Italy, and a breach can result in fines and imprisonment. Specifically, an Italian law issued in 2018 aims to organise and simplify the authorisation procedures for the export of dual-use items and technologies.

The Ministry of Economic Development is the government entity responsible for administrative penalties.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

The Italian authorities do not show a strong interest in the execution of sanctions.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

At the European level, Member States co-operate with each other, for example as regards authorisation for European operators who intend to work in Member States affected by trade embargoes.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

Italy has implemented the EU Blocking Regulation, listing all the administrative penalties applicable for breaches of the EU provisions. In particular, a fine of up to €92,962 may be imposed on any operator who is in breach of the provisions of the law, and a fine of up to €46,481.17 may be imposed on any operator who fails to comply with the duty of notification pursuant to the law.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

As far as we are aware, the EU Blocking Regulation has not been subject to any binding judicial interpretation. Moreover, with the exception of the European Commission's non-binding Guidance Note – Questions and Answers: adoption of update of the Blocking Statute, no further official guidance has been adopted at a local level by Italian authorities.

Furthermore, no cases have yet been brought before the national courts.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

Allegations of misconduct could come to light in many ways, but they arise most often through whistleblowers, internal audits and media reports. Following the recent adoption of legislation on whistleblowing, which provides for different measures to protect employees who report an offence within their organisation in both the private and public sectors, it is expected that whistleblowing may become even more common.

Information gathering

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

The main Italian legislation for the protection of personal data is the Privacy Code, recently amended to adapt it to the changes introduced by the GDPR. Moreover, there are several sector-specific pieces of legislation that could affect a data protection regime, such as the Statute of Workers, Consumer Code and Telemarketing Law, and legislation on whistleblowing.

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

The Data Protection Code provides for both administrative fines and criminal penalties.

The GDPR introduced an antitrust-type sanction regime with fines of up to 4 per cent of annual global turnover or €20 million, whichever is the greater. A limited number of breaches fall into a lower tier and so are subject to fines of up to 2 per cent of annual global turnover or €10 million, whichever is the greater. Regulators will have a range of other powers and sanctions at their disposal.

One year after the GDPR came into effect, the Personal Data Protection Authority published some key figures concerning its application in Italy. Accordingly, since May 2018: (1) 946 data breaches have been notified, (2) 7,219 complaints have been notified, and (3) 48,591 companies have appointed a data protection officer. The first GDPR fine in Italy was issued in April 2019.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

To be able to conduct effective internal investigations, it is certainly necessary to be aware of the potential conflicts between data privacy concerns and the need for gathering information that implies the processing of employees' personal data. Personal data shall be processed lawfully, fairly and in a transparent manner, and collected for specified, explicit and legitimate purposes.

In addition, in compliance with the principle of data minimisation, it shall be ensured that employees' personal data is adequate, relevant and limited to what is necessary in relation to the purposes for which it is processed.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

According to local employment law and the Personal Data Protection Authority, a company is prohibited from mass control and unlimited storage of employees' company emails.

Companies should adopt specific internal guidelines, for approval by trade unions and publicised internally, to enable the employer to carry out controls on employees' internet files and emails, with specific reference to making employees aware of the fact that the employer may execute controls on such data during internal investigations.

Dawn raids and search warrants

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

If there are reasonable grounds to believe that the corpus delicti (the item on which, or through which, the offence has been committed or the profit made from the crime), or material items related to the crime, are located on a company's premises, a search of those premises could be ordered by the public prosecutor.

At the beginning of the search, the accused and the person who has current access to the premises shall be given a copy of the decree ordering the search, with the notice informing them of their right to be assisted by a trusted person.

In the case of seizure ordered by the judicial authority, the person from whom the objects have been seized and the person who would be entitled to their restitution may submit a request for the re-examination of the seizure decree. The request does not suspend the enforcement of the decision.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

The law provides for a duty to hand documents and documentary evidence to the requesting judicial authority, except if the person who possesses them by virtue of function, job, service or profession declares in writing that they are covered by either public service or professional secret. The judicial authority shall proceed with the necessary ascertainment if it has reasons to doubt the legitimacy of the declaration and if it cannot proceed without gathering the documents. If the declaration is groundless, the judicial authority shall order the seizure, which can be challenged with a request for the re-examination of the seizure decree.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

A witness is obliged to appear before the court, follow the judicial indications regarding the procedural needs and answer truthfully the questions addressed to him or her.

If a witness fails to appear, the court may order his or her compulsory appearance and that he or she pays a fine and the costs arising from the failure to appear.

A witness is not obliged to testify on facts that could lead to self-incrimination. Moreover, the law provides for a right of abstention for the next of kin of the accused and for persons who invoke either public service or professional secret.

Whistleblowing and employee rights

28 Describe the whistleblowing framework in your country. What financial incentive schemes exist for whistleblowers? What legal protections are in place for whistleblowers?

A whistleblowing law, generally applicable to the private sector in Italy, came into force in December 2017. The protection scheme for whistleblowers provided by the law is applicable only when the company has adopted an organisational model for crime prevention. In all cases, the whistleblower's identity is and must be kept strictly confidential.

There are no incentives provided for in relation to reporting individuals.

However, the whistleblower is protected from any retaliatory or discriminatory dismissal as a consequence of his or her reporting, and protection from any demotion or any other (direct or indirect) discriminatory or retaliatory measure as a consequence of the reporting.

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

With the awareness that the employment relationship is imbalanced in favour of the employer, the Italian legislator sought to regulate the scope and the limits of companies' powers, to protect employees from any kind of abuse. In relation to internal investigations, interviews with employees should be conducted carefully to avoid raising disciplinary challenges. Disciplinary proceedings against employees are specifically regulated by the law, requiring the observance of certain formalities, such as a written notice in which the alleged wrongdoings are properly detailed. Challenging a disciplinary violation in relation to interviews may render the subsequent disciplinary proceedings invalid.

There is no distinction for these purposes between officers and directors.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

There are two ways in which an employer can terminate an employment contract: dismissal without notice for just cause (e.g., where there is a serious breach of the employment contract, such as gross misconduct) or ordinary dismissal with notice based on either a subjective reason or an objective reason. In either case, a special disciplinary procedure must be followed. Under this procedure, the employer must promptly send the employee a letter describing the facts that would constitute a breach of the contract, wait for the employee's reply, which must be received within five days, and finally send the employee a letter of dismissal, explaining why the employer cannot accept the employee's justifications.

Suspension, even in the case of misconduct, is not mandatory and does not deprive the employee of salary unless this is expressly provided for by law or by the contract.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

There is no obligation for employees to take part in an internal investigation. However, from a disciplinary standpoint relating to a general duty of co-operation with the employer or specific provisions in a company's policies, a refusal to participate may be relevant. Furthermore, if an employee refuses to participate in such an investigation, the employer may carry out the disciplinary process without the employee's engagement, having first given written notice of this to the employee.

Commencing an internal investigation

32 Is it common practice in your country to prepare a document setting out terms of reference or investigatory scope before commencing an internal investigation? What issues would it cover?

When an external counsel, appointed for this specific purpose, carries out an investigation, it is important to prepare an investigation plan from the start of the activity. The plan sets out the scope, approach, the issues to be investigated, the investigation team and reporting lines, how legal privilege will be maintained and timing. Measures regarding securing data and necessary steps relating to communication and disclosure might also be outlined in the plan.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

There are generally no formal legal obligations on a company to conduct an internal investigation. However, conduct rules issued by regulators may mean an internal investigation is required under those rules, or strongly recommended.

When an issue comes to light, it is strongly recommended to take all necessary steps to stop the offending behaviour, if it is still ongoing, to protect and preserve all material that would be relevant and to adopt preventive measures to ensure that the offending behaviour cannot occur again.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

This decision depends on the individual circumstances of the case and the nature of the request.

If authorities have issued a binding request, companies should co-operate, in general terms, unless there are indications that the request is not effective or if the privilege against self-incrimination may apply.

In the case of a non-binding request, it has to be decided based on the individual case whether co-operation appears to be advisable. For example, if a specific object is sought by search, the judicial authority may require its delivery. If such objects are handed in, no search shall be performed by the public prosecutor, unless it is believed that the search may be useful for the investigation.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

There is generally no requirement for privately held corporations – with no reporting obligations under the securities laws – to publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from law enforcement.

However, listed issuers shall publicly disclose information of a precise nature, which has not been made public, relating to one or more issuers and which, if it were made public, would be likely to have a significant effect on the prices of those financial instruments. Therefore, these companies must consider whether the disclosure of an internal investigation or contact from law enforcement would be considered material.

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

There is currently no specific discipline that regulates internal investigations, and it is recommended that companies heed a number of legal issues, such as data protection and employment law-related concerns, as well as the protection of whistleblowers and management of their reports.

Internal investigations could be approached by companies either as a reaction to an investigation started by the Prosecution Service to gather elements useful for the defence as part of criminal proceedings, and to co-operate with the enforcement authorities to discover misconduct and the wrongdoer. Moreover, internal investigations are encouraged to identify and, when possible, prevent the commission of improper behaviour that can trigger liabilities for corporations.

Attorney–client privilege

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

Considering that communications between a company and its in-house lawyers do not attract legal privilege, as recently confirmed by Italian case law, it is advisable that internal investigations are carried out by an external defence counsel, not bound to the client by any employment relationship and appointed for the purpose.

To protect the documentation relating to an internal investigation, it is recommended that it be held at the premises of the lawyer (which cannot be inspected or searched, unless the lawyer is under investigation), labelling any related communications as 'Privileged and Confidential' and restricting the circulation of privileged documents both outside and within the company.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

Professional secrecy is usually invoked by the attorney, but in the primary interest of his or her client, who could be either a corporation or a person.

In the case of companies, privilege applies subject to two fundamental conditions:

- the information was exchanged for the purpose of legal assistance; and
- the information was exchanged with an independent, external lawyer who is not bound to the client by any employment relationship and is member of the bar.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

While the attorney–client privilege applies in relation to external counsel, the professional activity of an in-house counsel is neither recognised nor regulated by any legal provision or statute. In-house counsel cannot be admitted to the bar (with some limited exceptions) and are thus deprived of all rights and privileges attaching to independent lawyers who are members of the Italian Bar, including the protection afforded by professional secrecy.

However, some judgments recognise the possibility of invoking the attorney–client privilege when in-house counsel is defending the company in proceedings.

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

The law provides for the attorney–client privilege to avoid intrusions that could hinder the defence; therefore, this privilege should certainly extend to foreign lawyers, provided that they are admitted to their national bar and their title is recognised by the Italian system. However, to date, there is no precedent from an Italian court to confirm this reasoning with specific reference to lawyers. There are precedents that have extended the benefit of professional secrecy to foreign private investigators, provided that their title is recognised in the country where the proceedings are pending.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

There is also no general concept of waiving privilege under Italian law.

Public prosecutors consistently state that they cannot expect waiver of the attorney–client privilege and that waiver could not be considered a prerequisite to obtain credit for co-operation. Naturally, submitting privileged documents to authorities is in general regarded as a co-operative step that can result in a reduction of a fine by contributing to a positive overall assessment.

It is mandatory to discuss any initiative with the client. As a matter of fact, divulging a professional secret without justification (or using it for the profit of oneself or a third party), and thereby procuring damage, is an offence.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

As previously said, the Italian legal system does not provide for waiver of privilege (neither general nor limited). However, with reference to criminal proceedings, the jurisprudence has stated that the privilege between a client and an attorney may suffer limitation and restrictions if the lawyer is suspected or accused in criminal proceedings. Even if there is not an actual waiver, in these cases all the information becomes available to third parties, by means of the gathering of that information in the trial dossier.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

Waiving privilege in another country has no direct legal effect on privilege claims in Italy. However, waiving privilege in one country by submitting documents to third parties can factually result in a loss of privilege, considering that documents disclosed to non-protected persons may lose privilege.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

The concept of common interest privilege does not exist in Italy. However, as has already been stated, according to the law, all documents concerning the defence's strategy and all the correspondence between the defending counsel duly appointed and the indicted or investigated person are privileged and cannot be gathered in the trial dossier.

Therefore, in practical terms, the documents and the correspondence in the possession of the attorney that also involves other lawyers and other accused, and which are related to the proceedings and the defence strategy of the client, have to be considered as privileged to protect the client's rights of defence.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

The privilege could be invoked by the attorney even if the defence activity is carried out with the assistance of third parties. Among others, it is possible to include third parties who are trainee lawyers, secretaries, authorised private detectives and technical consultants.

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

Italian law allows witnesses to be interviewed during an internal investigation. Commonly, this kind of activity is carried out by an external counsel appointed for the specific purpose.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

As stated in question 46, in most cases, it is preferable for the interviewer to be a lawyer, who acts in accordance with all the formalities provided for by the defence investigations provisions of the Italian Code of Criminal Procedure. This ensures that all the findings remain exclusively available to the defence counsel and the client.

However, it should be noted that the privilege does not apply with regard to a company's in-house counsel.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

Before the interview starts, the lawyer has to give the interviewee all the warnings provided for by the Italian Code of Criminal Procedure (such as their right to silence or not to give any statement). In addition, there are some rules of deontology that have to be observed (such as informing the witnesses who decide not to give any statements that they could be summoned by the public prosecutor, or before the court during the proceedings, where they also will have to answer the lawyer's questions).

The aforementioned rules apply to employees as well as third parties.

The Italian Workers' Statute provides for specific rules to avoid any kind of abuse from the employer: for example, no permission to investigate an employee's personal views on politics, religion, memberships of trade unions and personal life. Moreover, during an interview, it is necessary to be careful to avoid any disciplinary violation (e.g., a written notice reporting the alleged wrongdoing in detail is required).

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

The Italian Code of Criminal Procedure requires certain formalities to be followed. For example, in the first place, the lawyers give the witnesses a warning (as cited in question 48), then they ask the questions and listen to the answers, all of which is included in a report

(in full of in summary). Finally, the report has to be signed by all the persons attending the interview.

Italian law does not provide for the compulsory presence of the lawyer of the witness during the interview, except when the interviewee is a suspected or accused person in the same proceedings, in joint proceedings or for a joined offence. If that is the case, in order to interview, obtain a statement or gather information, the witness must be accompanied by a lawyer.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

Generally, according to Italian law, there is no obligation for a private entity to report crimes to the competent authorities (only public officials have the duty to report what they become aware of within their professional activities). Moreover, a lawyer is not under any obligation to disclose incriminating evidence against a client.

However, there are specific laws that provide for this kind of duty in relation of certain crimes and specific individuals (e.g, the law on anti-money laundering and illicit funding provides for the duty on professionals and intermediaries to report suspected activities).

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

The decision to disclose the findings of an investigation could be encouraged by the positive effect that co-operation with the authorities could have on a judge when quantifying the penalty. Moreover, it can contribute to avoiding the application or determining the reduction of pretrial disqualifying sanctions pursuant to criminal corporate liability law.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

The steps to be taken depend on the specific case at issue and the authority involved, but in any case, there is no obligation to self-report. Moreover, Italian law does not provide for benefits deriving from the disclosure of information gathered through internal investigations. Therefore, from a criminal point of view, it is important to consider in each case whether self-reporting could help in the settlement with the public prosecutor and avoid the application of a disqualifying measure.

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

The response will depend on the type of notice received by a company and which authority has sent it. For example, in the case of a request for document production from the public prosecutor, the company will respond by means of its external legal counsel, which can also arrange an appointment with the authority, through its secretary, to present the documentation collected. Meetings with the public prosecutor can be scheduled, but usually they are accompanied by the filing of a pleading.

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

It depends on the kind of investigation.

Generally, a criminal investigation itself cannot be challenged before the courts, but individual measures taken as part of the process (e.g., seizure of documents) can, when unlawful.

The Italian Code of Criminal Procedure provides for the possibility to challenge the request by the public prosecutor to continue with the investigations after the first six-month term has expired.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

In general, it is a requirement to answer all requests received from the authorities. However, in criminal matters, there are now several instruments to strive for mutual co-operation and joint action teams, to prevent unnecessary duplication of effort, from both the private and the public sides.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

If the material is under the control of a company (even by means of a parent company, therefore with a right to take possession, inspect or take copies of a subsidiary's documents), it is required to search and produce all the requested material, even if located in another country.

Nevertheless, it could be that the data protection legislation in the other country does not permit the removal or transfer of the data from that jurisdiction: the requesting authority will therefore seek help from mutual legal assistance with the foreign state.

A parent company could also raise a self-incrimination issue that impedes the delivery of data or documents.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

See question 11.

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

During criminal proceedings, the investigations are protected by secrecy, so the public prosecutor and enforcement authorities will not have to disclose information to third parties. However, there are time when investigations are conducted within a mutual assistance regime, in which authorities co-operate and exchange all the data acquired in the respective country.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

The advice given will depend on the specific case: in fact, a comparison should be made between the benefits of co-operating with the authority in the company's country and the legal risk of violating a rule in the other country. To achieve this, the company should thoroughly analyse the relevant rules, and request the legal opinion of a lawyer in that country. In cases of gross and evident violation, the best option would be to submit the opinion received to the public prosecutor and encourage a mutual assistance request directly from one authority to the other.

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

A request by an authority is usually a sufficient reason for the disclosure of data, according to the Privacy Code, adopted in Italy in 2003, recently modified to be consistent with the GDPR.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

Voluntary production can be regarded in a positive light by the judge, as can effective co-operation with the authorities. However, it can generally not be challenged before the courts. In criminal law, even if the investigative dossier is supposed to be protected by secrecy, the company should be conscious that, once a document has been handed to the public prosecutor, it is possible that it will be given to third parties.

Prosecution and penalties

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

Individuals could face financial penalties and detention, or ancillary penalties (such as disqualification).

In respect of vicarious criminal liability, Italian law provides for four types of penalties: financial penalties, disqualifying measures, seizure and publication of the judgment.

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

One example of when settlement in another country could be impeded is when there is a disqualification – imposed in Italy – from all activities (which, therefore, includes financial transactions).

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

Italian criminal law provides for specific criteria to fix a penalty.

With regard to individuals, the judge takes into account the seriousness of the crime deriving from several aspects (such as the nature of the offence, the modality of the action, the seriousness of the consequent damage, the intensity of the fraud, existing precedents, the subsequent conduct of the accused, and so on).

Corporations are punished with financial penalties based on a quota system, considering various factors: the seriousness of the deed, the degree of liability of the entity and the activity carried out by the entity to eliminate or diminish the consequences of the unlawful act and to prevent the commission of further unlawful acts. The judge also considers the economic and financial conditions of the entity. The amount of the financial penalty, therefore, is determined by multiplying the first factor (number of quotas) by the second (quota amount). Moreover, if the product or the profit are significant, the sanction could be increased by 10 times the amount of the product or the profit.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

Italian case law states that the law on probation is applicable only to individuals, and non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements are not provided by Italian law.

It is possible for a corporation to settle a case in advance by means of a special proceeding known as an application of punishment upon request. In particular, the company may agree with the public prosecutor to request the court to impose a penalty (reduced by a maximum of a third), when:

- the employee, whose conduct triggers the corporate liability, settled the case by means of an application of punishment; or
- the only sanction applicable to the corporation is a financial one.

However, the agreement between the company and the public prosecution will be rejected by the judge if he or she feels a permanent disqualifying sanction is warranted.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

Non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements are not provided by Italian law.

However, proceedings for vicarious liability against a corporate entity are automatically merged with criminal proceedings for an underlying crime allegedly committed by an individual. Therefore, the judicial authority will be aware of the choice of the company in the case of, for example, an application of punishment upon request.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

Prior to reaching a settlement with a law enforcement authority, a company should assess the strength of the prosecution and defence cases.

Adverse effects, such as damage to reputation, should be considered. According to Italian law, a settlement cannot be considered a confession of liability by the entity. However, an application of punishment shall be considered equal to a judgment of conviction, unless otherwise provided by the law.

International implications should also be considered, such as the effect the settlement could have in regard to ongoing investigations in other jurisdictions (e.g., whether the authority that has settled will disclose information and assist foreign authorities).

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

External corporate compliance monitors are not used as an enforcement tool. However, in specific cases, the law provides for the appointment of a special commissioner (e.g., when a disqualifying measure should be applied, which results in the interruption of all corporate activities).

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

Parallel civil actions are allowed. A civil action brought before the civil court may be transferred to criminal proceedings if, in the civil court, a judgment on merits has not been issued. If the action is brought against the accused in a civil court after joining the criminal proceedings as a civil party, or after a judgment of first instance is issued, civil proceedings shall be suspended until the delivery of a final criminal judgment. The plaintiff may have access to the public prosecutor's dossier.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

According to the Italian Code of Criminal Procedure, investigative acts carried out by a public prosecutor and the police are protected by secrecy, until the accused is entitled to have knowledge of them and, in any case, not beyond the closing of preliminary investigations.

Therefore, publication in the press, or by any other means of communication, of the aforementioned documents or their content, even if partially, is not allowed.

The publication, in whole or in part, of documents that are no longer protected by secrecy is not allowed until preliminary investigations are concluded or the preliminary hearing is terminated. However, if the proceedings reach the trial stage, publication, in whole or in part, of the documents of the investigative dossier is not allowed prior to the delivery of the appeal judgment.

Nevertheless, publication of the content of documents that are no longer protected by secrecy is allowed.

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

Corporate communication is a delicate aspect of management, which should always be carefully evaluated by experts and approved by the legal office and external legal consultants. In fact, an incorrect press release by a company could have a detrimental effect on customers, and on the strategy eventually chosen during a trial.

The biggest companies in Italy rely on both internal and external professionals for public relations.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

It is a general rule that the court should not be influenced by press reporting surrounding a trial. Therefore, during criminal proceedings, a company should avoid public communications and, when unavoidable, should make only brief and factual statements that have been approved by their external legal consultants.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

Privately owned corporations with no reporting obligations under the securities laws are generally not required to publicly disclose the existence of a settlement.

However, listed issuers shall publicly disclose information of a precise nature, which has not been made public, relating to one or more issuers and which, if it were made public, would be likely to have a significant effect on the prices of those financial instruments. Therefore, these companies must consider whether the disclosure of a settlement would be considered material.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

To address corporate misconduct, there is an ongoing debate in Italy in relation to the possibility of making the implementation of 'management and organisational control protocols' mandatory, when requested to exclude corporate vicarious liability.

Moreover, with the adoption of Directive (EU) 2017/1371 on the fight against fraud to the European Union's financial interests (known as the PIF Directive), corporate vicarious liability will be extended to apply to some tax offences.

General context, key principles and hot topics

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

Odebrecht is a wide-reaching corruption scandal involving payments in bribes within Brazil, Venezuela, the Dominican Republic, Panama, Angola, Argentina, Ecuador, Peru, Guatemala, Colombia, Mexico, Mozambique and, presumptively, El Salvador and Portugal, totalling US$800 million.

In relation to Mexico, Odebrecht has acknowledged paying US$10.5 million in bribes to officials of the state-owned oil company, Pemex. Mexico has now banned federal institutions and state governments from doing business with Odebrecht SA, a Brazilian construction firm, for the next two years and fined the company close to US$60 million. In addition, the Ministry of Public Function dismissed public official Marco Antonio Sierra Martínez from his position at Pemex, disqualified him from holding any public office for 10 years and fined him US$6.2 million for authorising excess payments for the construction of a Pemex refinery in Tula, Hidalgo.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

Corporations can be held liable under administrative, criminal and civil laws.

- Administrative liability of corporations is provided under the General Law of Administrative Responsibilities (GLAR).
- Criminal liability of corporations is provided under the National Code for Criminal Proceedings, the Federal Criminal Code and local criminal codes (depending on the applicable jurisdiction).

1 Diego Sierra is a partner at Von Wobeser y Sierra, SC

- Civil liability of corporations is provided under the Federal Civil Code and local civil codes (depending on the applicable jurisdiction).

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

In terms of administrative liability concerning potentially corrupt conduct, two principal authorities are in charge of imposing administrative liability on corporations: the Ministry of Public Function (which is in charge of investigating improper conducts) and the Federal Court of Administrative Justice (which is in charge of imposing sanctions on corporations). As regards corporate criminal liability, two authorities are involved in imposing liability on corporations, namely prosecutors and courts. Jurisdiction is shared between federal and state authorities for both administrative and criminal liability.

There are no general rules or policies relating to the prosecution of corporations. The guidelines for determining principles of corporate prosecution, the duties of the prosecutors and the factors to be considered for the sanctions imposed would depend entirely on the law enforcement authority applicable to the case.

Jurisdiction between authorities is allocated in federal and state matters, depending on (1) where the conduct took place, (2) the nature of the conduct being investigated, (3) whether there are federal interests involved, and (4) for criminal matters, whether the crime in question is expressly included within the purview of federal jurisdiction as provided under the Organisational Law of the Federal Judicial Power.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

Mexican authorities have ample discretion to initiate investigations. However, in practice, authorities will typically start an investigation having been made privy to information suggesting that there are violations to the legal provisions to which the company is subject.

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

It would depend on the law enforcement authority involved, and on the remedies provided under the applicable laws. Examples of legal remedies against the lawfulness of a notice are ancillary claims, appeals and amparo constitutional review actions.

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

Yes. Examples of this are as follows:

- An immunity programme, as provided under Article 103 of the Federal Economic Competence Law: any competitor involved in absolute monopolistic practices may file a request with the Federal Economic Competition Commission for an administrative fine reduction, which can be 20 per cent, 30 per cent, 50 per cent or even 100 per cent, depending on the timing of the request as compared with other competitors.

- Opportunity criteria, as provided under Article 256 of the Criminal Proceedings National Code: once an investigation begins, the offender may request that the prosecution authorities refrain from instigating a criminal prosecution (1) when the crime does not have a jail penalty, or has an alternative penalty, or when the jail penalty does not exceed five years, as long as the crime was not committed with violence, (2) in the case of white-collar crimes committed without violence, (3) when the penalty that could be imposed would lack relevance considering another judgment that has already been imposed or could be imposed, and (4) when the accused party provides essential and effective information for the prosecution of a more severe crime than the one attributed to the accused party.
- Criminal liability reduction, as provided under Article 11 of the Federal Criminal Code: a reduction of up to 25 per cent may be granted if a corporation proves that, before the commission of the acts considered as offences under Article 422 of the Criminal Proceedings National Code, it had a compliance department in charge of preventing potential criminal conduct and that it had sought to mitigate the damage caused by the offences.
- Self-reporting, as provided under Articles 88 and 89 of the General Law of Administrative Responsibilities: if a party commits an offence provided therein and self-reports it, the company could request a sanction reduction benefit of between 50 and 70 per cent of the corresponding sanctions provided for the offences committed.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

The most relevant priorities of the Mexican law enforcement agencies are antitrust, intellectual property, money laundering, fraud, trafficking of minors, environmental matters, corruption and influence peddling.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

There is no specific statute in Mexico regulating cybersecurity. Nevertheless, in June 2018, the Mexican government issued the Official Standards NMX-I-27032-NYCE-2018, NMX-I-27033-1-NYCE-2018 and NMX-I-27032-2-NYCE-2018, providing preventive guidelines to improve cybersecurity controls in Mexico, specifically concerning information security, social media security, internet security and the protection of critical information.

In addition, in late 2017, the Mexican government issued a cybersecurity national strategy to develop a legal regime for cybersecurity, specifically relating to Mexico's economy, national security and public institutions. The aim of the cybersecurity national strategy was to guide all actions incurred by Mexican authorities to prevent, identify, neutralise and mitigate any risks relating to the information contained in data-processing systems.

Since there is no specific statute in Mexico regulating cybersecurity, local law enforcement has been focused mainly on cybercrime.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

Cybercrime in Mexico is regulated under Articles 211 bis 1 et seq. of the Federal Criminal Code. The person who 'illegally and without authorization modifies, destroys or causes a loss of information contained in private systems or data-processing equipment protected by any security mechanism' has committed a cybercrime. Such conduct may be sanctioned with a prison sentence of between three months and eight years, depending on whether the offender took the information from a private party's equipment, government equipment or a financial institution's equipment, and whether the offender had the authorisation to access the protected data.

Furthermore, as to the approach of law enforcement authorities, the Mexican Federal Police has a special cybercrime unit (cybercrime police) that is responsible for preventing and investigating cybercrimes, and focuses mainly on (1) cyberattacks, (2) the vulnerability of data-processing equipment, (3) data fraud and theft derived from e-commerce, electronic banking services, phishing, pharming, malware and spam, and (4) failure of critical infrastructure. The cybercrime police co-operate directly with private corporations and with authorities from all levels of government, including international agencies such as the Forum of Incident Response and Security Teams, and the Organization of American States.

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

Criminal law has extraterritorial effects for the purposes of prosecuting foreign bribery in international business transactions. (Mexico will exercise extraterritorial jurisdiction in this context for bribery against both an individual and a corporation.) Article 222 bis of the Federal Criminal Code sanctions bribery of a foreign official to obtain an improper advantage.

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

The principal challenges that arise in cross-border investigations are:

- identifying all laws and policies that may be relevant;
- maintaining confidentiality of what comes to light during interviews with employees. This is often an issue as there is a weak confidentiality culture in Mexico;
- interviewing employees who, in some cases, may have the right to refuse to co-operate and report incriminatory information about themselves and their co-workers;
- implementing controls and efficient processes that take into consideration the cultural differences between countries;
- ensuring effective communication throughout the course of the investigation;
- complying with data privacy and confidentiality laws;
- determining which findings are relevant and which should be reported; and
- determining appropriate remedial actions.

These challenges are compounded when other countries involved have different laws that are applicable to the investigation. Further, remedial action is often determined by both the domestic and the foreign regulators, who have to decide such matters as whether to sanction a company for the violation of a law or to adjust the severity of a criminal penalty that might be assessed against the culprits.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

Double jeopardy, or non bis in idem defence, is provided under Article 23 of the Mexican Constitution and is understood to mean that no person may be sanctioned twice for the same crime. Hence, if a corporation has faced criminal prosecution and conviction in a country other than Mexico for a certain crime and, thereafter, a Mexican prosecuting authority brings a case against that corporation for the same crime, the corporation could raise this defence. The Mexican Constitution does not limit the defence to crimes relating to the same core set of facts. Moreover, there have been no cases so far that test whether the double jeopardy defence will hold when a corporation has faced prosecution for both administrative and corporate criminal liability relating to the same criminal conduct. However, there have been several cases in the past two years relating to the prosecution of individuals in which the double jeopardy defence is implicated. However, they offer contradictory positions, at times allowing for the imposition of sanctions from both administrative agencies and criminal prosecutors and, at other times, prohibiting parallel sanctions from administrative and criminal authorities. These are non-binding precedent.

There is no 'anti-piling on' policy or analogous provision in Mexico.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

Global settlements are not common. However, Mexico has signed international treaties and co-operation agreements with certain countries providing for mutual assistance in criminal, civil and tax matters that may lead to a similar kind of settlement.

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

This a relatively new area of law. Mexican authorities may exercise their right to prosecute conduct that is sanctioned under Mexican statute, regardless of whether a foreign authority is investigating the same conduct. Moreover, in the event that Mexico has a multilateral co-operation agreement with the country in which a parallel investigation has already started, Mexican authorities appear to be open to sharing evidence.

One of the most notable examples in recent times is Odebrecht, in which Mexican prosecuting authorities have been very vocal in stating that they will not make use of Brazilian agreements to accept evidence collected by Brazilian prosecutors as part of the Operation Car

Wash investigation. Mexican criminal enforcement authorities have stated that they are of the opinion that such crimes should be prosecuted under Mexican law to the full extent available. However, they have not made public any details of their investigations. Conversely, on the administrative front, Odebrecht was sanctioned in early September 2018 with a fine of a little over 1 billion pesos (which roughly equates to US$50 million).

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

There is no specific or unified sanctions programme. Instead, Mexico has a fragmented sanctions programme, which is enforced by different law enforcement authorities depending on the type of conduct.

Sanction enforcement in Mexico can be perceived mainly in administrative and criminal instances. In terms of enforcing sanctions for administrative offences:

- the Secretary of Public Function is in charge of investigating the types of corruption regulated under the GLAR; and
- the Federal Court of Administrative Justice is the authority in charge of imposing the corresponding sanctions.

As regards criminal offences, the two main authorities that participate in enforcing sanctions are prosecutors and criminal courts.

The most frequently applied sanctions in Mexico are the following:

- economic fine;
- order to repair damage and lost profits caused to third parties;
- imprisonment;
- debarment from participating in public procurement;
- dismissal of officials, or suspension of employment, commission or position;
- suspension of business activities; and
- dissolution of corporations.

The severity of the sanctions depends strictly on the type of conduct and on the specific circumstances of the case.

A recent enforcement example is the September 2018 sanction imposed by the Ministry of Public Function of almost US$50 million on Odebrecht. The Ministry also debarred Odebrecht and several of its subsidiaries from participating in public procurement processes because of its wide-reaching corruption scandal involving payments in bribes to officials of the state-owned oil company, Pemex.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

In recent months, enforcement on corruption allegations has increased significantly. We can trace this uptick to President Andrés Manuel López Obrador taking office in December 2018 and to the consolidation of certain key enforcement institutions. The Attorney General's Office (FGR) became independent from the Executive in December 2018. Moreover, the first Anti-corruption Special Prosecutor was appointed in March 2019. López Obrador ran his entire campaign on the promise of eradicating corruption and impunity. It appears his cabinet is taking this seriously.

One example of enforcement recently was the blocking by the Financial Intelligence Unit (which is supported by the Mexican Treasury) of thousands of accounts of people allegedly involved in stealing oil directly from Pemex's pipelines. Further, in the last week of May 2019, the FGR obtained a court order to imprison former Pemex chief executive officer Emilio Lozoya on charges of corruption. There had been news reports since late 2017 linking him to the Odebrecht scandal and illegal financing of former President Peña Nieto's 2012 campaign, albeit no action has been brought against him until now.

In August 2019, the former Secretary of Agrarian, Territorial and Urban Development and former Secretary of Social Development in the Peña Nieto administration, Rosario Robles, was sent to prison by a federal judge following accusations of corruption filed against her by the FGR. She is accused of diverting public monies without preventing the squandering of those resources and of failing to report this situation to her direct boss, former President Peña Nieto. The case arose out of a 2018 news report issued by Mexicanos Contra la Corrupción y la Impunidad (a non-governmental organisation) and independent news agency Animal Político, known as the 'Estafa Maestra' (the grand theft), which claimed, in theory, that close to US$350 million of public funds had been corruptly diverted.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

Yes, as general rule, Mexican enforcement agencies tend to grant comity to their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement. Mexico is a party to several mutual legal assistance treaties and thus co-operation tends to be based on those treaties. Moreover, it is typically required that foreign enforcers' petitions comply with at least the following:

- that the foreign authority had the legal competence to impose the sanction pursuant to competence rules analogous to those recognised within Mexican legislation;
- that the offender had been duly notified or served, to assure him or her a fair trial;
- that the object of the procedure from which the judgment derives is not subject to other pending procedures before Mexican courts; and
- that the request to enforce the award is not contrary to public policy.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

Mexico has not enacted any specific blocking legislation regarding sanctions measures ordered by third countries.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

There has been no blocking legislation in Mexico.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

It depends on the case, but allegations of misconduct most often come to light by means of:
- due diligence processes (in the context of merger and acquisition transactions);
- internal and external audits;
- whistleblower programmes;
- private complaints or litigation (when filed against a company or its employees); or
- activity reports to a company's appointed directors and officers.

Information gathering

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

Yes. Articles 6 and 16 of the Mexican Constitution provide for a data protection regime in Mexico. The regulatory laws of this regime are the Federal Law for the Protection of Personal Data Held by Private Parties and the General Law for the Protection of Personal Data Held by Regulated Institutions.

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

The National Institute of Transparency, Information Access and Protection of Personal Data enforces the data protection regime outlined in question 21. The main objective of the data protection regime is to 'protect the personal data of individuals and companies, with the sole purpose of regulating its legitimate, controlled and informed treatment to secure the privacy and the right of informed self-determination of the people involved'.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

The data protection regime involves the protection of ARCO rights (i.e., the right of access, rectification, cancellation and opposition), which afford an individual the right to:
- access their personal data;
- be made aware of the origin of the data, and executed or anticipated transfers of their data to third parties;
- rectify errors within their data;
- cancel their data when it is held in a manner inconsistent with the law, or when it is no longer needed; and
- to oppose the use of their data by third parties for any type of processing.

Given the technical nature of the collection of data within internal investigations, companies should protect these ARCO rights and be particularly mindful of sensitive data about employees regarding such information as racial origins, ethnicity, health issues and sexual preferences. Privacy notices and consent forms may be required.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

As a general rule, under Article 16 of the Mexican Constitution, all interception of private communications is strictly prohibited. The only exception to this provision applies when a competent authority renders a judicial order providing the legal reasons of its granting, the extent of the intervention, the parties involved and the duration of the intervention. However, this exception shall never apply to electoral, tax, commercial, civil, labour, administrative or attorney–client communications.

In light of the above, to avoid any illegal interception of private communications, companies usually draw up privacy notices and consent forms with their employees, for the purposes of allowing the company to collect, process, transfer and review company documents from the company devices (such as computers, internal and external hard drives, jump or 'thumb' drives, metadata, email, archived email, databases, servers, cell phones, and other cellular and email devices). By means of these mechanisms, employees consent to allow the collection of company-owned data, and employers usually commit to protect employees' personal data. Privacy notices and consent forms are usually prepared in accordance with the requirements set forth in Chapter 1, Articles 3(I), 15, 16, 17 and 18 of the Mexican Federal Law on Protection of Personal Data Held by Private Parties.

Lacking employee consent may expose companies and officials who intercept employees' private communications to criminal liability as provided under Article 177 of the Federal Criminal Code and analogous regulations in the states.

Dawn raids and search warrants

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

Yes, in relation to criminal matters. Under Article 16 of the Mexican Constitution:

- a judicial authority must order the search warrant;
- the warrant must be limited to a specific place, date and time;
- the object of the search must be strictly specified;
- a probable cause shall be justified; and
- the search must be executed in the presence of two witnesses.

If the aforementioned conditions are not met, all the evidence obtained by the authority by means of the search warrant is inadmissible at trial. Additionally, although there is no automatic redress, a subject company may be able to seek pecuniary penalties from the state and administrative penalties against the authority that exceeded the limits of the search warrant.

Dawn raids are also used by Mexican law enforcement regulators. In recent years, dawn raids have become a particularly invasive feature of antitrust investigations, because there is no injunction available to corporations to effectively defend against the seizure of information by the authorities. In certain cases, the authorities have entered corporations' offices to collect all sorts of data, both electronic and hard copy, for the purposes of their investigations.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

There is no specific protection a party could enforce against the seizure of privileged material before a dawn raid or search warrant is executed. However, there is precedent in the context of antitrust investigations, whereby if the Antitrust Commission collects privileged material in an antitrust investigation, it is obliged to immediately set it apart and exclude it from the investigation. Future cases will have to define the scope of what is covered under this privilege exclusion.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

The Mexican Constitution provides that there is a human right against self-incrimination. Under this right, the defendant cannot be compelled in any criminal case to testify against his or her own interests. This right can be extended to administrative investigations. However, testimony may be compelled from witnesses in possession of facts relevant to the subject matter of an investigation. The general rule is that anyone with knowledge of relevant facts to an investigation being conducted by the authorities has an obligation to testify. The primary exception flows from the privilege that covers what Mexican law calls 'professional secrecy'. This covers professions in which a client has an expectation of privacy from the service provider, such as an attorney, a doctor or a psychologist.

Whistleblowing and employee rights

28 Describe the whistleblowing framework in your country. What financial incentive schemes exist for whistleblowers? What legal protections are in place for whistleblowers?

The idea of whistleblower protection programmes is relatively new in Mexico and there are very few legal provisions that incorporate protection programmes. The main example is the 'immunity programme' foreseen in Article 103 of the Federal Economic Competition Law, which provides that any competitor involved in absolute monopolistic practices may make a request to the Federal Economic Competition Commission for a reduction in an administrative fine, which could be as much as 100 per cent, or up to 50 per cent, 30 per cent or 20 per cent depending on the timing of the request as compared with other competitors. If applicable, the Federal Economic Competition Commission will keep the identity of the competitor confidential. In our experience, financial incentive schemes will depend on the applicable statue, the type of conduct, and the subsequent co-operation by the whistleblowers with the law enforcement authorities.

There is no provision for a whistleblower protection programme under either criminal or administrative law.

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

Under Mexican employment law, there are no specific rights that enable employees to determine how they should be treated during an investigation. However, while conducting an investigation, best practice for an employer should involve:

- providing the employee with a fair opportunity to challenge the allegations being brought against him or her;
- making findings based on objective criteria and evidence; and
- informing the employee of the right to have his or her own counsel and that the interviewing counsel represents the company, not the employee.

Sensitive personal data uncovered during an internal investigation must also be protected. An employer should check the content of its privacy notices regarding the processing of information about employees and ensure that it is consistent with statutory processing conditions.

The officers and directors of a company have the same rights as any other employee. However, 'trusted employees' may be treated differently in that an employer's loss of confidence in a trusted employee is sufficient ground for dismissal of that employee.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

When an employee's alleged misconduct is found to be grounded, the employer may terminate the employment relationship without liability. However, grounds for dismissal follow strict scrutiny and will be interpreted at all times in favour of the employee. Article 517 of the Federal Labour Law provides that an employer has one month to terminate an employee's employment contract or to discipline the employee, starting from the moment the employer becomes aware of the misconduct.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

If an employee refuses to participate in an internal investigation, and the employment contract obliges him or her do so, the employee could be dismissed with cause. However, if an employment contract does not provide that the employee is obliged to co-operate in internal investigations, the employer is unlikely to be able to dismiss the employee for lack of co-operation.

Commencing an internal investigation

32 Is it common practice in your country to prepare a document setting out terms of reference or investigatory scope before commencing an internal investigation? What issues would it cover?

Yes. Such a document would typically include:

- the nature of the investigation;
- the people who will conduct the investigation;
- retention of external support if necessary (external lawyers or external auditors);
- the applicable law during the investigation (data protection, labour rights, criminal, etc.);
- an estimated timeline for the investigation;
- key individuals in the facts under review;
- identification of the databases in which the relevant information may be stored; and
- the individuals who will be subject to interviews or a review of documents.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

Pursuant to Article 222 of the Criminal Procedures National Code, 'any individual who is aware of an act that may constitute a crime is compelled to report it to the Public Ministry, or to any police officer if the matter is urgent . . . if any individual fails in this legal duty, he or she will be liable to the corresponding sanctions'. However, the term 'corresponding sanctions' is not defined in the Code. Under the Mexican Constitution, authorities cannot impose penalties if they are not expressly established in law. Article 222 does not provide a specific prison or monetary sanction. Therefore, although companies have a statutory obligation to report facts that may constitute a crime, non-compliance with this obligation will not necessarily carry sanctions.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

- Identify the facts that led to the authority's claim.
- Find and preserve the corresponding data.
- Analyse whether the request for production of documents is valid pursuant to the applicable laws.
- Provide protective measures for sensitive data relating to the company's operations or employees.
- Review the requested data to determine any possible legal consequences.
- Prepare a legal defence regarding any possible legal consequences to which the company might be subject, so as to mitigate risks, when applicable.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

There is no obligation binding a company to publicly disclose the fact that an internal investigation is being carried out, other than Article 105 of the Securities Market Law, which provides that entities registered on the Mexican Stock Exchange must publicly disclose 'relevant events' that may affect the price of their registered stocks.

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

Internal investigations are a recent trend in Mexico. Mexican enforcement authorities welcome them when they are conducted with a legitimate and serious purpose. Although not required by law, a company can benefit from conducting an internal investigation and co-operating with the enforcement authorities in the prosecution of potential criminal offences or infringements committed by the company's employees or by the company itself. That is to say, an internal investigation can allow a company to prove to the authorities that it has acted diligently and in good faith to try to understand, contain, mitigate and resolve an issue that could potentially result in criminal conduct or an administrative liability.

Further, using the results of an internal investigation, a company can improve its control processes and compliance functions, and implement preventative measures to prevent future infringements. Some law enforcement authorities may even provide 'legal benefits' to a company that has an internal compliance department focusing on the prevention of criminal conduct. For example, Article 11 of the Federal Criminal Code allows for a reduction in criminal liability of up to one-quarter of the penalty provided under Article 422 of the Criminal Procedures National Code (liability of corporations) provided that the corporation can prove that, before the commission of the conduct for which the company is being accused, it had a compliance department in charge of preventing criminal conduct and that, before or after being accused, it sought to mitigate the damage caused by the adduced conduct.

Attorney–client privilege

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

Yes, attorney–client privilege may be claimed over communications exchanged between counsel and his or her client. This criterion has been developed only recently in Mexican law: in an antitrust investigation, the Mexican Supreme Court held that privilege covers communications between a client and its external counsel. In judicial terms, 'communication' is understood to refer to all information exchanged and thus refers to both spoken or written communications (e.g., oral conversations, emails) or work-product (such as written notes, memorandums).

The steps needed for this privilege to attach are that there shall be a contractual relationship between the client and its external counsel, and that there is evidence to prove that the work-product arguably protected is related to the contract between the client and its counsel.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

Rather than a specific attorney–client privilege, there is a general obligation for all professionals, including attorneys, to maintain professional secrecy. In the legal profession, this involves both a right to refuse to disclose information about a client, and a duty not to testify, produce documents or disclose any information against a client's interests. Lawyers cannot be compelled to testify against their clients.

The holder of the attorney–client privilege in Mexico is, as a general rule, the client, but sometimes the attorney, depending on the specific case and the interests involved.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

As of January 2017, as consequence of a case dealing with this issue in the realm of antitrust law, the Supreme Court held that the privilege attaches only with regard to external counsel. Principles regarding attorney–client privilege in antitrust law are also incorporated in the technical criteria of 11 December 2018 published by COFECE regarding the management of information derived from legal counsel provided to companies subject to antitrust law.

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

Yes.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

It is not necessary to waive the attorney–client privilege as part of your co-operation with the authorities. However, counsel has a fiduciary duty towards his or her client to preserve the secrecy behind the privilege.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

No. However, a client may waive the attorney–client privilege if the waiver satisfies the requirements provided under Articles 6 and 7 of the Federal Civil Code that the waiver:

- does not affect public policy or the interests of third parties; and
- is carried out in clear and precise terms, in such a way that leaves no doubt as to the waiving party's intention to waive.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

Generally, if the privilege was waived in another country and the waiver was carried out in a manner that fulfils the Mexican law requirements referred to in question 42, the privilege will be considered waived in Mexico as well.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

There is no specific concept of common interest privileges in Mexico. However, there are other recognised privileges under Mexican law, such as banking secrecy and tax secrecy.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

Yes. When a third party is providing assistance to a lawyer, there can be an independent privilege of professional secrecy between the lawyer and the third party. If the assistance provided by a third party is connected to the relationship between the lawyer and his or her client, that assistance would also be protected by the attorney–client privilege. Best practice is for external counsel to retain third parties directly and thus secure preservation of this privilege.

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

Yes, as there is no legal provision that prohibits such interviews.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

Yes, attorney–client privilege will cover an attorney's work-product if the preparation of the work-product was consistent with the attorney's retention agreement and the discharge of his or her fiduciary duties towards the client.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

There are no laws setting out particular requirements regarding a witness interview of an employee. However, best practice would include:

- informing the employee that the attorney represents only the company and not the employee individually;
- making the employee aware of the right to have one's own representation;
- explaining the purpose of the interview and the allegations that are being investigated;
- warning the employee that lying or omitting information could constitute illicit conduct; and
- asking the witness if he or she is aware of the company's integrity policies.

Similar requirements apply when interviewing third parties.

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

An internal interview will often include the following:
- discussing the background of the interviewee;
- explaining of the nature of the investigation;
- asking the witness about the facts being investigated;
- putting to the witness relevant documents found during the course of the investigation and requesting an explanation from the witness; and
- listening to the witness's clarifications and explanations.

As mentioned in question 48, witnesses have the right to have their own legal representation during the interview. However, no statute or law mandates that the company provides a lawyer for witnesses or employees being interviewed.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

It is mandatory pursuant to Article 222 of the Criminal Procedures National Code. However, as discussed in question 33, there is no sanction for non-compliance with this 'obligation'.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

Voluntary reporting may be advisable if failing to report could result in more severe consequences for the company and self-reporting could be used as a defence measure to make a request to the relevant law enforcement authority (national or international) for a reduction in sanctions.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

- Identify the law enforcement authorities to which the company should self-report.
- Identify the legal consequences the company may face after self-reporting.
- Prepare the findings and seek evidence.
- Willingly co-operate with the law enforcement authorities during the course of their investigation.
- Seek penalty reductions for co-operating parties.

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

Companies may engage in a dialogue with the authorities and opt to co-operate in their investigation to try to seek a reduction of sanctions. Criteria that are taken into account by the authorities are that the co-operating party is the first to co-operate (assuming there are several parties in the investigated scheme), that it provides meaningful evidence to the authorities, that it co-operates continuously with the authorities, and that it suspends its participation in the scheme. Once an authority brings charges against a company, as a general rule, the company may enter into a dialogue to address the authority's concerns.

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

Yes. They can be challenged using legal remedies provided by procedural law governing the relevant law enforcement authority (e.g., contentious administrative proceedings or nullity trial) or by constitutional remedies (e.g., constitutional review of amparo claims).

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

As a general rule, the best practice will be for companies to seek to negotiate a consistent disclosure package between the various countries issuing notices or subpoenas.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

Typically, a company will be required to search for and produce all evidence responsive to the subpoena, even when that evidence is outside Mexico. This issue often arises in investigations relating to bribery of foreign officials, as, although the underlying conduct occurs in other jurisdictions, the conduct is prosecutable in Mexico. Difficulties may arise when responsive evidence exists in a foreign jurisdiction, but production of the evidence in response to the subpoena would violate that jurisdiction's confidentiality laws. However, Mexico has multi-lateral co-operation agreements with several countries that enable authorities to formulate direct requests to obtain evidence that exists abroad.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

Yes, Mexico has signed bilateral international treaties under which the parties agree to provide mutual assistance to law enforcement authorities from the signatory countries when requested. Several laws in Mexico include provisions relating to international co-operation; however, the most relevant laws are the Federal Procedure Civil Code, the Mexican Commerce Code and the Criminal Procedures National Code (for co-operation in criminal matters).

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

Yes, under Article 113 of section XI of the General Law of Transparency and Access to Public Information, judicial and administrative files are kept confidential until a final ruling on the matter has been made. Personal information contained in such files are confidential and can never be disclosed.

Furthermore, under Article 106 of the National Criminal Procedure Code, authorities cannot disclose confidential information regarding the personal data of the defendant or any related individual, or share information with third parties. Personal information contained in such files is confidential and can never be disclosed, except to a party involved in the proceedings.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

The advice would be to:

- state and demonstrate that the production of such documents would violate the law of the foreign country; or
- state that by producing the documents, the company might be subject to the penalties provided by the foreign law.

Accordingly, it would be 'legally impossible' to perform the object of the request.

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

No.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

When a company produces material voluntarily, it has greater latitude to decide what information to give to the authorities. When compelled, the authorities specify the documents and information that have to be provided, and therefore the company can face sanctions if it fails to comply.

As general rule, material – whether produced voluntarily or compelled – is not discoverable by third parties.

With regard to confidentiality, all types of documents and evidence provided to an authority by an individual are confidential and can only be disclosed to the parties involved in the proceedings. Once the courts enter their corresponding judgments, only the judgment will be published and all private information about the parties (such as their identities) is often redacted. Under Article 70 of the General Law of Transparency and Access to Public Information, all the Mexican law enforcement authorities shall publish 'all resolutions and judgments rendered in processes followed in a manner of trial'. However, Article 73 provides that the law enforcement authorities shall publish 'only the public versions of the judgments that are considered to be of public interest'. Thus, at least in Mexican law, the publication of judgments refers only to the courts' discretion.

Prosecution and penalties

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

Pursuant to Article 422 of the National Code of Criminal Proceedings, the penalties that a company can face for engaging in misconduct include:

- fines;
- confiscation of the instruments used in committing the misconduct;
- disgorgement;
- publication of the judgment;
- suspension of activities;
- dissolution of the company;
- closing down the company's business establishments;
- a ban on any future execution of the types of activities the exercise of which resulted in the misconduct;
- temporary disqualification – for an established period of time – from participating, directly or through a representative, in public contracting procedures such as public bids and government contracts;
- judicial intervention to safeguard the rights of workers or creditors (i.e., the imposition of a government-controlled trustee to remove the company's management so as to halt the alleged crime); and
- public warnings.

Additionally, the directors, officers and employees can be individually responsible for the misconduct and may be punished with a penalty as provided under Article 24 of the Federal Criminal Code, such as:

- imprisonment;
- community service;
- a ban on attending certain places (as determined by the facts of the case);
- fines and fees;
- suspension or deprivation of rights;
- disqualification, dismissal or suspension of functions; or
- a requirement to wear a tracking or surveillance device.

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

Under Article 81 of the General Law of Administrative Responsibilities, companies that perform unlawful acts (e.g., bribe, influence peddling, use of false information, collusion, misuse of public resources) are subject to the following penalties:

- temporary disqualification from participating in government contracts for a specified period of between three months and 10 years;
- suspension from continuing with business activities for a specified period of between three months and three years; or
- dissolution of the legal entity.

If a company wishes to settle in another country, for that settlement to have effect in Mexico it must be agreed with the Mexican authorities. The General Law of Administrative Responsibilities offers benefits for self-reporting companies, including being spared debarment. Thus, it may be advisable for companies that rely on government contracts to self-disclose and seek leniency from the administrative authorities.

The same principle applies under criminal law. Self-disclosure may bring benefits to the co-operating culpable party provided that it satisfies certain conditions, among which remediation for the damage caused is paramount.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

Pursuant to Article 410 of the Criminal Procedures National Code, the court shall consider the severity of the crime and the criminal liability of the offender.

The severity of the crime is determined by the value of the legally protected interest, its consequences, the nature of the conduct (wilful or negligent), the means employed, the circumstances of time, mode and place of the event, and the intervention of the defendant.

To determine the criminal liability of the defendant, the court shall consider the circumstances of the event and the wilfulness of the defendant in committing the crime.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

Yes, pursuant to Article 256 of the Criminal Procedures National Code, once an investigation begins, the offender can request that the prosecution authorities refrain from instituting a criminal prosecution based on the application of 'opportunity criteria', as long as the damage caused to the victims has been repaired or guaranteed.

These opportunity criteria are only applicable in the situations set forth under Article 256 of the Criminal Procedures National Code, and may apply:

- when the crime is not punishable by imprisonment, when it has an alternative penalty or when the jail penalty does not exceed five years, as long as the crime did not involve the use of violence;
- in the case of white-collar crimes committed without violence;

- if the defendant suffered serious damage as a consequence of the crime;
- if the penalty that could be imposed would lack relevance considering another judgment already imposed or that could be imposed;
- if the accused party provides essential and effective information for the prosecution of a more severe crime than the one attributed to the accused party, and the accused party agrees to testify; or
- if criminal prosecution would be disproportionate or unreasonable considering the causes or circumstances surrounding the commission of the crime.

It is common for the prosecution authorities in Mexico to apply one of the opportunity criteria when it is advantageous to the offender, the victim and the authorities. The possible advantages include (1) fast and effective repair of damage to the victim, (2) no prison penalty, (3) co-operation in the prosecution of more severe crimes, and (4) redress of the damage caused by the crime.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

In Mexican legislation, there are no specific reporting restrictions for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution or deferred prosecution agreements. However, given the nature of non-prosecution and deferred prosecution agreements in Mexico, parties usually agree upon certain conditions for the compliance of the agreement, such as constant co-operation, community service or refraining from certain types of conduct.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

Before entering into a settlement with a law enforcement authority, companies should consider:

- the applicable law that would regulate the procedure that allows the application of a settlement agreement;
- the possible legal consequences that the settlement may bring to the company (regarding civil, commercial, criminal and administrative matters);
- the possible legal consequences faced by the company's directors, officers and employees; and
- the extent to which the settlement agreement would mitigate the most risks and consequences for the company.

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

It is not common for Mexican law enforcement authorities to use external corporate compliance monitors as enforcement tools.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

Yes. Therefore, a defendant may be prosecuted for a criminal act and, at the same time, for a civil claim regarding the same actions.

Private plaintiffs can only gain access to the authorities' files if they are a party to the specific proceeding to which the plaintiffs are seeking access, or if a court requests the authority to produce its files.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

Under section XII of Article 113 of the General Law of Transparency and Access to Public Information, criminal investigations undertaken by the public prosecutor are classified. Thus, this information will not be public unless the court discloses it.

Also, Article 5 of the Criminal Procedures National Code provides that all hearings must be public. However, there are exceptions regarding publicity about criminal hearings, such as if the publicity affects the integrity of any of the parties or public security.

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

In complex litigation and in situations involving serious crises that affect a company's reputation, it is common practice to retain a public relations firm to manage the situation. Public perception will often have an influence on how the authorities view a case and will guide how they interpret public policy in reaching their decision.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

Ongoing proceedings are confidential until the issuance of the final judgment (except for personal data, which is generally not disclosed even after a final judgment). Nevertheless, there is often media attention surrounding high-profile cases, particularly with regard to matters of interest to the general public. Sometimes the parties to the proceedings provide information themselves to the media, and even the extent of the conflict itself is publicised. Moreover, it is not uncommon for information about high-profile cases to be leaked to the press and thus become public. Depending on the nature of the case, a party involved in a complex litigation or investigation may attempt to use the media to generate positive public opinion about the merits of its arguments.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

As general rule, there is no obligation to disclose settlements to the market. Article 105 of the Securities Market Law provides that companies registered on the Mexican Stock Exchange must disclose 'relevant events'. A settlement could be interpreted as a relevant event if, for example, if it could affect the share price.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

On 12 August 2019, the National Law of Asset Forfeiture (NLAF) came into force, replacing all previous laws on the subject. The NLAF regulates asset forfeiture in favour of the Mexican state regarding property with an illicit origin, use or purpose, and the administration and disposal of such property.

Pursuant to the NLAF, property shall only be subject to asset forfeiture if it is related to criminal investigations or criminal proceedings regarding the following:

- corruption;
- concealment;
- crimes perpetrated by public officials;
- organised crime;
- vehicle robbery;
- operations using resources of illicit origin;
- crimes against public health;
- kidnapping;
- extortion;
- human trafficking; and
- crimes relating to hydrocarbons, petroleum products and petrochemicals.

The forfeiting of assets is a civil action – independent of any criminal proceeding – and it will occur in cases where the defendant may not prove legitimate ownership of the assets.

Furthermore, the Ministry of Public Function introduced an integrity programme in late August 2019 to prevent corporate misconduct by establishing mandatory integrity standards among companies in Mexico. The main purposes of this programme are:

- that companies contracting with the Mexican government have principles of probity and integrity certified by competent authorities;
- support and training for companies moving towards a culture of integrity;
- the development of integrity materials and compliance training for Mexican companies;
- the creation of simple materials and content, such as infographics and videos, to ensure that the integrity principles are known and understood at all levels of the company;
- unification of international standards of integrity; and
- the creation of direct reporting channels to the Ministry of Public Function.

According to statements made by the Ministry of Public Function, the law regulating the integrity corporate programme shall be presented to Congress at the beginning of 2020, and compliance with the integrity standards by Mexican companies is expected to be mandatory by 2021.

General context, key principles and hot topics

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

New Zealand's Financial Markets Authority has noted that it has an ongoing investigation into the conduct of CBL Corporation Limited (in liquidation) and its directors. As at mid 2019, the Financial Markets Authority has publicly stated that, following a preliminary assessment, it has concerns about disclosure made as part of the initial public offer, continuous disclosure, financial reporting and directors' duties. New Zealand's Serious Fraud Office publicly announced an investigation into matters relating to CBL in mid 2018.

The High Court appointed liquidators to CBL Insurance Limited in November 2018 on the application of the Reserve Bank of New Zealand, in its capacity as insurance regulator. Further, the Reserve Bank of New Zealand commissioned an independent review of its own supervision of CBL to identify lessons for itself and the insurance regulatory regime.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

While there are some offences that on their proper interpretation cannot be committed by corporations (as opposed to natural persons), the general position in New Zealand is that corporations are legal persons and may be held criminally liable for offences. A corporation may be criminally liable for the conduct of employees or agents through the application of the doctrine of vicarious liability, or it may be liable directly or personally.

There is no corporate manslaughter offence under New Zealand law. Although it was considered for inclusion in the Health and Safety at Work Act 2015, it was ultimately excluded.

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

The key law enforcement authorities that regulate corporations include the following:

- New Zealand's Serious Fraud Office, which investigates and prosecutes serious or complex financial crime, including bribery and corruption;
- Inland Revenue Department, which is responsible for enforcing New Zealand tax law (including investigating tax-related offending);
- Reserve Bank of New Zealand, which is responsible for enforcing law relating to the regulation of banks, insurers and non-bank deposit takers;
- Financial Markets Authority, which is responsible for enforcing securities, financial reporting and company law relating to capital markets and financial services in New Zealand;
- Commerce Commission, which enforces legislation promoting competition in New Zealand markets and consumer protection legislation, including legislation prohibiting misleading and deceptive conduct in trade; and
- Worksafe, the workplace health and safety regulator, which conducts investigations and criminal prosecutions in relation to workplace health and safety breaches.

Unlike many similar jurisdictions, New Zealand has no centralised agency to take prosecution decisions. Regulatory agencies frequently publish their own enforcement policies. To assist in maintaining a core set of standards for the conduct of public prosecutions, the Solicitor-General publishes Prosecution Guidelines. These Guidelines contain no specific policies relating to the prosecution of corporations.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

The statutory requirements differ across enforcement authorities, but in all cases there are limits as to when an investigation can be commenced and information-gathering powers used. For example, the director of New Zealand's Serious Fraud Office requires a reason to suspect that an investigation into the affairs of any person may disclose serious or complex fraud before issuing a notice to produce a document; the director then needs to satisfy the higher threshold requirement of having reasonable grounds to believe that an offence involving serious or complex fraud may have been committed before issuing a notice requiring a person to attend an interview.

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

Before making any formal challenge, it may be possible to vary the scope and terms of a notice or subpoena through an informal agreement with the issuing authority. A notice or subpoena issued by a public authority may otherwise be formally challenged through an application to the High Court for judicial review.

In a notable example of a challenge through judicial review, notices issued by the Financial Markets Authority requiring the recipients to supply information or produce documents were declared to be unlawful because of a failure to comply with the statutory requirement to specify a time for compliance.

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

Most New Zealand regulators' enforcement guidelines provide that proactive and co-operative behaviour should be taken into account when considering enforcement outcome. This is a similar feature in criminal sentencing guidelines.

In the context of competition law, the Commerce Commission operates a specific Cartel Leniency Policy in respect to breaches of the prohibition against cartel conduct. The Cartel Leniency Policy grants immunity to the first person involved in a cartel that the Commission is not aware of, or is aware of but does not have sufficient evidence to launch court proceedings, who reports that cartel to the Commission. Any subsequent cartel members who co-operate will not receive immunity, but may be eligible for the Commission's co-operation policy or the Amnesty Plus scheme.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

A major focus for New Zealand's Serious Fraud Office has been bribery and corruption, particularly as New Zealand increasingly has links to high-risk jurisdictions, including doing more business with countries in the red zone of the Transparency International index.

The Inland Revenue Department is focusing on implementing proposals to address base erosion and profit shifting, and systems to allow for the greater exchange of information between tax authorities.

Both the Financial Markets Authority and Commerce Commission continue to focus on conduct that has the potential to harm customers, particularly vulnerable customers, or to harm New Zealand's reputation. The Commerce Commission's enforcement priorities for 2019–2020 include environmental claims, online retail, motor vehicle financing and related add-ons, and cartel conduct.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

With the exception of legislation regulating the telecommunications industry, New Zealand does not have any specific laws that impose general obligations on organisations or individuals in relation to cybersecurity. However, the Privacy Act 1993 and the Companies Act 1993 impose certain obligations with cybersecurity implications. The European Union's General Data Protection Regulation may also be applicable to organisations operating in New Zealand where their activities fall within its jurisdiction.

The Privacy Act 1993 requires an agency holding personal information to ensure that the information is protected by reasonable security safeguards against loss, unauthorised access, use, modification or disclosure and other misuse. If it is necessary for information to be given to a person in connection with the provision of a service to the agency, everything reasonably within the power of the agency must be done to prevent unauthorised use or disclosure of the information.

Under the Companies Act 1993, a director of a company must, when exercising powers or performing duties as a director, exercise the care, diligence and skill of a reasonable director. For most companies, reliance on technology and data is critical to the functioning of business, meaning that this duty of care is likely to extend to the management of cyber risk.

The New Zealand government promotes good cybersecurity practice. CERT NZ is a government agency established in 2017 to receive reports of cyber incidents, analyse threats, share information and advice, coordinate incident responses and be an international point of contact. The National Cyber Security Centre, which is a division of the government's Community Security Bureau, assists New Zealand's most significant public and private sector organisations to protect their information systems from advanced cyber threats. Other regulators, for example, the Financial Markets Authority, also are working with market participants to ensure high standards of cyber resilience and security.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

There are a number of provisions in the Crimes Act 1961 relevant to cybercrime. These sections are very broad and cover (for example) hacking. The offences are treated similarly to conventional crimes in that they fall under the jurisdiction of the New Zealand Police. It is an offence, for example, to:

- dishonestly or by deception access any computer system and:
  - obtain or intend to obtain any property, privilege, service, pecuniary advantage, benefit, or valuable consideration; or
  - cause loss to another person;
- intentionally or recklessly destroy, damage or alter any computer system where the person knows or ought to know that danger to life is likely to result;
- intentionally or recklessly and without authorisation:
  - damage, delete or otherwise interfere with or impair any data or software in a computer system;
  - cause any of the above to occur; or
  - cause any computer system to fail, or to deny service to any authorised users;
- sell, offer, agree to sell, or possess for the purpose of sale, any software or other information that would enable another person to access a computer system without authorisation where:
  - the defendant knows that the sole or principal use of the software is the commission of an offence; or
  - the defendant promotes the software or information as useful for the commission of an offence, knowing or being reckless as to whether it will be used for that purpose;
- possess any software or other information that would enable the person to access a computer system without authorisation, where the person intends to use that software or information to commit an offence; and
- access a computer system without authorisation (excluding where a person authorised to access a computer system accesses it for a purpose other than the one for which the person was given access).

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

Criminal law does not have general extraterritorial effect. However, there is a range of offences relating to conduct occurring outside New Zealand that can amount to an offence in New Zealand. An example is the bribery of foreign public officials by an employee of a company incorporated in New Zealand.

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

The principal issues that have arisen in the cross-border investigations we have been involved in include:

- ensuring that there is no difference in approach between jurisdiction as to the scope and application of legal advice and litigation privilege;
- ensuring that there is no difference in approach to data protection or privacy laws and that all data transfer arrangements put in place take into account the need to respect these laws and protect legal professional privilege;
- understanding the different legal offences in play across multiple jurisdictions, including determining whether different regimes may have applicable extraterritorial offences;
- ensuring that there is no difference in approach between jurisdictions as to the potential culpability of officers or employees that may result in additional care in respect of providing independent advice to officers or employees;
- ensuring that there are no differences in approach to positive obligations to notify regulators and enforcement agencies of potential offences;
- whether evidence-sharing or mutual assistance treaties exist between the relevant jurisdictions; and
- practical issues around the analysis, review and translation of datasets that include a mixture of languages.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

The principle of double jeopardy may apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in New Zealand after it resolves charges on the same set of facts in another country. Section 26(2) of the New Zealand Bill of Rights Act 1990 provides that no one who has been finally acquitted or convicted of, or pardoned for, an offence shall be tried or punished for it again. This provision applies to all legal persons, including corporations, by virtue of section 29. Difficult issues could arise, however, and the principle of double jeopardy could be tested if it is thought that an alleged offender has been unreasonably or improperly acquitted in, or unreasonably leniently punished by, the courts of another country.

New Zealand does not have any laws that are directly analogous to the United States' 'anti-piling on' policy. However, the 'totality principle' in relation to sentencing dictates that, in arriving at the appropriate sentence for several offences, the sentencing judge must not only consider each offence individually, but also assess the offender's overall culpability and determine the effective sentence that is appropriate for the whole of the conduct. The Sentencing Act 2002 provides that, if a court is considering imposing sentences of imprisonment for two or more offences, the individual sentences must reflect the seriousness of each offence. In some circumstances, however, concurrent rather than cumulative sentences may be more appropriate to reflect the gravity of the overall offending.

Specific statutes set out further sentencing rules in particular contexts. For example, the Anti-Money Laundering and Countering Financing of Terrorism Act 2009 provides that, if a person is or may be liable to more than one civil penalty under the Act in respect of the same or substantially the same conduct, civil penalty proceedings may be brought against the person for more than one civil penalty, but the person may not be required to pay more than one civil penalty in respect of the relevant conduct.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

Such settlements are not common in New Zealand, but there have been examples of information exchange and co-operation between New Zealand authorities and their counterparts in other countries.

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

New Zealand law enforcement authorities generally keep abreast of international developments and try to co-operate with their counterparts in foreign jurisdictions. In this respect, New Zealand's Serious Fraud Office, Financial Markets Authority, Inland Revenue Department and Commerce Commission all have standing co-operation agreements in place with equivalent authorities in other jurisdictions.

In the event of a decision by a foreign authority on an identical matter being investigated in New Zealand, we would expect that the New Zealand authorities would take into account that decision but continue to conduct their own investigation.

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

New Zealand ratifies United Nations sanctions through regulations promulgated under the United Nations Act 1946. This legislation enables the New Zealand government to act promptly to impose or remove sanctions shortly after a decision has been taken by the United Nationals Security Council. Financial sanctions targeting designated individuals and entities associated with Al Qaeda and the Taliban are implemented separately under the Terrorism Suppression Act 2002. New Zealand's sanctions are communicated to the public primarily via the New Zealand Gazette, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs' website and ministerial press releases.

Outside these existing frameworks, there is no general legislative power to allow the New Zealand government to impose economic sanctions in the absence of a United Nationals Security Council Resolution. Draft legislation that would permit the New Zealand government to impose unilateral or autonomous sanctions in certain circumstances was introduced into the House in May 2017 but has not yet progressed further through the parliamentary process.

Despite not having an autonomous sanctions regime, New Zealand can apply a limited range of diplomatic sanctions in the absence of authorising regulations. These include the refusal of entry visas, the expulsion of diplomats, the suspension of official visits, and the suspension of aid and co-operation.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

Sanctions compliance monitoring and enforcement functions are carried out by the New Zealand Customs Service, Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Trade, Immigration New Zealand and New Zealand Police. These government departments have robust systems and procedures in place for monitoring compliance with United Nations trade sanctions, visa restrictions and financial sanctions respectively.

Individuals and companies convicted of an offence under New Zealand's sanctions regulations may be subject to criminal or civil penalties. The maximum penalties are:

- in the case of an individual, imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months or a fine not exceeding NZ$10,000; or
- in the case of a company or other corporation, a fine not exceeding NZ$100,000 (per offence).

Evidence of knowledge or intent to breach sanctions will attract significantly harsher enforcement action.

Sanctions enforcement activity has traditionally been limited. New Zealand's first prosecution for a breach of regulations made under the United Nations Act 1946 occurred in 2018. In New Zealand Customs Service v. Pacific Aerospace Limited [2018] NZDC 5034, Pacific Aerospace Limited pleaded guilty to three breaches of the United Nations Sanctions (Democratic People's Republic of Korea) Regulations 2006 for supplying a Chinese company with aircraft parts knowing that they would be used to service an aircraft based in North Korea. These breaches carried a maximum penalty of NZ$300,000, but the District Court imposed a penalty of NZ$74,805 owing to a host of mitigating factors.

As a result of this prosecution, New Zealand companies (especially those operating in high-risk jurisdictions) have become increasingly vigilant with respect to their sanctions compliance obligations.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

New Zealand's compliance and enforcement authorities co-operate with their counterparts in other jurisdictions both on a bilateral ad hoc basis, and under the auspices of the United Nations sanctions framework.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

No.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

New Zealand has not enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

Allegations of misconduct come to light in all manner of ways in New Zealand, including:
- after specific accidents or events that highlight issues;
- through whistleblowers;
- through internal and external audits and compliance reviews;
- through thematic reviews undertaken by regulators; and
- through media reports, including in respect of emerging issues in other jurisdictions.

Information gathering

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

New Zealand's Privacy Act 1993 governs the collection, storage and disclosure of personal information in New Zealand. The Act applies to all companies and requires that personal information is collected and stored only with an individual's knowledge, and only disclosed with consent, unless specified exceptions are met.

There is currently an amendment Bill before New Zealand's Parliament, which would replace the existing Privacy Act 1993 with a more comprehensive data protection regime that would include a mandatory reporting obligation in the event of privacy breach and would require New Zealand agencies to ensure that personal information disclosed overseas would be subject to acceptable privacy standards.

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

Under the current data protection regime, any person may make a complaint to the Privacy Commissioner regarding an alleged breach of the Privacy Act 1993. If the Privacy Commissioner is unable to resolve the matter, proceedings can be brought in the Human Rights Review Tribunal alleging a breach of the Act.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

In our experience, the data protection issues that arise in New Zealand are similar to those encountered in internal investigations in other developed countries.

The Privacy Act 1993 allows disclosure of otherwise private personal information should it be required to avoid prejudice to the maintenance of the law, including the prevention, detection, investigation, prosecution and punishment of offences. This can allow the disclosure of personal information to a regulatory agency in the context of an investigation.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

Section 216B of the Crimes Act 1961 makes it an offence to intentionally intercept any private communication by means of an interception device. However, it is an exception to this offence if a party has the express or implied consent of the originator or recipient to intercept that communication.

The interception of employee communications that are work-related and using work email or equipment owned by the employer can be lawful, but there are limits to an employer's right to intercept such communications, including privacy implications. Under the Privacy Act 1993, collection of data must be for a lawful purpose and be necessary to achieve that purpose. In addition, an employer should not intrude to an unreasonable extent upon the personal affairs of its employees. An employer should expressly reserve the right to monitor employee emails (and, if applicable, other forms of work-related communications) and make it clear why that monitoring is occurring. The Privacy Commissioner in New Zealand has stated that monitoring of employee work email is acceptable following notification but that the interception of emails from an employee's private email account will not be lawful, even if accessed using an employer's server.

Interception or monitoring of telephone communications may also be lawful in the workplace where there is a good reason for such recordings and employees are aware that they may be recorded.

An employee can raise an issue in relation to interception of communications via a complaint to the Privacy Commissioner or by bringing an employment claim via the Employment Relations Authority.

Dawn raids and search warrants

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

Authorities that investigate corporate crime in New Zealand, such as the Serious Fraud Office or Financial Markets Authority, may conduct dawn raids of businesses or residential premises under the authority of a search warrant issued by the court or an issuing officer. The Commerce Commission also has similar powers.

The authorities will also consider using their powers to compel companies to provide information via the authorities' respective statutory powers by issuing statutory notices.

When a raid is carried out under a warrant in New Zealand, the authority may use reasonable force to gain entry to the premises. However, it may only search the premises specified in the warrant and seize items within the scope of the warrant. Some authorities have additional powers that can be exercised during the search, including compelling persons to assist with the search or to answer questions relevant to the search, such as how to access electronic documents or where documents are located.

If there are significant errors in the process of obtaining the warrant or authorising the raid, or in its execution, the raid can be challenged by judicial review (in the High Court) and rendered unlawful, and the material seized during the raid could be rendered inadmissible.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

In most instances, legally privileged material cannot be seized during a dawn raid.

The authorities who investigate corporate crime are frequently accompanied during raids by an independent lawyer specifically tasked with reviewing on-site any material that the company asserts as privileged. It is important to be aware of where privileged material is likely to be stored (electronically and physically) so that claims for privilege can be made before items are seized. The company should assert its rights in writing in this regard.

When there is a dispute as to privilege, in practice, the authority will often seal the material or the server (depending on what is permitted to be seized under the warrant) for review by an independent lawyer (typically a barrister) for privilege before it is examined by the investigating team.

Technology such as servers, mobile phones and tablets may contain both privileged and non-privileged material that cannot be separated. These can be seized or cloned during the raid, subject to the terms of the warrant. In practice, the privileged material will then be quarantined by digital forensic experts within the authority and privileged material will be identified by applying search criteria provided by the company.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

An individual providing required information in the course of a proceeding or to a person carrying out a statutory power has a right against self-incrimination when providing testimony. This right does not apply when it is removed by statute, and a number of New Zealand statutes that provide regulatory investigation powers expressly remove this right. Whether information obtained compulsorily is admissible in court will depend on the statute under which that information is acquired.

Whistleblowing and employee rights

28 Describe the whistleblowing framework in your country. What financial incentive schemes exist for whistleblowers? What legal protections are in place for whistleblowers?

The Protected Disclosures Act 2000 offers protection to individuals who make qualifying protected disclosures of serious wrongdoing in or by an organisation. A disclosure is protected if the:

- information is about 'serious wrongdoing' as defined in the Protected Disclosures Act;
- individual has a reasonable belief that the information is true (or likely to be true);
- individual wishes to disclose the information for it to be investigated; and
- individual wishes the disclosure to be protected.

A protected disclosure must be made in accordance with the internal procedures of the organisation, unless circumstances permit otherwise.

An individual who makes a protected disclosure is granted three core protections under the Protected Disclosures Act:

- Protection from retaliatory action. The individual cannot be dismissed or disadvantaged in his or her employment as a result of making the disclosure.
- Confidentiality. Anyone to whom the disclosure was made must use his or her best endeavours not to disclose information that might identify the individual (unless the individual's consent is obtained or there is a reasonable belief that disclosure of identity is essential to the investigation or the principles of natural justice).
- Immunity from civil or criminal liability. The individual cannot be sued for making a protected disclosure.

Upon receipt of a protected disclosure, an organisation has 20 working days to take action, and failure to do so entitles an individual to make further disclosure to an appropriate authority.

There are no financial incentive schemes for whistleblowers in New Zealand.

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

Justification test

Under the Employment Relations Act 2000, an employee may be dismissed or disadvantaged (when in ongoing employment) lawfully only if the employer can justify its action. The test for justification is whether the employer's actions were what a fair and reasonable employer could have done in all the circumstances at the time the action occurred. This is an objective test, which requires an employer's actions to be both substantively justified and procedurally fair.

Characteristics of a fair process in relation to an allegation of misconduct include (but are not limited to):

- conducting a sufficient investigation, having regard to the resources available;
- advising the employee of the nature of the allegations against him or her;
- providing all relevant information and an opportunity to provide feedback;
- providing an opportunity for the employee to be supported by a support person or other representative; and
- genuine consideration of feedback provided by the employee prior to making a decision.

If an employer is unable to justify an action (according to the test above), the employee has a personal grievance. Potential remedies for a successful personal grievance include reinstatement, reimbursement of lost remuneration, and compensation for hurt and humiliation.

Good faith obligation to employees

Both employers and employees owe each other a duty of good faith. This duty includes not doing anything that directly (or indirectly) misleads or deceives (or is likely to mislead or deceive) the other. This also requires parties to be active and constructive in establishing and maintaining a productive employment relationship as well as being responsive and communicative.

Specifically, when an employer proposes to make a decision that will, or is likely to, have an adverse effect on the continuation of employment, the employer has a good faith duty to provide the affected employee with all relevant information. The employer must also provide the employee with the opportunity to comment on the information.

Directors and officers

If a director is also an employee, the above obligations apply with regard to the employment relationship. All directors will also be subject to obligations under the Companies Act 1993, including duties to act in good faith, to act in the best interests of the company and to exercise the care, diligence and skill of a reasonable director in the same circumstances. Failure to comply with such duties may result in additional consequences.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

The employment rights described at question 29 apply to an employee who is the subject of an investigation regardless of whether misconduct is ultimately found to have occurred. If an employee is dismissed as a result of misconduct, the justification test will apply to the employer's actions. Good faith obligations apply for the duration of the employment relationship regardless of the reason for termination.

There is no requirement for an employer to suspend an employee who is implicated or suspected of misconduct. However, suspension may be lawful, provided the employee's employment agreement contains a power to suspend, a dismissible action has been alleged and a fair process is followed.

For a dismissal to be lawful, a full and fair disciplinary process must be followed including (as discussed at question 29) putting the relevant allegations to the employee and seeking the employee's feedback prior to making a decision to dismiss.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

An employee can only be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation if such a refusal constitutes a failure to follow a lawful and reasonable instruction from the employer. Whether this is the case will depend on whether participation in the investigation is within the scope of the employee's role.

Generally, as discussed at question 29, the justification test and good faith obligations apply to all disciplinary processes or other actions taken by an employer against an employee.

Commencing an internal investigation

32 Is it common practice in your country to prepare a document setting out terms of reference or investigatory scope before commencing an internal investigation? What issues would it cover?

There is a range of practices in New Zealand depending on the legal representatives engaged. However, it is good practice to draw up written terms of reference. This is particularly the case when an external party is being instructed and there is a desire to ensure a tight rein is kept on the scope of the investigation.

The key purposes of a terms of reference document include:

- setting out very clearly the aims of the investigation;
- defining the scope of the investigation, in terms of both the issues to be covered and any proposed limitations in terms of access to people or documents;
- recording who is conducting the investigation and to whom in the company (and in what form – written or oral) they are to report; and
- setting time frames.

Privilege should be a key consideration when drafting the terms of reference. When litigation privilege may be claimed over a report, the terms of reference should record that the company anticipates proceedings and that the dominant purpose of the investigation is preparing for those proceedings. Given privilege is a matter of substance and not form, this alone will not guarantee a claim of privilege is successful. Further, the terms of reference will also need to be implemented as intended for privilege to attach.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

A company should obtain prompt legal advice on the issue, and should consider matters such as:

- notifying insurers;
- preserving claims against or minimising liabilities to other parties;
- identifying any other jurisdictions and regulators potentially relevant to the issue;
- continuous disclosure obligations;
- any legal obligations to report or regulator policies encouraging self-reporting;
- protecting whistleblowers;
- commencing employment investigations; and
- document preservation.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

Upon receipt, the notice or subpoena should be sent to the appropriate person or persons, which will usually include the general counsel. We recommend acknowledging receipt of the notice immediately, indicating that the notice will be considered and that the recipient will revert with any questions or concerns as to the scope or timelines set out in the notice. An initial assessment of the legal basis for the notice (for instance, to check whether it is a voluntary or compulsory request, whether it is validly issued and whether there are any confidentiality obligations) is recommended.

Consideration should then be given to which documents and other materials may respond to the notice or subpoena, and steps should be taken to preserve and hold those documents and materials. Consideration should also be given to how best to address the request, for example keyword searching across date ranges. Issues of privilege, data privacy and (where applicable) bank secrecy and contractual confidentiality obligations should be considered (noting there may be particular issues if a voluntary notice is issued).

Once a plan is developed as to how to respond in terms of process, we typically recommend checking the approach to be adopted with the requestor and explaining any difficulties foreseen in terms of completing what is required within the time frame set in the notice.

The company may be required to take steps to preserve documents and data prior to the receipt of a notice or a subpoena if earlier correspondence with the law enforcement authority suggests a proceeding may be commenced. An obligation to preserve documents exists from the time a court proceeding is reasonably contemplated. Particular consideration should be given to automated document deletion practices as electronic documents must be preserved in a retrievable format even when they would otherwise be deleted in the ordinary course of business.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

Companies publicly listed on the New Zealand Exchange must disclose material information immediately. 'Material information' means information that:

- a reasonable person would expect, if it were generally available to the market, to have a material effect on the price of the issuer's quoted securities; and
- relates to particular securities, a particular issuer or particular issuers, rather than to securities generally, or issuers generally.

Some exceptions to the continuous disclosure obligation apply, notably where information is generated for internal management purposes, or comprises matters of supposition or is insufficiently definite to warrant disclosure. Legal advice is recommended on the application of continuous disclosure rules to a particular internal investigation or contact from law enforcement.

Privately owned companies are not required to publicly disclose the existence of internal investigations or contact from law enforcement.

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

New Zealand regulators and enforcement agencies are typically not opposed to internal investigations that would not impede a criminal investigation. However, if a matter becomes known to an authority before the internal investigation has begun or been concluded, some caution is necessary. At present, New Zealand regulators and enforcement agencies provide less formal guidance on the appropriateness and expectations around internal investigations than in some other jurisdictions.

Attorney–client privilege

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

In some circumstances, where an investigation is conducted by lawyers and comprises confidential legal advice, or an investigation is conducted for the dominant purpose of preparing for contemplated court proceedings, privilege may be claimed over aspects of the investigation. A company should take legal advice on the applicability of privilege before commencing an internal investigation. Where privilege attaches, the relevant communications or work-product must be kept confidential to preserve privilege.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

Under the Evidence Act 2006, legal advice privilege attaches to communications between a person and their legal adviser if:

- the communication was intended to be confidential; and
- it was made in the course of, and for the purpose of the person obtaining professional legal services from the legal adviser, or the legal adviser giving such services to the person.

Corporations can be persons for the purposes of the Evidence Act. The same privilege applies to individuals.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

Yes, so long as the in-house or external counsel holds a current practising certificate. Privilege may attach to communications to or from an in-house lawyer, provided that the in-house lawyer holds a current practising certificate, and provided that the communications were intended to be confidential and were made in the course of, and for the purpose of, the person obtaining professional legal services. Privilege may also apply to lawyers of certain named overseas jurisdictions.

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

The provisions in the Evidence Act 2006 pertaining to attorney-client privilege are sufficiently broad to cover advice given by overseas practitioners as defined in that Act.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

The concept of limited waiver of attorney–client privilege is recognised as a potential step, but there are no specific policies or contexts where it is expected by regulators as a matter of course.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

The concept of limited waiver is recognised in New Zealand. The Evidence Act 2006 provides that a person who has legal advice or litigation privilege (for instance) may waive that privilege either expressly or impliedly. The Act sets out those situations where privilege will be deemed to be waived generally if the privilege holder:

- (or anyone with the authority of that person) voluntarily produces or discloses, or consents to the production or disclosure of, any significant part of the privileged communication, information, opinion or document in circumstances that are inconsistent with a claim of confidentiality;

- acts so as to put the privileged communication, information, opinion or document at issue in the proceeding; or
- institutes a civil proceeding against a person who is in possession of the privileged communication, information, opinion or document, the effect of which is to put the privileged matter at issue in the proceeding.

In cases of limited waiver, therefore, care needs to be taken, particularly regarding the first bullet point above, by ensuring that confidentiality is maintained over the material.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

The key consideration will be whether the limited waiver in another country is deemed to amount to a general waiver of privilege (applying the statutory test – see question 42).

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

This concept exists in New Zealand and is frequently invoked. The provisions of the Evidence Act 2006 dealing with waiver of privilege (see question 42) will govern whether disclosure of privileged information to a person with a common interest is deemed to be a waiver of privilege. Further, it is key to a successful claim to common interest privilege that disclosure should take place in circumstances of confidentiality.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

Communications by clients or lawyers with third parties (such as accountants or other experts) may only attract privilege in exceptional circumstances. Either the communication must be for the dominant purpose of preparing for apprehended litigation, or in certain narrow circumstances the third party may be considered to be the agent of the client for the purpose of communications with the lawyer.

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

Yes. However, it is important to remain sensitive both to expectations of any other investigating authority and to employee rights.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

Yes, to the extent that any documents fall within the categories of legal advice privilege or litigation privilege, as discussed in questions 32 and 38. This may depend on the context of the investigation, who is conducting the investigation, and any terms of reference under which these persons are engaged.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

When a witness in an investigation is also an employee, an employer's actions must be fair and reasonable in all the circumstances and the employer will owe a duty of good faith to the employee (as outlined in question 29). Unless the interview arises in the context of a disciplinary process against the employee, no additional obligations (including in relation to notification or warning) arise.

The duty of good faith applies only to employees and not third parties (including former employees).

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

The conduct of an internal interview is entirely fact-specific. The employee cannot be misled in relation to the information provided or the questions asked. As a consequence, it is common to put documents to the individual being interviewed. Employees are not required to, but they may have legal representation or a support person present.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

In certain circumstances, it is mandatory to report misconduct to law enforcement authorities in New Zealand. For instance, under the Anti-Money Laundering and Countering Financing of Terrorism Act 2009, financial institutions must report certain suspicious transactions. Under the Companies Act 1993, a liquidator must report to the Registrar of Companies certain offences committed by a company or its directors that are 'material to the liquidation'. As another example, under the Financial Markets Conduct Act 2013, a number of parties, including an auditor, issuer, supervisor and manager of schemes established under that Act, must report to the Financial Markets Authority the contravention or possible contravention of an issuer's obligations under that Act, or the likely insolvency of an issuer or a registered scheme.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

Relevant considerations for a company in deciding whether to self-report an issue to law enforcement may include the expectations of the relevant agency, whether issues of public health and safety are at risk, and whether agencies in other jurisdictions have been notified.

Like many jurisdictions globally, New Zealand has introduced a leniency policy that provides a cartel participant with immunity from prosecution by the Commerce Commission for its participation in that cartel, as long as that participant is the first party involved in that cartel to come forward to the Commerce Commission, and meets a number of further criteria (such as ongoing co-operation with the Commerce Commission during an investigation). For cartels that have had global effect or implementation, the decision whether to self-report cartel conduct in New Zealand to the Commerce Commission is often made in coordination with legal counsel in other jurisdictions, as it is often important to know the sequence in which jurisdictions leniency applications are made, and to adopt a consistent approach across jurisdictions.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

The company or the individual should seek legal advice to ascertain its legal risk, and should satisfy itself as to the appropriate strategy. There are some particular considerations in relation to self-reporting under the Commerce Commission's leniency policy. Because full immunity is only available for the first applicant to approach the Commerce Commission, and because the Commerce Commission may decline to offer immunity if it has already begun an investigation of its own accord, time is of the essence.

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

New Zealand's transparent approach to government means that agencies are typically open to communication at a range of stages. In practice, companies often enter into dialogue with agencies to clarify the scope of notices and deadlines within which information is requested.

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

The exercise of a public power (including, for instance, in an ongoing investigation) may in principle be challenged through an application to the High Court for judicial review.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

In such an event, counsel should liaise closely with the client's counsel based in other jurisdictions, to ensure that any concessions or understandings are aligned. However, it will be important to ensure that any disclosure to a New Zealand agency meets the requirements of the notice in New Zealand and that obligations under New Zealand law (including in relation to data privacy and any confidentiality obligations) are properly considered.

Also the agency in question may have information-sharing arrangements in place with its counterparts in other jurisdictions. For example, the Commerce Commission has entered into a number of international agreements with foreign competition and consumer law protection agencies, which provide for co-operation on matters of common interest. Some co-operation agreements allow the Commerce Commission to share compulsorily obtained information with overseas regulators even without the party's consent.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

There is often an expectation that a New Zealand company will search for information within its control, even if it is located in another country. However, data protection laws and blocking statutes in other jurisdictions may present legal obstacles to adopting such an approach.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

There are formal mechanisms for New Zealand law enforcement to provide mutual legal assistance to other governments in criminal investigations and prosecutions. Formal mutual legal assistance by the New Zealand government is governed, largely, by the Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters Act 1992. The New Zealand Police provide informal, police-to-police co-operation to other countries' police forces. In addition, agencies such as New Zealand's Serious Fraud Office and the Commerce Commission have entered into memoranda of understanding enabling the sharing of information with their counterparts in other countries.

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

New Zealand agencies such as the Financial Markets Authority, Commerce Commission and Serious Fraud Office are bound by their empowering statutes to maintain a limited standard of confidentiality with respect to information obtained during their investigations. This prohibits publication or disclosure of the information or documents unless the disclosure falls within one of the listed exceptions. Where the party who provided the information consents, or the publication can be justified in light of the purposes of the empowering statute, publication may be permitted.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

Generally, a company may wish to consider entering into a dialogue with the relevant New Zealand agency as early as possible to explain that it is prohibited from making the disclosure under the laws of another country.

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

New Zealand's data protection laws are primarily set out in the Privacy Act 1993. This sets out 12 data protection principles that apply to both public and private sector entities. These principles are generally similar to those underlying the data protection laws of other developed countries – the Privacy Act was heavily influenced by the Guidelines Governing the Protection of Privacy and Transborder Flows of Data issued by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development in 1980.

A company conducting an investigation will have various obligations in relation to the collection, use, storage, accuracy and disclosure of personal information. Under the Privacy Act, an individual can make a data access request requiring the recipient to provide all personal information held about that individual (subject to limited exceptions).

For the purposes of Article 25(2) of Directive 95/46/EC (the Data Protection Directive), the European Commission has recognised New Zealand as ensuring an adequate level of protection for personal data transferred from the European Union. The effect is that personal data can flow from any of the EU Member States or the three Member States of the European Economic Area to New Zealand without any further safeguard being necessary.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

A company should consider whether providing information voluntarily means (under the particular statute involved) that there is a broader range of circumstances in which the information can be used against it in court proceedings. However, in some contexts, providing information voluntarily will mean that it cannot be shared with overseas regulators without a waiver. There may be circumstances in which compelled production is preferable in light of the risks to the company of breaching confidentiality, bank secrecy or data privacy obligations.

As noted in question 58, New Zealand agencies such as the Financial Markets Authority, Commerce Commission and Serious Fraud Office are bound by their empowering statutes to maintain a limited standard of confidentiality with respect to information obtained during their investigations.

Third parties may make information requests to certain public agencies under the Official Information Act 1982. However, if an investigation is ongoing or the information was provided confidentially, the agency may have grounds, in certain circumstances, to withhold the information.

Prosecution and penalties

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

The penalties for criminal offences in New Zealand include fines and imprisonment. Multiple corporate regulatory statutes allow agencies to take a range of enforcement actions. Notably, a number of agencies may bring civil proceedings seeking pecuniary penalties against companies and individuals. In some circumstances, individuals can be debarred from (for instance) being a director or being involved in the management of a company.

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

There is no legislative regime for suspension and debarment from government contracts in New Zealand. However, under the Government Rules of Sourcing, a government agency may exclude a supplier from participating in a contract if there is a good reason for exclusion, which includes conviction for a serious crime or offence.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

Authorities must have regard to binding or relevant sentencing principles when fixing penalties for conviction of a criminal offence. Factors the courts have had regard to include:

- level of culpability;
- harm to victims (investors or the 'nation');
- previous character;
- co-operation or assistance with the investigation; and
- whether a guilty plea was entered and at what stage.

Similar factors have been taken into account in fixing civil pecuniary penalties. In deciding what enforcement action to take, an agency will also be guided by the principles set out in its own enforcement policies.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

Some New Zealand agencies (such as the Financial Markets Authority) may obtain 'enforceable undertakings'. An advantage for the company concerned is that they can form part of a settlement and thereby avoid immediate court action. A potential disadvantage is the risk of future breach of the undertaking, as the agency may bring court proceedings for breach of the undertaking itself.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

New Zealand does not have non-prosecution or deferred prosecution agreements. However, in general, the Criminal Procedure Act 2011 provides that a court may grant an order preventing the publication of the identity of any person connected with criminal proceedings or the accused. It may grant such an order if (for example) the publication would be likely to cause undue hardship to the connected person.

Additionally, the Financial Markets Authority and Commerce Commission each have broad powers to make orders prohibiting the publication or communication of any information, document or evidence that is provided or obtained in connection with certain activities of the regulators, including investigations.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

Relevant considerations will include the risks of enforcement action if a settlement is not entered into, the nature of the potential enforcement action that may be taken, the strength of the company's potential defence, any reputational risks, whether all relevant agencies are involved in the settlement, whether confidentiality is available, and whether any issues are raised in other jurisdictions as a result of either the settlement or the possible enforcement action.

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

The term 'corporate compliance monitor' is not used within the New Zealand regulatory environment. However, regulators may in instances either using their specific statutory powers or in the context of negotiating settlements or enforceable undertakings with parties require independent oversight of a company's compliance programme. For example, section 95 of the Reserve Bank of New Zealand Act 1989 gives the Reserve Bank of New Zealand the power to require a bank to provide a report by a Reserve Bank of New Zealand-approved, independent person. These reviews can investigate such issues as risk management, corporate or financial matters, and operational systems.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

Civil claims by private parties running parallel to agency investigations and action are generally possible. The courts may allow a plaintiff in parallel proceedings access to authorities' files. However, particularly where the information sought is of a confidential or commercially sensitive nature, there will often be obstacles to obtaining this information.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

When materials are published in the period leading up to or during a proceeding, the publication of those materials could amount to contempt of court when there is a real risk that it interferes with the administration of justice.

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

Both communications specialists within the company itself and external public relations consultants are routinely used to manage a corporate crisis in New Zealand.

Generally, the chief executive officer is the company spokesperson and manages messaging in conjunction with the board or with internal communications or public relations teams. In-house and external counsel may also be called on to advise in some circumstances. Some organisations may consult external public relations specialists, particularly if they do not have the expertise in-house, in the face of a crisis.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

Companies often decline to comment on matters where there are proceedings before the courts. A key consideration tends to be the continuous disclosure obligations of listed issuers of securities.

If information can be disclosed to the public, companies may opt to distinguish between the facts found and the legal consequences. Careful consideration is required, particularly regarding any confidential obligations (such as bank secrecy obligations) when dealing with a voluntary disclosure and whether customer information can be redacted. It may be better for the purposes of public relations to wait until disclosure is required by law.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

There are exceptions to the New Zealand Exchange requirements to disclose material information to the market when information is either confidential or concerns an incomplete negotiation or proposal.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

The New Zealand government is currently considering further regulation in the financial services sector to include new entity-level obligations to ensure that customers are treated fairly throughout an institution's relationships with those customers and a corresponding directors and senior managers regime (potentially akin to the UK Senior Managers Regime or Australian Bank Executive Accountability Regime) to span both prudential and conduct requirements.

In April 2019, the New Zealand government criminalised cartel conduct. From April 2021, individuals who intentionally engage in cartel conduct are liable on conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding seven years or a fine not exceeding NZ$500,000 (or both).

General context, key principles and hot topics

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

No significant new corporate investigations have come into the public domain during the past 12 months. The cases that have received attention in the media have, in the main, tended to be those that came to light more than a year ago, and were reported in the 2018 edition of this chapter. The cases mostly involved Nigeria's petroleum sector and, directly or indirectly, the national oil company – Nigerian National Petroleum Corporation. They included the Malabu matter, in which the Federal Republic of Nigeria commenced fresh civil proceedings in the English High Court against JPMorgan Chase and others.

An interesting development, about which few details have emerged, is the announcement, made in July 2019, that the Nigerian Information Technology Development Agency (NITDA) was investigating several entities – from banks, financial technology companies and telecommunication companies, to the National Immigration Service – for alleged breaches of the Nigerian Data Protection Regulation (NDPR), specifically Article 2, which is focused on data retention, protection from theft and unnecessary transfer. The outcome of these investigations will be awaited with great interest as they will provide some indication as to how NITDA will handle breaches of the NDPR.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

Many statutes create criminal offences for which corporations may be held liable. Each state of the Nigerian federation has its own criminal laws. In Lagos, the largest state in terms of population and the size of its economy, the Criminal Law at section 20 makes specific provision for corporate criminal liability. Any act or omission under the Law is attributable to the corporation when 'it is done or omitted to be done by its officer'. In determining which officer's act or omission can be attributed to the company, a court must 'have regard to all the circumstances, including the fact that the person has apparent or real authority to bind the company'. If the prohibited conduct is performed by a person who is not an officer of a corporation, that person will nevertheless be criminally liable if the act or omission was carried out by him or her in the performance of his or her duty as an employee of the corporation and if the corporation failed to take steps to prevent it.

1 Babajide Ogundipe is a partner and Olatunde Ogundipe is an investigator/analyst at Sofunde, Osakwe, Ogundipe & Belgore.

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

Other than the body charged with the regulation of corporations, the Corporate Affairs Commission (CAC), no specific law enforcement authority regulates corporations. The CAC regulates and supervises companies from incorporation to dissolution. Its functions are listed in the Companies and Allied Matters Act. The CAC can impose penalties and sanctions for corporate misconduct, and for security market-related offences, such as insider trading and market manipulation, most of which are pecuniary in nature.

In addition to the CAC, the Securities and Exchange Commission is charged with the regulation of investments and securities in Nigeria, and its functions are listed in section 8 of the Investments and Securities Act.

The Federal Inland Revenue Service is responsible for the taxation of corporations in Nigeria and may take tax enforcement action against corporations.

The various authorities are created by statute and there is rarely any overlap.

There are a number of other regulatory agencies, such as the Central Bank of Nigeria, which regulates the banking industry, the Department of Petroleum Resources, which regulates the oil and gas industry, and the National Insurance Commission, which regulates the insurance industry.

Other than these, the Nigeria Police Force and the Economic and Financial Crimes Commission (EFCC) also prosecute cases against corporations.

In February 2019, NITDA published the Data Protection Regulation, which empowers approved third-party entities to ensure compliance with the Regulation's terms. The Regulation itself outlines a number of data protection requirements for any data controller, which is defined as any entity that collects data, including employee information, making it extremely widely applicable.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

There are no specified grounds on which law enforcement authorities may initiate investigations. Consequently, it would appear that simple suspicion may be all that is required to trigger an investigation. Usually, however, investigations will only be initiated on the basis of a complaint, or some other written allegation that an offence has been committed, addressed to a law enforcement agency or regulatory authority.

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

A subpoena may be challenged by making an application to a high court seeking to set it aside. The grounds on which a court will set aside a subpoena include the following:

- the scope of the documents or information requested unfairly burdens or prejudices the recipient of the subpoena;
- there was no factual or lawful basis shown for the issuance of the subpoena; and
- legal privilege, such as attorney–client privilege, spousal privileges and the right against self-incrimination.

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

There are no formal rules relating to the granting of immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities. However, it is not uncommon for no action to be taken against such individuals.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

The present Nigerian government, re-elected in March 2019, continues to emphasise that investigating corruption is one of its top priorities. In addition, in recognition of the country's tax base (of a taxable population of between 75 and 100 million people, it has been reported that there are between 10 and 19 million registered taxpayers) and, given the recent decline in the price of crude oil – the country's largest source of income – it has become increasingly important for the collection of tax and customs duties to be more efficient. Nigeria imports a significant amount of goods and there has historically been a significant amount of duty evasion.

The approach by the enforcement authorities continues to be focused more on recovering money than on pursuing transgressors.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

NITDA regulates cybersecurity. All data controllers, as defined by the NDPR, must take security measures, including but not limited to 'protecting systems from hackers, setting up firewalls, storing data securely with access to specific authorized individuals, employing data encryption technologies, developing organizational policy for handling personal data (and other sensitive or confidential data), protection of emailing systems and continuous capacity building for staff'.

However, the NDPR is new and there is no case law yet to show its limits. NITDA has issued draft guidelines that provide for the creation of an Administrative Redress Panel to investigate any breaches of the provisions of the NDPR, which are to be treated as breaches of the National Information Development Agency Act.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

A Cybercrimes Act, passed in 2015, created specific criminal offences in respect of a variety of things, ranging from cyberstalking, the unauthorised access of information and trading in stolen information. It also imposed an obligation on financial institutions to verify the identities of its customers, through documentation, prior to allowing any online transactions. In addition, the statute led to the establishment of the Nigerian Computer Emergency Response Team, which is part of the Office of the National Security Adviser. The body receives reports of cybercrime incidents and issues guidance on cybersecurity best practices. In addition, the EFCC has been known to use the Act in its pursuit of fraudsters. The Act has also been used in the prosecution of persons who have published material that is critical of religious institutions and leaders, and the head of the EFCC.

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

Nigerian criminal law does not purport to have extraterritorial effect. State and federal criminal laws apply only to persons (natural and legal) within Nigeria.

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

The principal challenge, and one that has arisen in relation to investigations conducted and concluded outside Nigeria, relates to corporations being pursued, and punished, in Nigeria for conduct that has been penalised outside Nigeria. This occurred, to some extent, to corporations involved in the Bonny Island bribery cases. Those corporations were subjected to sanctions imposed by the US Department of Justice and the Securities and Exchange Commission. While from a strictly legal perspective this is not a real problem, as the corporation that is most likely to be subjected to sanctions in Nigeria would probably be Nigerian (foreign corporations are, generally, not permitted to carry on business in Nigeria unless they are locally incorporated), the corporations that were involved did consider action taken against their Nigerian subsidiaries and affiliates as amounting to being penalised for conduct that had already been sanctioned elsewhere.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

Under Nigerian law, persons may not be tried for an offence if they can show they have previously been 'convicted or acquitted of the same offence by a competent court' or 'convicted or acquitted by a competent court on a charge on which he might have been convicted of the offence charged'. However, it is questionable whether this provision would be of assistance to corporations carrying on business in Nigeria, given that foreign corporations wishing to carry on business in Nigeria must incorporate in Nigeria, and be separate and distinct entities from non-Nigerian corporations. A Nigerian corporation would have to have been involved in the foreign proceedings to be able to take advantage of these provisions. Further, since a deferred prosecution agreement does not amount to an acquittal or conviction, this might pose additional challenges to the ability of a corporation to rely on the double jeopardy provisions to avoid being subjected to further action in Nigeria. At this time there is no policy similar to the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

Simultaneous resolutions are uncommon. However, companies that have had issues in other jurisdictions have, on occasion, also had to resolve issues relating to the same misconduct separately in Nigeria. Given the possibility that matters in respect of which settlements reached outside Nigeria, where Nigerian authorities also have jurisdiction, may well be pursued, it is always advisable to obtain local advice and, if possible, seek to conclude a resolution of the Nigerian part at the same time as the external settlement.

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

Much depends on the foreign authority and the corporations involved, and on whatever policy considerations are at play. There appear to be no rules or other objective criteria available to enable an all-embracing answer to this question. On the occasions when foreign authorities have taken decisions in respect of matters that are related to Nigeria, any action taken by Nigerian authorities has tended to be shrouded in secrecy, as the Nigerian authorities tend not to provide information to the public. Consequently, only the authorities and the affected parties (with their advisers) tend to have knowledge of any steps that have been taken.

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

We are not aware of Nigeria having any sanctions programme.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

Given the absence of any Nigerian sanctions programme, there is no enforcement activity.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

Nigeria has no sanctions programme and tends to be the subject of sanctions imposed by foreign governments, rather than the imposer of sanctions.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

Nigeria has not enacted any blocking legislation in relation to sanctions imposed on it, or on other countries or individuals.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

Nigeria has not enacted any blocking legislation.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

Allegations of misconduct usually surface through whistleblowers, internal audits and media reports. A matter of concern when allegations arise from whistleblowing is the victimisation and dismissal of whistleblowers by corporations.

Information gathering

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

In February 2019, NITDA turned its Data Protection Guidelines into the NDPR. The document, on its face, claims to be binding on all entities that process data in Nigeria. It limits the power of data controllers to share that data for anything that is not to the benefit of the owner of the data. It also restricts the ability of controllers to transfer data to another country, particularly countries with weaker data protection laws. In addition, certain industries have had data protection regulation from their own regulating bodies. For example, the Nigerian Communications Commission (NCC) requires that all its licensees (telecommunications service providers) take reasonable steps to protect customer information against 'improper or accidental disclosure' and ensure that this information is securely stored. In addition, there is a requirement that information must not be transferred to any party except as otherwise permitted or required by other applicable laws or regulations.

NITDA is the authority responsible for planning, developing and promoting the use of information technology in Nigeria. It is empowered to issue guidelines that may prescribe data protection requirements relating to the collection, storage, processing, management, operation and technical controls for information and, in 2017, it issued draft data protection guidelines. These guidelines, which form the basis of the NDPR, are the only set of regulations that contain any comprehensive provisions relating to the protection, storage, transfer or treatment of data in Nigeria. Personal data is defined in the draft guidelines as 'any information relating to an identified or identifiable natural person, information relating to an individual, whether it relates to his or her private, professional or public life. This can be anything from a name, an address, a photo, an email address, bank details, posts on social networking websites, medical information or a computer's IP address'. Data controllers are obliged to prevent any transfer of data to any country that does not ensure an adequate level of protection within the prescribed context of the guidelines. The guidelines also recommend that the processing of all data collected shall not take place without the consent of the data subject.

The NDPR also states that NITDA shall create an Administrative Redress Panel to investigate any breach of the provisions of the NDPR. Any such action shall be treated as a breach of the National Information Development Agency Act. The basis for such a provision is unclear as the Act does not confer power on NITDA to create such an offence.

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

The NDPR outlines an intention to create an Administrative Redress Panel. However, as at July 2019, there has been no further information provided by NITDA about this panel. As the regulations are very new and still in draft form, it is impossible to say how likely enforcement action will be. While it appears that NITDA intends to be very proactive in its enforcement of the Regulation, it remains to be seen how serious it will be about enforcement.

The NDPR outlines fines for non-compliance based on the size of a company: a fine of 10 million naira or 2 per cent of annual gross turnover for the preceding year, whichever is greater, for controllers processing the data of 10,000 subjects, and a fine of 2 million naira or 1 per cent of the gross turnover for the preceding year for controllers processing the data of fewer than 10,000 subjects.

Additionally, the Regulation does not restrict the ability of data subjects to seek redress in a court of competent jurisdiction.

This is all in addition to the existing law based partly on the constitutional guarantee of privacy, which is rather broad, and the NCC's Regulation for Telecommunication Companies.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

In the absence of clear general data protection laws, data protection issues have not been a major cause of concern in the conduct of internal investigations in Nigeria. The introduction of the NDPR has yet to have any noticeable effect on internal investigations, but clearly attention needs to be paid to its provisions. In the past, data protection issues have, generally, not posed any particular problems to internal investigations.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

This has not been directly addressed in the NDPR. However, the Constitution contains the following, somewhat broad, guarantees in respect of private communications: 'The privacy of citizens, their homes, correspondence, telephone conversations and telegraphic communications is hereby guaranteed and protected.'

Dawn raids and search warrants

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

Search warrants and dawn raids are a rarity in Nigeria. When a search warrant is required, it is issued by a magistrate, which is the lowest rank of judicial officer in Nigeria. To obtain a warrant, the law enforcement authority must show that there are reasonable grounds to believe the search will provide evidence that a crime has occurred or is likely to occur, and that evidence relating to this is believed to be in the premises to be searched. Unfortunately, search warrants, and the process for obtaining them, have rarely been subjected to any significant judicial scrutiny. Anecdotal evidence indicates that warrants tend to be issued on request and magistrates do not scrutinise the grounds for them.

In theory, if a law enforcement authority fails to comply with the terms of a warrant, a court may preclude it from using any improperly or illegally obtained evidence in a court proceeding, and may direct the return of such improperly obtained material.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

Searches are permitted when law enforcement authorities are able to show that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the search will provide evidence that a crime has occurred or is likely to occur. All material deemed to be connected to the commission of a crime may be seized, whether privileged or otherwise. The relevance of privilege, in relation to seized material, will arise when, and if, a party to proceedings seeks to rely on such material. At that point, the issue as to the admissibility of the material and the weight to be attached to it will need to be addressed by the court before which the question is raised.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

The Evidence Act regulates the competence and compellability of witnesses. Privileges that prevent individuals from providing testimony, which are presently recognised in Nigeria, include attorney–client privilege, spousal privilege and the Constitutional provision preventing a person who is being tried for a criminal offence from being compelled to give evidence at trial.

Whistleblowing and employee rights

28 Describe the whistleblowing framework in your country. What financial incentive schemes exist for whistleblowers? What legal protections are in place for whistleblowers?

There is currently no general law in Nigeria providing protection for whistleblowers. A Whistleblower Protection Bill, first introduced in the National Assembly in 2017, continues to make its way through the legislature. The Federal Ministry of Finance unveiled a whistleblowing programme in December 2016. Under this, persons providing information relating to the violation of financial regulations, the mismanagement or misappropriation of public funds and assets, theft, solicitation and collection of bribes, procurement frauds and other infractions are entitled to receive rewards, calculated as a percentage of monies recovered, and to do so without their identities being revealed publicly. The Investments and Securities Act provides a framework for the disclosure of information in respect of capital market operators and public companies. In 2011, Nigeria's Securities and Exchange Commission released a Code of Corporate Governance for Public Companies, which includes a provision that all public companies establish a whistleblowing mechanism for the reporting of illegal and unethical behaviour.

The Financial Reporting Council of Nigeria has issued the Nigerian Code of Corporate Governance (enacted in January 2019), which also provides comprehensive guidelines for the protection of whistleblowers in the private sector.

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

Generally, employees have no specific rights under employment laws that determine how they should be treated if their conduct brings them within the scope of an internal or external investigation. The rights and obligations of an employee are, by and large, regulated by the terms of the employment contract. Similarly, save where there are express provisions creating liability of officers and directors, the rights and obligations of officers and directors are governed by the terms of their contracts with the company.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

When employees are accused of misconduct, employment law does not afford them any specific rights.

The steps an employer may take when an employee is suspected of misconduct depend on the terms of the employment contract. In general, and without specific provisions in the employment contract, corporations may take any number of disciplinary actions against employees suspected of misconduct, including suspension and termination. When an employee is deemed to have engaged in misconduct, upon the conclusion of investigations, the company may dismiss the employee summarily and report the conduct to the appropriate law enforcement authority.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

If such a refusal can be construed as a breach of a contract of employment, for which dismissal would be a lawful sanction, an employee may be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation.

Commencing an internal investigation

32 Is it common practice in your country to prepare a document setting out terms of reference or investigatory scope before commencing an internal investigation? What issues would it cover?

As discussed further in question 36, the involvement of external counsel in corporate investigations is not common in Nigeria and, as a result, it is difficult to discern any general practices. However, to conduct an internal investigation properly, there must be some terms of reference, and it would be expected that such a document would include a summary of ascertained facts, the objectives and scope of the investigation, the procedures for the conduct of the investigation and any limitations that there may be in carrying out the investigation.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

When a company becomes aware of issues before the Nigerian authorities, the first step should be to seek local legal advice. There is no positive obligation to ensure that records are secured and retained. However, the destruction or suppression of such records could result in obstruction of justice charges. Similarly, there is no requirement to self-report to regulatory or law enforcement agencies. Any decision as to whether to self-report should be made in each individual case. Currently, it is extremely rare that companies self-report to the authorities. In one instance where a publicly quoted company self-reported issues relating to its accounts, arising from the fraudulent conduct of an individual executive that resulted in the incorrect reporting of stock, all the members of the board were sanctioned and barred from holding office as company directors, including those who had no involvement in the wrongdoing. While the sanctions were eventually overturned, following successful litigation against the regulators, this occurrence reinforces the view that, presently in Nigeria, the best course of action may not involve any self-reporting, given the absence of any reporting framework. It might well be that the best thing to do, once an investigation has been concluded, is to keep the information private and secure and wait to see what action, if any, the relevant regulatory or law enforcement agencies might take.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

As stated in question 33, there is no positive obligation to ensure that records are secured and retained. However, the destruction or suppression of such records could result in obstruction of justice charges. The power to issue subpoenas in Nigeria stems from provisions in civil and criminal procedure legislation. Accordingly, they may only be issued by a court in the context of ongoing proceedings. Consequently, law enforcement agencies and regulatory authorities do not issue subpoenas, as a general rule. Upon the receipt of a properly issued subpoena, the recipient must, in the case of a witness summons, attend the court at the designated time or, in the case of a documents subpoena, attend to produce the documents listed in the subpoena.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

Privately owned companies are not required to publicly disclose the existence of internal investigations or contact from law enforcement. However, Rule 187 of the Securities and Exchange Commission's Rules and Regulations, which applies to companies listed on public exchanges, provides: 'All information likely to affect the financial condition of a company shall be made available to the Commission by the company and the Commission shall disclose it on the trading floor immediately the information is made available.'

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

As stated in question 32, internal investigations involving external legal practitioners are rare in Nigeria. When they are conducted, they tend to be in the form of internal and external audits rather than investigations conducted by external counsel. Given their rarity, the authorities do not appear to have any general position on them. There have been instances in which a law enforcement authority has used the product of internal investigations as the basis of a prosecution, in essence merely repeating the process undertaken by the internal investigations to obtain evidence for use in the prosecution.

Attorney–client privilege

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

Attorney–client privilege may only be claimed under Nigerian statutory law when a legal practitioner has been engaged and has received information from his or her client 'in the course of and for the purpose of his employment as such legal practitioner by or on behalf of his client'. Legal practitioners may also not disclose the contents of documents with which they have become acquainted, or the contents of any advice given, in the course, and for the purpose, of their employment as legal practitioners. In addition, the Rules of Professional Conduct for Legal Practitioners impose a duty to keep confidential all communications with clients. There is some doubt as to whether in-house counsel have the same duty, and the issue has yet to be determined in Nigeria. Therefore, to ensure that privilege attaches to an internal investigation, it would be advisable to engage external counsel.

Nigeria is a common law jurisdiction, so it would be open to Nigerian courts to adopt common law privilege rules, as exist in other common law jurisdictions. It does not appear that this issue has been the subject of any reported cases in Nigeria. Therefore the extent to which such common law rules may be accepted in Nigeria remains unclear.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

Under the Evidence Act, a legal practitioner may not, except with the consent of the client, disclose 'communications made to him in the course and for the purpose of his employment as such legal practitioner by or on behalf of his client, or to state the contents or condition of any document with which he has become acquainted in the course and for the purpose of his professional employment or to disclose any advice given by him to his client in the course and for the purpose of such employment'. This privilege is the client's and does not extend to communications made in furtherance of illegal purposes.

The Rules of Professional Conduct for Legal Practitioners state the obligations differently, providing that all communications made by a client to a 'lawyer in the normal course of professional employment' are 'privileged'. It goes on to prohibit a lawyer from revealing a 'confidence or secret of his client'. Again, it is clear that the privilege is that of the client. There is no distinction between a client who is an individual and one that is a corporation.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

This is unclear, as there have been no judicial statements on the matter. The answer turns on how in-house counsel are viewed – as employees in general or as lawyers whose client is their employee. As Nigeria is a common law jurisdiction, the views in other common law jurisdictions are relevant. Generally, in-house counsel are lawyers for privilege purposes. Ultimately, the burden of demonstrating that an in-house counsel's communication is privileged falls on the corporation. To establish the privilege, the corporation must show that the in-house counsel's communication:

- was made for the purpose of obtaining or providing legal advice to the corporation;
- involved subject matter within the scope of the employee's responsibilities for the corporation;
- was known by the parties to the communication to be for the purpose of legal advice; and
- was confidential when made and has remained confidential.

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

This is unclear. The statutory provisions in the Evidence Act are unlikely to apply to foreign lawyers because the provision relates, specifically, to 'legal practitioners' and that term has been interpreted to refer to persons on the roll of legal practitioners kept in the Supreme Court of Nigeria. Therefore, unless the foreign lawyer is also enrolled as a legal practitioner in Nigeria, the provisions in the Evidence Act cannot apply to such a person. However, to the extent that common law privilege rules are adopted in Nigeria, attorney–client privilege may extend to such advice.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

We are not aware of any instance when this issue has arisen. There are no situations in which the waiver of privilege is mandatory. Generally, the privilege may only be waived by the client – the corporation – but the obligation to maintain client confidentiality is not mandatory:

- when the communication is made in furtherance of any illegal purpose and the acts of the client constitute a crime or fraud or other illegal acts; and
- where permitted by law or to comply with a court order.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

In theory, given the nature and extent of legal privilege, the client may stipulate the extent to which it waives that privilege, and should be able to require parties to which disclosure is made to maintain the confidentiality with regard to further disclosures. However, this issue has not been considered by the courts in Nigeria.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

Privilege generally can only be waived with the consent of the client. In relation to attorney–client privilege, no attorney is permitted, unless with the client's express consent, to disclose any communication made to him or her in the course, and for the purpose, of his or her employment. Accordingly, information that is not treated as privileged in another country may still attract privilege in Nigeria, if it constitutes what the law determines to be privileged communication.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

As a common law jurisdiction, Nigeria would recognise common interest privileges, in appropriate circumstances. The privilege would attach to communications between a legal practitioner and other parties who share a common interest with the client, provided those communications are made with a view to developing legal advice in anticipation of, or collecting evidence for, litigation. This privilege also applies to all documents obtained or prepared with a view to litigation.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

When a third party acts under the direction of a legal practitioner, the third party is bound by the same obligations as the legal practitioner.

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

The interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation is permitted as there are no laws prohibiting the practice.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

Communications made with a view to developing legal advice in anticipation of litigation, or collecting evidence for litigation, is privileged. Therefore, privilege may be claimed when internal witness interviews take place with litigation in contemplation.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

There are no legal or ethical requirements or guidance currently stipulated in Nigeria when conducting witness interviews of employees. However, the wise course is to adhere to international best practices.

With regard to third parties, who would have to consent to being interviewed, the situation should be the same as for employees.

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

There is no prescribed way to conduct internal interviews. This would be mainly down to the nature of the investigation and any internal company policy and guidelines. Investigations are usually document-heavy so documents will probably be put to the witness if they are relevant to the investigation. Ordinarily, employees do not require their own legal representation; however, there is no law prohibiting it. The only concern for most employees is that the use of legal representation may appear to suggest some measure of guilt on their part.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

Under certain legislation, such as the Independent Corrupt Practices Commission Act (reporting the solicitation of bribes) and the Money Laundering (Prohibition) Act, the reporting of certain types of conduct is mandatory.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

Generally, we would not advise a company to self-report to any law enforcement agency or regulatory authority. If, as a result of a good relationship with an agency or authority, it were possible to anonymously provide information as to the nature of some infringement and to obtain assurances that the resulting official investigation would not be conducted oppressively, we might advise that a report be made. Otherwise, our routine advice would be not to self-report.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

As indicated in question 51, we would generally not advise self-reporting. However, when self-reporting is contemplated, no information should be passed on to the authorities until attempts have been made to understand how the authority would respond and after assessing that any action that would be taken would not be oppressive or inordinate. Only where there is a high level of confidence would self-reporting be advised.

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

Law enforcement authorities do not issue subpoenas. They may only be issued by courts in the context of ongoing proceedings.

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

The exercise of investigative powers by law enforcement authorities can be challenged by an application to the court if it is considered unlawful. If declared unlawful, the court can order various remedies, such as terminating the exercise of that power or awarding damages. Generally, however, the courts tend not to interfere with the conduct of investigations by law enforcement authorities.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

As indicated in question 53, subpoenas may only be issued by courts in the context of ongoing proceedings. Unless an authority in a foreign country can exercise authority over a Nigerian company, disclosure cannot be enforced against the Nigerian company. Of course, there may be other factors that would influence how a company might react to foreign demands for material. However, there are no data protection laws or blocking statutes in force in Nigeria that would be relevant.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

Subpoenas are only issued by courts, and Nigerian courts have no extraterritorial reach, nor do they profess to have. Consequently, if material sought by a properly issued subpoena is not under the control of the company to which the subpoena is addressed, the company is under no obligation to seek to obtain such material and will not be sanctioned for its inability to produce the material.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

Information is shared, both formally and informally, with countries with which Nigeria has treaties, conventions or other agreements, and informally with other friendly countries with which the sharing of information is not unlawful.

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

Any such obligations would depend on how the information is shared. If there is an agreement under which the information is shared, and that agreement stipulates some confidentiality obligations, the Nigerian authorities would most likely abide by them.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

Unless the law enforcement authority in Nigeria may request the production of the documents, we would advise against providing them.

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

Nigeria has neither blocking statutes nor any general privacy laws, other than the general constitutional right to the privacy of homes, correspondence, telephone conversations and telegraphic communications.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

The primary risk of voluntary production of material is that there are no guarantees as to how the material will be used by the Nigerian authority or agency. The material may also be subject to disclosure under freedom of information legislation. Although there are no confidentiality rules attached to productions to law enforcement in Nigeria, and Nigerian law enforcement agencies are generally unwilling to share information with non-official bodies, there can be little confidence that such material will not be leaked.

Prosecution and penalties

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

The penalties applicable to companies are fines and forfeiture of assets. Directors and officers of companies, on the other hand, are subject to imprisonment as well as fines and forfeitures.

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

Nigeria has no formal framework for suspension or debarment from government contracts, and settlements in other jurisdictions are not usually relevant to the award of contracts in Nigeria.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

The authorities will consider the gravity of the offence, the punishment prescribed by the law, whether the offender is a first-time offender, any mitigating circumstances and the interest of the public, among other things.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

Nigeria has no formal framework of non-prosecution or deferred prosecution agreements.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

The lack of a formal framework for non-prosecution or deferred prosecution agreements means that it is unclear whether or not there would be reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into such agreements.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

The primary considerations would be with regard to whether the settlement needs to be kept confidential and whether it would have any adverse consequences outside Nigeria.

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

The Federal Inland Revenue Service and the CAC rely on externally audited financial statements from licensed accountants for publicly listed companies. Additionally, the NDPR issues licences to data protection compliance organisations for the purposes of auditing, training and consulting. The NDPR provides that licensees shall act on behalf of NITDA, which implies that licensees would perform audits, not the NDPR. However, NITDA does not currently require data controllers to engage licensed auditors, therefore it seems that, for the time being, internally produced audits are sufficient for compliance with the Regulation.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

Private civil actions can be undertaken at the same time as prosecutions. Private individuals have limited rights to undertake the prosecution of criminal offences. However, Nigeria does not have the concept of complainants being parties to prosecutions undertaken by the state, and complainants have no rights to access the authorities' files.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

There is no law regulating publicity of criminal cases at either the investigatory stage or once the case is before a court. Although persons accused of criminal offences are presumed to be innocent until proven guilty, the absence of jury trials in Nigeria makes it extremely difficult for defendants to contend that pretrial publicity has created a real risk that they will not be afforded a fair trial.

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

Large companies will frequently use public relations firms to manage crises, but this is rarely made public.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

If there is public (or media) interest in ongoing proceedings, they will be covered by Nigeria's print and electronic media. Proceedings in court are generally open to the public although they cannot be televised or otherwise broadcast. Documents filed in court are accessible to the public, theoretically, though many courts will place obstacles in the path of persons seeking access to obtain them. For example, judges may direct court registrars to restrict access to court documents to the parties to a legal action. Though there is no legal backing for the restriction of access, there is a lack of understanding among some of the judiciary of the rights of persons to access information under the Freedom of Information Act.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

Under the rules of the Securities and Exchange Commission, publicly quoted companies must disclose to the Commission 'all information likely to affect the financial condition' of the company. There is also a requirement to disclose that information 'on the trading floor immediately the information is made available'. Therefore, if a settlement has been agreed with a publicly quoted company and it is 'likely to affect the financial condition' of the company, that must be disclosed to the Commission, which would then disclose it on the floor of the exchange.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

NITDA has been extremely active of late, having made frequent statements relating to the NDPR, and making promises to enforce it. The specifics of this remain to be seen, however. Given the broad range of entities that have obligations under the NDPR, it is likely that there will be a number of developments related to it.

General context, key principles and hot topics

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

The most relevant criminal investigations relate to Operation Car Wash, in which Brazilian construction companies are alleged to have bribed Peruvian public officials to have infrastructure work contracts awarded at inflated prices.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

Statute No. 30424 (the law regulating the administrative liability of corporation), in force as of 1 January 2018 and its Regulation, Supreme Decree No. 002-2019-JUS, establish the liability of corporations for collusion crimes, domestic and transnational bribery, influence peddling, money laundering and funding of terrorism. In this sense, if an individual linked to a corporation commits any of these crimes, either in the corporation's name or on behalf of it and to its benefit, whether direct or indirect, the company could be liable for the crime autonomously. However, if the company proves that, before the crime was committed, it had an effective compliance programme in place, it could expect immunity from sanctions or a reduced sanction.

1 Alberto Rebaza is managing partner, Augusto Loli, Héctor Gadea and María Haydée Zegarra are partners and Sergio Mattos is a senior associate at Rebaza, Alcázar & De Las Casas.

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

Regarding the autonomous liability of corporations foreseen in Statute No. 30424, the investigation will be carried out by a prosecutor, which requires the intervention of the Stock Market Superintendence to issue a technical report regarding the effectiveness of the compliance model of the company being investigated. In the event that the compliance model is not appropriate, the prosecutor could take the company to trial, where a criminal judge could impose sanctions.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

The Supreme Court has recently established that to initiate a preliminary investigation, only a 'simple initial suspicion' is required, which in turn constitutes 'the least intensive degree of suspicion'.

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

For these cases and others in which the investigated party considers that his or her rights are not being respected, or that he or she is being subjected to illegal requirements (e.g., fishing expeditions), a motion may be filed with the preliminary investigation judge, who may invalidate the subpoena or limit its scope.

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

Originally, the Code of Criminal Procedure only regulated effective co-operation for natural persons. Depending on the relevance of the information provided, a prosecutor may request a criminal judge to exonerate or reduce the sanction.

Statute No. 30737 (passed on 11 March 2018) modified the Code of Criminal Procedure and now companies are allowed to enter into co-operative agreements with the prosecutor. In exchange for providing relevant, verifiable and timely information to clarify the facts being investigated and to prosecute the natural persons involved, the companies may obtain an exemption or reduction of the sanction.

Likewise, the clemency proceeding established in Legislative Decree No. 1034 (Law of repression of anticompetitive behaviour, passed on 24 June 2008) allows those who violate the competition rules to be exonerated from an administrative sanction or to mitigate its magnitude if they provide evidence that helps to detect and prove the existence of collusion (i.e., a cartel) and to sanction the liable parties.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

Authorities focus their efforts on the investigation of emblematic corruption or money laundering, which, in some cases, involve the political and business elite. For example, former presidents, political parties that participated in the last presidential campaigns and construction companies and their directors, among others, are being investigated for the aforementioned crimes.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

The National Cybersecurity Policy of 2017 is applicable to public administration entities. The main aspects of this Policy are (1) to protect the information, data and state information infrastructure and the technology used for processing them from internal or external threats, whether deliberate or accidental, to ensure the confidentiality, integrity, availability, legality and reliability of the information, and (2) to ensure the implementation of legislative proposals and regulations relating to information security or cybersecurity.

Statute No. 30999 (Cyber defence law, passed on 26 August 2019) establishes the regulations framework on cyber defence of Peru, regulating the military operations in and through the cyberspace executed by bodies that are part of the Ministry of Defence within their scope of competence. The purpose of this regulation is to defend and protect the sovereignty, national interests, national critical assets and key resources to maintain the nation's capacity to face threats or attacks in and through cyberspace insofar as they affect national security.

Since it is a very recent law, there is still no case law.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

Statute No. 30096 (Law of Computer Crimes, passed on 21 October 2013) sanctions behaviour such as illegal access and attacks on the integrity of computer systems (hacking), propositions with sexual purposes to underage children through technological means, computer fraud, among others.

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

Article 2 of the Criminal Code establishes a general rule that Peruvian law applies to a crime committed abroad, when:

- the person committing the crime is a Peruvian public official or servant fulfilling the duties of his or her office;
- public security or tranquillity are attacked, or the incident involves money laundering, provided the effects of the incident occur in Peru;
- the act or behaviour offends the Peruvian state and national defence, the powers of the state and the constitutional order, or the monetary order;
- the act or behaviour is committed against a Peruvian or by a Peruvian and the crime is foreseen as susceptible to extradition pursuant to Peruvian law, provided it is also punishable in the state where it was committed and the agent enters Peru in any way; or
- Peru is obliged to repress such behaviour according to international treaties.

In turn, Article 397-A of the Peruvian Criminal Code sanctions those who offer, grant or promote, directly or indirectly, bribery to foreign officials in exchange for obtaining a particular advantage for himself or herself or for others within the framework of international economic or trade activities (transnational bribery).

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

In such investigations, one of the main challenges is the time it takes to process the official communications with the authorities of other countries; for example, for international judicial assistance. However, in respect of the emblematic cases, such as Operation Car Wash, the delay in replies and effective assistance by foreign authorities has been considerably reduced.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

Under the protection of Article 6(c) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the non bis in idem principle or res judicata is applicable if there is the intention of criminally investigating a company in Peru for deeds that have previously been subjected to a final decision by a foreign authority against the same company.

If a company is being investigated both administratively and criminally for the same deeds and on the same grounds, by virtue of Article III of the Preliminary Title of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the criminal jurisdiction prevails over the administrative one. Other than this, there is no institution that is analogous to the US 'anti-piling on' policy.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

There is no record any global settlement, neither is there a specific regulation of the matter.

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

Matters investigated in another country that could have an effect in Peru can be considered as evidence to initiate a criminal investigation. Likewise, the authorities may initiate a judicial co-operation agreement with foreign authorities to share relevant information and evidence. For example, this is happening in Operation Car Wash with the information provided by the Brazilian authorities.

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

The Peruvian government has not imposed economic sanctions against foreign countries, governments, entities or people who may represent a threat to the interests of Peru or of the international community.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

Peru has not applied any economic sanctions.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

Not applicable.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

There is no blocking legislation in Peru.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

There is no blocking legislation in Peru.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

Misconduct usually arises through media reports, internal audits and, in those companies supervised by the financial intelligence unit (companies within the financial system, mining activity, construction, etc.), through reports of suspicious operations of money laundering to the regulator.

Information gathering

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

Statute No. 29733 (Law of Personal Data Protection, passed on 2 July 2011) and its Regulation, Supreme Decree No. 003-2013-JUS, have as a purpose to guarantee the fundamental right of protection of privacy. Regarding companies, they are expected to provide appropriate treatment of the personal data of their clients, workers and other natural persons related to their activity.

The titleholder of the personal data has the rights of information, updating, inclusion, correction, suppression, opposition, objective treatment, protection and of being indemnified. The National Authority for the Protection of Personal Data may sanction a company if it proves that it made any inappropriate use of the personal data.

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

The Peruvian Data Protection Authority has been issuing fines for non-compliance with the rules on personal data protection since 2015. The organisations that have been fined are of different types, including clinics, universities, banks and public entities. As an example, Google Inc was sanctioned in 2016 with a fine of up to 256,750 Peruvian soles.

It is important to bear in mind that Peruvian data privacy rules are applicable not only to natural persons or legal entities established in Peru, but also to those using media located in Peruvian territory.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

In the event that an internal investigation entails sharing information with peers located abroad (for example, a parent company or law firm), the cross-border flow of information must be duly communicated to the national authority and comply with the legal provisions.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

Although there is no rule that specifically regulates the control of work tools (email, cell phones, etc.) by an employer, Article 2.10 of the Constitution establishes that every person has the right to secrecy and to the inviolability of communications and private documents.

The Constitutional Tribunal (Docket Nos. 114-2011-PA/TA, 3599-2010-PA/TC and 05532-2014-PA/TC) and the Supreme Court (Cassation No. 14614-2016-LIMA) have established, from a labour point of view, that an employer is forbidden to inspect the use of corporate email assigned to its employees, unless it has the express authorisation of the employees every time the employer wants to log in to view the email. Thus, a general waiver signed by an employee when joining the company will not be sufficient.

However, in the criminal sphere (Nullity Appeal No. 817-2016/Lima), the Supreme Court established that if there is a high probability that corporate email has been used to exchange communications with criminal content, it is not illegal or unconstitutional for the employer to inspect its employees' email for the purposes of a criminal claim. A prosecutor may subsequently use the email as admissible evidence in a criminal procedure.

Dawn raids and search warrants

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

Search warrants are used frequently by Prosecutors, particularly in emblematic investigations for corruption or money laundering crimes, such as Operation Car Wash.

According to Article 214° of the Code of Criminal Procedure, a search can be carried out when there are reasonable reasons to consider that evidence may be found inside the premises subject to the search. Authorisation by a judge is required.

Both the search and the seizure of documents must be limited to what has been authorised by the judge. There is a possibility of controlling a warrant dictated by a judge through an appeal in which the pertinence, proportionality and reasonableness of the measure are discussed. However, even if the search is considered legal, the judge can be asked to exclude privileged material and any documents not related to the investigation.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

Privileged material cannot be seized during a search ordered by a judge and carried by a prosecutor. In this sense, it is recommended that all materials or reports of this nature be labelled as 'protected under professional secrecy', in accordance with the procedure established in Article 2.18° of the Constitution, Article 30° of the Attorney's Code of Ethics and Article 165° of the Criminal Code. Moreover, the presence of an external lawyer is recommended during a search to enforce privilege over documents having such a condition. The Supreme Court has ruled that 'the right to the professional secrecy must prevail over the right to obtain evidence' (Cassation No. 272-2016-Tacna, fj. 13).

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

As investigated parties, people are not compelled to testify. They have the right to remain silent, and silence cannot be treated negatively. As witnesses, however, people are compelled to testify. Nevertheless, there is the possibility of opposing the testimony when some specific circumstances apply, such as the fact that questions may refer to the witness's own criminal liability, that the investigated party is a close relative or that the questioning is about some type of professional secrecy or state secret.

Moreover, investigated parties are not compelled to collaborate with their own prosecution.

Whistleblowing and employee rights

28 Describe the whistleblowing framework in your country. What financial incentive schemes exist for whistleblowers? What legal protections are in place for whistleblowers?

There are no specific financial incentives for whistleblowers in criminal procedures. However, Article 39° of the Regulation of Statute No. 30424 establishes that companies must adopt protection measures to avoid retaliation against the people that use a whistleblowing channel.

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

During the process of an internal investigation, 'non-specific labour rights' are applicable. This relates to actions, the legal entitlement – and enforceability – of which goes beyond the standard entitlements of workers (as set forth in the Constitution), such as presumption of innocence, due process, right of defence, right to intimacy, right to secrecy and inviolability of communications, among others.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

All employees have the same rights during the term of the work contract. During an investigation, the employer cannot adopt any type of preventive measure (for example, suspension of the contract), unless he or she has the employee's consent. The only exception to this rule is foreseen for cases of sexual harassment, in which the employer is entitled to suspend – or transfer to another workplace – the alleged harasser to protect the victim.

Without prejudice to the foregoing, in practice employers usually grant paid leave unilaterally to the employees involved in an investigation. Notwithstanding, this practice could be questioned alleging an affectation to the right to 'effective occupation'.

Finally, the employer may adopt disciplinary measures when he or she indubitably verifies that an employee has engaged in labour misconduct or irregularity. In the event a dismissal proceeding is initiated, the employee must be notified in a letter detailing the facts that constitute the serious offence that may lead to his or her dismissal.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

As a general rule, an employee's participation in an investigation should be voluntary or consented.

However, the seriousness of the investigated deeds and their relation to the position of the employee could mean a failure to comply with the labour obligations in the event that he or she refused to collaborate during an investigation process. In such a situation, we consider that this would constitute an assumption of violation of the labour good faith. In this situation, the employer may impose reasonable and proportionate disciplinary measures (warnings, suspensions or even dismissal).

Commencing an internal investigation

32 Is it common practice in your country to prepare a document setting out terms of reference or investigatory scope before commencing an internal investigation? What issues would it cover?

It is not a common practice. However, it is recommended that at the commencement of each internal investigation, a document be prepared defining its objectives and scope. Likewise, among other aspects to prioritise, the hypothesis of the investigation, the team in charge of the investigation and the means of proof to be used should be defined, as well as the fact that, owing to the nature or complexity of the investigated deeds, external advice will be required, both legal and regarding public relations.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

There is no legal obligation for companies to report dishonest behaviour that has occurred. However, once an internal investigation has commenced, the company must try to remedy or compensate the damage caused, identify and correct any internal proceeding the failure of which originated the dishonest behaviour, particularly any action relating to the compliance model. Likewise, according to Article 38° of the Regulation of Statute No. 30424, the internal investigation and subsequent self-reporting could be taken as a sign of an effective compliance model and, therefore, could release the company from liability.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

It is advisable for the company to have a protocol to address such requests satisfactorily and in which the following steps are established:

- Identification of the actions that have brought about the authority's request, in collaboration with the company's legal department or external legal advisers.
- Verification of the validity of the authority's request, that is to say it is not violating any fundamental right such as due process, professional secrecy or protection of personal data.
- Informing the competent authority if the information is in the hands of third parties or if it requires a third party's authorisation to be submitted.
- A detailed review of the information, prior to submission, to identify any legal contingency that could arise from it.
- Designing a defence strategy, both from a legal and a communication point of view, to mitigate the contingencies that could be generated by the submission of information.
- If, as a result of receiving a notice or subpoena, a company becomes aware of any dishonest behaviour within the company, an internal investigation must be commenced to establish its scope.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

There is no obligation to publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation. However, at the moment of deciding whether to disclose this information, companies must take into consideration the following factors:

- the degree of probability that the prosecutor or another authority becomes aware of the facts that are the subject matter of the investigation;
- the existence of an internal investigation may demonstrate to the authorities that the company itself, through its compliance model, identified, investigated and sanctioned dishonest behaviour; and
- by collaborating with the authorities in providing relevant information that allows clarification of the criminal deed, the company could be applying for an attenuation or exemption of the sanction.

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

Spontaneous internal investigation for suspicion of criminal wrongdoings is a tool that has only recently been available within the Peruvian corporate environment. There is still no case law about its real worth to the authorities. However, any form, or sign, of collaboration with the investigation is always well received by prosecutors.

Attorney–client privilege

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

Although there is no specific regulation in Peru, the attorney–client privilege could be claimed over the findings of an internal investigation in which an external attorney directly participated. In this sense, it is advisable that the instrument or document that initiates the investigation identifies the external attorneys who will participate and that their intervention is documented, for example, during the interviews and in the communications exchanged by the team in charge of the inquiry.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

According to the Code of Ethics of the Peruvian Bar Association, there is no distinction in the treatment of the attorney with the client when the latter is a natural person or corporation. In this sense, the scope of the attorney–client privilege is the same for both.

Likewise, in the framework of an internal investigation, to avoid the lawfulness of the gathered information or the scope of the attorney–client privilege being questioned, it is advisable to inform the parties at each stage of the investigation that the external attorney only represents the interests of the company; thus, the privilege will be between the attorney and the company and not between the attorney and the employee being interviewed.

The holder of the privilege is the client.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

Although there is no specific regulation in Peru, based on the guidelines adopted by foreign courts (for example, in the European Court of Justice Akzo Nobel Chemicals Ltd case), a sector of Peruvian specialists considers that the attorney–client privilege only applies when external attorneys are involved.

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

To the extent that the waiver to the privilege corresponds to the client, it would apply equally to the advice provided by both national and foreign external attorneys regarding an investigation carried out in Peru.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

In the framework of an effective collaboration, if a company wants to obtain a benefit that, in the best-case scenario, exempts it from liability, it is advisable to waive the attorney–client privilege, if necessary, to provide all the information required by the authorities. Waiver of this privilege is always voluntary.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

There is no specific regulation in Peru. However, a company could waive privilege before the prosecutor and maintain privilege before third parties denying the production of the same information. However, law enforcement may share the information waived to other government agencies.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

The attorney–client privilege can be maintained in Peru after a limited waiver in another country. However, the information disclosed in another country may be shared with Peruvian authorities through international co-operation.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

This concept does exist in Peru. If there are no conflicts of interest, the same attorney may represent several clients in the same criminal procedure.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

The attorney–client privilege extends to those who assist external attorneys, such as experts, accountants and translators, among others.

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

Yes.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

Yes (see also question 39). In turn, it is advisable that at each stage of an internal investigation, the external attorney announces that his or her intervention is on behalf of the company and not as an attorney of any internal witness.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

The parameters of the interviews within an internal investigation are not regulated in Peru. However, to avoid the admissibility of the gathered evidence being questioned in the event the company decides to share it with the competent authority, it is advisable to inform the employee or third party before starting the interview that the attorney–client privilege applies to the company and not the employee or third party.

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

Although there is no predetermined protocol for conducting interviews, it is common that an attorney participates in them as a representative of the company. Likewise, minutes are usually written, transcribing part of the information provided. This document is signed by the interviewed employee as a declaration that it conforms with what was said.

It is not common that employees have their own legal representation during interviews. However, if an employee does request the attendance of a lawyer, the employer should agree to the request to prevent the employee from alleging any coercion in making his or her statement.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

There is no legal obligation for companies to report misconduct to the authorities.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

Self-reporting is advisable when it is probable that the company may obtain a benefit in exchange for the information it provides and that the prosecutor may find out about the wrongdoing by other means. Self-reporting will be considered as evidence that the compliance programme of the company was efficient and the company could receive a reduced penalty or even an exemption from a penalty. If the decision to self-report has been made in Peru, it is advisable also to make the self-report in other countries that have jurisdiction to prosecute the crimes.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

There is no express regulation on how to self-report. It is advisable that an external attorney seeks an interview with the prosecutor order to establish his or her interest in the matter. However, it is also advisable to delay arranging such an interview until after an internal investigation has established the actual scope of the misconduct, the persons involved and the legal, financial and reputational contingencies that could be activated.

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

How a company should respond to a notice or subpoena will depend on the conditions under which it has been served. If the company is included as a defendant in an investigation, it is recommended that its attorneys review the case file held by the authorities before providing any kind of statement or information. However, if a company has been called only as a witness, its lawyers do not have the right to review the case file. Nevertheless, the company representative who has been called as a witness does have the constitutional right to be advised by an attorney during his or her testimony before the authorities.

In-house or external lawyers may have interviews with prosecutors to address their concerns, such as to clarify the scope of the subpoena and the deadline to comply with.

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

Motions challenging investigations may be filed when the investigated deeds lack any criminal nature or when fundamental rights are violated, such as due process, the right to produce evidence, etc.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

Companies should address the local subpoena to the full extent regardless of the existence of a foreign subpoena. Local law enforcement authorities will not take into account the subpoenas issued by foreign authorities in making any alterations to the scope of their inquiry and will expect compliance with the local request. Therefore, companies should verify that the information provided to the different authorities, both domestic and foreign, is not contradictory.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

The general rule is that the company must comply with the subpoena. However, if the scope is unreasonable or the costs to produce the material are prohibitive, a motion may be filed to the competent judge (see question 5).

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

Lately there has been an increase in law enforcement co-operation with other countries as a result of Operation Car Wash. The Code of Criminal Procedure regulates the formalities that must be observed.

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

A prosecutor's investigation is confidential. Only the investigated parties and the attorneys of the alleged victims may have access to it (note that in corruption or money laundering cases, the victim is represented by the state attorney). If the case reaches trial, which is public, the information may be disclosed.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

A legal report from counsel in the foreign country should be obtained, explaining that the information may not be produced.

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

There are some sectors in which statutes of secrecy exist, such as banking, tax reports and communications. In the event that a foreign state requires this type of information, it must obtain an order from a Peruvian judge.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

The confidentiality of the information or documentation provided to the authorities need only be maintained during the investigation phase. The information may be revealed at trial. Further, foreign regulators may seek the information produced through international co-operation channels.

Prosecution and penalties

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

The sanctions to companies imposed by a criminal judge are fines, temporary suspension of activities, cancellation of licences, debarments and, when they have been incorporated and operated just to commit crimes, the dissolution of the company. A monitor can be appointed for up to two years. The natural persons, public and private officers can be sanctioned with imprisonment, fines and disgorgement. All this without prejudice to repairing the generated damages that must be jointly and severally assumed by the natural persons and the company.

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

Peruvian courts have no jurisdiction to avoid companies resettling in another country. However, information about local wrongdoing may be shared to foreign authorities through international co-operation to enable suspensions or debarments.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

A judge will take into account the benefit the company has obtained or expects to obtain from committing the crime when imposing a fine, which is usually between twice and six times the amount of the benefit. If the benefit cannot be determined, the company's annual income will be taken into account by the judge to fix the fine.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

Yes. For this purpose, the company must admit committing the crime, provide evidence against third parties – usually public officers – and remediate. In exchange, the companies could obtain exonerations or reduced sanctions. If it is found that the companies hid information or did not fully collaborate, the agreement can be reverted and the criminal proceedings may continue.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

The effective collaboration agreements are ruled precisely by secrecy from the beginning to the end of the investigation. The other investigated parties do not know the identity of the collaborator.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

The company should weigh the collateral effects of confessing to committing a crime, such as reputational and financial damage. Likewise, the company should take into account that its collaboration may result in members or former members of the company being sentenced to imprisonment.

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

Since January 2018, external monitors may be imposed for up to two years as a sanction by a judge. However, such a measure has not been enforced to date.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

Private actions parallel to the criminal proceeding are allowed, as is a proceeding for reparation or indemnification for damages. However, if the injured party so desires it, that party can take on a civil action in the criminal proceeding and request civil reparation in the same criminal proceeding. In these circumstances, the party injured by the crime will have access to all the evidence in the criminal proceeding.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

The Code of Criminal Procedure establishes the prohibition of publishing the procedural actions during a prosecution investigation. However, the trial is public. There are certain exceptions, including when the sexual morality, the private life or the physical integrity of someone participating in the trial is affected, when national security is affected, or when a particular commercial or industrial secret is threatened.

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

There is no general rule, and our recommendations will vary depending on the assessment of each case. Having said that, if the client is a large corporation and is facing a severe crisis related to a criminal investigation, we always advise hiring a public relations agency, which should work alongside the lawyers to assess both the accuracy and the strategic effects of the information provided to stakeholders and of public opinion. Further, the company's strategy should aim to stop the spread of news relating to any criminal contingency.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

Publicity depends on the degree of media coverage, or on the role of the company or the individual in society. The statements of a company under investigation must be short and not lead to speculation.

In Peru, confidential information about an investigation is usually leaked to the media when there is a case of public interest.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

It could be mandatory if the company in which the settlement has been agreed is a listed company and if the settlement, or the settled issue, is capable of having significant influence on the security of the company, its business, its financial situation or any other aspect that could be considered relevant by a reasonable investor, or that could alter the decision to sell, purchase or keep securities for a reasonable investor. If deemed mandatory, a reserved report could be made, thus the company will report the settlement to the regulator only. However, authorisation for such a report is at the regulator's discretion. Hence, if granted, full disclosure will not be required until approval of the settlement by the judge.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

The Stock Market Superintendence has scheduled the publication of guidelines to clarify what they expect from effective compliance models.

General context, key principles and hot topics

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

The most recent high-profile corporate investigation relates to corruption in the information technology (IT) sector. The National Anticorruption Directorate (DNA) alleges that the general manager of the local branch of a leading global IT company received a €870,000 bribe from the representatives of partner IT companies in exchange for better offers for company products (mainly IT licences). According to the DNA, the partner companies used these special offers to win in public tenders.

In another high-profile matter, four directors of a leading Austrian company operating in the wood processing industry are currently being investigated by the Directorate for Investigating Organised Crime and Terrorism (DIICOT) in connection with alleged organised crime, bid rigging, tax evasion and illegal logging that caused €25 million in damage.

The healthcare sector is still making headlines, as one of the largest network of private clinics in Romania is being investigated for allegedly claiming amounts from the National House of Health Insurance for medical services already paid for by the patients.

Prosecutors have also targeted the insurance sector. One of the largest current investigations involves a leading Austrian insurance group, its executive board and 87 individuals in connection with alleged tax evasion (amounting to €6 million) relating to surrendering life insurance policies open on employees' names and paying the insurance premiums directly into the employees' accounts each month.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

Article 135 of the Romanian Criminal Code provides the conditions for criminal liability of legal entities. It very broadly states that corporations (other than state and public authorities) can be held criminally liable for crimes committed in furtherance of the company's scope of business, for its benefit or in its name – irrespective of the acting capacity of the individuals committing the offence. The scope of individuals who may trigger criminal liability of a company is therefore very broad – it includes: legal representatives (e.g., a director or manager), employees, agents and even third parties who commit a criminal offence for the benefit or in the name of the company.

In practice, to trigger a company's criminal liability, prosecutors focus on proving that the company either benefited from the criminal activity of the individual perpetrating the offence or that the conduct was performed by the individual within the scope of his or her services for the company (by way of an employment contract, services contract or otherwise).

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

Public prosecution offices are responsible for investigating and prosecuting crimes in Romania – there is not a specialised team focused on corporate crimes. A prosecutor is competent to investigate and prosecute a criminal offence within the jurisdiction of the court to which it is attached.

Romania also has specialist enforcement institutions, such as DIICOT and the DNA, which have exclusive jurisdiction over certain types of crimes.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

Law enforcement authorities can initiate investigations based on any of the following: a complaint by a prejudiced party; self-reporting by a person with knowledge about an offence; a report by a person with a management or other control function of a public institution; the prosecution office's initiative, on the basis of data available to it; or the commission of an offence being observed.

Although there is no specific threshold of suspicion required to trigger an investigation into the facts of a matter, in practice, prosecutors will launch an investigation if they can identify direct or indirect evidence that gives rise to a suspicion that a crime has been committed.

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

A company can challenge a subpoena or orders for production of documents before the relevant chief prosecutor or court. Prosecutors are generally given wide discretion to conduct investigations and, in practice, subpoenas are upheld. However, a warrant to search premises and seize assets cannot be challenged effectively before it is implemented.

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

No. Individuals who report on others and help the authorities to trigger their criminal liability receive a statutorily provided reduction (by half) of the punishment limits for the charged crime.

In addition, there is a limited number of crimes for which the perpetrator (1) is granted immunity if he or she reports the crime before the law enforcement authorities are notified (e.g., giving a bribe or buying influence) or (2) benefits from leniency (e.g., setting up a criminal organised group, if the perpetrator helps to identify other members of the group).

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

In recent years, Romanian law enforcement authorities have prioritised the targeting of high-level corruption cases, EU funds fraud, tax fraud and money laundering. A notable record of success was achieved in conducting investigations into allegations of corruption at the highest levels of the government, the judiciary and across the IT, energy, infrastructure, real estate and healthcare sectors.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

Romania has implemented Directive (EU) 2016/1148 concerning measures for a high common level of security of network and information systems (the NIS Directive) through Law No. 362/2018.

The law requires operators of essential services and providers of digital services to have adequate security measures and to report serious incidents to the competent national authority, CERT-RO. Failure to comply may result in a fine ranging from 3,000 Romanian lei to 5 per cent of the turnover for the previous year. Given the recent enactment of the law, the approach by law enforcement authorities is not yet known.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

The Romanian Criminal Code has a dedicated chapter on cybercrime, which covers crimes such as illegal access to a computer system and illegal interception of computer data transmission. Computer-related fraud and forgery are also provided in different chapters.

DIICOT handles most cybercrime allegations. In 2018, DIICOT successfully indicted several individuals for cybercrimes related to ransomware attacks and man-in-the-browser/man-in-the middle threats.

Some of these indictments relied on co-operation with similar agencies in other countries, as Romania is part of the Council of Europe's Convention on Cybercrime, the only binding international instrument on this issue.

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

In general, Romanian criminal law applies to offences committed on Romanian territory. However, in certain situations (e.g., when the punishment limits for the alleged crime exceed 10 years' imprisonment), the Romanian Criminal Code will apply to a Romanian citizen or Romanian legal entity that commits a crime abroad (unless an applicable international treaty states otherwise).

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

The principal challenges that arise in cross-border investigations are difficulties in coordinating the investigation efforts across cultures and in communicating effectively in different languages; differences in laws regarding attorney–client privilege, employee rights and data protection laws across various countries; and differences in attitudes and approaches of law enforcement authorities.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

The principle of double jeopardy applies in Romania and a corporation cannot be tried for the same or a similar crime based on the same conduct and facts, regardless of whether the initial trial occurred in Romania. However, the Romanian Criminal Procedure Code provides that cases can be revised when new evidence later comes to light that proves the previous outcome of the case was not substantiated.

Romania does not have a law similar to the US 'anti-piling on' policy, but some of the guiding principles – offsetting of fines and requiring co-operation as a prerequisite – are used in practice.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

Global settlements do not occur in Romania; however, at sentencing, the national authorities may take into account any sanctions imposed on companies by their foreign counterparts.

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

The influence that foreign decisions have on Romanian investigations is determined largely by applicable bilateral treaties and legislation on the provision and receiving of judicial assistance between Romania and the country in question.

Romanian authorities exercise their freedom to investigate matters within their jurisdiction and have discretion in how they view foreign decisions; they also endeavour to co-operate with foreign authorities.

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

As a Member State of the European Union, Romania enforces the sanctions imposed through Common Positions adopted within the Common Foreign and Security Policy. The sanctions include asset freezing, prohibition on making funds available, prohibition on certain financial actions, restrictions on services, restrictions on goods, and prohibition on arms procurement.

Recently, the European Union extended the economic sanctions targeting specific sectors of the Russian economy until 31 January 2020. Separate sanctions banning the European Union from doing businesses in Crimea have also been renewed for another year.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

Romania's tax authority, the National Agency for Fiscal Administration (ANAF), is responsible for issuing blocking orders and effectively blocking funds belonging to or under the control of persons subject to international sanctions. In recent years, the number of international sanctions enforced by ANAF has been very low.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

Romania authorities co-operate with their counterparts in other countries (especially other EU Member States) by exchanging data and information relevant for the purposes of enforcement.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

The EU Blocking Regulation is directly applicable in Romania and prohibits EU operators from complying with US extraterritorial sanctions and assures them that such sanctions will not be enforced in EU courts. The regulation allows EU operators to request an authorisation to comply with the targeted US laws, if the operator can demonstrate that serious damage would be caused to it or the European Union unless the applicant is allowed to comply.

The Regulation itself does not provide any penalties for the breach of its requirements. However, Member States are obliged to determine the sanctions to be imposed in the event of a breach of any relevant provision of the regulation. According to Romanian law, failure to observe the restrictions and obligations provided by EU regulations results in a fine ranging from 10,000 to 30,000 Romanian lei and confiscation of assets.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

Romanian incorporated companies face a difficult decision, considering that the US extraterritorial sanctions and the EU Blocking Regulation are now directly conflicted.

Obtaining authorisation to comply with the US extraterritorial sanctions can be difficult, and a company would need to prove that it has suffered 'serious damage', which is not defined by the EU Blocking Regulation and leads to the authorisations being granted in an arbitrary manner.

If the authorisation is not granted, the relevant authorities could be alerted about the applicant's intention to do business in breach of the EU Blocking Regulation.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

Internal investigations are triggered by information from various sources, such as whistleblowers, employees, internal audits, lawsuits, business partners, media reports, as well as from the prosecutor or other government authority. Audits commenced by the Romanian tax authority could bring to light wrongdoing that could create the need to investigate. Corporations must treat any allegations of misconduct very seriously.

Romanian law obliges persons who carry out control duties within a corporation to report suspected wrongdoing to the enforcement authorities. Corporations will want to conduct investigations to make an informed decision prior to self-reporting the matter to the enforcement authorities.

Information gathering

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

The EU General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) entered into force in all EU Member States on 25 May 2018. The GDPR has a broader scope than the former Romanian legislation and seeks to protect the personal data of all natural persons in the European Union, regardless of the geographical location of the data controller.

The GDPR is directly enforceable in Romania, without any national legislation being required. However, a law implementing the GDPR was adopted in late July 2018. This law maintains the main provisions of the GDPR but also sets forth special rules concerning the processing of genetic data, biometric data, data concerning individuals' health, national identification numbers and data concerning work relations.

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

The GDPR emphasises mandatory reporting obligations that require data controllers to self-report personal data breaches that may risk the rights and freedom of natural persons. In the event of a GDPR infringement, the Romanian Data Protection Authority (RDPA) can issue a reprimand or impose a fine. Under the GDPR, fines depend on the severity of the infringement; fines for minor infringements can be up to €10 million or 2 per cent of annual global turnover, while fines for significant infringements can be up to €20 million or 4 per cent of annual global turnover.

To date, the RDPA has imposed only four fines for infringement of GDPR provisions. The biggest of these (€130,000) was applied recently to a multinational bank for failure to apply appropriate technical and organisational measures to effectively implement data protection principles, such as minimising data and integrating processing safeguards.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

There are circumstances that arise in which a company cannot process or transfer the personal data of an individual because it requires, but does not have, the consent of an individual. In most cases, lack of consent would not prevent disclosure of information to the law enforcement authority, given that the grounds for disclosure would be the need to comply with a legal obligation.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

Under Romanian law, interception of employees' communications is permitted if the following requirements are met:

- the employer's legitimate interests are justified and prevail over the targeted persons' interests or rights and liberties;
- the employees were informed accordingly;
- the employer consulted the labour union or the employees' representatives prior to introducing the interception system;
- other less intruding methods did not prove effective; and
- the storage period of the data does not exceed 30 days if there is no legal provision that allows this storage or when there are no justifying cases.

Dawn raids and search warrants

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

During a criminal investigation, a search warrant may only be issued by a special judge upon the prosecutor's request; during trial, a search warrant may be issued by the court, ex officio or upon the prosecutor's request. Search warrants must be executed within 15 days and can only be used once.

Dawn raids can be performed between 6am and 8pm, except for acts in flagrante delicto or when the dawn raid is being performed in a location that is open to the public outside these hours (e.g., bars and clubs).

The company being raided must be provided with the search warrant and informed that it has the right to be assisted by a lawyer. If the presence of a lawyer is requested, the dawn raid shall be delayed until the lawyer arrives on site, but not by more than two hours from the time the company has been informed of its right to be assisted.

Only objects, documents, correspondence and evidence relating to the offence being investigated can be seized; the correspondence between suspects or defendants and their legal counsel is subject to legal privilege and cannot be seized or searched by authorities.

If a search warrant or dawn raid violates legal requirements, any evidence seized may be deemed inadmissible in criminal proceedings and companies should seek to have it excluded. Court decisions based on unlawfully obtained evidence can be overturned. Assistance during a dawn raid by external legal counsel proves extremely useful in ensuring that the prosecutors do not seize documents or assets unrelated to the investigation or that breach privilege.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

In 2016, the Lawyers' Law clarified the rules surrounding legal privilege and specified that, as far as external counsel is concerned:

- documents that include attorney–client communications or attorney notes regarding matters relating to the defence of a client cannot be viewed, taken, seized or confiscated by prosecutors; and
- attorney–client communications can only be obtained if they have been created in furtherance of an illegal or improper purpose or relate to the promotion of an illegal act such as money laundering, terrorism, drug trafficking or various other corruption crimes.

Invoking privilege is crucial in dawn raids. It is important that companies are trained in recognising documents that are subject to legal privilege and in effectively opposing attempts by the investigating authorities to access these materials. For this reason, having external counsel on the ground during a dawn raid is recommended.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

Witnesses may avoid an obligation to testify in certain situations, such as when they have a family relationship with the defendant or suspect, or when medical, legal or religious circumstances give rise to confidentiality. Otherwise, during Romanian criminal proceedings, a suspect or a witness can be compelled to testify with a bench warrant. If a witness's or a defendant's answer could give rise to self-incrimination, he or she has a right to silence. Witnesses can be criminally charged with perjury if they make false statements in their testimony.

Whistleblowing and employee rights

28 Describe the whistleblowing framework in your country. What financial incentive schemes exist for whistleblowers? What legal protections are in place for whistleblowers?

Although whistleblowing in the private sector is not broadly regulated, whistleblowing in the public sector is. The law protects individuals who report a breach of law committed within a public authority or state-owned company. Reporting misconduct cannot trigger disciplinary misconduct against the employee, except when the reporting is purely vexatious or in bad faith. Financial incentive schemes for whistleblowers do not exist under Romanian law.

Under the public sector legislation, a whistleblower may report misconduct relating to a defined list of crimes, including corruption and assimilated offences, offences against the financial interests of the European Union, discriminatory treatment or practices, public procurement and non-reimbursable financing.

Whistleblowers in the public sector benefit from a presumption of good faith. Upon request from a whistleblower subject to a disciplinary investigation, the authority or entity must invite the press or broadcast media and a representative of the union to the disciplinary hearing. Any sanction imposed against a good-faith whistleblower in the public sector is likely to be overturned.

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

During a disciplinary investigation, employees are entitled to:

- written notice of the allegations against them before the disciplinary hearing (the notice must provide sufficient information to enable the employees to prepare a proper defence);
- 'reasonable time' between the receipt of the notice and any hearing, to prepare a defence; and
- be informed of (and exercise) the right to defend themselves and to seek assistance, either from a lawyer, or from the trade union of which the employee is a member.

At disciplinary investigations, employees may raise all arguments and provide all evidence that they wish to bring in defence. If a disciplinary hearing is held without such prior information on the scope of the allegations being investigated, and a disciplinary sanction is applied, the sanction can be overturned in court.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

When allegations of misconduct against an employee (including officers and directors, if retained under an employment agreement) are made, employers may start an investigation into the alleged misconduct.

Employers have discretion to investigate and sanction a particular case of misconduct (including where such misconduct may constitute a criminal offence).

A company cannot take any action (except for issuing a written warning) against an employee suspected of misconduct until it has conducted an internal investigation. In certain situations, employees suspected of criminal conduct may have their employment suspended, including remuneration, until a final decision is rendered in the criminal file.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

If the investigation establishes that the employee has violated a law or internal regulation, the company may impose on the employee any sanctions permitted by law or internal regulations, including dismissal, issuing a warning or demotion.

To the extent that an employee refuses to participate in an investigation relating to another employee, if the first employee has knowledge or holds evidence that is crucial to the investigation, that employee may be subject to disciplinary measures. It is unlikely, though, that an employee's refusal to participate in the disciplinary investigation of another employee would represent sufficient grounds for dismissal.

Commencing an internal investigation

32 Is it common practice in your country to prepare a document setting out terms of reference or investigatory scope before commencing an internal investigation? What issues would it cover?

The best practice for commencing an internal investigation is to prepare a plan establishing the scope, approach, responsibilities and steps relating to communication and disclosure, preservation of evidence, and securing witness testimony while information is still fresh in the minds of the various participants in or witnesses to the alleged misconduct. The preparation and execution of this plan are essential for a successful investigation in a manner that allows the company to argue an efficient and consistent corporate culture of compliance within the investigation, while limiting exposure and mitigating the potential risks of a formal investigation.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

In some situations, companies and individuals must report crimes, and potential crimes, to the police. For instance, any person holding a managerial position (or an oversight authority) within a public authority or entity that, in the exercise of his or her responsibilities, has acquired knowledge of the commission of a criminal offence that warrants a criminal investigation, must immediately refer the matter to the relevant criminal investigation body.

This obligation also applies to any person mandated by public authorities to perform (or oversee) a public-interest service who has, in exercising his or her responsibilities, acquired knowledge of the commission of a crime. In general, all individuals must immediately report knowledge of any offence against human life.

Additionally, persons with control functions prescribed by law must notify enforcement authorities if they become aware of information relating to potential corruption or corruption-assimilated offences. Failure to comply with these obligations is in itself a criminal offence and could result in prosecution.

Companies are not legally required to take internal steps, other than in circumstances that give rise to mandatory reporting. It is, however, both prudent and ethical to undertake steps to ensure that the offending behaviour ceases, any evidence relating to the offending behaviour is retained and protected, and future misconduct of that kind is prevented. This helps to build a culture of compliance, and may assist the company – in a future formal investigation – to argue that it has implemented and enforced appropriate mechanisms to curb illegal conduct within the company.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

Upon receipt of a subpoena, the company should immediately alert its internal compliance and central management representatives and seek legal advice from external counsel. Measures to preserve all relevant documentation and data must be taken immediately. External counsel will assist the company to minimise risks and determine the most appropriate strategy for responding to the subpoena.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

Romanian law does not oblige companies to disclose the existence of an internal investigation or any contact from law enforcement agencies. Depending on the type of investigation conducted, proactive behaviour may be recommended to prevent reputational backlash arising from a press release by the investigating authority (the DNA, for example, regularly publishes reports on investigations that have started, especially if they involve high-profile cases or persons).

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

Enforcement bodies view internal investigations positively; however, due care must be taken in performing an internal investigation to ensure that it does not interfere with a prosecution investigation. Internal investigations are also a sign of a healthy corporate culture.

Sometimes, internal investigations may validate a company's position that it was unaware of, did not condone, or did not permit the conduct in question. Further, some EU doctrine provides for the mitigation of corporate liability and sanctions if an internal investigation exposes the commission of a criminal offence and allows a corporation to improve and optimise its corporate compliance programme to prevent similar offences from occurring.

Attorney–client privilege

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

Documents, information and data of any type and format are protected by attorney–client privilege when they:

- are deemed by the client to be confidential and are provided to the lawyer for the purposes of the legal advice sought;
- were created or issued by the lawyer in relation to the legal advice sought by the client; or

- are communications or correspondence between a client and lawyer (or a lawyer and another lawyer also bound by confidentiality) relating to the legal advice sought by the client, or consist of notes or comments taken or prepared by the lawyer on the basis of information relating to a particular case.

To protect the privilege and confidentiality of an internal investigation, companies should retain an external lawyer to coordinate and execute the investigation, and ensure that retention is explicit in a written agreement and registered in the lawyer's registry of contacts.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

Legal privilege protects confidential communication between a lawyer and client, if the communications relate to the seeking and receiving of legal advice. For legal entities, the definition of a 'client' is limited to persons who legally represent the entity (based on the legal entity's charter), or are empowered by the entity to seek and obtain advice on behalf of the legal entity.

If communication is shared with third parties or parties who are not considered 'clients', that communication may no longer be considered confidential and loses its privilege.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

Under Romanian law, communications with in-house legal counsel who are not admitted to the bar are not protected by legal privilege. A 2010 European Court decision (CJEU Case C-550/07 P Akzo Nobel Chemicals Ltd and Akcros Chemicals Ltd v. European Commission) found that, at least in terms of competition law, communication with in-house counsel is not considered to be privileged. It was found that, although in-house counsel are enrolled in a bar or law society, and are subject to professional ethical obligations, they are not as independent from their employer as external counsel. Privilege in competition matters now only applies to communications with external counsel who have been retained by a client through a written and registered agreement.

Based on this decision, it is sensible for companies to assume that any in-house counsel communication may not be protected by legal privilege.

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

Attorney–client privilege applies equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers as long as: the foreign attorney is properly qualified in his or her own country; an attorney–client relationship exists; and the other requirements for privilege are satisfied.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

Waiving legal privilege is not a mitigating circumstance provided by law. It may fall under the wider mitigating factors relating to circumstances that reduce the gravity of the offence or the degree of risk posed by the offender, but applying this criterion is at the discretion of the court. Nonetheless, in determining the penalty applicable in a particular case, the court will consider the gravity of the offence and the degree of risk posed by the offender. Co-operating with the investigation, and being forthcoming with information (for example, by waiving legal privilege), could count towards a more lenient sentence.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

The concept of a limited waiver of privilege is not regulated. However, that should not preclude one's ability to waive privilege only with respect to certain aspects or documents.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

Maintaining confidentiality is regarded as an absolute obligation for lawyers in Romania. Therefore, even if privilege has been waived in another country, the lawyer must maintain the privilege in Romania, except when a client waives privilege specifically in relation to the lawyer or the information becomes public.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

The concept of common interest privilege does not exist in Romania.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

Legal privilege can be claimed on any documents or information created, exchanged or disclosed during the professional services rendered by a lawyer, provided the client has retained the lawyer through a written agreement registered in the lawyer's registry of contracts.

This privilege will extend to lawyers' associates, employees, subcontractors, other lawyers who co-operate with the lawyer and any individual who is helping the lawyers in carrying out their jobs. However, lawyers must inform these persons of their obligation to respect the privilege. If other parties, such as accountants or experts, have been consulted but not retained by a lawyer, privilege will not apply.

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

Companies may gather information by interviewing witnesses during internal investigations, but there is no legal obligation on a potential witness to testify in internal investigations.

However, in practice, employees are bound to co-operate and testify in accordance with the internal code of conduct of the company, and this may be considered a facet of the broader obligation of loyalty to the employer that employees have under the law.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

If a lawyer conducts interviews to provide legal advice on a matter, the records or a report of the interviews may be privileged. However, as discussed in questions 42 and 43, this privilege may be waived in some circumstances. Best practice would see lawyers recording interview notes as their 'impression' of an interview, rather than as a verbatim transcription.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

Romanian labour law does not specify how an interview of employees or third parties should be conducted. Employers should strive for fairness and transparency when conducting interviews, treat interviewees appropriately and avoid leading questions. Further, employees generally must assist in all aspects of an internal investigation, including interviews, if this obligation is included in the company's code of conduct or under the more general obligation of loyalty to employers. Confidentiality and respect for private life should also be ensured, so that information obtained in relation to other individuals is not distributed except on a need-to-know basis and is subject to appropriate confidentiality safeguards.

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

There are no prescribed methods for conducting a witness interview. Companies either retain external counsel or conduct the interviews with their internal compliance teams. If external counsel is retained to conduct an interview, it is customary for the lawyer to inform employees that he or she does not represent them. Nevertheless, an employee has a right to legal representation during the interview. Also, it is customary in a witness interview to show documents to the employee if it is necessary to refresh the employee's memory.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

A variety of circumstances trigger mandatory reporting obligations. In practice, however, law enforcement authorities are primarily concerned with investigating crimes and the enforcement of reporting breaches are usually ancillary.

One of the more problematic mandatory reporting obligations comes from corruption legislation, which requires certain categories of individuals to report indications or knowledge of potential corruption, even when these may be the sole result of a purely vexatious or unsubstantiated claim. While the intent of the legislature was to maximise reporting of suspected corruption and ensure that the reporting obligation was triggered without the need to investigate the merits of the suspicion, the mandatory reporting obligation opens the door to potential investigations by law enforcement authorities in purely speculative or bad-faith cases.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

This issue is currently the subject of public debate in Romania. The advice given to companies varies depending on the matter and requires careful assessment of a company's duties as well as the risks and benefits of self-reporting. One considerable benefit is that the relevant authorities in Romania may agree to non-criminal penalties or other benefits for self-reporting companies.

For certain criminal offences (such as giving a bribe and acquiring influence), a person (physical or legal) who reports his or her participation in a criminal offence will receive leniency under criminal law, if the self-reporting is carried out before law enforcement authorities become aware (by any other means) of the offence.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

Companies should thoroughly investigate the issue and the surrounding circumstances to be reported to ensure that they are fully aware of all the issues that may arise during a law enforcement investigation. Next, the company should assess the benefits and potential setbacks of self-reporting, including whether the self-reporting entails impunity, or acts only as a mitigating factor or counts towards a lesser penalty; the timing and content of self-reporting and its effects on the organisation's ability to conduct its business; a potential reputational backlash; or the risk of opening up the organisation to additional scrutiny. This assessment needs to be conducted carefully, with an external legal consultant who specialises in crisis and reputation management. If the company decides that self-reporting is the most appropriate action, it should prepare a communication plan and ensure it is ready to co-operate with authorities and provide any requested support.

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

Companies should seek external counsel's advice regarding compliance with a document production request or a subpoena. External counsel should engage in dialogue with the law enforcement authority regarding the scope of the subpoena and communicate the intent of the company to fully co-operate. Dialogue with the authority is possible and advisable; authorities may view it as a demonstration of the willingness to co-operate and an act of good faith. If the company fails to comply with requests within an established deadline, the prosecutor may obtain a warrant to search the premises.

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

A company can file requests for quashing a prosecutor's measures and orders. Such requests are reviewed and decided by the relevant chief prosecutor. In practice, challenges are filed before the relevant chief prosecutor; however, prosecutors are reluctant to uphold such challenges, unless there is a clear indication that the company's legitimate interests are harmed.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

Companies should seek legal advice on legal requirements under both countries' jurisdictions and their legal counsel should provide advice that details the appropriate strategy that the company should use to respond to the subpoenas, and advise whether it is most appropriate to respond to notices or subpoenas separately or together.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

If the material is in the company's possession, the company should comply with the request for production. Companies will also be expected to comply with requests to produce material that is legally required to be held by the company, even if the company does not possess that material. If the material requested should be in the company's possession under Romanian law but is in another country, the company should search in that country. If the material is not (and should not be) in the company's possession, the company is not bound to make additional enquiries (although, if it is feasible, making additional enquiries may be a sign of active co-operation with the investigation).

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

Romanian law enforcement authorities frequently co-operate with foreign law enforcement.

The Criminal Procedure Code and Law No. 302/2004 regulate Romania's co-operation procedures on extradition, European arrest warrants, the transfer of criminal proceedings and sentenced persons, and the execution of judgments. These laws and the 2000 EU Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters between the Member States of the European Union regulate Romania's obligations in providing and receiving mutual legal assistance, including the search, seizure and confiscation of assets.

Additionally, Romania has signed more than 25 bilateral treaties with other countries, including France, Italy and the United States, which enable it to provide and receive assistance in criminal matters.

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

The law enforcement authority is itself under a duty of confidentiality with respect to material it has accessed as a result of a request for production or a search warrant. Criminal procedure rules specifically require a strict level of confidentiality with respect to all information discovered during such procedures. Moreover, (1) the unlawful disclosure of information that is not public by a person who had access to that information as part of his or her work-related duties and (2) the use of information that is not public or granting an unauthorised person access to such information, if perpetrated with the purpose of obtaining money or other undue benefits, constitute criminal offences sanctioned by imprisonment.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

In these circumstances, companies should seek an exception and inform the relevant law enforcement authority that they cannot reasonably comply with the request without violating the laws of another country. Further, as the company receiving the request would not typically own the documents in another country, the company should direct the law enforcement authorities to the foreign entity holding the documents.

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

Generally, a company's data is not protected under Romanian data protection statutes and, as a result, the obligation to comply with a notice or subpoena is not blocked by data protection statutes unless it involves the personal data of employees or clients (and even in those cases, restrictions on consent to disclose would most likely be overridden by other legitimate grounds). The GDPR, implemented in May 2018, has the same effect.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

Compliance with a request for production of material is mandatory under the law – to do otherwise would be to act in breach of the law. Unless there are legitimate grounds to argue that a request violates specific rights or legitimate interests of the company (in which case the company is able to file a complaint against the order), the request should be complied with.

Furthermore, if the request is not complied with, a warrant may be issued to search the company premises to obtain the requested material.

Prosecution and penalties

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

The main criminal penalty applicable to legal entities is a fine, ranging from 3,000 to 3 million Romanian lei. The penalty can be increased by a third (up to a maximum of 3 million lei) if the company perpetrated the crime with the purpose of obtaining financial gain.

Other penalties include:

- dissolution;
- suspension of the legal entity's activity for between three months and three years;
- prohibition of the legal entity's participation in public procurement procedures for between one and three years;
- shutting down the legal entity's offices for between three months and three years;
- placing the legal entity under judicial supervision; and
- publication of the sanctioning decision.

For individuals, the main penalties are imprisonment and fines.

Individual employees, directors and the companies they serve can be prosecuted together. Criminal liability of the company does not exclude criminal liability of the individuals perpetrating the offence.

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

As a general rule, a company's decision to settle in another country should be driven by pure business reasons and should therefore not be subject to any restrictions other than those regarding the lawful termination of the local entity.

However, if a company under investigation in Romania tries to move its business to another country, the prosecutor may request a judge to take a preventive measure if there is reasonable suspicion that the company perpetrated a crime and its actions are impeding the criminal investigation. In such cases, the judge has discretion to order one or more of the following measures:

- interdiction to initiate or, as the case may be, the suspension of the company's dissolution or liquidation procedure;
- interdiction to initiate or, as the case may be, the suspension of the company's merger, division or share capital reduction, started prior or during the criminal investigation phase;
- interdiction to perform certain commercial transactions that would lead to the reduction of the company's assets or that would cause the company to become insolvent;
- interdiction to conclude certain legal documents; or
- interdiction to perform activities such as those that led to the perpetration of the crime.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

The gravity of the offence and the threat posed by the convicted individual or company determine the severity and type of penalty. The following criteria are used to assess the gravity and threat:

- the circumstances and manner of the commission of the offence, and the means that were used;
- the threat to the protected social interest;
- the nature and seriousness of the outcome produced by the offence or other consequences of the offence;
- the reason for committing the offence and the intended goal;
- the nature and frequency of offences in the indicted person's criminal history;
- the indicted person's conduct after committing the offence and during the trial; and
- the indicted person's level of education, age, health, family and social situation.

Where the law provides for alternative penalties, the court may also use these criteria to assess which penalties are most appropriate.

When determining the value of a corporate fine, in addition to the above criteria, courts will consider a company's financial status and any benefit derived by the company as a result of the crime. The value of corporate fines has increased and have culminated at the beginning of 2019 with the biggest fine ever applied to a company in Romania. The leading television and internet provider in Romania was convicted of money laundering and fined 1.25 million Romanian lei; in addition, €3.1 million and 655,124 lei was seized.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

Romanian legislation does not provide for non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements for corporations or individuals.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

Romanian legislation does not provide for non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements for corporations or individuals.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

Companies must cautiously weigh the benefits and risks of proceeding under such a settlement. Some of the factors that should be considered are:

- the strength of the prosecution case and defence case, and the likely outcome;
- the sanction that is likely to be imposed in the event of a conviction;

- the object of the settlement and an assessment of whether the settlement is comprehensively defined;
- the effect the settlement may have on any aspect of the company's future activities and operations;
- ensuring the settlement is consistent with the company's internal regulations; and
- consideration of any benefits derived, such as the potential for a guilty plea to act as a mitigating factor in sentencing.

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

Romanian legislation does not provide for external corporate compliance monitors.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

Parallel civil actions are allowed; however, in practice, they are often suspended until the conclusion of the criminal proceedings, because findings of fact in criminal courts may influence civil courts.

Parties to civil matters do not have access to authorities' or criminal investigation files unless they also hold a capacity in the criminal file (i.e, injured civil party); that is because investigations must maintain confidentiality and are not made public.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

The procedure and information obtained during criminal investigations is not public. Moreover, during the course of a criminal investigation, the prosecutor may restrict access to the case file if access could prevent a proper criminal investigation. Once official charges are brought against a person, access can be restricted for a maximum of 10 days.

Once a case is before a court, the criminal investigation and subsequent information becomes public (although the court may, in limited circumstances, judge the file in chambers, without public access). This does not mean that the entire file is generally accessible to the public, and requests may be made on the basis of Romanian regulations on freedom of access to information.

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

The appointment of a public relations advice team is crucial to develop and follow a well-planned strategy. Relevant stakeholders, experts and legal consultants should work together to prepare public statements and to avoid damaging the company's reputation.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

Strategic considerations are required to successfully manage public communication in cases of ongoing proceedings. During the court proceeding phase, media access to information about the activity of the court and prosecutors' offices is determined by judicial authorities. It is useful for companies to have an organised plan for dealing with media queries and communications relating to the proceedings.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

Disclosure by the company to the market is not mandatory and the decision must be made depending on the facts of the individual case, and by weighing up the factors discussed in question 33.

However, all decisions in criminal matters (including court-approved settlements) become public and are published on a court database. This publication is limited to basic information, such as names, the offence committed and the sanction imposed. As mentioned in question 62, a company may be required – once convicted of an offence – to ensure publication in national media of the full court decision, at the company's own expense.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

Some changes have been announced in relation to the Criminal Code that may affect legal entities. One of these targets the reduction of the statute of limitations for corruption crimes from eight to six years. The aim of these changes is to sanction the slow manner in which criminal investigations have been performed in Romania in recent years.

Another change that may affect legal entities relates to tax evasion crimes. The proposed change provides that, if a perpetrator repays the damage caused to the state budget (plus 20 per cent, interest and delay penalties), the criminal tax evasion charges will be dropped.

It is unclear if and when these changes may occur. The Constitutional Court of Romania decided that they are unconstitutional and Parliament now has to modify them and restart the procedure.

General context, key principles and hot topics

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

The highest-profile corporate investigation currently under way in Singapore relates to the revelation that S$33 million belonging to the Singapore Exchange catalyst-listed precision engineering firm Allied Technologies Ltd, which was held in escrow with law firm JLC Advisors LLP, had gone missing. The Law Society of Singapore is carrying out an investigative audit on the law firm's client accounts.

In the meantime, the managing partner of JLC Advisors, Jeffrey Ong, has been charged with one count of cheating another company, CCJ Investments, out of S$6 million and eight counts of forgery for the purpose of cheating in the same case. It has also been revealed that three more clients of JLC Advisors have come forward to the police regarding missing monies totalling S$16 million that were held by the law firm.

This is the largest amount of alleged misappropriation involving a lawyer in Singapore since the case in 2006 involving an alleged misappropriation of S$11 million by another lawyer, David Rasif. Following this latest incident, the Law Society has said that it may consider introducing rules and guidelines for operating escrow accounts after it completes its probe into JLC Advisors.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

Corporate entities can be held criminally liable. The Interpretation Act (Cap. 1) expressly states that a 'person' includes 'any company or association or body of persons, corporate or unincorporate' unless the relevant legislation expressly provides otherwise or there is something in the subject or context inconsistent with such a construction. As such, a corporate entity can be charged with an offence, whether or not the legislation refers specifically to corporate entities.

This is also borne out in Singapore's main criminal legislation, the Penal Code (Cap. 224), which provides expressly that 'persons' liable to punishment under the Penal Code include 'any company or association or body of persons, corporate or unincorporate'.

There are also various pieces of legislation that contain offences specifically directed at corporate entities. For example, criminal liability can arise on the part of a corporate entity for market misconduct under Part X of the Securities and Futures Act (Cap. 289) (SFA) if the offence is committed by an employee or an officer of a corporate entity with the consent or connivance of the corporate entity and for the benefit of that corporate entity (section 236B), whereas a corporate entity may be liable to an order for a civil penalty if the corporate entity fails to prevent or detect a contravention, if that contravention is committed for the benefit of the corporate entity and is attributable to the negligence of the corporate entity (section 236C).

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

The Accounting and Corporate Regulatory Authority (ACRA) is the national regulator of business entities, public accountants and corporate service providers. ACRA's Compliance Division, comprising the Enforcement Department and the Prosecution Department, undertakes investigations and prosecutions of breaches of various laws under ACRA's purview, including the Companies Act (Cap. 50).

The Monetary Authority of Singapore (MAS) is the central bank. It administers and enforces the SFA. Apart from the prosecution of criminal offences under the SFA, MAS is also responsible for the enforcement of civil penalties for market misconduct and for supervising financial institutions.

The Singapore Exchange Regulation Pte Ltd is an independent regulatory subsidiary of the Singapore Exchange (SGX), which oversees the regulation of companies listed on the SGX.

The Competition and Consumer Commission of Singapore (CCCS) is the national agency that administers and enforces the Competition Act (Cap. 50B). The Competition Act empowers the CCCS to investigate and adjudicate anticompetitive activities, issue directions to stop or prevent anticompetitive activities and impose financial penalties. The CCCS is also the administering agency of the Consumer Protection (Fair Trading) Act (Cap. 52A), which protects consumers against unfair trade practices in Singapore.

The Commercial Affairs Department (CAD), which is a specialist department of the Singapore Police Force (SPF), is the principal white-collar crime investigation agency. It investigates a wide range of commercial and financial crimes, including offences under the SFA. In 2015, MAS and CAD announced a collaboration to undertake joint investigations into market misconduct offences such as insider trading and market manipulation. In March 2018, this arrangement was extended to cover all offences under the SFA and the Financial Advisers Act, to allow for greater efficiency and more effective enforcement of capital markets and financial advisory offences.

The Corrupt Practices Investigation Bureau (CPIB) is the only agency authorised to investigate corruption offences under the Prevention of Corruption Act (Cap. 241) (PCA) and other related offences. The CPIB is a government agency under the Prime Minister's Office and is independent of the SPF.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

A police officer will ordinarily initiate investigations when information about an arrestable criminal offence is received. There is no specific threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger a police investigation.

Insofar as regulators such as MAS and the SGX are concerned, the relevant legislation provides them with investigative powers.

There is no specific threshold of suspicion necessary for MAS to initiate an investigation into an alleged or suspected contravention of the SFA so long as it considers an investigation 'necessary or expedient' (section 152, SFA).

Under the SGX (Mainboard) Listing Rules, the SGX may conduct an investigation if the SGX has reason to believe that there is a possibility that any of its rules have been contravened, a written complaint is received or the SGX is of the opinion that the circumstances warrant it.

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

A notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority may be challenged by asking the court to quash it or prohibit further action by the relevant law enforcement authority.

A search warrant issued by the Singapore courts under the Criminal Procedure Code (Cap. 68) (CPC) may be suspended or cancelled if there are good reasons for doing so.

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

Deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs) were implemented in Singapore on 31 October 2018 through amendments to the CPC. Prosecutors can enter into a DPA with corporate offenders under which there may be no prosecution in exchange for compliance with a series of conditions. Conditions to a DPA range from producing documents to assisting in investigations. They aim not only to penalise the entity but also to ensure that the entity does not repeat the offence in the future. DPAs must be approved by the High Court and published after such approval. The High Court must be satisfied that the agreement is in the interests of justice and its terms are fair, reasonable and appropriate.

Other than DPAs, co-operation with authorities can be a significant mitigating factor. For instance, a conditional warning in lieu of prosecution was issued to Keppel Offshore & Marine Ltd in view of the substantial co-operation rendered by the company during investigations.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

Singapore has a zero tolerance of corruption and prides itself on its clean and incorrupt system. This continues to be a top priority.

Cybercrime and money laundering are also key priorities towards ensuring that a resilient system with high integrity is maintained for Singapore's financial institutions and the financial sector, not least because cybercrime is the fastest-growing type of transnational crime in Singapore.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

The Cybersecurity Act 2018 (No. 9 of 2018) (CSA) provides a regulatory framework with a focus on protecting critical information infrastructures and to prevent, manage and respond to cybersecurity threats. The Commissioner of Cybersecurity is empowered to oversee all aspects of cybersecurity, and may require remedial action to be taken or certain activities to cease.

The CSA operates in tandem with the patchwork of existing legislation that promotes cybersecurity, such as the Personal Data Protection Act 2012 (PDPA). Non-compliance with the PDPA or CSA may result in enforcement actions and financial penalties of up to S$1 million.

Corporations are expected to comply with sector-specific codes of practice. For instance, the Notice on Technology Risk Management issued by MAS, the Telecommunication Cybersecurity Code of Practice for major internet service providers, and the Business Continuity Readiness Assessment Framework for public sector agencies. In addition, organisations are required to protect personal data in its possession or under its control by making reasonable security arrangements under the PDPA.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

Cybercrime is regulated mostly under the Computer Misuse Act (CMA). However, cybercrime can also constitute offences under the Penal Code and the PDPA. The Singapore Police Force's Technology Crime Division within the Criminal Investigation Department has wide investigative powers and works closely with Interpol in combating cybercrime internationally.

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

Generally, Singapore's criminal law does not have extraterritorial effect. However, there are certain offences that do have extraterritorial effect, such as corruption offences under the PCA.

The provisions of the PCA set forth extraterritorial powers to deal with corrupt acts committed by a Singapore citizen outside Singapore as though the acts were committed in Singapore (section 37, PCA).

Further, section 29 of the PCA, when read with sections 108A and 108B of the Penal Code (which deals with the abetment of corruption offences), can attach criminal liability to a person who, from Singapore, abets the commission outside Singapore of any act, in relation to the affairs or business or on behalf of a principal residing in Singapore, which if committed in Singapore, would be an offence under the PCA.

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

Investigations that require the assistance of foreign authorities may be hampered by the level of international co-operation. Singapore is a party to various international conventions and treaties that facilitate the provision and obtaining of international assistance in criminal matters, including the Treaty on Mutual Legal Assistance in Criminal Matters. Some of these have been incorporated into Singapore's laws, such as the Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters Act (Cap. 190A) (MACMA), the Corruption Drug Trafficking and Other Serious Crimes Act (Confiscation of Benefits) Act (Cap. 65A) (CDSA) and the Terrorism (Suppression of Financing) Act (Cap. 325) (TSOFA).

International co-operation between MAS and other central banks is also provided for under the Monetary Authority of Singapore Act (Cap. 186) (the MAS Act).

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

Singapore laws protect against double jeopardy, that is to say a person who has been convicted or acquitted of an offence cannot be tried again for the same offence. However, the issue as to whether international double jeopardy applies in Singapore remains resolved.

Insofar as offences under the PCA are concerned, section 37(2) of the PCA addresses this situation by stating that, once proceedings in respect of an act committed outside Singapore have been commenced in Singapore, this shall be a bar to further proceedings against a person for his or her extradition for the same offence outside Singapore.

Singapore does not have any specific 'anti-piling on' policy at present. However, MAS and CAD have a Joint Investigations Arrangement to cover all offences under the SFA and the Financial Advisors Act, allowing both agencies to consolidate their investigative resources and improve effectiveness of market misconduct investigations.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

No. The first known global resolution in relation to a Singapore company was arrived at only in December 2017.

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

Decisions made by foreign authorities would generally be of interest to local investigators in respect of the same matter in Singapore. It may also have a bearing on the pace of investigations in Singapore.

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

Singapore implements United Nations Security Council sanctions through the United Nations Act (Cap. 339) for non-financial institutions and individuals and the Monetary Authority of Singapore Act (Cap. 186) for financial institutions. The International Convention for the Suppression of Financing of Terrorism is given effect in Singapore through the Terrorism (Suppression of Financing) Act (Cap. 325), which not only criminalises terrorism financing but also prohibits any person in Singapore from dealing with or providing services to a terrorist entity, including those designated in the act.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

Sanctions implemented in Singapore are enforced by the Singapore Customs, MAS and the Inter-Ministerial Committee on Terrorist Designation. Recent years have seen a rise in the number of prosecutions for sanctions violations, such as Chinpo Shipping Company being fined for transferring money that could have contributed to North Korea's nuclear-related activities in 2016; and, in 2018, T Specialist International and its director, Ng Kheng Wah, being charged in Singapore for, among other things, the supply of sanctioned luxury goods to North Korea in breach of UN sanctions against North Korea.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

Under the CDSA, a mechanism is available for financial intelligence to be shared with other financial intelligence units of other jurisdictions. Assistance may also be provided pursuant to MACMA. However, Singapore does not enforce unilateral sanctions imposed by other countries.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

Singapore has not enacted any blocking legislation.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

Singapore has not enacted any blocking legislation.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

Allegations of misconduct are often brought to light by whistleblowers making complaints directly to companies or to law enforcement authorities.

Apart from complaints of misconduct, which may be lodged with the law enforcement authorities, reports lodged pursuant to disclosure obligations under the CDSA in respect of property that are reasonably suspected of being connected to criminal activity are called 'suspicious transaction reports'. These reports are lodged with the Suspicious Transaction Reporting Office, which is Singapore's financial intelligence unit. While these suspicious transaction reports are property-based and for the purpose of combating money laundering, the SPF may also initiate investigations into misconduct associated with the property.

Internal investigations into misconduct may also be initiated pursuant to internal or external audits conducted by a company.

Information gathering

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

Personal data in Singapore is protected under the PDPA, which took effect in phases beginning in January 2013. The Act governs the collection, use, disclosure, transfer and security of an individual's personal data.

Certain personal information is also protected under various statutes, such as the Banking Act (Cap. 19), the CDSA and the common law of confidentiality.

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

The PDPA ensures a baseline standard of protection for personal data, which requires organisations to comply with the PDPA as well as common law and other relevant laws that are applied to the industry they belong to, when handling personal data in their possession.

If the Personal Data Protection Commission finds that an organisation is in breach of any of the data protection provisions in the PDPA, it may give the organisation such directions as it thinks appropriate to ensure compliance.

There are also offences under the PDPA for which an organisation or a person may be liable.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

The PDPA provides that an organisation may collect personal data about an individual with the consent of the individual or from a source other than the individual in circumstances where collection is necessary for any investigation or proceedings, if it is reasonable to expect that seeking the consent of the individual would compromise the availability or the accuracy of the personal data.

The PDPA also provides that an organisation may use or disclose personal data about an individual without the consent of the individual where the use is necessary for any investigation or proceeding.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

Communications such as emails are not considered as personal data for the purposes of the PDPA. As such, the interception of employees' communications per se is permitted insofar as it does not amount to a contravention of the CMA. Insofar as they contain personal data, interception without consent is permitted so long as the collection of the data is reasonable for the purposes of managing the employment relationship, which include monitoring how employees use company network resources.

Organisations in breach may be subject to a financial penalty of up to S$1 million in addition to civil proceedings.

Dawn raids and search warrants

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

Search warrants and raids on companies are features of law enforcement in Singapore.

The person granted a search warrant must conduct the search in accordance with the warrant and with the CPC, including conducting the entry and search during a period of time specified in the warrant.

A court issuing a search warrant may suspend or cancel the warrant if there are good reasons to do so.

There are also instances when searches can be carried out by the SPF even without search warrants, for example if there is reasonable cause for suspicion that stolen property is concealed and a police officer of or above the rank of sergeant has good grounds for believing that by reason of delay in obtaining a search warrant, that property is likely to be removed (section 32, CPC).

If an illegal search is conducted, the aggrieved party may make a criminal complaint for trespass or criminal force, or commence a civil claim for damages in the tort of trespass.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

There is no prescribed process to protect privileged material during a dawn raid or search. As a practical measure, the company or individual should assert privilege during the dawn raid or search itself regarding the relevant material seized by the authorities and follow up thereafter with the authorities to claim privilege over the same.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

Under section 283(2) of the CPC, the court may issue a summons to compel the appearance of a witness if that person's evidence is essential to making a just decision at the close of the case for the defence, or at the end of any proceeding under the CPC. In addition, there are other statutes that confer the power on authorities to require the attendance of witnesses for examination. For instance, the MAS has the power to require persons to be examined (section 154, SFA), and evidence obtained by the MAS in this regard may be used in criminal investigations and proceedings (section 168B, SFA).

The Singapore courts are permitted to draw an adverse inference against an accused under section 261(1) of the CPC from a failure to disclose to the police facts that he or she subsequently relies on in his or her defence at trial.

There is a right against self-incrimination in Singapore under section 22(2) of the CPC whereby a person need not say anything that might expose him or her to a criminal charge, penalty or forfeiture. However, the police do not have to inform the accused of the right against self-incrimination.

An advocate, solicitor or in-house counsel would be prohibited from disclosing any communications covered by legal privilege (sections 128 and 128A, Evidence Act). Further, a person would not be permitted to produce any unpublished official records relating to the affairs of the state (section 125, Evidence Act).

Whistleblowing and employee rights

28 Describe the whistleblowing framework in your country. What financial incentive schemes exist for whistleblowers? What legal protections are in place for whistleblowers?

There is no general whistleblowing law in Singapore. Listed companies are required to disclose the existence of a whistleblowing policy, but beyond this, there are no hard and fast rules, including whether a whistleblower may be financially incentivised, as to the implementation of a whistleblowing policy within an organisation.

The PCA protects whistleblowers in that no complaints of an offence under the PCA can be admitted in evidence in any civil or criminal proceeding whatsoever, and no witness shall be obliged or permitted to disclose the name or address of any informer, or state any matter that might lead to the discovery of a person's identity.

A suspicious transaction report lodged pursuant to section 39(1) of the CDSA is also confidential and cannot be admitted in evidence in any civil or criminal proceeding whatsoever, and no witness shall be obliged or permitted to disclose the name or address of any informer, or answer any question if the answer thereto would lead, or would tend to lead to the discovery of the name or address of the informer.

Auditors are also protected from defamation suits when reporting fraud in good faith under the Companies Act.

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

For employees covered under the Employment Act (Cap. 91), which generally covers all employees with certain exceptions, such as managers or executives with a monthly basic salary of more than S$4,500, the employer may suspend the employee from work during an inquiry, but any suspension cannot exceed one week and the employee should be paid at least half his or her salary during the suspension.

Employees are also protected against wrongful dismissal under common law. Directors and officers of a company are treated no differently from employees in terms of protection under common law.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

For employees covered under the Employment Act (Cap. 91), which generally covers all employees with certain exceptions, such as seafarers and domestic workers, an employer can dismiss an employee, or take disciplinary action against an employee, only on the ground of conduct that is inconsistent with the fulfilment of the express or implied terms of his or her service after due inquiry. There is no fixed procedure for an inquiry but, as a general guide, the person or persons hearing the inquiry should not be in a position that may suggest bias, and the employee who is being investigated for misconduct should have the opportunity to present his or her case.

There are no particular disciplinary or other steps that a company must take, subject to the company's own internal policies and procedures, and the terms of employment.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

Subject to the applicability of the Employment Act to employees who are covered by the Act, generally a company may terminate the employment of an employee in accordance with the terms of the employment contract. As such, subject to the terms of the employment contract, an employee may be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation.

Commencing an internal investigation

32 Is it common practice in your country to prepare a document setting out terms of reference or investigatory scope before commencing an internal investigation? What issues would it cover?

Yes, it is – particularly for larger-scale internal investigations. It would typically cover the objectives of the internal investigation, the scope of investigation, the identity and roles of the investigation team and any restriction or protocol on communications or information flow regarding the investigation.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

If an issue comes to light, the company should first activate its in-house legal counsel or engage external counsel (or both) to obtain advice (including in respect of any interim measures that should be taken, and its disclosure obligations, if any) and commence an internal investigation.

The company may have an obligation to report to the authorities (for example, in respect of certain specified offences under the Penal Code pursuant to section 424 of the CPC, or its obligation to file a suspicious transaction report under the CDSA) or to make any public disclosures (if it is a listed company).

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

The company would be required to comply with the notice or subpoena and should take immediate steps to obtain legal advice, and implement the identification, extraction and preservation of the relevant documents and data. The company should ideally also take steps to ensure that copies of the documents and data are made and retained.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

A listed company must make timely disclosure of any information it has concerning itself or any of its subsidiaries or associated companies that is either 'necessary to avoid the establishment of a false market in [its] securities' or 'that would be likely to materially affect the price or value of its securities' under Rule 703 of the SGX (Mainboard) Listing Rules.

An intentional or reckless failure to disclose under Rule 703 is a criminal offence under section 203 of the SFA, for which the directors of the listed company may also be liable.

There is no obligation on private companies to publicly disclose any information, including the existence of an internal investigation or contact from law enforcement officials.

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

Internal investigations are generally welcomed by law enforcement authorities. Additionally, financial institutions regulated by MAS are generally expected to conduct internal investigations in cases involving certain types of misconduct by their licensed representatives.

Attorney–client privilege

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

A company may claim litigation privilege over investigation reports and documents created during an internal investigation if there is a reasonable prospect of litigation at the time the documents are created, and the dominant purpose for the creation of the documents over which privilege is claimed is pending or contemplated litigation.

Legal advice privilege can also be claimed for a document if there is legal advice embedded in it, or it was created for the dominant purpose of provision to legal counsel for the purpose of seeking legal advice.

To ensure that privilege is protected, legal counsel, whether external or in-house, should be substantially involved in the investigations, particularly when conducting interviews of witnesses. However, it should be noted that merely copying legal counsel in correspondence is not enough to attract privilege, and that the contents themselves have to satisfy the requirements for privilege. It would also be good practice not to mix legal and business advice in the same document, and marking advice as 'confidential and legally privileged' would assist in identifying privileged material (even though the labelling itself does not create privilege).

Generally, to ensure that the confidentiality of an internal investigation is maintained, the company should put in place a communications protocol and limit the communications, reports and any advice regarding the investigations to specified individuals within the company on a need-to-know basis.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

Legal professional privilege is found in two principal forms – litigation privilege and legal advice privilege. When a document is protected by either form, it is exempted from disclosure in litigation.

Legal advice privilege attaches to legal advice and communications between a lawyer (whether in-house or external legal counsel) and a client (or the company, as the case may be in the context of an in-house legal counsel) for the purpose of seeking legal advice, whether or not litigation is contemplated.

Litigation privilege will apply to documents and communications created for the dominant purpose of pending or contemplated litigation, and if there is a reasonable prospect of litigation at the time the documents are created.

Legal professional privilege belongs to the client, regardless of whether the client is an individual or a corporate entity.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

Yes, pursuant to section 131 of the Evidence Act (Cap. 97).

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

Common law rules of legal professional privilege pertaining to foreign lawyers apply in Singapore and are effectively as extensive as legal professional privilege under section 131 of the Evidence Act.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

Waiver of legal professional privilege is often viewed as a co-operative step by the authorities. There is no prescribed context in which waiver of legal professional privilege is mandatory or required. However, it is not unheard of for regulatory authorities, in certain circumstances, to request that a company waives privilege over an internal investigation report that is required to be submitted to the authorities.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

Yes. For example, in a recent decision, the High Court found that in a multiparty litigation, selective disclosure to an adverse party of any documents to which litigation privilege applies does not waive the litigation privilege generally.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

This question has not been determined specifically in Singapore. However, it is noted that the concept of limited waiver of privilege exists in Singapore.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

Common interest privilege can be used to enable party B to shield behind the privilege of party A and prevent party C from obtaining or using documents from B that were provided to B pursuant to the common interest between A and B in the subject matter of the documents.

Common interest privilege can also be used to enable A to obtain documents from B, which B can withhold on the ground of privilege against the rest of the world, on the basis that it is inconsistent with the common interest for B to claim privilege against A in relation to these documents.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

Yes, if the documents created with the assistance of third parties fall within the scope of litigation privilege or legal advice privilege, for example if a document was created by a third party who was acting as the client's agent at the time, for the dominant purpose of obtaining legal advice.

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

There is no prohibition against witness interviews as part of an internal investigation.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

Yes, if the interview records fall within the scope of litigation privilege.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

There are no specific requirements that must be adhered to for a witness interview of employees or third parties. However, it is good practice to state up-front during the interview whom the interviewers represent and, where appropriate, make it clear that they are not acting for the employee. This is to avoid any potential claims of conflict of interest.

It would also be advisable to involve legal counsel to ensure that the witness interviews are conducted with the benefit of legal advice, and to ensure that any statements taken during internal investigations may properly be protected by privilege.

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

Generally, an interview starts with the interviewer explaining the purpose of the interview and highlighting that the interview should be kept confidential. Questions would be asked and if these questions relate to certain documents, these documents are usually put to the witness during the interview.

When allegations are being made against an employee, it is advisable to give the employee an opportunity to seek legal advice.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

Yes. Section 39 of the CDSA imposes an obligation to lodge 'suspicious transaction reports' in respect of property that is reasonably suspected to be connected to criminal activity.

Section 424 of the CPC also imposes an obligation to file a police report in respect of specified offences under the Penal Code.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

Self-reporting and co-operation would generally be seen as mitigating factors and would also provide an avenue for dialogue with the law enforcement authorities.

Companies should bear in mind that any self-reporting in a particular jurisdiction may trigger reporting or disclosure obligations in other jurisdictions.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

Before making any self-report, a company should first undertake an internal investigation and obtain legal advice on the scope of the company's disclosure obligations and potential liability.

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

It is common, and indeed advisable, for a company to engage legal counsel upon receipt of any notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority to seek advice on compliance therewith.

It may be possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities, depending on the nature of the investigations. It is also possible to engage in plea bargaining with the prosecutor even after charges are brought.

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

It depends on whether the aggrieved persons satisfy the requirements for judicial review, and whether the relevant acts are justiciable in the first place.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

It is important to ensure that a consistent position is taken across the various investigations in the different countries. To this end, the company may wish to engage legal counsel to coordinate the investigations.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

If the material is in the possession or power of a company, the company must search for and produce the material, wherever that material may be located but provided that the material actually belongs to the company.

Issues might arise in circumstances where the data servers or material are maintained by third parties or related companies not in Singapore. In these circumstances, the Singapore company may nonetheless choose to co-operate and offer assistance to provide access to these data servers or materials.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

Yes, this is provided for under MACMA, the CDSA, the TSOFA and the MAS Act (see question 11).

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

Generally, yes, depending on the relevant legislation empowering the investigations. See, for example, part VC of the MAS Act relating to assistance to foreign authorities and domestic authorities for their supervisory and other actions in respect of money.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

The company should obtain legal advice from counsel in the foreign country to ascertain the potential liability if the documents were produced, and have its foreign and local legal counsel work together to explore a solution or establish whether it would be possible to resist the production or mitigate its exposure overseas.

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

No, but Singapore has general statutory provisions that prevent disclosure of matters relating to state interests.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

In practice, the law enforcement authorities generally maintain the confidentiality of material provided to them, whether voluntarily or because they are compelled to do so.

However, foreign law enforcement authorities may request assistance and the sharing of information or documents, whether informally or formally, pursuant to the relevant legislation or treaties. Confidentiality measures may be put in place for the sharing of such information or documents. For example, assistance provided by MAS under the MAS Act in some circumstances requires the receiving authority to provide an undertaking to protect the confidentiality of information or documents.

Prosecution and penalties

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

If a company is found guilty of a criminal offence, the typical penalty is a fine.

A company's directors, officers or employees found guilty of a criminal offence may generally be subject to imprisonment or fines.

Further, a company or individual found guilty of a criminal offence may be required by a court to pay compensation.

Other than criminal and civil liability, companies or their directors, officers or employees may also be subject to sanctions or civil penalties imposed by regulatory bodies such as the SGX and MAS.

A court may also order a third party who has benefited from misconduct to disgorge benefit arising from that misconduct, on the application of MAS or any other claimant pursuant to section 236L of the SFA.

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

The Standing Committee on Debarment (SCOD) decides all cases of debarment. The relevant grounds for debarment from government contracts include:

- cheating or attempted cheating;
- giving false information that has a material bearing on the award or performance of the contract;
- corruption in connection with a government agency or contract;
- compromise of national security or public interest;
- repeated defaults; and
- bid rigging.

Except for cases involving CPIB or CCCS investigations, government agencies generally would warn the defaulting companies in writing of the intention to debar them and the grounds for such an action before a case is submitted to SCOD. This would give the defaulting contractor the opportunity to make a business trade-off between proceeding with the contract or facing the possibility of debarment. The defaulting contractor will also be given an opportunity to explain why it has defaulted.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

There are various mitigating factors that may be taken into account by a court when considering an appropriate sentence, including:

- co-operation with the authorities;
- self-reporting;
- remediation;
- lack of record; and
- voluntary restitution or compensation.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

Singapore has recently enacted a framework for DPAs, which came into force on 31 October 2018. Under this framework, the public prosecutor can agree to dismiss the charges a company faces provided it agrees to undertake certain obligations. A DPA would be subject to approval by the High Court, which must be satisfied that the agreement is in the interests of justice and that the terms are fair, reasonable and proportionate.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

Section 149J of the CPC confers powers on the High Court to order that public notice of the DPA be postponed until the conclusion of criminal proceedings, that any information contained in the court documents be removed or redacted, or that such information shall not be published.

Material obtained by the public prosecutor in the course of negotiations for a DPA may be used against the subject of the DPA or any other person in criminal proceedings.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

If the company has a presence overseas, it should consider the implications of the settlement on any ongoing or pending investigation in respect of the same or similar subject matter overseas.

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

A possible condition under a DPA could be for the appointment of a person to advise and report on the subject's compliance programmes.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

Civil proceedings can continue in parallel with criminal investigations or proceedings. However, it is common to put civil proceedings on hold until the conclusion of any criminal investigation.

There is no obligation on the authorities to provide civil litigants with access to their files.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

Anyone who intentionally publishes any matter or carries out any other act that prejudices, interferes with or poses a 'real risk of prejudice' to current court proceedings is liable to be found guilty of contempt of court pursuant to the Administration of Justice (Protection) Act 2016.

Further, obstruction of justice is an offence under section 204A of the Penal Code.

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

Depending on the scale of the matter, a company may choose to engage an external public relations firm if it does not have an in-house public relations or communications team. It is also common for external counsel to assist and advise a company on a holistic crisis management plan.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

Generally, a company undergoing investigation or legal proceedings tends not to comment on it when asked by the media, save to the extent necessary to meet disclosure obligations or to refute any inaccuracy. It is important that a crisis management plan is created and abided by, particularly if there are various stakeholders in the company.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

A settlement may fall within the scope of information that a listed company is required to disclose under Rule 703 of the SGX (Mainboard) Listing Rules, subject to any disclosure obligations imposed by the relevant law enforcement authorities.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

On 6 May 2019, the Criminal Law Reform Bill was passed in Parliament, introducing, among other things, a new offence of fraud, adapted from the UK Fraud Act 2006. This offence focuses on the dishonest or fraudulent intent to deceive a victim, rather than the effect of the deception of the victim. With this new fraud offence, sophisticated deceptive schemes in which wrongful gain or loss was intended without an identifiable victim being deceived would now constitute an offence under Singapore law.

The Criminal Law Reform Bill also introduces provisions to tackle crime committed in the virtual arena, such as setting out a comprehensive definition of property to cover virtual currency, as well as clarifying that a company is capable of being deceived or induced to act in a certain manner for the purposes of the offence of cheating, even if none of its individual officers, employees or agents is personally deceived or induced to act in such a manner.

The Criminal Law Reform Bill has yet to come into effect.

General context, key principles and hot topics

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

In the past few years, Switzerland has been confronted with several multi-jurisdictional investigations relating to corruption, fraud, money laundering and tax evasion. Most of these cases attracted considerable media attention.

Beginning in 2008, the US authorities, and later the Swiss Financial Market Supervisory Authority (FINMA), initiated investigations against several Swiss banks in connection with their US cross-border business. By the end of 2018, more than 90 Swiss banks had reached an agreement with the US authorities and paid penalties totalling more than 6 billion Swiss francs.

Notable also are the investigations launched by FINMA and the Office of the Attorney General (OAG) in connection with the global money-laundering scandal around the Malaysian sovereign wealth fund 1MDB, and the investigations around the FIFA corruption scandal and the diesel emissions fraud scandal.

In connection with Brazil's biggest corruption case – Odebrecht/Petrobras (Operation Car Wash) – the Swiss prosecutors and FINMA have sent disclosure orders to more than 40 Swiss banks and seized assets of more than US$1 billion. By the end of 2018, the Swiss authorities were able to transfer more than 300 million Swiss francs to the Brazilian authorities. In 2018, the OAG initiated criminal proceedings against two Swiss banks.

At the national level, notable cases are the investigations in connection with possible irregularities regarding certain private and business dealings of the former chief executive officer of Raiffeisen Bank and the investigation regarding incorrect accounting practices of the state-owned post bus company that had led to receipt of considerably higher subsidies than would otherwise have been due to it.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

Corporate criminal liability in Switzerland can arise in two situations. First, a corporation will be held criminally liable if it is not possible to attribute an offence to any specific individual because of the inadequate organisation of the corporation. Second, a corporation may be held criminally liable if it fails to take all necessary and reasonable organisational measures to prevent certain offences, such as bribery, corruption, financing of terrorism or money laundering. The penalty is a fine up to 5 million Swiss francs.

Corporations may also be fined in administrative criminal proceedings instead of the responsible individual if a penalty of no more than 5,000 Swiss francs will be imposed and the investigations would be disproportionate compared to the fine. If the matter concerns a violation of financial market laws, the fine may be as high as 50,000 Swiss francs.

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

There are no specific law enforcement authorities regulating corporations. Accordingly, there are no specific policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations.

At cantonal level, criminal laws are enforced by the regional and cantonal prosecutors with the assistance of the police. Some cantons have specialist prosecutors' offices for business crimes.

At federal level, the OAG is responsible for prosecuting offences that are subject to federal jurisdiction (e.g., espionage, certain cases of corruption, international organised crime and certain white-collar crimes). The Federal Department of Finance is generally responsible for prosecuting offences against financial market laws (e.g., violation of duty to file a suspicious activity report or violation of disclosure rules).

In addition, government agencies enforce administrative laws and regulations. Important regulatory authorities at a national level are FINMA, which is responsible for monitoring financial institutions and enforcing the financial market legislation, and the Competition Commission (COMCO), which is responsible for monitoring companies for signs of anti-competitive conduct, combating harmful cartels and enforcing merger control legislation.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

The police, the prosecutors and the Federal Department of Finance are required to open an investigation once they become aware of a potential criminal offence.

FINMA will initiate an investigation if it has reason to believe that financial market laws and regulations have been violated. However, FINMA has some discretion in deciding whether to open formal enforcement proceedings. For example, it may refrain from opening formal enforcement proceedings if a supervised entity fully co-operates and instantly implements all necessary remedial measures to ensure compliance with financial market legislation.

COMCO has adopted guidelines to establish the circumstances under which it will investigate antitrust violations. It usually opens an investigation when an alleged violation is serious or has a significant effect on the market, or when the case raises a legal question that warrants judicial clarification. COMCO usually declines to investigate complaints when the issue could be better solved through private litigation. COMCO can also decline to investigate a complaint when the target business has already changed its policy, or when it agrees to adapt its market behaviour or contracts.

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

In general, any orders from authorities can be challenged before the competent authorities and courts.

In criminal proceedings (including administrative criminal proceedings), records and objects must be sealed if the owner claims that they may not be searched or seized (e.g., owing to attorney–client privilege). The authorities then have the possibility to file a request for the removal of the seal before the competent courts.

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

Confessions and co-operation during the investigations in administrative criminal proceedings and criminal proceedings may lead to a reduction in the sentence. However, there are currently no specific immunity or leniency rules in Swiss criminal laws for co-operation. Therefore, an individual must carefully assess the potential benefits and downsides and decide on a case-by-case-basis whether he or she wants to co-operate with the authorities.

In enforcement proceedings, supervised entities and individuals are in general required to provide all information and documents that FINMA requests to fulfil its supervisory tasks. In this context, co-operation is not a mitigating factor but a statutory obligation. However, a supervised entity or individual is more likely to be able to negotiate an alternative resolution and to avoid formal enforcement proceedings by agreeing to co-operate with FINMA and take remedial measures.

COMCO has adopted a leniency policy that closely mirrors the model of the European Commission's programme. Companies may be granted complete or partial immunity from sanctions if they self-report, hand over all available evidence and fully co-operate with COMCO. However, only the company that first reports a cartel may benefit from full immunity. Companies reporting subsequently may receive a reduction of their fine if they provide significant additional evidence.

In tax law, voluntary disclosure may lead to a mitigation or waiver of punishment if certain requirements are met.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

In recent years, the focus of the Swiss law enforcement authorities has been on corruption, fraud and money laundering cases. In addition, there has been an increase in criminal proceedings in connection with cybercrime.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

Currently, there is no specific legislation regarding cybersecurity. Instead, cybersecurity is regulated by a variety of Swiss laws and regulations.

According to the Federal Data Protection Act (FDPA), personal data must be protected against unauthorised processing through adequate technical and organisational measures. In general, any violations of this principle must be enforced by bringing an action before the civil courts. The Federal Data Protection and Information Commissioner (FDPIC) has currently no enforcement powers (see question 21).

Based on the Financial Market Infrastructure Act, financial market infrastructures are required to operate IT systems that ensure the availability, confidentiality and integrity of data relating to participants and their transactions. Violations of these requirements might lead to investigations or, in serious cases, to formal enforcement proceedings by FINMA. Data breaches concerning data covered by Swiss bank secrecy may result in imprisonment for up to three years or a monetary penalty of up to 540,000 Swiss francs.

Currently, there is no general statutory duty to report data breaches. Depending on the circumstances, however, it might be advisable to notify the data subjects affected by such breaches based on the general data processing rules. In addition, there are some sector-specific reporting obligations, including in the financial services, telecommunications, aviation, railway and nuclear sectors.

It is also possible (not an obligation) to inform the Swiss Reporting and Analysis Centre for Information Assurance (known as MELANI) about cyber incidents.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

There is no specific law in Switzerland that regulates cybercrime. However, there are several provisions in the Swiss Criminal Code (SCC) that are specific to cybercrime, including unauthorised obtaining of data or unauthorised access to a data processing system. Depending on the circumstances, other criminal provisions may be applicable also, such as document forgery, extortion, coercion and money laundering.

Switzerland is a member of the Budapest Convention on Cybercrime. The main objective of the Convention is to pursue a common criminal policy aimed at protecting society against cybercrime, especially by adopting appropriate legislation and fostering international co-operation.

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

Generally, the Swiss authorities have jurisdiction over offences committed in Switzerland. An offence is committed in Switzerland if either the accused person acted in Switzerland or the offence had effects in Switzerland.

In specific cases, Swiss courts also have jurisdiction over offences committed abroad, including:

- offences against the Swiss state or its national security;
- specific offences against minors (e.g., trafficking, sexual assault, rape);
- offences that Switzerland undertook to pursue based on an international treaty if the offence is also punishable in the place it was committed; and
- offences that are punishable both in Switzerland and the place abroad where it was committed if the offence in question is an extraditable offence and the accused person is located in Switzerland but not extradited.

If the offence was committed abroad, the main evidence often needs to be obtained through international mutual legal assistance, which might be a lengthy process depending on the foreign authorities. Swiss authorities are thus usually selective in the prosecution of such offences. Instead, they try to prosecute foreign offences indirectly by targeting the accused persons for related offences committed in Switzerland (in particular, money laundering).

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

The typical issue in cross-border investigations is the transfer of personal data from Switzerland to foreign courts, regulators or enforcement authorities. Several legal provisions restrict the disclosure of personal data to foreign authorities, inter alia, the prohibition of unlawful activities on behalf of a foreign state (Article 271, SCC), Swiss banking secrecy (Article 47, Federal Banking Act), Swiss data protection and labour laws. Additionally, contractual secrecy obligations or confidentiality agreements may prevent the disclosure of data.

Article 271 of the SCC prohibits and sanctions activities on behalf of a foreign state on Swiss territory unless the competent administrative body has granted an authorisation. In general, Swiss-based corporations and individuals are thus required to obtain authorisation if they intend to disclose personal data to foreign authorities.

Pursuant to Article 47 of the Federal Banking Act, it is an offence to disclose confidential information relating to current or former clients of a Swiss bank. A breach of Swiss banking secrecy may not only trigger criminal sanctions but also administrative measures or proceedings and civil liability.

The FDPA requires, inter alia, that personal data only be processed in compliance with specific processing rules (see question 21). In addition, the FDPA provides that personal data may not be disclosed to recipients outside Switzerland if this seriously endangers the privacy of the data subject (Article 6, FDPA). Such a risk is presumed as a matter of statutory law if the country of destination is lacking adequate data protection regulation. The FDPIC maintains a list of countries that are deemed to have adequate data protection.

When foreign authorities use the available channels of mutual administrative or legal assistance to obtain documents and information, the aforementioned provisions do not apply.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

Switzerland applies the ne bis in idem doctrine, which is essentially the equivalent of the double jeopardy concept in common law jurisdictions. Based on this doctrine, no person who has been convicted or acquitted in Switzerland in a final legally binding judgment may be prosecuted again for the same offence. This also applies to corporations. Owing to the territoriality principle, a foreign prosecution or conviction has, in general, no effect on the jurisdiction of Swiss criminal authorities regarding offences committed in Switzerland. Under certain conditions, however, the Swiss criminal authorities have to observe a foreign verdict of acquittal or reduce the sentence if it has already been partly served abroad.

Unless the investigations do not have the same subject matter, multiple government authorities may simultaneously investigate the same corporation. If appropriate, they usually coordinate their actions and may consult each other to ensure that their investigations do not interfere with each other or duplicate the same enquiries. The ne bis in idem doctrine prohibits multiple authorities from penalising companies for the same conduct. However, in general, the doctrine has no effect on civil or regulatory proceedings. Therefore, regulatory authorities may order additional measures against a corporation even if that corporation has already been convicted or acquitted in criminal proceedings.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

Global settlements are not frequent in Switzerland. However, the Swiss authorities do co-operate with foreign authorities based on applicable laws, in particular in connection with multi-jurisdictional investigations.

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

In general, Swiss authorities conduct their investigations independently. However, investigations or decisions of foreign authorities may cause the Swiss authorities to initiate an investigation.

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

Switzerland's sanctions programme authorises the Federal Council to impose non-military measures to implement sanctions that have been imposed by the United Nations, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development or by Switzerland's most significant trading partners (e.g., the European Union) for the enforcement of international law, in particular of human rights.

Possible sanctions are direct or indirect restrictions on transactions involving goods and services, payment and capital transfers, the movement of persons, scientific, technological and cultural exchange as well as prohibitions, licensing and reporting obligations and other restrictions of rights.

In general, Switzerland updates its sanctions lists in accordance with those issued by the United Nations.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

The State Secretariat for Economic Affairs is the main authority with responsibility for monitoring and implementing sanctions. A breach of sanctions may result in imprisonment for up to five years, which may be combined with a fine of up to 1 million Swiss francs.

SECO does not publish information on its sanctions enforcement activity. Based on our experience, however, there has not been a significant increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

The Swiss authorities co-operate with their foreign counterparts provided that the co-operation is necessary for the implementation of the imposed sanctions regime, the foreign authorities are bound by official secrecy or a corresponding duty of secrecy, and they guarantee the prevention of industrial espionage within the scope of their activities.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

Switzerland does not have restrictions in place that prohibit adherence to other jurisdictions' sanctions or embargoes. However, the blocking statutes, and secrecy and data protection regulations (see question 11), may restrict compliance with foreign reporting obligations relating to sanctions imposed by other countries or supranational organisations.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

Not applicable (see question 18).

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

The Swiss authorities initiate their investigations in general based on their own observations, criminal or other complaints filed by victims or third parties, reports by whistleblowers, media reports and reports from other authorities, including foreign authorities. The criminal authorities and FINMA are required to report all offences they become aware of in their official capacity. Investigations are also often triggered by suspicious activity and transaction reports filed with the Money Laundering Reporting Office of Switzerland.

Information gathering

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

The basis of the data protection regime in Switzerland is the FDPA, which is applicable when personal data is processed in Switzerland by a federal authority or a private person (individual or entity). Personal data is defined as all information relating to an identified or identifiable person (individual or entity).

The FDPA requires, inter alia, that personal data only be processed lawfully, in good faith, in a proportionate manner and transparently. Any data processing that does not comply with these processing rules constitutes a breach of the data subject's personality rights. Such breaches are unlawful unless they are justified by the consent of the data subject, by an overriding private or public interest, or by a statutory provision of Swiss law.

The FDPA is currently under revision to bring it into alignment with the revised data protection regime of the European Union.

In addition, there are a number of additional statutory provisions that regulate or prohibit the process or disclosure of data (e.g., Swiss bank secrecy, professional secrecy, employment law).

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

The FDPIC is the relevant authority if federal authorities, individuals or entities process personal data in Switzerland. At the moment, the FDPIC only has limited powers; specifically, it has no enforcement powers and cannot impose any fines or sanctions. The FDPIC may issue recommendations that a specific method of data processing be amended or abandoned. If the party concerned does not follow the recommendation or rejects it, the FDPIC may file an action with the Federal Administrative Court. The Court's decision may be challenged before the Federal Supreme Court.

If an individual or entity wilfully fails to comply with its information, registration or co-operation obligation under the FDPA, it may receive a fine of up to 10,000 Swiss francs.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

Internal investigations must be set up in compliance with data protection laws. In practice, the most important data protection issue in connection with internal investigations is the provision that personal data may not be disclosed to recipients outside Switzerland if this seriously endangers the privacy of the data subject. Therefore, personal data may only be transferred to a country with inadequate data protection regulation if it justified by a statutory provision of Swiss law, the consent of the data subject, or an overriding public interest

(an overriding private interest does not suffice). However, Swiss courts only exceptionally acknowledge the existence of an overriding public interest.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

Based on data protection and labour laws, employees must be informed about the method, scope, period and purpose of any visual, audio or electronic monitoring. Consequently, any monitoring that is clandestine, or has not been announced in advance, is prohibited and cannot be justified by an overriding interest of the employer.

In addition, there are several criminal provisions that sanction the breach of privacy.

Dawn raids and search warrants

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

In connection with investigations, dawn raids and search warrants are common tools of the authorities.

In general, houses, dwellings and other rooms not publicly accessible may only be searched with the consent of the proprietor unless a search warrant has been issued. Searches not covered by the search warrant are in general unlawful and evidence obtained in connection with such an illegal search is inadmissible unless it is essential to secure a conviction for a serious offence. Other evidence gained from that tainted evidence is in general also not admissible.

Search warrants can be challenged before the competent authorities or courts based on both the legitimacy and the scope of the search.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

A request may be made to seal privileged material, but this must be done without delay. The authorities must not search the sealed material, but they may file a request before the competent courts for the removal of the seal. The court will then review whether the claim of privilege is valid. The court's decision may be challenged before the Federal Supreme Court.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

Every individual from the age of 15 and with the mental capacity to testify is compelled to testify before the criminal prosecution authorities and criminal courts unless they have the right to refuse testimony because of a personal relationship (e.g., marriage, kinship), for personal protection (self-incrimination) or to protect closely related persons (e.g., spouses, parents, children, siblings), or owing to official secrecy or professional confidentiality (which applies to, for example, lawyers, members of the clergy, physicians).

Whistleblowing and employee rights

28 Describe the whistleblowing framework in your country. What financial incentive schemes exist for whistleblowers? What legal protections are in place for whistleblowers?

There is currently no specific whistleblowing framework in existence in Switzerland; in particular, there is no specific protection for whistleblowers. A proposal of the Federal Council to improve the protection for whistleblowers was rejected by the National Council in 2019.

Based on Swiss labour law, employees are bound by a duty of loyalty towards their employers. Therefore, they risk legal consequences if they report potential misconduct publicly or to the authorities.

Swiss courts consider a dismissal in connection with whistleblowing to be abusive only if the employee first reported the offence or misconduct internally but if the management did not take appropriate remedial measures. Under Swiss labour law, even an abusive termination is valid and only entitles the dismissed employee to a financial compensation of up to six months' salary.

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

Under Swiss labour law, all employees have a general duty of loyalty towards their employers as well as an obligation to account for all their activities and work-product during their period of employment. Based on these provisions, it is recognised that employees have to assist with internal investigations conducted by the employer, including providing relevant documents and information, and participating in interviews. In return, employers have the obligation to safeguard the personal rights of their employees. If employees might be subject to criminal prosecution, it is in general advisable to alert them to the right not to incriminate oneself and to allow them not to respond to specific questions. However, there is no uniform opinion regarding this matter. The same applies to the question whether employees are entitled to have legal representation or a trusted adviser present during interviews.

In general, employees with high-level positions have an increased duty of loyalty towards their employees compared to other employees and thus have increased co-operation obligations in connection with internal investigations.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

Under Swiss labour law, an ordinary dismissal is possible at any time without specific grounds, while an immediate dismissal requires a material ground. Based on case law, the employer is generally required to investigate the allegations of potential misconduct before dismissing the employee. Otherwise, the dismissal might be considered as abusive and thus entitle the employee to financial compensation.

In practice, corporations tend to suspend employees from work while the investigation regarding their potential misconduct is ongoing.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

An unwarranted refusal to co-operate with an employer's internal investigation constitutes a breach of contractual duties and may entitle the employer to take disciplinary action against the non-co-operating employee, including, in serious cases, dismissal.

Commencing an internal investigation

32 Is it common practice in your country to prepare a document setting out terms of reference or investigatory scope before commencing an internal investigation? What issues would it cover?

It is common practice in Switzerland to prepare an investigation plan prior to the launch of the investigation. The plan should define in particular the subject matter (i.e., the factual and legal topics to be covered) and the scope of the investigation. Additionally, investigation plans often define investigatory steps, timeframes, resources and responsibilities as well as status and final reporting.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

There is no explicit statutory obligation to conduct an internal investigation. However, several provisions in corporate, labour, regulatory and criminal law may require a corporation to investigate potential misconduct so as to avoid liability and sanctions, or to be able to co-operate with the authorities.

Based on their duty of loyalty, employees are in general obliged to report to their superiors if they become aware of potential misconduct within the company. Management is required to inform the board of directors of any misconduct with potential material effects on the corporation.

In recent years, many corporations have introduced whistleblower frameworks that allow employees or third parties to file complaints anonymously.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

Under Swiss criminal law, it is illegal to interfere with the course of justice, in particular to tamper with or destroy evidence. In addition, corporations have statutory obligations to preserve documents for certain periods (in general for 10 years). Therefore, corporations are required to have the appropriate systems and directives in place and to provide all employees with clear instructions to prevent material from being destroyed that is subject to an order from a law enforcement authority.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

Unless the company is listed on the Swiss stock exchange (see question 73), there is no obligation to inform the public about an internal investigation or an inquiry from a law enforcement authority.

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

In general, internal investigations are welcomed, or at least tolerated, by Swiss enforcement authorities as long as they do not negatively affect or impact their own investigations. Often internal investigations are a practical necessity for corporations to be in a position to respond to requests from criminal or regulatory authorities.

Attorney–client privilege

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

In general, internal investigations conducted by Swiss attorneys are subject to attorney–client privilege. In two recent decisions, however, the Federal Supreme Court called into question the generality of that rule.

In both cases, the clients were financial institutions and the authorities claimed that the invocation of attorney–client privilege to protect the investigation report and its annexes would constitute a circumvention of statutory documentation obligations under the anti-money laundering legislation. Both decisions have been heavily criticised in the legal community.

Best practice to uphold attorney–client privilege in connection with internal investigations includes a clear definition of the scope of the investigation and a clear separation between fact finding and legal analysis and advice. If the client is subject to anti-money laundering duties, potential documentation obligations should either be part of a separate investigation stream and report, or explicitly excluded from the scope of the investigation conducted by external counsel.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

All communications between a client and an attorney (see questions 39 and 40 for certain limitations) and all work-product are subject to attorney–client privilege provided that they are related to the attorney's typical professional activities (i.e., advising and representing in legal matters). The protection applies irrespective of the location of the correspondence and documents, that is to say the material does not need to reside with the attorney to be privileged.

In criminal proceedings, privilege cannot be invoked if the attorney is charged in the same context.

Pre-existing documents and materials created outside the scope of an attorney's engagement are not subject to attorney–client privilege.

Both the client and the attorney are deemed holders of the attorney–client privilege. This means that the client can release the attorney from the confidentiality obligation but the attorney may still refuse to disclose privileged information despite the release.

Attorney–client privilege can be invoked by both individual and corporate clients.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

The attorney–client privilege only applies to external counsel. Consequently, communications between employees of a corporation and in-house counsel are not privileged in Switzerland.

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

According to Swiss procedural laws, attorney–client privilege only applies to Swiss attorneys and lawyers in EU member states or the European Free Trade Association countries who are authorised to practise in Switzerland.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

Swiss authorities cannot require a client or the attorney to waive attorney–client privilege. If there is a disagreement as to whether specific material is privileged, the competent courts will decide whether the documents may be used by the authorities. If a corporation or individual under investigation seeks leniency but at the same time heavily relies on attorney–client privilege, this approach might be considered as inconsistent and thus as a lack of co-operation.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

As a general rule, attorney–client communications or work-product may be disclosed to third parties, including Swiss authorities, without waiving privilege. However, such disclosure may lead to factual loss of privilege if the proceedings are public (e.g., court hearings) or the authority is required to share the information with other Swiss or foreign authorities (e.g., mutual administrative or legal assistance). Therefore, it should be decided carefully on a case-by-case basis whether privileged information will be disclosed to Swiss authorities.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

In general, attorney–client privilege waived on a limited basis in another country can generally be maintained in Switzerland. However, the foreign-based recipient of the privileged information may share the information with the Swiss authorities without informing the privilege holder.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

The concept of common interest privileges does not exist in Switzerland. Corporations and individuals represented by separate attorneys may share information and work-product with each other without waiving attorney–client privilege under Swiss law.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

Attorney–client privilege also applies to third parties assisting a Swiss attorney (or an attorney authorised to practise in Switzerland) if the third parties have been engaged by the attorney and the assistance is related to the attorney's typical professional activity (e.g., forensic analysis for advising and representing a client in administrative, civil or criminal proceedings).

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

There are no specific laws on how to conduct an internal investigation. In general, interviewing witnesses is permitted in Switzerland but interviews may only be recorded by a camera or audio device if all participants agree to the recording. Violation of this principle constitutes a criminal offence.

According to case law, Swiss lawyers may only perform interviews if there is a factual need for the interview, the interview is in the interest of the client, the lawyer avoids any influence on the interviewee and the interview does not impair investigations by the authorities. These requirements are usually met when a lawyer conducts a mere fact-finding interview in connection with an internal investigation.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

Until recently, the commonly held view was that work-product created by external counsel in connection with internal investigations, including witness interviews or attorney reports, is subject to attorney–client privilege. This view has been challenged based on two recent decisions of the Federal Supreme Court (see question 37).

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

At the beginning of the interview, the interviewee should be informed about the background of the investigation, the purpose of the interview, any allegations made against the interviewee, and the intended use of the information provided during the interview (in particular whether the information may be shared with authorities). If external lawyers are present at the interview, it should be emphasised that they represent the interests of the corporation and not those of the interviewee.

The questioning should be fair, objective and based on civility and respect towards the interviewee. If it becomes apparent in the course of the interview that an interviewee may expose himself or herself to criminal prosecution, the interviewee should be informed about the right to refuse to testify and the right to seek legal representation. If the authorities are already investigating the matter, it might be advisable to liaise with them to clarify whether they have any objections to the interview.

In general, the aforementioned best practices apply to both employees and third parties. The main difference is, however, that third parties do not have an obligation to assist with an internal investigation and to participate in an interview.

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

The structure of an internal interview will depend on the investigation and the person to be interviewed (for details, see questions 46 and 48). Documents will be presented to the interviewee if it is necessary or helpful for the line of questioning.

Whether or not an interviewee has a right to legal representation has not been established by the courts to date.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

There is no general statutory obligation to report potential offences or misconduct to the authorities in Switzerland.

In the financial sector, there are two main reporting obligations. First, supervised entities and individuals must inform FINMA immediately about any incident, including potential offences or misconduct within their activities, that is of material relevance for the supervision. Second, Swiss financial intermediaries are required to report cases of suspected money laundering to the Money Laundering Reporting Office of Switzerland based on applicable Swiss anti-money laundering provisions.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

Among the many factors to determine whether to self-report are the likelihood that potential misconduct will become public or otherwise known to the competent authorities and the availability of a leniency regime or co-operation bonus. The decision to self-report should be made from a multinational perspective if the potential misconduct relates to more than one jurisdiction.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

Before approaching the authorities, the company should have a sufficient understanding of the relevant facts of the misconduct it plans to report. This often requires a preliminary internal investigation. In practice, it is often advisable to contact the authorities informally through external counsel.

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

Corporations are required to comply with notices and subpoenas unless they challenge them before the competent agencies or courts (see also question 54). There is no obligation to liaise with the law enforcement authorities before responding to notices or subpoenas. In practice, however, in many cases it is advisable to enter into a dialogue with the law enforcement authorities to get a better understanding of the background, the scope and the next steps of the investigation. A dialogue can also be helpful to clarify potential misunderstandings or ambiguities. Under certain circumstances, the authorities may be willing to amend their notices or subpoenas (e.g., when it would be practically or technically impossible or far too burdensome to provide the authorities with the information or documents requested).

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

In criminal law, the initiation of investigations and preliminary proceedings is not subject to challenge before the courts unless the accused person claims that it would constitute a violation of the ne bis in idem doctrine (see question 12). In practice, the initiation of administrative or regulatory investigations cannot be challenged either.

Once the investigations or preliminary proceedings are ongoing, procedural orders, compulsory measures, and decisions may usually be challenged before the competent agencies or courts.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

Nowadays, Swiss and foreign authorities increasingly tend to coordinate a course of action in multi-jurisdictional investigations.

Owing to several Swiss legal provisions, corporations and individuals based in Switzerland are subject to several restrictions when co-operating with foreign authorities, in particular if the requested information and documents include personal data of employees, third parties and clients (see question 11). Should a foreign authority issue a notice or subpoena, the company must carefully consider whether it may co-operate, may provide only redacted information, needs to obtain an authorisation from the Swiss authorities or should inform the foreign authority that they have to use the channels of mutual administrative or legal assistance.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

In general, the Swiss authorities do not seek production of material that is only available outside Switzerland. In such cases, the Swiss authorities will rather use the available channels of mutual administrative or legal assistance to obtain the material.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

Switzerland co-operates with foreign authorities based on mutual administrative or legal assistance and police co-operation through Interpol and Europol.

Whether or not assistance is granted depends on whether the applicable requirements are met. In addition, the persons concerned may challenge the decisions of the Swiss authorities to grant assistance before the competent courts.

The sharing of information with Interpol and Europol is in general not subject to challenge before the courts. However, persons may request that information related to them will be amended or deleted.

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

For the confidentiality obligations of the Swiss authorities, see question 70.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

If a Swiss authority issues a notice or subpoena that would violate foreign law, the company may challenge the order before the competent authority or court. However, Swiss authorities will usually use the available channels of mutual administrative or legal assistance (see question 56).

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

Switzerland has several secrecy or blocking statutes that restrict co-operation with foreign authorities (see questions 11 and 55).

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

In general, there are no legal risks involved if the production is based on an order or subpoena issued by the Swiss authorities.

In respect of voluntary productions, however, corporations and individuals co-operating with Swiss authorities must be careful not to violate applicable data protection, labour and secrecy laws (in particular, business secrecy and bank secrecy). To reduce their exposure to risk, they can either obtain consent from the data subjects and secrecy owners, or redact the protected information.

For confidentiality regarding both voluntary and compelled productions, see question 70.

Prosecution and penalties

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

In criminal proceedings, a corporation may face a fine of up to 5 million Swiss francs (for lesser fines in criminal administrative proceedings, see question 2). In addition, the court may order the publication of the judgment and the forfeiture or confiscation of assets.

Depending on the offence committed, directors, officers or employees may be punished with a fine (in general, up to 10,000 Swiss francs), monetary penalty (in general, up to 540,000 Swiss francs) or imprisonment (in general, up to 20 years).

In enforcement proceedings, FINMA has a wide set of enforcement tools. Inter alia, FINMA may confiscate profits generated or losses avoided through serious violations of financial market laws and regulations by supervised entities or individuals in senior functions, prohibit individuals from exercising a professional activity, withdraw licences, and order the liquidation of financial institutions in the event of serious violations. In addition, individuals and entities that do not comply with an order by FINMA may be fined up to 100,000 Swiss francs. Finally, individuals who provide FINMA with false information may face a custodial sentence of up to three years or a monetary penalty.

Some supervisory authorities (e.g., COMCO in antitrust and OFCOM in telecommunication matters) may impose fines of up to 10 percent of the average turnover of the corporation in Switzerland during the previous three years.

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

Debarment from government contracts is currently not a specific sanction under Swiss law. However, if a settlement with a foreign authority may have a relevant effect on the corporation's liquidity, stability, business or reputation, it is advisable to liaise with the competent supervisory authority prior to the settlement.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

Relevant factors for determining the fines for corporations in connection with any wrongdoing are the seriousness and number of the offences committed in their commercial activities, the damage caused by the offences, the severity of the organisational inadequacies, the economic ability of the corporation to bear the fine, remedial measures taken (e.g., restructuring measures or reparation payments), the insensitivity and quality of the corporation's co-operation with the authorities during the investigation and previous misconduct.

For individuals, the criminal authorities have to take a variety of aspects into account, inter alia, the culpability (i.e., damage caused, conduct and motives), previous conduct and the personal circumstances of the offender as well as potential mitigation factors (e.g., honourable motives, serious distress, dependency, remorse) and the effect that the sentence will have on the offender's life.

Overall, we observe a tendency by criminal authorities to impose higher fines and monetary penalties as well as longer custodial sentences for business crimes.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

Neither deferred prosecution agreements nor non-prosecution agreements are available in Switzerland, either for corporations or individuals.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

No, since deferred prosecution agreements and non-prosecution agreements are currently not available in Switzerland (see question 65).

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

According to Swiss case law, journalists are entitled to access settlements with prosecutors unless the access would be contrary to overriding public or private interests. Therefore, corporations should be prepared for media enquiries and coverage once they have reached a settlement. In addition, plaintiffs may use publicly available orders against a corporation to pursue their civil claims because most settlements include an implicit admission of guilt (e.g., payment of reparation or acceptance of the facts).

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

Swiss criminal law currently does not provide external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool.

However, FINMA may engage an independent and suitably qualified person as either an investigating agent or an auditing agent. Investigating agents will be engaged in connection with enforcement proceedings and are responsible for investigating the facts in connection with a potential misconduct or implementing supervisory measures ordered by FINMA. Auditing agents will conduct special audits of supervised individuals and entities.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

In connection with criminal investigations and proceedings against corporations or their (former) employees, individuals or entities claiming damages regularly request to participate as private plaintiffs. If they are admitted to participate in the criminal proceedings as private plaintiffs, they may have access to the case file, be present during hearings of parties and witnesses, ask questions of the parties and witnesses, submit requests for evidence, and file appeals against orders and the final judgment.

In administrative proceedings, however, in particular in enforcement proceedings conducted by FINMA, private plaintiffs are not parties to the proceedings and thus have no access to the case file and will not be informed about the outcome of the investigation and proceedings.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

Swiss authorities and their staff are bound by official secrecy and may only disclose non-public information they become aware of during the exercise of their official duties, provided the law allows them to do so.

Investigations and pretrial proceedings conducted by the criminal authorities are not public. Therefore, the criminal authorities must treat as confidential any information gathered or received during the investigations and pretrial proceedings.

Once a case is before a court, the proceedings and the oral passing of judgments are, in general, open to the public.

FINMA does not usually inform the public about pending investigations. It only publishes information on specific proceedings when this is necessary to protect market participants, to correct wrong or misleading media reports or to maintain the reputation of the Swiss marketplace. If there is a serious violation of the law, FINMA may publish its final ruling and disclose personal data about individuals and entities.

COMCO is required to issue an official press release when opening a formal investigation stating the purpose of and parties to the investigation. COMCO may publish its decision but the publications must not reveal any business secrets. Corporations named in the decision receive the decision prior to publication and may ask COMCO to redact further information if this is necessary to protect business secrecy or personal privacy.

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

Communications strategies vary from company to company and will need to be assessed for each situation separately, taking into account various factors, such as the complexity and gravity of the issue or crisis. In complex or severe cases, it has become common to build a communications task force, including external counsel and communications experts, that provides guidance on the communications strategy.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

The communication strategy depends on the specific circumstances. In general, corporations tend not to comment on ongoing proceedings or only give very high-level comments.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

In general, there is no mandatory obligation to disclose to the market when a settlement has been reached. However, depending on the circumstances (e.g., penalty amount, effect on business), the conclusion of a settlement may lead to a disclosure obligation under the ad hoc publicity rules under which publicly listed companies have to disclose any information in their sphere of activity that could have a substantial impact on the market price.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

As mentioned in question 65, Switzerland currently has no tools that correspond to deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs) or non-prosecution agreements as known in other jurisdictions. In connection with the planned revision of the Swiss Criminal Procedure Code, the OAG proposed the introduction of a form of DPA (aufgeschobene Anklageerhebung). However, the Swiss Federal Council rejected the proposal in its Official Statement to the Swiss Federal Parliament dated August 2019. Therefore, it is doubtful whether DPAs will be introduced into Swiss law in the foreseeable future.

General context, key principles and hot topics

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

Since the attempted coup on 15 July 2016, criminal investigations relating to the Fethullah Gulen Terrorist Organisation (FETO) have been initiated. These investigations have also extended to corporations; those being funded by FETO or financing any associated corporation or institution, or having any kind of connection with FETO, have also been under the spotlight of the law enforcement authorities. The Financial Crimes Investigation Board (MASAK) is the organisation that has been involved to the greatest extent and has had an important role in these investigations as, in most cases, they concern financing terrorism. This involvement has resulted in new legal regulations that have extended the scope of MASAK's authority and reorganised its structure. However, it is not possible to give any detailed information about these investigations as these procedures are highly confidential and are not reported in the press.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

Under Turkish law, corporations cannot be held criminally liable. When a crime is committed for the benefit of a legal person by the participation of its representatives or authorised bodies, the Turkish Criminal Code (CC) provides for security measures to be imposed on that legal person. Those measures are listed as the cancellation of business licences granted by a public authority, and the seizure of goods that are used, allocated for or gained as a result of the commission of crime. In addition, in cases where certain crimes (e.g., fraud, collusive tendering, bribery, money laundering) are committed by representatives or authorised bodies or by third persons who perform a task within the framework of its field of activity, administrative fines are also imposed on the legal person, as prescribed by Article 43 of the Law on Misdemeanours.

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

There are no special authorities relating to the prosecution of corporations. When a crime is committed by a corporation, public prosecutors and criminal courts prosecute representatives or members of authorised bodies of the corporation. In addition, pursuant to Law No. 5549 on Prevention of Laundering Proceeds of Crime, MASAK is authorised to convey to the public prosecutor's office any case in which there is serious suspicion that a money laundering or terrorist financing offence has been committed.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

Having an impression that a crime has been committed is sufficient for the public prosecutor to trigger an investigation. According to Article 160 of the Criminal Procedure Code (CPC), the public prosecutor would start an investigation as soon as he or she becomes aware of any impression of a crime being committed, by any means (e.g., the reporting of a crime).

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

Whereas Law No. 2577 on Administrative Procedure provides application to a superior administrative body or the filing of a cancellation action as legal remedies to challenge the lawfulness or scope of an administrative action, the CPC provides an objection procedure before the issuing authority or its superior. The procedure to be followed when filing these applications and the time limits within which they should be made are set out clearly by these laws. Similar procedures are also set out by various special laws, such as the Law on Capital Markets and the Law on Misdemeanours.

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

Although it is not an agreement technically, there is an effective remorse mechanism (leniency-type mechanism) under the CC that provides for either a reduction in the punishment or full immunity. This mechanism applies for certain crimes only as prescribed by the CC; these include bribery and money laundering. In terms of bribery, if either the perpetrator, participant, intermediary or accessory to a crime reports the same to the authorities before the law enforcement bodies become aware of it, that person will not be subject to any punishment for bribery. In terms of money-laundering, there will be no punishment for a person who helps the law enforcement bodies to seize the assets that are the subject of a crime or reports their location before the commencement of criminal proceedings.

There are some reconciliation mechanisms that apply with regard to tax and customs-related administrative investigations and sanctions. These mechanisms do not provide for complete immunity, but do provide for considerable decreases in the fines and penalties imposed.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

In parallel with our response to question 1, the fight against terrorism has been the top priority of law enforcement authorities in Turkey. There have been amendments to several acts related to counter-terrorism and to the rules of the CPC concerning the investigation and trial procedures for such crimes.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

Cybersecurity has recently become a hot topic in Turkey. According to the Electronic Communications Law, the task of determining the politics and strategies to secure national cybersecurity and to coordinate entities in the field of cybersecurity is assigned to the Ministry of Transportation and Infrastructure and the Information Technologies and Communications Institution (ITI).

In the National Cyber Security Strategy, certain sectors are listed as 'critical infrastructure sector' and cybersecurity in these (for both public and private entities) has been highlighted: electronic communication, energy, water management, critical public services, transportation, and banking and finance. The Ministry has published several sets of guidelines for the establishment of operations units for cyber incidents (OUCIs) for entities in these sectors.

ITI has been established as a regulatory and supervisory authority of the telecommunications sector and it has a significant role in providing cybersecurity within electronic communications. In this respect, the National Operations Centre for Cyber Incidents in the framework of ITI ensures co-operation between the OUCIs of other regulatory and supervisory authorities and OUCIs established within the organisation of other public and private entities in the critical infrastructure sector.

There are also some sector-specific regulations on cybersecurity; for example, the Banking Regulation and Supervision Agency has published a draft regulation for banks on standards for cybersecurity.

Regulation on cybersecurity is likely to become more detailed in the years to come. To reflect the importance of the topic for the future, the 11th Development Plan (2019–2023), published by the Turkish presidency, set targets for cybersecurity and highlights the following strategic priorities:

- improvements in technology and human resources within cybersecurity;
- establishing undergraduate and graduate programmes in the area of cybersecurity;
- raising public awareness of this matter; and
- development of a cybersecurity infrastructure.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

Cybercrimes are regulated under the CC under an individual section where illegal access to a data processing system, the hindrance or destruction of a system, deletion or alteration of data and the misuse of debit or credit cards are regulated as crimes. The recording of personal data, unlawful delivery or acquisition of the same also constitutes a crime. For certain crimes, such as theft and fraud, commission of a crime through the use of a data processing system is regarded as an aggravated form of the crime. There is also a separate law regulating crimes committed via the internet (Law No. 5651).

The fight against cybercrime is undertaken by the Department of Cybercrimes, which is a unit within the General Directorate of Security. This Department was assigned as the point of contact to comply with the requirements of the EU Convention on Cybercrime, to which Turkey became a party in 2014. In addition to tasks relating to preventing and prosecuting cybercrimes, the Department has organised several workshops and educational activities to raise public awareness. In particular, the protection of children against any form of cyber-related abuse is one of the main topics about which the Department frequently publishes leaflets, brochures, etc.

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

In principle, the territorial scope of Turkish criminal law is limited to crimes committed within Turkey. However, trial and punishment in Turkey under Turkish laws and procedures for a crime committed in a foreign country, or by a citizen of a foreign state to the detriment of Turkey, is also possible when specific circumstances are satisfied (Articles 10 to 12, CC). Other than that, bribery can be charged as a specific crime with an extraterritorial effect in accordance with amendments to Article 252 of the CC on bribery in 2005 and 2012 in line with the process of implementation of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development' Convention on Combating Bribery of Foreign Public Officials in International Business Transactions 1997 (the OECD Anti-Bribery Convention). Accordingly, Article 252 of the CC applies to:

- public officials who have been appointed or elected in a foreign country;
- officials serving in international, supranational or foreign state courts (such as judges and members of juries);
- members of international and supranational parliaments;
- persons who perform a public duty for a foreign country, including foreign public institutions;
- citizens or foreign arbitrators who are appointed to arbitrate for a dispute resolution; and
- officials or representatives of international or supranational organisations that have been established by international treaties.

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

One of the main challenges that arises in cross-border investigations is the transfer of personal data pursuant to Law No. 6698 on the Protection of Personal Data (DPA) of 2016. Pursuant to Article 9 of the DPA, personal data may only be transferred abroad with the explicit consent of the data subject. However, if the general exceptions for the processing of personal data under Articles 5/2 and 6/2 exist (such as the existence of legal obligations or the legitimate interests of the data controller), personal data may be transferred abroad without explicit consent, given that the country that will obtain the data provides an adequate level of data protection or that the data controllers in both Turkey and the subject country provide a written undertaking to provide adequate protection and obtain the authorisation of the Data Protection Board. As at September 2019, the Data Protection Board has not published the countries deemed to be providing adequate protection.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

Notwithstanding the fact that legal persons cannot be held criminally liable under Turkish law, the principle of ne bis in idem is generally recognised at national level. However, Article 9 of the CC states that a person who has been sentenced in a foreign country for a crime committed in Turkey shall be tried again in Turkey. Although Article 16 of the CC provides for the deduction of the time spent in custody or detention in a foreign country from the term of sentence to be served in Turkey, parallel investigations and even verdicts can be possible for individuals where Article 9 of the CC applies. In terms of a legal person, in spite of the exemption from criminal liability, that person may face administrative sanctions or civil liability in Turkey for the same conduct that was the subject of resolved charges in another country.

In Turkey, there is not anything analogous to the anti-piling on policy as exists in the United States.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

Global settlements are not common practice in Turkey.

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

There is no specific or direct rule concerning the effect of the decisions of foreign authorities on an investigation to be conducted in Turkey for the same matter. That being said, the CC allows the retrial of a person who has committed a crime in Turkey or in a foreign country if that person has undertaken an official duty on behalf of the state, even if this person has been convicted by a foreign state court for the same matter. Naturally, the decisions of foreign authorities do not have any bearing on an investigation to be conducted for such cases. Law No. 5781 on International Private and Civil Procedural Law enables the recognition and enforcement of criminal court decisions only for verdicts concerning personal rights.

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

No economic sanctions have been implemented by Turkey in recent years. That being said, for many years, Turkey has imposed sanctions on Cyprus and Armenia, such as prevention of direct transport.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

Although official records show that Turkey has no direct trade with Cyprus or Armenia, it is a fact that Turkish merchants trade with these two countries indirectly. However, such relations are not strictly investigated or are not subject to any sanctions under the legislation.

So, it could be said that Turkey does not have a strict approach to sanctions enforcement.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

There is no such concept in Turkey as there is not a strict sanctions programme.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

There is no blocking legislation in force in relation to measures undertaken by third countries.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

There is no blocking legislation in force in relation to measures undertaken by third countries.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

Allegations of misconduct generally come to light either through internal sources, such as employees of a company, or external sources, such as customers or distributors. Although company employees often have concerns about being identified as a whistleblower, observations show that the higher the level of misconduct, the more likely it is that employees will disclose it to their superiors. In the case of distributors, whistleblowing seems to be mostly dependent on commercial interests, as distributors are more likely to reveal misconduct when commercial relationships have been destroyed. Internal audits are also a way of detecting misconduct.

Information gathering

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

Yes, the DPA was enacted on 7 April 2016. Following a two-year post-adoption grace period, the Act became fully enforceable in Turkey on 7 April 2018. Moreover, Turkey is a party to the Convention for the Protection of Individuals with regard to Automatic Processing of Personal Data (CETS No. 108). Although Turkey has been a party to the Convention since 1981, it was not ratified until 17 March 2016.

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

Pursuant to the DPA, the data protection regime is enforced by the Data Protection Board, and by criminal courts and public prosecutors for crimes regarding data protection offences.

Pursuant to Article 18 of the DPA, the Board is authorised to impose administrative fines on data controllers who breach the DPA by failing to fulfil the obligation of informing the data subject of the full scope of data processing activities, the obligations of data security, the obligation to comply with the Board's decisions and the obligation to be registered with the Data Controllers Registry. Depending on the nature of the breach of the DPA, administrative fines range from 7,352 to 1,470,580 Turkish lira and may be imposed on natural or legal persons who act as data controllers.

In April 2019, the Board imposed a fine of 1.6 million Turkish lira on Facebook because of its incapacity to block unauthorised access to the personal data of its users by some application programming interfaces, its failure to take explicit consent from the users and to duly inform the Board about the data breaches. Marriott International was fined 1.4 million Turkish lira for unauthorised access to customers' personal data within their information technology system for almost four years.

Articles 135 to 138 of the CC also regulate criminal liability regarding the data protection regime. Under the CC, the illegal recording, illegal transfer, distribution or receipt and non-destruction of personal data are regulated as criminal offences. The penalty for these offences is imprisonment for between one and four years, depending on the specific offence.

Although there is no corporate criminal liability in Turkey, security measures (see question 2) can be imposed on legal persons who commit crimes under the data protection regime.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

In a guideline announced on the DPA website with respect to data controllers and processors, attorneys are deemed to be data controllers in respect of the personal data transferred to them by their clients in relation to the legal services provided to them. Although this requirement has been highly criticised, from the perspective of the DPA, it also applies to the evidence sent to law firms by their clients. Therefore, law firms should also ensure that they comply with all the provisions of the DPA in terms of the data transferred to them by their clients.

In addition, since employees' emails fall within the scope of the DPA as personal data, seizure of such data within the framework of internal investigations is a cause for particular concern as regards data protection. Article 5 of the DPA allows the processing of personal data under certain circumstances as listed in the Article, two of which are the express consent of the data subject and the legitimate interests of the data controller. Thus, if employees did not give their express consent for the investigation of their emails, a data controller's best option would be to argue the grounds of legitimate interest for the data processing activities (i.e., internal investigations). It can be argued that processing personal data on the grounds of legitimate interest does not constitute any harm to the data subject's fundamental rights and freedom but, since this is the most abstract ground yet for data processing, data controllers should be cautious in relying on it without the explicit consent of the data subject.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

There is not a specific set of legal rules regulating this issue. However, it is approached from the perspective of data protection, right to privacy, freedom of communication and labour law, and practice is formed by the precedents of the Constitutional Court and the Court of Cassation for the time being.

To combine what is set out under these precedents, employees must be informed at an appropriate level (via employment contracts, internal regulations or any other supplement to the employment contract) that the employer can monitor their communications via company emails or phones and their consent for this must be obtained. The employer should ensure that there is a legitimate interest when taking measures that could constitute an intervention of an employee's right to privacy and that the measure is proportionate.

An intervention without these above conditions being present may result in the criminal and civil liability of the employer, and if terminations of employment contracts have been realised as a result of such an intervention, there is an increased likelihood of successful reinstatement claims.

Dawn raids and search warrants

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

Article 119 of the CPC stipulates that search warrants for houses, workplaces or non-public closed areas shall only be issued by a judge or a public prosecutor if a search should be carried out without delay. The warrant shall include the act constituting the grounds for the search, the subject of the search, the address where the search is to be conducted and the period for which the warrant is valid. The CPC expects the law enforcement authorities to comply with the scope and content of a search warrant in a proportionate manner. In the event of non-compliance, the subject of the warrant is entitled to compensation (both monetary and moral) from the state.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

Privileged material can be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid based on attorney–client privilege. The correspondence between attorneys and their clients is deemed to be a significant part of the right of defence. However, to benefit from the privilege, the correspondence must be made between an independent attorney and his or her client. Therefore, correspondence between a company and its in-house attorney cannot benefit from attorney–client privilege. To ensure the protection of privileged material during a dawn raid, it is recommended that such material be marked as confidential beforehand and that the attorney is contacted as soon as possible so that he or she can be present at the raid. This will facilitate the raising of any necessary objections while the dawn raid is being carried out. On the other hand, pursuant to the Competition Board's decision No. 15-42/690-259, dated 12 December 2015, in addition to the foregoing (i.e., the requirement for external counsel), the Board concludes that correspondence that does not fall within the scope of the right to defence and that aims to aid the violation, or that is intended to conceal a possible violation, shall not benefit from attorney–client privilege.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

Pursuant to Article 48 of the CPC, an individual may refrain from providing testimony that would lead to him or her, or his or her specified relatives, being prosecuted within the scope of the right against self-incrimination. Moreover, the specified relatives of the accused also have the right to refrain from providing testimony against the accused. Besides, Article 46 of the CPC entitles individuals in certain professions (such as attorneys, healthcare professionals and financial advisers) to refrain from providing testimony regarding information relating to their profession. However, while attorneys may use their right to refrain from providing testimony under any conditions, healthcare professionals and financial advisers cannot enjoy this right if the accused waives the privilege. Pursuant to Article 44 of the CPC, if a witness who has been duly notified and summoned does not appear before the court without providing any excuse, he or she may be compelled to provide testimony before the court. Moreover, a witness who has been introduced before the court by force would also be fined for the expenses raised from his or her absence. The right against self-incrimination and the right to refrain from providing testimony are similarly regulated under Law No. 6100 on Civil Procedure.

Whistleblowing and employee rights

28 Describe the whistleblowing framework in your country. What financial incentive schemes exist for whistleblowers? What legal protections are in place for whistleblowers?

There is no general framework for whistleblowing in Turkey. That being said, there are financial incentives for whistleblowing relating to certain crimes. For example, whistleblowers who report tax evasion can be awarded up to 10 per cent of the tax imputed and those who report the smuggling of goods or drugs can be awarded up to 25 per cent of the price of the smuggled goods or drugs. A recent regulation provides for whistleblowers reporting terrorist organisations also to be granted a financial incentive.

There is no legislation granting legal protection to whistleblowers. Although there is an Act on Witness Protection, it only applies to people who have provided testimonies during criminal proceedings and certain of their relatives.

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

There are not any specific rules under employment law that set forth the rights of an employee (whether an officer or a director) under an investigation of any kind. Labour Act No. 4857 (LA) lists valid reasons and just causes by analogy, and being under an investigation does not constitute a reason for termination on its own. As the LA is silent on the interim period within which the investigation is conducted, most companies regulate the circumstances that apply during this period by internal policies and disciplinary regulations. As long as they are proportionate with the suspected act of the employee and his or her position regarding the misconduct, the employer may take some measures for the sake of the investigation within its right of management.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

If an employee is deemed to have engaged in misconduct following an internal investigation, the employer may proceed with terminating the employment agreement either for valid reasons or just causes, depending on the severity of the employee's conduct. However, if there are internal company policies or regulations that foresee a different sanction from termination for the specific conduct at hand, the employer is required to follow that procedure to prevent a claim for invalid termination.

If an employee is taken into custody or arrested for a period longer than notice periods within the scope of an external investigation, this constitutes a just cause for termination.

The LA only regulates termination of employment and is silent on disciplinary sanctions that could be taken during a current employment relationship. However, a company may determine disciplinary sanctions in its internal policies and regulations. From a labour law standpoint, it is especially important in drawing up internal company rules to set out the framework in a specific manner, as a sanction imposed without a clear ground may entitle an employee to several claims against the employer.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

Whether refusal by an employee to participate in an internal investigation could be a reason for termination of the employment agreement depends on the specific circumstances of the case. If the refusal is of a nature that could be construed as a breach of the employment agreement or the employee's obligation of due care and loyalty, then it may result in dismissal.

Commencing an internal investigation

32 Is it common practice in your country to prepare a document setting out terms of reference or investigatory scope before commencing an internal investigation? What issues would it cover?

The methods for conducting internal investigations are still a growing area for Turkish corporations. Therefore, drawing up a document that sets out the scope of an investigation is not common. That is why it is highly recommended to have a document that can also serve as a road map of the investigation, both to have an organised and complete investigation and to keep the whole process under control. To achieve this, the document should include the purpose and scope of the investigation, the procedure to be followed and the actions to be taken (interviews with employees, examination of corporate documents or emails, etc.), the units or individuals to be involved and the means of communication with the relevant parties.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

Although its application in practice is quite rare, failure to report a crime at the very instant it has been committed, or when it is still possible to limit its consequences, constitutes a crime that is punishable by imprisonment for up to one year under the CC. Other than that, there are no mandatory reporting obligations.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

If a company receives a notice from a law enforcement authority seeking production of documents, it should comply with the notice in an appropriate way. Thus, pursuant to Article 332 of the CPC, it is obligatory to reply within 10 days to an information request raised by a public prosecutor, judge or court during the investigation and prosecution phase. If it is not possible to provide this information in due time, addressed parties must notify the appropriate person or entity why they cannot provide the information and when they will be providing it within the same period of time (i.e., 10 days). Those who do not comply with this requirement will be subject to the consequences of Article 257 of the CC, which is misconduct in office.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

Only Law No. 6362 on Capital Markets sets out a disclosure obligation for information, events and developments that may affect the value and price of capital market instruments or investment decisions by investors. Article 15 of Law No. 6362 defines such cases as material events and, according to the Capital Market Board's Guidebook on Material Events, material events include administrative and judicial proceedings that directly concern the issuer, or court actions and sanctions against those having a material duty and responsibility for the issuer.

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

In practice, the degree of importance a public prosecutor will attribute to an internal investigation very much depends on the specific circumstances of the case, and the quality and content of the findings of an internal investigation. As there is not any legal rule granting internal investigations a role in the official investigation stage, the public prosecutor and, at the next stage, the criminal court, have full discretion on how to view it.

Attorney–client privilege

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

There are insufficient sources of specific guidance on attorney–client privilege in respect of internal investigations. Therefore, the extent to which attorney–client privilege will apply to the relationship and communications between in-house or external counsel and the perpetrators of white-collar crime remains unclear. In that respect, decisions by the Turkish Competition Board are helpful for guidance. The Board concluded that attorney–client protection covers any correspondence in relation to a client's right of defence and documents prepared within the scope of an independent attorney's legal service.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

In addition to the information in question 28, the Advocate Law of 19 March 1969 (1136) and the CPC set out the key principles of attorney–client privilege. Accordingly, the Advocate Law regulates attorney–client privilege for attorneys. According to Article 36 (Right to Keep Secrets), attorneys cannot disclose any document or information obtained while practising their profession. Similarly, Article 130/2 of the CPC sets out that any material seized as a part of a search conducted in an attorney's office must be returned immediately to the attorney if the material is understood to relate to the professional relationship between a client and that attorney. There are not any differences between an individual client and a corporation in that respect.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

There are no specific provisions that define the application of attorney–client privilege to in-house and external counsel in Turkey. However, the Turkish Competition Board stated in its Dow decision that correspondence with an independent attorney falls within the scope of attorney–client privilege and shall be protected. In other words, in-house counsel employed by a corporation that is the subject of an investigation cannot enjoy attorney–client privilege.

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

Currently, there is no law or precedent touching on the level of privilege that a foreign lawyer will enjoy compared to a domestic one. Under the Turkish Constitution, attorney–client privilege is protected under the right to legal remedies. From the constitutional point of view, there should be no restriction to the attorney–client privilege between a client and a foreign attorney.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

There are no regulations to guide us as to whether waiver of attorney–client privilege would be regarded as a co-operative step.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

No, we do not have such a concept.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

There are no rules or regulations in this respect.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

There are no rules or regulations under Turkish law relating to common interest privileges.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

The principles of attorney–client privilege apply to the correspondence between attorney and client and not to assistance from third parties to lawyers.

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

There are no rules preventing companies from interviewing witnesses as part of an internal investigation. However, obtaining consent from a witness would prevent any subsequent complaint from a criminal law or data privacy law perspective.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

There are no court cases or regulations about claiming privilege over attorney reports that are based on internal witness interviews. Therefore, good practice would be to assume privilege only when external counsel is taking notes during witness interviews or preparing attorney reports to establish a legal defence.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

There are no legal or ethical requirements or guidance under Turkish law to consider when conducting a witness interview of an employee. The general principles and provisions about data privacy law, employment law and criminal law should be adhered to during interviews (note that the latter can be an issue when, for instance, a witness claims that his or her interview took place by force and his or her freedom was restricted, or that the interview was recorded without his or her consent).

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

There is no specific format or guidance for conducting an interview. Internal interviews are usually conducted in a Q&A format. In practice, documents might be shown to the interviewees as well. Witnesses may choose to attend the interviews with their counsel.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

As stated in question 33, although its application in practice is quite rare, failure to report a crime at the very instant it is committed, or when it is still possible to limit its consequences, constitutes a crime that is punishable by imprisonment for up to one year under the CC. Other than that, there are no mandatory reporting obligations.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

Self-reporting should be assessed in each case by taking into account the real risks and strategy in the matter. It would be advisable to self-report if there is an imminent threat of external investigation.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

There is no guidance on any practical steps regarding self-reporting. When a corporation or individual decides to self-report, it would be advisable also to correctly determine the relevant law enforcement body. However, note that effective remorse is available for certain crimes (e.g., bribery under the CC).

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

Every communication between a law enforcement authority and a company is made in writing. However, in practice, it is advisable to have good communications with a public prosecutor to better understand the claims and status of the investigation. Other than this, there is no mechanism for plea bargaining in Turkey.

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

The decision to initiate an investigation can be challenged under the procedural rules to which the authority is subject. For example, if a ministry initiates an investigation against a company, this administrative action can be challenged as per Law No. 2577 on Administrative Procedure.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

It would be advisable to have a central supervision mechanism for cross-border investigations. The consistency of negotiation packages can be affected by disclosure limitations imposed on companies through legal requirements (e.g., data protection or blocking statutes).

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

There is no specific regulation regarding production of material in a different jurisdiction. The authorities co-operate with each other, and there are some reciprocity agreements between countries that enable a request to be recognised and enforced in another jurisdiction. However, note that, in practice, it is not always quick and easy to have effective co-operation because of bureaucracy.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

Turkish authorities share information with foreign authorities through the existing bilateral and multilateral agreements on mutual legal assistance.

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

As explained in question 61, any documents produced for a court file are open to third parties unless the court grants a confidentiality decision on the file.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

If compliance with a request made by an enforcement authority would violate the laws of another country, it would be advisable for that company to explain the reasons why it cannot provide the requested documentation or information to the local law enforcement authority.

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

Please see question 11 regarding data protection rules as blocking statutes in Turkey.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

In principle, any documents produced for a court file are open to third parties. If the relevant party submits its request for confidentiality about the material presented, it must give a legitimate reason for that request. In such a case, the court will assess whether there is legitimate and reasonable cause to ask for the material in question to be kept confidential.

Prosecution and penalties

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

As there is no criminal corporate liability, the directors, board members or representatives of a corporation may face judicial fines or imprisonment for misconduct, but the corporation itself cannot be sanctioned. Other than this, administrative or civil liability may arise for both the corporation and any individuals concerned, in connection with misconduct.

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

Article 58 of Law No. 4734 on Public Procurement sets forth a suspension regime of one to two years for those who have been involved in, among other offences, collusive tendering or document forging. Moreover, Law No. 4734 sets forth that those who refrain from entering into a contract after procuring a tender will be suspended for between six months and a year. If the suspended company is an equity company, any shareholders owning more than half of its capital would also be affected by the suspension. If the suspended company owns more than half the capital of another company, that company would also be suspended accordingly.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

Article 61 of the CC lists the factors that a criminal judge shall consider when fixing a penalty between the lower and upper limits for the offence at hand. Those factors are the way in which the offence was committed, how the damage occurred, the severity of the perpetrator's fault, and so on. Following that, Article 62 of the CC provides the following grounds for discretionary mitigation: the background and social relations of the perpetrator; the perpetrator's conduct after the act and during the proceedings; and the possible effects of the punishment on the perpetrator's future.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

Neither non-prosecution agreements nor deferred prosecution agreements are available in Turkey. Although it does not have the same scope, one may note the following.

Pursuant to Article 171 of the CPC, offences prosecuted on complaint that are subject to a penalty of imprisonment for less than one year can be deferred by the prosecutor for five years. However, certain conditions must be met before the prosecutor can make this decision. Those conditions are that the accused should not previously have been sentenced to imprisonment based on an intentional crime; the investigation should indicate that the accused will not commit any crimes after a possible deferral decision; the deferral must be more beneficial to the accused and society than prosecution; and the damage suffered by the victim and the general public must be fully compensated. If the accused does not intentionally commit a crime during the deferral period, the prosecution will be dropped.

On the other hand, Article 253 of the CPC regulates reconciliation by mediation for certain offences. In this regard, the outcomes of the offence can be compensated between the accused and the private person or entity without proceeding with a prosecution. If the offence is subject to reconciliation, the prosecutor will initiate the procedure ex officio and present the file to the reconciliation bureau. If all the parties agree to proceed with reconciliation, the court will defer announcement of the verdict until the conditions agreed under reconciliation are met by the accused. If the accused violates the reconciliation agreement within this period, the court will announce the verdict.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

With reference to our explanations regarding corporate liability under question 2 and non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements under question 65, there is no such concept in Turkey.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

In Turkish law, settlement with law enforcement authorities is subject to certain requirements and limitations in terms of scope. To exemplify, penalties arising from the offence of smuggling are left out of the scope of settlement tax penalties or administrative fines. In terms of settlement for criminal liability, the possibility to settle is provided for offences, subject to a complaint by the victim, with some exceptions, such as the offence of fraud or the disclosure of business secrets, banking secrets or information relating to customers.

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

There is no such concept under Turkish law. However, it is possible under the CPC for the criminal court to appoint a custodian for the management of the corporation during the investigation or criminal proceedings if the court has serious doubt that a crime has been committed and it is necessary to shed light on the material facts. That being said, the role of such a custodian is not related to monitoring and compliance with laws, but rather to financial management of the company.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

Under Turkish law, the authorities' files are considered to be in the public domain and this allows access to such files by private plaintiffs. However, similar access to confidential files may be restricted.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

Article 157 of the CPC provides for the confidentiality of an investigation and Article 285 of the CC deems a breach of the confidentiality of an investigation to be an offence subject to imprisonment for between one and three years. Only the victim, the complainant and the lawyers of the parties are allowed to review the investigation file and take copies to the extent that confidentiality is maintained. After the criminal case is filed, the trials are open to the general public in principle. However, where public morality and security so requires, the court may opt for confidential conduct of a trial. Confidentiality of a trial when the accused is less than 18 years old is mandatory.

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

Generally, lawyers and public relations firms work together in managing corporate communications. In sensitive cases that require communication with government bodies, in particular, lobbying firms may also take a role.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

When such publicity is deemed necessary by the corporation, it is mostly managed by press statements.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

Mandatory disclosure in these circumstances may be required under the Law on Capital Markets, as described in question 35.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

In March 2019, the OECD issued a notice to Turkey with regard to its continued failures to implement the key aspects of the OECD Anti-Bribery Convention and to enforce its foreign bribery laws. Under this notice, Turkey is criticised about not covering state-owned or state-controlled enterprises under the current corporate liability regime. Besides, sanctions applicable to legal persons are found to be insufficient and ineffective, along with the fact that imposing a sanction on a legal person is only possible when a real person is prosecuted or convicted. The OECD clearly invited Turkey to take the necessary action to address these deficiencies under the relevant legislation and, for that purpose, set a deadline of 19 October 2019. Although several notices have been given in the past, Turkey has failed to abide by such notices and take relevant action.

The insufficiency of sanctions applicable to legal persons and the fact that they are seldom used in practice are also issues that are subject to criticism by scholars. Therefore, there might now be an increased awareness of this topic and this latest OECD notice may help to trigger legislative activity.

General context, key principles and hot topics

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

The investigation by the UK Serious Fraud Office (SFO) into Unaoil (which involves allegations of bribery, corruption and money laundering) continues to draw interest as much for the related investigations it has spawned as for the investigation into its affairs; during summer 2019, another individual (Basil Al Jarah, Unaoil's former partner in Iraq) pleaded guilty to five offences of conspiracy to give corrupt payments.

The SFO's related investigation into the officers, employees and agents of Petrofac plc and its subsidiaries for suspected bribery, corruption and money laundering is also of interest. In February 2019, Petrofac International Limited's former global head of sales pleaded guilty to bribery. Four other senior executives were named in the charging documents but have not been charged at the time of writing. The naming of the executives without charge by the SFO has been criticised as materially prejudicial to their rights and reputation. No charges have so far been levied against a Petrofac company.

The naming of executives by the SFO also caused controversy in two deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs) concluded during 2018–2019, leading to calls for anonymity until charges are brought.

Another related investigation, into US engineering company KBR's UK subsidiary, has also raised interesting points this year, particularly on the question of the extraterritorial reach of the SFO's investigatory powers.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

A corporation can be held criminally liable under the laws applicable to the UK (the laws of England and Wales, Northern Ireland and Scotland, referred to collectively as UK laws) and there are several ways this can arise, depending on the factual circumstances and the types of underlying conduct.

Typically, corporate criminal offences of strict liability and offences involving a company's vicarious liability for its employees' actions arise for a range of regulatory offences under UK laws. These features of corporate criminal liability are not considered in detail in this chapter, as they tend to be less common in relation to financial crime matters, with the exception of offences involving company legislation. Generally, however, UK principles of vicarious liability of employers for the criminal conduct of employees differ markedly from the US doctrine of respondeat superior.

For some offences, including fraud and corruption, the law developed the 'identification doctrine' as a means of holding a corporate entity to account for its misdemeanours. In essence, this attributes the knowledge of a corporate's directing mind – the individual or individuals who control the actions of the corporate (for example, its directors, senior managers, etc.) – to the corporate itself. Whereas the idea behind the doctrine was to attribute knowledge and action to an abstract entity, in practice this has proved difficult in all but the simplest cases involving small companies with unsophisticated structures. The difficulties are particularly apparent in larger companies or multinationals with more diffuse decision-making among management teams and where complex corporate structures may mean there are numerous reporting lines that would need to be assessed. An area that frequently needs careful analysis is where management teams or business units have been given delegated authority to act on the corporate's behalf.

To meet some of the criticisms of the identification doctrine, and the consequent difficulties in holding corporates liable for misconduct, in recent years the UK has introduced two types of corporate offences, essentially holding the corporate liable for failing to prevent certain types of wrongdoing, subject in each case to the corporate being able to raise a compliance-related defence (i.e., that it had in place either adequate or reasonable procedures designed to prevent the defined type of wrongdoing occurring). One example is the Bribery Act 2010's corporate offence of failure to prevent bribery, in which a company (incorporated or carrying on part of its business in the UK) is liable for bribes paid by a third party to win business for or on behalf of the company anywhere in the world, unless it can demonstrate it had adequate procedures intended to prevent bribery. Third parties are broadly defined in the Bribery Act 2010 to include anyone who performs services for or on behalf of the company in whatever capacity (e.g., an employee, agent or intermediary). The Criminal Finances Act 2017 similarly introduced a new offence of failure to prevent the facilitation of tax evasion with an affirmative defence of reasonable prevention procedures.

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

The UK has three legal systems and jurisdictions for criminal law purposes, each of which applies geographically: England and Wales, Northern Ireland and Scotland. The criminal laws of England and Wales and of Northern Ireland are similar, whereas Scots law and procedure is markedly different.

In the UK as a whole, allegations of corporate offending involve the same criminal process, enforcement agencies and court system as investigations and prosecutions of individuals. As a corporate is a legal rather than a natural person, certain steps vary because of this status (e.g., how it may need to respond to enquiries from a regulator, how a corporate will appear in court (via counsel) and how it is sentenced if guilty of an offence). Some key law enforcement authorities involved in the regulation, investigation or prosecution of corporates in the UK include (not exhaustively) the following:

- The SFO – set up with special powers under the Criminal Justice Act 1987 for the investigation and prosecution of large and complex corporate fraud and corruption. Unusually for UK law enforcement agencies, it combines investigative and prosecution functions.
- National Crime Agency (NCA) and local police forces – tend to lead investigations involving smaller-scale or less complex fraud or corporate crime, which is then prosecuted by the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS).
- The Police Service of Northern Ireland – investigates crimes within the jurisdiction of Northern Ireland. Crimes are then prosecuted by the Public Prosecution Service of Northern Ireland (PPSNI).
- The Police Service of Scotland (Police Scotland) – investigates crimes within the jurisdiction of Scotland. Crimes are then prosecuted by the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (COPFS).
- Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs – investigates tax-related offending, which is then prosecuted by the CPS.
- Financial Conduct Authority (FCA) – the regulator of the financial services industry. As a regulator, the FCA can impose civil sanctions for misconduct, but also may prosecute regulated firms or individuals for specific market-related offences, such as insider trading and market manipulation. Frequently, cases involving financial services companies fall within the scope of both the FCA and the SFO's investigation powers. In those cases, the SFO will usually take precedence in relation to the criminal proceedings as it may prosecute a wider range of offences.
- Competition and Markets Authority (CMA) – investigates anticompetitive behaviour; it may impose civil sanctions but can also prosecute cartel offences.
- Department for Business, Innovation and Skills – this government department investigates and prosecutes activities concerning the affairs of companies, including fraudulent trading and breaches of bankruptcy or disqualification orders.
- Information Commissioner's Office (ICO) – investigates and prosecutes or imposes civil sanctions for data protection offences.
- Health and Safety Executive (HSE) and Health and Safety Executive for Northern Ireland (HSENI) – the HSE investigates and prosecutes or imposes civil sanctions for health and safety offences and works with the police on corporate manslaughter investigations. In Northern Ireland, the position is similar, except that it is the PPSNI (not the HSENI) that brings prosecutions. Prosecutions in Scotland are brought by the COPFS.
- Office of Gas and Electricity Markets – investigates and prosecutes certain criminal offences under legislation focused on the energy sector.

- Environment Agency, Northern Ireland Environment Agency and Scottish Environmental Protection Agency – investigate and prosecute environmental crime (in Scotland, the prosecution is brought by the COPFS and in Northern Ireland by the PPSNI).
- UK Office of Financial Sanctions Implementation (OFSI) – although not a prosecutor, OFSI has significant additional powers to impose financial penalties for breaches of financial sanctions measures.

In Scotland, all criminal investigations are undertaken by Police Scotland and the COPFS. Police Scotland has a dedicated economic crime unit, but investigations into serious and complex frauds are overseen by COPFS' economic crime unit. The SFO can also investigate crimes that have occurred in Scotland if they affect other parts of the UK, but it cannot prosecute cases in or from Scotland.

There can be concurrent jurisdiction between the SFO and the COPFS, particularly with respect to overseas bribery cases. In 2014, the SFO and the COPFS entered into a memorandum of understanding, which provides a framework for co-operation in cases of bribery or corruption that both organisations have (or may have) jurisdiction to prosecute under the Bribery Act 2010 and for determining 'primacy' to investigate and prosecute corporate bribery offences.

In late 2009, the SFO and the CPS published a joint guidance note for corporate prosecutions setting out general principles, and evidential and public interest factors that could be taken into account when making a prosecutorial decision in regard to a corporate. One of the public interest factors that these agencies are entitled to take into account to decide against a prosecution of a corporate is 'the existence of a genuinely proactive and effective corporate compliance programme'.

In July 2011, the COPFS published its civil settlement guidance, which encourages Scottish and other companies that have committed bribery offences within the jurisdiction of Scotland to self-report to the COPFS in return for the opportunity to resolve the case through a civil settlement mechanism. The initiative must be reviewed and approved each year by the Lord Advocate and has recently been extended until June 2020.

In February 2014, following the introduction of DPAs in England and Wales (but not Scotland or Northern Ireland) under Schedule 17 of the Crime and Courts Act 2013, the SFO and the CPS published a Deferred Prosecution Agreements Code of Practice setting out public interest factors for and against offering a corporate a non-prosecutorial resolution by way of a DPA.

In August 2019, the SFO issued its Corporate Co-operation Guidance as part of its Operational Handbook, which it will use in making charging decisions in relation to allegations of bribery and corruption.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

Law enforcement authorities must have reasonable grounds to suspect that a criminal offence has been committed to exercise their investigative powers.

The SFO may investigate any suspected offence that appears to the director of the SFO on reasonable grounds to involve serious or complex fraud. The SFO's powers to compel the production of evidence under section 2 of the Criminal Justice Act 1987 can be exercised in any case in which it appears to the director that there is good reason to do so for the purpose of investigating the affairs, or any aspect of the affairs, of any person.

Additionally, and only in relation to possible bribery and corruption with an international dimension, the SFO may apply the even lower test under section 2A of the Criminal Justice Act 1987 of whether there is an 'appearance' that bribery and corruption may have taken place to initiate a pre-investigation (and use its powers under section 2 to determine whether a formal investigation should be undertaken). Therefore, the section 2A powers can only be exercised for the purpose of enabling the SFO to decide whether to open a formal investigation.

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

Depending on the authority and type of notice, it may be possible to informally agree a narrower scope of information to be produced without having to formally challenge the lawfulness or scope. Otherwise the company may challenge the lawfulness or scope of the notice or production order by way of application to court. Usually this challenge will be by way of judicial review (in Scotland, a bill of suspension), although under certain statutes it may be possible for the company to seek a hearing before the court or tribunal that had originally issued the notice or court order (where this is provided for under the applicable statute).

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

There is the possibility of immunity or leniency for individuals who assist or co-operate in the investigation or prosecution of criminal offences.

Section 71 of the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 (SOCPA) allows certain prosecutors, including the SFO, to grant any person immunity from prosecution in England and Wales or Northern Ireland by issuing a written immunity notice. The immunity notice, which will specify the criminal offences for which no proceedings can be brought, ceases to have effect if the person fails to comply with the conditions contained in the notice. The use of section 71 is relatively rare.

Section 73 of SOCPA provides a means to incentivise assistance from defendants. A defendant who, pursuant to a written agreement with a relevant prosecutor, has provided or has offered to provide assistance to an investigator or prosecutor is eligible to receive a reduction in sentence, provided a guilty plea has been tendered. Judges are required to state in open court the sentence would have been imposed but for the assistance given or offered, unless it would not be in the public interest to disclose that the sentence has been discounted.

Broadly equivalent principles relating to immunity and leniency apply in Scotland under Part 3 of the Police, Public Order and Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2006.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

International corruption and a coordinated global approach to its defeat has been a top priority for the UK government and its law enforcement authorities for the past few years, and this has been reiterated in the government's Economic Crime Plan 2019–2022, published in July 2019, which makes significant commitments to meet the government's objective of tackling economic, white-collar and corporate crime.

A focus on tax evasion led to the introduction of a new corporate criminal offence of failing to prevent the facilitation of tax evasion, which came into force in September 2017, and there have been increasing calls to extend the 'failure to prevent' offences to other economic crime. The government is currently analysing the responses to an earlier call for evidence on this; its response is awaited. In the meantime, some high-profile committees and officers, including the UK's solicitor general, have given their support to the introduction of such an offence.

A further focus is increased transparency of the beneficial ownership of foreign companies investing in UK property or bidding for government contracts. This has prompted the introduction of a register of beneficial ownership of foreign investors, which is intended as a measure to reduce both tax evasion and the likelihood of UK properties being used to launder foreign criminal funds, to be operational by 2021.

Pursuant to the Criminal Finances Act 2017, unexplained wealth orders (UWOs) came into force on 31 January 2018. The legislation allows the High Court to make a UWO in respect of any property (valued at more than £50,000) where the Court is satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that the property is held by a politically exposed person who has been involved in serious crime or that a person connected with that individual is, or has been, involved in serious crime.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

Cybersecurity is regulated within the UK through a number of statutory regimes. Regulation (EU) 2016/679 on the protection of natural persons with regard to the processing of personal data and on the free movement of such data (the General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR)), which came into force on 25 May 2018, requires that personal data is 'processed in a manner that ensures appropriate security of the personal data, including protection against unauthorised or unlawful processing and against accidental loss, destruction or damage, using appropriate technical or organisational measures'. Accordingly, organisations that control personal data must have sufficient cybersecurity measures in place to protect against attack. There are mandatory reporting obligations in place where certain attacks happen.

Enforcement of the GDPR falls to the relevant supervisory authority within each European country; in the UK, this is the ICO.

Fines have been substantially increased under the GDPR, to up to 4 per cent of annual global turnover or €20 million (whichever is higher), and the ICO has indicated that it intends to use the full force of its powers for the most serious breaches.

Cybersecurity has far-reaching consequences, however, and a range of other regulators also require notification following a cybersecurity incident; these include the FCA, the Charity Commission and other professional regulatory bodies.

Cybersecurity is woven into a range of other statutory regimes. The Privacy and Electronic Communications (EC Directive) Regulations 2003 (PECR) regulate providers of public electronic communication services. Service providers are similarly required to take appropriate technical and organisational measures to safeguard the security of their service. The PECR also have mandatory reporting obligations but impose a shorter time frame than the GDPR; within 24 hours of becoming aware of the essential facts. Under the GDPR, mandatory personal data breach reports must be made within 72 hours of becoming aware of the breach. Powers open to the ICO in enforcing the PECR include criminal prosecution and a fine of up to £500,000.

Additionally, the Network and Information Systems Regulations 2018 (NIS), which came into force on 10 May 2018, govern the threat posed to essential network systems and seek to improve the functioning of the digital economy. NIS applies to operators of essential services and relevant digital service providers. The requirements placed on systems operators again include having appropriate and proportionate technical and organisational measures to manage risks to the security of the network. Additionally, appropriate and proportionate steps should be taken to prevent and minimise the effects of incidents.

There is a range of 'competent authorities' that regulate NIS, depending on the specific sector. A breach of NIS can result in a fine of up to £17 million and, like the GDPR, there is a time limit of 72 hours (from becoming aware) for reporting any incident which has a significant effect on the continuity of the essential service.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

The main regulations relating to cybercrime are the Computer Misuse Act 1990 (the CMA 1990), the Data Protection Act 2018 (the DPA 2018) and the Cyber Attacks (Asset Freezing) Regulations 2019 (the 2019 Regulations).

The CMA 1990 has been amended to take account of the developing nature of cybercrime. Offences can be tried summarily or on indictment with a range of maximum sentences, depending on the offence committed.

Although prosecutions have been made over many years pursuant to the CMA 1990, the ICO secured its first conviction in November 2018. The prosecution was followed by an application under the Proceeds of Crime Act and a confiscation order.

The domestic legislation that sits alongside the GDPR is the DPA 2018, section 170 of which makes it an offence to knowingly or recklessly obtain, disclose, procure or retain personal data without the consent of a data controller and, on indictment, the maximum sentence is an unlimited fine. The offence slightly augments that under the previous legislation (the Data Protection Act 1998). Prosecutions being brought by the ICO currently tend to be pursuant to the 1998 Act in view of the time it takes to investigate and prosecute an offence.

Proceeds of crime legislation can be used as part of the enforcement toolkit; in June 2019, for example, the ICO secured the conviction of a former managing director of a claims management company who had unlawfully obtained and sold personal data. He was sentenced to a fine of £1,050 but the benefit derived from the illegal activity was valued at £1,434,679.60. In view of the defendant's lack of assets, a nominal £1 order was made.

Aside from unauthorised access and use of information, cybercriminals also deploy ransomware to secure a ransom demand. The aim of the 2019 Regulations, which came into force on 11 June 2019, is to address this. Measures under the Regulations include sanctions, restrictive measures and offences connected with cyberattacks threatening the European Union or its Member States.

The 2019 Regulations apply to UK nationals or any body incorporated in the UK. They have extraterritorial effect, and their measures are also applicable to conduct wholly or partly outside the UK that is perpetrated by a UK national, or a body incorporated or constituted under UK law.

Rather like sanctions regimes, the 2019 Regulations restrict interactions with 'designated persons'. Dealing with or making funds available to such persons is a criminal offence. The maximum sentence under the 2019 Regulations is an unlimited fine, seven years' imprisonment, or both.

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

The jurisdictional basis of criminal law in the UK is generally territorial, as an offence will only be triable in the jurisdiction in which it takes place unless there is a specific provision to the contrary, for instance where specific statutes enable the courts of the UK to exercise extraterritorial jurisdiction.

Some examples of exceptions are worthy of note. First, under general common law principles, if a substantial part of an offence occurs in the UK (even if other parts occur outside the UK), the UK courts can have jurisdiction.

Second, under Part I of the Criminal Justice Act 1993, certain fraud, theft, forgery, false accounting, blackmail and cheat offences are triable in England and Wales if a relevant event, or part of the wrongful act within an offence, has occurred in England or Wales. The extension of jurisdiction under this statute also applies to attempts and conspiracies to commit these defined offences.

Third, the Bribery Act 2010 (and prior bribery and corruption legislation) has important provisions to allow law enforcement to investigate and prosecute cases of overseas corruption. A feature of the extraterritorial effect of the Bribery Act is that it applies to substantive corruption offences in which the acts and omissions are entirely outside the UK, if these involve UK nationals, others ordinarily resident in the UK, or UK companies, among other defined categories of a party with a close connection to the UK. The failure to prevent an offence also applies worldwide to UK-headquartered and non-UK headquartered corporates that carry on part of their business in the UK.

In September 2018, the High Court held that section 2(3) of the Criminal Justice Act 1987, which gives the SFO power to require a person to produce specified documents in connection with an SFO investigation, has extraterritorial effect, to compel a foreign company to produce documents held outside the jurisdiction if there is a 'sufficient connection' between the company and the jurisdiction. In April 2019, the UK Supreme Court granted leave to appeal this decision.

In February 2019, the Crime (Overseas Production Orders) Act 2019 received royal assent, allowing UK law enforcement agencies to apply for a court order with extraterritorial effect (an overseas production order), to obtain data stored electronically, directly from communication service providers based outside the UK.

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

The challenges of dealing with cross-border investigations arise from inconsistencies in the approaches of the various law enforcement agencies and the application of different laws in the relevant jurisdictions.

The principal issues are:

- the differences in the scope and application of legal professional privilege between the jurisdictions, and ensuring that privilege is adequately protected when dealing with document or information requests from the various authorities or when conducting the internal investigation;
- the differences in data protection laws in each jurisdiction, and ensuring that breaches do not occur in the gathering and transferring of data between jurisdictions for the purposes of the internal investigation or responding to requests from a law enforcement authority;
- whether any of the jurisdictions impose a positive statutory obligation to make a formal report once the corporation becomes aware, or begins to suspect, that a crime has been committed. Northern Ireland and Scotland have additional statutes that impose reporting duties that apply in addition to laws that apply UK-wide.
- identifying which authorities may claim that the offending conduct occurred in their jurisdiction as a result of the fact that, with cloud-based communications (email, WhatsApp, i-Message, etc.), offending behaviour can occur in more than one location;
- whether evidence-sharing or mutual assistance treaties exist between the relevant jurisdictions; and
- whether there are sensitivities between the authorities in the various jurisdictions, for example, whether one authority is taking precedence, and if so whether the other authorities accept that position.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

The existence of the principle of double jeopardy means that a corporation cannot be prosecuted a second time in the UK for the same or similar offences on the same facts following a legitimate acquittal or conviction, or other appropriate disposal, such as a DPA, by a UK court. European law also extends double jeopardy principles in cross-border cases within the European Union.

However, the protections for corporates worldwide in relation to double jeopardy principles are more varied and likely to be an area of discussion with law enforcement authorities when a corporate is involved in cross-border investigations in multiple jurisdictions. If the predicate offending has been disposed of in one jurisdiction, double jeopardy will not preclude UK authorities from prosecuting ancillary or incidental offences, such as record-keeping or money laundering offences that occurred in the UK. Nevertheless, there is scope to engage with international regulators with close ties to UK enforcement agencies or mutual legal assistance arrangements with the UK (or both) to ensure that, in practice, one agency takes primary responsibility for the investigation and enforcement, to avoid any undue prejudice when a case spans multiple jurisdictions. Notwithstanding this, frequently corporates will be expected to respond to enquiries simultaneously from agencies inside and outside the UK, and there are no general, formal rights on the part of a company to seek to stay a UK investigation pending the outcome of a foreign investigation or set of criminal proceedings that may have commenced prior to the UK law enforcement agencies becoming involved.

There is no UK policy analogous to the 'anti-piling on' policy that exists in the United States. However, in situations of concurrent jurisdiction, there are memorandums of understanding between the various law enforcement and regulatory authorities in the UK. These provide a framework for co-operation between organisations that have (or may have) jurisdiction to prosecute an offence and for determining 'primacy' to investigate and prosecute offences.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

Global settlements have been known, such as the DPA agreed between the SFO and Standard Bank PLC in November 2015 that was coordinated with the settlement between Standard Bank and the US Securities and Exchange Commission. The SFO will also reference the assistance it receives from foreign authorities at the conclusion of any successful prosecution.

A coordinated approach between the United States and the United Kingdom was also achieved in relation to Innospec Inc and BAE Systems in 2010, although in both cases the court was critical of the coordination.

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

Law enforcement authorities in the UK generally try to co-operate with counterparties in foreign jurisdictions. Usually at the outset of an investigation, the authorities will agree whether one jurisdiction should take precedence in the investigation and prosecution of the matter (e.g., if the majority of the misconduct took place in that jurisdiction or in the jurisdiction of incorporation) or agree what aspect of a larger cross-border enquiry involving a corporate each will lead on if the case involves a number of components.

Even if it is agreed that the predicate offending in a matter should be prosecuted in one particular country, incidental offences, such as books and records offences, can still be prosecuted in the other jurisdictions.

Ultimately, UK authorities are responsible for the conduct of their own investigations and prosecutions. The extent to which a decision by a foreign authority would influence a UK investigation will depend on the particular facts of the matter, the relationship between the UK and foreign authorities, and the relationship between the UK and the other country on a state level, including any history of co-operation in timely mutual legal assistance.

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

Currently domestic sanctions are limited to the counterterrorism regime with all other sanctions stemming from the European Union (including those implementing the sanctions imposed by the United Nations). The regulations adopted by the Council of the European Union imposing sanctions, as a tool of the EU's Common Foreign and Security Policy, are currently directly applicable in the UK.

The main types of sanctions the UK imposes are:

- trade sanctions, including restrictions relating to military and dual-use items, certain industrial sectors and the provision of certain services (these sanctions are in addition to the UK's general export control laws);
- financial sanctions, including asset freezes; and
- immigration sanctions, known as travel bans.

There may be specific exceptions under which it is possible to engage in an activity that would otherwise be prohibited. It may also be possible to get a licence or authorisation permitting activities that would otherwise be prohibited.

A principle of most sanctions regimes is the prohibition on knowingly and intentionally participating in activities that have the object or effect of circumventing any sanctions laws.

The Sanctions and Anti-Money Laundering Act 2018 will govern the sanctions regime following the UK's exit from the European Union. The UK government has been taking steps to ensure the uninterrupted application of EU sanctions post-exit, including in the case of a no-deal exit.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

Although the EU regulations imposing sanctions are directly effective, UK legislation is required to introduce the penalty regimes that apply for a contravention of sanctions.

The Department for International Trade implements and enforces trade sanctions and other trade restrictions. OFSI, which is part of HM Treasury, implements and enforces financial sanctions. The Home Office implements and enforces immigration sanctions.

The potential consequences for breaching sanctions laws are severe, including unlimited criminal fines, periods of imprisonment for individuals, the disgorgement of any profits and reputational damage.

The 2017 Policing and Crime Act introduced civil penalties for breaches of financial sanctions, available in cases where it is not in the public interest to prosecute.

To date, OFSI has imposed two civil penalties: in February 2019 against Raphaels Bank and in May 2019 against Travelex (UK) Limited.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

The UK has historically had a leading role in developing the EU's sanctions policy and is embedded in a structure for co-operation on sanctions with other EU Member States.

OFSI has an international engagement branch that is leading an 'initiative to help promote robust financial sanctions implementation on the world stage, not only through bilateral and multilateral meetings/events but also through technical assistance to other governments'.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

Council Regulation (EC) No. 2271/96 protecting against the effects of the extraterritorial application of legislation adopted by a third country and actions based thereon or resulting therefrom (the Blocking Regulation) is currently directly applicable in the UK.

The Blocking Regulation currently applies to certain sanctions imposed by the United States in respect of Cuba and Iran (referred to as the listed extraterritorial sanctions). The Blocking Regulation was updated in August 2018 following the United States' withdrawal from the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action known as the 'Iran deal'.

The Blocking Regulation has four main components:

- EU persons (currently including UK nationals and UK-incorporated entities) and those in the territory of the European Union are prohibited, without authorisation from the European Commission, from complying, either directly or through a subsidiary or other third party, actively or by deliberate omission, directly or indirectly, with any requirement or prohibition with the listed extraterritorial sanctions.
- EU persons whose economic or financial interests are directly affected by the listed extra-territorial sanctions must inform the European Commission of this within 30 days. In the case of EU businesses, the reporting obligation rests with directors, managers and others with managerial responsibility.
- Judgments or decisions of non-EU courts, tribunals or administrative authorities giving effect to the listed extraterritorial sanctions are not enforceable in the European Union. This is intended to shield EU persons, for example, from the effects of any decision requiring seizure or enforcement of any penalty in the European Union based on the listed extraterritorial sanctions.
- EU persons 'engaging in international trade and/or the movement of capital and related commercial activities between the Community and third countries' are entitled to recover damages caused to them by the application of the listed extraterritorial sanctions through the courts in Member States. Recovery can take the form of seizure and sale of the assets of the persons causing the damage, their representatives or intermediaries.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

In the UK, it is a criminal offence to breach the prohibition or fail to comply with the reporting obligation provided in the Blocking Regulation. This offence is punishable by an unlimited fine.

If a UK national or incorporated entity wishes to comply with any listed extraterritorial sanctions in the Blocking Regulation, authorisation must first be obtained from the European Commission. Applications must be made in writing to the Commission, which will consider whether sufficient evidence has been provided that the interests of the applicant or the European Union would be seriously damaged by non-compliance, based on 14 criteria set out in Commission Implementing Regulation (EU) 2018/1101. Authorisation is effective on the date when it is notified to the applicant.

To date, no UK nationals or UK-incorporated entities have been prosecuted for a breach of the Blocking Regulation.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

In addition to the normal means for identifying misconduct, such as audits, screening procedures and whistleblowing, UK companies can become aware of allegations of misconduct through cybercrime or data breaches (e.g., the Unaoil and Panama Papers cases) and due diligence carried out in relation to commercial transactions, including mergers and acquisitions.

Allegations may also arise in hearings, such as employment tribunals and litigation proceedings.

Information gathering

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

The UK implemented the Data Protection Act 2018 (the DPA 2018) to complement the GDPR. The GDPR has direct effect across all EU Member States and applies directly to all organisations processing personal data within the European Union. However, it allows Member States limited opportunities to make provisions for how it applies in their country. The DPA 2018 essentially provides the details of local derogations, such as law enforcement processing. The two must therefore be read side by side. This new legislation supplements existing UK laws such as the Freedom of Information Act 2000 and the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, and directly applicable EU legislation, such as the Privacy and Electronic Communications Regulations.

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

In publishing its first intended fines for serious cybersecurity incidents post-GDPR, the ICO has demonstrated its intention to use the full force of its powers. In July 2019, the ICO reported its intention to fine British Airways £183.39 million in relation to a cyber incident involving the compromise of personal details of around 500,000 customers; similarly with the ICO's reported intention to fine Marriott International, Inc more than £99.2 million in relation to a cyber incident whereby the records of approximately 339 million guests globally were exposed.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

Typically, a considerable amount of evidence will be reviewed in the course of any internal investigation and must be handled carefully to ensure compliance with the DPA 2018. It is very likely that it will be necessary to conduct a data privacy impact assessment before processing any information. Decisions taken with regard to the processing and disclosure of data should be made in accordance with the DPA 2018, and all reasons for those decisions should be documented. If any of the data reviewed contains or may contain personal data, particularly sensitive personal data, extra care should be taken. Firms should seek legal advice with regard to what additional measures should be taken in relation to this material. This includes whether redaction of any personal information is required and whether this would be an appropriate mechanism to avoid any data protection breaches.

Further, extra care should be taken in circumstances where there may be a transfer of the data outside the European Union or a jurisdiction with an adequacy decision (i.e., a jurisdiction that offers an equivalent level of protection to data as in the European Union).

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

A range of factors must be taken into account when considering the monitoring of employee communications. These typically fall into two categories:

- review of emails sent and received by an employee; and
- intercepting emails before receipt.

In relation to the review of emails sent and received by an employee, the situation broadly involves considerations under the GDPR, the DPA 2018 and the Human Rights Act 2000. The processing of emails through review will require an employer to consider the extent to which it can satisfy a lawful condition of processing under the GDPR with balancing the data subject and privacy rights. However, consent is not typically a basis upon which such processing would take place as consent, under the GDPR, has to be freely given and the ICO has stated that it is unlikely that consent could be so considered in an employer–employee relationship in view of the imbalance of power.

If monitoring does take place, this will often be overt monitoring, in that the employer will set out in its information technology (IT) use and privacy policies that they retain the right to access emails and messages sent and received on employer-issued devices.

The ICO issued guidance prior to the implementation of the GDPR that, at the time of writing, has not been updated but recommends that covert monitoring only takes place in exceptional circumstances; for example, for the detection of crime.

It is essential, if monitoring is taking place, that the employer ensures that it is proportionate and undertaken only for as long as is necessary.

The GDPR sets out circumstances in which it is mandatory to conduct a data protection impact assessment, which includes assessing when processing is likely to result in a high risk to data subjects. As a matter of good practice, it may be prudent to work through a risk assessment prior to processing even when the high threshold has not been triggered, so that essential security and data minimisation measures are considered and adopted where necessary.

Up to 27 June 2018, the Provisions of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 and the Telecommunications (Lawful Business Practice) (Interception of Communications) Regulations 2000 (SI 2000/2699) governed the interception of electronic communications during transmission. Since that date, these have been replaced by the Investigatory Powers Act 2016 (IPA) and the Investigatory Powers (Interception by Businesses etc. for Monitoring and Record-keeping Purposes) Regulations 2018 (S 2018/356) (the 2018 Regulations).

Under the IPA, it is a criminal offence to intercept communications without lawful authority. Although the 2018 Regulations include the detection of crime as authorised conduct in certain circumstances, given the criminal implications of interception without proper authority, every case must be assessed on its merits to ensure that the relevant standards are met.

Dawn raids and search warrants

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

Authorities that investigate corporate crime in the UK, such as the SFO, often conduct dawn raids of business or residential premises under the authority of a search warrant issued by a court. Depending on the specific powers of the law enforcement agency conducting a raid, the raid is often undertaken in coordination with a local police force.

When a raid is carried out under a warrant, the authority may only search the premises specified in the warrant and seize items within the scope of the warrant.

In England, Wales and Northern Ireland, certain categories of material, such as confidential journalistic material or personal records created in the course of a business (e.g., patient records in a medical practice) cannot be seized during a raid without additional authorisations being obtained, in some circumstances from particular courts. Different rules apply in Scotland.

In the UK as a whole, legally privileged material cannot be seized unless it was created with the intention of the furtherance of a crime (crime-fraud exception) or is inextricably linked to other, seizable material. In that case, it can be seized but must be sifted to exclude as far as possible any privileged material from the investigating team at the law enforcement agency. In England and Wales, a typical approach is for material subject to a claim of legal privilege to be examined by an independent lawyer before it is examined by the investigating team (and any privilege material excluded). The use of this power is also subject to the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001, which entitles a corporate's legal representative to be present at a review of the material and apply to a judge for the material to be returned. In Scotland, there is no statutory framework for dealing with privilege issues and there may be a need to apply to the courts for the seizure of privilege material to be suspended.

The CMA may conduct a dawn raid of business premises without a warrant.

Some authorities have additional powers that can be exercised during a dawn raid, for example, the SFO and the CMA may compel a person to answer questions relevant to the search, such as regarding the location of certain documents.

If there are significant errors in either the process of obtaining a warrant or authorising a raid, or in the execution of a raid, the raid can be challenged by judicial review and rendered unlawful and the material seized during the raid could be rendered inadmissible.

The Law Commission is reviewing the law governing search warrants. A consultation on the issue closed on 5 September 2018. The Commission's report and recommendations are still awaited.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

As a general rule, legally privileged material cannot be seized during a dawn raid unless the crime-fraud exception applies or where it is inextricably linked to seizable material (as described in question 25), in which case other safeguards, including those set out in question 25, should be adhered to. However, in relation to certain competition investigations, the European Commission does not regard advice from in-house lawyers as legally privileged, so it may seize such material during raids or inspections.

In England, Wales and Northern Ireland, the authorities that investigate corporate crime are routinely accompanied during raids by an independent lawyer specifically tasked with reviewing on-site any material that a company asserts as privileged. It is, therefore, important to be aware of where privileged material is likely to exist so that assertions can be made before items are seized.

If there is a dispute regarding privilege, the authority will seize the material by sealing it in an opaque bag for review by an independent lawyer at a later date. The company is entitled to have its legal representative present during that review.

Digital devices containing both privileged and non-privileged items that cannot be separated may be seized or imaged during a raid. In practice, the privileged material will then be quarantined by digital forensic experts within the authority by applying search criteria provided by the company.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

In England, Wales and Northern Ireland, there is a qualified right of silence when being interviewed as a suspect, and a defendant in a criminal trial has a right not to give evidence. In both situations, the right is qualified as, in certain circumstances, adverse inferences can be drawn from this silence.

However, in Scotland the right to silence is not qualified and no negative inference can be drawn from an interviewee's refusal to answer questions.

A right of silence does not apply when an authority such as the SFO, FCA or CMA exercises specific statutory powers by issuing a notice compelling a witness to answer questions or produce documents. Failure to comply with such a notice without a reasonable excuse can result in a criminal offence. However, the contents of a compulsory interview under these powers cannot be used against the individual except in a prosecution specifically for making a false or misleading statement in that interview. In practice, complications can arise when an individual is initially a witness compelled to produce evidence and then later becomes a suspect in a criminal investigation. Any evidence provided in the subsequent interviews conducted under caution can be adduced against the individual.

Whistleblowing and employee rights

28 Describe the whistleblowing framework in your country. What financial incentive schemes exist for whistleblowers? What legal protections are in place for whistleblowers?

The Public Interest Disclosure Act 1998 and the Public Interest Disclosure (Northern Ireland) Order 1998, as amended, combined with the Employment Rights Act 1996 and the Employment Rights (Northern Ireland) Order 1996, offer statutory protections to whistleblowers.

The dismissal of an employee will be automatically unfair if the principal reason for dismissal is that the individual has made a qualifying 'protected disclosure'. Workers and employee are also protected from detrimental treatment (e.g., harassment, reduction in pay or dismissal) on the ground that they have made a qualifying protected disclosure.

There is no requirement for a minimum period of service nor is there any financial cap on the amount of compensation that can be awarded. An employee alleging automatic unfair dismissal on the grounds of being a whistleblower may make an immediate application for interim relief which may result in effective reinstatement. A successful automatic unfair dismissal claim could also result in the individual being reinstated as an employee, although this is rare.

There are no financial incentive schemes in the UK for whistleblowers.

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

Suspension pending investigation

Employment legislation does not specifically deal with suspension but case law and guidance issued by the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service (ACAS, a public body funded by the UK government), in the form of the ACAS Code of Practice on Disciplinary and Grievance Procedures (the ACAS Code), requires that employees only be suspended where this is necessary and that the period of suspension be as short as possible. It is also important that employees be informed, preferably in writing, of the nature of the allegations made against them (whether in relation to an internal or external investigation) and, in most cases, suspension should be on full pay and with no loss of benefits. Any failure to follow these principles can result in a breach of the ACAS Code and a repudiatory breach of contract. In Northern Ireland, similar provisions apply, pursuant to the Labour Relations Agency, Code of Practice on Disciplinary and Grievance Procedures (the LRA Code).

The right to a fair hearing

The disciplinary process should be carried out in accordance with the ACAS Code. As a minimum, it should include an investigation to establish the facts before proceeding to a disciplinary hearing (assuming there is a case to answer). In good time ahead of a disciplinary hearing, the employee must be informed of the allegations against him or her and the right to be accompanied at the hearing by a colleague or a trade union representative. During the hearing, the accused should be given a full opportunity to answer the allegations before any decision is made by the employer.

Employers should carry out their own disciplinary process irrespective of any third party finding of guilt (e.g., the police). The employer is still required to follow a fair disciplinary process (in accordance with the ACAS Code) as far as possible. As stated above, in Northern Ireland, compliance with the LRA Code (rather than the ACAS Code) is required but also note that, unlike in Great Britain, statutory dismissal procedures have been retained.

These requirements can be relaxed when employees do not have the requisite length of service with their employer to bring an unfair dismissal claim (two years in Great Britain and one year in Northern Ireland); however, it is best practice to follow a fair process in dismissals, to avoid allegations of whistleblowing or discriminatory treatment.

The right not to be unfairly dismissed

All employees with the requisite length of service have the right not to be unfairly dismissed. In the case of a successful claim, an employment tribunal can order reinstatement or re-engagement, or award compensation. In most cases in Great Britain, compensation is capped at one year's pay or £86,444 (whichever is lower) plus a basic award of up to £15,750. In Northern Ireland, the one-year pay cap does not apply and unfair dismissal compensation is capped at £86,614, plus a basic award of up to £16,410, although in certain situations, employees can argue that this compensation cap should be disapplied.

The requirement for length of service and the statutory caps on compensation do not apply where the employee successfully alleges that the principal reason for dismissal is that the individual made a qualifying protected disclosure.

Company director considerations

Directors may also be employees (in which case the above will apply in tandem with any specific issues regarding directors' duties). A director who is not an employee (a non-executive director) will not be subject to the above rules. However, directors are subject to general duties, which are set out in the Companies Act 2006, contained within a company's articles and may also be set out in any letter of appointment. The company's articles and any relevant letter of appointment will include provisions regarding the removal of a director who has acted in breach of one or more of his or her duties under the Companies Act. There are additional regulations that apply to directors of public companies.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

Rights regarding suspension, the right to a fair hearing and the right not to be unfairly dismissed all apply to employees who may have engaged in misconduct. In general, there is no strict employment law requirement to suspend or discipline those suspected of misconduct; that is a decision for the employer. Some heavily regulated employers, such as those within the financial services sector, may be required by their regulatory body to suspend and take disciplinary action against employees who carry out regulated activities. In some cases, an employee's misconduct must be reported to the regulator. Employees may also be regulated themselves and will have specific obligations towards the regulator.

Failure to take disciplinary action could be regarded by an authority as evidence of poor corporate culture. Furthermore, failure to suspend or dismiss an employee who is capable of impeding a criminal investigation by destroying documents or alerting or interfering with witnesses, could be regarded as obstruction of the criminal investigation.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

In general, a request to participate in an internal investigation will be a reasonable management instruction and any unreasonable refusal to engage in this process may constitute misconduct in itself. Whether or not an employer could fairly dismiss in these circumstances will depend upon the whole context and in particular the seniority of the employee. At all times, it is important that the employer does not interrogate or put pressure on the employee to make admissions of guilt, and a range of safeguards as to how the investigation is conducted should be considered, to ensure fairness to the employee.

Commencing an internal investigation

32 Is it common practice in your country to prepare a document setting out terms of reference or investigatory scope before commencing an internal investigation? What issues would it cover?

It is good practice to prepare an initial scope of an internal investigation, potentially with a written investigation plan, with target deadlines and a clear set of tasks where possible, before commencing the investigation proper, setting out:

- its purpose;
- the issues to be investigated;
- the investigation team and reporting lines;
- how legal privilege will be established and maintained (e.g., the investigation team is instructed by and reports to a lawyer);
- how digital and hard copy material will be collected and preserved;
- how staff interviews will be conducted; and
- any other necessary immediate controls or steps, such as ceasing all future payments to suspect third parties.

The scope of an internal investigation and the client team may need to be kept under review, depending on factual findings and other developments that are possible at different stages in the investigation.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

In UK law, there are generally no formal legal obligations on a company to conduct an internal investigation into its own affairs. However, conduct rules applicable to some companies by the bodies that regulate them may mean an internal investigation is strongly recommended or even required. Generally, from an effective compliance perspective, a company should always investigate an issue as soon as it comes to light to enable the company to take the steps set out below (see also question 36).

The company will also need to consider whether a money laundering report is needed in accordance with the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (UK-wide application) and whether any additional report is required for the police in Northern Ireland or Scotland to comply with specific legislation that is applicable in those jurisdictions. In addition, the company should:

- stop the offending behaviour, otherwise the company could be exposed to a risk of criminal liability itself for allowing potential offending to carry on unchecked and uninvestigated. Additionally, if the offending conduct has ceased and the company is aware or suspects that it possesses funds obtained from the conduct, but it fails to take any action in regard to those funds, for example making a suspicious activity report to the NCA, the company could commit a further money laundering offence;
- preserve all documents and material relevant to the issue. If a law enforcement authority becomes aware of the matter, it would expect the company to have taken all necessary steps to protect and preserve all material that would be relevant to its criminal investigation (including by taking forensic images of digital material) so that the material could be provided to them eventually. Failure to do so could impede a criminal investigation and would be viewed as a lack of co-operation by an authority. Furthermore, it can be a criminal offence to destroy, falsify, conceal or dispose of relevant documents when a person knows or suspects an investigation of serious or complex fraud is already being, or is likely to be, undertaken by certain law enforcement agencies.
- take remedial or preventive action to ensure that the offending behaviour cannot occur in the company again.

If a company has failed to take any steps to address an allegation of bribery, it is unlikely that it would be able to rely upon the 'adequate procedures' defence in the event of a prosecution of corporate failure to prevent bribery under the Bribery Act 2010.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

Upon receipt, the notice or court order should be sent immediately to the appropriate person within the business, whose function is to deal with such external matters (usually within the legal department). All steps should be taken to ensure that evidence that may be relevant for production under the notice or court order is not deliberately or inadvertently lost, destroyed or altered, and that any individuals who may be involved in possible wrongdoing are not tipped off. The exact scope of the request should be determined, and clarifications sought if the scope is unclear. The deadline for responding should also be diarised. It is advisable to seek external legal advice if the legal department is inexperienced in dealing with such matters.

To the extent that a company has an internal policy setting out the steps to be taken upon receipt of a notice or court order, this should be followed. Among other steps, the company should consider circulating document retention notices to ensure all relevant data is preserved, taking forensic images of all potentially relevant data sources (e.g., laptops, PCs, tablets, phones), and compiling a database that can be interrogated for documents falling within the request.

Once reviewed for relevance, the results should be double-checked for privilege and copies retained of anything provided to the authorities.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

Privately owned companies are not required to publicly disclose the existence of internal investigations or contact from law enforcement.

Under the UK Listing Rules, publicly listed companies must issue a market announcement of any major new development that may affect their business without delay, if the development may lead to a substantial share price movement. A notice compelling the provision of documents would be unlikely to require an announcement, but confirmation from the authority that the company was a suspect in a criminal investigation would be likely to require an announcement.

Organisations that are authorised by the FCA also have an obligation to disclose to it anything relating to the firm of which it would reasonably expect notice. This would include breaches of UK laws and regulations, civil, criminal or disciplinary proceedings against a firm and fraud, errors and other irregularities.

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

UK authorities have publicly stated that they are not opposed to internal investigations that are carried out in a manner that would not impede a criminal prosecution. They expect data gathering exercises to be carried out promptly, covertly and coordinated across multiple sites simultaneously. 'Covert' in this context is intended to ensure potential suspects in a later criminal investigation are not tipped off prior to data collection and so given an opportunity to destroy or delete incriminating material. It does not mean that companies should conduct internal investigations in a manner that involves unlawful surveillance or data gathering techniques (whereby they could be separately liable for other offences). In practice, digital material should be forensically imaged and preserved by IT specialists. All procedures used to gather and image data should be recorded and then fully disclosed to the relevant law enforcement authority.

Additionally, UK authorities expect that full and accurate accounts are taken during any witness interviews and, in some circumstances, consideration may need to be given to whether certain interviews should be conducted at all. This is particularly important if there is a risk of criticism that a corporate conducted an interview knowing a law enforcement agency would wish to speak to a witness first and obtain a first account from a witness prior to any internal investigation or review.

The SFO has repeatedly said that it expects to be given interview notes by corporates seeking to demonstrate co-operation in their investigation. While this is tempered to an extent by an acknowledgement that disclosure is not required when legal professional privilege applies, where such a claim is without foundation, co-operation is likely to be cast into doubt in the absence of such disclosure.

Prior to the Court of Appeal decision in September 2018 in SFO v. ENRC, provision of interview notes would normally be expected by the SFO in the event of any self-report by a corporate, and any claims of privilege over those accounts were uncertain (and likely to be contested by the SFO).

Following ENRC, there are now more established grounds for litigation privilege to apply to interview notes, depending on the factual context of an internal investigation (see further at question 37).

Attorney–client privilege

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

Legal professional privilege has traditionally been claimed over various aspects of internal investigations, which, in recent years, has increasingly been disputed by law enforcement authorities. However, in a 2018 Court of Appeal case, Eurasian Natural Resources Corporation Limited (ENRC) successfully repelled a challenge by the SFO relating to claims of privilege by ENRC. The SFO sought to challenge claims to privilege by ENRC regarding various documents that were produced by lawyers and forensic accountants during an internal investigation into allegations of bribery and corruption that had arisen from a whistleblower report. The documents in question fell into four categories:

- category 1: notes taken by lawyers of interviews conducted during an internal investigation;
- category 2: materials generated by forensic accountants as part of a 'books and records' review;
- category 3: documents, such as a presentation slides, containing or surmising factual evidence, that were used by lawyers to present to ENRC; and
- category 4: emails between a senior executive and the head of mergers and acquisitions at ENRC, who was a Swiss qualified lawyer.

The Court of Appeal held that documents falling into categories 1, 2 and 4 were protected by litigation privilege. The High Court had already held that the factual updates provided in category 3 were protected by legal advice privilege.

In short, the Court of Appeal held that a criminal investigation by the SFO could be 'litigation' for privilege purposes and that while a party anticipating possible prosecution will often need to make further investigations before it can say with certainty that proceedings are likely, that uncertainty does not in itself prevent proceedings being in reasonable contemplation. The fact that ENRC did not have the information required to evaluate the whistleblower email, therefore causing it to be uncertain as to whether a crime had in fact taken place, was not a bar to having the protection of litigation privilege. The Court opined that it would be wrong to deny a potential defendant the benefit of litigation privilege when he or she asks his or her lawyer to investigate the circumstances of the alleged offence. It concluded that ENRC did contemplate that prosecution was possible when the documents in question were created and these documents were therefore protected by litigation privilege. Much of the reasoning of the Court of Appeal decision is highly fact specific in the circumstances of the ENRC case. Therefore, the judgment should not be interpreted to extend litigation privilege to all documents created in all internal investigations.

While the question of whether or not privilege will apply remains fact specific, there are nevertheless several standard ways to advance and strengthen any legitimate claim to privilege, such as:

- involving lawyers (whether external or internal) as soon possible;
- marking all communications pertaining to legal advice as 'privileged and confidential';
- segregating privileged and non-privileged documents;
- refraining from forwarding or creating new documents that summarise legal advice received;
- encouraging employees not to amend or quote extracts from legal advice;
- where there is the reasonable possibility of potential litigation at a later stage, recording this in writing when the future possibility arises in an internal investigation, to evidence any subsequent legitimate claim for litigation privilege; and
- only circulating legal advice and privileged material on a strictly need-to-know basis.

Parties are able to obtain legal advice in the context of an internal investigation, and communications between a lawyer and a client for the purposes of legal advice continue to be privileged under legal advice privilege principles. These principles generally do not protect communications involving third parties. However, the Court of Appeal in ENRC has expressly left open a question as to whether aspects of current UK law on legal advice privilege (see the Bank of England BIU case) should be reviewed at a later date by the UK Supreme Court. It is therefore likely that the subject of privilege in internal investigations will be a matter of ongoing development of UK law.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

There are two main forms of legal professional privilege in the UK: (1) legal advice privilege, which protects confidential communications (and evidence of those communications) between a lawyer and a client (but not communications with third parties) provided that the communications are for the dominant purpose of seeking and receiving legal advice; and (2) litigation privilege, which protects confidential communications (and evidence of those communications) between a lawyer and a client or third party, or both, or between a client and a third party, created for the sole or dominant purpose of obtaining information or advice in connection with the conduct of existing or reasonably contemplated litigation (including avoiding or settling, as well as defending or resisting, that litigation).

The holder of the privilege is the client.

In the case of corporate investigations, the client tends to be represented by the group of individual employees or directors charged with seeking and receiving legal advice on behalf of the company (or commissioning or conducting the internal investigation) rather than the entire corporate entity. This group of individuals usually includes the in-house legal team and some or all of the board of directors or subcommittee established by a company, but this group should be defined as soon as any external lawyers are engaged or at the outset of an investigation. This helps to ensure that there is a defined group from whom instructions by lawyers can be received and to whom advice is provided, which safeguards any claim of legal advice privilege.

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

Yes, although not in the context of an antitrust and competition investigation by the European Commission. In-house counsel must always be careful to ensure that they distinguish between legal advice and advice that is commercial in nature, since the latter will not attract legal professional privilege.

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

Advice sought from foreign lawyers in investigations in the UK is subject to the same legal professional privilege as advice sought from lawyers within the UK. The UK courts will apply UK law on privilege to determine the extent to which privilege applies. If a document satisfies the test for legal advice privilege or litigation privilege under UK law, the document will be treated as privileged. This decision is made regardless of whether that document would not have been privileged under a foreign law.

This principle can have the opposite effect in respect of any documents that would be privileged under foreign law but do not meet the requirements for privilege under UK law. Such foreign privileged documents would not attract legal professional privilege in the UK.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

UK authorities have frequently stated that they have no interest in communications between a client and its lawyers as to questions of liability or rights; however, in recent years, law enforcement agencies such as the SFO have challenged assertions of legal professional privilege over factual aspects of internal investigations and have expected the waiver of claimed legal professional privilege in the event of any self-report.

The authorities have stated previously that a refusal to waive a well made-out claim of legal professional privilege will not be held against a company, but a waiver of such a claim would be good evidence of co-operation. False or exaggerated claims of legal professional privilege will continue to be considered strong evidence of not co-operating and will be challenged.

The 2018 ENRC Court of Appeal judgment has confirmed that even when a party may lead the SFO to believe that it might in future waive privilege over certain documents, this does not in itself amount to a waiver of privilege and would only amount to such a waiver in the event of a formal agreement.

In summer 2019, the SFO issued some long-awaited guidance on its requirements for a company to be considered to be adopting a co-operative approach with the SFO in relation to allegations of fraud, bribery, money laundering and a failure to prevent the facilitation of tax evasion, which will influence its charging decisions. Other regulators may refer to the guidance in assessing whether the subject of an investigation has co-operated. In relation to legal professional privilege, the guidance provides that 'if the organisation claims privilege, it will be expected to provide certification by independent counsel that the material in question is privileged'.

With regard to witness accounts collated in the course of internal investigations (presumably prior to reaching a conclusion that there was a potential corporate offence that should be notified to the SFO), companies are expected to provide those witness accounts to the SFO as a mark of co-operation.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

There is a concept of limited waiver of legal professional privilege, and it is for the individual or entity waiving the privilege to determine the extent of the waiver.

It is important to be very clear as to the scope of the waiver with regard to the purpose for which the privileged information can be used and with whom it can be shared, particularly if a party seeks to prevent the information being shared with other domestic or foreign enforcement authorities or parties in any related civil proceedings. Generally, there are various gateways where evidence is shared between law enforcement agencies in the UK (and sometimes elsewhere), and proposals for a limited waiver from a corporate may not be acceptable to a law enforcement agency given the wider duties of disclosure or information-sharing.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

This will depend on a number of factors, including the terms of the waiver, the circumstances in which the material was received by the UK authority, and whether the UK authority disputes the claim of privilege, for example, if the UK authority asserts that the material falls within the crime-fraud exception.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

Common interest privilege exists in the UK and can be used to preserve privilege in documents disclosed to third parties who have, at the time of the disclosure, a common interest in the subject matter of the privileged document or the litigation for which the document was created.

It is advisable when disclosing information under the common interest privilege to ensure that the recipient understands that the document has been disclosed on this basis and to obtain undertakings from the recipient that the privilege will not be waived. Typically, in criminal-related investigations, common interest privilege has very limited practical scope, because it is often in doubt whether two parties do, in fact, have a common interest.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

Privilege can be claimed over confidential communications (and evidence of those communications) between a lawyer and a client or third party, or both, or between a client and a third party, created for the sole or dominant purpose of obtaining information or advice in connection with the conduct of existing or reasonably contemplated litigation (including avoiding or settling, as well as defending or resisting, that litigation).

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

An internal investigation is a fact-finding exercise and interviews will often be central to any internal investigation. However, it is advisable always to be sensitive to the expectations of investigating authorities, to avoid any criticism that such interviews could have prejudiced the law enforcement investigation.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

While privilege is often claimed over internal witness interviews, UK authorities, such as the SFO, have stated in the past that they do not accept that the factual accounts of a witness interview are privileged and disapprove of such claims. This culminated in an unsuccessful challenge by the SFO over materials produced during an internal investigation on behalf of ENRC (see question 37), in which the Court of Appeal held that factual notes of what is said by a witness to a lawyer constituted a privileged document on the particular facts of the ENRC case.

It should also be borne in mind that in situations where proceedings are not in contemplation, communications between interviewees and counsel not made in the course of giving instructions to counsel will not attract litigation privilege or legal advice privilege. Only communications between counsel and those entrusted by the company to give instructions to counsel will attract legal advice privilege.

As stated under question 41, in summer 2019, the SFO issued some long-awaited guidance on its requirements for a company to be considered to be adopting a co-operative approach with the SFO, which includes guidance on witness interviews.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

Although there are no general, formal requirements when conducting witness interviews as part of an internal investigation, best practice dictates that, irrespective of whether the interviewee is an employee or a third party, they should be informed:

- that the interview is part of a fact-finding exercise and, if applicable, in contemplation of litigation;
- if they are implicated in any wrongdoing;

- that the lawyer conducting the interview represents the company and not the interviewee;
- that the interview notes created by the lawyer belong to the company and therefore any privilege in the notes rests with the company;
- the company may choose to provide the notes to an authority (and this is at its election); and
- that the interview is confidential and the contents of the interview should not be discussed with other employees or witnesses (to avoid contaminating their recollection and generally to protect the integrity of the process).

Care should also be taken not to taint the witness's recollection, for example by disclosing previously unseen material or discussing another witness's statement.

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

It is common for interviewees not to be legally represented in initial fact-finding interviews during internal investigations; however, companies should not refuse a request from an individual to be legally represented at his or her own expense. In other circumstances, for example where an employee may incriminate himself or herself during an interview, there are compelling ethical reasons why a company may suggest that an employee may wish to obtain his or her own independent legal advice.

Documents can be put to the interviewee. A copy of each of the documents referred to or an interview pack should be retained as part of the record of the interview, as a matter of good internal investigation practice.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

The Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (POCA) places a specific duty on employees of regulated businesses (i.e., financial services firms and professional services such as lawyers and accountants) to make a report to the NCA when they have reasonable grounds to know or suspect that another person is engaged in money laundering and that knowledge came to them within the course of their regulated business. Failure to make a report in those circumstances carries a risk of imprisonment or a fine, or both, for individuals (and fines for companies), unless, in the case of individuals, they have reported to their firm's money laundering reporting officer (MLRO). Other similar offences arise in the case of MLROs who have failed to report to the NCA, given their designated statutory duties to do so.

All companies (regulated and non-regulated) should make a report to the NCA if the company has a suspicion that it possesses funds obtained as a result of suspected criminal conduct by the company or employees, as this may be a money laundering offence under POCA. Other offences can arise if transactions involve the facilitation of money laundering offences by other persons. A report to the NCA of any of these types of suspicions can provide a statutory defence to money laundering if made as soon as practicable.

A money laundering report to the NCA is not a self-report for the purposes of a DPA (see question 51) or mitigation of sentence. A self-report must be made directly to the relevant authority, such as the SFO.

In Scotland, there is an obligation to report any knowledge or suspicion of serious organised crime to the police when this knowledge or suspicion originates from information obtained in the course of business or as a result of a close personal relationship (Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010). In Northern Ireland, additional reporting duties apply under the Criminal Law (Northern Ireland) Act 1967.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

The question of when and whether to self-report in the UK has been the subject of considerable debate following the Rolls-Royce case, which involved a DPA, notwithstanding that there was no self-report by Rolls-Royce.

A DPA is an agreement reached between a prosecutor and a company under investigation and approved by a court. The agreement allows a prosecution to be suspended for a defined period provided the organisation meets certain specified conditions. If the conditions are met, the prosecution is formally discontinued. (For further information about the DPA process in the UK, see question 65.) Prior to the DPA agreed in Rolls-Royce in January 2017, it was considered advisable for a company to self-report if it wished a matter to be settled by way of a DPA; the SFO had articulated that one of the preconditions of a DPA was a genuinely proactive approach by the company, including a full self-report (i.e., complete disclosure of the facts).

However, the stance that a self-report was a precondition to a DPA was put into some doubt in light of the DPA secured by Rolls-Royce in circumstances that did not follow a self-report. The SFO, and indeed the court in approving the DPA, has emphasised that the circumstances in which Rolls-Royce secured a DPA, notwithstanding that it had not self-reported, were due to the extraordinary level of co-operation with the SFO that followed once the offending conduct was already in part known to law enforcement authorities. The 'extraordinary co-operation' that was commended in the court's judgment included a comprehensive internal investigation that extended beyond the original allegations known to the SFO, the results of which were made available to the SFO; disclosure of unreviewed documents; access to witnesses who had not previously undergone interviews by the company; and a limited waiver of any claim for legal privilege – all of which, the judgment suggests, brought to light conduct that otherwise may not have been exposed.

As stated in question 41, the SFO has now issued guidance on what it considers amounts to co-operation with its investigations, including a requirement to report a suspected fraud or bribery within a reasonable time of the suspicion arising. The guidance makes it clear that co-operation will be a relevant factor in making charging decisions (i.e., whether to prosecute, recommend a DPA or take no further action). There is no presumption that self-reporting will lead to no further action.

The SFO does not publish details of the self-reports that have led to no further action. Whether a DPA will be available in the absence of a self-report in future remains to be seen, but the benefits of so doing were highlighted recently in a case brought by the SFO against company director Carole Ann Hodson. The new company owners became suspicious and reported their concerns to the SFO, which launched an investigation into the company, its officers, employees, agents and associates. Hodson was then prosecuted and convicted. No action has been taken against the company – a reminder of the potential benefit of self-reporting by companies in appropriate cases, when the public interest may be served by taking action against the former owners and wrongdoers, rather than the company itself.

The question of when, and indeed whether, to self-report came into sharp focus again in relation to the Tesco Stores Limited DPA and subsequent acquittal of its senior executives. After discovering issues in the executives' financial statements, Tesco referred itself to enforcement authorities. On 10 April 2017, Tesco entered into a DPA in respect of false accounting charges. This decision has subsequently been called into question by some following the collapse of the trial of two Tesco executives accused of the same false accounting. The judge concluded that the SFO's evidence, taken at its highest, was such that a jury could not properly convict. The SFO subsequently offered no evidence at the trial of a third director.

A charge of accounting fraud, however, requires the conviction of a senior executive, or 'directing mind and will', to bind the guilt of the company. In short, the company cannot be guilty without the guilt of the senior executive. This contrasts with the corporate offence of 'failure to prevent bribery' under the Bribery Act, which does not depend on the guilty mind of a senior executive. If a company pleads guilty to a fraud offence, such as accounting fraud, at an early stage and secures a DPA, there is a risk that a jury, on consideration of the complete evidence at a later stage, will not be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the relevant individual is guilty. Therefore, companies must carefully assess the evidence against them before entering into a DPA. In cases that do not involve a 'failure to prevent' offence, the company may be hesitant to enter into a DPA given the difficulties of prosecuting these offences. The importance of making the correct decision is reinforced by the expense of a DPA and the requirements of extensive co-operation with the SFO.

DPAs are only available to corporate defendants and not to the individual employees or directors involved in the criminal conduct.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

Before making a self-report, a company should undertake the appropriate level of investigation to ascertain the extent and nature of the offending, ensuring that the company will not be taken by surprise by further issues that could arise in the course of a criminal investigation.

UK authorities have advised that for a company to be afforded full credit for making a self-report, it must be made within the context of a genuinely proactive and co-operative approach by the company. The SFO's Corporate Co-operation Guidance sets out the steps it expects an organisation to take to demonstrate such co-operation.

The SFO's outline of the process to be adopted by corporate bodies or their advisers when self-reporting provides that:

- initial contact, and all subsequent communication, must be made through the SFO's Intelligence Unit, using the secure reporting form;
- hard copy reports setting out the nature and scope of any internal investigation must be provided to the SFO's Intelligence Unit;

- all supporting evidence, including, but not limited to, emails, banking evidence and witness accounts, must be provided to the SFO's Intelligence Unit; and
- further supporting evidence may be provided during the course of any ongoing internal investigation.

In Scotland, the COPFS's self-reporting policy, which applies in relation to corporate bribery offences, requires a written report to be submitted on the company's behalf by a solicitor.

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

It is both possible and desirable to enter into a dialogue with the authority before or upon receipt of a notice or warrant to discuss any concerns the company has, for example that the deadline for compliance is unreasonable, or the description of the information and documents requested is unclear.

The authority should be willing to discuss such concerns and work with the company to find a reasonable and practical solution, so long as the result is that the relevant information and documents are ultimately received in a timely fashion. With regard to search warrants served on businesses, the police do not usually contact a business to discuss the terms of a warrant prior to turning up and executing the warrant. However, depending on the circumstances, the police may be willing to discuss the implementation of the warrant to avoid unnecessary disruption to the business's legitimate activities and the risk of the warrant being challenged.

Materials subject to legal professional privilege may be withheld when responding to a search warrant. Warrants often do not address how privileged materials should be handled, and dealing with issues of privilege tends to be a matter for negotiation. The legal agent for the company should object to privileged materials being reviewed or seized and offer to set aside potentially privileged materials for review by the company's legal agent subsequently. If the authority will not agree to this course, it may be proposed to appoint independent counsel (usually an advocate, barrister or solicitor) to review potentially privileged material and to make a determination as to whether or not the material is, in fact, privileged. If the authority will not agree to proceed on that basis, the legal agent for the company should insist that any privileged material should be sealed, unread, and delivered to the court to enable it to adjudicate upon the matter. In the event that such suggestions are not acted upon by the authority, the company may need to seek to overturn the warrant by presenting to the court a judicial review (or a bill of suspension in Scotland). (See also question 26.)

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

The exercise of powers by any public authority, such as in undertaking an investigation, can be challenged by application to the court for a judicial review (a bill of suspension in Scotland) if considered to be unlawful.

If found to be unlawful, the court can order various remedies, such as stopping the exercise of that power, rendering it ineffective or awarding damages.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

While attempting to deal with notices or court orders issued by various jurisdictions as one consistent disclosure package would reduce effort and costs, it is generally advisable to deal with them separately but have protocols in place to ensure consistent approaches are maintained to any relevant documents to be produced. Court orders and notices issued under compulsory powers usually negate data protection laws and any obligations of confidentiality to third parties. Consequently, civil proceedings cannot be brought by third parties against a company for its actions in providing material in response to a lawful court order or compulsory notice as long as the material provided was within the scope of the notice or order. However, if the company voluntarily provides material beyond the scope of the notice or order, and in doing so breaches a confidentiality obligation or data protection law, it could expose itself to claims.

To avoid creating risks of civil and criminal liability, notices and orders should be responded to separately unless the company is able to satisfy itself that the scope of the orders or notices from each of the jurisdictions are identical in all important respects.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

In general, if information is in the control of a company (e.g., a parent company with a right to take possession, inspect or take copies of a subsidiary's documents), the company will be expected, and may be required, to search for and produce all requested material, even when it is located in another country. In practice, if the company wishes to seek credit for co-operation, it should comply with any reasonable requests, whether or not it is required to. Also see question 10.

The exception is when the data protection legislation in the other country does not permit the removal or transfer of the data from that jurisdiction. In those cases, the requesting authority will generally need to use mutual legal assistance to obtain the material through foreign counterparts.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

The UK authorities can and do share information and investigative materials with authorities in various other countries (for intelligence purposes and the detection and prevention of crime), whether or not there is a mutual legal assistance agreement with that country. This occurs regardless of whether the country is providing information or materials in return, although reciprocity is generally expected.

Where material is required for a prosecution, a mutual legal assistance request must be made. UK law authorities will only provide assistance that conforms with the UK's laws and international obligations.

A list of the international mutual legal assistance and extradition agreements to which the UK is a party can be found on the UK government website (www.gov.uk/government/publications/international-mutual-legal-assistance-agreements).

The UK authorities can provide further assistance by conducting dawn raids in the UK on the foreign authority's behalf, interviewing witnesses or suspects, freezing assets, or arresting and extraditing suspects.

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

Law enforcement authorities owe a general duty not to disclose information or material received during the course of an investigation, and which is not otherwise in the public domain, unless the public interest in the disclosure outweighs the private interests of the owner. Furthermore, before disclosing information to a third party, the law enforcement agency should provide the owner with sufficient notice of the request to allow an opportunity for objections to the disclosure (Marcel and Others v. Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis and Others [1992] 2 WLR 50). Any objections should be considered and advance notice should be provided of an intention to disclose regardless. Notice does not have to be given when it would be inappropriate or impracticable to provide notice, for example if it would prejudice an investigation by the law enforcement agency requesting the information (R (on the application of Kent Pharmaceuticals Ltd) v. Serious Fraud Office and another [2004] All ER (D) 191 (Nov)).

Section 3 of the Criminal Justice Act 1987 further limits disclosure by the SFO to third parties. Information obtained during the course of an investigation by the SFO can only be disclosed to certain specific government departments or bodies, or competent authorities specified in the Act, and only for the purposes of any criminal investigation or criminal proceedings, whether in the UK or abroad and for the purposes of assisting any public or other authority under the order. The list of competent authorities is wide and includes anybody having supervisory, regulatory or disciplinary functions; however, it does not include liquidators, provisional liquidators, administrators or administrative receivers.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

In these circumstances, the company should not provide the documents, but should inform the requesting authority of the reason why these documents cannot be provided (i.e., that the data protection laws in the other country constitute reasonable excuse for lack of compliance).

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

The collection and use of personal data in the UK are governed by the DPA 2018, including restrictions on the disclosure of personal data. Personal data is defined as data that relates to a living individual who can be identified from that data. However, broadly speaking, the non-disclosure provisions in the DPA 2018 do not apply if the material is requested by a notice or court order issued on the grounds that the material is necessary for the prevention or detection of crime, the apprehension or prosecution of offenders, the assessment or collection of any tax or duty, or of any imposition of a similar nature.

The term 'blocking statute' is generally not applicable except in the field of financial and trade sanctions, for which there is blocking legislation in relation to specific US sections that have extraterritorial application.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

When material is provided voluntarily and without restrictions, the authority is free to share it with third parties or other authorities, and to use it for any purpose.

In general, it is advisable only to provide material voluntarily having obtained contractual undertakings that agree the restricted basis on which the material has been provided (e.g., only for use by that authority in the course of an investigation and not to be shared with other parties).

While contractual undertakings restrict an authority's ability to voluntarily provide material to other parties, they do not prevent third parties from obtaining court orders against the authority requiring production of the material. However, production orders should only be granted when it is in the interests of justice, and the fact that the material came into the possession of the authority under the restrictions imposed by the undertakings may lead a court to determine that it is not appropriate to grant a production order against the authority in that context, particularly as the third party could attempt to obtain the documents from an unfettered source, such as the company.

In general, authorities are restricted as to how they can share material they obtain as a result of exercising their compulsory powers or court orders, and customarily such material should only be shared where it is necessary for an investigation and the disclosure is proportionate.

Prosecution and penalties

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

Penalties on conviction include imprisonment for individuals, fines, compensation and confiscation orders. Individuals can also be disqualified from being a director of a company for up to 15 years. When DPAs are agreed, monitoring may be imposed.

Companies convicted of certain offences, including active bribery and money laundering, must also be debarred from public tendering for up to five years.

Regulatory authorities can impose additional penalties. For example, the FCA can withdraw a firm's authorisation and prohibit it from undertaking specific regulated activities for up to 12 months, prohibit individuals from carrying out regulated activities, or impose fines on firms or individuals. The Prudential Regulation Authority (the authority responsible for the prudential regulation and supervision of around 1,700 banks and other firms) can restrict a firm's permission to conduct regulated activities or impose a fine.

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

The Public Sector Procurement Directive (2014/24/EU) was transposed into UK law by the Public Contracts Regulations 2015. Under these Regulations, companies must be excluded from public procurement if they have been convicted in the past five years of any offences from a list that includes, among others, conspiracy, corruption, bribery, money laundering and fraud. The corporate offence of failure to prevent bribery (section 7 of the Bribery Act 2010) is not included in this list of offences and does not require mandatory debarment.

The Regulations also provide a list of offences that carry discretionary debarment for up to three years, including professional misconduct, non-payment of tax and distortion of competition.

However, the Regulations allow companies to recover eligibility to bid for public contracts following a debarment by demonstrating evidence of self-cleaning, such as the payment of compensation to the victim of the offending, clarification of the facts and circumstances of the offence in a comprehensive manner, co-operation with the investigating authority, and the implementation of appropriate measures to prevent further criminal offences or misconduct.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

When fixing penalties following conviction, courts must have regard to the sentencing guidelines published by the Sentencing Councils for England and Wales, and Scotland.

Specific sentencing guidelines were published in 2014 for England and Wales in respect of corporate fraud, bribery and money laundering offences providing that, when sentencing a company, the court must first determine whether compensation or confiscation orders should be made.

Thereafter, the court should consider, inter alia, the following issues:

- the level of culpability and financial harm;
- the aggravating or mitigating factors, for example whether the criminal activity was endemic or whether the corporate offered full co-operation with the law enforcement authority during the investigation;
- the financial circumstances of the company; and
- the stage at which a guilty plea was entered (if the matter was not contested).

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

DPAs have been available in England and Wales (as a result of the Crime and Courts Act 2013) since 2014 as an alternative disposal for corporate offending. DPAs are not currently available in Scotland, where a civil settlement regime applies, or in Northern Ireland. Non-prosecution agreements do not exist in the UK.

The SFO and CPS have published a Code of Practice explaining the DPA process. Also, in summer 2019, the SFO issued guidance on what it considers amounts to co-operation with its investigations, including a requirement to report a suspected fraud or bribery within a reasonable time of the suspicion arising. The guidance makes it clear that co-operation will be a relevant factor in making charging decisions.

A prosecutor may invite, at its discretion, a corporate suspect into DPA negotiations if it determines that having identified the full extent of the offending, the evidential test has been satisfied and the public interest would benefit from a DPA. Until the Rolls-Royce case, the orthodox view was that a corporate will only be invited to negotiations where a self-report has been made and the corporate has fully co-operated with the authority. Following Rolls-Royce, it is possible that a DPA may be negotiated in wider circumstances, including when there has been no self-report but subsequent extraordinary co-operation by a corporate with the law enforcement authority.

If it is possible to agree the terms of a DPA and a statement of facts, the corporate will be formally charged with the criminal offence or offences and the matter will be brought before a judge for approval. The judge will only approve the DPA if satisfied that it is in the interests of justice and the terms are fair, reasonable and proportionate. The judge can adjourn the matter to obtain further information or clarification as to the facts or terms.

If judicial approval is given, the criminal proceedings will be suspended for a set period as defined by the terms of the DPA. The terms and facts of the DPA will then be published on the authority's website.

If the corporate complies with the terms of the DPA, at the conclusion of the set period the criminal proceedings will be formally discontinued. If the corporate breaches the terms and the breach cannot be remedied, the criminal proceedings will resume.

DPAs carry the advantage of avoiding a conviction, affording the opportunity of speedier resolution (relatively speaking) and to continue trading under agreed parameters. They also enable the corporate to avoid the time and costs of an open-ended, lengthy and uncertain criminal investigation and trial that can adversely affect share price and access to finance, and cause difficulties in tendering.

The obvious disadvantage of entering into a DPA is if a corporate has substantially accepted its conduct would have constituted a criminal offence, and then will need to accept penalties based on a prosecution case that has not been tested at trial, where a corporate could potentially have been acquitted of the relevant charges (as in the Tesco Stores Limited case, as discussed in question 51). A further disadvantage to be carefully considered is that the terms of a DPA are likely to include regular monitoring and audit by an independent monitor (typically a large accountancy or law firm) for which the company will bear the costs.

At the time of writing, five DPAs have been agreed in the UK. The most recent of these was with Serco Geografix Ltd (a wholly owned subsidiary of Serco Group plc), relating to allegations of fraud and false accounting. Of particular significance was the 'very substantial co-operation' shown by Serco Group, which included not only waiving privilege in respect of certain accounting material and detailed, proactive and prompt reporting of the fraudulent conduct, but also co-operation with the SFO's request not to engage in any internal inquiry of its own by way of interviewing witnesses during the SFO's criminal investigation; instead Serco Group instructed an independent law firm to conduct a full document review and provided the SFO with a detailed report of the findings. It also notified the SFO of any developments within the business that could affect the criminal investigation and gave the SFO unrestricted access to the email accounts of current and former employees. This is also the first case in which a parent company agreed to accept obligations mirroring the requirements imposed on its subsidiary by the DPA, described by Mr Justice Davis as a 'key component of the DPA' and 'an important development in the use of DPAs'.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

Reporting restrictions can be placed on DPAs while criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals are under way in the UK. Reporting restrictions were imposed on the Sarclad and Tesco DPAs because of ongoing proceedings against the individuals allegedly responsible for the misconduct. Following the conclusion of those proceedings, the reporting restrictions were lifted.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

Before entering into a settlement with a law enforcement authority, a company should assess: the merits and strength of the prosecution and defence cases; the likelihood of conviction; the expected time, cost, reputational damage and other adverse effects of a lengthy investigation and trial; and the likely penalties in the event of a conviction, including possible debarment from public procurement tenders.

The company should then carefully assess the terms of the proposed settlement, including the effect that continuing co-operation could have on the business (legal costs, staff resources, etc.); whether the settlement will resolve the matter in all relevant jurisdictions and, if not, the effect the settlement could have in regard to ongoing investigations in other jurisdictions (e.g., whether the authority that has settled will disclose information and assist foreign authorities); and any other adverse effects that the settlement could have on the future of the business.

Ultimately the company should balance the seriousness of the charge and the potential consequences of a conviction (including whether it results in debarment) against the terms of the settlement, as in some circumstances the terms of a settlement, including, for example, the costs of regular review and monitoring by an independent monitor (typically a large accountancy or law firm), could be more disadvantageous to a company than a conviction.

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

The Crime and Courts Act 2013 and the related guidance permit the appointment of monitors in appropriate cases. The Deferred Prosecution Agreements Code of Practice (the DPA Code) – of which the SFO and CPS are required to take account when negotiating, applying to the court for and overseeing DPAs – sets out the roles, duties and mechanics of appointing monitors as a term of a DPA. The DPA Code stops short of requiring or even encouraging the appointment of a monitor as a condition of a DPA.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

Parallel private civil actions are allowed. Generally, but not always, the criminal proceedings will take precedence and civil proceedings can be stayed for the duration of the criminal investigation, so as not to prejudice any criminal proceedings.

Private plaintiffs will only gain access to specified information in the authority's files if they obtain a court order. Before making any such order, the court would carefully consider the reason why the private plaintiff requires the information, whether the plaintiff would be able to obtain the information from any other source, the method by which the authority obtained the relevant information, for example if it was obtained under compulsory powers, and whether the information is likely to contain any confidential, privileged or personal information relating to third parties.

Increasingly, small numbers of private criminal prosecutions involving allegations of fraud are being conducted in the courts of England and Wales. The instigation of a private prosecution is provided for in section 6 of the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985 and is subject to a power of the director of public prosecutions to take over the private prosecution at any stage (and, if they choose, to discontinue it).

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

It is a contempt of court to publish a report that creates a substantial risk that the course of justice in active criminal proceedings will be seriously impeded or prejudiced. Proceedings are active for this purpose after arrest or charge and until the proceedings have been concluded, for example by acquittal or conviction, or discontinuance by the authority. As a result there is generally very little media reporting of criminal investigations in the UK until the end of a trial other than to state the facts of arrests and report court hearings.

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

It is common practice for companies to hire a public relations (PR) firm to manage a large-scale corporate crisis to mitigate potential reputational damage. It is important to ensure a consistent approach by opening good lines of communication between the company's internal marketing and the external PR firm, and to ensure that the PR firm is aware of any legal or corporate issues (including any agreements reached with the investigating authority with regard to press releases, etc.).

It is also vitally important that public statements do not have the potential effect of prejudicing ongoing criminal proceedings (for example, the trial of the company or individual employees) or contradict any defence on which the company may later seek to rely. For those reasons, statements issued by a company under investigation should be brief and factual, and should always be approved by the company's criminal law advisers.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

As stated in question 71, it is vitally important that public statements issued by the company do not have the potential effect of prejudicing ongoing criminal proceedings, such as the related prosecution of employees or third parties. Statements issued by a company in those circumstances should always be brief and factual, and approved by the company's criminal law advisers until the conclusion of all related proceedings.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

Under the UK Listing Rules, publicly listed companies must issue a market announcement without delay regarding any major new development that may affect their business, if the development may lead to a substantial share price movement. A settlement of criminal proceedings would generally require such an announcement.

If the matter is settled by way of a DPA, the matter is not settled until it has actually been approved by a judge at a court hearing. In practice, prior to the final hearing (at which the parties will generally expect approval to be given, as the terms, etc. will have been examined and challenged at preliminary hearings), the company and the authority will have agreed press statements to be released to the market and wider public as soon as approval is given.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

The UK government is due to report on its call for evidence in expanding the 'failure to prevent' offence to include other economic crime (it currently covers bribery and tax evasion).

In April 2018, the European Parliament voted to adopt the Fifth Money Laundering Directive (5MLD). Intended to address weaknesses and update 4MLD, it is to be transposed into UK domestic law by 10 January 2020; however, it is presently unclear whether the UK government will proceed with the legislation in the event of a no-deal Brexit.

5MLD makes significant changes to the anti-money laundering regime in the European Union, including designating virtual currency platforms and custodian wallet providers as obliged entities for the purposes of 4MLD and revising the scope of the customer due diligence provisions. It will also require enhanced due diligence to be carried out in transactions to and from high-risk countries; increase powers and access to information for national financial intelligence units; and require registers of corporates' beneficial ownership information to be made available to the general public.

In June 2019, the Law Commission published its report on the suspicious activity reporting process, concluding that although the core of the current system should be retained, improvements and efficiencies are required if the reporting regime is to produce useful intelligence rather than simply volumes of low-quality information. Recommendations include:

- the creation of an advisory board of industry experts to oversee the drafting of guidance and advise the secretary of state on appropriate improvements and how best to respond to emerging threats;
- the production of a new standardised online suspicious activity report (SAR) form, to make the reporting process easier to navigate, promoting greater consistency in the information that is provided in an easy-to-read, accessible format that would also allow analytical techniques to be applied to it, and speed up the process; and
- allowing ring-fencing of suspected criminal property by a credit of financial institution in certain circumstances. The practical effect of submitting an SAR is that whole accounts are frozen, not just the allegedly criminal property element, which can cause difficulties for both banks and account holders while a decision on consent to proceed is awaited (and even after that). This recommendation will give some comfort particularly to banks, allowing for a more proportionate response to the reporting of suspected criminal property, enabling transactions on legitimate funds to continue while prohibiting the use of those under suspicion.

The UK government's response to the recommendations is awaited.

General context, key principles and hot topics

1 Identify the highest-profile corporate investigation under way in your country, describing and commenting on its most noteworthy aspects.

According to published reports, a significant criminal investigation is being conducted in connection with the computer issues that contributed to two crashes involving the 737 Max (in October 2018 and March 2019). This could, as a minimum, result in civil actions or criminal charges (or both) being pursued against corporations involved in the aviation industry or executives at some of those companies, depending on the facts that emerge from that investigation.

Numerous cases have been filed against drug manufacturers and distributors in connection with the distribution of opioids in the United States. While these are predominately civil cases, in some instances prosecutors are evaluating criminal charges against involved individuals.

2 Outline the legal framework for corporate liability in your country.

Under the doctrine of respondeat superior, a corporation may be held criminally liable for the illegal acts of its directors, officers, employees and agents. The government must establish that the corporate agent's actions were (1) within the scope of his or her duties and (2) intended, at least in part, to benefit the corporation. The corporation need not have profited from the agent's actions for the corporation to be held liable. Prosecutors in the United States are given broad discretion to determine whether to prosecute for violations of federal criminal law.

3 Which law enforcement authorities regulate corporations? How is jurisdiction between the authorities allocated? Do the authorities have policies or protocols relating to the prosecution of corporations?

Corporations are subject to regulation and oversight by federal, state and local authorities depending on their businesses and industry. It is not uncommon for multiple government authorities to conduct investigations at the same time regarding the same set of facts, and agencies do not typically refrain from pursuing cases because other agencies are also involved. The Department of Justice (DOJ) has policies and protocols relating to corporate prosecutions, as well as a policy to work with other agencies investigating the same conduct to avoid 'piling on' penalties.

4 What grounds must the authorities have to initiate an investigation? Is a certain threshold of suspicion necessary to trigger an investigation?

There is no threshold of suspicion that must be met before law enforcement may initiate an investigation. Investigations may even be initiated and conducted to satisfy law enforcement that no misconduct occurred.

5 How can the lawfulness or scope of a notice or subpoena from an authority be challenged in your country?

Civil subpoenas issued by government agencies can be challenged in court with respect to the lawfulness or scope of a subpoena. However, typically, the relevant government agency has broad authority to obtain information that is relevant to a legitimate subject of investigation.

6 Does your country make use of co-operative agreements giving immunity or leniency to individuals who assist or co-operate with authorities?

Both individuals and corporations can benefit from co-operating with law enforcement during an investigation. Individuals may enter into agreements with the government by which they will be granted immunity or be permitted to plead guilty to a lesser charge in exchange for agreeing to provide information or testimony against other defendants. Corporations may receive non-prosecution agreements (NPAs) or deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs) in exchange for co-operating in an investigation.

7 What are the top priorities for your country's law enforcement authorities?

Some top law enforcement priorities affecting corporations include enforcement of the False Claims Act (prohibiting overcharging and related false claims for payment by the government); securities laws regulating publicly traded companies and the stock market; anti-bribery and anti-corruption laws; cybersecurity; and laws governing consumer online privacy.

Cyber-related issues

8 Does your country regulate cybersecurity? Describe the approach of local law enforcement authorities to cybersecurity-related failings.

The United States does not have an overarching federal cybersecurity law; rather, certain government agencies and banking regulators have created cybersecurity regulations for the corporations under their control.

For example, issuers of US securities are required to comply with the Securities and Exchange Commission's (SEC) regulations, including: (1) Regulation S-P (17 CFR section 248.30), which requires firms to adopt written policies and procedures to protect customer information against cyberattacks and other forms of unauthorised access; (2) Regulation S-ID (17 CFR section 248.201-202), which outlines a firm's duties regarding the detection, prevention and mitigation of identity theft; and (3) the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (17 CFR section 240.17a-4(f)), which requires firms to preserve electronically stored records in a non-rewritable, non-erasable format. Since 2015, the SEC has brought a handful of enforcement actions against public companies for violations of these regulations.

All 50 US states have state-specific cybersecurity laws. The states require companies to inform consumers if their personal information was compromised or may have been compromised. In many cases, state attorneys generally work together to bring coordinated, multi-state data breach actions. For example, when Marriott announced that there had been a breach of its reservation systems, exposing the personal data of up to 500 million customers, multiple states announced the opening of investigations.

State banking regulators also have cybersecurity requirements and often coordinate enforcement efforts. The New York Department of Financial Services and seven other state banking regulators announced that Equifax had agreed to take corrective action for its 2017 data breach.

9 Does your country regulate cybercrime? What is the approach of law enforcement authorities in your country to cybercrime?

Most cybercrime is prosecuted under the US Computer Fraud and Abuse Act (CFAA). The CFAA criminalises the unauthorised access of a protected computer without proper authorisation. It covers hacking, phishing, infection of IT systems with malware, electronic theft, and identity theft or fraud. Additional US statutes that cover cybercrime are 18 USC section 1028, which criminalises identity theft; 18 USC section 1029, which criminalises the use of unauthorised access devices to commit fraud; and the Stored Communication Act (18 USC section 2701), which criminalises electronic theft of stored communications. The DOJ has a Computer Crime and Intellectual Property Section that investigates and prosecutes computer crimes.

The US and 60 other jurisdictions have signed the Budapest Convention on Cybercrime, which is a binding international treaty that provides a framework for international co-operation on cybercrime and electronic evidence.

Cross-border issues and foreign authorities

10 Does local criminal law have general extraterritorial effect? To the extent that extraterritorial effect is limited to specific offences, give details.

In RJR Nabisco, Inc. v. European Community (2016), the US Supreme Court set up a two-step framework for addressing the extraterritorial application of federal statutes. First, a court must determine whether the presumption against extraterritoriality has been rebutted through a clear, affirmative indication that the statute applies extraterritorially. If not, the court must determine whether the case involves a domestic application of the statute. If the relevant conduct occurred within the United States, even if some conduct occurred abroad, the case is deemed an acceptable domestic application of the statute. On the other hand, if the conduct that is the statute's focus occurred abroad, extraterritorial application is not permitted.

The Foreign Corrupt Practices Act is an example of a statute that states that it can be applied against foreign companies or persons who carry out bribery schemes while acting in the United States. Since 2010, the US courts have narrowly construed the extraterritorial reach of a number of other statutes, including the Alien Tort Statute, the Torture Victim Protection Act and the Securities and Exchange Act of 1934.

11 Describe the principal challenges that arise in your country in cross-border investigations, and explain whether and how such challenges depend on the other countries involved.

The combination of data protection regimes, blocking statutes, bank secrecy laws and employment laws outside the United States make cross-border investigations challenging. The DOJ has broad discretion to provide co-operation credit and leniency to corporations that turn over relevant facts in a timely manner. Corporations that have relevant documents outside the United States must weigh the risk of violating foreign laws against the risk that the US government will bring criminal charges against it.

12 Does double jeopardy, or a similar concept, apply to prevent a corporation from facing criminal exposure in your country after it resolves charges on the same core set of facts in another? Is there anything analogous in your jurisdiction to the 'anti-piling on' policy as exists in the United States (the Policy on Coordination of Corporate Resolution Penalties) to prevent multiple authorities seeking to penalise companies for the same conduct?

Double jeopardy does not prevent the US government from charging a corporation with a crime even if the corporation has already resolved similar charges with a foreign government. According to the dual-sovereignty doctrine, a crime under one sovereign's laws is not 'the same offence' for double jeopardy purposes as a crime under the laws of another sovereign.

In May 2018, the DOJ adopted a non-binding policy into the Justice Manual that promotes coordination between US and foreign law enforcement in an effort to limit duplicative penalties on corporate entities for the same conduct. The policy instructs prosecutors that in resolving a case with a company that is being investigated by multiple authorities, the DOJ and others should coordinate with one another to avoid the unnecessary imposition of duplicative penalties against the company.

13 Are 'global' settlements common in your country? What are the practical considerations?

Global resolutions are becoming more common as US law enforcement increases its co-operation with law enforcement in other countries. Global settlements can benefit a corporation by presenting an efficient way to resolve issues with multiple countries at once. However, global settlements do not always result in overall reduced penalties and fines, as law enforcement authorities may make higher settlement demands than they would have made individually. Corporations should proceed cautiously when negotiating global settlements and be sure to invoke any applicable policies against 'piling on'.

14 What bearing do the decisions of foreign authorities have on an investigation of the same matter in your country?

A criminal decision against a corporation in another jurisdiction will not end an ongoing investigation in the United States. US law enforcement may attempt to co-operate with foreign authorities to gain additional facts about the corporation that it has been unable to get directly. US law enforcement may also consider the penalties and fines imposed by the foreign authority when deciding an appropriate penalty in the United States.

Economic sanctions enforcement

15 Describe your country's sanctions programme and any recent sanctions imposed by your jurisdiction.

The Office of Foreign Assets Control (OFAC) of the US Department of the Treasury enforces economic and trade sanctions against targeted foreign countries and individuals, and takes action against those who do business with them. Primary sanctions prohibit transactions with sanctioned countries or persons. Primary sanctions apply to US persons, US corporations and all persons physically located in the United States, regardless of nationality. Non-US entities can also be liable for primary sanctions for taking actions within the United States, conspiring with US persons to violate sanctions, or using the US financial system. Secondary sanctions may be imposed on non-US persons or entities who engage in transactions deemed to be contrary to US national security and foreign policy interests. Although penalties cannot be imposed for secondary sanctions, they can result in restricting access to the US financial system or markets. OFAC has brought several high-profile cases against non-US financial institutions in recent years.

16 What is your country's approach to sanctions enforcement? Has there been an increase in sanctions enforcement activity in recent years, for example?

OFAC enforcement actions have increased significantly as compared with prior years. In the 12 months ending 30 June 2019, OFAC reported bringing 25 published enforcement actions as compared with nine the previous year. The level of penalties has increased as well, from US$17.1 million for the year ending 30 June 2018 to approximately US$1.35 billion the following year.

OFAC recently announced a change in policy that may end up increasing a corporation's overall penalty in cases involving multiple US agencies. In June 2019, OFAC stated that the only penalties charged by another agency that OFAC would deem to satisfy its own penalties would be those that fit the same pattern of conduct over the same period of time that gave rise to the OFAC penalty.

17 Do the authorities responsible for sanctions compliance and enforcement in your country co-operate with their counterparts in other countries for the purposes of enforcement?

The US Treasury Department and OFAC co-operate with their counterparts in countries that are allies of the United States.

18 Has your country enacted any blocking legislation in relation to the sanctions measures of third countries? Describe how such legislation operates.

The US has not enacted blocking legislation.

19 To the extent that your country has enacted any sanctions blocking legislation, how is compliance enforced by local authorities in practice?

Not applicable.

Before an internal investigation

20 How do allegations of misconduct most often come to light in companies in your country?

Common ways in which misconduct comes to light include regular audit and compliance activities, whistleblower complaints, government subpoenas, media reports, and business people encountering irregularities in the ordinary course of their jobs.

Under the federal securities laws, when auditors become aware that an illegal act may have occurred at a public company, certain affirmative investigation and reporting obligations are triggered. The auditor is obliged to determine whether an illegal act has occurred, report it to management and assure itself that the issuer's audit committee or board of directors has also been informed. There are additional reporting obligations imposed on the auditor if the issue is not remedied, which culminate with auditor withdrawal and affirmative reporting to the SEC of the issue.

Information gathering

21 Does your country have a data protection regime?

The United States does not have a data protection regime.

22 To the extent not dealt with above at question 8, how is the data protection regime enforced?

Not applicable.

23 Are there any data protection issues that cause particular concern in internal investigations in your country?

Not applicable.

24 Does your country regulate or otherwise restrict the interception of employees' communications? What are its features and how is the regime enforced?

There is no general restriction on interception of employee communications in the United States so long as the employees are using company systems.

Dawn raids and search warrants

25 Are search warrants or dawn raids on companies a feature of law enforcement in your country? Describe any legal limitations on authorities executing search warrants or dawn raids, and what redress a company has if those limits are exceeded.

Ordinarily, US law enforcement uses subpoenas for information to obtain materials from companies. It is unusual for law enforcement to conduct a dawn raid or execute a search warrant at a company. The use of these tools generally indicates a concern that the company may either conceal or destroy relevant evidence if it was requested by a subpoena.

A search warrant allows law enforcement to search for materials specifically delineated in the warrant. While a search warrant requires a company to provide access to these materials, it does not require employees of the company to submit to interviews or answer questions posed by law enforcement. If law enforcement exceeds the limits of a search warrant or conducts improper interviews, the company's primary recourse would be to move to suppress the information in any subsequent legal proceeding.

26 How can privileged material be lawfully protected from seizure during a dawn raid or in response to a search warrant in your country?

Law enforcement agencies bear the responsibility for segregating privileged materials or using a special 'taint team' of attorneys unrelated to the investigation to review seized documents for privilege. Ordinarily, companies will not be permitted to withhold privileged documents without consent of law enforcement. Companies can assist in the privilege review process by identifying in-house and external attorneys to the investigative agents. Companies can also be careful to segregate these materials to protect against inadvertent disclosure.

27 Under what circumstances may an individual's testimony be compelled in your country? What consequences flow from such compelled testimony? Are there any privileges that would prevent an individual or company from providing testimony?

Under the Fifth Amendment to the US Constitution, an individual cannot be compelled to provide incriminating testimony against himself or herself. Any testimony improperly compelled cannot be used in a legal proceeding against the individual. Companies, however, are not protected by this privilege and cannot withhold testimony that might be incriminating.

Generally, there is no right against self-incrimination for producing documents, unless the act of producing the documents would be incriminating.

Whistleblowing and employee rights

28 Describe the whistleblowing framework in your country. What financial incentive schemes exist for whistleblowers? What legal protections are in place for whistleblowers?

The United States does not have a comprehensive framework for protecting all whistleblowers in all situations. Instead, many different federal and state laws have been enacted to incentivise whistleblowers and protect them from retaliation. For example, the False Claims Act allows persons and entities with evidence of fraud against federal programmes or contracts to sue the wrongdoer on behalf of the government. A qui tam plaintiff can receive between 15 and 30 per cent of the total recovery from the defendant.

Additionally, the whistleblower programme under the Dodd-Frank Act provides monetary incentives for individuals to report possible violations of the federal securities laws to the SEC. Under the programme, eligible whistleblowers are entitled to an award of between 10 and 30 per cent of the monetary sanctions collected. The whistleblower programme also prohibits retaliation by employers against employees who provide the SEC with information.

29 What rights does local employment law confer on employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation? Is there any distinction between officers and directors of the company for these purposes?

Aside from any applicable whistleblower protections, employees generally do not have rights under federal or state employment laws during an investigation. This is true whether the employee is an officer, director or rank-and-file employee.

30 Do employees' rights under local employment law differ if a person is deemed to have engaged in misconduct? Are there disciplinary or other steps that a company must take when an employee is implicated or suspected of misconduct, such as suspension or in relation to compensation?

Unless whistleblower protections apply, a company may take any number of disciplinary actions against an employee who has engaged in misconduct, including suspension or termination of contract. Companies have a duty to their shareholders to take action and not turn a blind eye to misconduct.

31 Can an employee be dismissed for refusing to participate in an internal investigation?

Most employees in the United States are subject to at-will employment, meaning that, unless other protections apply, their contracts may be terminated at any time. Employees whose conduct is within the scope of an investigation are expected to participate in investigations, and may be dismissed if they refuse to co-operate.

Commencing an internal investigation

32 Is it common practice in your country to prepare a document setting out terms of reference or investigatory scope before commencing an internal investigation? What issues would it cover?

It is common to have a working investigative plan to manage investigative activities. Such a document may address:

- document preservation and gathering;
- witnesses;
- legal issues and analysis;
- factual analysis;
- key questions to be answered; and
- reporting obligations.

However, because investigations are often fluid, the expectation is that the document will be updated and revised frequently, to account for new or different tasks based on information learned in the course of the investigation.

33 If an issue comes to light prior to the authorities in your country becoming aware or engaged, what internal steps should a company take? Are there internal steps that a company is legally or ethically required to take?

A company should conduct an internal investigation and remediate the issue. Most government agencies give corporations credit for investigating and self-reporting issues. The decision to self-report is fact dependent and involves weighing many factors.

Under the SEC's regulations, an in-house lawyer at a public company is required to report 'evidence of a material violation' to the issuer's chief legal officer and chief executive officer, and in some cases to the appropriate committee of the issuer's board of directors consisting solely of independent directors, or to the whole board of directors. In the context of an investigation initiated by a public company's external auditors, the company may have an obligation to report to the SEC if the auditors conclude that the company has not properly remediated certain illegal activities.

34 What internal steps should a company in your country take if it receives a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority seeking the production or preservation of documents or data?

The company should prepare a legal hold notice and distribute it to relevant individuals and the company's IT department. Affirmative steps should be taken to prevent destruction of responsive materials – including discontinuing any automatic deletion of such data pursuant to data retention policies.

If the company is being investigated for potential wrongdoing, it is important that external counsel or individuals with indicia of independence and trustworthiness are responsible for preserving and collecting documents. If there is any uncertainty regarding what search terms should be used to identify responsive documents, attorneys for the corporation typically discuss search terms with the government.

35 At what point must a company in your country publicly disclose the existence of an internal investigation or contact from a law enforcement authority?

As a general matter, there is no requirement to disclose the existence of an internal investigation or the fact that the company was contacted by law enforcement. Public companies are forbidden from making affirmative statements that are false or misleading. Thus, companies should be careful not to make statements that are untrue or misleading because of undisclosed facts about an internal investigation or law enforcement contact. There is a duty to disclose to the extent that disclosure is necessary to ensure affirmative statements are not misleading.

36 How are internal investigations viewed by local enforcement bodies in your country?

Government authorities place value on independent and thorough internal investigations. For example, the DOJ in its Justice Manual has stated that to 'earn maximum co-operation credit, a corporation must do a timely self-analysis and be proactive in voluntarily disclosing wrongdoing and identifying all individuals substantially involved [ ] or responsible' (Justice Manual, section 4-3.100(3)). The SEC describes self-reporting as one of the key factors for evaluating a company's co-operation 'including conducting a thorough review of the nature, extent, origins and consequences of the misconduct, and promptly, completely and effectively disclosing the misconduct to the public, to regulatory agencies, and to self-regulatory organizations' (SEC Enforcement Manual, Framework for Evaluating Co-operation by Companies, 6.1.2). Neither agency sets forth exacting requirements for the conduct or format of the internal investigations; what is appropriate is fact-dependent.

Attorney–client privilege

37 Can attorney–client privilege be claimed over any aspects of internal investigations in your country? What steps should a company take in your country to protect the privilege or confidentiality of an internal investigation?

Generally, the attorney–client privilege and the attorney work-product doctrine may be claimed over most aspects of an internal investigation so long as the fact-finding and analysis is being done by or at the direction of attorneys for the purpose of providing legal advice to the client. This privilege would cover attorney notes, interview memoranda, legal analysis and recommendations provided by counsel to the client. Companies should ensure that privileged materials are not shared with third parties and are clearly labelled as being 'attorney–client privileged'.

38 Set out the key principles or elements of the attorney–client privilege in your country as it relates to corporations. Who is the holder of the privilege? Are there any differences when the client is an individual?

Communications by corporate employees made for the purpose of assisting counsel in providing legal advice to the corporation are generally covered by attorney–client privilege. The corporation holds the privilege and it may only be waived by the corporate entity or an authorised executive (for example, the general counsel).

39 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to in-house and external counsel in your country?

The attorney–client privilege applies equally to in-house and external counsel so long as both are providing legal advice. In certain instances, in-house counsel will be called on to provide 'business' advice, which is not protected even if it is provided by an attorney.

40 Does the attorney–client privilege apply equally to advice sought from foreign lawyers in relation to (internal or external) investigations in your country?

The attorney–client privilege applies equally to US and foreign lawyers.

41 To what extent is waiver of the attorney–client privilege regarded as a co-operative step in your country? Are there any contexts where privilege waiver is mandatory or required?

While the waiver of the attorney–client privilege is regarded as a co-operative step by US law enforcement, DOJ policy prohibits law enforcement from requesting or requiring privilege waivers to receive credit for co-operation. Other federal agencies may request but do not typically require privilege waivers to obtain co-operation credit.

42 Does the concept of limited waiver of privilege exist as a concept in your jurisdiction? What is its scope?

Most courts will not enforce 'selective waivers' to government entities. Companies sometimes provide factual information to the government (rather than any legal analysis or memos) to avoid an argument by a third party that privilege has been waived.

43 If privilege has been waived on a limited basis in another country, can privilege be maintained in your own country?

If the disclosure of attorney–client information was compelled in a foreign country (or the privilege was not recognised), this would generally not result in a waiver of the attorney–client privilege in the United States. However, any voluntary disclosure will usually result in a waiver.

44 Do common interest privileges exist as concepts in your country? What are the requirements and scope?

Common interest privilege does exist in the United States. It is an extension of the attorney–client privilege to communications between two or more parties that have a common legal interest. The party asserting the privilege must demonstrate that (1) the communications were made in furtherance of a joint defence effort, (2) the statements were designed to further that effort and (3) the privilege was not waived.

45 Can privilege be claimed over the assistance given by third parties to lawyers?

So long as a third party is working for a client at the direction of an attorney, and for the purpose of assisting the lawyer to provide legal advice to the client, this assistance will remain privileged.

Witness interviews

46 Does your country permit the interviewing of witnesses as part of an internal investigation?

Yes, witness interviews are a critical part of internal investigations in the United States.

47 Can a company claim attorney–client privilege over internal witness interviews or attorney reports?

Yes, companies regularly assert privilege over witness interviews and reports in the United States, provided that the interviews and reports were generated to provide legal advice.

48 When conducting a witness interview of an employee in your country, what legal or ethical requirements or guidance must be adhered to? Are there different requirements when interviewing third parties?

Upjohn warnings are required when conducting witness interviews of employees and are typically provided to both current and former employees.

49 How is an internal interview typically conducted in your country? Are documents put to the witness? May or must employees in your country have their own legal representation at the interview?

Witness interviews are typically conducted by external counsel, sometimes in the presence of in-house counsel or subject matter experts assisting counsel (or both). Documents are usually shown to the witness during interviews. Witnesses can retain their own legal representation if they so choose, but there is no requirement to do so.

Reporting to the authorities

50 Are there circumstances under which reporting misconduct to law enforcement authorities is mandatory in your country?

There is no overarching duty or legal obligation to self-report corporate misconduct, but there are certain specific situations in which it is mandatory, including highly regulated industries such as insurance, banking and healthcare.

51 In what circumstances might you advise a company to self-report to law enforcement even if it has no legal obligation to do so? In what circumstances would that advice to self-report extend to countries beyond your country?

The DOJ and several other federal agencies have issued policies providing for leniency and reduced penalties for companies that self-report. It is generally understood that co-operating with a government investigation will not result in as favourable an outcome for a corporation as the combination of self-reporting and co-operating. In some cases, self-reporting corporate misconduct and co-operating with an investigation can lead to a decision not to prosecute.

Despite the strong incentive to self-report, it is not always the best course of action. Several factors must be considered, such as the severity and pervasiveness of the misconduct; whether corporate officers or board members were involved; whether the misconduct continued over a long period of time; and whether the investing public or consumers were harmed by the misconduct.

52 What are the practical steps you need to take to self-report to law enforcement in your country?

There is no formal process for self-reporting. Typically, external counsel will contact law enforcement and seek a meeting to explain how the misconduct was discovered, how the misconduct occurred, and what the corporation is doing to investigate and make sure the misconduct is not repeated. One of the factors the government considers is whether the company reported within a reasonable time after learning of the misconduct. Accordingly, a complete internal investigation is not required prior to self-reporting, although the company will want to understand enough facts to determine whether self-reporting is advisable.

Responding to the authorities

53 In practice, how does a company in your country respond to a notice or subpoena from a law enforcement authority? Is it possible to enter into dialogue with the authorities to address their concerns before or even after charges are brought? How?

The first step following receipt of a subpoena would ordinarily be for external counsel to place a call to the government attorney. The purpose of the call would be to understand the nature and scope of the government's investigation, as well as whether the company is a target of the investigation or simply a witness. Most law enforcement agencies will enter into a dialogue with a company's external attorney prior to charges being brought. Most prosecutors' offices will also allow a company's attorney to meet with senior supervisors in the prosecutors' office to present their position as to why charges should not be brought.

54 Are ongoing authority investigations subject to challenge before the courts?

Investigations are considered to be firmly within the discretion of the executive branch of government. Unless there is evidence that government prosecutors are abusing their investigative authority and violating legally protected rights, it is highly unusual for courts to interfere with an ongoing investigation.

55 In the event that authorities in your country and one or more other countries issue separate notices or subpoenas regarding the same facts or allegations, how should the company approach this?

When a company receives multiple subpoenas regarding the same facts, the company should analyse whether this is part of a coordinated effort or whether these are entirely separate investigations. If they are coordinated investigations, it can be advantageous to ensure consistent disclosure between all jurisdictions. If they are separate investigations, it may not be advantageous to alert US authorities that foreign authorities are investigating the same issues.

56 If a notice or subpoena from the authorities in your country seeks production of material relating to a particular matter that crosses borders, must the company search for, and produce material, in other countries to satisfy the request? What are the difficulties in that regard?

Prosecutors typically expect a company to search for and produce responsive documents in its possession, custody or control even if those documents are located outside the United States. Documents held by a company's foreign affiliates are generally considered in the company's control. If the subpoenaed documents implicate the laws of another jurisdiction, such as data privacy laws, the company should consider whether there is a way to comply with the law while also complying with the subpoena (such as by requesting the consent of employees whose data will be turned over). If responding to the subpoena would expose the company and its employees to criminal liability in another country, the company may decide to seek a protective order from a US court.

57 Does law enforcement in your country routinely share information or investigative materials with law enforcement in other countries? What framework is in place in your country for co-operation with foreign authorities?

It is common for US law enforcement to share investigative materials with authorities outside the United States, particularly when the information sharing is mutual. Sometimes co-operation occurs through formal mutual legal assistance treaties or memoranda of understanding.

58 Do law enforcement authorities in your country have any confidentiality obligations in relation to information received during an investigation or onward disclosure and use of that information by third parties?

Unless law enforcement agrees to be bound by a non-disclosure agreement, the government can share materials received during an investigation with other agencies or overseas investigators. The government does not typically share information with non-government third parties or allow the material to be subject to public disclosure during the course of an investigation. There are strict secrecy laws for information obtained in the United States via a grand jury subpoena. This information cannot be shared without a court order, or else under very narrow legal exceptions.

59 How would you advise a company that has received a request from a law enforcement authority in your country seeking documents from another country, where production would violate the laws of that other country?

A company should not voluntarily produce documents to US law enforcement if doing so would violate the laws of another country. If the company is compelled to produce them by subpoena, the least risky solution is to obtain consent from the foreign country or ask law enforcement to obtain the documents through a mutual legal assistance treaty. If those options fail, the company could seek a protective order in court, seeking to be relieved of its obligation to produce such documents. If the court denies the company's motion for a protective order, the company will have to decide whether it is more risky to continue to resist the subpoena or to comply and violate foreign law.

60 Does your country have secrecy or blocking statutes? What related issues arise from compliance with a notice or subpoena?

Not applicable.

61 What are the risks in voluntary production versus compelled production of material to authorities in your country? Is this material discoverable by third parties? Is there any confidentiality attached to productions to law enforcement in your country?

In some cases, there are no additional risks in producing documents voluntarily versus pursuant to a subpoena. In other cases, however, such as when the government requests otherwise confidential information about customers or third parties, it is less risky to produce documents pursuant to subpoena. Voluntary production may subject a company to potential liability from third parties for providing confidential information to law enforcement that was not compelled.

Documents produced to the government during the course of an investigation are exempt from public disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act during the pendency of the investigation. Information compelled by a grand jury subpoena is ordinarily protected by strict secrecy and would not be discoverable by third parties, whereas similar information that was voluntarily provided would be discoverable.

Prosecution and penalties

62 What types of penalties may companies or their directors, officers or employees face for misconduct in your country?

If a company is convicted of a crime, it can be sentenced to fines, restitution, disgorgement, forfeiture of property derived from criminal activity, and suspension or debarment. Corporate monitors are also sometimes appointed to oversee a company's ongoing activities. Individuals are subject to similar criminal penalties in addition to imprisonment.

63 Where there is a risk of a corporate's suspension, debarment or other restrictions on continuing business in your country, what options or restrictions apply to a corporate wanting to settle in another country?

Depending upon the context of the investigation, suspension or debarment is a significant risk in heavily regulated industries, such as healthcare and securities. When negotiating with regulators, counsel may be able to negotiate terms that would avoid or minimise the risk of these possibilities and the attendant impact on future business operations. Extraterritorial settlements are not typical because such arrangements tend not to resolve violations of US law.

64 What do the authorities in your country take into account when fixing penalties?

In the event of a successful conviction, sentencing courts consider factors set forth in the US Sentencing Guidelines as well as criminal statutes and policy guidelines. In general, the broad factors to be considered at sentencing are set forth at 18 USC section 3553(a) and include:

- the nature and circumstances of the offence and the history and characteristics of the defendant;
- the need for the sentence imposed to reflect the seriousness of the offence, promote respect for the law and provide just punishment for the offence;
- to afford an adequate deterrent to criminal conduct;
- to protect the public from further crimes of the defendant;
- to provide the defendant with the necessary educational or vocational training, medical care or other correctional treatment in the most effective manner;
- the kinds of sentences available;
- the kinds of sentence and the sentencing range established for the applicable category of offence committed by the applicable category of defendant as set forth in the US Sentencing Guidelines or applicable policies; and
- the need to provide restitution to any victims of the offence.

Resolution and settlements short of trial

65 Are non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements available in your jurisdiction for corporations?

Both are available in the United States.

Under the terms of an NPA, the government agrees not to file a criminal charge for the specified acts under investigation. In exchange, the putative corporate or individual defendant enters into certain agreements with the government, which may include financial terms, imposition of a corporate monitor or other remedial actions. The advantage of such an agreement from the defendant's perspective is that no criminal charge is filed and no conviction for any offence occurs (provided that the terms of the NPA are satisfied).

Under the terms of a DPA, the government agrees to hold in abeyance a criminal charge that has already been filed in exchange for the defendant's agreement to undertake certain actions. This can include financial requirements, monitoring requirements or other conditions, depending upon the nature of the case. The advantage of a DPA is that, provided the terms of the agreement are satisfied for the designated period of time, the government agrees to dismiss the pending criminal case and no criminal conviction results.

The disadvantage of NPA and DPA agreements is that the facts of the case are never tested by the adversarial system in court. Therefore, the government can make demands and allegations without ever having to prove (or even provide supporting evidence) to establish that a crime actually may have occurred.

66 Does your jurisdiction provide for reporting restrictions or anonymity for corporates that have entered into non-prosecution agreements or deferred prosecution agreements until the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to connected individuals to ensure fairness in those proceedings?

There is no restriction on reporting the existence or terms of a DPA or NPA.

67 Prior to any settlement with a law enforcement authority in your country, what considerations should companies be aware of?

Before entering into any settlement or plea bargain, companies must fully assess the risks and costs associated with trial, which involves a critical and detailed analysis of the underlying facts. If a settlement or plea bargain is the appropriate mechanism to resolve the case, companies must consider the effects on business operations and the possible ramifications for suspension, debarment, exclusion, negative publicity, effect on the company's market valuation, or other collateral consequences that may result. Companies should be aware that a resolution with US law enforcement could prompt investigations in other jurisdictions as well as possible private civil litigation, whether in the United States or abroad.

68 To what extent do law enforcement authorities in your country use external corporate compliance monitors as an enforcement tool?

Corporate compliance monitors are regularly used in the context of negotiated resolutions with the DOJ.

69 Are parallel private actions allowed? May private plaintiffs gain access to the authorities' files?

Private civil rights of action are sometimes allowed by statute. For example, securities fraud may give rise to private civil claims. Private litigants generally do not have access to the government's files, particularly any materials in possession of the government that were obtained via grand jury subpoena, since such materials are protected by Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

Publicity and reputational issues

70 Outline the law in your country surrounding publicity of criminal cases at the investigatory stage and once a case is before a court.

At the investigatory stage, all matters being investigated by a grand jury are protected from public disclosure. While a company is free to disclose the existence of an investigation if it so chooses, this usually does not happen unless the company decides that the existence of an investigation should be disclosed to shareholders or other parties of interest.

Once a case is before a court, the court record and pleadings in the case are generally available to the public, unless the case is filed under seal. The general view is that court cases should be transparent unless there is a special reason for confidentiality being required.

71 What steps do you take to manage corporate communications in your country? Is it common for companies to use a public relations firm to manage a corporate crisis in your country?

Public relations firms are regularly used to assist with corporate messaging strategy. However, careful coordination between public relations firms and counsel is of paramount importance. While a statement may be good for the company from a public relations perspective, that same statement may be harmful to the company from a criminal law perspective, and such statements may be admissible in the event of a trial or other proceeding on the merits.

72 How is publicity managed when there are ongoing related proceedings?

All publicity should be managed through the company's counsel. Counsel should coordinate and manage media issues in connection with public relations professionals.

Duty to the market

73 Is disclosure to the market in circumstances where a settlement has been agreed but not yet made public mandatory?

Under securities laws governing US issuers, disclosure would be required if the corporation's prior disclosures about the matter would be misleading without the updated information. Disclosure may also be required if the nature of the settlement triggers affirmative reporting obligations, for instance under SEC Regulation S-K.

Anticipated developments

74 Do you expect to see any key regulatory or legislative changes emerge in the next year or so designed to address corporate misconduct?

A bill that is currently being considered in Congress would shift the basis for insider trading liability from fraud to the wrongful use, gathering or communication of inside information. The bill would make it a violation to trade while in possession of material, non-public information 'if such person knows, or recklessly disregards, that such information has been obtained wrongfully, or that such purchase or sale would constitute a wrongful use of such information'. The bill would also make it a violation for a person 'wrongfully to communicate' confidential information if it was 'reasonably foreseeable' that the recipient, known as a 'tippee', would trade on it.

This year will also bring new cybersecurity laws and regulations. In 2019, at least 45 states and Puerto Rico introduced or considered more than 260 bills or resolutions that deal with cybersecurity. Most of the proposed legislation is intended to protect information held by government or businesses from unauthorised access and defending against attacks to various networks, computers and data.

About the Authors

Jennifer L Achilles
Reed Smith LLP

Jennifer Achilles is a partner in Reed Smith's global regulatory enforcement group based in New York. Her practice focuses on white-collar criminal defence, securities litigation and internal investigations. Jennifer is regularly ranked as a super lawyer and is an active supporter of diversity initiatives. She defends public and private companies, as well as their officers and directors, in insider trading, market manipulation, fraud, antitrust and Foreign Corrupt Practices Act investigations by the SEC, CFTC, FINRA, DOJ and New York DA's and AG's offices. Jennifer also leads internal investigations in advance of and in connection with government investigations, and counsels clients on co-operation and self-disclosure strategies.

Ama A Adams
Ropes & Gray LLP

Ama A Adams is a litigation and government enforcement partner at Ropes & Gray in Washington, DC. Her practice focuses on international transactions and the US government's regulation of trade and investment. This includes, most notably, export controls, economic sanctions, anti-corruption, foreign direct investment and customs laws and regulations. In addition to advising clients on the application of international trade regulations to their business operations, Ms Adams also assists clients in developing compliance programmes, handling pre- and post-acquisition due diligence, conducting internal investigations relating to potential violations of trade laws and representing clients before the US government agencies in connection with enforcement matters and government inquiries. She advises companies in a range of industries, including the oil and gas, aviation, pharmaceutical, manufacturing, technology, chemical and financial sectors.

Pamela Alarcón
Philippi Prietocarrizosa Ferrero DU & Uría – PPU

Pamela Alarcón is a partner at PPU and an expert in criminal law and compliance. She is also an attorney and consultant in criminal law, corporate criminal law, corruption, crime prevention and compliance, as well as risk analysis in corporate business and criminal litigation. She has an outstanding reputation for managing crises arising from criminal activities within companies, by advising legal representatives, chief executive officers, managers and administrators. She is also a criminal consultant and provides risk analysis in real estate, financial, M&A and infrastructure related matters, among others. She has extensive experience in economic criminal law, as well as corruption and criminal compliance issues.

Pamela has law and political science degrees from Los Andes University, a master's degree in advanced studies of human rights from the Carlos III University in Madrid and a specialist degree in corporate law from Pontifical Xavierian University in Bogotá. She is a former adviser to the Office of the Deputy Attorney General and a professor of corporate criminal law and compliance at various universities in Bogotá.

Stuart Alford QC
Latham & Watkins

Stuart Alford QC is a partner in the London office of Latham & Watkins and a member and former co-chair of the firm's litigation and trial department in London. Mr Alford focuses on economic crime and regulatory matters, leveraging his former experience as one of the UK's leading prosecutors to represent clients in their most critical, high-stakes cases.

From 2012 to 2016, Mr Alford headed the Fraud Division at the Serious Fraud Office (SFO), where he was responsible for many of the UK's landmark white-collar cases. His work focused on investigations in banking and money markets, including the wide-ranging cases involving foreign-exchange benchmarks, a major criminal recapitalisation investigation and the Bank of England's liquidity auctions.

Mr Alford has handled numerous multi-jurisdictional investigations, with a concentration on cross-border US–UK matters. He has supervised case teams prosecuting the LIBOR investigations and trials; led the pre-investigation stages of the foreign exchange manipulation cases and supervised the investigation of liquidity auctions run by the Bank of England during the financial crisis of 2007 and 2008.

He was appointed Queen's Counsel in 2014, while working at the SFO, a rare achievement for a lawyer in public service.

Nicholas Purnell QC
Cloth Fair Chambers

Nicholas Purnell's practice in commercial and business crime and in regulatory and professional disciplinary matters has spanned over four decades. Typically instructed at the early stages of investigations pre-charge, he advises clients in cases under examination by global regulatory and prosecuting authorities including the Serious Fraud Office (SFO), the Financial Conduct Authority, the US Department of Justice and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The development of collaborative investigations across jurisdictions has brought about the need for teams to be in place to provide joint advice on the impact of managing the response to investigations on a global basis. Nicholas has specialist experience in the development of the appropriate strategy to enable businesses to develop and cope with the resource demands imposed by such investigations.

Nicholas acted for ICBC Standard Bank throughout the first ever deferred prosecution agreement to be approved in the United Kingdom. Following months of negotiations with the SFO, Nicholas appeared before the President of the Queen's Bench Division at the High Court where the terms of the agreement were finalised. This case marked Nicholas's hat-trick of firsts: the first civil settlement with the SFO for Balfour Beatty; the first attempt at a simultaneous global settlement in the United States and the UK with the SFO in Innospec; and the combination of this first charge under section 7 of the Bribery Act in achieving this deferred prosecution agreement with the SFO.

Nicholas successfully represented clients in the United Kingdom over allegations made by the SFO against Tesco and Barclays and advised one of the three DePuy International executives who was on trial in Athens.

He focuses on white-collar criminal defence, regulatory enforcement and internal investigations. He represents a broad range of companies, financial institutions and their executives in matters involving securities fraud, accounting fraud, foreign bribery, cybersecurity, insider trading and money laundering. He has extensive experience representing corporations and individuals outside the United States in responding to inquiries and investigations.

Chambers Global 2018 recognises Mr Yannett as a Band 1 practitioner for FCPA matters, and Chambers USA 2018 recognises Mr Yannett as a Band 1 practitioner for both white-collar criminal defence and FCPA matters. Clients praise his work as 'excellent' and describe him as a 'very strong communicator and litigator' and a 'leading light in the field', noting that 'he has real gravitas about him', giving him the 'immediate respect of everybody in the room'. In a similar vein, The Legal 500: United States calls him a 'superstar', Lawdragon recognises him as one of the 500 leading lawyers in America, and Benchmark Litigation names him a 'Litigation Star'. Further, in selecting Debevoise as 'Litigation Department of the Year' in 2014, The American Lawyer stated that Mr Yannett's work on the groundbreaking Siemens FCPA internal investigation, which spanned 34 countries, and settlement with US and German authorities, 'cemented his credibility with regulators' on subsequent matters.

He is a member of the American Law Institute. Mr Yannett is on the board of advisers for the New York University programme on corporate compliance and enforcement.

Early in his career, Mr Yannett served in the Office of Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra and as an assistant United States attorney.

Steve Young Association of Corporate Investigators

Steve Young spent 20 years in UK law enforcement with the City of London and Metropolitan Police services investigating economic crime. He specialises in the proactive investigation of banking fraud, money laundering, bribery and corruption. He worked internationally with multiple law enforcement agencies in the United States, Europe and Asia. This was followed by six years as Citigroup EMEA regional director of investigations, and eight years as Barclays' global head of investigations for investment banking and wealth management. At Barclays, he managed a team of corporate investigators who worked globally on all aspects of internal and external economic crime, whistleblowing investigations, regulatory investigations and litigation support. To date, he has 39 years of international economic crime experience in both law enforcement and corporate environments. He speaks frequently on economic crime investigations at legal, corporate and law enforcement events. Steve is currently head of fraud and investigations at Lombard Odier & Co Ltd, based in Geneva and chief executive officer of the Association of Corporate Investigators.
